MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) said that his delegation could not accept the deletion of the word “arbitrary”, which would result in a statement contrary to the established practices and even to the constitutions of many countries. The phrase “against any discrimination” would imply that States had the duty to pass laws forbidding discrimination of any sort. But in certain circumstances discrimination was not reprehensible. For [10] example, in many countries the Prime Minister was chosen because he was the leader of a particular political party; yet surely there should be no law against discrimination on grounds of political opinion in such a case. Mr. Wilson therefore urged that the sentence should be made clear by the retention of the adjective “arbitrary” or, as an alternative, he proposed that the sentence should end after the words “protection of the law” in the second line.

MR. KLEKOVKIN (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) still preferred the phrase “without or against any kind of discrimination”. It was important to strengthen the text and there was no real cause for fear that distinction such as the United Kingdom representative had pointed out would be interpreted as covered by the article.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) did not think the sentence could be considered apart from its context. The first part of the article spoke of the rights and freedoms of everyone, without distinction as to race, sex, etc.; and the second part of the article clearly referred to the obligation to provide legal protection against discrimination in the enjoyment of those fundamental rights. There was therefore nothing to substantiate the possible interpretation suggested by the United Kingdom representative.

MR. CASSIN (France) was impressed by the United Kingdom argument and proposed to meet the point raised by the addition of the words “in violation of this Declaration” after the words “any discrimination” in the second line.

MR. LEBEAU (Belgium) agreed with the French representative.

THE CHAIRMAN speaking as the United States representative thought the difficulty lay in the differences of opinion concerning the meaning of the word “discrimination”. The adjective “arbitrary” would make clear what was intended. [11] She did not, however, oppose the French suggestion.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) was also willing to accept the French suggestion but he wondered whether the concept of “equal protection of the law” would be somewhat narrowed by the added reference to the rights laid down in the Declaration.

MR. CHANG (China) agreed with the United Kingdom representative that the suggested addition might have the effect of limiting the idea of equal protection of the law and advised further consideration of the article. To say “against any discrimination in violation of this Declaration” was perhaps acceptable but was certainly less strong than the phrase “without or against any discrimination”.

The meaning of “discrimination” did not present a problem, for the word was unquestionably used in a derogatory sense.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) explained that the word “discrimination” in Russian clearly referred to unfair, unequal treatment. He urged that a vote should be taken on the phrase “without or against any discrimination”.

MR. LOPEZ (Philippines) shared the doubts of the United Kingdom and Chinese representatives concerning the French suggestion. Certain rights, such as the right to travel on railroads without discrimination, were not specifically mentioned in the Declaration but should certainly be covered.

Mr. Lopez accepted the Chinese modification of his amendment to the effect that the phrase would be without or against any discrimination.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) also agreed to the Chinese wording.

MR. CASSIN (France) suggested that the words “in violation of the principles of this Declaration” would be broader than his original suggestion [12] and would rest the doubts expressed by some representatives.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) pointed out that “without distinction” had already been mentioned in paragraph 1 of the article. The phrase “without or against any discrimination” seemed therefore an unnecessary repetition which should be avoided in the interest of brevity.

MR. CHANG (China) did not agree that the phrase was repetitious since in paragraph 2 of the article it was used to describe equal protection of the law.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) observed that the “without distinction” of paragraph 1 covers all fundamental rights of which the right to equal protection of the law was merely the first.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) thought paragraph 1 referred to the opportunity of an individual to make use of his rights and freedoms whereas paragraph 2 dealt with the law. The second was not covered by the first and the phrase suggested by the Chinese representative was needed.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote first the United Kingdom proposal to delete the sentence after the words “equal protection of the law” as the amendment furthest removed from the present text.

The United Kingdom proposal was rejected by six votes to eight with one abstention.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the proposal to add “without and” before the word “against” in the second line. The proposal was adopted by ten votes to four with two abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the proposal to delete the word “arbitrary”.
[13]

The proposal was adopted by nine votes to six with one abstention.

MR. CASSIN (France) proposed again the addition of the words “in violation of the principles of this Declaration” in the second line which seemed necessary now that the word “arbitrary” had been deleted.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) feared that confusion would result if paragraph 2 spoke of the principles of the Declaration whereas paragraph 1 of the article had mentioned “rights and freedoms set forth in this Declaration”.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) and MR. STEPANENKO (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) thought that reference to violation of the present Declaration should be made only at the end of the sentence after the words “incitement to such discrimination”.

MR. CHANG (China) agreed with the United Kingdom representative that the French suggestion was unwise. He proposed that the sentence should end after the word “discrimination” in the second line.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) thought it important specifically to condemn incitement to discrimination. Since discrimination itself was considered a crime, incitement to it was also criminal.

MR. CASSIN (France) stressed that his proposal would in no way prejudice the reference to incitement to discrimination but was intended to allay the doubts of those representatives who had pointed out that the word “discrimination” had not legally an invidious meaning. There was every advantage in making the sentence clear.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) expressed his delegation’s objections to the words “against any incitement to discrimination”. In the United Kingdom where human rights had certainly been respected as much as [14] in any country, there had never been any need for legislation to compel the authorities to take action against incitement to discrimination. The force of public opinion had always proved sufficient to deal with any attempts at such incitement. If the sentence included the phrase in question, the United Kingdom, feeling morally bound to carry out the provisions of the Declaration, would be obliged to pass laws which experience had shown were neither necessary nor desirable. It was inappropriate for the Commission to place such an obligation upon a country; each country should be allowed to decide for itself how, within the framework of its own social development, the principles laid down in the Declaration could best be put into effect.

MR. LEBEAU (Belgium) associated himself with the remarks made by the United Kingdom representative and pointed out that in Belgium the question of incitement to discrimination had not arisen for the past century and there was therefore no need for laws against it. Any such laws would in fact run counter to the laws providing for freedom of speech and the press and would be possible in Belgium only to cover cases involving slander or libel. The Commission should not take a decision contrary to the United Nations principle of not causing fundamental changes in national laws.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) did not think that a country in which incitement to discrimination was not a problem would be required to pass laws against it if the phrase in question were retained, especially since the article was being drafted for the Declaration on Human Rights and not for the Covenant. Unfortunately however discrimination and incitement to discrimination did exist in some countries and for that reason the phrase was needed to ensure legal protection against such an evil.

MR. CASSIN (France) strongly favoured the inclusion of the phrase in question. [15]

The word "law" in the present case was equivalent to the French idea "le droit d'un pays" and did not necessarily imply written or criminal law. Incitement to discrimination included organized conspiracies and was extremely serious. Even in a democracy citizens should not be allowed liberties which ran counter to the liberties of others. A definite statement of the principle of legal protection against incitement to discrimination should therefore be made.

MR. MORA (Uruguay) supported the proposal to delete the phrase as the arguments presented had convinced him that it would infringe upon the freedom of expression and would therefore go beyond the intention of the article.

In reply to a point raised by MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics), MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) agreed that Sir Oswald Mosley<sup>95</sup> of the United Kingdom was guilty of anti-Semitic propaganda. He stressed however that he had not intended to say that there was no incitement to discrimination in his country, but rather to show that the United Kingdom could best deal with such a situation in its own way. Mr. Wilson asked the exact meaning of the phrase “equal protection of the law”. Did it mean that there should be laws which should be applied equally or did it mean that all were equally entitled to whatever protection the law might provide? In the latter case his objections would be largely resolved.

<sup>95</sup> Oswald Ernald Mosley (1896–1980) was a Member of Parliament in the United Kingdom who founded the British Union of Fascists.

MR. CHANG (China) thought the meaning of the phrase was clear if it were read with the proper emphasis. Since it had already been accepted by a vote of the Commission it was no longer open to question.

MR. LEBEAU (Belgium) upheld the right of the United Kingdom representative to ask what the majority had meant by the text it had voted to accept.

[16]

MR. LOPEZ (Philippines) pointed out that the article in question was a part of the Declaration on Human Rights and was not therefore legally binding.

MR. HOOD (Australia) gave his interpretation of “equal protection of the law”. All individuals were entitled to equal treatment under whatever laws existed.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) urged that the Commission should agree to such an interpretation of the phrase if that was in fact its meaning.

THE CHAIRMAN thought that since a vote had been taken the Commission should not reconsider the phrase. Its meaning seemed clear especially in view of the explanation given.

Speaking as the United States representative, she supported the deletion of the words “against any incitement to discrimination”, but was willing either to delete or retain the phrase “in violation of this Declaration”. The United States opposed the provision against incitement to discrimination because it feared that such a provision might be used to justify the enactment of repressive measures, laws that would curtail freedom of speech and the press. In her own country, for example, members of the Democratic Party might be accused of arousing discrimination against members of the Republican Party or ardent feminists of encouraging discrimination against men in favour of women. Real liberties might be endangered by the inclusion of a statement that could be too broadly interpreted.

MR. VILFAN (Yugoslavia) particularly cherished the tradition of free speech; but as one who had been unfortunate enough to live under the fascist regime in Italy where discrimination was practised, he felt that incitement to discrimination should be explicitly forbidden.

[17]

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) proposed the addition of the word “systematic” before the word “incitement”.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the Lebanese proposal.

The Lebanese proposal was rejected by six votes to five with five abstentions.

At the request of MR. LEBEAU (Belgium), the Chairman put to the vote the first part of the deletion proposed by the Chinese representative. The proposal to delete “or against any incitement to discrimination” was rejected by eight votes to seven, with one abstention. Referring to the last part of his proposal, namely, the deletion of the words “in violation of this Declaration”, MR. CHANG (China) pointed out that the comma should be omitted as it affected the meaning of the text. Without the comma the phrase would apply only to the last part of the sentence and would be acceptable.

MR. CASSIN (France) asked for a vote on his earlier proposal to insert the words “in violation of the principles of this Declaration” after “discrimination” in the second line. The discrimination spoken of there was much more serious and more frequently practised and there should be no doubt that reference to violation of the Declaration applied in that line as well as in the third line.

MR. CHANG (China) thought the French amendment would unduly weaken the words “without and against any discrimination”. The phrase at the end was sufficient.

THE CHAIRMAN appointed a small drafting committee made up of the representatives of China, France and the United Kingdom to draw up a text, or alternative texts, on the basis of the discussion that had taken place.

The meeting rose at 6:20 p.m.

E/CN.4/SR.53

1 June 1948<sup>96</sup>

Summary Record of the Fifty-Third Meeting
[of the Commission on Human Rights]

Held at Lake Success, New York, on Tuesday,
 27 May 1948, at 2:30 p.m.<sup>97</sup>

Chairman: Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, United States of America. Rapporteur: Mr. Malik, Lebanon. Members: Mr. Hood, Australia; Mr. Lebeau, Belgium; Mr. A. Stepanenko, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic; Mr. Chang, China; Mr. Loutfi, Egypt; Mr. Cassin, France; Mrs. Mehta, India; Mr. de J. Quijano, Panama; Mr. Lopez, Philippines; Mr. Klekovkin, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic; Mr. Pavlov, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics; Mr. Wilson, United Kingdom; Mr. Fontaina, Uruguay; Mr. Vilfan, Yugoslavia. Also Present: Mrs. Ledon, Representative of the Commission on the Status of Women. Specialized Agencies: Mr. Cox, International Labour Organization; Mr. Lebar, United

<sup>96</sup> This is the date of the meeting. The document was issued on 4 June 1948.

<sup>97</sup> The date was changed to 1 June 1948 at 10:45 a.m. by E/CN.4/SR.53/Corr.1 of 11 June 1948.

Nations Educational Scientific and Cultural Organization. [2] Non-governmental Organizations: Miss Sender, American Federation of Labor; Mr. van Istendael. Secretariat: Mr. J. Humphrey, Director, Human Rights Division; Mr. E. Lawson, Secretary of the Commission.

MR. QUIJANO (Panama) explained the reasons which had prevented him from taking a more active part in the debate. He had been informed of his assignment only on the very eve of the Commission's convening, and thought, therefore, that the observations of one who had not followed the work through its various stages could not be as effective as the opinions expressed by those members who were more familiar with the subject at hand.

Another obstacle was his lack of fluency in the two working languages and the scarcity of documents in Spanish. He had not requested more ample documentation in his language, keeping in mind the difficulties mentioned by the Director of the Division of Human Rights; and had used his vote trying to express his Government's wishes.

He did, however, regret not having intervened in the discussion of the second paragraph of article 3, when it was decided to delete the word "arbitrary", without which the paragraph lost much of its force for the reasons ably expressed by the French representative and the Chairman.

Consideration of the Draft Declaration of Human Rights

Article 4

MR. LEBEAU (Belgium) questioned the necessity of saying that every individual had the right to life, as in his opinion the Declaration applied only to those who were already alive.

In reply to MR. CASSIN (France), who pointed out that at a time when millions of people had been deprived of their life it was important that the Commission should raise its voice in defence and emphasis of that right, Mr. Lebeau said that in that case the wording should be [3] "has the right to protection of his life". If the article were to be put to the vote in its present form, he would have to abstain from voting.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) thought the remarks of the Belgian representative were logical, but since no other wording had been suggested, the article would have to remain in its present form. He recalled that during the discussion on this article in the Drafting Committee he had pointed out that it lacked concreteness and was divorced from actual realities since millions of people were still dying of starvation, succumbing to epidemics and being exterminated in wars.

MR. LEBEAU (Belgium) requested that the article should be voted upon in sections.

THE CHAIRMAN agreed and put to the vote the phrase: "Everyone has the right to life".

It was adopted by fourteen votes to none, with one abstention. The phrase "everyone has the right to liberty and security of person" was adopted by fifteen votes to none.

Article 5

MR. CHANG (China) drew attention to the Chinese draft for article 5, the first part of which was the same as that used in the United Kingdom and Indian draft. For the present, he thought discussion ought to be limited to article 5, leaving the question of merging articles 5 and 8 to a later stage.

MISS SENDER (American Federation of Labor) thought the text presented jointly by the representatives of United Kingdom and India, and the Chinese text, constituted an improvement over the Drafting Committee's text which excluded the notion of compulsory or forced labour. Both the concept of slavery and that of forced labour or involuntary servitude should be covered by the Declaration.

[4]

THE CHAIRMAN, speaking on behalf of the United States delegation, supported the joint United Kingdom and India text as it expressed the thought in terms of a right instead of a prohibition. She thought the expression "involuntary servitude" was appropriate; it expressed the idea of freedom from peonage or forced or compulsory labour.

MR. CASSIN (France) observed that the French text was much wider in scope than the others, for in saying that "slavery in all its forms" would be prohibited all the possible manifestations of slavery would have been covered; whereas forced labour was only one form of slavery, and the article would not be effective against traffic in women and children. It was better not to attempt to enumerate the various forms of slavery for in mentioning some there was danger of forgetting others.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) recalled that during the deliberations in the Drafting Committee he had proposed two amendments: The inclusion of the words "and slave trade" after the word "slavery", and the addition of a second sentence reading "All attempts at the establishment or retention of slavery or slave trade should be prohibited under threat of punishment by law".

THE CHAIRMAN and the representative of India believed the addition of the words "and slave trade" to be unnecessary as in their opinion the word slavery included slave trade. They felt that the sentence proposed by the USSR representative would be inappropriate in the Declaration, which was a statement of human rights, but could perhaps be considered for inclusion in the Covenant.

MR. CASSIN (France) supported the first amendment proposed by the USSR representative and said that if it were adopted he would not ask for a vote on the first sentence of the French text.

[5]

Although he agreed that slavery and slave trade should be prohibited, he considered the inclusion of the clause on punishment inappropriate in the Declaration for then similar penal clauses would have to be included in every article to cover cases of violation.

The first USSR amendment was rejected by nine votes to six.

The second USSR amendment was rejected by ten votes to four.

The joint United Kingdom and Indian text was adopted by nine votes to three with three abstentions.

MR. CASSIN (France) expressed his Government's desire to see a particularly strong condemnation of slavery included in the Declaration and requested that the last sentence of the French text should be put to the vote.

MR. FONTAINA (Uruguay) stated that he agreed on the substance of the French text but felt that juridical considerations should be left out of the Declaration as they merely served to limit the principle to which they applied.

THE CHAIRMAN agreed with the views expressed by the representative of Uruguay.

The last sentence of the French text, "Their practice is a challenge to the conscience of the world", was rejected by seven votes to two with six abstentions.

Article 3, paragraph 2

THE CHAIRMAN drew the attention of the Commission to the following new draft of article 3, paragraph 2, which had been prepared by the small drafting group set up for that purpose at the previous meeting:

"All are equal before the law and are entitled to equal protection of the law without any discrimination, and against any discrimination in violation of this Declaration or incitement to such discrimination."

[6]

MR. HOOD (Australia) objected that there was over-elaboration of the wording at the expense of clarity, and that the word "discrimination" had been used with two different shades of meaning. He proposed that the word "distinction" should be substituted for the first use of the word “discrimination”, so that the wording would then be “. . . without distinction, against any discrimination . . .”

MR. CHANG (China) explained that the small drafting group had not been particularly satisfied with the final wording; the text had, however, the advantage of being in conformity with the decisions taken by the Commission at the previous meeting, and could therefore be adopted without the Commission reconsidering the votes already taken.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) stated that he, as a member of the drafting group, was bound by the text it had produced. He reminded the Commission that he had opposed the inclusion of the clause “against discrimination and against incitement”; since, however, the Commission had decided in favour of its inclusion, the present draft represented the most satisfactory one within that decision. He proposed therefore, that the second part of the paragraph should be put to the vote first. He was willing to accept the Australian amendment.

MR. CASSIN (France) also declared his readiness to accept the Australian amendment, provided the Chinese representative had no objection to it. From the point of view of style, he found it an improvement.

MR. STEPANENKO (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) averred that, in spite of the long discussion of article 3 at the previous meeting, when decisions had been taken concerning its contents, the text now proposed represented something quite different. In his opinion it would be incorrect to reconsider the decisions already taken, and therefore the only part of the draft open to discussion was the phrase “in violation of this Declaration”, which had not been agreed upon at the earlier meeting.

[7]

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) assured the Byelorussian representative that he was not proposing the reconsideration of the paragraph; he had merely suggested that a vote should be taken first upon that part of the paragraph which had not been decided upon earlier.

THE CHAIRMAN stated that, as the Australian amendment was only a minor drafting change, it could be accepted without reconsidering earlier votes.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) protested that the drafting group had gone beyond its terms of reference, which had been to decide where the phrase “in violation of this Declaration” was to appear in the paragraph.

The Australian amendment only made the position more complicated, since the Commission had decided upon the word “discrimination”.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the drafting group had not exceeded its mandate, since the new draft contained no substantive changes from the decisions which had been taken at the previous meeting.

MR. CHANG (China) recalled that by the two votes taken at the previous meeting, the Commission had decided that the phrase “without and against any discrimination” was to be included, and that mention was to be made of incitement to discrimination. The only question not decided had been the position of the phrase concerning the principles of the Declaration, the inclusion of which had been suggested by the representative of France. The drafting group had decided, with the agreement of the French representative, that the phrase “in violation of this Declaration” should qualify the phrase “against any discrimination” and not the phrase “without any discrimination”.

[8]

Mr. Chang contended that in making that decision, the drafting group had in no way overstepped its terms of reference. If, however, any members felt that an unwarranted liberty had been taken with the wording, the Commission could revert to the original text, in which case the Chinese delegation would abandon the compromise text and urge, as before, a shorter paragraph, ending with the words “and against any discrimination”.

With regard to the Australian amendment, its acceptance would necessitate a reconsideration of the votes taken at the previous meeting.

MR. CASSIN (France) confirmed the statement of the Chinese representative. The drafting group had carried out its mandate in strict observance of the instructions of the Commission, and had unanimously decided that the qualifications “in violation of this Declaration” could only be placed after the phrase “against any discrimination”. The Australian amendment seemed to him to be chiefly a question of style, to avoid the repetition of the word “discrimination”.

THE CHAIRMAN ruled that the text submitted by the drafting group embodied the meaning of the votes taken previously, and that the Australian proposal was simply an amendment to the wording of the text of the drafting group, the acceptance of which would not necessitate any reconsideration of those votes.

[9]

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) objected to that ruling as incorrect. The Chairman declared herself willing to have the ruling put to a vote.

MR. STEPANENKO (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) could not agree that the Australian amendment was merely a question of form; as far as the Russian translation was concerned, it certainly changed the substance of the article. He was opposed to any reconsideration of the votes already taken, and thought a vote should be taken upon the text prepared by the drafting group.

THE CHAIRMAN proposed that since it was obvious that there would be no agreement at the present stage, the only procedure was for the drafting group, together with the representatives of Australia and the Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, to discuss the text again, and present alternative formulas for the Commission to vote upon.

MR. CHANG (China) supported that proposal.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom), while not opposing the suggestion, asked whether the drafting group was to consider itself bound by the actual words decided in the votes at the earlier meeting. He had thought the group was well within its mandate if it changed certain words or expressions merely as a matter of style.

MR. KLEKOVKIN (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) could not agree with the United Kingdom representative that style only was involved. The Australian amendment of “distinction” for “discrimination” was an alteration of substance. The word “discrimination” had already been adopted at the previous meeting, and must be retained.

[10]

MR. LOPEZ (Philippines) considered the text produced by the drafting group was in conformity with the votes taken at the previous meeting. The Australian amendment, however, was an amendment of substance, and could not be accepted unless the Commission decided to reconsider the votes.

If the article were to be returned to the drafting group, however, he would ask them to consider the omission of the clause “in violation of this Declaration”. There might be certain rights protected by national laws which found no place in the Declaration, and the clause in question would have the effect of limiting the scope of the principle embodied in the article.

MR. CASSIN (France) stated that there was no difference of substance between the words “distinction” and “discrimination” in French. For his part, he preferred the word “discrimination”, but he had used the word “distinction” in his translation of the text submitted by the drafting group because that word was found in all the official translations of “discrimination”.

MR. HOOD (Australia) declared that in the circumstances he was willing to withdraw his amendment, which he had put forward only in the interest of clarity.

THE CHAIRMAN asked the drafting group to take into account the fact that the word “distinction” was used throughout the Charter, and that the use of the word “discrimination” would constitute an important change.

Since the Australian representative had withdrawn his amendment, he would not need to take part in the discussions of the drafting group which would now be composed of the representatives of China, France, the United Kingdom, the Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic and the Philippines.

The meeting rose at 1 p.m.

E/CN.4/SR.54*1 June 1948<sup>98</sup>

Summary Record of the Fifty-Fourth Meeting
[of the Commission on Human Rights]

Held at Lake Success, New York, on Tuesday,
 1 June 1948, at 2:30 p.m.

Chairman: Mrs. F. D. Roosevelt, United States of America. Rapporteur: Mr. Malik, Lebanon. Members: Mr. Hood, Australia; Mr. Lebeau, Belgium; Mr. A. Stepanenko, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic; Mr. Chang, China; Mr. Loutfi, Egypt; Mr. Cassin, France; Mrs. Mehta, India; Mr. Azkoul, Lebanon; Mr. Quijano, Panama; Mr. Lopez, Philippines; Mr. Klekovkin, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic; Mr. Pavlov, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics; Mr. Wilson, United Kingdom; Mr. Fontaina, Uruguay; Mr. Mora, Venezuela, Mr. Vilfan, Yugoslavia. Also Present: Mrs. Ledon, Representative of the Commission on the Status of Women; Mr. Lebar, United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization. [2] Non-governmental Organizations: Miss Sender, American Federation of Labor; Mr. van Istendael; Mr. Goldsmith, Agudas Israel World Organization; Mr. Brotman, Co-ordinating Board of Jewish Organizations; Miss Strahler, International Committee of the Red Cross; Miss Burgess, Business and Professional Women Liaison Committee of Women's International Organizations; Mr. Bienenfeld, World Jewish Congress.

Continuation of Consideration of Draft International Declaration on Human Rights (document E/CN.4/95)

Article 3

MR. CHANG (China) reported that the drafting sub-committee appointed at the fifty-third meeting had agreed on the text of paragraph 2, Article 3 as originally amended. The Philippine representative had accepted the view of the French representative that the words "in violation" should be retained. The English and the Russian texts would contain the word "discrimination", while the French text would use "distinction", since the words in question were so used in the United Nations Charter.

THE CHAIRMAN suggested that the second part of the paragraph should be voted first.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) wished that the paragraph should be voted on in two parts and supported the Chairman's view that the second part i.e. "against any discrimination in violation of the Declaration or incitement to such discrimination" should be put to the vote first.

<sup>98</sup> This is the date of the meeting. The document was issued on 10 June 1948.

THE CHAIRMAN put the second part of paragraph 2, of Article 3 to the vote.
[3]

The second part of paragraph 2 of Article 3, was adopted by eleven votes to none, with five abstentions.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) regretted that he felt obliged to vote against paragraph 2 as a whole although he was in agreement with the principle expressed in the first part. However, he considered that the expression “equal protection against any discrimination” was ambiguous and the words “without any discrimination” were unnecessary. The Declaration should merely state general principles and not elaborate them. In its present form the paragraph was weaker than the original.

MR. LEBEAU (Belgium) was opposed to the present text of the paragraph which he considered confused both verbally and in the ideas which it wished to convey. A simple declaration which would be clearly understood was preferable to a detailed and involved statement.

THE CHAIRMAN put the whole of paragraph 2, of Article 3 to the vote.

Paragraph 2 was adopted by a vote of nine votes to six, with one abstention.

The Chairman put the whole of Article 3 to the vote.

Article 3 was adopted by nine votes to five, with two abstentions.

Article 6

THE CHAIRMAN outlined the background of Article 6. The text adopted at the second session of the Commission contained 4 main elements: 1) no arrest or detention except in cases prescribed by law and, 2) after due process; 3) immediate judicial determination of the legality of detention; 4) trial within reasonable time or release.

The minority text contained in the report of the Drafting Committee included four additional elements: 5) arrest or detention must be in accordance [4] with pre-existing law; 6) the person arrested or detained must be informed of the reasons for his detention; 7) there must be no imprisonment for inability to fulfil contractual obligations; 8) there must be compensation for false arrest.

Some members had felt that eight separate provisions were too many and consequently the Drafting Committee’s article had been rejected. Article 6 represented the view of the majority of the Drafting Committee on what should be said about arrest.

The Commission had at present before it the proposal of the Chinese, Indian and the United Kingdom delegations that the article should simply state “no one should be subjected to arbitrary arrest or detention”. (E/CN.4/99 and E/CN.4/102).

Speaking as the representative of the United States of America, the Chairman favoured the proposed text. She suggested that the Chinese, Indian and the United Kingdom amendment should be voted first as furthest removed from the original draft. If the text were rejected, she would make a further suggestion as to the order of considering the various points in the Drafting Committee and Geneva texts.

MRS. MEHTA (India) pointed out that the Declaration should lay down principles and not become involved in details. It should be couched in as simple language as possible. The proposed amendment possessed that quality.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) favoured the text of the amendment. It was short and concise but contained all the essential elements. Detailed elaboration was more appropriate in the Covenant than in the Declaration. In addition the second part of Article 3 which had just been adopted implied the details contained in Article 6.

[5]

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) felt that simplicity might be carried to extremes and opposed the amendment as oversimplified. The amendment must be considered a very general statement which contained no effective guarantees against arbitrary arrest. He referred to Article 6 in the minority report which had been voted twelve times and rejected only in the thirteenth vote by the narrow margin of three to two.

Thus it could not be considered a true reflection of the majority decision. Both the text adopted at the second session of the Commission and that adopted by the Drafting Committee were better than the proposed amendment.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) pointed out that what was needed was not a longer or a shorter text. The length should be determined by the substance. The Declaration should state the principle involved but should not deal with its application. The USSR representative had correctly recalled what had happened in the Drafting Committee. There was always substantial agreement when a vote was taken on principles but disagreements immediately appeared when details were discussed.

Mr. Wilson was not opposed to the details but he felt that a selection must be made of what should be included in the Declaration. Since the Declaration was to be an important basis for teaching education and propaganda, it should be as simple as possible. He favoured the amendment as being less complicated than the original article.

MR. LOUTFI (Egypt) recalled that the United Nations Charter contained a guarantee of personal safety. Agreement on detailed provisions was difficult. The text of the relevant article in the communication from the French Government (document E/CN.4/82/Add.8) seemed clearer than the proposed substitute. He wished to know whether the United Kingdom representative would accept the first sentence of the French text.

[6]

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) would not vote against the French text but preferred the China-India-United Kingdom substitute as being more precise.

THE CHAIRMAN considered that in substance the proposed substitute and the French text meant the same.

MR. CASSIN (France) expressed the view that the Drafting Committee's text could form part of the Covenant but not of the Declaration. The text adopted at the second session of the Commission represented a happy medium and he was prepared to vote for it. Acceptance of the Egyptian suggestion would make it easier for him to vote for the China-India-United Kingdom substitute.

MR. LARRAIN (Chile) favoured the text adopted at the second session of the Commission, which covered all principles and ideas which should be stated. He merely wished to substitute "immediately" for "within a reasonable time".

MRS. MEHTA (India) pointed out that the proposed substitute was identical with the language used in Article 9 of the Covenant and that consequently it should be also accepted for the Declaration.

THE CHAIRMAN said she would put the text to the vote in the following order: first the China-India-United Kingdom substitute as furthest removed from the original, and then the first sentence of the text adopted at the second session of the Commission.

The China-India-United Kingdom text was adopted by ten votes to four with two abstentions.

[7]

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) wished to draw the Commission's attention to the fact that, apart from arbitrary arrest mentioned in the adopted article there were other violations which had to be considered. They were contained in the minority report which included the following provisions: Every person has the right to be promptly informed of the reasons for his detention; the right to judicial determination whether his detention was legal or illegal, and the right to be tried before a court.

No person should be in prison for inability to meet a contractual obligation. In case of illegal arrest an innocent person must be compensated. The Commission should vote those provisions one by one, but it could not reject them without previous examination.

THE CHAIRMAN stated that the Commission had given the Article careful consideration. It did not seem possible to reopen discussion of an article which had been adopted. She assured the USSR representative that his remarks would be included in the summary record.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) considered the Chairman's statement a violation of the rules of procedure.

In order to ascertain the sentiment of the Commission members concerning her ruling the Chairman put the question of whether the Commission wished to proceed with a discussion of Article 7 or consider the USSR representative's suggestion, to a vote.

The Commission decided by ten votes to four with one abstention to consider Article 7.

Article 7

MR. CHANG (China) accepted the India-United Kingdom text (E/CN.4/99) but suggested that it should be changed as follows: "Everyone in the determination of any criminal charge against him and of his rights and obligations [8] is entitled . . ." He explained that he suggested the change because the text adopted at the second session of the Commission followed that order.

MR. CASSIN (France) was ready to accept the India-United Kingdom text but considered that the present position of the Article in question between two articles dealing with penal law was not appropriate. The important word in the Article was "tribunal". If the text was made shorter it should also be made stronger and the idea of access to the tribunal must be emphasized.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) was ready to accept the Chinese representative's suggestion concerning the transposition of the clauses. He agreed with the French representative that the Article might be inserted in a more appropriate place but felt that it was necessary to decide first what articles should be included and the question of order might be settled later.

MR. STEPANENKO (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) found the India-United Kingdom amendment unsatisfactory. The draft adopted at the second session of the Commission mentioned the right to the aid of a qualified representative in court. The amendment did not mention the right to trial in one's native language. Such an omission must be regarded as discrimination and many countries practised such discrimination against members of minority groups.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) referred the Commission to the text submitted by the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics delegation and contained on page 29 of document E/CN.4/95. He pointed out that the India-United Kingdom amendment made no reference to the important principle that all persons were equal before the courts, that judges should be independent, that legal procedure should be based on [9] democratic principles, that trials should be public and that an accused person was entitled to defence in his native language. He proposed the entire text as a separate amendment to Article 7.

MR. CASSIN (France) requested that the USSR amendment should be voted in parts. He would be ready to accept only the first sentence.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that Article 3, paragraph 2 had stated “all are equal before the law” which seemed synonymous with equality before the courts. Considering that the India-United Kingdom text was farthest removed she suggested that it should be voted first.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) stressed that his proposal was farthest removed because it stated general principles, whereas the India-United Kingdom text was specific. Equality before the law and equality before the courts were not synonymous. He could quote many examples, to show that coloured and white people were in theory equal before the law but that such was certainly not the practice of the courts. The Commission might not agree to those proposals of democratic guarantees but it should not distort them. Mr. Pavlov insisted that his proposal should be put to the vote.

In order to determine which text was farthest removed from the Geneva text the Chairman read the USSR proposal and the India-United Kingdom substitute.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) favoured the India-United Kingdom text but felt that the USSR proposal contained a very valuable element, i.e., equality before the law.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) felt that the Chinese-Indian-United Kingdom draft, being the shortest, was farthest removed from the Geneva [10] text. As regards the first sentence of the USSR amendment to Article 13 of the Covenant, in the United Kingdom the concept of equality before tribunals was included in the principle of equality before the law. He therefore opposed the USSR proposal as repetitious of previously stated principles.

MR. CHANG (China) also felt that the principles of equality before the law and before the tribunal were the same.

MRS. MEHTA (India) observed that the Chinese-Indian-United Kingdom draft was simpler and covered all provisions of the USSR amendment. In India the two above-mentioned concepts were also synonymous; for countries where that was not so, the words “fair hearing” and “impartial tribunals” should cover the first sentence of the USSR amendment.

THE CHAIRMAN agreed with the Indian representative’s remarks.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics), replying to the preceding speakers, noted that, in colonial history the principle of equality before the law had not always implied equality before the tribunals. With reference to the remarks by the Indian representative, he stated that the USSR text was more definite and concrete, leaving no room for different interpretations to which the Chinese-Indian-United Kingdom draft might give rise. He would welcome a sentence by sentence vote which would clearly show the Commission’s views on the various provisions of his proposal.

MR. LEBEAU (Belgium), while not opposing the USSR proposal in principle, would vote against it as inappropriate for a Declaration.

MR. FONTAINA (Uruguay) stated that he did not oppose the principle of the USSR proposal, but would vote against it as inappropriate in the [11] Declaration. He would abstain on paragraph 2 of that proposal in view of the fact that the problem concerned did not exist in his country.

THE CHAIRMAN noted that while there was general agreement with the principle of the USSR proposal, the feeling was that its detailed provisions belonged to the Covenant.

After further discussion of the procedure to be followed, the Chairman, at the request of the USSR representative, put the latter's amendment to the vote sentence by sentence. (E/CN.4/95, page 29).

Paragraph 1. sentence 1 was rejected by eight votes to six with one abstention.

Paragraph 1. sentence 2 was rejected by seven votes to four with four abstentions.

Paragraph 1. sentence 3 was rejected by nine votes to four with three abstentions.

Paragraph 1. sentence 4 was rejected by six votes to four with five abstentions.

Paragraph 2 was rejected by six votes to five with four abstentions.

MR. CASSIN (France) appealing for the greatest possible measure of agreement on the text, urged the Commission to accept the following amendment:

“Everyone is entitled in full equality to a fair hearing by an independent and impartial tribunal in the determination of his rights . . .”

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) was not opposed to the addition of the words “independent and”, but felt that the expression: “in full equality” was repetitious, and therefore inadvisable.

MR. CHANG (China) shared the United Kingdom representative's opinion.
[12]

MRS. MEHTA (India) also felt that the French amendment was covered by the original Chinese-Indian-United Kingdom text. Moreover, the addition of the word “independent” would only require further explanations in the Covenant.

MR. LARRAIN (Chile) stated that he would vote for the French amendment with the understanding that the words “in full equality” included the question of language to which his delegation had attached great importance ever since the second session of the Commission.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the French amendment to the Chinese-Indian-United Kingdom draft.

The addition of the words “in full equality” was accepted by seven votes to six with four abstentions.

The addition of the words “independent and” was accepted by eight votes to two with six abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the Chinese-Indian-United Kingdom draft, as amended by the representative of France.

The Chinese-Indian-United Kingdom draft, as amended, was adopted by thirteen votes to none, with four abstentions.

Article 8

MR. CASSIN (France), upon a suggestion by the Chairman with regard to the voting procedure, pointed out that the India-United Kingdom text, while farthest removed from the text adopted at the second session of the Commission, could not be put to the vote first in view of the fact that it omitted several fundamental principles contained in the other drafts. He therefore felt that the Commission should either amplify the India-United Kingdom draft, or shorten the draft adopted at its second session.

[13]

MR. LOUTFI (Egypt) would support the United Kingdom draft provided it was made to include the last part of paragraph 1 of the text adopted at the second session of the Commission, which contained an important corollary to the principle of non-retroactivity of law. He also thought the Article should include the principle that a person must be presumed to be innocent until proved guilty.

THE CHAIRMAN proposed that a drafting group should be set up to reformulate Article 8, paragraphs 1 and 2. Paragraph 3 could be put to the vote at once.

MR. BIENENFELD (World Jewish Congress) spoke in favour of retention of Article 8, paragraph 2, of the draft adopted at the second session of the Commission. Omission of that paragraph would be contrary to the principles of the Hague Convention of 1907<sup>99</sup> as well as the principles established by the International Military Tribunals at the Nuremberg Trials. Those principles protected the law of humanity against violation by national laws (as had happened in the case of Nazi Germany). Omission of that paragraph would constitute a step back in international law.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) agreed with a suggestion by the representative of Lebanon to vote, paragraph by paragraph on Article 8 of the Drafting Committee's text, and explained the reasons for omitting some principles from his amendment. The first sentence of the text adopted at the second session had been deleted in view of the fact that the presumption of a defendant's innocence was frequently shifted during a trial. The second sentence had been omitted, its principle being covered by the preceding Article. With regard to the last principle of paragraph 1, he explained that it was sometimes unwise, as in the case of people engaging in the black market, to permit offenders to weigh the pre-established penalty against the [14] profits they hoped to make. The question of penalty was not a fundamental human right and should be considered on a different basis. He pointed out that the last part of paragraph 1 proposed by the United Kingdom included national as well as international law.

<sup>99</sup> The Regulations annexed to the fourth Hague Convention of 1907 govern the laws and customs of war. They were relied upon by the International Military Tribunal which said "the rules of land warfare expressed in this Convention are declaratory of existing international law" (France et al. v. Goering et al., (1948) 22 IMT 44, at 581.

MR. HOOD (Australia) did not think that the United Kingdom draft of paragraph 1 covered the provisions of paragraph 2 of the Geneva text which, he felt, should be retained so as to avoid any lacunas in the Declaration. It might be better, however, to consider later whether that provision might not be included elsewhere, possibly in the limitation clause of Article 2.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) pointed out that the first sentence of paragraph 1 of the text adopted at the second session contained the important principle of innocence until proved guilty, which represented great progress from the inquisitorial trial concepts of the Middle Ages to which Nazi Germany had reverted. If established, the drafting group should take that point into consideration. With reference to paragraph 2, he stated that he had always opposed the expression: "principles of law recognized by civilized nations" which implied the condescending attitude of colonial powers toward their colonial peoples. The Commission should rather use the word "democratic countries". He supported an immediate vote on paragraph 3.

MR. CHANG (China) noted general agreement on the clear and simple drafting of paragraph 3. As regards the other paragraphs, disagreement might arise, not on the principles involved, but with regard to their appropriateness in the present context. He favoured retention of the first sentence of paragraph 1, deletion of the second sentence, and would abstain from voting on the third and fourth sentences. Paragraph 2 could be deleted, and paragraph 3 maintained.

[15]

MR. LEBEAU (Belgium) agreed with the representative of France. The full text of paragraph 1 should be retained in view of the importance of the principles contained. All the important principles cited by the French representative were contained in the French draft (E/CN.4/82/Add.8). He shared the view of the representative of the World Jewish Congress with respect to paragraph 2, the importance of which his delegation had stressed already at the second session. While supporting paragraph 3, he suggested that the wording might be rearranged in a more logical sequence: "No one shall be subjected to torture, or to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment."

MR. VILFAN (Yugoslavia) also favoured retention of paragraph 2, pointing out that the defence at the Nuremberg Trials had based itself on the non-retroactivity of penal law. Moreover, several German war criminals had been acquitted on the basis of legalistic interpretation of the principle of non-retroactivity of laws, as could be seen from the Official Transcript of 19 February 1948 of the American Military Tribunal in Nuremberg, (0930–1630), pp. 10440 and 10438.<sup>100</sup> Consequently, it was most important to retain paragraph 2, and he thought, in that connection, that some of the conclusions reached at the Nuremberg Trials (see document E/CN.4/W.19) could well be included in the present Declaration.

After a brief exchange of views on a suggestion by THE CHAIRMAN to proceed to a vote on the principles contained in Article 8 for the drafting sub-committee's guidance, MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) proposed that the Commission should not commit itself as yet, but rather appoint a drafting sub-committee for a reformulation of that Article. The sub-committee could take full account of the views expressed in the Commission.

[16]

MR. CASSIN (France) suggested that the following concepts should be considered in connection with Article 8: innocence until proven guilty, public trial, guarantees of defence (independent tribunals could be omitted in view of the preceding provisions), non-retroactivity of laws and punishment, and the non-applicability of those rights to war-criminals for which the USSR amendment could be considered.

THE CHAIRMAN then put to the vote Article 8, paragraph 3, with the amendment proposed by the representative of Belgium.

Paragraph 3 with the proposed amendment was adopted unanimously.

THE CHAIRMAN then appointed a sub-committee, consisting of the representatives of the United Kingdom, India, France, China, and Yugoslavia, to compose a new draft of Article 8, paragraphs 1 and 2.

The meeting rose at 5:45 p.m.

E/CN.4/105

2 June 1948

Lebanon: Amendment to Article 13 of the International Declaration on Human Rights (Document E/CN.4/95)

Add the following to the text of Article 13 as drafted by the Drafting Committee:

<sup>100</sup> The reference is to the judgment of the American Military Tribunal in the case of List et al., (1950) 11 TWC 1230, known as the "The Hostage Case". The discussion of non-retroactivity (see pp. 1238–1240) is consistent with the view taken by the International Military Tribunal and can in no way be described as "legalistic interpretation". Vilfan was probably upset about other portions of the judgment that do not attribute combatant status to anti-Nazi partisans operating in Yugoslavia (ibid., pp. 1243–1246), and that recognize the lawfulness of reprisals and hostage-taking under certain circumstances in dealing with guerilla warfare.

“The family deriving from marriage is the natural and fundamental group unit of society. It is endowed by the creator with inalienable rights antecedent to all positive law and as such shall be protected by the State and society.”

[The document also contains the French text of the amendment.]

E/CN.4/109

2 June 1948

First Report of the Sub-Committee Consisting of the Representatives of China, France, India, United Kingdom and Yugoslavia on Article 8 of the Draft Declaration on Human Rights

Article 8

1. Everyone is presumed to be innocent until proved guilty according to law (in a public trial at which he has had all guarantees necessary for his defence).

2. No one shall be held guilty of any offence on account of any act or omission which did not constitute an offence, under national or international law, at the time when it was committed.

E/CN.4/SR.55

2 June 1948<sup>101</sup>

Original Text: French

Summary Record of the Fifty-Fifth Meeting [of the Commission
on Human Rights]

Held at Lake Success, New York, on Wednesday,
2 June 1948, at 11 a.m.

Chairman: Mrs. F. D. Roosevelt, United States of America. Vice-Chairman: Mr. P. C. Chang Wu, China; Mr. R. Cassin, France. Rapporteur: Mr. Malik, Lebanon. Members: Mr. Hood, Australia; Mr. Lebeau, Belgium; Mr. A. Stepanenko, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic; Mr. Larrain, Chile; Mr. O. Loutfi, Egypt; Mrs. H. Mehta, India; Mr. M. de J. Quijano, Panama; Mr. Lopez, Philippines; Mr. Klekovkin, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic; Mr. Pavlov, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics; Mr. Wilson, United Kingdom; Mr. Fontaina, Uruguay; Mr. Vilfan, Yugoslavia. Also Present: Mrs. Ledon, Representative of the Commission on the Status of Women. Specialized Agencies: Mr. R. W. Cox, International Labour Organization (ILO); Mr. Lebar, United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization

<sup>101</sup> This is the date of the meeting. The document was issued on 15 June 1948.

(UNESCO). [2] Non-governmental Organizations: Miss Toni Sender, American Federation of Labor (AF of L); Mr. van Istendael, International Federation of Christian Trade Unions (IFCTU). Secretariat: Mr. J. Humphrey, Director, Division of Human Rights; Mr. E. Lawson, Secretary of the Commission.

Continuation of the Consideration of the Report of the Drafting
Committee to the Commission on Human Rights (Document E/CN.4/95);
Consideration of the Articles of the Declaration and the Amendments Presented by Various Delegations (Documents E/CN.4/82/Add.8; E/CN.4/99; E/CN.4/102)

Article 9

THE CHAIRMAN read the Drafting Committee's text and the variants submitted by the delegations of China, France, and India and the United Kingdom.

MR. CASSIN (France) said the French delegation was in full agreement with the Drafting Committee's text and consequently would withdraw its own text (document E/CN.4/88/Add.8, paragraph 8).

Speaking as representative of the United States of America, the Chairman said she supported the United Kingdom-India text; she did not consider it necessary to specify the legal nature of protection, since equal protection under the law was already guaranteed to all by article 3, which had been adopted.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) observed that apart from the point made by the Chairman, protection could be granted by other means beside the purely legal; hence the specification "under the law" was not merely unnecessary, but undesirable.

MR. CHANG (China) drew attention to the negative form in which article 9 was worded in the text proposed by his delegation. The wording [3] "No one shall be subjected to unreasonable interference . . ." affirmed implicitly everyone's right to protection under the law and avoided the ambiguity which might arise as a result of the deletion of the words "under the law" from the Drafting Committee's text.

He thought, moreover, that the order of presentation of the provisions was more logical in his delegation's text beginning as it did with interference with the individual and from there going on to cover interference with his family, home, correspondence and reputation.

MR. VILFAN (Yugoslavia) preferred the Drafting Committee's text. The provisions of article 3 were not applicable to the cases covered by article 9; paragraph 2 of article 3 provided for the protection of the law against arbitrary discrimination, whereas article 9 dealt with the protection of the individual, his family and home, and it was important that such values should be protected by law.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) agreed with Mr. Vilfan that the provisions of article 3 were not sufficient to cover cases under article 9. Furthermore, he felt it was indispensable to ensure recourse to legal protection in cases of unreasonable interference in order to avoid possible recourse to protection outside the law. Deletion of the words “under the law” might allow of too wide or arbitrary an interpretation of the rights guaranteed under article 9.

He could not, therefore, accept the amendment proposed by the delegations of India and the United Kingdom, and would vote for the text drafted in Geneva, which had been respected by the Drafting Committee.

MRS. MEHTA (India) pointed out that the Commission had not deemed it necessary to specify in article 4, which guaranteed to everyone the right to life, liberty and security of person, that these rights would enjoy the protection of the law, which was self-evident. What was true [4] of one article was true of the others, and the Commission should try to achieve a certain uniformity of presentation in its drafting of the Declaration. However, if the majority of the Commission thought that the United Kingdom and Indian draft was not entirely satisfactory, the Indian delegation would be ready to support the Chinese draft.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) said his delegation also accepted the Chinese text and would withdraw its own proposal.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the Chinese draft of article 9 of the Draft Declaration.

Draft article 9 proposed by China was adopted by 9 votes to 3, with 4 abstentions.

[5]

Article 10

THE CHAIRMAN read out the drafts of article 10 proposed by the Drafting Committee and by the French delegation.

Replying to a question of the USSR representative, MR. CASSIN (France) pointed out that his delegation’s draft followed very closely the wording of the text, drawn up at Geneva. The difference, marked by punctuation, was that in the French text the words: “Subject to any general law not contrary to the purposes and principles of the United Nations Charter adopted for specific reasons of security or in the general interest” applied not only to movement within the borders of a given country, but also to the right to leave that country.

The text suggested by the Drafting Committee narrowed the scope of the original Geneva text, for it retained neither the reservation “Subject to any general law etc.” nor the provision on the right to acquire a nationality. As regards that right, the French delegation felt it was not directly connected with the problem of movement, and agreed to delete from its text all the part relating to nationality. It could not, however, ignore the very serious difference between the two texts as regards the general powers of governments to control movement, even movement from one country to another.

Some representatives had argued that article 2 restricted human rights within the framework of the general wellbeing and just requirements of the democratic State, and that this restriction applied to rights in general.

If the Commission agreed that the provisions of article 10 fully safeguarded the general prerogatives of the community and of the State (even if the article did not make any specific reservations to that effect), then, and then only would the French delegation vote for the Drafting Committee's text, interpreted in accordance with article 2.

[6]

MRS. MEHTA (India) said that article 10 aimed at establishing the principle of freedom of movement, which, like freedom of speech, freedom of meeting, etc., was a fundamental human right. The Drafting Committee had not deemed it necessary to restrict that freedom as it was already subject to the general limitation contained in article 2, and as it was for the Covenant to specify what definite measures should limit that right in certain cases. The right to a nationality was covered by article 15. Measures relating to the acquisition of a new nationality should come under article 15 rather than article 10. The Indian delegation would vote for the text proposed by the Drafting Committee.

THE CHAIRMAN said article 2 was clearly worded and afforded adequate safeguard for the State rights mentioned by the French representative. If each article of the Declaration were to contain reservations for every possible case, the document would become unnecessarily long.

MR. LEBEAU (Belgium) said his delegation would stand by the original text drafted at Geneva. It contained the reservation concerning any general law, but, unlike the French proposal, did not extend it to the right to leave a country. Moreover, the original text contained the provision for the right to a nationality, which the French representative had renounced on behalf of his delegation. Owing to those two appreciable differences between the Geneva and the French texts, he asked for a vote to be taken on both.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the text proposed by the French delegation.

The text of the French delegation was rejected by 9 votes to 6 with 2 abstentions.

[7]

THE CHAIRMAN then put to the vote the original Geneva text formally submitted by the Belgian representative.

The text was rejected by 11 votes to 2, with 4 abstentions.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said in explanation of his vote that he had been in favour of the French text, which his delegation considered as the best draft for article 10, but since that text had been rejected, he had voted for the Geneva text, which he thought acceptable, though not as satisfactory.

The only text remaining before the Commission was that submitted by the Drafting Committee. The USSR delegation would vote in its favour only if the following two amendments were accepted:

- (1) The words “in accordance with the laws of that country” to be added at the end of the first paragraph:
- (2) The words “in accordance with the procedure established by law” to be inserted at the beginning of the second paragraph.

The USSR delegation thought it natural that every sovereign State should have the right to establish whatever rules it considered necessary to regulate movement on its territory and across its borders. Recognition of that right was based on respect for the principle of national sovereignty embodied in the United Nations Charter.

Besides rights, people had certain obligations which they had to fulfil. That was a fact which article 10 could not leave out of account; to encourage tendencies towards total independence at the cost of the common good would be to distort the normal relations between the citizen and the State. The responsibility of ensuring collective security borne by the State gave it the right to impose certain restrictions on liberty of movement. That was true of all countries and not merely of the USSR, as had been implied in certain quarters.

To sum up, the USSR delegation was of the opinion that article 10 should recognize the sovereignty of States in accordance with the principles of the [8] Charter, establish the obligations of citizens as opposed to their rights, and formulate the principle of liberty of movement on those lines.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out to the USSR representative that article 10 did not deal with immigration. As for general reservations in respect of legislation, the Commission had only just formally rejected the two texts containing those reservations. She feared that to vote on the USSR amendments would mean reconsidering a decision already taken.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) wished to know whether, under the terms of the amendments to paragraph 2 of article 10 proposed by the USSR representative, an individual would automatically receive permission to leave his country if he conformed to the procedure established by law, or whether it was left to the discretion of the authorities to grant such permission.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) replied that permission to leave any given country would be granted in accordance with the legislation in force in that country.

MR. LEBEAU (Belgium) stated he would be unable to vote for the USSR amendments, since he believed they deprived the two provisions of article 10 of part of their meaning. He would therefore vote in favour of the text submitted by the Drafting Committee subject to the same reservation as Mr. Cassin's, i.e. provided it was clearly understood that the article would be interpreted in the light of article 2.

MR. LOPEZ (Philippines) stated he had voted in favour of the text [9] proposed by the French delegation and later in favour of the Geneva text. He would vote against the text submitted by the Drafting Committee because the liberty of movement and residence guaranteed under article 10 should be specifically subjected to the laws of the State. The general limitation embodied in article 2, concerning the just requirements of a democratic society, seemed to his Government insufficient in that particular case and should be repeated in article 10.

MR. LARRAIN (Chile) stated that his delegation's position was well known and perfectly clear: it thought the Declaration should proclaim the fundamental human rights in forceful terms, and that article 10 embodied one of those rights. It could not therefore agree to the inclusion of any limitations to that right.

It had been stated that the provisions of article 10, unless accompanied by certain reservations, would encroach upon the sovereignty of States. He would observe in that connection that while the Charter recognized the principle of national sovereignty, it subordinated that principle to superior interests such as the maintenance of peace and international co-operation founded on friendly relations among nations.

The Chilean delegation realized that owing to circumstances of a temporary nature, it might sometimes be necessary to impose certain limitations, but such limitations should not be set forth in the Declaration, which was designed to proclaim the principles of human rights and to preserve their full force and philosophical significance. Moreover, article 2 contained a general limitation applicable to the body of rights proclaimed in the other articles of the Declaration.

The Chilean delegation would therefore support the Drafting Committee's text, which was the product of long and thorough discussion by that Committee.

[10]

MR. LOUTFI (Egypt) announced that his delegation was in favour of the text submitted by the Drafting Committee subject to the reservations outlined by the French and Belgian representatives.

MR. STEPANENKO (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) emphasized that the Declaration on Human Rights would have to be equally valid for all States Members of the United Nations, not just for some of them, and he appealed to the members of the Commission to draw up article 10 in a way acceptable to all.

For his part, the Byelorussian delegation would not be able to accept the Drafting Committee's text because it considered that text to be inconsistent with the Charter. While the Charter stated explicitly that the United Nations were not authorized to intervene in matters essentially without the domestic jurisdiction of any State, article 10, by acknowledging without reservation the right of individuals to move freely and to leave their own country, would impair the national sovereignty of States, in whose interests it might be to control the movement of their citizens and traffic in and out of the country.

He wished to point out that the only citizens of the Byelorussian SSR who had left their country or who wished to do so were those who had collaborated with Nazi Germany and who were attempting thus to escape from the punishment they deserved. The adoption of article 10 as drawn up by the Drafting Committee would enable such traitors to go unpunished and to continue their nefarious activities both against their own country and against the United Nations. He supported the two amendments proposed by the representative of the USSR, which clearly stated that the movements of citizens inside a country as well as into and out of that country were regulated by the legislation of each State.

[11]

THE CHAIRMAN reiterated that article 10 did not deal with the question of immigration, which was necessarily subject to the national legislation of each State.

Speaking as the representative of the United States of America, Mrs. Roosevelt stated that while it was true that the Charter prohibited the United Nations from interfering in the internal affairs of States, it was none the less true that one of the essential aims of the Charter was to develop and encourage respect for the rights of man and his fundamental liberties. It was for the United Nations to proclaim the principles which they believed would ensure that respect.

It was quite possible that certain persons wished to leave their country to escape the punishment that awaited them, but before they were deprived of their freedom of movement they must be proved to be traitors. Many people who were not traitors to their country preferred to live in another country than their own; their right freely to leave their country should be guaranteed.

MR. HOOD (Australia) fully concurred in the remarks of the Chilean representative. He pointed out that the Declaration which the Commission would adopt should lay down the essential rights and fundamental liberties of man in general terms, and it should not include provisions regulating the relations between the individual and the State. Freedom of movement was unquestionably one of the fundamental rights of man, and it should form the subject of a statement of principle. To subject it to reservations would be to deprive the Declaration of all its force. His delegation would vote for the text drawn up by the Drafting Committee.

MR. CASSIN (France) announced that he would vote against the amendments proposed by the USSR representative, as he was satisfied with the Drafting Committee's text, interpreted in accordance with article 2. [12] He wished to point out that the question of emigration should be dealt with on a much wider plane. When the United Nations made a practical study of the problems of emigration and immigration, it would have to take account on the one hand of the relations between the individual and the State, and on the other of the relations between the individual and the community of States which constituted society.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the two amendments to article 10 proposed by the representative of the USSR.

The Commission rejected the first amendment by 11 votes to 5, and the second amendment by 12 votes to 4.

THE CHAIRMAN then put to the vote the text of article 10 drawn up by the Drafting Committee.

The draft of article 10 drawn up by the Drafting Committee was adopted by 11 votes to 1, with 4 abstentions.

[13]

Article 8

THE CHAIRMAN read the draft of article 8 prepared by the Sub-Committee set up for the purpose on the previous day, the text of which had just been distributed:

“1. Everyone is presumed to be innocent until proved guilty according to law (in a public trial at which he has had all guarantees necessary for his defence).

“2. No one shall be held guilty of any offence on account of any act or omission which did not constitute an offence, under national or international law, at the time when it was committed.”

MR. CHANG (China) explained on behalf of the Sub-Committee that the phrase “in a public trial at which he has had all guarantees necessary for his defence” had been placed in brackets to indicate that there had been a difference of opinion on the subject in the Sub-Committee. The Sub-Committee reached a unanimous decision with regard to the first part of paragraph 1 only. He therefore suggested that first the clause in brackets be put to the vote.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) pointed out a divergence between the English and the French texts of article 8. The English text read: “Everyone is presumed to be innocent . . .” while the French text read: “Toute personne accusée est présumée innocente . . .” The French representative had insisted that the word “accusée” should appear in the French text.

Mr. Wilson observed that although the two texts were not quite identical, they had exactly the same meaning.

MR. CASSIN (France) explained that he had wished to make it clear that they were treating of criminal law. He considered the word “accusée” to be absolutely indispensable.

[14]

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom), supported by the representative of the United States of America, suggested, in order to obtain complete agreement in the French and English texts, that the latter should read: “Everyone charged with a penal offence is presumed to be innocent . . .”

MR. FONTAINA (Uruguay) remarked that the Spanish text of the analogous article approved by the Inter-American Conference at Bogotá corresponded exactly with the formula proposed by the United Kingdom representative.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) pointed out that although the principle of the publicity of judicial proceedings was a progressive and democratic principle, it was not always possible to put it into practice. In fact there were cases where in the interests of public morals or national security it was necessary to administer justice in camera. It should therefore be stated that exceptions would be made to the principle of public trial in the cases prescribed by the law.

Moreover, in its present form paragraph 1 of article 8 implied that the accused would be entitled to the guarantees necessary for his defence only when his trial was public. It was essential to state unequivocally that the accused had that right in any case, whether his trial was public or in camera. The part of the sentence in parentheses should specify that the trial would be public except in cases proscribed by law and that steps would be taken to ensure that the accused was given all guarantees necessary for his defence.

MR. VILFAN (Yugoslavia) explained that in the opinion of the Sub-Committee the reservations contained in article 2 of the Declaration would cover cases in which justice could not be administered publicly. All the members of the Sub-Committee had agreed that in certain circumstances trial in camera was essential.

[15]

MR. MALIK (Lebanon), Rapporteur, suggested an explicit enumeration of cases, prescribed by law, in which it could not be guaranteed that the hearings would be public.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) recalled that under article 7 of the Declaration everyone would be “entitled to a fair hearing of his case”; that included the guarantees necessary for his defence. If there were no such guarantees, the case would not be conducted fairly. He was therefore opposed to the insertion in article 8 of the part of the sentence in parentheses.

As regards the suggestions of the USSR and Lebanese representatives, Mr. Wilson observed that the Commission had several times decided that the Declaration should not list exceptions to the principles it set forth. That decision should be followed in connection with article 8.

MR. LOUTFI (Egypt) supported Mr. Wilson. He thought that if the Commission decided to keep the part of the sentence in parentheses, the word "public" should be deleted, for by retaining it, the Commission would be endorsing a principle contrary to the codes of several countries.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) stressed the importance of the principle of public hearings, which would afford the accused a greater guarantee of fair treatment through the force of public opinion.

MR. CASSIN (France) admitted that the Sub-Committee's text was ambiguous in regard to the right of the accused to the guarantees necessary for his defence. From the text, it did seem that the accused would have a right to those guarantees only if his trial was public. The text might be modified as follows:

"Everyone charged with a penal offence is presumed to [16] be innocent until his guilt has been legally proved at a public trial. He shall have the right in every case to all guarantees necessary for his defence."

He pointed out moreover that there were two tendencies in the Commission; one towards shortening the text of the articles of the Declaration as much as possible, even at the cost of an occasional small sacrifice of principle; the other toward adding details which, in general, would be more appropriate in the Covenant than the Commission was planning to draw up. He thought the Sub-Committee's formula the golden mean between the two tendencies. Article 8 laid down the principle of public hearings; article 2 covered cases in camera.

The French delegation did not think the words in parentheses superfluous. There had unfortunately been so many abuses under criminal law that it would be wrong not to specify that the accused had a right to the guarantees necessary for his defence.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the retention or deletion of the part of the sentence in parentheses.

It was decided by eight votes to six, with two abstentions, to delete the part of the sentence in parentheses from the first paragraph of article 8.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) stressed the necessity of making paragraph 1 of article 8 more complete, and formally proposed the following amendment which took into account the suggestion of the Lebanese representative: to add at the end of the paragraph: "in a public trial subject to exceptions prescribed by law in the interests of public morals or [17] national security and under conditions which ensure him in every case the guarantees necessary for his defence."

MR. CASSIN (France) proposed that the USSR amendment should be changed to read as follows: “. . . in a trial at which he will have all the guarantees necessary for his defence. The trial shall be public, subject to exceptions made in the interests of public morals or national security.”

THE CHAIRMAN asked the representatives of France, Lebanon, and the USSR to prepare for the afternoon meeting a joint text, in both working languages, for the first paragraph of article 8.

The meeting rose at 1:15 p.m.

E/CN.4/SR.56

2 June 1948<sup>102</sup>

Summary Record of the Fifty-Sixth Meeting [of the Commission on Human Rights]

Held at Lake Success, New York, on Tuesday,
2 June 1948, at 2:30 p.m.

Chairman: Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, United States of America. Vice-Chairman: Mr. P. C. Chang, China. Rapporteur: Mr. Azkoul, Lebanon. Members: Mr. Hood, Australia; Mr. R. Lebeau, Belgium; Mr. A. S. Stepanenko, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic; Mr. Larrain, Chile; Mr. O. Loutfi, Egypt; Mr. R. Cassin, France; Mrs. H. Mehta, India; Mr. de J. Quijano, Panama; Mr. Lopez, Philippines; Mr. Klekovkin, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic; Mr. Pavlov, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics; Mr. Wilson, United Kingdom; Mr. R. Fontaina, Uruguay; Mr. Mora, Venezuela; Mr. Vilfan, Yugoslavia. Also Present: Mrs. Ledon, Representative of the Commission on the Status of Women. Representatives of Specialized Agencies: Mr. R. W. Cox, International Labour Organization; Mr. Lebar, United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization. Consultants from Non-Governmental Organizations: Miss Toni Sender, American Federation of Labor; Mr. A. J. van Istendael, International Federation of Christian Trade Unions; Mr. Bienenfeld, World Jewish Congress. [2] Secretariat: Mr. J. Humphrey, Director of the Human Rights Division; Mr. E. Lawson, Secretary of the Commission.

Continuation of the Discussion of the Draft Declaration of Human Rights
(Document E/CN.4/95)

Article 8, paragraph 1

THE CHAIRMAN read out the following text prepared by the drafting sub-committee:

“Everyone charged with a penal offence is presumed to be innocent until proved guilty in a trial at which he will have had all the guarantees necessary to his defence. Trials shall be public subject to exceptions made in the interests of public morals or security.”

<sup>102</sup> This is the date of the meeting. The document was issued on 4 June 1948.

Speaking as the representative of the United States, she suggested that the second part of the second sentence beginning with the word “subject” should be deleted. It was unwise to enumerate exceptions, for there were cases not covered by the interests of morality or security which should not be heard in public trials. Moreover, justifiable exceptions could be made under article 2 of the Declaration.

MR. CHANG (China) proposed to replace the sub-committee’s text by the following:

“Everyone charged with a penal offence is presumed to be innocent until proved guilty according to law.”

The phrase “according to law” had been inadvertently omitted in the English translation.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) supported the Chinese amendment.

The Chinese amendment was rejected by a vote of seven to six, with two abstentions.

[3]

THE CHAIRMAN then suggested that the paragraph should be voted in four parts. A vote was first taken on the first part of the first sentence ending with the words “according to law” which had been inserted after the word “guilty”.

The first part of the first sentence was unanimously adopted.

A vote was next taken on the second part of the first sentence beginning with the words “in a trial” to the end of the sentence.

The second part of the first sentence was adopted by a vote of ten to three, with three abstentions.

The Commission proceeded to vote on the first part of the second sentence: “Trials shall be public.”

The first part of the second sentence was adopted by a vote of ten to one, with five abstentions.

A vote was then taken on the remainder of the second sentence beginning with the words “subject to exceptions.”

The second part of the second sentence was rejected by a vote of seven to four, with five abstentions.

After a brief exchange of views concerning an improvement in the drafting, it was decided to maintain the second sentence in the form in which it has been adopted.

Paragraph 1 of article 8 was adopted as amended by a vote of seven to four with five abstentions.

Article 8, paragraph 2

THE CHAIRMAN read out the text of paragraph 2 prepared by the drafting sub-committee, as follows:

[4]

“No one shall be held guilty of any offence on account of any act or omission which did not constitute an offence, under national or international law, at the time when it was committed.”

MR. LOUFI (Egypt) felt that reference should be made to the principle of retroactivity by the addition of the following clause:

“nor shall he be liable to any greater punishment than that prescribed for the offence by the law in force at the time it was committed.”

However, he agreed not to press his suggestion in the form of an amendment.

MR. LEBEAU (Belgium) wished to amend the sub-committee’s text by inserting the words “the general principles of” before “international law”. His amendment was intended to broaden the concept of international law to include unwritten as well as written law. He pointed out that the general principles of international law were invoked at the Nuremberg and Tokyo trials. The simple phrase “international law” might be interpreted to mean only written law laid down in conventions.

MR. CASSIN (France) supported the Belgian amendment. The principles of international law could be derived from various sources such as national conventions, the application of national law by national tribunals and special circumstances. The Nuremberg and Tokyo tribunals were instituted by the victors in the last war to repress attempted violations of international law, Mr. Cassin emphasized the importance of preserving those elements of law [5] which were common to the law of most nations, and therefore favoured the broader formulation suggested by the representative of Belgium.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) thought that reference to the general principles of international law was too vague and could hardly be said to constitute a less ambiguous formulation than the term “international law”. The general principles of English law were very different from English law itself; the same was true of most other nations. He therefore preferred to retain the term used in the sub-committee’s text.

In the light of the remarks made by the representative of the United Kingdom, MR. LEBEAU (Belgium) expressed readiness to modify his amendment in conformity with the wording of the original Geneva text. It would then read: “the general principles of law recognized by civilized nations”.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) objected to restoring that unhappy formulation which seemed to distinguish between civilized and uncivilized nations. Deletion of that wording had been a positive achievement of the drafting committee.

On the other hand, if the position taken by the representative of the United Kingdom could be interpreted to mean that he considered that the principle of punishing fascists and nazis for war crimes had been made part of international law by the very fact that the Nuremberg trials had been held, Mr. Pavlov might vote in favour of paragraph 2 in its original form.

[6]

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) tended to favour reverting to the Geneva text, as suggested by the representative of Belgium. He was strengthened in that view by the fact that Article 38 of the Statute of the International Court of Justice included as one of the criteria of international law the general principles of law recognized by civilized nations. The USSR which was a signatory of that Statute, as well as of the Charter, should logically favour that wording. However, international law as defined in the Statute was not confined to written instruments. It was based on international conventions, international custom, recognized principles, judicial decisions and the teachings of the most highly qualified publicists of the various nations. In view of the fact that the Belgian representative had proposed a much narrower definition, and provided the term were interpreted as defined in the Statute of the international Court, Mr. Wilson would vote to retain it.

THE CHAIRMAN, speaking as the representative of the United States, recalled that the Geneva text cast doubt upon the validity of the Nuremberg judgment. She supported retention of the broader term “international law”.

MR. LOUTFI (Egypt) recalled that, during the second part of the first session of the General Assembly, the Legal Committee had proposed that in the light of the Nuremberg trials, the International Penal Code of Law should be revised to cover war criminals.

MR. LEBEAU (Belgium) stressed that the term should be interpreted in accordance with the provisions of Article 38 of the Statute of the international Court and withdrew his amendment.

[7]

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics), while he thought that the Commission could improve the definition given in the Statute, was ready to accept the sub-committee’s text.

Paragraph 2 of article 8 was adopted by a vote of twelve to none, with three abstentions.

Article 8, as a whole, was adopted.

Article 11 (documents E/CN.4/104, E/CN.4/102, E/CN.4/99, E/CN.4/97)

MISS SENDER (American Federation of Labor) felt that the wording proposed by the drafting group was highly unsatisfactory.

The permissive character of the phrase “may be granted asylum” deprived the article of any real value. Both article 11 of the Geneva Draft and the French proposal were more acceptable. The right to asylum from persecution was a natural corollary to the right to hold or change one’s beliefs, which was mentioned more than once in the draft Declaration. The USSR proposal was too limited in scope, for persons could be persecuted for philosophical as well as for political reasons.

MR. BIENENFELD (World Jewish Congress) stated that the right to asylum was implicit in the concept of the right to life.

In demanding the right to asylum, refugees were not asking for permanent homes but for temporary safety from persecution. The Governments of the United Kingdom, the United States, France and the USSR had been generous in providing homes for many Jewish refugees before and during the last war. For that reason, it was difficult to believe that their representatives in the Commission would oppose the inclusion of the right to asylum.

In order to meet the objections expressed by the United Kingdom and French representatives, he suggested that an explanatory sentence should be included in the article, to the effect that [8] the obligation of the United Nations or of any Member State was to secure the right to asylum and that the limitations of that obligation would be laid down in conventions established under the auspices of the United Nations. The Economic and Social Council had already recognized the importance of this principle in instructing the Commission to collect documentation on the subject of the right to asylum. The right had been observed in Europe in the Middle Ages and was being observed now in the Mohammedan countries. The Bill of Human Rights would mean little to those who most eagerly awaited it, if the right to asylum, in principle, was not included.

MR. CASSIN (France) agreed with the importance of the principle and pointed out that it had been written into the constitutions of most countries. However, experience had shown that there were great difficulties to its implementation. The Geneva text was impractical because it did not solve the problem of who would be responsible for ensuring that the right to asylum would be granted. The responsibility rested with the whole world and not just with the State which happened to be in close geographical proximity to another in which persecution was being practised. It would be useless merely to state the principle, however magnificent; the practical question of responsibility would have to be worked out in a series of agreements between the United Nations and Member States.

In reply to the Chairman, DR. CHANG (China) agreed to amend his proposal to read as follows:

“Everyone has a right to seek and shall be granted temporary asylum from persecution in other countries.”

[9]

In connection with the remarks of the representative of the Jewish World Congress, the Chairman drew attention to the difficulties which had had to be faced in Congress and because of existing laws, before the Nazi-persecuted Jews had been allowed to enter the United States.

It did not seem possible to include the French proposal, particularly as the Council had asked the Commission to make a study on the right to asylum. In view of that study, she would prefer to adopt the more general principle incorporated in the amended Chinese proposal, with the deletion of the second paragraph.

MR. LEBEAU (Belgium) supported the French proposal because it introduced the idea of international responsibility with respect to the right to asylum. He also agreed to the deletion of the second paragraph.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) also supported the French proposal, on the grounds that it proclaimed the right to asylum and at the same time safeguarded the interests of States who would have to receive refugees. Should the French proposal not be accepted, he would vote for the amended Chinese text. He objected to the word “temporary”, however, and felt that a sentence should be added to the effect that the period of asylum would have to last as long as there was still threat of persecution.

MR. STEPANENKO (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) was unable to accept the drafting group’s proposal for article 11 because of the deletion of the second paragraph. The people of Byelorussia had suffered greatly during the war and its horrors were still fresh in their minds. In Minsk,<sup>103</sup> the Germans had established a ghetto where Byelorussian Jews and those of Western European countries had been subject to torture. Bearing that in [10] mind, he could not accept a text which would grant to war criminals the right to asylum.

<sup>103</sup> After the Minsk ghetto was established on 20 July 1941, Jews (and non-Jews who had married Jews) were transferred there from Dzerzhinsk, Chervan and Slutsk. The ghetto was enclosed by barbed wire. Those living in the ghettos were subject to surveillance, curfews from 10 p.m. to 5 a.m., insufficient food and water, forced labour (for men), and poor living conditions. Each adult was allocated 1.5 metres of living space, which aggravated the spread of disease. Although the Minsk ghetto was closed on 21 October 1943, the remaining 2,000 captives were killed at Maly Trostinec.

MR. VILFAN (Yugoslavia) said that he would vote for the USSR proposal because its terms were similar to those of Article 31 of the Constitution of the Federated People's Republic of Yugoslavia. That Article had been drafted as a result of the Yugoslav peoples' experience during the war. The second paragraph of the Geneva text of article 11 met his point of view to a certain extent, but because of the experience of the war the right to asylum could not be allowed to be too freely interpreted. One of the most famous Yugoslav war criminals was wandering freely around Europe at this moment.

MR. LOPEZ (Philippines) supported the view that the right to seek asylum had to be balanced by the right to be granted it. He was in favour of stating the broad principle set forth in the amended Chinese proposal, leaving the future implementation of it to the appropriate United Nations organ.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) was not in favour of the USSR proposal because of its restrictive character, while the French proposal might prejudice the results of the study on the right to asylum. He had been impressed with the arguments against the text proposed by the drafting group, but pointed out that one of the most jealously guarded rights of a State was the right to prevent foreigners from crossing its border. He proposed that a small drafting committee should be appointed to find a formula which would be acceptable to all.

MR. KLEKOVKIN (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) asked the Chinese representative if the Chinese people would be prepared to grant asylum to Japanese war criminals. In his opinion, the attempt to word the Declaration in the most general terms would make for unsatisfactory results. The proposals which had been made were [11] similar to the declarations on Justice which had appeared in the nineteenth century and which had failed, perhaps because of their too general character. It was impossible to avoid reference to activities against the United Nations and against democracy.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) emphasized the impossibility of granting the right to asylum to war criminals. The United Kingdom representative could suggest further categories of persons which should be included, but the USSR proposal would have to be taken as a basis for agreement. In respect to the drafting group's proposal, he remarked that the right to seek asylum was meaningless without the right to be granted it.

DR. CHANG (China) said that the question of Japanese war criminals in China did not arise, because article 11 dealt with refugees from persecution. The Commission was attempting to draft a declaration of aspirations and therefore no qualifications should be introduced into the text.

THE CHAIRMAN was even more convinced of the fact that the Declaration should be made up of general principles. Anything more complicated would have to be determined by international agreement, in the form of extradition or asylum conventions, or by the appropriate United Nations organ. She called for a vote on the USSR proposal. It was rejected by nine votes to four with two abstentions.

MR. CASSIN (France) urged the adoption of his proposal and expressed the hope that the Commission on Human Rights would not be more timid than the Council which, at least, had instructed the former to study the question of the right to asylum.
[12]

The French proposal was rejected by six votes to five with five abstentions.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) announced that he would vote for the retention of the second paragraph of article 11, although it was not entirely acceptable to him, because without it the article would have no value whatsoever.

The motion to delete the second paragraph was defeated by eight votes to eight.

Appointment of Sub-Committees

The following sub-committees were appointed:

Sub-Committee on article 11: France, United Kingdom, China, India, United States of America.

...

The meeting rose at 5:20 p.m.

E/CN.4/82/Add.12

3 June 1948

Corrigendum to Comments from Governments on the Draft International Declaration on Human Rights, Draft International Covenant on Human Rights and the Question of Implementation

Communication Received from New Zealand

[2]

The New Zealand Government have given careful consideration to the proposals of the Commission for an international bill of human rights, which proposals, in their opinion, form a satisfactory basis for the consideration of further action. The New Zealand Government desire, however, to stress the intrinsic complexity and difficulty of any attempt to formulate, in an international treaty, definitions of human rights and fundamental freedoms to be secured by states to individuals within their respective jurisdictions. It is true that members of United Nations have combined in the Charter to “reaffirm faith in fundamental human rights, in the dignity and worth of the human person, in the equal rights of men and women and of nations, large and small” and have thereby, and in the other relevant provisions of the Charter, established the basis for the development of international action in this field. But the states concerned have achieved varying stages of economic and social development; their economic and social structures do not conform to a single pattern, the historical conditions from which they draw their philosophical ideas are not uniform. In these circumstances, however desirable may be the early conclusion of an agreement or agreements on human rights, it is essential that sufficient time should be allowed for each government to consider the views and comments of other governments, for differing viewpoints to be reconciled, and for the greatest possible measure of agreement to be achieved. Some delay would be preferable to the over-hasty adoption of texts which any considerable number of states might, upon reflection, be unwilling to ratify.

The New Zealand Government are not convinced of the wisdom of insisting that final consideration of the proposals made by the Human Rights Commission should be completed at the next regular session of the General Assembly. If the comments of governments and the discussions in the third session of the Commission and in the seventh session of the Economic and Social Council do not reveal a wide measure of agreement, an opportunity should be given to governments to reconsider their views in the light of the varying positions taken by governments. The short intervals between the meetings of the Commission, the Economic and Social Council and the General Assembly may not be adequate for such reconsideration.

The comments of the New Zealand Government now forwarded must not be taken as representing their final views. It has, in fact, been found necessary to record express reservations of the position of the New Zealand Government on certain articles proposed for inclusion in the Covenant on Human Rights until their scope and proper interpretation is clarified.

[3]

The present comments are put forward in a spirit of constructive criticism in an endeavour to assist the appropriate organs of the United Nations in arriving at a wide measure of agreement. The New Zealand Government hope that other members of the United Nations will approach the proposals in a similar manner and they must reserve the right to reconsider their views in the light of the comments and views of other governments.

[Comments regarding the Covenant are omitted.]

...

[4]

The Declaration

A clear distinction must be drawn between the purpose of the Covenant and the purpose of the Declaration. The Covenant is a document which will impose far-reaching obligations on acceding states and which accordingly demands detailed and precise drafting appropriate to a legal document. There are obvious advantages, however, in stating, in simple language and as briefly as is consistent with the avoidance of ambiguity, the essence of each human right and fundamental freedom. In the opinion of the New Zealand Government, this should be the aim and the purpose of the Declaration. The rights and freedoms so stated should be progressively elaborated and defined in detail in a form suitable for an international treaty. Certain of the rights and freedoms will no doubt be dealt with in this way in the Covenant presently under consideration. Others should in time be dealt with in further covenants. Others again may demand elaboration and implementation through the medium of some other type of international action. The Declaration should, however, state the philosophical basis of human rights and fundamental freedoms, define the essence of each and state, in a form comprehensible to the peoples of the world, the objectives of the United Nations in the field of human rights and fundamental freedoms.

Two comments follow from this appreciation of the purpose of the Declaration. The first is that the Declaration cannot in itself impose any legal obligation on states or call for any measures of implementation, although it may, with reference to the rights and freedoms not dealt with in detail in the Covenant, provide a guide to the interpretation of the relevant provisions of the United Nations Charter.

The second comment is that the Commission's draft of the Declaration is unnecessarily long and confused in language, being both declaratory and mandatory and frequently passing from statements of principle to points of detail without, however, achieving a definition which could found a legal obligation.

The New Zealand Government have endeavoured, in the time available, to redraft the Declaration in the light of the foregoing assumptions of its proper purpose. A redraft is attached hereto as Annex C. In advancing this redraft, the New Zealand Government desire to stress that it is intended to indicate the lines along which, in their opinion, a shorter and more consistent Declaration might be framed and not as a final statement of their views on the proper content of the Declaration. In these circumstances, it is not desired to offer detailed comments on the Declaration at this stage.

...

[10]

[Annexes A and B concern the Covenant and are omitted.]

[24]

Annex “C”*Revision of Draft International Declaration on Human Rights Prepared by Human Rights CommissionArticle 1

1. All men are born free, equal in dignity and rights as human beings, endowed with reason and conscience, and bound in duty to one another as brothers.

2. All men are members of communities and as such have the duty to respect the rights of their fellow men equally with their own.

3. The just claims of the state, which all men are under a duty to accept, must not prejudice the respect of man's right to freedom and equality before the law and the safeguard of human rights, which are primary and abiding conditions of all just government.

Article 2

Everyone is entitled to the rights set forth in this Declaration without distinction, whether on grounds of nationality, race, colour, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, property status, social origin or otherwise.

Article 3

Everyone has the right to equal treatment under the law and to recognition everywhere in the world as a person before the law.

Article 4

Everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of person and to protection by law of his life, liberty, personal security, property, reputation, privacy, home and correspondence, subject to deprivation only in cases prescribed by law and after due process.

Article 5

Everyone has a right to the protection of the state of which he is a national or of the United Nations.

Article 6

Everyone has the right to move and choose his place of residence within the borders of each state, to leave his own or any other country, and to acquire the nationality of any other country willing to grant it.

Article 7

Men and women have the same right to contract marriage in accordance with the formalities required by the law.

[25]

Article 8

Everyone has the right to own property in accordance with the law of the state in which such property is located.

Article 9

Everyone is entitled to freedom of belief, thought and expression, to freedom to seek and receive information and the opinion of others wherever situated, and to access to all publicly available sources of information, opinion and knowledge.

Article 10

Everyone is entitled to freedom of association, including freedom to join trade unions.

Article 11

Everyone has the right, either individually or in association with others, to petition or to communicate with the government of the state of which he is a national, or in which he resides, and to petition or to communicate with the United Nations.

Article 12

Everyone has the right to take an effective part in the government of his country and the right to a free vote in the election of representative organs of government.

Article 13

Everyone is entitled to equal opportunity to engage in public employment and to hold public office in the state of which he is a citizen or a national.

Article 14

Everyone has the right to work and to receive fair and reasonable payment therefor.

Article 15

Everyone has the right to health and, therefore, to the benefits of the highest standard of food, clothing, housing and medical care which the resources of the state or community can provide.

Article 16

Everyone has the right to social security in respect of sickness, disability, unemployment, widowhood, motherhood, childhood and old age to the extent to which the resources of the state or community can provide it.

[26]

Article 17

1. Everyone has the right to education.
2. Education should, so far as possible, be free and universal. Access to higher education should be provided on the basis of merit.

Article 18

Everyone has the right to rest and leisure to be ensured through the limitation of working hours and provision of paid vacations.

Article 19

Everyone has the right to participate in the cultural life of the community, to enjoy the arts, and to share in the benefits that result from scientific discoveries.

Article 20

Everyone has the right to use the language and participate in the cultural life of the ethnic, linguistic or religious group to which he belongs.

E/CN.4/108

3 June 1948

Lebanon: Suggested Amendment to Article 16 of the Draft International Declaration on Human Rights (E/CN.4/95)

Article 16

Everyone has the right (is entitled) to freedom of religion, conscience and belief; this right includes freedom to change his religion or belief, and freedom, either alone or in community with other persons of like mind and in public or private, to manifest his religion or belief in teaching, practice, worship and observance.

E/CN.4/110

3 June 1948

Second Report of the Sub-Committee Consisting of the Representatives of China, France, India, United Kingdom and Yugoslavia on Article 8 of the Draft International Declaration
on Human Rights

Article 8

1. Everyone charged with a penal offence is presumed to be innocent until legally proved guilty in a trial at which he will have had all the guarantees necessary to his defence. Trials shall be public subject to exceptions made in the interests of public morals or security.

E/CN.4/SR.57

3 June 1948<sup>104</sup>

Summary Record of the Fifty-Seventh Meeting
[of the Commission on Human Rights]

Held at Lake Success, New York, on Thursday,
3 June 1948, at 10:45 a.m.

Chairman: Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, United States of America. Rapporteur: Mr. Malik, Lebanon. Members: Mr. Hood, Australia; Mr. Lebeau, Belgium; Mr. Stepanenko, Byelorussian

<sup>104</sup> This is the date of the meeting. The document was issued on 7 June 1948.

Soviet Socialist Republic; Mr. Larrain, Chile; Mr. Loutfi, Egypt; Mr. Cassin, France; Mrs. Mehta, India; Mr. Quijano, Panama; Mr. Lopez, Philippines; Mr. Klekovkin, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic; Mr. Pavlov, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics; Mr. Wilson, United Kingdom; Mr. R. Fontaina, Uruguay; Mr. Mora, Venezuela; Mr. Vilfan, Yugoslavia. Also Present: Mrs. Ledon, Representative of the Commission on the Status of Women; Miss Kenyon, Commission on the Status of Women. Specialized Agencies: Mr. Lebar, United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization; Mr. Cox, International Labour Organization. Non-governmental Organizations: Miss Sender, American Federation of Labor; Mr. van Istendael, International Federation of Christian Trade Unions.

[2]

Article 11 – Continuation of consideration.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the drafting sub-committee had prepared the two following versions of article 11, paragraph 1, which differed only slightly from each other.

1. “Everyone has the right to seek and be granted in other countries asylum from persecution as humanity requires.”
2. “Everyone has the right to seek and be granted in other countries such asylum from persecution as humanity requires.”

In reply to a question by the representative of Yugoslavia, she explained that the drafting sub-committee, in re-drafting paragraph 1, had felt that the addition of the qualification: “as humanity requires” might obviate the need for paragraph 2 which had already been adopted by the Commission. The Commission would have to decide that question after a vote on paragraph 1.

MR. VILFAN (Yugoslavia) thought that such procedure might set a dangerous precedent.

MR. CASSIN (France) pointed to some errors in the arrangement of the versions of the re-drafted paragraph 1.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) noted two important changes in the drafting sub-committee’s versions of paragraph 1: (1) the optional character of granting asylum, as laid down by the Drafting Committee, had been changed to what seemed an obligation on the part of governments to grant asylum, and (2) the qualification “as humanity requires” added a new element which had not previously been discussed by the Commission.

The Committee should consider the two new elements separately. He felt that the qualification clause was vague and its addition to the paragraph would require further qualifications such as “the requirements of democracy and progress.”

[3]

THE CHAIRMAN explained that the expression “as humanity requires” had been chosen by the drafting sub-committee for its all-inclusiveness.

As regards paragraph 2, she specified that there was no question of reconsidering that paragraph, but only deciding, in the light of the new draft of paragraph 1, whether it was still necessary.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) wished to know whether there was any difference of substance between the two proposed versions of paragraph 1. If not, then he would prefer the better style of the second version. The phrase: “as humanity requires” seemed very broad and vague; he therefore suggested that a separate vote should be taken on that qualification clause which he would rather see deleted and replaced by the previously rejected French proposal to entrust the United Nations with the problem of asylum. He was prepared, if in order, to propose reconsideration of that proposal.

MR. CASSIN (France) would support the first part of the newly proposed paragraph 1, (without the qualification clause) in the hope that the United Nations would find a just solution to the problem.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) observed that the discussion had shown the extreme complexity of the entire article. Control over immigration was one of the most jealously guarded rights of sovereign states. On the other hand, every person had the right to escape and seek asylum from persecution. The drafting sub-committee had attempted to reconcile those two conflicting rights by adding a qualification clause which set the dictates of humanity as a standard for granting asylum. The two proposed versions differed only in style. He suggested that the Commission should defer consideration of the need for paragraph 2 until paragraph 1 had been discussed.

MR. STEPANENKO (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic), referring to the Chairman’s remarks, felt that the vague qualification clause was no [4] substitute for paragraph 2. He recalled, in that connection, that the defence at the Nuremberg Trials had invoked the “law of humanity” in order to mitigate the punishment of war criminals; nevertheless, the Military Tribunal had pronounced, and humanity had approved, a just sentence for those war criminals. While recognizing the right of asylum also laid down in article 104 of the Constitution of the Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic he noted that such a right could not apply to fascists and other criminals against humanity. Consequently the article needed specific provision excluding war criminals from the right of asylum.

MR. LEBEAU (Belgium) shared the Lebanese representative’s regrets at the previous rejection of the French amendment. He wished to show that to an uninitiated reader, contrary to the United Kingdom representative’s view of the matter, there was a substantial difference between the two alternative versions of paragraph 1. In the French text, the first version implied granting of asylum subject to the humanitarian considerations of the country concerned, while the second version laid down the general philosophical concept of asylum. He favoured the first version with the following amendment:

“Everyone has the right to seek and be granted in other countries asylum from persecution.”

MR. LARRAIN (Chile) agreed with the Belgian representative. He would support the Lebanese proposal for re-opening consideration of the French proposal which provided an effective method of dealing with the problem.

MR. CHANG (China), agreeing with the Belgian representative's interpretation of the two versions, noted the importance of a clear and unambiguous text on the matter. It was true that the first version gave the country of immigration certain control over the granting of asylum.

The original Chinese amendment had included that right of states to control immigration. He supported the French proposal which had been rejected in view [5] of the fact that a similar question was under consideration by the Council.

Should it be impossible to revert to that proposal, the Commission might go on record as considering that a United Nations organ should deal with that problem. He agreed with the representative of Lebanon regarding the vagueness of the qualification clause which could not be a compromise between the rights of states granting, and persons seeking, asylum. The Commission should state clearly and frankly whether or not countries had control over the granting of asylum. If no qualification clause was included, the question might arise whether countries were obliged to grant asylum whenever asked for it. There were two possibilities, the Commission could either accept the first version without the qualification clause, and in that case it would be well to revert to the French proposal or at least go on record that the French proposal constituted the most desirable solution to the problem; or the Commission should clearly leave it to countries to decide whether they would grant asylum. The first alternative should be put to the vote first as being furthest removed from the Drafting Committee's text.

THE CHAIRMAN, referring to the Chinese representative's remarks, explained that the Commission's action with regard to the French proposal had been based on the fact that the Council had called for a separate study of the question of nationality which would probably include the problem of asylum. She also pointed out that the qualification clause had been introduced by the drafting sub-committee partly because the Chinese representative had indicated the danger of an unqualified right of persons to seek and be granted asylum. Such a provision might keep many countries unable to make such a commitment from ratifying the Convention.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) also agreed with the Belgian representative's interpretation of the meaning of the two versions. He would support reconsideration of the French proposal.

[6]

MRS. MEHTA (India) stated that she had not supported the French text in view of the fact that the United Nations could be instrumental in providing permanent asylum only. It was a human right, however, to seek and be granted temporary asylum from persecution. That right was not covered in the French proposal.

THE CHAIRMAN recalled that the original United States proposal had provided the right to seek temporary asylum. Without the word "temporary" the right to be granted asylum might come into conflict with the immigration laws of various countries. The problem of permanent asylum might be studied under the above-mentioned Council Resolution; reference to the United Nations, however, as proposed in the French amendment, might raise difficulties.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) pointed out that a return to the French proposal would raise once more the question of the exact role of the United Nations in the matter. Since the United Nations had no common territory on which to provide asylum, such asylum would have to be granted on the territory of Member States; that, however, would constitute an interference in the domestic affairs of the country concerned.

On the other hand, the United Nations were not authorized under the Charter to make recommendations to Member countries on the matter of asylum. He therefore agreed with the Chairman's view on the French proposal.

As regards the two drafting sub-committee versions of paragraph 1, he felt that the two texts had different implications; while the first version seemed to refer to the type of asylum required by humanitarian standards, the second version apparently laid down the demand of humanity as one of the bases for granting asylum. The latter version, he felt, should be amplified by further considerations.

[7]

THE CHAIRMAN recalled that the question of asylum had been raised at the Commission's second meeting. As was evident from the summary record the point then considered had been whether the right to asylum should be included in the Declaration or in a special convention.

In reply to the questions of the Indian and USSR representatives MR. CASSIN (France) explained that at its previous meeting the Commission had not voted on the text submitted by the French Government, but on his own amendment which contained the provision "the United Nations acting in agreement with Member Governments". What he had meant was that the United Nations should take preliminary steps and provide to Member States material aid to facilitate their acceptance of persons seeking asylum. He wished to make it clear that he had never implied that the United Nations could interfere in the internal affairs of States; he merely considered that an agreement on the whole problem should be reached at the earliest possible time and that the question should not be treated solely on an emergency basis. He had never intended that nations' rights should be infringed upon in any way.

With regard to the USSR representative's remark about the treatment of political refugees in France, Mr. Cassin pointed out that the fact that thousands of them chose to remain in France and make it their adopted country was sufficient proof of the treatment they had received.

MR. FONTAINA (Uruguay) wished that some misconceptions should be clarified. The task of the Commission consisted in drafting principles. The question of implementation would be considered by the Commission during the discussion of the Covenant. The Commission's sole concern at the present time was to lay down the principle that a person persecuted for political reasons had a right to asylum. The determination of how asylum should be granted belonged to the Covenant.

[8]

The representative of Uruguay referred to the Declaration on Human Rights adopted at Bogotá to show how the problem of asylum for political refugees was treated on a regional basis. He considered that the necessary mechanism should be provided by the United Nations and consequently would favour reconsideration of the French proposal. He reiterated that it was essential to separate a statement of principle from its implementation.

MR. LOPEZ (Philippines) felt that the significance of the paragraph in question should be considered in practical terms. Some representatives had stressed that the right of asylum should be granted only to the persecuted persons who were deemed desirable from the point of view of the recipient state.

An inhabitant of Latvia or Estonia who did not agree with the Soviet regime and therefore was in danger of persecution might seek asylum in Sweden or the United States of America. On the other hand, a person with Communist sympathies in Greece or some other country who was threatened with persecution might seek asylum in the Ukrainian SSR or in Yugoslavia. The right of asylum would thus be available in different countries for exactly the opposite reasons.

Mr. Lopez quoted those theoretical examples to show that it would be inadvisable to try to specify the persons who were entitled to asylum. The paragraph should guarantee the right of asylum in the broadest possible terms. Consequently he would favour an article free from the limitations implied by the phrase "as humanity requires". He would vote for the original Chinese amendment.

MR. QUIJANO (Panama) considered that the principles should be clearly and precisely stated. If the Commission were unable to agree on a precise formulation it would be advisable to re-examine the French amendment.

[9]

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) was not clear on the exact meaning of the two versions of paragraph 1. He wished to know whether the first version referred to the kind of asylum and the second to the reasons for or conditions under which it should be granted. He considered that a specific reference should be made to defence of democracy, scientific activity and participation in the struggle for national liberty. In connection with the Philippine representative's remarks he enquired whether Japanese and Nazis would be granted asylum in the Philippines or in some other country. He also stressed that the USSR did not persecute its citizens for not agreeing with the Government. They were liable to punishment for treason and similar crimes.

MR. LOPEZ (Philippines) said in reply to the USSR representative that no Japanese or Nazi war criminal would be granted asylum in the Philippines. He would be arrested, tried and probably put to death.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) formally moved that the French proposal "The United Nations in agreement with Member Governments" should be resubmitted for consideration.

MR. KLEKOVKIN (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) recalled that at its previous meeting the Commission had adopted paragraph 2 of article 11, which contained the very important principle that prosecution arising from acts contrary to the propositions and principles of the United Nations did not constitute persecution. The term "humanity" introduced by the drafting group was very broad and vague. It should be remembered that during the Nuremberg Trials clemency for war criminals had been asked for in the name of humanity. The United Nations, which was based on the defeat of fascism and nazism, should also be mentioned in paragraph 1 and no possibility whatsoever for the escape of war criminals should be implied.

In Mr. Klekovkin's opinion the drafting group had not fulfilled its task and the Commission must redraft the paragraph.

[10]

After an exchange of views between MR. WILSON (United Kingdom), and MR. CHANG (China) on the order in which the vote should proceed, MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) expressed the opinion that both alternative texts of the amendment were equally removed from the original. He stated that the text he had previously suggested was furthest removed. The final version of the USSR amendment was as follows: "Everyone has the right to seek and be granted in other countries asylum from persecution as required by humanity, defence of democratic interests, activity in the field of science, and participation in the struggle for national liberty". He requested that his amendment should be voted first.

THE CHAIRMAN put the USSR amendment to the vote by a show of hands.

The USSR amendment was rejected by four votes to eleven, with two abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN wished to know how the Commission would like to vote. She considered that the deletion of the words "as humanity requires" should be voted first.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) maintained that the version had included the words "as humanity requires" and since his amendment had been rejected there was no need for another vote.

THE CHAIRMAN said she had understood that only the additions to the paragraph had been rejected. In order to ascertain the members' opinion on whether the Commission still had before it the whole of the original text, she put the question to the vote.

The Commission decided by ten votes to four, with one abstention, that a vote on the original text should be taken.

The Commission decided by fourteen votes to one, with two abstentions to delete the words "as humanity requires".

[11]

In answer to a question by MR. FONTAINA (Uruguay), THE CHAIRMAN recalled that the French proposal had been resubmitted by the Lebanese representative, and put it to the vote.

The resubmission of the French proposal was rejected by seven votes to eight, with one abstention.

MR. HOOD (Australia) suggested that paragraph 1 should be voted in parts.

MR. LOPEZ (Philippines) opposed that suggestion and MR. MALIK (Lebanon) considered that instead of dividing the paragraph mechanically its two notions, that of seeking and that of being granted asylum, should be voted separately.

After a short discussion in which MR. CASSIN (France), MR. CHANG (China), MR. HOOD (Australia) and MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) took part, THE CHAIRMAN put the amended version of paragraph 1, article 11 to the vote.

The Commission adopted by twelve votes to one with four abstentions, the following version of paragraph 1: "Everyone has the right to seek and be granted in other countries asylum from persecution".

The meeting rose at 1:20 p.m.

E/CN.4/SR.58*3 June 1948<sup>105</sup>Original Text: French

Summary Record of the Fifty-Eighth Meeting
[of the Commission on Human Rights]

Lake Success, New York on Thursday,

3 June 1948 at 2:30 p.m.

Chairman: Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, United States of America. Rapporteur: Mr. C. Malik
Members: Mr. Hood, Australia; Mr. Lebeau, Belgium; Mr. Stepanenko, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic; Mr. Larrain, Chile; Mr. Chang, China; Mr. Loutfi, Egypt; Mr. R. Cassin, France; Mrs. Mehta, India; Mr. de J. Quijano, Panama; Mr. Lopez, Philippines; Mr. Klekovkin, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic; Mr. Pavlov, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics; Mr. Wilson, United Kingdom; Mr. R. Fontaina, Uruguay; Mr. Vilfan, Yugoslavia. Also Present: Mrs. Ledon, Representative of the Commission on the Status of Women. Specialized Agencies: Mr. Cox, International Labour Organization. [2] Non-governmental Organizations: Miss Sender, American Federation of Labor; Mr. van Istendael, International Federation of Christian Trade Unions; Mr. Brotman, Co-ordinating Board of Jewish Organizations; Miss Strahler, International Committee of the Red Cross; Miss Burgess, International Federation of Business and Professional Women; Miss Robb, Liaison Committee of Women's International Organizations; Miss Shaffer, International Union of Catholic Women's Leagues. Secretariat: Mr. J. Humphrey, Director of the Human Rights Division; Mr. E. Lawson, Secretary of the Commission.

Continuation of the Examination of the Report of the Drafting Committee to the Commission on Human Rights
 (Document E/CN.4/95)

Article 12

THE CHAIRMAN read out the text of Article 12 proposed by the Drafting Committee (document E/CN.4/95) and the alternative version proposed by the French delegation (E/CN.4/82/Add.8). She recalled that the United Kingdom, Indian and Chinese delegations thought it better to omit any such provision from the Declaration.

Speaking as representative of the United States of America, the Chairman stated that her delegation would vote against Article 12 because its wording was ambiguous. The provisions of Article 3 were sufficient to ensure the enjoyment of the rights that Article 12 was intended to declare if Article 12 was designed to go beyond those provisions, its ambiguity became obvious, and it had no place in a Declaration which should set forth clearly determined rights.

<sup>105</sup> This is the date of the meeting. The document was issued on 16 June 1948.

MR. CASSIN (France) recalled that the text adopted at the second session of the Commission had consisted of two parts: the first, which had been retained by the Drafting Committee, concerned juridical personality and was designed to supplement Article 5 on slavery; the second ensured the enjoyment of fundamental civil rights by everyone.

[3]

To affirm that an individual was a person before the law, was to declare that he had rights and duties. Such a declaration might seem unnecessary if the most recent history did not offer an example of forms of slavery under which juridical personality had been withdrawn from certain individuals. He instanced the Hitler regime under which several hundred thousand human beings had been arbitrarily deprived of their juridical personality. The United Nations should not ignore such a state of affairs, a recurrence of which was to be feared by the whole civilized world; the Declaration on Human Rights must be based on reality.

Mr. Cassin pointed out the difficulty of translating the term “droits civils fondamentaux” into English. The corresponding expression in English meant human rights as a whole – the fundamental liberties. In French law, and generally in all legislation based on Roman Law, “droits civils fondamentaux” were understood as all the rights protected by laws governing private relations. He therefore suggested that “droits civils fondamentaux” should be translated by “fundamental rights in domestic relations”. Such a translation would not be literal, but it would be accurate.

In the present state of the world it was inevitable that States should distinguish between their own nationals and foreigners. A large proportion of such distinctions was of a permanent nature. There could be no question of issuing directives to sovereign States; but there were degrees between absolute equality and the denial of all rights, and it was the United Nations’ duty to ensure not only that all human beings had juridical personality, but also that they should be guaranteed certain elementary rights indispensable to their wellbeing and to their dignity.

The recognition of everyone as a person before the law was the first and most important step. Nevertheless, the French delegation favoured restoration of the second part of the text adopted at the second session of the Commission, since it established a general principle ensuring a minimum of indispensable fundamental rights to everyone.

[4]

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) agreed with the French representative. He also pointed out that apart from attempts against whole groups, such as those against the Jews in Germany, account must be taken of the fact that some civil legislation still contained restrictive provisions regarding juridical personality of individuals. Thus, in certain cases, a wife had no juridical personality independent from that of her husband. It was the Commission's duty to combat all discrimination, including discrimination based on sex, which was still prevalent in several countries, and he did not see why it should reject an article that could not fail to be of value from that point of view. In his opinion Article 3 was not an adequate substitute for Article 12; the first established the equality of all before the law, the second would ensure the effective enjoyment of rights thus recognized. The difference was important; the two articles were complementary, not mutually exclusive.

Speaking as representative of the United States, THE CHAIRMAN observed that in her country the practice of certain professions by foreigners was prohibited. She asked Mr. Cassin whether, under the terms of the article he advocated such prohibition would be equivalent to a denial of juridical personality.

MR. CASSIN (France) repeated that "droits civils fondamentaux" meant the most elementary rights which could not be denied to any human being, the "jus gentium" of Roman Law. As early as the Middle Ages, canon law had recognized that all men possessed a minimum of rights. That was the minimum envisaged by Article 12, which could not impair the sovereignty of any State conscious of its responsibilities in respect of foreigners residing in its territory.

[5]

MR. HOOD (Australia) remarked that Article 15 of the Covenant contained provisions similar to those of the article under consideration. Moreover, those provisions were not fully covered by Article 3 of the Declaration, which, in a way, was only the application of the general principle stated in Article 12. Hence the Australian delegation was not only in favour of the Drafting Committee's text, but in view of the importance it attached to those provisions, it felt that they should be given a more prominent place in the Declaration.

THE CHAIRMAN recalled that despite the long discussions that had taken place on the subject when the Draft Covenant was being considered the Drafting Committee had not found a satisfactory translation of the term "personnalité juridique", for which there was no equivalent in Anglo-Saxon law. The Committee had therefore agreed on the term "juridical personality" subject to a better formula being found.

MR. FONTAINA (Uruguay) confirmed that the concept of juridical personality was to be found in the Constitutions of several Latin American States. Moreover, the terms of Article 17 of the Declaration on Human Rights, drafted by the Inter-American Conference at Bogotá, corresponded with the proposed text of Article 12.

The article should certainly be retained; the difficulty was how to express the idea in a way that would be clear to the English speaking countries. He thought that the Commission should not be afraid to make an innovation by employing a term that would certainly be established by usage if the legal concept it expressed was recognized.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) announced that his delegation would vote against the retention of Article 12. The United Kingdom delegation considered that such significance as the proposed text of the article had in Anglo-Saxon law was already covered by the provisions of Article 3. [6] However, if the Commission felt that Article 12 should be retained because of the corresponding Article 15 of the Covenant, it would be advisable to see that Article 12 of the Declaration was drafted in the same terms as Article 15 of the Covenant, in order to avoid any possible misunderstanding.

MR. CASSIN (France) pointed out that there was no need to make Article 12 conform to the text of Article 15 of the Covenant, since the latter had been evolved from the Draft Article 12 of the Declaration submitted by the French delegation at Lake Success in June 1947 and adopted in its entirety after long discussion at the second session. It was a return to that original draft that the French delegation was proposing.

Without having taken part in the final drafting of the Covenant, he thought he was right in saying that Article 15 related to condemnation to civil death, which should have no further place in criminal law. Article 12 of the Declaration was designed to have a wider scope, proclaiming that every human being possessed juridical personality from the time of birth.

Article 12 was also intended to ensure to everyone the enjoyment of certain fundamental rights not expressly mentioned in other articles of the Declaration, such as contractual capacity. He urged the Commission to remember, when taking decisions, that its work should not be purely theoretical; it had to combat facts that were still fresh in every memory.

THE CHAIRMAN, speaking as representative of the United States of America, said that the meaning of Article 12 in its present form was not sufficiently precise in Anglo-Saxon law for her delegation to accept it.

She asked the Commission to decide by vote whether the article should be retained.

It was decided to retain Article 12 by eleven votes to five.

[7]

On the Chairman's suggestion, MR. CASSIN (France) agreed to amend the term "droits civils fondamentaux" to read "droits privés fondamentaux", if "fundamental private rights" seemed more acceptable to the English speaking delegations.

MR. LEBEAU (Belgium) was unable to believe that Anglo-Saxon legal terminology could not express the Roman concept of "civil rights".

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) stated that Anglo-Saxon law distinguished between different rights but did not group them in separate categories.

MR. CHANG (China) stated that the law of his country, too, did not clearly define the concept.

MR. LOUTFI (Egypt) suggested that the Commission should refer to Article 17 of the Bogotá Declaration.

Speaking as the representative of the United States of America, THE CHAIRMAN observed that translation difficulties connected with the Bogotá Declaration had not yet been completely overcome.

She asked Mr. Cassin to define what he considered to be the difference between juridical personality and the enjoyment of fundamental civil rights.

MR. CASSIN (France) replied that it was possible to deprive an individual of some of his fundamental civil rights while recognizing his juridical personality; that had occurred at the beginning of the Nazi regime in Germany. Speaking figuratively, juridical personality was the vessel and fundamental civil rights were its contents. After the individual's right to recognition of his juridical personality had [8] been affirmed he should be assured of full enjoyment of his fundamental civil rights. The Declaration defined some of these rights, but since it did not expressly establish certain others, such as contractual capacity, a separate article should state them in general terms.

However, in order not to delay the Commission's work on so important a matter, he would not press for retention of the second part of his proposal and he hoped that the Commission would be able to reach agreement on the first part. He reserved his Government's position.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the first part of the French proposal, which was as follows:

“Everyone has the right, everywhere in the world, to be recognized as a legal person”.

The text was adopted by twelve votes, with four abstentions.

[9]

Article 13

THE CHAIRMAN read out the text of Article 13 proposed by the Drafting Committee and the amendments submitted by the United Kingdom and Indian delegations (document E/CN.4/99), the Belgian delegation (document 3/CN.4/103) and the Lebanese delegation (document E/CN.4/105). She recalled that the Chinese delegation would prefer not to include such a provision in the Declaration. Speaking as representative of the United States of America, the Chairman stated that her delegation was strongly in favour of adopting the text submitted by the United Kingdom and Indian delegations, which she understood to cover not only the right to contract marriage but also the right to dissolve it.

However, if the Commission thought it necessary to supplement that text, the United States delegation suggested the following compromise based on both the Lebanese and Belgian proposals (documents E/CN.4/105 and E/CN.4/103) and corresponding with the text of the Bogotá Declaration:

“Men and women are entitled to equal rights as to marriage. The family deriving from marriage is the natural and fundamental group unit of society and is entitled to protection”.

MRS. LEDON, Vice-Chairman of the Commission on the Status of Women, recalled that, at its session in January 1948, that Commission had studied the article of the Declaration relating to marriage and had submitted the following amendment to the Commission on Human Rights, through the Economic and Social Council:

“Men and women shall have equal rights: to contract or: dissolve marriage in accordance with the law.”

[10]

The Commission on the Status of Woman was aware that a certain section of public opinion had protested against that text on religious grounds, which the Commission understood and respected. But since the Commission had been appointed to safeguard their rights and protect the interests of woman throughout the world, it had been obliged to take account, not only of the views of groups that did not recognize divorce, but also of the existing situation in countries where, divorce being legally recognized, the relevant legislation usually placed women at a disadvantage.

The Commission on the Status of Woman had not thought that the text it advocated would be against the religious principles of certain groups, since even religious doctrine provided for the dissolution of marriage in certain cases, although extensive restrictions were applied.

The Commission had been guided above all by concern at existing conditions, under which inequalities were too often sanctioned to the detriment of women and the family. In many countries grounds for divorce for men differed from those for women. In many cases the law denied a woman the most elementary right to express her opinion, to take her own decisions or sometimes even to receive alimony for herself and for her children. It was the duty of the Commission on Human Rights to examine every aspect of the problem and to find a just and humane solution. The Declaration must plainly state the principle of equality of men and women in marriage.

The Commission on the Status of Women would willingly accept any draft that was better than the one it had proposed, provided that it took account of women's moral and material interests, which had to be guaranteed and protected.

[11]

MR. LEBEAU (Belgium) recalled that the purpose of his delegation's amendment was to state in the first paragraph of Article 13, that the object of marriage was to establish a family and, in the second paragraph, that the family was the fundamental unit of society and therefore had a right to be protected by society and the State.

The Belgian delegation had felt that the reference to the age and consent of intending spouses was unnecessary, since those matters were governed by civil law and were not basic principles that should be included in a Declaration on Human Rights.

He found the compromise text proposed by the United States delegation satisfactory and if it was acceptable to all, his delegation was prepared to withdraw its amendment.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon), Rapporteur, also said that he would withdraw his amendment if the Commission reached agreement on the compromise text proposed by the United States representative. He pressed for retention of the words "the natural and fundamental group unit of society" which were the most essential part of his amendment.

MR. STEPANENKO (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) stressed that the purpose of Article 13 should be to grant women rights equal to those of men and observed that all the texts suggested so far, including that proposed by the Drafting Committee, which his delegation preferred failed to answer that purpose.

The joint United Kingdom and Indian draft was incomplete, since it saw men and women had equal rights as to marriage but did not specify that such equality of rights held good throughout the period of marriage. He recalled the efforts made by Mrs. Uralova [12] (Byelorussian SSR) and Mrs. Begtrup (Denmark), the representatives of the Commission on the Status of Women to the Economic and Social Council, to guarantee to women the same rights as men not only to contract but also to dissolve the marriage ties.

In his country women enjoyed absolute equality of rights as to marriage. A more formal and explicit wording of Article 13 might lead all States to adopt an attitude towards women similar to that of the Byelorussian SSR.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) pointed out an error in translation. It appeared that in the Russian text the words "as to marriage", which comprised all questions pertaining to marriage, such as the right to contract marriage, relations between spouses during marriage and the dissolution of marriage, had been translated by an expression signifying only the right to contract marriage. That error should be corrected.

MR. LOUTFI (Egypt) said that the delicate nature of the question under discussion might make it preferable merely to state the principle without going into details. He would therefore vote for the Indian and United Kingdom proposal.

However, the Egyptian delegation would be prepared to accept the compromise text if the words “deriving from marriage” were deleted; it felt that protection should not be withheld from families not deriving from marriage.

MR. LARRAIN (Chile) supported that suggestion.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon), Rapporteur, regretted that he could not agree to the deletion suggested by the Egyptian representative. He pointed out that his amendment did not automatically withhold [13] protection from children born out of wedlock. It must be recognized, however, that illegitimate births were the exception; the family usually derived from marriage and was entitled to protection for that reason.

MR. LEBEAU (Belgium) agreed with the Lebanese representative. He emphasized that declaring the family deriving from marriage to be the natural and fundamental group unit of society did not make it impossible for certain countries to enact civil legislation favourable to children born out of wedlock.

He pointed out that the French text, in which the words “deriving from marriage” were placed between two commas, gave less cause than the English version for such fears as those expressed by the Egyptian and Chilean representatives. He therefore suggested that the same punctuation should be adopted for both texts.

MR. FONTAINA (Uruguay) agreed with the Egyptian representative. He also proposed the deletion of the word “natural”, since the essential point was to state that the family was the fundamental group unit of society and that it was the cell around which the State was formed; the way in which the family was constituted was of secondary importance.

If the Commission made that change, and the one suggested by the Egyptian representative, the Uruguayan delegation would vote in favour of the compromise text.

MRS. MEHTA (India) confirmed that the amendment proposed by her delegation and that of the United Kingdom embraced all questions pertaining to marriage. However, if there were any doubts, regarding that interpretation, the Indian delegation would accept [14] the compromise text with the amendments suggested by the Egyptian and Uruguayan representatives.

She felt that the age and consent of intending spouses were details that should not be included in the Declaration on Human Rights. She also thought that the Declaration should give no definition of the family. However, if the Commission thought it necessary to adopt a provision for the protection of the family, the idea to be kept in view was that the family, whether deriving from marriage or not, was entitled to protection.

MR. CASSIN (France) suggested the following wording, which took account of the various views expressed:

- 1) Everyone of marriageable age shall have the right to marry, provided that it is with his or her full consent, and to establish a family.
- 2) Men and women shall have equal rights as to marriage.
- 3) The family is the natural and fundamental group unit of society and is entitled to protection.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) favoured the text of the first paragraph proposed by the Drafting Committee.

He felt that it was essential to retain the words “in accordance with law” in the first sentence, and to retain the second sentence relating to the consent of intending spouses; those were very important factors which must not be overlooked.

He recalled that the second paragraph of Article 13 had been discussed by the Drafting Committee at length, and that his delegation had given strong support to the just claims of the Commission on the Status of Women. Taking those claims into account, he proposed:

[15]

- 1) to amend the wording of the paragraph as follows:

“The State and society must protect marriage and the family and ensure equality between men and women in marriage”.

- 2) to add a third paragraph, as follows:

“Men and women shall have equal rights as to dissolution of marriage.”

Regarding the reference to the Creator, which the Lebanese representative seemed willing to drop, he recalled that the Drafting Committee had decided, after a long debate, not to mention the Creator in a civil document, as in most cases the State was separated from the Church. That decision should be adhered to.

Lastly, he pointed out that both the compromise text and the various proposed amendments contained philosophical or legal definitions of the family, which were perhaps excellent, but would be more appropriate in a treatise on sociology than in a Declaration on Human Rights of wide practical scope. At all events, there could be no question of distinguishing between families that derived from marriage and those that did not. The Drafting Committee had rightly decided not to retain these points in Article 13, and there again its decision should be respected.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) pointed out that while the Commission had learned to be in full agreement on the text proposed by his delegation and that of India, disagreement had arisen as soon as they deviated from that text. That was because marriage was so closely bound to religion, traditions and culture that as soon as one tried to give a philosophical definition of marriage and the family, opinions were bound to differ. In such matters, the views of the majority could not be imposed on the minority.

[16]

The United Kingdom delegation felt it was better to keep to a declaration of the equal rights of men and women as to marriage, without giving any definition of marriage and the family, especially as Article 9 provided for the protection of the family. His delegation would therefore vote against any amendment designed to provide any definition of those concepts. He wished to state that although he agreed on the principle of the full consent of intending spouses, his delegation considered that it should not be written into the Declaration.

MR. FONTAINA (Uruguay) said that after the explanations given by the United Kingdom and Indian representatives he was prepared to accept the text proposed by their delegations.

MR. VAN ISTENDAEL (International Federation of Christian Trade Unions) said that as the Declaration on Human Rights was a statement of general principles and should be a moral guide for the nations, it was imperative that it should contain no principle that might offend the conscience of a large number of people. If the Declaration proclaimed the right to dissolve marriage, it would be unacceptable to hundreds of millions of Christians in countries that were Members of the United Nations.

The equality of men and women before the law and before the Courts was already adequately stated in various articles of the Declaration. The International Federation of Christian Trade Unions asked the Commission to proclaim the equality of men and women as to marriage, without specially mentioning one aspect of that equality.

The Drafting Committee had recognized that it was necessary to state the right of the family to be protected. The rights of social, political and other groups had been repeatedly recognized; Article 14 [17] should proclaim the indefeasible rights of the family, especially the right to protection by the State and by society.

MRS. SCHAEFER (International Union of Catholic Women's Leagues) pointed out that her organization comprised 36 million women divided among 120 associations in 60 countries.

The Union of Catholic Women's Leagues thought that the purpose of Article 13 was to define the family and to guarantee freedom of consent and equality in marriage to intending spouses. The principle of the dissolution of marriage offended Christian conscience, and the Union of Catholic Women's Leagues protested against the mention in a Declaration on Human Rights which should establish an ideal acceptable to all, of a right which was repudiated by a large section of world opinion.

MR. CHANG (China) stated his delegation would vote in favour of the most concise text, namely, that proposed by the delegations of India and the United Kingdom.

MR. DE QUIJANO (Panama) said that in his country men and women were absolutely equal in marriage. Consequently, the delegation of Panama would vote for the Indian and United Kingdom text, which established that principle most concisely.

MR. KLEKOVKIN (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) proposed the appointment of a sub-committee to draft a single text on which the Commission could vote at its next meeting.

THE CHAIRMAN put the Ukrainian proposal to the vote.

The Ukrainian proposal to appoint a sub-committee was rejected by nine votes to four, with three abstentions.

[18]

MR. VILFAN (Yugoslavia) said he could not express any opinion on a new proposal put forward at the present meeting. He asked that the examination of Article 13 should be postponed until the next meeting, so that the various proposals submitted during the debate could be more thoroughly considered.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) reminded the Commission that under Article 52 of the Rules of Procedure of the Economic and Social Council's Functional Commissions, resolutions, motions and amendments of a substantive character should, if so requested by any member, be deferred until the next meeting on a following day. He supported the request of the Yugoslav representative.

MR. CHANG (China) formally proposed the adjournment of the discussion.

THE CHAIRMAN asked the Secretariat to submit suggestions in the order in which the various proposals and amendments relating to Article 13 should be put to the vote.

The meeting rose at 5:35 p.m.

E/CN.4/106

4 June 1948

Order of Voting on Proposals and Amendments Concerning Article 13 of the Declaration Memorandum by the Secretary-General

The Secretariat has been asked to suggest the order in which the various proposals and amendments relating to Article 13 of the Draft Declaration should be voted on. The rule of procedure governing this question is rule 54 which reads as follows:

Rule 54

If two or more proposals relating to the same question, or if one or more amendments are moved to a proposal, the Commission shall first vote on the most far-reaching proposal or amendment, and then on the next most far-reaching proposal or amendment, and so on, until either all the proposals and amendments have been put to the vote, or one or more of them has been adopted, which in the opinion of the Commission makes voting on the remaining proposals and amendments unnecessary.

In applying this rule the Secretariat has followed the generally accepted rule that the phrase “most far-reaching proposal or amendment” involves a comparison with the original text before the Committee, namely, the text of the Drafting Committee. In other words, the term “most far-reaching” as used in this rule has essentially the same meaning as the term “furthest removed in substance from the original proposal” which is used in the Council Rule 62 and the General Assembly Rule 82. (This is shown by the discussion in the Council Committee on Procedure in document E/AC.2/8, page 2, and by the French text of Rule 54).

In applying this standard in this particular case it is necessary to determine which of the various proposals and amendments would change the original text most. The Secretariat feels that it is impossible to avoid a certain amount of arbitrariness in making this choice. Moreover it is [2] also felt that it is undesirable in connection with this procedural question to attempt to decide which of the ideas are most fundamental or would have the greatest effect. Consequently, the Secretariat has analysed the proposals and amendments in terms of the component ideas without attempting to evaluate the scope or effect of the particular ideas. On this basis the text which would delete or add the largest number of expressly formulated ideas in relation to the original text would be the furthest removed in substance.

In accordance with this analysis the order of voting would then be as follows:

1. Proposals submitted by India and the United Kingdom:

Men and women are entitled to equal rights as to marriage. This proposal is the furthest removed from the text of the Drafting Committee because there are four ideas in the latter text which are now expressly included in the India-United Kingdom proposal in accordance with the law, full consent of both intending spouses, age of puberty, protection by State and Society.

2. Amendment submitted by the representative of Egypt to the United States proposal, which is to delete the words “deriving from marriage”.

This amendment should be voted on before the United States proposal for two reasons: in the first place, it is an amendment to the United States of America proposal. Secondly, it is further removed from the text of the Drafting Committee than the United States text because it would give protection even to family groups which do not derive from marriage.

3. Proposal submitted by the United States

Men and women are entitled to equal rights as to marriage.

The family deriving from marriage is the natural and fundamental group unit of society and shall be entitled to protection.

This proposal is not as far removed as the India-United Kingdom proposal because it deletes only three ideas mentioned in the text of the Drafting Committee in accordance with the law, consent of both intending spouses, age of puberty. On the other hand, it adds one idea which is not in the text of the Drafting Committee, namely that the family deriving from marriage is the natural and fundamental unit of society.

4. Proposal submitted by the Representative of the Soviet Socialist Republic which is:

- (a) to insert the phrase “and the equality of men and women in the marriage” after the word “family” in the second paragraph [3] of the text presented by the Drafting Committee;
- (b) to add a new paragraph to the text of the Drafting Committee reading as follows: “Both men and women shall have equal rights to dissolve marriage”.

This proposal is not so far removed from the text of the Drafting Committee because it adds only two new ideas not contained in the latter text, viz. the equality of men and women during marriage, and the express mention of dissolution of marriage.

5. Proposal submitted by the Representative of France, which is:

1. Every man and woman of the age of puberty has an equal right to contract marriage provided that this be with his or her full consent and to found a family.
2. Every man and woman has equal rights as to marriage.
3. The family, which is the natural and fundamental group unit of society is entitled to protection.

This proposal seems to be the nearest to the text of the Drafting Committee because it introduces only one new idea, viz. the idea that the family is the natural and fundamental unit of society.

---

The Secretariat has not included the proposals of Belgium and the Lebanon in the list because it understands that both of these proposals were withdrawn by their sponsors in favour of the United States text.

E/CN.4/107

4 June 1948

Draft International Declaration on Human Rights

Article 14

Report of the Sub-Committee Consisting of France, United States of America, United Kingdom, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics

1. Everyone has the right, alone as well as in association with others, to own property (in accordance with the laws of the country where the property is located).
2. No one shall be arbitrarily deprived of his property.

E/CN.4/SR.59

4 June 1948<sup>106</sup>

Summary Record of the Fifty-Ninth Meeting [of the Commission on Human Rights]

Held at Lake Success, New York, on Friday,
4 June 1948, at 10:45 a.m.

Chairman: Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, United States of America. Rapporteur: Mr. Malik, Lebanon. Members: Mr. Hood (Australia); Mr. Lebeau (Belgium); Mr. Stepanenko (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic); Mr. Chang (China); Mr. Loutfi (Egypt); Mr. Cassin (France); Mrs. Mehta (India); Mr. Quijano (Panama); Mr. Lopez (Philippines); Mr. Klekovkin (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic); Mr. Pavlov (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics); Mr. Wilson (United Kingdom); Mr. Fontaina (Uruguay); Mr. Vilfan (Yugoslavia). Also Present: Mrs. Ledon (Commission on the Status of Women). Representatives of Specialized Agencies: Mr. Cox (International Labour Organization); Mr. Stone (International Refugee Organization); Mr. Lebar (United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization). [2] Consultants from Non-Governmental Organizations: Miss Sender (American Federation of Labor); Mr. van Istendael (International Federation of Christian Trade Unions); Miss Stuart (World Federation of United Nations Associations); Mr. Nolde (Commission of the Churches on International Affairs); Mr. Brotman (Coordinating Board of Jewish Organizations); Miss Strahler (International Committee of the Red Cross); Miss Burgess (International Federation of Business and Professional Women); Miss Robb (Liaison Committee of Women's International Organizations); Miss Schaefer (International Union of Catholic Women's Leagues); Mr. Bienenfeld (World Jewish Congress). Secretariat: Mr. Humphrey (Director of the Human Rights Division); Mr. Lawson (Secretary of the Commission)

<sup>106</sup> This is the date of the meeting. The document was issued on 10 June 1948.

Continuation of the Discussion on the Draft Declaration of Human Rights (document E/CN.4/95)

Article 14

THE CHAIRMAN, speaking as the representative of the United States, favoured the broader concept contained in the joint United Kingdom-India text (document E/CN.4/99).

MR. CASSIN (France) pointed out that the various texts submitted could be roughly divided into two categories. The drafting committee had defined the fundamental right to own property with certain limitations (document E/CN.4/95). On the other hand, the Chinese, United Kingdom and French texts tended to circumvent a precise statement of the problem by setting forth the incontrovertible fact that no one could be arbitrarily deprived of the right to own property. As the representative of the USSR had pointed out, every government in every country could accept the definition in the light of its own laws regulating the right. Any attempt to reach a more definite statement must involve amendments giving rise to [3] debate. The text proposed by the French delegation merely constituted an amendment to the form of the original Geneva draft. Mr. Cassin reserved the right to submit a substantive amendment after a vote had been taken on the other texts.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) favoured adoption of the original Geneva draft, which stated that everyone had the right to own property in accordance with the laws of the State in which such property was situated. That formulation was especially desirable for it recognized that the national legislation of the various countries provided for various and different systems of property ownership. In order to clarify that point, Mr. Pavlov wished to amend the Geneva text by inserting, after the words "everyone had the right" the following phrase: "either alone (individually) or in community (association) with others".

His amendment was intended to make clear that the right to own property applied to various systems of ownership: government property, property owned by the community, co-operative and collective property. The amended article would also cover what was known in the USSR as personal ownership of property, which differed from private property, as understood in Western countries, because it was based on income earned from collective work. It would also include property owned by mutual organizations, corporations and various other groups in Western countries. Thus, no particular system of property ownership would be favoured by the article.

MR. LOUTFI (Egypt), while he would have liked to support the Drafting Committee's text, said that he would accept the proposal of the representative of the USSR to retain the Geneva text, in the interest of unanimity.

In reply to a question from Mr. Pavlov, (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics), MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) explained that the joint United [4] Kingdom-Indian amendment (document E/CN.4/99) was intended as a substitute for the whole of article 14, and not for the second part alone.

Mr. Wilson pointed out that the United Kingdom amendment reduced the problem to its essence by assuring everyone freedom to enjoy ownership of property without interference. It took for granted the right guaranteed by all countries to own property and avoided specifying who could own such property, how much and what type of property could be owned, as those questions were adequately covered by regulation contained in domestic legislation. Nothing in the United Kingdom version precluded common ownership.

MR. VILFAN (Yugoslavia) observed that an error had been made in translating the United Kingdom text into Russian: the words “unreasonable interference” read “illegal interference” in the Russian text.

MR. KLEKOVKIN (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic), supported by MR. STEPANENKO (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic), thought that the United Kingdom amendment lacked clarity and precision. As the problem of property ownership involved many controversial social and economic questions, the definition of that right should be quite specific to avoid multiple interpretations. Both the Drafting Committee’s text and the United Kingdom amendment contained such debatable concepts as “decent living” in the former, and “unreasonable interference” in the latter.

The representatives of the Ukrainian and Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republics expressed readiness to accept the United Kingdom draft as an amendment to the second part of the Geneva text. However, they strongly favoured the original Geneva draft, as amended by the representative of the USSR, and supported Mr. Pavlov’s arguments in that connection.

THE CHAIRMAN proposed that a drafting committee, composed of representatives of the United Kingdom, France, the Union of Soviet Socialist [5] Republics and the United States, should work out an acceptable text for article 14.

MR. CASSIN (France) thought that the drafting committee should have some directive from the Commission as guidance for its work. He found the United Kingdom amendment unsatisfactory from two points of view: it failed to state the right to property ownership incontrovertibly, and it raised the technical question of determining what constituted “unreasonable interference”. Mr. Cassin therefore felt that the Commission should proceed to vote on the United Kingdom text in order that the results of the vote might serve as an indication of the consensus of the Commission regarding the principle contained in article 14.

THE CHAIRMAN observed that her suggestion for a drafting committee represented a compromise. If the United Kingdom text were put to a vote, it would follow logically that a vote should be taken on all the texts under discussion.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) and MR. STEPANENKO (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) supported the Chairman’s proposal for a drafting committee to reconcile the various drafts. Mr. Pavlov would be willing to accept the United Kingdom text as a substitute for the second part of the Geneva text, provided the word “unreasonable” were changed to “illegal”.

After a brief discussion, MR. CASSIN (France) consented to the establishment of a drafting committee.

Article 14 was referred to the Drafting Committee.

Article 15

[6]

THE CHAIRMAN read the various texts submitted for the article and observed that the French draft followed most closely the original Geneva text.

MISS SENDER (American Federation of Labor) stressed the importance of finding a satisfactory solution to the problem of statelessness, in connection with the right to a nationality. While the joint United Kingdom-Indian amendment did ensure some protection of that right in the future, it did not help to solve the urgent problem of stateless persons whose numbers had increased considerably as an aftermath of the war. Miss Sender favoured the French text because it specifically stated that the United Nations took responsibility for the protection of persons who had been deprived of their nationality. Although the Economic and Social Council was studying the question of drawing up a special convention on statelessness, the Declaration of Human Rights should contain a statement of general principle affecting the problem.

THE CHAIRMAN recalled the terms of the resolution adopted by the Economic and Social Council at its sixth session (Resolution 116(VI)D) requesting the Secretary-General, in consultation with interested commissions and specialized agencies “. . . to make recommendations . . . on the interim measures which might be taken by the United Nations . . .” and “. . . to submit recommendations to the Council as to the desirability of concluding a further convention. . .” on stateless persons.

MR. CHANG (China) supported the United Kingdom text of article 15 (document E/CN.4/99).

MR. STONE (International Refugee Organization) felt that the Geneva text or that proposed by the French representative was worthy of consideration. The Drafting Committee’s text merely dealt with the right to nationality.

[7]

The principle of international protection for stateless people was accepted by the United Nations when it created the International Refugee Organization, and therefore the Declaration on Human Rights should contain a statement recognizing the fundamental need of protection of thousands of people who were stateless either in law or in fact. Such a statement in the Declaration would not necessarily impose any specific resulting obligation on the United Nations itself, but would leave it free to entrust that task to a specialized agency.

THE CHAIRMAN, speaking as the representative of the United States of America, said that her delegation would vote in favour of the joint text submitted by the delegations of India and of the United Kingdom. The United States delegation believed that it was preferable to guard against arbitrary deprivation of nationality rather than to attempt to provide that everyone had the right to a nationality, as was done in the French proposal and in the Geneva text. It considered that the Declaration was not the place to say that everyone had a right to a nationality and felt that that was a matter for consideration by an international conference on nationality.

MR. FONTAINA (Uruguay) agreed with the remarks of the United States representative. Referring to Article 19 of the Bogotá Convention, he considered that Article 15 of the Declaration on Human Rights should contain a similar provision and suggested that the joint proposal of the Indian and United Kingdom delegation might be amended in that sense.

MR. LOUTFI (Egypt) said the question of nationality was a very complicated one which could only be settled by conventions between States. The India-United Kingdom amendment referred to one phase of the question only, that of the arbitrary deprivation of nationality. He could not support the amendment to that proposal suggested by the representative of [8] Uruguay as it would raise too many difficulties. The second sentence of the Geneva text, beginning, "All persons who do not enjoy. . ." should be retained.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) could not support the India-United Kingdom proposal as it stood. Although it might be an improvement on the Geneva text and that of the Drafting Committee, it was too brief. The Article under consideration should mention three fundamental ideas: (1) that no one could be arbitrarily deprived of his nationality; (2) that the United Nations was concerned with the question of the stateless person, and (3) that a person had the right, if he so wished, to change his nationality.

He felt that the second and third sentences of the French proposal could be combined, and mention might be made of the provision contained in Article 19 of the Bogotá Convention, as suggested by the representative of Uruguay.

MR. CASSIN (France) said that to include in the Declaration provisions which infringed upon the sovereign rights of State would be exceeding the Commission's terms of reference. Large numbers of human beings without nationality, rights or obligations were migrating unhappily from country to country. A human being had a number of rights, one of them being the right to be attached to a national group; and the Declaration should contain a provision covering that right.

The Economic and Social Council had already recognized its duty in that field and had set up an organization for the protection of stateless people. The Commission would be taking a backward step if it neglected that work. He considered that the question of the change of nationality raised by the representative of Lebanon had to a great extent been settled by Article 9 of the Geneva draft. The French Government had not submitted any amendments to that Article and would not object if the Commission added [9] the text of Article 9 to that of Article 15. The India-United Kingdom text covered a very small part of the whole problem, and referred only briefly to the arbitrary deprivation of nationality. Mr. Cassin emphasized the hardships suffered by a woman who lost her own nationality through marriage with a citizen of a foreign state but did not acquire that of her husband. He pointed out that the French Government was attempting, through legislation, to keep such marriages from becoming the cause of statelessness.

It was not sufficient for the Declaration to say that no one must be deprived of his nationality. The United Nations must accept responsibility and protect those who did not enjoy the protection of any government.

Replying to the Chairman, MR. CASSIN (France) agreed to the insertion of the amendment suggested by the representative of Egypt in the French proposal.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) said that questions of nationality were among the most complicated to be dealt with by the Commission. Every government had hitherto had the right to say whom it would and would not regard as its citizens, and to whom it would or would not extend its protection.

There was more than one way of dealing with the problem of nationality, and he considered that the right method had been adopted by the Commission at Geneva when it recognized the existence of the problem of statelessness and decided to deal with it by sending a resolution to the Economic and Social Council. Action had been taken by the Council, and studies were at present being carried out to see what positive stage could be taken to relieve all the problems arising from statelessness.

He shared the views of the representative of Lebanon on the matter, but considered that it would not help matters to refer to the United Nations in Article 15 of the Declaration.

[10]

There was some ambiguity in the use of the word "protect" in the French and Geneva texts as that word could have two meanings, one of a general nature and the other a highly technical one.

States should not arbitrarily refuse to grant their protection to people who were their citizens. That was the essence of the very complicated and technical matter under consideration, and it was for that reason that the delegation of India and of the United Kingdom felt that the statement contained in their amendment was as far as the Commission could go in a declaration of general principles which were to be of significance for a long time to come.

He agreed with the suggestion made by the representative of Uruguay that the words “or denied the right to change his nationality” should be added to the India-United Kingdom amendment.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) felt that the India-United Kingdom text was more satisfactory than that suggested by the French delegation. The latter referred to obligations of the United Nations regarding nationality problems, and he considered that the Declaration on Human Rights should not contain such a statement as it led to a limitation of the rights and sovereignty of States. He would vote for the India-United Kingdom text if it were amended to read as follows:

“No one shall be arbitrarily deprived of his nationality except in cases and procedures determined by national legislation.”

If the representatives of India and of the United Kingdom were unable to accept that amendment to the text they had suggested he would propose it as a separate motion.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) was unable to accept the amendment proposed by the USSR representative for the reason that it was possible for a state to pass laws laying down, for instance, that persons belonging [11] to a certain race or political party should be deprived of their nationality. That would be perfectly legal but entirely arbitrary. He would have to insist on the retention of the word “arbitrary”, and would vote against the amendment suggested by the USSR representative.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) said that, with the acceptance by the delegation of India and of the United Kingdom of the amendment proposed by the representative of Uruguay, two fundamental ideas had been taken care of, namely, that no one should be arbitrarily deprived of his nationality or of the right to change his nationality. He agreed with the remarks of the United Kingdom representative, but considered some mention should be made in Article 15 of the responsibilities of the United Nations in connection with those persons who did not enjoy the protection of any Government. He suggested that the wording of the second sentence of Article 15 should be amended to read: “All persons who do not enjoy the protection of any Government shall be the concern of the United Nations.” The word “concern” was used in the Constitution of the International Refugee Organization, and he felt that the wording he had suggested would meet all points of view.

MR. LOUTFI (Egypt) and MR. CASSIN (France) supported the amendment suggested by the representative of Lebanon.

After a brief discussion, the Chairman put to the vote the following text suggested by the representative of Egypt, as amended by the representative of Lebanon.

“All persons who do not enjoy the protection of any Government shall be the concern of the United Nations.”

The amendment was rejected by nine votes to six with one abstention.

[12]

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the amendment suggested by the French delegation, i.e. “It is the duty of the United Nations and the Member States to prevent statelessness.”

The amendment was rejected by nine votes to three with four abstentions.

The amendment to the India-United Kingdom text suggested by the representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics was then put to the vote.

The amendment was rejected by ten votes to four with two abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the India-United Kingdom amendment to Article 15 together with the amendment to that text suggested by the Uruguayan representative as follows:

“No one shall be arbitrarily deprived of his nationality, or denied the right to change his nationality.

The amendment was adopted by ten votes to three with three abstentions.

Article 15, as amended, was adopted.

The meeting rose at 1:25 p.m.

E/CN.4/SR.60

4 June 1948<sup>107</sup>

Original Text: French

Summary Record of the Sixtieth Meeting
[of the Commission on Human Rights]

Lake Success, New York on Friday, 4 June 1948, at 3 p.m.

Chairman: Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, United States of America. Rapporteur: Mr. Charles Malik, Lebanon. Members: Mr. Hood, Australia; Mr. Steyaert, Belgium; Mr. Stepanenko, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic; Mr. Chang, China; Mr. Loutfi, Egypt; Mr. Cassin, France; Mrs. Mehta, India; Mr. de J. Quijano,<sup>108</sup> Panama; Mr. Klekovkin, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic; Mr. Pavlov, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics; Mr. Wilson, United

<sup>107</sup> This was the date of the meeting. The document was issued on 23 June 1948.

<sup>108</sup> Pursuant to E/CN.4/SR.60/Corr.1 of 28 July 1948, the words “Mr. Lopez, Philippines” are to be added after “Mr. de Quijano, Panama”.

Kingdom; Mr. R. Fontaina, Uruguay; Mr. Vilfan, Yugoslavia. Also Present: Mrs. Ledon, Representative of the Commission on the Status of Women. Specialized Agencies: Mr. Cox, International Labour Organization; Mr. Lebar, United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization. [2] Observers from Inter-Governmental Organizations: Mr. Stone, Preparatory Commission of the International Refugee Organization. Consultants from Non-governmental Organizations: Miss Sender, American Federation of Labor; Mr. van Istendael, International Federation of Christian Trade Unions; Miss Stuart, World Federation of United Nations Associations; Mr. Goldsmith and Mr. Lewin, Agudas Israel World Organization; Mr. Brotman, Co-ordinating Board of Jewish Organizations; Miss Strahler, International Committee of the Red Cross; Miss Schaefer, International Union of Catholic Women's Leagues; Miss Robb, Liaison Committee of Women's International Organizations. Secretariat: Mr. Humphrey, Director, Human Rights Division; Mr. Lawson, Secretary of the Commission.

Continuation of the Discussion of Article 15 of the Draft Declaration on Human Rights (documents E/CN.4/95, E/CN.4/99, E/CN.4/102)

Article 15 (continued)

MR. CASSIN (France) pointed out that the Commission had adopted the Indian and United Kingdom amendment to article 15, but had not yet taken any decision on the text adopted during the session at Geneva, re-submitted by the Drafting Committee and taken up again in the French amendment, namely the sentence: "Everyone has the right to a nationality." He did not wish to question the Commission's decision on the Indian and United Kingdom amendment, but thought that article 15 of the Drafting Committee's text should be put to the vote before the next article was discussed.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom), supported by MR. LEBEAU (Belgium), explained that the Indian and United Kingdom amendment [3] was intended to replace the Drafting Committee's text. Consequently, he could see no need for a further vote.

THE CHAIRMAN stated that the Indian and United Kingdom amendment had, in fact, been intended to replace article 15, so that the Commission had disposed of that article. However, if the French representative thought that, owing to a misunderstanding, the Commission had not taken a decision on part of the French amendment, he was entitled to propose formally that the sentence be inserted in the text adopted for article 15.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that the procedure suggested by the Chairman might create a dangerous precedent. The Commission could not reconsider a decision that had already been voted on. But as there had been a misunderstanding and some members had voted for the United Kingdom amendment as an addition, while others thought it was intended to replace the Drafting Committee's text, he proposed that the Indian and United Kingdom amendment should be put to the vote again, as a substitute for the Drafting Committee's text.

That was the only proper procedure, as there had been some confusion regarding the amendment.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) (Rapporteur) supported the French representative's view. From the point of view of procedure, the United Kingdom and Belgian representatives were right, but it would be regrettable if the Commission were prevented from expressing its opinion on a question of substance for purely procedural reasons. The Indian and United Kingdom amendment would not be incompatible with the text that the French representative wished to insert, since the one dealt with arbitrary deprivation of nationality [4] and the other with everyone's right to a nationality.

MR. CHANG (China) did not oppose the French representative's request for a vote, but feared that the inclusion of the words he proposed would amount to a repetition.

MRS. MEHTA (India) pointed out that declaration of the right to nationality had been intentionally omitted from the Indian and United Kingdom amendment. It was, in fact, difficult to decide whether that right was fundamental. For example, if a person fled from his country and sought asylum in another, thus losing his nationality, had he the right to claim the nationality of the country that sheltered him? That was a debatable point. She thought that the fundamental right was the right not to be deprived of nationality. She would therefore vote against the inclusion of the words proposed by the French representative.

MR. CASSIN (France) recalled that the Commission had discussed certain parts of article 15 at the previous meeting, but had taken no decision on the article as a whole. It was for a vote on the article as a whole that he was asking. The French amendment had been put to the vote as presented in the Egyptian and Lebanese amendments; the points that seemed furthest from the original text had been dropped, but public opinion would not understand that no vote had been taken on the fundamental question, that of everyone's right to a nationality.

When the Indian and United Kingdom amendment was put to the vote, he had considered it as an addition and had not thought that it would prevent the Commission from taking a decision on another text. He therefore asked the Commission to vote on the Drafting Committee's text, which was also part of the French amendment and had not been voted on.

[5]

THE CHAIRMAN decided that the Commission had before it part of the French amendment which had not yet been voted on, owing to a misunderstanding, and asked the Commission for a decision on that text.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) contested the Chairman's ruling, which he thought procedurally incorrect. The Commission should take another vote on the Indian and United Kingdom amendment as an alternative to the Drafting Committee's text of the article.

THE CHAIRMAN put her ruling to the vote.

The Chairman's ruling was accepted by 6 votes to 3, with 6 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the proposal to include in article 15, as adopted by the Commission, the words "Everyone has the right to a nationality."

The proposal was rejected by 6 votes to 5, with 4 abstentions.

Article 16

MR. LEWIN (Agudas Israel World Organization) said that article 16, which was the foundation for religious freedom should include the word "religion", which was contained both in the Indian and United Kingdom representatives' amendments, and in the United States recommendations on that article.

The word "religion" appeared in the French Declaration on Rights of Man and of the Citizen of 1789, and in the American Bill of Rights of 1791. The words "freedom of thought and conscience", which appeared in the Drafting Committee's text of Article 16, were assumed to cover freedom of religion, but in practice might lead to misunderstandings in certain countries.

[6]

He wished the word "religious" to be inserted in paragraph 2, either before the word "practice" or before the word "observance". The United States recommendation regarding article 16 of the draft Declaration (document E/CN.4/AC.1/20) seemed to be the best text, except for the words "including the right, etc ...", which might give the impression that certain rights had been omitted.

On the basis of that text, he suggested the following draft of article 16 as a whole: "Everyone has the right to freedom of religion, conscience and belief, has the right, either alone or in community with other persons, in public or in private, to hold, change or manifest any belief and has the right to practise any form of religious worship and to teach and practise any form of observance.

The repeated use of the word "right" was intended to stress the cardinal importance of the right to hold or change beliefs, and the right to practise any form of worship and to teach and practise any observance. The words "of like mind" had been deleted as being superfluous.

The other Jewish organizations in category B endorsed what he had just said.

THE CHAIRMAN said the Commission could begin by voting on the Chinese amendment, which seemed to be the most far-reaching.

MR. CHANG (China) pointed out that the Chinese amendment applied simultaneously to articles 16, 17, 18 and 19, and suggested that it should not be considered at present.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that the USSR amendment was a compromise between the Chinese text, which was an over-simplification, and the Drafting Committee's text, which was too long. The USSR text stressed freedom of thought and freedom to practise religious observance, and emphasized the limitations [7] imposed by conformity of such practice to national laws and public morals. There were many superstitions that were incompatible with national laws or public morals, particularly with the moral education of youth, with health and with respect for others. The text was sufficient to defend freedom of conscience and belief, and also satisfied the demands of public morals.

MR. LOUTFI (Egypt) wished to amend articles 16, 17, and 18 and 19. The limitations contained in article 2 of the Declaration were not sufficient in respect of these articles. He therefore proposed inserting, either at the end of article 19, or the beginning of article 16, the text of article 16 sub-paragraph 4 of the Covenant, namely: "The above rights and freedoms shall be subject only to such limitations as are prescribed by law and are necessary to protect public order and health, morals and the fundamental rights and freedoms of others."

The amendment was prompted by uncertainty as to whether the Covenant would be ratified or not.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon), Rapporteur understood the motives underlying the Egyptian amendment. But a limitative clause of that nature might distort the exact meaning intended in article 16. The article dealt with the rights and freedoms that were above the law and, as it were, outside it. A provision based on religion or morals could not be amended by the law. He would be opposed to such a formula, even in the Covenant. Moreover, the provisions of articles 2 and 3 of the Declaration answered the Egyptian representative's purpose. Consequently, he did not support the latter's proposal.

[8]

THE CHAIRMAN and MR. LOPEZ (Philippines) concurred in the views of the Lebanese representative.

MR. FONTAINA (Uruguay) pointed out a procedural error.

The Chinese amendment was not complementary, since it was meant to replace articles 16, 17, 18 and 19. The adjournment of its discussion was incorrect. The Egyptian amendment should be considered in connexion with article 19 and, if adopted, would then become retroactive and would apply to article 16, 17 and 18.

[9]

MR. CASSIN (France) thought that the Egyptian amendment raised the question whether Article 2 had been well drafted. The facts showed that it was inadequate. If the Commission did not wish the same problem to arise in connection with every article, Article 2 would have to be given more force and clarity.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) pointed out that the shortcomings of Article 2 were becoming evident. It was, however, premature to discuss the Egyptian amendment. He suggested leaving the question open until after the consideration of all the articles of the Declaration had been completed, then returning to that proposal and perhaps summarizing those limitations in a general way in a single article. Had the draft Article 2 submitted by the USSR delegation at the commission's second session, a draft which mentioned the demands of the laws of the democratic States, been adopted, many difficulties would have been avoided. It could not be said that the law of a democratic State contained abuses, since to suppose that the demands of the law of a democratic State could conceal abuses would be to fail in self-respect.

He proposed that the USSR amendment to Article 16, which mentioned the limitations desired by the Egyptian representative, be put to the vote.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the USSR amendment to Article 16.

The amendment was rejected by 10 votes to 5, with 1 abstention.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) (Rapporteur) submitted the following amendment to Article 16, as proposed by the Drafting Committee:

“Everyone has the right (is entitled) to freedom of religion, conscience and belief; this right includes freedom to change his religion or belief, and freedom, either alone or in community with other persons of like mind and in public or private, to manifest his religion or belief in teaching, practice, worship and observance.”

[10]

His amendment embodied all the essential elements of the original article; only the right to freedom of religion had been added. Apart from that, he had deleted the words “absolute and sacred right” and had merged the two original paragraphs into one.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that the Lebanese amendment had made no allusion to “freedom of thought”. Science had a right to protection on the same terms as religion. Out of respect for the heroes and martyrs of science, those words should not be deleted.

He preferred the Drafting Committee's text.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) (Rapporteur) replied that he had not mentioned freedom of thought simply because that right was provided for under Article 17. He was as anxious as the representative of the USSR to safeguard freedom of thought, and agreed to include it in his amendment.

MR. CASSIN (France) wished the right to freedom of religion to be mentioned in the Drafting Committee's text, which he preferred to the Lebanese amendment. Moreover, he objected to the deletion of the reference to the right to freedom of thought.

The right to freedom of thought was a sacred and inviolable right. It was the basis and the origin of all other rights. Freedom of thought differed from freedom of expression in that the latter was subject to certain restrictions for the sake of public order. It might be asked why freedom of inner thought should have to be protected even before it was expressed. That was because the opposite of inner freedom of thought was the outward obligation to profess a belief which was not held. Freedom of thought thus required to be formally protected in view of the fact that it was possible to attack it indirectly. Hence the right to freedom of thought, which was the basis of other liberties, should be included in the article.

[11]

He would prefer an article divided into two paragraphs, like that of the Drafting Committee. Speaking of the comments made by the representative of the Agudas Israel Organization, he thought that the English text of Article 16, which the latter had found lacking in clarity, protected all essential religious freedoms and needed no amplification.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) (Rapporteur) agreed to insert in his text a mention of the right to freedom of thought, and to divide his amendment into two paragraphs as follows:

“Everyone has the right to freedom of religion, conscience, belief and thought, including freedom to change his religion or belief.”

“Everyone has the right to freedom, either alone or in community with other persons of like mind, and in public or private, to manifest his religion or belief in teaching, practice, worship and observance.”

MR. FONTAINA (Uruguay) pointed out that the freedom to change one’s religion or belief was covered by freedom of religion and belief. That part of the article was therefore redundant. Moreover, the Lebanese amendment as redrafted coincided with the Drafting Committee’s original text. The only real amendment to Article 16 was the one submitted by India and the United Kingdom.

MR. CHANG (China) preferred the latter amendment. Article 16 should treat only of the protection of freedom of religion and belief; the protection of freedom of thought was dealt with in Articles 17 and 18. He suggested replacing “either alone or in community with other persons of like mind” by “with others”. He would vote for the Indian and United Kingdom amendment.

[12]

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) (Rapporteur) said that he had divided his amendment into two paragraphs so as to meet the wishes of the French representative. If the redrafting met with any objection, he would reserve the right to revert to his original text.

THE CHAIRMAN proposed, to take a vote, first on the first paragraph of the Lebanese amendment, then on the Indian and United Kingdom amendment, and finally on the second paragraph of the Lebanese amendment.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) said that freedom of religion and belief implied the freedom to practise one's religion or belief. There was, therefore, no need to mention it specifically. Moreover, if the idea of freedom of thought were introduced into the first part of the sentence, it would also have to be included in the second part so that it would read: "including freedom to change his religion, belief or thought" which would be rather out of place in a Declaration on Human Rights. The article dealt essentially with freedom of religion, and it would be better not to introduce any other consideration.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) supported the French representative's arguments regarding freedom of thought. That freedom should, moreover, be mentioned before the other freedoms. The United Kingdom representative's view that the article was a purely religious one was quite unjustified. Atheists also had the right to express their opinions and to have their freedom of thought protected.

MR. FONTAINA (Uruguay) said that freedom of thought was the fundamental freedom, and that freedom of religion and belief derived therefrom. He therefore suggested reversing the order of Articles 16 and 17 so that freedom of thought should be guaranteed by an article preceding the one on freedom of religion.

[13]

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that Article 17 covered more than freedom of thought. She suggested taking a vote on whether it was desirable to deal with freedom of thought in a separate article or whether it would be sufficient to mention it in Article 16.

MR. CASSIN (France) said that according to the European conception, freedom of thought had a metaphysical significance. It was an unconditional right which could not be subjected to any restrictions of a public nature. The other rights, however important they might be, were subject to certain limitations. There was a great difference in degree between freedom of thought and freedom of opinion. It would, therefore, be sufficient to mention the right to freedom of thought first among the freedoms enumerated in Article 16; it was unnecessary to mention it again in Article 17.

MR. LOPEZ (Philippines) was in favour of mentioning the right to freedom of thought in Article 16, and not in Article 17, which was intended to guarantee freedom of expression.

Moreover, since Article 16 was intended essentially to protect religious freedom, the logical order in which the freedoms should be enumerated in that article were, in his opinion, "freedom of religion, of conscience, of thought and of belief," freedom of thought thus following freedom of religion and conscience.

MR. CHANG (China) agreed that according to European ideas freedom of thought was the basis of freedom of belief. Although belief implied thought, freedom of thought had in the course of history actually preceded freedom of belief. But the right to those freedoms implied the right to change them. He therefore suggested simply saying: "the right to freedom of thought, religion and belief."

[14]

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) thought that metaphysical considerations were being pushed too far. Article 17 contained elements without which freedom of thought could not exist. It would therefore be better to be satisfied with the original Articles 16 and 17, which were admirably drafted and satisfied all practical requirements.

THE CHAIRMAN appointed a sub-committee, composed of the representatives of France, Lebanon, the United Kingdom and Uruguay, to reconsider the drafting of Articles 16 and 17 in the light of the views expressed during the meeting.

The meeting rose at 5:30 p.m.

E/CN.4/111

7 June 1948

Report of the Sub-Committee Consisting of the Representatives of Australia, China, France, Lebanon, India and the United Kingdom on Article 2 of the Draft International Declaration
on Human Rights

Article 2

1. Everyone has duties to the community which enables him freely to develop his personality.

2. In the exercise of his rights, everyone shall be subject only to such limitations as are necessary to secure due recognition and respect for the rights of others and the requirements of general welfare in a democratic society.

E/CN.4/112

7 June 1948

Report of the Sub-Committee Consisting of the Representatives of China, France and the United Kingdom on the Second Paragraph of Article 3 of the Draft International Declaration
on Human Rights

Article 3

All are equal before the law and are entitled to equal protection of the law, without any discrimination, and against any discrimination in violation of this Declaration or incitement to such discrimination.

E/CN.4/113
7 June 1948

Report of the Sub-Committee Consisting of the Representatives of France, Lebanon, the United Kingdom and Uruguay, on the Consideration of Article 16 of the Draft
International Declaration on Human Rights and its Relation to Articles 17 and 18

1. Article 16 should read as follows:

“Everyone has the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion; this right includes freedom to change his religion or belief, and freedom, either alone or in community with others in public or private, to manifest his religion or belief in teaching, practice, worship and observance.”

2. The word “thought” in Articles 17 and 18 should be replaced by the word “opinion”.

3. Article 16 should precede Articles 17 and 18.

E/CN.4/SR.61
7 June 1948<sup>109</sup>

Original Text: French

Summary Record of the Sixty-First Meeting
[of the Commission on Human Rights]
Held at Lake Success, New York, on Monday,
7 June 1948 at 11.00 a.m.

Chairman: Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, United States of America. Vice-Chairmen: Mr. P. C. Chang Wu, China; Mr. René Cassin, France. Rapporteur: Mr. Charles Malik, Lebanon. Members: Mr. Hood, Australia; Mr. Steyaert, Belgium; Mr. A. Stepanenko, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic; Mr. Omar Loutfi, Egypt; Mrs. Hansa Mehta, India; Mr. de J. Quijano, Panama; Mr. Lopez, Philippines; Mr. Klekovkin, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic; Mr. Pavlov, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics; Mr. Wilson, United Kingdom; Mr. Fontaina, Uruguay; Mr. Vilfan, Yugoslavia. Also Present: Mrs. Ledon, Representative of the Commission on the Status of Women. Representative of Specialized Agency: Mr. Metall, International Labour Organization (ILO). [2] Representatives of Non-governmental Organizations: Miss Sender, American Federation of Labor; Mr. A. J. van Istendael,

<sup>109</sup> This was the date of the meeting. The document was issued on 23 June 1948.

International Federation of Christian Trade Unions; Miss Drennan, Catholic International Union for Social Service; Mr. Nolde, Commission of the Churches on International Affairs; Mr. Janner and Mr. Brotman, Co-ordinating Board of Jewish Organizations for Consultation with the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations; Miss Schaefer, International Union of Catholic Women's Leagues. Secretariat: Mr. Humphrey, Director, Human Rights Division; Mr. Lawson, Secretary of the Commission.

Continuation of Consideration of the Report of the Drafting Committee
(Document E/CN.4/95)

Article 14

THE CHAIRMAN read out the following text, prepared by the Drafting Sub-Committee, consisting of the representatives of France, the United States of America, the United Kingdom and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics:

“(1) Everyone has the right, alone as well as in association with others, to own property (in accordance with the laws of the country where the property is located).

“(2) No one shall be arbitrarily deprived of his property.”

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the clause in parentheses had not been unanimously accepted by the Sub-Commission, and would therefore be put to a separate vote.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) felt that it was absolutely necessary to preserve the clause in parenthesis which emphasized the respect to the internal laws of each country. On the other [3] hand, he thought that in the second paragraph, the word “arbitrarily”, which apparently lent itself to different interpretations, should, in order to avoid any misunderstanding, be followed by the phrase: “that is, contrary to the laws.”

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) was in full agreement with the USSR representative on the purpose of the clause between parenthesis, but he thought it unnecessary to reaffirm the obvious fact that property rights were subject to the laws of the country where the property was situated. That was true of every country in the world, moreover, the general limitation clause of article 2 applied to all articles of the Declaration, including article 14.

The laws of most countries provided for the right to own immovable property, but did not regulate the ownership of movable property; consequently a limitation as general as the one proposed for article 14 was not fully justified, and the Commission should not retain it if it did not wish to establish a completely new legal theory of the ownership of movable property.

MR. CASSIN (France) said that the original French proposal had provided that property ownership should be governed by the laws of the country where the property was situated. That qualification however, now seemed unnecessary, as the Drafting Sub-Committee's text introduced a new element by mentioning the two forms which property rights take, thus ensuring the right of states to choose either form.

He could not entirely agree with Mr. Wilson's objections concerning the regulation of movable property, and pointed out that the limitation clause in parenthesis referred to property rights in general. In any case, that clause was unnecessary since it was covered, by the provisions of article 2.

[4]

In conclusion, he stressed that legality did not necessarily preclude arbitrary action. The Commission wanted to combat such action, even if it were given a legal form. That was the purport of the second paragraph of the Drafting Sub-Committee's text, which made it harmonize with the spirit of the Declaration.

THE CHAIRMAN, as representative of the United States of America, supported the deletion of the words in parenthesis since they might give rise to confusion; furthermore, they were unnecessary in view of the provisions of article 2. Neither could the United States delegation accept the USSR amendment to paragraph 2 as it might be interpreted in such a way as to deprive people of their property both by arbitrary and legal means, and that was exactly what the Commission wished to prevent.

In reply to a question by MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon), the Chairman explained that according to the Drafting Sub-Committee's text, everyone had a dual right to own property, either by himself, or in association with others, and these two forms of ownership were not mutually exclusive.

MR. CASSIN (France) agreed that the French text was not as clear on that point as the English. He proposed the following French version:

“Toute personne a le droit de posséder des biens, aussi bien seule qu'en collectivité.”

The Commission agreed to the new drafting of the French version as proposed by Mr. Cassin.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) recalled that the unanimously adopted Geneva text contained a reference to laws. He failed to understand why this reference should have raised doubts since then.

[5]

He stressed that the word “arbitrarily” referred to that which was against the law; the USSR amendment was therefore only intended to clarify that meaning. The Hitlerite concept which treated arbitrary action as legal would not be accepted by democratic states; it would be wronging them to think that they might include in their legislation any provisions making arbitrary action possible.

The USSR concept of property was different from that of other countries; exploitation of property was considered unjust and illegal in his country. The Union of Soviet Socialist Republics was not trying to impose its views upon other nations, but it attached great importance to the limitation clause between parentheses, for this clause would prevent the views of others from being imposed upon it.

MR. STEYAERT (Belgium) stated that his delegation favoured the deletion of the words in parentheses for the same reasons as those brought forward by the representatives of the United Kingdom and of France.

MR. STEPANENKO (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) said the discussion had convinced him of the weight of the USSR representative's arguments and proposals. It was not for the Commission to go into such details as the distinction between movable and immovable property. The Commission was only called upon to draft the article in such a way as to take into account the interests of all States, in a spirit of complete co-operation. It was essential to retain the clause between brackets if the principle of national sovereignty, laid down in the Charter, was to be respected.

He also supported Mr. Pavlov's interpretation of the word "arbitrary." The Commission should take the word "arbitrary" to mean everything which was not in conformity with the laws of democratic States, i.e., of States which traditionally defended the interests of the people.

[6]

The clarification called for by the USSR representative was intended only to avoid any misunderstandings on that point.

MR. DE QUIJANO (Panama) stated that the Commission's primary duty was to lay down the principles upon which the Declaration on Human Rights was to be based, without concerning itself with the obstacles to the realization of those principles, and on the assumption that the States would respect them. The Declaration of Human Rights should satisfy the aspirations of all the free men of the world.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that in English the word "arbitrarily" had the connotation of injustice. The purpose of the Drafting Sub-Committee's text was to protect everyone from being unjustly deprived of his property. It was not impossible that governments might sometimes act arbitrarily, and it was that possibility that had to be prevented. The addition of the words "that is, contrary to the laws", would add nothing in that respect.

She would ask the Commission to decide on the retention of the words "in accordance with the laws of the country where the property is located", and would then put to the vote the first part of the first paragraph, the USSR amendment to the second paragraph, and finally the second paragraph of the Drafting Committee's text for article 14.

It was decided by eight votes to four, with two abstentions, not to retain the part of the sentence in parentheses.

The first paragraph was adopted by nine votes with four abstentions.

The USSR amendment to the second paragraph was rejected by nine votes to four with one abstention.

*The second paragraph was adopted by ten votes to four.
Article 14 as a whole was adopted by nine votes to four.*

[7]

Article 19

THE CHAIRMAN read the text proposed by the Drafting Committee for article 19 (document E/CN.4/95) and the alternative text proposed by the Chinese delegation (document E/CN.4/102), the French delegation (document E/CN.4/88/Add.8) and the United Kingdom and Indian delegations (document E/CN.4/99).

She asked the USSR representative whether the text proposed by his delegation, given in document E/CN.4/95, was designed to replace the Drafting Committee's text or to be added to it.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said his delegation had intended that the text should be substituted for that of the Drafting Committee; he would however be willing for it to be the second paragraph of article 19, if the Commission so desired.

The USSR delegation was chiefly concerned with ensuring, in article 19, that freedom of organization, assembly, etc. should not be granted to organizations having a nazi, fascist or anti-democratic character. Past experience had given ample proof of the extent to which such freedom could be abused, if it were granted indiscriminately. Germany under Hitler had furnished a convincing example.

THE CHAIRMAN called attention to an error in translation in document E/CN.4/95. The USSR draft should read: "In the interest of democracy the freedom of assembly, of public demonstration, of procession and of organization, of voluntary associations and unions shall be guaranteed by law and all other organizations having a nazi, fascist or anti-democratic character, as well as their activity in whatever form, shall be forbidden under penalty of the law."

Speaking as representative of the United States of America, she said her delegation preferred the Indian and United Kingdom text, but with an [8] amendment consisting of the addition of the words: "including freedom to form and join trade union associations of his own choice."

MR. CASSIN (France) said the French delegation withdrew its amendment in favour of the Drafting Committee's text, which seemed the best possible one, as it would allow freedom of assembly and association for organizations of very different sorts, including trade union associations, would retain the idea of freedom for international associations – a subject which had been discussed at length – and finally, would substantially meet the point raised by the USSR representative, namely that the right of assembly and to participate in associations was granted on condition that it would not be exercised for purposes or interests contrary to the aims of the proposed Declaration.

He thought the various proposed amendments would not improve the Drafting Committee's text. For his part, he would ask for only a small drafting correction in the French text, the last part of which should read: "en vue de favoriser, de défendre et de protéger des fins et des intérêts non contraires aux buts de la présente Déclaration."

MR. CHANG (China) said that after studying the different proposals submitted, he wished to stress that his delegation's draft had the advantage of being both complete and concise.

The joint text proposed by the delegations of India and the United Kingdom added to the Chinese proposal a condition taken from the Drafting Committee's text: "for the promotion, defence and protection etc . . ." That rather long reservation did not seem necessary, for the general interest of the democratic societies was the constant aim of the proposed Declaration.

The Drafting Committee's text enumerated moreover the kinds of associations to which a person had a right to belong. But any enumeration was dangerous. It might be argued that religious associations, for example, had the same right to be included in article 19 as trade union organizations. [9] He did not see why the latter should be mentioned any more than the former. The purpose of article 19 should be to grant to everyone freedom to organize or join any association provided only that that was done within the framework of democratic interests. The simplified draft advocated by the Chinese delegation best fulfilled that purpose.

MR. FONTAINA (Uruguay) associated himself with the remarks made by the Chinese representative. The Commission's task was to establish the right of association and of assembly. Anything added to the declaration of that right would amount to a limitation.

The amendment proposed by the United States of America in particular, was a somewhat peculiar limitation, as it mentioned only one type of association.

The Uruguayan delegation would vote for the text proposed by the Chinese delegation.

MR. LOPEZ (Philippines) said his delegation considered the Chinese text not only the simplest but the most satisfactory. There was no more reason to limit freedom of assembly and of association than religious freedom or freedom of expression; yet articles 17 and 18 contained no provisions of that sort. The only limitation which the Philippine delegation considered desirable was the general reservation contained in article 2 of the Declaration.

MRS. MEHTA (India) was opposed to the United States amendment because she did not think it necessary to make special mention of trade unions, which were included among democratic associations covered by the article dealing with the right of organization and assembly. She explained that the part of the sentence "for the promotion, etc." taken from the Drafting Committee's text had been adopted by her delegation in order to meet objections raised by the USSR representative. She realized, however, that the provisions of article 2 made that phrase unnecessary. [10] The Indian delegation would therefore vote for the simplified text proposed by the Chinese delegation.

MISS SENDER (American Federation of Labor) drew the attention of the representatives of China and Uruguay to the reasons for making a special mention of trade unions. The right of association had been guaranteed to man for one hundred and fifty years and was included in the first Declaration on Human Rights. At present that right not only had to be reaffirmed but had to be specifically granted to a new form of association, the trade union association, which had been in existence for only some sixty years.

MR. VAN ISTENDAEL (World Federation of Christian Trade Unions) observed that the new Declaration on Human Rights should take into account the constant evolution of human society. A new type of organization had appeared during recent decades, the trade union organization; and to mention it in article 19 of the Declaration would mean granting it formal recognition. As regards the amendment submitted by the United States, he stressed the importance of allowing everyone to belong to the trade union association “of his own choice” in order to avoid all possible abuses. Furthermore, he considered it unnecessary to mention the same reservations in each of the articles of the Declaration since, under article 2, no association could be formed if its interests and purposes were contrary to the aims of the Declaration.

MR. STEYAERT (Belgium) pointed out that the English and French versions of the Drafting Committee’s text might be interpreted differently. In his opinion, the French text seemed to refer only to trade union organizations, whether local, national or international, whereas the English text seemed to enumerate various types of organizations – local, national, international and trade unions.

[11]

MR. HOOD (Australia) said the Drafting Committee had specifically mentioned trade union associations at the latter’s request. In his opinion, the words “local”, “national” and “international” referred to the trade union associations.

He recalled that the Indian and United Kingdom proposal had left out all mention of trade unions and had merely proclaimed the general principle of the freedom of association. The United States amendment had again taken up the idea of mentioning trade unions specifically. If the Commission thought that trade unions should be mentioned, it should go back either to the Geneva text or to the French draft. If, on the other hand, it was against any enumeration, the simple and concise Chinese text was the best.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) also supported the Chinese draft.

MR. LOPEZ (Philippines) said that the Drafting Committee text for article 24 of the Declaration assured to everyone the freedom to belong to trade unions to protect their interests.

That provision fully accorded with the wishes of trade union associations.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the USSR draft for article 19 (see document E/CN.4/95).

The draft was rejected by nine votes to four with one abstention.

The Chairman then put to the vote the variant proposed by China (document E/CN.4/102).

The Chinese draft for article 19 was adopted by seven votes to four with three abstentions.

[12]

Article 20

THE CHAIRMAN reminded the Commission that the Drafting Committee had decided not to examine the text of article 20 relating to petitions until articles on implementation had been drafted. The Committee felt that the article would be of little use as long as the means of implementing the Declaration had not been worked out. She asked the members of the Commission whether they agreed with the Drafting Committee's decision.

The Commission decided to postpone the examination of article 20 until articles on implementation had been drafted.

Articles 21 and 22

THE CHAIRMAN read out the drafts proposed by the Drafting Committee for article 21 and 22 (document E/CN.4/95) and the variants proposed by the French delegation (document E/CN.4/82/Add.8), the Indian and United Kingdom delegations (document E/CN.4/99) and the Chinese delegation (document E/CN.4/102).

MR. CHANG (China) withdrew his amendment and said the Chinese delegation preferred and accepted the wording proposed by the Indian and United Kingdom delegations.

Speaking as the representative of the United States of America, the Chairman thought it must be through inadvertence that the list of grounds for discrimination in articles 21 and 22 differed from the grounds set forth in article 3 of the Declaration. She wished to draw the Commission's attention to this matter and stressed the necessity of bringing the list into line with article 3.

The United States delegation believed that in its present form the first sentence of the Drafting Committee text could be interpreted as meaning that everyone had the right to take an effective part in the government of his country only so long as his opinions coincided with those of the President, [13] the Prime Minister or whoever might be in power, but that the right lapsed as soon as he disagreed.

The United States felt that the only way to guarantee a free government was to allow persons of opposing views to serve in different capacities in various public services, to guarantee the minority full freedom to have its own opinions, and, if such was the people's will, to become the majority. Those considerations were set forth in the second paragraph of the United States draft.

In order to secure agreement on a short and concise text, laying down only the broadest principles, the United States would support the Indian-United Kingdom draft, which was also supported by China. If, however, the Drafting Committee's text was put to the vote, the United States delegation reserved the right to offer as an amendment paragraph (b) of the text it had submitted to the Drafting Committee (see document E/CN.4/95).

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) pointed out that though it was more comprehensive from a democratic point of view, the Geneva text adopted by the Drafting Committee did have some gaps. The list of possible reasons for discrimination did not include nationality, place of residence, property status and level of education. Yet, in several countries, certain persons could take no part in the government of their country for reasons of nationality, residence, property status or education. The list in paragraph 1 of the Drafting Committee's text should therefore be made complete.

As regards the elections provided for in the same paragraph, the USSR delegation felt that they should be universal and just. There was no need to provide for the elections to be periodic, for that was a detail which could well be omitted. It should be stated, however, that the elections must be direct as direct elections ensured the setting up of truly democratic organs. Nevertheless, if certain delegations objected, the USSR delegation was prepared not [14] to insist on the insertion of this principle in articles 21 and 22, as that might give rise to great difficulties in several countries. It would insist, however, on the principle of the universal character of elections and on the equal right of all to take part in them for that principle was acceptable to all.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) asked Mr. Pavlov whether he wished, in connection with the enumeration of possible grounds for discrimination contained in articles 21 and 22, to add certain points to article 3, or, on the contrary, to delete some.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) pointed out that there was a difference between the enumerations in article 3 and in articles 21 and 22. Article 3 dealt with the full enjoyment of all the rights and freedoms set forth in the Declaration, while articles 21 and 22 dealt only with the right to vote and the way in which elections should be held. What was important in the latter case – for instance, the right of everyone to take part in elections without any discrimination based on education – might be of no importance whatever for article 3. Similarly, length of residence played a very important part as regards the right to vote for, in several countries, part of the working population, such as the agricultural workers, were deprived of the right to take part in elections because they had not resided in their constituencies for a sufficient length of time. There was also the case of one country where the rich had two votes at elections. If elections were to be quite fair, he thought the principles he had mentioned should be added to the list in the Drafting Committee's text.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) asked the USSR representative whether, for the purpose of articles 21 and 22, he wished to add education and residence to the list in article 3, and omit from it political opinion.

[15]

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) replied he would propose to add the following four possible reasons for discrimination to the list contained in articles 21 and 22: nationality, residence, education and property status.

MR. CASSIN (France) said he was prepared to accept the Indian-United Kingdom text which did not contain such a list.

It was obvious that if some grounds for discrimination were mentioned, then all would have to be mentioned. The French delegation agreed with the additions the USSR representative proposed making to the list in articles 21 and 22, with the exception of the one concerning nationality. There could be no question of recognizing the right of aliens to vote in their country of residence. He thought the USSR representative had probably in mind the right to vote in federal and local elections, and that he wished to safeguard the right of citizens of a federated state residing in another part of the Union, of which their own country was a member, to vote in the constituency in which they resided. The question of the federal and local vote was far too complex; it depended on the legislation of the various States, and the Commission was not competent to deal with it. The French delegation did not think it would be appropriate to have a kind of election notice in the Declaration; it was necessary to lay down principles without enumerating all the possible grounds for discrimination.

The Indian and United Kingdom text could form the first paragraph of article 21. The article, however, could not end there; the Commission would have to proclaim that the State must conform to the will of the people. Such a statement of principle should be included at the beginning of any document of a doctrinal or theoretical nature. In its draft Declaration the Commission had to find a compromise between the present state of the world and men's aspirations; but whatever the place assigned to it the principle that the [16] State must conform to the will of the people must be stated in the Declaration; on that point the French delegation would not yield at any cost.

He admitted that equality of opportunity to engage in public employment, dealt with in article 20 of document E/CN.4/82/Add.8, was not, strictly speaking, a fundamental right. The French delegation had written it into its draft Declaration for fear that the absence of any provision on this point might subsequently have been used to justify some form of discrimination.

MRS. LEDON (Vice-Chairman of the Commission on the Status of Women) said her Commission was strongly in favour of retaining the enumeration of the possible grounds for discrimination, and particularly discrimination of sex.

It was unfortunately, a fact that in many countries women did not enjoy political rights; the right to vote, in particular, was often withheld on the pretext of political immaturity. It was important, therefore, that that Declaration should state that everyone had the right to take an effective part in the government of his country, and should specify the grounds on which there could be no discrimination. In case the Commission decided not to retain the enumeration of the grounds for discrimination, she would like the records of the meeting to set forth how the Commission interpreted the words "everyone".

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) confirmed that the expression embraced all persons with the obvious exception of children, prisoners and the insane, as in the case of several other articles of the Declaration. The expression "everyone" could be defined as follows: "any adult of sound mind."

MR. STEPANENKO (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) was sorry to note a general tendency to shorten the text of articles 21 and 22, which would result in a less exact definition of the rights which should be proclaimed in those articles.

[17]

Stressing that effective participation in the government of one's country was a fundamental right for everyone, he asked the Commission to devote particular care to the articles dealing with that right, and drew its attention to the fact that the rights and wellbeing of all the inhabitants of a given country depended on the extent to which the masses of the people took part in the government of that country.

In various countries, unfortunately, there were still numerous grounds for discrimination in election matters. The USSR representative had mentioned some which were not to be found in the Drafting Committee's text. Supporting the observations made by Mr. Pavlov and the representative of the Commission on the Status of Women, he urged that the list in the Drafting Committee's text should be retained and completed on the lines of the USSR representative's suggestions. The Commission should guard against the danger of adopting too concise a text; the freedoms proclaimed by the Commission would be reduced to a minimum and discrimination would remain. His delegation could not accept the text proposed by the Indian and United Kingdom delegations, and would vote only for a text that granted genuine rights to the masses of the people.

MR. FONTAINA (Uruguay) supported the remarks made by the French representative on the importance of mentioning the duties of the State to the individual in the Declaration.

He would also point out that there was a difference between the notions of access to public office and participation in the government, and he suggested, amending the Indian and United Kingdom text as follows:

“Everyone has the right to access to public office and to take part in the government of his country directly or through his freely chosen representatives.”

MR. MALIK (Lebanon), Rapporteur, proposed that the words “and to hold public office”, suggested by the Lebanese representative, should be [18] placed at the end of the Indian and United Kingdom text.

Replying to MR. LOPEZ (Philippines), MR. FONTAINA (Uruguay) explained that the term “government”, was more restricted in its meaning than “public office”, for it did not include the various administrative bodies which formed the State apparatus.

MR. CASSIN (France), replying to the question asked by the Philippines representative, said there was a distinction in English between “government”, that is to say political affairs, on the one hand, and “administration” on the other. In order to avoid any ambiguity, he proposed replacing, in the French text, the expression “prendre part au gouvernement de son pays” by the expression “prendre part à la direction des affaires politiques de son pays”. The access to public office and employment would be dealt with in a separate paragraph.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) said his delegation was prepared to accept the addition proposed by the representative of Uruguay. He would prefer, however, the expression “to have access to public employment” because in the English expression “to hold office”, the word “office” usually referred to a ministerial post.

MR. CHANG (China) proposed, as regards the English text, to revert to the Drafting Committee’s wording and say “access to public employment”.

THE CHAIRMAN asked the representatives of China, India and of the United Kingdom to work out a formula on which the Commission would vote at its next meeting.

The meeting rose at 1:15 p.m.

E/CN.4/SR.62

7 June 1948<sup>110</sup>

Summary Record of the Sixty-Second Meeting
[of the Commission on Human Rights]

Held at Lake Success, New York, on Monday,
 7 June 1948, at 2:30 p.m.

Chairman: Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, United States of America. Rapporteur: Mr. Charles Malik, Lebanon. Members: Mr. Hood, Australia; Mr. Lebeau, Belgium; Mr. Stepanenko, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic; Mr. Loutfi, Egypt; Mrs. Mehta, India; Mr. Quijano,

<sup>110</sup> This is the date of the meeting. The document was issued on 11 June 1948.

Panama; Mr. Lopez, Philippines; Mr. Klekovkin, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic; Mr. Pavlov, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics; Mr. Wilson, United Kingdom; Mr. Fontaina, Uruguay; Mr. Vilfan, Yugoslavia. Also Present: Mrs. Ledon, Representative of the Commission on the Status of Women. Representatives of Specialized Agency: Mr. Lebar, International Labour Organization (ILO). [2] Consultants from Non-governmental Organizations: Miss Sender, American Federation of Labor; Mr. van Istendael, International Federation of Christian Trade Unions; Mr. Rubinow, World Federation of United Nations Associations; Mr. Lewin, Agudas Israel World Organization; Mr. Drennan, Catholic International Union for Social Service; Mr. Nolde, Commission of the Churches on International Affairs; Mr. Janner and Mr. Brotman, Co-ordinating Board of Jewish Organizations for Consultation with the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations; Miss Strahler, International Committee of the Red Cross; Miss Schaefer, International Union of Catholic Women's Leagues.

Consideration of Draft International Declaration on Human Rights, Submitted by the Drafting Committee (Annex A of document E/CN.4/95)

Articles 21 and 22

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) explained that he had not been able to consult the Chinese representative with regard to a new text of Articles 21 and 22, but that he and the representative of India had agreed upon the following draft, which they submitted as Article 21:

“Everyone has the right to take part in the government of his country directly or through his freely chosen representatives. Everyone has the right of access to public employment in his country.”

It would be seen that the first sentence was the original Indian-United Kingdom draft, as in document E/CN.4/99, to which the second sentence had been added.

THE CHAIRMAN put the above draft to the vote, as a substitute for the text proposed by the Drafting Committee.

The Commission approved the new text of Article 21 by eleven votes to four with one abstention.

[3]

MR. CASSIN (France) urged that the following sentence, which had been in the Drafting Committee text of Article 21, should not be dropped from the Declaration:

“The State shall conform to the will of the people as manifested by elections which shall be periodic, free, fair and by secret ballot.”

Since, according to the rules of procedure, he could not propose it as an addition to Article 21, which had already been voted upon, he would ask to have it considered as Article 22.

After a short discussion of procedure, THE CHAIRMAN asked the Commission to vote whether it wished to consider the inclusion of the above text as Article 22.

The Commission decided, by nine votes to three with four abstentions, to consider the inclusion of the above text as Article 22.

The Chairman, speaking as the representative of the United States of America, asked the French representative whether he would agree to redraft the beginning of the article as follows: "Everyone has the right to a government which will conform . . ." That would put the article in a declaratory form, and would be in keeping with the rest of the Declaration.

MR. CASSIN (France) accepted that proposal.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) expressed concern that the text in question, either in the original French draft or as amended by the United States representative, went beyond the original purpose of the Declaration. This was to state human rights, not the obligation of States. Article 21 contained all that was necessary, for, if government representatives were freely chosen, the government would in fact conform to the will of the people.

Moreover, the phrase "as manifested by elections which shall be periodic, free, fair and by secret ballot" went into matters of detail which [4] the Commission was expressly trying to avoid. It was sufficient to speak of "freely chosen representatives"; how they were to be chosen was a debatable subject. Mr. Wilson drew the attention of the Commission to the comment on Article 21 of the Draft Declaration on page 24 of document E/600, according to which the Commission had agreed at its second session, held at Geneva, that "the use of such balloting procedure as the secret ballot could not be imposed when its effect might be contrary to the intentions of Article 74(b)<sup>111</sup> of the Charter, or to the obligations contained in the relevant parts of the trusteeship agreements". The Commission would recall that the Trusteeship Council had recently sent a Visiting Mission to Western Samoa,<sup>112</sup> where voting by secret ballot was not and never had been in operation: the Visiting Mission had agreed that that was in accordance with the Charter, since representatives were freely chosen. That principle was already maintained in the text just approved for Article 21, and Mr. Wilson urged that nothing more was necessary.

<sup>111</sup> There is no article 74(b) of the Charter. It is evident that the reference should be to article 73(b) which reads: "Members of the United Nations which have or assume responsibilities for the administration of territories whose peoples have not yet attained a full measure of self-government recognize the principle that the interests of the inhabitants of these territories are paramount, and accept as a sacred trust the obligation to promote to the utmost, within the system of international peace and security established by the present Charter, the well-being of the inhabitants of these territories, and, to this end: . . .

b. to develop self-government, to take due account of the political aspirations of the peoples, and to assist them in the progressive development of their free political institutions, according to the particular circumstances of each territory and its peoples and their varying stages of advancement. . ."

<sup>112</sup> The Trusteeship Council sent a Visiting Mission to Western Samoa in June 1948 to investigate a petition dated 18 November 1946 from the Members of the Legislative Council, political representatives, and judiciary in Western Samoa, requesting that Samoa be granted self-government and remain under the protection of New Zealand.

THE CHAIRMAN declared that her delegation, too, was satisfied with Article 21. She had proposed an amendment to the French text, simply in order that the Article should be in a declaratory form if the Commission adopted it.

MR. STEPANENKO (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) pointed out that many members had felt that Article 21, as adopted was inadequate. He supported the French proposal.

He could not agree with the United Kingdom representative that democratic principles were applicable to the metropolitan powers only and not to non-metropolitan territories. In the former Italian colonies, for instance, a system of secret ballot had in fact been used, with satisfactory results. If such a system had not been universally applied heretofore, it was the duty of the Commission to see that in future it was made the right of all peoples in the world.

[5]

MR. CASSIN (France) was willing to admit that Article 21 did perhaps include the essence of the principle he was now trying to incorporate. The Declaration should not, however, omit some reference to the will of the people. The Commission was not preparing a purely legal text, but was speaking for the masses of the world.

He did not wish the question of secret ballot to become the subject of controversy; there were other systems, as for example in the Swiss Confederacy, which were equally democratic. He would therefore withdraw the words "and by secret ballot", but hoped the Commission would retain the reference to the will of the people.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) recalled that when the Commission had considered Article 2 of the Draft Declaration, he had urged that reference should be made to the democratic State. The Commission had, however, decided against it; and had consequently come upon great difficulties with regard to the question of arbitrary acts. The present discussion was another example of the result of that mistaken decision.

Mr. Pavlov agreed that the will of the people must be mentioned. While he thought the representative of France had been wrong to withdraw the reference to the secret ballot, he was willing to compromise and would agree to the words "and, where possible, by secret ballot". He would further wish to amend the French proposal to read as follows: ". . . elections which shall be universal, without discrimination, equal and direct, periodic, free, fair and, where possible, by secret ballot".

MR. CHANG (China) wondered whether a simplified form would be acceptable, taking into consideration the general structure of the Declaration. He proposed some such simple formula as "The Government shall conform to the will of the people".

[6]

MR. HOOD (Australia) supported the representative of China. It was possible that the Commission had proceeded too rapidly in its consideration of Article 21 and that some mention of the will of the people should be included somewhere in the declaration. He would go even further than the Chinese representative, and would suggest that the Commission might go back to Article 21 with a view to including that phrase at the end of the first sentence, along the following lines: “. . . freely chosen representatives, to the end that the Government shall conform to the will of the people”.

THE CHAIRMAN, supported by MR. FONTAINA (Uruguay), thought that the proper place for such a statement was not in an article, but in the Preamble.

MR. CASSIN (France) could not agree that his proposal should be relegated to the Preamble.

MR. FONTAINA (Uruguay) suggested that, before a vote was taken upon the actual text, the Commission should vote whether it was to be included in the Preamble or as a separate article.

After a short discussion, in which MR. CHANG (China) pointed out that if the text was rejected as an article, members would still have the right to reintroduce it when the Preamble was discussed, MR. FONTAINA (Uruguay) withdrew his suggestion.

THE CHAIRMAN proposed to take the vote in the following order: the first part of the French proposal, namely “Everyone has the right to a government which shall conform to the will of the people”, should be voted upon first, since it was practically the same as the USSR proposal; the USSR amendment to the second part would next be voted; and if that was rejected, the remainder of the French proposal would be put to the vote.

[7]

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) pointed out that his proposal for the first part was the wording of the text, adopted at the second session of the Commission, namely, “The State shall conform . . .”, a broader form than the French draft, which by using the word “government” narrowed the sense of the article.

After a brief exchange of views, in which MR. CASSIN (France) pointed out that the French translation of “government” was “pouvoirs publics”, which was all-inclusive, and MR. LEBEAU (Belgium) stated his preference for the word “State”, as covering all degrees of authority, the Commission decided to vote upon the proposal in two parts, taking the USSR amendment first in each case.

The Commission rejected the first part of the USSR amendment by six votes to four, with five abstentions.

The Commission approved the first part of the French proposal by eight votes to three with five abstentions.

The Commission rejected the second part of the USSR amendment by nine votes to six, with one abstention.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) explained that he would vote against the second part of the French proposal, on the ground that it was the duty of the government to conform to the will of the people, however that will was expressed. It was unnecessary to specify the means whereby the will of the people was to be manifested.

The Commission rejected the second part of the French proposal by nine votes to six, with one abstention.

THE CHAIRMAN announced that Article 22 would thus read:

“Everyone is entitled to a government which shall conform to the will of the people.”

[8]

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) asked whether the text approved could not be attached to Article 21, as the representative of Australia had proposed. It belonged in substance to that Article.

THE CHAIRMAN suggested that that decision should be left to the style Committee which was to go over the final draft.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom), as a member of that Committee, thought the matter far too delicate to be decided by the Committee and asked for a ruling from the Commission.

The Commission decided by eleven votes with four abstentions, to attach the text to Article 21.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) asked the Commission to consider the addition of a new article, to the effect that everyone had the right to participate in the elections of the governing body of his country.

The Commission decided, by seven votes to four, with three abstentions not to consider the inclusion of such an article.

Article 13

THE CHAIRMAN read a paper on the order of voting on proposals and amendments concerning Article 13, prepared by the Secretariat at the request of the Commission (document E/CN.4/106).

MR. CASSIN (France) said that if the United States delegation would accept the inclusion in their amendment of “the right to found a family”, and reference to the age of puberty, he would withdraw his own proposal.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) wished, in deference to ideas expressed at a previous meeting by the French representative, to insert the words “have the right to marry and” in his amendment, after the words “Men and women”.

[9]

At the request of the Uruguayan representative, he replaced the words “are entitled to” by “have”, as that would facilitate translation into Spanish.

MR. FONTAINA (Uruguay) was opposed to the addition of the words “have the right to marry and”. If that right were mentioned expressly, it would be only logical to mention the right to the dissolution of marriage, which the text failed to do.

MRS. MEHTA (India) remarked that she would support the United States text, if the Egyptian amendment to it, deleting the words “deriving from marriage”, were approved. While, in most cases, a family derived from marriage, the text as it stood could not be applied to adopted children.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) stated that, according to the very criteria set up by the Secretariat in document E/CN.4/106, the United States amendment should be put to the vote before that submitted by India and the United Kingdom; the United States amendment was farthest removed from the original in that it not only deleted four ideas contained in the original, as did the other amendment, but introduced one new idea.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) agreed with the Lebanese representative.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) pointed out that, according to rule 54 of the rules of procedure, “the most far-reaching proposal or amendment” was to be put to that vote first. The Secretariat had proceeded to determine the most far-reaching proposal on the quantitative basis of the number of words deleted. Mr. Pavlov felt that the determination should have been made on a qualitative basis, and that the extent to which ideas contained in the amendments were removed from the [10] original should have been given primary consideration. In that case, the USSR amendment would have to be put to the vote first.

It was obvious that the USSR proposal went farther than that of the United Kingdom, since it contained three ideas: equal rights for men and women to enter into marriage, during married life, and to dissolve the marriage, in countries where divorce existed. That last clause could be added to the USSR amendment to meet the previously made objection that in some parts of the world divorce was not permitted.

Mr. Pavlov stressed the need to introduce equality between men and women in all matters relating to marriage. According to the rules of procedure, the USSR amendment should be put to the vote first; those opposed to the principle of equality between the sexes could then cast a negative vote.

After a brief procedural discussion, the Commission decided to consider the United States amendment first.

MR. CASSIN (France) proposed the following amendments to the United States text:

1. Change the first sentence to read: “Men and women of full age have the right to marry and to found a family and are entitled to equal rights as to marriage.”
2. In the second sentence, delete the words “deriving from marriage”. The Egyptian amendment was thus included in the second French proposal.

The Commission approved the first French amendment by ten votes to one, with four abstentions.

The Commission approved the second French amendment by seven votes to three, with four abstentions.

[11]

THE CHAIRMAN explained that the United States text, as amended by the French representative, was intended as a substitute for Article 13 in document E/CN.4/95. If adopted, it would become the new Article 13. The Commission approved the United States text as a whole, as amended by the French representative, by eight votes to one, with six abstentions.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) called attention to the fact that the Commission had, no doubt inadvertently, left out of the new article the idea that marriage was to be entered into only with the full consent of both parties. It had, in fact, approved an article permitting young girls, in parts of the world where such customs still prevailed, to be forced into marriage.

In order to remedy that situation, Mr. Pavlov wished to propose the following: "Marriage may be entered into only with the full consent of both spouses; men and women shall have equal rights both during the marriage and in its dissolution." The statement that men and women should have equal rights in the dissolution of marriage was intended to protect the woman from the loss of property which she frequently incurred as a result of divorce.

Mr. Pavlov remarked that, if the Commission were unwilling to reopen the discussion of Article 13, his proposal might constitute a new article. MR. CASSIN (France) observed that the concept of full consent still existed in Article 13 as approved by the Commission. The phrase in that article, "the right to marry" struck at the very root of the problem, as the original draft adopted at the second session of the Commission had not done; the right to marry meant that no one was obliged to marry, save of his own free will.

[12]

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) requested that the USSR proposal might be put to the vote in two parts. He would support the first part (up to the semi-colon); the second part he thought unnecessary, as the words in Article 13 approved by the Commission, "equal rights as to marriage", covered all stages of marriage, including divorce.

The Commission approved, by eleven votes to none, with four abstentions, the first part of the USSR proposal, reading as follows: "Marriage may be entered into only with the full consent of both spouses".

The Commission rejected the rest of the USSR proposal by seven votes to six, with two abstentions.

The Commission decided, by fourteen votes to none, with one abstention, that the approved portion of the USSR proposal would become part of Article 13.

Article 16

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) reported that the drafting sub-committee, composed of the representatives of France, Lebanon, the United Kingdom and Uruguay, and entrusted with the consideration of Article 16 and its relations to Articles 17 and 18, unanimously recommended the following text: “Everyone has the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion; this right includes freedom to change his religion or belief, and freedom, either alone or in community with others, in public or private, to manifest his religion or belief in teaching, practice, worship and observance.” The sub-committee also recommended that the word “thought” in Articles 17 and 18 should be replaced by “opinion”, and that Article 16 should precede those articles.

MR. CASSIN (France) called attention to the fact that the word “observances” in the French text of proposed Article 16 should be replaced by “rites”, and that other drafting changes in that text were desirable.

[13]

The Commission approved Article 16 by eleven votes to none, with four abstentions.

Articles 17 and 18

MR. JANNER (Co-ordinating Board of Jewish Organizations) said that he was aware of the Commission’s desire to formulate principles of a general character in the Declaration, rather than draft a detailed statement of principles. While his organization would be the last to advocate any unnecessary limitation to the freedom of expression and imparting information, it wished to call attention to the danger of expressing those freedoms in too general terms. A most fundamental human right, that to freedom from fear, might be imperilled thereby.

Freedom of expression and imparting information should not mean freedom of incitement to hatred and violence against racial or religious groups. Mr. Janner recalled that, for precisely such incitement against the Jews, Streicher had been condemned to death by the Nuremberg Tribunal.<sup>113</sup> Consequently, incitement to hatred and violence had been recognized as a crime under international law. The Declaration of Human Rights should prevent such incitement from being carried on under the guise of free expression, and should provide security from continual fear.

In particular, Mr. Janner felt that close attention should be given to the words “by any means” in the text of Articles 17 and 18 submitted by the United Nations Conference on Freedom of Information (document E/CN.4/95). To avoid the dangers he had indicated, they might be amended in some such manner as: “by any means consistent with the fulfilment of this Declaration”. Although the words “by any means” might refer simply to the technical media of imparting information, that safeguard was necessary. Even in the post-war world, incitement to hatred against racial, religious and national groups occurred.

<sup>113</sup> Julius Streicher was one of the defendants at the International Military Tribunal. An anti-Semitic propagandist, he was convicted of crimes against humanity.

It might be considered that the appropriate place for specific limitations was the Covenant. Nevertheless, the Declaration should be drafted in such a manner as to permit the insertion of such limitations in the Covenant. It should be made clear that, under the Declaration, no man had the right to incite others to violence against any group of human beings.

The meeting rose at 5:40 p.m.

E/CN.4/SR.63

8 June 1948<sup>114</sup>

Summary Record of the Sixty-Third Meeting
[of the Commission on Human Rights]

Held at Lake Success, New York, on Tuesday,
 8 June 1948, at 10:45 a.m.

Chairman: Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, United States of America. Rapporteur: Mr. Malik, Lebanon. Members: Mr. Hood, Australia; Mr. Lebeau, Belgium; Mr. Stepanenko, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic; Mr. Larrain, Chile; Mr. Chang, China; Mr. Loutfi, Egypt; Mr. Cassin, France; Mrs. Mehta, India; Mr. Quijano, Panama; Mr. Lopez, Philippines; Mr. Klekovkin, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic; Mr. Pavlov, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics; Mr. Wilson, United Kingdom; Mr. Fontaina, Uruguay; Mr. Vilfan, Yugoslavia. Also Present: Mrs. Ledon, Commission on the Status of Women. Specialized Agencies: Mr. Lebar, United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization. Non-Governmental Organizations: Miss Sender, American Federation of Labor; Mr. van Istendael, International Federation of Christian Trade Unions; Miss Stuart, World Federation of United Nations Associations.

[2]

Articles 17 and 18

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the Drafting Committee had transmitted to the Commission the text of articles 17 and 18 as adopted by the United Nations Conference on Freedom of Information. Amendments to that text had been presented by France, China and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (documents E/CN.4/82/

<sup>114</sup> This was the date of the meeting. The document was issued on 22 June 1948.

Add.8, E/CN.4/102, and E/CN.4/95). She then opened discussion of the USSR amendment as the most removed text from the Geneva draft.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) asked for separate votes on the three important principles in the USSR amendment (document E/CN.4/95, page 8): freedom of expression in accordance with the principles of democracy (first part of paragraph 1), limitation of that freedom against fascist and war propaganda (second part of paragraph 1), and government subsidy to democratic organs of the press (paragraph 2). All those principles should be acceptable to true believers in democracy.

Speaking on the second part of paragraph 1, Mr Pavlov stated that the bitter lesson of fascist and imperialist wars had shown the need to limit the freedom of expression of fascists who even now carried on their dangerous war propaganda, contrary to the desires of the people. The present amendment was drawn up in accordance with the General Assembly Resolution 127(II) dealing with the publication of false or distorted reports likely to impair friendly relations among nations. As regards paragraph 2 of the USSR amendment, Mr. Pavlov wished to correct certain allegations made at the time of a previous discussion [3] of that question. The USSR amendment did not aim at nationalization of the press, nor would its results be as far-reaching as those achieved inside the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics where there was not only a tremendous circulation of the major dailies, but where all professional and other groups had, with government assistance, their own press organs which truly reflected the people's point of view.

The sole purpose of that amendment was to enable the people to avail themselves fully of their right of freedom of expression by providing that facilities for printing newspapers should be extended to them by their own governments. Such provision was also necessary to counterbalance the newspaper syndicates and monopolies through which, in many countries, small groups of people had complete control over the standardized news published in their papers. Mr. Pavlov referred to several such owners of newspapers, particularly in the United States of America and the United Kingdom. There had been a marked trend towards monopolization of newspaper publications in certain countries. Moreover, the owners of those syndicates were frequently connected with other big business concerns and thus reflect a different point of view from that of the people. That circumstance had been particularly apparent during the late President Roosevelt's electoral campaigns deferring to a statement by the late Lord Northcliffe, owner of numerous British newspapers, that it was impossible to start a newspaper on less than two million. Mr. Pavlov stressed that it was extremely unfair that financial reasons should prevent the people from having newspapers reflecting their own views. There was no need to fear that government subsidization of newspapers would lead to government control of the latter since individual journalists had shown independence of view and objectivity, even under the system of newspaper syndicates. However, some influence by a democratic government was to be preferred to control of the press by [4] business interests. In view of the importance of the matter, he asked for a roll call vote on his proposal.

MR. QUIJANO (Panama) opposed government subsidy to organs of the press. It was undemocratic and would work against the principle of freedom of expression. Even control by small groups was to be preferred to the possibility of complete government control of the press through subsidies. He was therefore against the USSR amendment.

MR. CASSIN (France) felt that the USSR provisions for implementing freedom of expression, while valuable, were inappropriate in the present context. The French delegation had always felt that freedom entailed responsibility, as reflected in the French amendment to article 17.

However, he would withdraw his own amendment to articles 17 and 18 in favour of the Geneva draft, provided the expression: "on his own responsibility" was inserted in the latter text. As regards the second part of paragraph 1 of the USSR proposal, he recognized the pernicious effects of war propaganda – amply demonstrated at the unsuccessful disarmament conference of 1925 in Geneva – but raised the question whether such provisions should be included in the present text. Referring to similar proposals previously discussed and rejected, he stressed the need for a strong, over-all limitation clause in article 2, and reserved the right to propose at a later date the necessary amendments to that article (including a provision relating to international co-operation requirements). He would vote against the USSR amendment, not because he objected to the principle proposed, but because such provisions belong to article 2.

[5]

THE CHAIRMAN, as representative of the United States of America, stated that she supported the wording submitted by the United Nations Conference on Freedom of Information.

MR. CHANG (China) also supported the text submitted by the United Nations Conference on Freedom of Information, but proposed, in view of the previously agreed substitution of the word "opinion" for the word "thought" in the first line of the Geneva text, the following re-arrangement of the article: "Everyone shall have the right to freedom of opinion and expression; this right shall include freedom to seek, receive and impart information and ideas without interference and regardless of frontiers." The word "by any means" in the third line of the Geneva text seemed superfluous. He would not oppose, however, the inclusion of such an idea, but suggested that the words should be changed to: "through all media of expression".

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) explained that he could not support the USSR amendment for the following reasons: the first sentence of paragraph 1 of that amendment imposed a limitation upon the freedom of expression, an absolute and unrestricted right. Furthermore, freedom of expression should be above guarantees of law which could be withdrawn at any time. He also questioned the desirability of singling out freedom of artistic representation from among other similar freedoms not mentioned.

As regards the second part of paragraph 1 of the USSR proposal, while he was opposed to fascism, he thought that it did not constitute the only evil of society; consequently such a provision would lead to further unnecessary enumeration. The main purpose was to lay down the positive and basic freedom of expression, limitations could be provided elsewhere.

[6]

Paragraph 2 seemed to imply a form of state control over the press which was as undesirable as control by private monopolies. He would like to see a completely free press which he was sure would be able to correct its own shortcomings. He therefore suggested that the Commission should respect the decision of the Conference and adopt its better formulated text.

MR. LEBEAU (Belgium) thought that the vote about to be taken did not relate to the ideas, but the formulation of the different proposals. He would vote against the USSR amendment in view of the fact that the other proposals were better formulated.

MRS. MEHTA (India) felt that the Commission should accept the text which the United Nations Conference on Freedom of Information had adopted after thorough discussion.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) also preferred the text submitted by the Conference. Referring to some remarks by the USSR representative, he pointed out that in any case the greater diversity in the opinions expressed in the United Kingdom indicated a condition fundamental to democracy.

THE CHAIRMAN said that in view of her previous request that the Commission should confine itself exclusively to the consideration of broad principles, she would refrain from correcting some remarks made during the discussion.

MR. HOOD (Australia) agreed with the foregoing speakers, in particular with the Lebanese representative. The USSR proposal resembled another proposal introduced during the last regular session of the General Assembly, and unanimously settled after prolonged debate. While that [7] proposal had been treated as a political question, the Commission was at present concerned with the formulation of principles of human rights. He would therefore vote against the USSR proposal.

MR. LARRAIN (Chile) shared the Belgian representative's views. He supported the principles underlying the USSR text, but felt that it was a question of choosing the most adequate draft.

MR. LOUTFI (Egypt), while sharing some of the views expressed by the USSR representative, supported the shorter and clearer text submitted by the Conference.

MR. KLEKOVKIN (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) observed that the Lebanese fear that mentioning the principles of democracy in the first sentence of the USSR proposal would unduly limit freedom of opinion and expression was particularly difficult to understand since democratic principles were the basis of the United Nations Charter and of the work of the Commission.

The second sentence of the USSR proposal was a logical sequence to the first, as it was aimed against fascism and aggression which were contrary to the principles of democracy. The United Nations would be as unsuccessful as the League of Nations had been in dealing with aggressors if it could not agree to take a clear stand against them. The terrific cost in lives of the last war surely should have taught some worthwhile lessons.

The Lebanese representative had suggested that if limitations on freedom of speech were enumerated, the list should be complete and should include for example, a provision against pornography. There was an important difference, however, between specifying fascism and aggression, which had proved to be the worst scourges humanity had ever known and other [8] lesser evils; and to fail to condemn them, particularly for such formalistic reasons as had been given, would be unfair and unjust to the hopes of millions of people throughout the world.

MR. FONTAINA (Uruguay) pointed out that under the USSR proposal it might be possible to justify the control of information and the press exercised in Franco Spain. The word “fascism” did not technically include the Spanish regime, which called itself “phalangist”,<sup>115</sup> nor did it include imperialism and other “isms”. The USSR text was therefore particularly restrictive and he would vote against it.

MR. STEPANENKO (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) stressed the important substantive difference between the USSR proposal and the other proposals. The first part of the USSR draft was completely in accordance with the spirit and letter of the United Nations Charter in that it spoke of strengthening international co-operation in order to achieve world peace and security.

Referring to the point raised by the Uruguayan representative, Mr. Stepanenko recalled that in two different resolutions the General Assembly had pronounced the Franco regime in Spain fascist and the USSR draft, in speaking of fascism, would therefore necessarily include Franco Spain. It would moreover guarantee that the freedoms mentioned would be used in the interests of democracy. Not to limit the freedoms proclaimed in article 17 would be dangerous. The Nazis, prior to the Second World War had given an example of how the press could incite racial and national hatreds that led to war. As a member of a country whose losses were among the most severe of those endured by Nazi victims, he appealed to the members of the

<sup>115</sup> The term “Phalangist” or “Falangist” was used to describe fascist-type political movements associated with the Spanish dictator Franco, who ruled from the late 1930s until his death in 1975. It derives from the Falange Española de las Juntas de Ofensiva Nacional Sindicalista. “Falange” refers to a phalanx formation.

Commission to accept the USSR proposal in order to protect the world from a renewal of the catastrophe of war.

[9]

MR. VILFAN (Yugoslavia) thought the discussion held at the previous meeting on the subject of the right to marriage had proved that members of the Commission could be convinced by arguments that explained a need felt by millions of people. The suggestion that it would be necessary to give a complete list of restrictions to freedom of opinion and expression if fascism and aggression were specified, was incorrect. The average citizen anywhere would probably not even know the meaning of the word pornography, for example; yet everybody in all parts of the world understood the difference between war and peace. Only recently when there had seemed to be a probability that another war could be avoided, people everywhere rejoiced. The Declaration on the Rights of Man could not fail, therefore, to mention the obligations of the press to fight against war.

MR. LOPEZ (Philippines) opposed the USSR draft and supported the text adopted by the Conference on the Freedom of Information, with minor amendments. The Soviet proposal to state certain limitations on the right to freedom of opinion and expression was unnecessary in view of the provisions of article 2 of the Declaration. Mr. Lopez was willing, however, to consider the French proposal to strengthen article 2 by including in it reference to the requirements of international co-operation. Explicit restrictions on freedom of speech and of the press would threaten the whole principle of freedom, for in attempting to restrict the abuses of freedom, the basic freedom itself might be denied.

Mr. Lopez felt that in spite of the faults of the press in his own country he would be unwilling to exchange the system in use there for any system which would make the press a tool of the Government. With a free press there was at least a possibility of improvement, but there was no possibility for remedying a press corrupted by totalitarian control at its very source.

[10]

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) asked that paragraph 1 of his draft amendment should be voted on as a whole, as the statements made had indicated that members of the Commission who could not accept the second sentence would not accept the first sentence either. He was convinced, however, that history would justify his proposal.

The objection to including freedom of artistic representation unless scientific and other freedoms were mentioned seemed unfounded since the latter would be covered by freedom of speech and press.

Some representatives had objected to his proposal on the ground that it did not include an exhaustive list of the limitations on the freedom of speech and press. He was prepared to mention other limitations if it were so desired; but the USSR delegation had specified only those which it considered most important and most acceptable to the Commission. It was hard to imagine that anyone could seriously be opposed to prohibiting fascism and incitement to hatred.

In reply to the point raised by the Philippine representative, Mr. Pavlov said that the Nuremberg trials had shown ways for curtailing the freedoms and activities of the enemies of democracy without doing harm to democratic elements themselves.

A vote was taken by roll-call on paragraph 1 of the USSR proposal. The result of the vote was as follows:

In favour: Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Yugoslavia

Against: Australia, Belgium, Chile, China, Egypt, France, India, Lebanon, Panama, Philippines, United Kingdom, United States of America, Uruguay

Absent: Iran

Paragraph 1 of the USSR proposal was rejected by thirteen votes to four.

[11]

A vote was taken by roll-call on paragraph 2 of the USSR proposal. The result of the vote was as follows:

In favour: Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Yugoslavia

Against: Australia, Belgium, Chile, China, Egypt, France, India, Lebanon, Panama, Philippines, United Kingdom, United States of America, Uruguay

Absent: Iran

Paragraph 2 of the USSR proposal was rejected by thirteen votes to four.

THE CHAIRMAN turned to consideration of the proposed French amendment to add to the first line of article 17 the words “on his own responsibility”.

MR. LEBEAU (Belgium) did not think the meaning of the words proposed was clear.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) recalled the history of the article under consideration. After prolonged discussions in the Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information and the Press and at the Geneva Conference on Freedom of Information, a text had been adopted by the Conference, by a vote of 29 in favour and 6 against. A proposal such as that which had just been made by the French representative had been presented to the Conference and had been rejected.

The Commission should be extremely wary of making changes in a text that had been arrived at after so much thought. It should feel an obligation to respect views so emphatically expressed by the Conference, especially since the document under preparation would go before the Economic and Social Council and [12] finally to the General Assembly itself where the representation would more nearly parallel that of the Conference than did the representation in the Commission.

Referring to certain Chinese amendments, Mr. Wilson pointed out that changing the word “thought” to the word “opinion” in the first line of the Conference text, was merely a logical result of changes that had been made in the previous article. He was also willing to accept as a drafting change the substitution of the words “through all media of expression” for “by any means”, in order to clarify a meaning which might have been ambiguous in the original wording. He hoped, however, that the Commission would feel bound not to introduce any new ideas or to exclude any ideas which were already contained in the text.

MR. CASSIN (France) was convinced by the argument presented by the United Kingdom representative that the Commission should feel morally bound to follow the text submitted by the Conference on the Freedom of Information. He therefore withdrew his proposal and also stated his approval of substituting “through all media of expression” for “by any means”.

MR. HOOD (Australia) agreed with the United Kingdom representative that the Commission should not make any substantive changes in the text submitted. However, he approved the Chinese wording as a necessary and proper drafting change resulting from the substitution of the word “opinion” for the word “thought” in the first line.

MR. CHANG (China) did not think that the suggestions of the Conference on the Freedom of Information were necessarily binding on the Commission but he agreed that the important ideas in the Conference text should be retained. It seemed redundant, however, to keep the phrase “to hold opinions” in the second line, if freedom of opinion had already been mentioned in the first line.

[13]

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) pointed out that the first clause of the Conference text was a general statement of principle, which was explained in the second clause. If the phrase “to hold opinions” were omitted, then part of the process of enjoying the right stated in the first clause, would be missing. It was not, therefore, redundant to retain the phrase in the second part. He was prepared to accept the substitution of “through all media of expression” for “by any means”.

MR. LOPEZ (Philippines) observed that freedom to impart information necessarily implied freedom to hold opinions and he therefore supported the Chinese suggestion to omit “to hold opinions” in the second line. He also favoured changing “thought” to “opinion” in the first line and placing the phrase “without interference” before “regardless of frontiers”, as the two phrases taken together would make for a more harmonious and logical statement.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) asked whether the words “freedom of opinion” implied in English, as they did in the Russian translation, both the freedom to hold an opinion and the freedom to convince others of such an opinion. He also wondered whether “regardless of frontiers” referred to geographical or moral frontiers.

In reply to the point raised by the Philippine representative, Mr. Pavlov observed that frequently people did impart opinions which they did not themselves hold, as for example certain newspapermen wrote articles that expressed the opinions of the owners of the papers rather than their personal convictions.

[14]

THE CHAIRMAN explained that in the first line freedom of opinion and expression meant the right to form any opinion and to speak freely about it.

She agreed with the USSR representative that it was possible to impart an opinion which an individual did not himself hold, but she observed that newspapermen who followed such a practice were generally looked upon as lacking in integrity.

MR. CHANG (China) suggested that the representatives of Lebanon, Philippines, the United Kingdom and China should try to prepare for the afternoon meeting a text that would be acceptable to the Commission.

THE CHAIRMAN stated that the Chinese suggestion would be followed.

The meeting rose at 1:08 p.m.

E/CN.4/SR.64

8 June 1948<sup>116</sup>

Original Text: French

Summary Record of the Sixty-Fourth Meeting
[of the Commission on Human Rights]

Held at Lake Success, New York, on Tuesday,
8 June 1948, at 2:30 p.m.

Chairman: Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, United States of America. Rapporteur: Mr. C. Malik, Lebanon. Members: Mr. Hood, Australia; Mr. Lebeau, Belgium; Mr. Stepanenko, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic; Mr. Larrain, Chile; Mr. Chang, China; Mr. Loutfi, Egypt; Mr. Cassin, France; Mrs. Mehta, India; Mr. de Quijano, Panama; Mr. Lopez, Philippines; Mr. Klekovkin, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic; Mr. Pavlov, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics; Mr. Wilson, United Kingdom; Mr. Fontaina, Uruguay; Mr. Vilfan, Yugoslavia. Also Present: Mrs. Ledon, Commission on the Status of Women. Specialized Agencies: Mr. Metall, International Labour Organization (ILO); Mr. Lebar, United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization; Mr. Hill, World Health Organization. [2] Non-governmental Organizations: Miss Sender, American Federation of Labor; Mr. van Istendael, International Federation of Christian Trade Unions; Miss Drennan, Catholic International Union for Social Service; Mr. Nolde, Commission of the Churches on International Affairs; Mr. Janner and Mr. Brotman, Co-ordinating Board of Jewish Organizations; Miss Strahler, International Committee of the Red Cross; Miss Schaefer, International Union of Catholic Women's Leagues; Miss Robb, Liaison Committee of

<sup>116</sup> This is the date of the meeting. The document was issued on 17 June 1948.

Women's International Organizations; Mr. Bienenfeld, World Jewish Congress. Secretariat: Mr. Humphrey, Director, Human Rights Division; Mr. Lawson, Secretary of the Commission.

Continuation of Consideration of the Articles of the Declaration of Human Rights

Articles 17 and 16 (Continuation)

THE CHAIRMAN requested the representative of China to present the conclusions of the Drafting Sub-Committee on articles 17 and 16.

MR. CHANG (China) said that the Drafting Sub-Committee had not intended to change the substance of the articles and had limited itself to proposing slight drafting modifications: replacing "freedom of opinion", in the second line, by "freedom of thought", and in the English text, replacing "any means" by "any media".

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the USSR representative also had transmitted an amendment on those articles to the Secretariat (document E/CN.4/117).

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) proposed to amend the Drafting Committee's text by adding the phrase "within the limits which [3] ensure the security of the State". The present text made no mention of the security of the State; it was too wide in scope and could lead to abuses, for it could protect any aspect of espionage. No State could allow a foreigner to collect any kind of information within its boundaries without any control. Articles 17 and 18, as now drafted, represented a violation of national sovereignty. Moreover, not only was the amendment indispensable in principle, but it corresponded to the practice followed by all States. In addition it represented nothing new, for it was taken word for word from the text worked out and unanimously adopted by the Sub-Committee on Freedom of Information, which had met on 19 January 1948. True, the text then applied to correspondents and the press, but it could very well be made to apply to all individuals.

THE CHAIRMAN wished to make clear that the report of the Subcommittee on Freedom of Information had been submitted to the Conference on Freedom of Information and of the Press, which had itself drafted the article as it appeared in the Draft Declaration. In her opinion, the limitations mentioned in article 2 of the Declaration would suffice to calm the anxiety of the representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, particularly if it were decided to strengthen the provisions of that article.

The USSR amendment was rejected by 12 votes to 4, with 1 abstention. The Drafting Committee's text, as amended by the Drafting Sub-Committee, was adopted by 13 votes to 4.

MR. CASSIN (France) remarked that certain modifications of form might be required in the French equivalent of the text which had just been adopted in its English version.

THE CHAIRMAN observed that the Commission still had to take a stand on the amendment submitted by the Egyptian representative at the sixtieth meeting and which would be inserted as a new article after article 19.

[4]

MR. LOUTFI (Egypt) declared that he would withdraw his amendment provided the Commission voted to reconsider article 2 of the Declaration and to strengthen its provisions.

MR. CHANG (China) recalled that his delegation had suggested placing article 2 at the end of the Declaration. In addition, since it was apparent that the majority of members favoured a reconsideration of that article, he did not think it appropriate to vote for its reconsideration before it was known, in what way it would be modified. He therefore proposed that the Commission should merely mention those two suggestions in its minutes.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) said that it would be difficult to vote on the revision of the article without knowing how it would be changed. He suggested that the representatives of France and Egypt should submit a text on the basis of which the Commission could express its opinion.

THE CHAIRMAN remarked that there was no question of voting on a text but merely of deciding whether the Commission was eventually prepared to reconsider article 2, and, for that purpose, to appoint a drafting subcommittee composed of the representatives of France, Egypt and the United Kingdom. The Commission would be pledged to nothing except the setting up of a drafting sub-committee to consider the question.

MR. VILFAN (Yugoslavia) declared that, were a drafting subcommittee to be appointed, it would be advisable to include among its members the representative of the USSR, as the suggestion of the French representatives concerning the strengthening of the provisions of article 2 had been made in connection with Mr. Pavlov's observations.

THE CHAIRMAN accepted that suggestion and put to the vote the question as to whether the Commission would reconsider article 2.

[5]

The proposal was adopted by 15 votes, with 2 abstentions; the Drafting Sub-Committee was set up.

THE CHAIRMAN noted that the Commission would also have to undertake the drafting of a preamble. She suggested that the members of the Commission should present their written proposals on that subject within twenty-four hours, and proposed to name a drafting sub-committee, composed of four of the Officers of the Commission.

Articles 23 and 24

MISS ROBB (Liaison Committee of International Women's Organizations) speaking on behalf of 14 feminine organizations, requested that paragraph 2 of article 24 of the Drafting Committee's text should be deleted. Not only were its provisions covered by the first paragraph of the same article, but the very existence of a paragraph containing as it did, a qualification of the word "Everyone", could lead to the belief that when that word appeared unqualified elsewhere, it did not comprise both men and women.

THE CHAIRMAN declared that the United States supported the text presented by India and the United Kingdom (document E/CN.4/99), with the addition of the words: "as well as to form trade unions and to join the trade union of his choice."

The United States delegation favoured the inclusion of economic and social rights in the Declaration, for no personal liberty could exist without economic security and independence. Men in need were not free men. The United States delegation considered that the Declaration should enunciate rights, not try to define the methods by which Governments were to ensure the realization of those rights. Those methods would necessarily vary from one country to another and such variations should be considered not only inevitable but salutary.

[6]

As regards article 23, which concerned the right to work, in the opinion of her delegation that right was meaningless unless it was coupled with the mention of "just and favourable working conditions", which would guarantee the worker and his family a decent standard of living. The right to work had to be accompanied by the freedom of choice with respect to work. That was the reason why the United States delegation wished to join the first paragraph of article 23, dealing with the right to work, to article 24, dealing with conditions of work. It should also be borne in mind that the right to work, without qualifications might mean very different things, some of which might be incompatible with other articles of the Declaration. In the opinion of the United States delegation, the right to work, in this Declaration, meant the right of the individual to benefit from conditions under which those who were able and willing to work would have the possibility of doing useful work, including independent work, as well as the right to full employment and to further the development of production and of purchasing power.

The realization of those objectives meant more to individuals in the United States than any state guarantee of full employment. That was why the United States considered the text submitted by India and the United Kingdom to be the best if amended by the addition of the right to set up and join trade unions. It was, moreover, in conformity with the text adopted in the Declaration of Bogotá.

MR. CHANG (China) thought that the Chinese text would have to be considered subsequently, for it embodied a different conception of how the Declaration should be set out.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom), in the interests of greater clarity, proposed the following amendment to the United Kingdom text: "Everyone has the right to work and to just and favourable working conditions." Thus, the two ideas of the right to work and working conditions would be clearly separated.

[7]

MRS. LEDON (Commission on the Status of Women) declared that during the last meetings of the Commission on the Status of Women, a resolution had been drafted for submission to the Economic and Social Council and addressed to Member States of the United Nations, requesting them to take a formal stand on the principle of equal pay for equal work and equal working conditions for men and women workers.<sup>117</sup> She drew the attention of the members of the Commission on Human Rights to this fact so that the latter should, as far as possible, retain the words "equal pay for equal work", contained in the second paragraph of article 24. Even if that assertion were repetitious, given the word "Everyone" in the first paragraph, the idea was of such fundamental importance that it should be stated explicitly.

MISS SENDER (American Federation of Labor) understood the Commission's desire to shorten the articles whenever possible but she urged the Commission not to omit ensuring the right of every person to an opportunity of doing useful work. Everyone had the right to ask the community to take steps to avoid unemployment. Article 24 which mentioned the right to a decent standard of living aimed at the alleviation of the consequences of unemployment and not at the prevention of unemployment itself. Therefore, the idea stated in paragraph 3 of article 24 should not be left aside. It could be expressed as a right of the individual instead of the duty of a Government, by saying, for instance, "everyone has the right to ask the State to . . .", but it must not be omitted.

MR. CASSIN (France) stressed that it was the same desire for brevity which had caused France to combine in one article the two articles adopted at the second session of the Commission relating respectively to work and unemployment and to remuneration.

Six essential ideas had been brought out by the discussion: 1) the right to work, 2) the right to just and favourable working conditions, 3) the right to a decent standard of living for the worker and his family, [8] 4) equal working conditions for men and women workers, 5) the right to join a trade union and 6) the right to fight unemployment.

<sup>117</sup> See the 1947 Report of the Commission on the Status of Women (E/CN.4/81), Chapter XI (paragraph 36) on "Urgent Problems" regarding the question of "equal rights impartially for all citizens".

Mr. Cassin expressed the conviction that the maximum number of ideas could be expressed in a minimum of words, but if the Commission retained only one or two ideas, it might be accused of failing to carry out a part of its work. Recently acquired rights, such as the right to work, should be stated more explicitly than rights recognized for centuries, such as the right to life. As to the prevention of unemployment, the French text mentioned States, in the plural, for unemployment was not a purely national question. International organizations such as the Commission for Full Employment existed to deal with the unemployment question, and while it would be useless to list them in the Declaration, it was quite impossible to pretend not to see the problem. Every individual had the right to expect the various organs of society to fight against unemployment, each at its own level. Thus, there were six different ideas to be dealt with, each of which could, perhaps, be voted upon separately.

MR. KLEKOVKIN (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) stated that his delegation was particularly interested in the articles which concerned the right to work, the right to rest, etc. Only a very few documents in existence at the present time mentioned those rights. The question of work and employment was on a totally different plane nowadays than during the nineteenth century. Unemployment had become an every-day phenomenon, affecting as many as twenty million people in the world at any given moment. To gloss over that problem would mean disregarding one of the main anxieties of the man in the street. In that connection, attention should be paid to the statements of trade union representatives. Mr. Klekovkin could not understand that some members opposed the mention of the State as responsible for the prevention of unemployment. After all, it was the State which had to take the necessary measures on behalf of the community or of society. In the Ukraine, the new generation was unacquainted with the fear of unemployment. The Ukrainian [9] constitution affirmed the right to work and the organization of the soviet economy guaranteed it. Capitalist States could not offer the same guarantees because the control of their national economic system was not in their hands, but even they could take certain effective measures against unemployment.

Freedom of thought was undoubtedly a fundamental freedom; but it could exist only if based on economic freedom. He shared the Chairman's point of view, that men in need were not free men. In that respect, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics could offer an example to all. Before 1917, the majority of the population was subjugated by the fear of poverty and, as a consequence, was illiterate; no intellectual freedom existed. Within the last thirty years, when it became clear that all freedoms depended on economic freedom, intellectual liberty had developed. Now that they were able to satisfy their hunger, millions of people enjoyed intellectual freedom. That spiritual resurrection evolved from the economic prosperity which had facilitated the spreading of culture among workers.

Work was not a painful obligation, but a mutual emulation whereby each wanted to out-do his neighbour. The reconstruction of Ukrainian industry was proof of the constructive and progressive character of that concept of work.

Thus, articles 23 and 24 were of great importance and should bring to the peoples which awaited them an answer to their preoccupations and a materialization of their hopes. The Ukrainian representative could not accept the Chinese draft, which failed to take into consideration the actual evolution of events; he considered that the draft proposed by the representative of France or that worked out at the second session of the Commission most effectively guaranteed the right to work.

MR. HOOD (Australia) said that he was in full agreement with most of the ideas expressed by the representative of France. If the article were to keep its proper importance, it should include not only five or six ideas but others as well, such as wellbeing and public health, the right to education [10] and to culture. Those ideas could, however, be grouped in three or four sections, which would have to be arranged harmoniously in a final concise text. His delegation was ready to take its share in that work, but it was necessary beforehand that each member should express his opinion on the matter. A sub-committee could then combine all the suggestions in three or four groups.

MRS. MEHTA (India) thought that the text drawn up at the Commission's second session (document E/CN.4/95) was too detailed. The Commission's task was to define the rights of individuals and not the duties of the community or of the State. The rights of individuals and the duties of the State were linked, and it was not necessary to include the latter in each article for they were implied in the statement of the former.

She agreed to the modification proposed by the United Kingdom representative to their joint text; thus amended, the text would take account of the concern of the representative of the American Federation of Labor, for if each individual had the right to work, it was logical that someone had the obligation to guarantee that he had work. The statement concerning just and favourable working conditions covered the provision of article 24, relating to remuneration: unless the latter were satisfactory, the working conditions would not be just or favourable. The second article suggested by her delegation and that of the United Kingdom replacing articles 24 and 26 similarly covered all the details of those articles while preserving their substance intact.

As to the remarks made by the representative of the Commission on the Status of Women, Mrs. Mehta did not think it necessary to use the words "and women", since the word "everyone" was all-inclusive. She suggested the addition of the words "mothers and children have the right to special protection", after the joint United Kingdom-India article, replacing articles 24 and 26.

[11]

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) said that the India and United Kingdom delegations had attempted to do exactly what was being urged by the Australian representative, i.e., they had summarized in five articles the principal rights set forth in articles 23 to 30.

The five rights were the following: 1) the right to work, 2) the right to satisfactory conditions of work, 3) the right to an adequate standard of living, 4) the right to limitations on working hours and to rest, 5) the right to participate in the cultural life of the community.

Those five points constituted the essential principles which the Commission wished to see included in the Declaration, with the exception of the concept of the State's responsibility for measures to combat unemployment, which had been omitted for reasons he would explain later.

In referring again to each of the six points which Mr. Cassin wished to see included in the Declaration, Mr. Wilson observed that the first three points relating respectively to the right to work, the right to satisfactory conditions of work and the right to an adequate standard of living were also included in the text proposed by India and the United Kingdom. The fourth point, concerning the equality of women in respect of work, had been omitted for the reasons given by the Indian representative. The fifth point, concerning the right to join a trade union, had been regarded as already covered in article 19 which guaranteed the right of association. The sixth point, viz. the State's responsibility in respect of work, had been omitted, it being presumed that the "right to work" implied an obligation to provide work. Thus, all the points which it had been considered desirable to include in the Declaration were already either explicitly or implicitly included.

He was not unaware of the fact that, in the last resort, the responsibility in respect of unemployment would lie with the State. In view, however, of the existence of different economic systems, it did not seem appropriate to include that concept in the Declaration in too rigid a form.

[12]

Mr. Wilson went on to point out that the Declaration set forth a series of personal rights, such as the right to life, to freedom of thought and of expression, to marriage and so on. Although the protection of those rights was the responsibility of the State, in the first instance, it had not been thought necessary to state that fact expressly. Why then affirm it in the case of unemployment, when only one part of the responsibility rested with the State?

The United Kingdom representative said that it was for those who benefited from the existence of rights to make good those rights, to fight for their application and to demand of their governments the rights which the latter recognized as belonging to them. In imposing an express obligation upon the State, the Commission would only be taking a theoretical step which would not change the practical result.

In conclusion, Mr. Wilson said that the Declaration was destined to be given a large amount of publicity and had to be drafted clearly and precisely so as to be understandable to the whole world. The Indian and United Kingdom delegations had attempted to do that.

MR. FONTAINA (Uruguay) asked if the Commission was discussing the right to work stricto sensu, that is, from the point of view of the manual worker, for example, or the factory worker, or the right to work in the larger sense, from the point of view of all workers, including factory directors, engineers etc. and intellectuals in general. It was obvious that the Commission would want the rights of all workers, without distinction, to be protected and if so, the original text put forward by the United Kingdom and India was preferable to that which restricted the scope of the article to too great an extent.

As regards the State's responsibility in respect of unemployment, he agreed with the United Kingdom representative, in recognizing that one could [13] not delegate to the State all the functions and responsibilities of the community. To do that, would be to relieve employers and the organizations concerned of all responsibility.

The right to join a trade union was implicitly provided for in article 19 which guaranteed freedom of association. If nevertheless, it was considered desirable to specifically mention that right, it had to be made clear that it included not only the right to join but also the right to leave a trade union. It was a question of protecting the worker himself from the hold which some trade unions could have over him in regard to political and economic affiliations with which he was not in sympathy.

MR. STEPANENKO (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) felt that the text put forward by the Indian and United Kingdom delegates was completely inadequate. Only one concept, that of the right to work, had been maintained; the rest of the original text had been disregarded.

The question of the State's responsibility was one, among others, of fundamental importance, because it was not sufficient to state a right, it had to be guaranteed. He was surprised that whereas six months ago the Commission had unanimously agreed on the importance of that view, it had never completely reversed its position. Finally, he supported the Uruguayan representative in his statement that a large part of the responsibility rested with the employers.

MR. LEBEAU (Belgium) approved the India-United Kingdom amendment in all respects, save one. It was an excellent draft and preferable to that of the French delegation because of its conciseness. The principle of equality between the sexes had been stated many times in the Declaration and therefore, it was unnecessary to mention it again.

[14]

He did not share the views of preceding speakers on the question of the right to join a trade union. It was true that article 19 guaranteed freedom of association, but the concept of the right to join a trade union was sufficiently new to deserve special mention.

As regards the question of the stated responsibility in respect of unemployment, he felt that article 24 as amended was sufficient to meet the requirements of the case. It was obvious that the intervention of the State would always be needed, in the final instance, but, given the fact that the degree and the time of that intervention would vary depending on the country, it would be better to make no definite reference to it.

In conclusion, he accepted the entire text proposed by India and the United Kingdom, subject to mention being made of freedom of association.

MRS. LEDON (Commission on Status of Women) thanked the Indian representative for her proposal that paragraph 2 of article 26, concerning the special protection of the rights of mothers and children, should be inserted at the end of article 23.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that the Commission was engaged in defining rights without providing any means to guarantee their application.

The India-United Kingdom amendment reduced the rights of workers to nothing; it contained nothing concrete which could give satisfaction to the millions of workers who were hoping for the betterment of their lot. He seconded the ideas put forward by Mr. Cassin and hoped that he would not withdraw them.

In referring to the responsibility of the State, he praised the courage which Mr. Fontaina had shown in stating that capital should share that responsibility. Who, finally, however, if not the State, would guarantee those rights and see that effect was given to them? It was essential to specify clearly who would assume the responsibility for giving effect to the rights set forth in the Declaration.

[15]

He pointed out that both the Geneva text and that proposed by the French delegation guaranteed workers a minimum wage. That was a particularly important point when it was remembered, for example, how absurdly low wage rates were in colonial territories. Of course in fixing wages, the worker's capacity had to be taken into consideration.

The question of social security was also of great importance in view of the risks and dangers undergone by workers, especially by those employed in mines.

The right to join a trade union also required specific mention. He did not understand how, in a well-organized trade union system which lived up to its ideals, a worker needed to be protected against his own union, the precise function of which was to protect his interests.

Finally, there was the question of equal pay for equal work for both sexes. It could not be left to the discretion of the employer who was only too ready to hire cheap labour when he could. It was necessary, therefore, to guarantee that right explicitly.

MR. LOPEZ (Philippines) said that his delegation attached particular importance to the social and economic rights mentioned in the articles under discussion.

The Philippine delegation had taken an active part in the drafting of article 23 during the Geneva sessions. It could, of course, be redrafted if the Commission considered it necessary, but without either shortening or lengthening it to excess. The fact that the existence of the rights in question had only recently been recognized could be used as an argument in favour of conciseness, as pointed out by the United Kingdom representative. On the other hand, it could also be argued that that fact necessitated their being even more fully defined than rights which had been recognized for a long time. The right to protection against unemployment had to be mentioned explicitly.

[16]

Excessive reference, in the Declaration, to the duties of the State, should be avoided. Article 2 dealt with the duties of the individual in relation to the community and it would be appropriate, therefore, somewhere in the Declaration, to mention specifically the duties of society or the community to its members so as to establish a fair balance between the statement of rights and duties.

Article 23 dealt with an obligation which rested not only with the State but with the community as a whole. He proposed, therefore, that the following second paragraph should be inserted in article 23: "The enjoyment of those rights should be ensured by such measures as would create the possibility for useful work and prevent unemployment."

The new paragraph represented a compromise between the India-United Kingdom text and that put forward by the French delegation.

MR. HOOD (Australia) proposed that the following text should replace articles 23, 24, and 25:

"Everyone has the right to useful and remunerative work;
 "Everyone has the right to just and fair working conditions and to reasonable limitations on working hours;
 "Everyone is free to join trade unions for the protection of his interests."

MR. VAN ISTENDAEL (International Federation of Christian Trade Unions) said that in spite of the Commission's anxiety to be brief and the general character of the principles set forth in the Declaration, it had to be remembered that this was a question of protecting rights that had only recently been recognized, it would be useful, therefore, to state them explicitly.

Those rights were the following: 1) the right to work; 2) freedom to join trade unions; 3) the right to protection against unemployment; 4) the right to social security; 5) equality between workers; 6) the right to a [17] standard of living that would permit a person to live with decency and dignity; 7) the right to limitations on working hours and to rest; 8) the right to participate in the cultural life of the community. The millions of workers who had placed their hopes in the Declaration would not understand how it could be either incomplete or ambiguous.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon), Rapporteur, remarked that until now the Commission had discussed and examined the rights of the individual as such; the right to life, freedom of thought, freedom to come and go, to marriage, and so on. Now it was engaged in discussing the rights of the individual as a member of society. It was desirable, therefore, to insert somewhere in the Declaration a statement calling attention to the need for establishing the kind of economic and social conditions that would guarantee those rights. What was necessary was to define the standard of an ideal society in which the individual could develop and in which his rights could be guaranteed. Such a statement could be inserted in the preamble or could stand as a separate article.

He preferred to make no specific reference to the State's obligation in respect of measures to combat unemployment and expressed approval of the India-United Kingdom text as amended by the United Kingdom representative. He proposed that a drafting committee should be appointed to examine fully the various proposals which had been made.

MR. LEBEAU (Belgium) seconded the proposal.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the proposal to refer the question to a drafting committee.

The proposal was adopted by 7 votes to 1, with 8 abstentions.

[18]

THE CHAIRMAN appointed a sub-committee, composed of the representatives of Australia, France, India, the Philippines, the United Kingdom, the United States, and the USSR and instructed it to draft a compromise text, taking into consideration all the ideas which had been expressed.

The meeting rose at 5:30 p.m.

E/CN.4/114

9 June 1948

Report of the Sub-Committee Consisting of the Representatives of Australia, France, India, Philippines, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Kingdom and the United States on Article 23 of the Declaration on Human Rights

1. Everyone has the right to work and to just and favourable conditions of work and pay.

2. The enjoyment of these rights should be ensured by such measures (taken by the State or by society) as would create the widest possible opportunities for useful work and prevent unemployment.

3. Everyone is free to form or join trade unions (of his own choice) for the protection of his interests.

(4. Women shall work with the same advantages as men and receive equal pay for equal work.)

Several members of the Sub-Committee felt that the substance of paragraph 2 might be inserted in a general form in the preamble or in the text preceding the enumeration of economic and social rights.

E/CN.4/117

9 June 1948

Original Text: Russian

Union of Soviet Socialist Republics: Amendment to the Text of Articles 17–18 of the Draft International Declaration on Human Rights as Suggested by the Conference on Freedom of Information (Document E/CN.4/95)

Everyone has the right to freedom of thought and its expression; wherein is included freedom of conviction, and freedom of access to sources of information and means of communication and transmission in the territory of his own country and of other countries, within limits corresponding to the interests of national security.

E/CN.4/SR.65

9 June 1948<sup>118</sup>

Summary Record of the Sixty-Fifth Meeting
[of the Commission on Human Rights]

Held at Lake Success, New York, on Wednesday,
9 June 1948, at 10:15 a.m.

Chairman: Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, United States of America. Rapporteur: Mr. Malik, Lebanon. Members: Mr. Hood, Australia; Mr. Lebeau, Belgium; Mr. Stepanenko,

<sup>118</sup> This was the date of the meeting. The document was issued on 24 June 1948.

Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic; Mr. Larrain, Chile; Mr. Chang, China; Mr. Loutfi, Egypt; Mr. Cassin, France; Mrs. Mehta, India; Mr. de Quijano, Panama; Mr. Lopez, Philippines; Mr. Klekovkin, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic; Mr. Pavlov, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics; Mr. Wilson, United Kingdom; Mr. Fontaina, Uruguay; Mr. Vilfan, Yugoslavia. Also Present: Mrs. Ledon, Commission on the Status of Women. Representatives of specialized agencies: Mr. Metall, International Labour Organization; Mr. Lebar, United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization; Observer from an inter-governmental organization: Mr. Stone, Preparatory Commission of the International Refugee Organization. [2] Consultants of non-governmental organizations: Miss Sender, American Federation of Labor; Mr. van Istendael, International Federation of Christian Trade Unions. Secretariat: Mr. Humphrey, Director, Human Rights Division; Mr. Lawson, Secretary of the Commission.

[3]

Continuation of the Discussion of the Draft Declaration on Human Rights (Document E/CN.4/95)

Article 23

THE CHAIRMAN announced that the text of article 23 as proposed by the Drafting Committee would be voted upon paragraph by paragraph.

Paragraph 1 of article 23 was adopted unanimously.

MRS. MEHTA (India) recalled that some members of the Drafting Committee had thought that paragraph 2 should constitute a separate article or be inserted in the preamble.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) thought that the paragraph could be dealt with in three ways. It could be inserted in the preamble, in article 2 of the Declaration, or at the beginning of the list of economic and social rights. He suggested that a vote should be taken first to decide whether or not paragraph 2 should remain in article 23.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) opposed the idea that the paragraph should be inserted in articles 2, 3 or 23. He felt that it should be clearly stated somewhere in the Declaration that it was not enough to enumerate economic and social rights, but that society itself should be of such a nature as to ensure the observance of those rights. Favourable social conditions were necessary for that purpose. An article to that effect should therefore be included in the section devoted to economic and social rights.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) thought that the worst fault of the old democracy was that it was too formal. It proclaimed certain rights but did not guarantee their observance. The Soviet Union would always be in favour of full implementation. If the means to exercise a certain right were not specified, the fact of proclaiming that right had no great value. The right to work should not remain an empty phrase. It would have no full meaning unless the measures to prevent unemployment were also [4] set forth; and the right place for such a provision was in the section devoted to economic and social rights.

Some members of the Commission wished to relegate that provision to the preamble in order to destroy whatever concrete usefulness it might have in the struggle against unemployment. The USSR representative declared that he would oppose any attempt to place the provision elsewhere, and asked the Chairman to proceed to the vote.

MR. LOUTFI (Egypt) suggested that paragraph 2 of article 23 should become a separate article to be placed at the beginning of the section devoted to economic and social rights, thus establishing a general principle.

MR. LEBEAU (Belgium) supported the Egyptian representative and called for a decision on the question as to whether the provision contained in paragraph 2 should be placed in the preamble, in articles 2, 3 or 23 or expressed in a separate article. He proposed the deletion of the words: "by the State and" in the parenthesised phrase.

MR. CASSIN (France) did not think that it would be possible to include such a provision in the preamble or articles 2 or 3. In his opinion it was necessary to establish that the individual was entitled to demand that the State, society and international co-operation should guarantee the right in question. He therefore proposed the following amendment to paragraph 2: "...ensured by such measures taken by the State and by international cooperation . . .".

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) asked a vote to be taken to establish whether the provision contained in paragraph 2 should remain in article 23. If it was decided not to insert it in article 23, a completely new text could be drafted to cover all the other economic and social rights as well.

[5]

MR. MALIK (Lebanon), Rapporteur, thought that an article containing a provision to the effect that "everyone had a right to a good social order ensuring the enjoyment of . . ." might be inserted at the beginning or the end of the section dealing with economic and social rights. He agreed with the French representative in believing that greater emphasis should be given to action within the State than to action by the State.

MR. LEBEAU (Belgium) seconded the French representative's amendment and withdrew his own.

THE CHAIRMAN agreed with the Lebanese representative. She thought that the Commission wished to have the paragraph inserted elsewhere in the Declaration and proposed the appointment of a sub-committee to prepare a new draft.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) thought that paragraph 2 should first be put to the vote. A sub-committee could be appointed if that paragraph were rejected. If a new article in general terms were to be drafted, any reference to the prevention of unemployment would be lost. That was an important point on which the Commission should come to a decision by vote. He thought that the provision of paragraph 2 should be retained, but that the idea of a general article was an excellent one provided that it did not involve the exclusion of that provision.

THE CHAIRMAN remarked that the expressed conception of the necessity for full employment covered the prevention of unemployment.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) thought that the right to protection against unemployment could be included in the first paragraph of article 23. That would in no way interfere with the adoption of a general article covering [6] all economic and social rights.

MR. HOOD (Australia) believed that the difficulty might be solved if all economic and social rights were grouped together in a single article preceded by a provision similar to that contained in paragraph 2 of article 23, or as had been suggested by the French and Lebanese representatives.

MR. LOPEZ (Philippines) supported the Lebanese representative's amendment. He had no objection to the insertion of a new article covering all economic and social rights. He thought, however, that it was possible to leave out the question of unemployment altogether, in view of the fact that Article 55 of the Charter contained a reference to full employment.

MR. KLEKOVKIN (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) did not think that the problem could be solved by a vote, since the question involved was one of principle. In his opinion, the only possible solution was to retain paragraph 2 of article 23 in its present form.

As regards the Australian representative's suggestion, Mr. Klekovkin did not think that it was acceptable in view of the fact that a separate article was devoted to each separate right throughout the other parts of the Declaration.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) agreed with the Ukrainian representative. He went even further believing that the right to work on the one hand and unemployment on the other were two aspects of the same problem, taken from two different points of view, namely the point of view of the State and that of the individual. That being so, prevention of unemployment was already covered by the reference to full employment. He proposed to proceed to the vote.

[7]

MR. CHANG (China) thought that it was difficult to decide whether or not the provision should be included in article 23, since no text was available on which all members agreed. He agreed with the Lebanese representative that reference to unemployment should be made in article 23 and that a general article should be placed at the end of the section devoted to economic and social rights.

He proposed the following text combining the provisions of paragraphs 1 and 2 of article 23:

“Everyone has the right to work and to just and favourable conditions of work and pay; that right includes the adoption of such measures as would create the widest possible opportunities for useful work and prevent unemployment.”

He asked that his proposal be put to the vote.

MR. VILFAN (Yugoslavia) proposed an amendment to the text submitted by the representative of China; involving the addition of the words: “taken by the State or society” after the word: “measures”.

MR. CASSIN (France) also proposed an amendment; he suggested the addition of the words: “taken by the various States, and with international co-operation” after the word: “measures”.

MR. CHANG (China) could accept neither of the two amendments.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) asked whether the representative of Lebanon had withdrawn his amendment; he preferred the Lebanese to the Chinese text in view of its more energetic formulation.

MR. LOPEZ (Philippines) stated that he had supported the Lebanese amendment; but, since the Chinese text corresponded more to his own wishes, he would support the latter and vote against the Lebanese amendment.

[8]

THE CHAIRMAN read out paragraph 1 as amended by the representative of China. She said that she would vote against that amendment.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) felt that his own draft was better; the word “protection”, contrary to the views of the United Kingdom representative, was completely unambiguous and included all measures to be taken against unemployment.

Mr. Malik asked for a vote on his amendment. If that amendment were rejected, he would propose, as an amendment to the Chinese text, replacing the words: “the widest possible” by the word: “adequate”. He pointed out that, while the French representative’s intentions were excellent, his amendment might raise difficulties in introducing a new element which would require further study.

MR. CHANG (China) accepted the Lebanese representative’s amendment to his text.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) felt that the Lebanese amendment was enhanced by the element to which the United Kingdom representative had objected. He proposed that the Lebanese text should be amended by the addition of the following clauses: “guaranteed by measures (taken by the State or society) to create the widest possible opportunities for full employment.” He pointed out that his amendment was based on the text of Article 55 of the Charter. Mr. Pavlov asked for a separate vote on the Lebanese, USSR, and Yugoslav amendments; the latter amendment consisted of adding the words between brackets to the phrase suggested by the USSR representative.

Mr. Pavlov also proposed that the Chinese draft should be amended by replacing the word “includes” by the word: “provides”.

[9]

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) stated that if the Indian representative accepted the Lebanese amendment, he would do the same. He agreed that the words “protection” would not cause misunderstanding. Mr. Wilson could not accept the Chinese amendment; it would be difficult to interpret since it concealed the disagreement without settling it.

MR. CHANG (China) considered that his was a compromise formula; he pointed out that it was impossible to deal with the question of unemployment without mentioning measures to be taken against it.

MR. CASSIN (France) stated that the USSR amendment led him to propose the addition of the phrase: “in the various States and with international co-operation” after the word: “measures”.

MR. KLEKOVKIN (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) asked for a full explanation of the meaning of the French amendment. Did it imply that, without international co-operation, States would take no measures against unemployment?

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) agreed with the Ukrainian representative’s interpretation of that amendment, and asked whether the representative of France would not agree to withdraw his amendment.

MR. CASSIN (France) stated that such interpretation of his amendment was incorrect and due, perhaps, to a certain ambiguity. He proposed that the text should read: “in the different States, separately, or with international co-operation”.

MR. FONTAINA (Uruguay) supported the French amendment which implied consultation with existing international organizations, in particular, with the International Labour Organization.

[10]

MR. HOOD (Australia) recalled that the discussion had arisen over the question of whether or not the second paragraph of article 23 should be retained. He pointed out that the Lebanese amendment represented a mere drafting improvement of the first paragraph which dealt with the right of work and consequently with the maintenance of employment; the USSR and French amendments were concerned with the question of measures to be taken and would therefore have to be examined in the light of all the economic and social rights. Consequently it would be better to vote first on the Lebanese amendment which he supported.

MR. FONTAINA (Uruguay) remarked that adoption of the Lebanese amendment would mean that the Commission abandoned the idea of a general article on measures to be taken to ensure the enjoyment of economic and social rights. He therefore requested that the Commission should first vote on the question of whether or not the second paragraph of article 23 should be retained.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) supported the Chairman's suggestion to vote first on the amendments to the first paragraph of article 23; regardless of the decision on the USSR and French amendments, the Commission could then consider a general clause relating to measures to be taken in order to ensure enjoyment of economic and social rights.

MR. CASSIN (France) withdrew his amendment in order to eliminate the difficulties and enable a vote to be taken on the Lebanese amendment.

MR. LOUFI (Egypt) supported the suggestion to vote first on the Lebanese amendment in view of the fact that it related to the first paragraph.

[11]

MR. LEBEAU (Belgium) shared the view of the representative of Uruguay that a vote should first be taken on the preliminary question of whether or not the Commission wished to retain the idea in the second paragraph of article 23.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) remarked that his amendment applied to the first paragraph, consequently the normal procedure would be to take a decision on that paragraph before considering the second paragraph.

He would vote against the USSR amendment which, however, might fit into a separate article.

Mr. Malik specified that his amendment would complete the first paragraph by stating the theory of the right of constant work; its adoption would in no way prejudice the acceptance of a separate article on the measures to be taken.

THE CHAIRMAN put the Yugoslav, USSR and Lebanese amendments to the vote. The Yugoslav amendment was to add the words: "taken by the State or society".

The amendment was rejected by 9 votes to 4 with 4 abstentions.

The USSR amendment was to add the words: "guaranteed by measures to create the widest possible opportunities for full employment".

The amendment was rejected by 9 votes to 4 with 4 abstentions.

The Lebanese amendment was to add the words: "and of protection against unemployment" at the end of the first paragraph of article 23.

The amendment was adopted by 8 votes to 5 with 4 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN appointed a sub-committee, consisting of the representatives of France, Lebanon, United Kingdom, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and the United States, to work out a special article concerning the measures to be taken in order to ensure enjoyment of economic and social rights.

The meeting rose at 1:15 p.m.

E/CN.4/SR.66
9 June 1948<sup>119</sup>

Summary Record of the Sixty-Sixth Meeting
[of the Commission on Human Rights]
 Held at Lake Success, New York, on Wednesday,
 9 June 1948, at 2:30 p.m.

Chairman: Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, United States of America. Rapporteur: Mr. Malik, Lebanon. Members: Mr. Hood, Australia; Mr. Lebeau, Belgium; Mr. Stepanenko, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic; Mr. Larrain, Chile; Mr. Wu, China; Mr. Loutfi, Egypt; Mr. Cassin, France; Mrs. Mehta, India; Mr. Quijano, Panama; Mr. Lopez, Philippines; Mr. Klekovkin, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic; Mr. Pavlov, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics; Mr. Wilson, United Kingdom; Mr. Fontaina, Uruguay; Mr. Vilfan, Yugoslavia. Also Present: Mrs. Ledon, Representative of the Commission on the Status of Women. [2] Representatives of Specialized Agencies: Mr. Metall, International Labour Organization; Mr. Lebar, United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization. Consultants from Non-Governmental Organizations: Miss Sender, American Federation of Labor; Mr. Drennan,<sup>120</sup> Catholic International Union for Social Service; Mr. van Istendael, International Federation of Christian Trade Unions (IFCTU); Miss Schaefer, International Union of Catholic Women's Leagues; Dr. Robb, Liaison Committee of Women's International Organizations; Dr. Bienenfeld, World Jewish Congress. Secretariat: Dr. Humphrey, Director, Division of Human Rights; Mr. E. Lawson, Secretary of the Commission.

Continuation of the Consideration of the Draft International Declaration on Human Rights, Submitted by the Drafting Committee
 (Annex A of Document E/CN.4/95)

THE CHAIRMAN drew attention to the text of Article 23 submitted by the drafting sub-committee. (E/CN.4/114) She pointed out that the words "of his own choice" in paragraph 3 had been placed in parenthesis, as the sub-committee had been unable to agree upon their inclusion. Certain members had contended that the words "everyone is free to form or join trade unions" already implied that the individual was free to choose the trade union, but the United States delegation wished to retain the words "of his own choice" for the sake of clarity.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) warned the Commission of the danger of putting more in the article than was necessary. The words "of his own choice" would imply that any individual could join any trade union, which would, only increase the difficulties of demarcation which already existed among the different trade unions.

<sup>119</sup> This is the date of the meeting. The document was issued on 14 June 1948.

<sup>120</sup> The representative of the Catholic International Union for Social Service was Miss Juliet H. Drennan.

[3]

He added that the United Kingdom delegation considered the whole paragraph unnecessary if the Commission wished to retain it. However, it should make sure that no misleading statements were included.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) asked why the Sub-committee had in that instance departed from the formula “everyone has the right . . .”, and had substituted “everyone is free . . .”.

MRS. MEHTA (India) explained that “everyone is free . . .” left it to the individual to decide whether or not he wished to join a trade union.

MR. LEBEAU (Belgium) supported the explanation given by the Indian representative; it was not only a question of the right of the individual to join a trade union, but also his right not to join. The present text made that abundantly clear, and in his opinion the words “of his own choice” were redundant.

THE CHAIRMAN, speaking as the representative of the United States of America, withdrew the words “of his own choice”, in order to simplify the voting.

MR. LOUFI (Egypt) declared his intention not to vote for paragraph 3, which he considered superfluous, since the right to freedom of association was already given in Article 18.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) asked why the sub-committee had singled out trade union association for separate mention, when freedom of association was already covered in Article 18.

THE CHAIRMAN explained that the United States delegation considered that the right to form and join trade unions was an essential element of freedom. While other associations had long enjoyed recognition, trade unions had met with much opposition and it was only recently that they had become an accepted form of association. The struggle was, in fact, still [4] continuing, and her delegation thought, therefore, that specific mention should be made of trade unions.

MR. FONTAINA (Uruguay) agreed with the representative of Egypt that paragraph 3 was superfluous, as the matter was already covered by freedom of association in Article 18. He would not, however, be able to vote against the paragraph, having voted for freedom of association. If it were to be retained, it should be interpreted as meaning that individuals were not only free to join, but also not to join trade unions.

Mr. Fontaina understood why the USSR representative, who had only seen USSR trade unions, could not imagine any worker wishing to remain outside a trade union, for a USSR worker who left his trade union would have no work. Uruguay, however, among other countries, had many trade unions, which could be roughly classified into two politically opposed categories: those with a socialist trend, and those with a communist trend. Mr. Fontaina cited a case in his country where a socialist trade union had promoted a strike for an increase of pay; when the increase was obtained for all workers, whether members of the socialist or communist trade union, the communist trade union had organized a strike for a further increase, with the result that the factory in question had closed and all had suffered from a long period of unemployment. In view of such cases, it was essential that the right to join trade unions should be accompanied by the right not to join.

THE CHAIRMAN recalled that when Article 19 had been considered, the suggestion to include trade unions in it had been decided against. Several members had supported that decision on the assumption that specific mention of trade unions would be made in Article 23. It was understood that the words "everyone is free to form or join trade unions" left individuals free not to join.

The Commission approved paragraph 3 of Article 23 by twelve votes, with four abstentions.

[5]

Paragraph 4: "Women shall work with the same advantages as men and receive equal pay for equal work."

THE CHAIRMAN, speaking as the representative of the United States of America, expressed her strong support for the principle of equal pay for equal work, which was widely observed in the United States, where many States had equal pay laws on their Statute Books. She felt, however, that there was no need for a specific provision in the Declaration, since the principle was adequately covered by the provision against discrimination in Article 3, and paragraph 1 spoke of "just and favourable conditions of work and pay". Moreover, she disagreed with the phrase "with the same advantages" since there were many fields of work in which women required special advantage?

MRS. MEHTA (India) explained that only two members of the subcommittee had wished to include the paragraph in question. For her part, she would vote against it, as she had explained at an earlier meeting. To make a specific reference to women in the article would give rise to the impression that women did not have the same rights in other matters where they were not specifically mentioned.

MR. LARRAIN (Chile) recalled that when the Economic and Social Council at its last session had considered the proposal concerning equal pay for equal work submitted by the World Federation of Trade Unions and supported by the French and many Latin American delegations, Chile had supported the proposal wholeheartedly, pointing out that equal pay would be no innovation in Chile, where the principle was already applied in various fields of activity. The Council had adopted a resolution referring the problem to the International Labour Organization and calling upon all Member States to implement the principle.

In view of the Council's action, the delegation of Chile felt it was right and proper to refer to the principle in Article 23. Since there were, however objections to the specific mention of women, Mr. Larrain [6] proposed that the following text might be more acceptable:

“Everyone is entitled to receive equal pay for equal work.”

MR. STEPANENKO (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) expressed his astonishment that the representative of India, herself a woman, was opposed to paragraph 4. The importance of such a provision was paramount, in view of the fact that women had been discriminated against in the matter of pay almost more than in any other. Moreover, the Commission on the Status of Women had adopted a resolution, requesting that the Declaration should contain a provision with regard to equal pay for equal work.

The provision had been included in the text adopted at the second session of the Commission and in the text of the Drafting Committee, and it was not right to ask for its exclusion now. As the representative of Chile had pointed out, the Economic and Social Council had passed a resolution on the subject, and in Mr. Stepanenko’s opinion the Commission was bound to include such a provision in the Declaration.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) declared that, in spite of the arguments of the Byelorussian representative, he would be guided by the views of the two women members of the Commission.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) felt that paragraph 4 was of great importance. In many countries women were paid less than men for the same work – a particular form of discrimination which could not be ignored in the Declaration. The fact that “just and favourable conditions of work and pay” were mentioned in paragraph 1 would be no safeguard, since employers might consider it just to pay women less for the same work.

Mr. Pavlov suggested that the following text might prove more acceptable to the majority of the Commission:

[7]

“Women shall enjoy no less advantages than men in work and shall receive equal pay for equal work.”

MR. CASSIN (France) thought paragraph 4 had its uses, since the matter was not entirely covered by the provision against discrimination in Article 3, which had no power to regulate relations between employer and employee. He would favour the principle of the text adopted at the second session, with the amendment proposed by the USSR representative.

MRS. MEHTA (India) reiterated her conviction that any specific mention of women in the article would only weaken the position of women; there were many other fields in which there was discrimination against women, but nowhere else did the Declaration make specific mention of women, it being understood that “everyone” included women.

MRS. LEDON (Commission on the Status of Women), on behalf of her Commission, which represented all the women of the world, urged the adoption of paragraph 4. The argument that the question of equal pay for equal work was covered by the general provision in paragraph 1 was not correct, since the Declaration did not specify what were “just and favourable conditions of work and pay”.

Human beings must first be able to live; the standard of living depended upon work and its remuneration. The question of equal pay was therefore vital for women. In conclusion, Mrs. Ledon appealed to the sense of justice of the members of the Commission, urging them to support that paragraph in order to improve the position of women throughout the world.

MR. LOPEZ (Philippines) stated that he had previously objected to the wording of the first part of the provision, as he had thought it was open to misinterpretation. With the first part now amended by the [8] USSR representative, he could support paragraph 4. Paragraph 1 was not enough, since the criterion of what was “just and favourable” would be determined by contracts between the employer and employee. Paragraph 4 would in no way be redundant, for it introduced a new idea which was not contained in the rest of the article.

MR. HOOD (Australia) supported the alternative text proposed by the representative of Chile, since it disposed of the objection, which he shared, to the specific mention of women. Moreover, it stated a principle which was not clearly enunciated in paragraph 1, wherein “just and favourable” referred to the conditions of work of individuals and did not cover the relations of individuals to one another.

MR. WU (China) also supported the text proposed by the representative of Chile, which he thought would cover the objection raised by the representative of India.

MR. CASSIN (France) urged members not to allow discrimination to continue, simply because they were afraid of words and preferred abstract amendments. The French delegation had considered the question very seriously and would support the original provision, since it considered it more important to defend women than to defend words.

MR. WU (China) wished to make it clear that his delegation did not object to the mention of women, and was guiltless of any attempt to use vague and abstract words. The broader statement of the Chilean representative, however, stated an important principle which had not hitherto found its place in the Declaration, and which the Chinese delegation was glad to support.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) had no fault to find with the Chilean text, save that it was not sufficiently specific.

[9]

If that could be corrected, he would be willing to support it. He proposed that it should be amended to read:

“Everyone, regardless of race, nationality or sex, is entitled to equal pay for equal work.”

That would cover discrimination against women, and also discrimination against coloured workers as compared to white, colonial workers as compared to those of metropolitan Powers, etc.

MR. LARRAIN (Chile) explained that his sole desire had been to enunciate the principle clearly, yet in such a way that the paragraph would not be rejected. He would accept the USSR amendment.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) pointed out that although the Commission had started by discussing equal pay for men and women, a separate principle had now developed. He had nothing against the principle of equal pay for equal work, but it was a wide subject which entered into the matter of family responsibilities and which would involve an examination of the wage structure in various countries. Moreover, if that one principle were to be emphasized, it would throw the whole Declaration out of balance.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) stressed that the vital interests of the working people were concerned in the question of equal pay for equal work, and the working woman must be protected from discrimination.

The whole question of wages was not a question of pay for work, but rather of pay in accordance with the requirements of the individual. Modern society, unfortunately, could not yet achieve that, but at least it could do away with the injustice suffered by women, coloured races, national minorities etc.

MR. FONTAINA (Uruguay) declared that the very arguments of the USSR representative indicated the vast nature of the subject, for if the principle of equal pay for equal work were to be enlarged upon, it would [10] be necessary to mention every possible ground for discrimination. The Chilean text, on the other hand, referred to the principle of equal pay for equal work for “everyone”, which included men and women, and rendered the USSR amendment unnecessary.

MR. LOUTFI (Egypt) moved the closure of the debate.

MR. QUIJANO (Panama) asked the Chairman to put paragraph 4 to the vote in two parts, the first part to be: “Everyone regardless of race, nationality and sex”.

The Commission rejected the first part of paragraph 4 of Article 23, by eight votes to five, with four abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote paragraph 4 in the following text: “Everyone is entitled to receive equal pay for equal work”.

The Commission approved paragraph 4 of Article 23 by ten votes to three with four abstentions.

[11]

MR. CASSIN (France) said he had voted against the text “Everyone is entitled to receive equal pay for equal work” because he considered that not only was such an abstract formula very dangerous, but its interpretation would give rise to serious problems.

MR. FONTAINA (Uruguay) suggested that paragraph 4 should become paragraph 2.

MR. LOPEZ (Philippines) considered that the suggested new paragraph 2 should begin with the word “Women”.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) regretted the adoption of a wording for paragraph 4 of Article 23 which did not include mention of “equality regardless of sex”.

The Committee decided by eight votes to none with eight abstentions that paragraph 4 of Article 23 should become paragraph 2.

THE CHAIRMAN put Article 23, reading as follows, to the vote:

“1. Everyone has the right to just and favourable conditions of work and pay and to protection against unemployment.

“2. Everyone is entitled to receive equal pay for equal work.

“3. Everyone is free to form or join trade unions for the protection of his interests.”

The Commission adopted by eight votes to three with five abstentions the text of Article 23 as amended.

Consideration of the Report of the Drafting Committee, (document E/CN.4/95) (Continuation of discussion)

Article 24

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) considered that Article 24 was covered by Article 23.

After a brief discussion, THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote a proposal that the Drafting Sub-Committee should be requested to draft a separate Article 24.

[12]

The proposal was adopted by eleven votes to none with five abstentions.

Articles 25 and 26

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the India/United Kingdom joint proposal (document E/CN.4/99) suggested the amalgamation of Articles 25 and 26, and that the delegation of China had proposed that Article 23–29 should be amalgamated (document E/CN.4/102).

MRS. MEHTA (India) suggested the insertion in the Joint India-United Kingdom proposal of a new paragraph reading as follows:

“Mothers and children shall be granted special care and assistance” to which MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) said he was not opposed. He did not however wish to be committed to that exact wording.

Replying to MR. LEBEAU (Belgium), who asked whether the words “security in the event of unemployment”, need be retained in the India / United Kingdom draft as protection against unemployment was provided for in Article 23, MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) said he would prefer their retention.

MR. CASSIN (France) pointed out that the amendments suggested by his delegation (document E/CN.4/82/Add.8) were submitted as amendments to the text adopted at the second session, but as the Lebanese amendment to paragraph 1 of Article 23 had been adopted that morning, he would not press the French amendment to Article 25. He supported the retention of the words “security in the event of unemployment” in the Joint India / United Kingdom text, and suggested the addition of a new paragraph referring to the right of everyone to an adequate standard of living. He agreed with the representative of India’s proposed amendment.

MRS. MEHTA (India) and MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) accepted the amendment suggested by the representative of France.

[13]

MR. STEPANENKO (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) referring to Article 26, said the questions of social security etc., dealt with under that Article were of great importance to workers throughout the world. Pointing out that in some countries workers who became unemployed because of old age, illness, disability etc., found themselves without any means of support he emphasized the fact that in his country all workers, without exception, were insured against such possibilities, and that the insurance contributions were paid entirely by the employers. He disagreed with the practice followed in certain countries whereby workers themselves were required to pay their share of the cost of social insurance.

Article 26 should contain more concrete guarantees of social security for the working man than were contained in the India/United Kingdom text.

Replying to the Chairman, who asked what percentage of his wages a worker in Byelorussia received in case of disability etc., MR. STEPANENKO (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) said that such a worker received a monthly allowance based on the average rate of pay for the number of years he had been working.

THE CHAIRMAN, speaking as the representative of the United States of America, wished to make the position of her delegation clear, and to emphasize that it supported the India/United Kingdom text for Articles 24/26 in the belief that that text stated the substance of the original Articles in a briefer and better form. She suggested that the words “necessary social services and” should be inserted before the word “security”, in order to make it clear that the term “social security” encompassed the right to services as well as to economic protection.

MR. HOOD (Australia) supported the India/United Kingdom text and the amendment suggested by the Chairman. He proposed that the words “and to social services” should be added after the words “standard of living”.

[14]

MR. LEBEAU (Belgium), MRS. MEHTA (India) and MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) also supported the amendment suggested by the Chairman.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) suggested that the second part of the text for Articles 24–26 should read: “including security in the event of unemployment, disability, old age or other lack of livelihood in circumstances beyond his control, and special care and assistance for mothers and children”.

MR. CASSIN (France), supported by MR. MALIK (Lebanon) suggested that the proposed text for Articles 24–26 should be divided into three sentences.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) said he preferred two sentences and proposed that a Sub-Committee should be appointed to draft the Article.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that the India/United Kingdom text omitted all reference to the right of the family to a dignified standard of living, and the right of man to medical care and housing. The Declaration must contain clauses emphasizing these rights, and he asked the Drafting Sub-Committee to take his suggestions into consideration.

Referring to the high cost of medical aid and the lack of hospitals and health centres in the United States of America, he pointed out that in the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics not only was all medical aid provided free of charge to workers, but the hospital network system had been increased five times and the number of physicians 500 per cent during the last quarter of a century. Expenses in connection with the improvement of health services were increasing yearly.

Stressing the right of man to adequate housing, he said that in the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics only one to four per cent of a worker’s earnings was spent on housing, whereas in certain other countries the average spent on housing was 30 per cent.

[15]

THE CHAIRMAN said the Drafting Sub-Committee would take into account the suggestions made by the representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. Speaking as representative of the United States of America she pointed out that in that country the poor received free medical aid, and that although the idea of socialized medicine was not generally accepted, several hospital insurance schemes were being tried out. Taken on a basis of population she thought that there were more doctors in the United States of America and more hospital beds than there were in the USSR.

She felt it would be most interesting if there was an exchange of medical missions between the United States of America and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. That exchange might prove to be a very profitable one and would help greatly in the two countries' mutual knowledge of one another. She would do all in her power to arrange for such a mission if the USSR representative would reciprocate.

The meeting rose at 5:20 p.m.

E/CN.4/119

10 June 1948

United States of America: Proposed Alternative for the Preamble of the Draft International Declaration
on Human Rights

Whereas recognition of the inherent dignity and the equal rights of all the persons is the foundation of freedom, peace and justice in the world, and

Whereas the States, Members of the United Nations, reaffirming their recognition of that dignity and of those rights, have declared their purpose to promote and encourage respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms,

Now therefore the General Assembly recommends the following Declaration as a common standard of achievement for the United Nations in the performance of its obligation to promote universal respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion.

E/CN.4/120

10 June 1948

Report of the Sub-Committee Consisting of the Representatives of France, Lebanon, United Kingdom, United States of America and Uruguay, on Additional Articles for the Draft International Declaration of Human Rights

(1) The following text was unanimously accepted by the Sub-Committee to come at the end of the Declaration:

“Everyone has the right to a good social and international order in which the rights and freedoms set out in this Declaration can be fully realized.”

(2) in addition, Mr. Cassin suggests the following article, to precede the articles on economic and social rights:

“Everyone as a member of society has the economic, social and cultural rights enumerated below, whose fulfilment should be made possible in every State separately or by international collaboration.”

E/CN.4/121

10 June 1948

Original Text: Spanish

Panama: Proposed Text for Articles 27–28 of the Draft International Declaration on Human Rights

Everyone has the right to education and to free primary schooling. Education shall be based on the principles of human freedom, morality and brotherhood. It shall be widely available to everyone without distinction as to sex, race, language, religion or political opinion and shall promote the spiritual, intellectual and physical development of the people.

E/CN.4/122

10 June 1948

Original Text: Spanish<sup>121</sup>

American Declaration of the Rights and Duties of Man

Adopted by the Ninth International Conference of American States (Extract from the Final Act of the Conference)

Whereas:

The American nations have acknowledged the dignity of the individual, and their national constitutions recognize that juridical and political institutions, which regulate society, have as their principal aim the protection of the essential rights of man and the creation of circumstances that will permit him to achieve spiritual and material progress, and attain happiness;

<sup>121</sup> This version of the American Declaration was presumably prepared by the translation services of the United Nations on the basis of a Spanish-language version. There is an official English-language version of the American Declaration that differs slightly from this text. Note the remarks of Eleanor Roosevelt concerning translation difficulties of the Declaration at E/CN.4/SR.58, p. 7.

The American states have on repeated occasions recognized that the essential rights of man are not derived from the fact of one's being a national of a certain state, but are fundamental attributes of the individual;

The international protection of the rights of man should be the supreme guide of an evolving American law.

Both the American affirmation of essential human rights and the guarantees given by the internal regimes of the respective states establish the initial system of protection considered by the American States as being suited to the present social and juridical conditions, not without recognizing that they should increasingly strengthen that system in the international field as these conditions become more favourable;

The Ninth International Conference of American States Agrees
To adopt the following

American Declaration of the Rights and Duties of Man

[2]

Preamble

All men are born free and equal in dignity and in rights, and, being endowed by nature with reason and conscience, they should conduct themselves as brothers one to another.

The fulfilment of duty by each individual is a prerequisite to the rights of all. Rights and duties are inter-related in every social and political activity of man. While rights exalt individual liberty, duties express the dignity of that liberty.

Duties of a juridical nature presuppose others of a moral nature that support those duties in concept and are the basis therefor.

Inasmuch as the spirit is the supreme aim of human existence and the greatest expression thereof, it is the duty of man to serve that end with all his strength and resources.

Since culture is the maximum social and historical expression of that spirit it is the duty of man to preserve, practice, and foster culture by every means within his power.

And, since morality and good manners constitute the noblest flowering of culture, it is the duty of every man always to hold them in high respect.

Chapter One

Rights

Article I

Every human being has the right to life, liberty, and the security of his person. Right to life, liberty and personal security.

Article II

All persons are equal before the law and have the rights and duties established in this Declaration, without Right to equality before the law.

distinction as to race, sex, language, creed, or any other factor.

Article III

Every person has the right freely to profess a religious faith, and to manifest and practise it both in public and in private.

Right to religious freedom and worship.

Article IV

Every person has the right to freedom of investigation, of opinion, and of the expression and dissemination of thought by any medium whatsoever.

Right to freedom of investigation, opinion, expression, and dissemination.

[3]

Article V

Every person has the right to the protection of the law against abusive attacks upon his honour, his reputation, and his private and family life.

Right to protection of honour, personal reputation, and private and family life.

Article VI

Every person has the right to establish a family, the basic element of society, and to receive protection therefor.

Right to a family and to the protection thereof.

Article VII

All women, during pregnancy and the nursing period, and all children have the right to special protection, care and aid.

Right to protection for mothers and children.

Article VIII

Every person has the right to fix his residence within the territory of the state of which he is a national, to move about freely within such territory, and not to leave it except by his own will.

Right to residence and movement.

Article IX

Every person has the right to the inviolability of his home.

Right to inviolability of the home.

Article X

Every person has the right to the inviolability and circulation of his correspondence.

Right to the inviolability and circulation of correspondence.

Article XI

Every person has the right to the preservation of his health through sanitary and social measures relating to food, clothing, housing, and medical care, to the extent permitted by public and community resources.

Right to the preservation of health and to wellbeing.

Article XII

Every person has the right to an education, which should be based on the principles of liberty, ethics, and human solidarity.

Right to education.

[4]

Article XII (Cont'd)

Furthermore, every person has the right to an education that will prepare him to lead a decent life, to raise his standard of living, and to be a useful member of society. The right to an education includes the right to equality of opportunity in every case, in accordance with natural talents, merit, and the desire to utilize the resources that the state or the community is in a position to provide. Every person has the right to receive, free, at least a primary education.

Article XIII

Every person has the right to take part in the cultural life of the community, to enjoy the arts, and to participate in the benefits that result from intellectual progress, especially scientific discoveries. He likewise has the right to the protection of his moral and material interests as regards his inventions or any literary, scientific, or artistic works of which he is the author.

Right to the benefits of culture.

Article XIV

Every person has the right to work, under proper conditions, and to follow his vocation freely, in so far as existing conditions of employment permit. Every person who works has the right to receive such remuneration as will, in proportion to his capacity and skill, assure him a standard of living suitable for himself and for his family.

Right to work and to fair remuneration.

[5]

Article XV

Every person has the right to leisure time, to wholesome recreation, and to the opportunity for advantageous use of his free time to his spiritual, cultural, and physical benefit.

Right to leisure time and to the use thereof.

Article XVI

Every person has the right to social security which will protect him from the consequences of unemployment, old age, and any disabilities arising from causes beyond his control that make it physically or mentally impossible for him to earn a living.

Right to social security.

Article XVII

Every person has the right to be recognized everywhere as a person having rights and obligations, and to enjoy the basic civil rights.

Right to recognition of juridical personality and of civil rights.

Article XVIII

Every person may resort to the courts to ensure respect for his legal rights. There should likewise be available to him a simple, brief procedure whereby justice will protect him from acts of authority that, to his prejudice, violate any fundamental constitutional rights.

Right to a fair trial.

Article XIX

Every person has the right to the nationality to which he is entitled by law and to change it, if he so wishes, for the nationality of any other country that is willing to grant it to him.

Right to nationality.

Article XX

Every person having legal capacity is entitled to participate in the government of his country, directly or through his representative, and to take part in popular elections, which shall be by secret ballot, and shall be genuine, periodic, and free.

Right to vote and to participate in government.

[6]

Article XXI

Every person has the right to assemble peaceably with others in a formal public meeting or an informal gathering, in connection with matters of common interest of any nature.

Right of assembly.

Article XXII

Every person has the right to associate with others to promote, exercise, and protect his legitimate interests of a political, economic, religious, social, cultural, professional, trade union, or other nature. Right of association.

Article XXIII

Every person has a right to own such private property as meets the essential needs of decent living and helps to maintain the dignity of the individual and of the home. Right to property.

Article XXIV

Every person has the right to submit respectful petitions to any competent authority, for reasons of either general or private interest, and the right to obtain prompt action thereon. Right of petition.

Article XXV

No person may be deprived of his liberty except in the cases and according to the procedures established by pre-existing law. No person may be deprived of liberty for non-fulfilment of obligations of a purely civil character. Right to protection from arbitrary arrest.

Every individual who has been deprived of his liberty has the right to have the legality of the measure ascertained without delay by a court, and the right to be tried without undue delay or, otherwise, to be released. He also has the right to humane treatment during the time he is in custody.

[7]

Article XXVI

Every accused person is presumed to be innocent until proved guilty. Every person accused of an offence has the right to be given an impartial and public hearing, and to be tried by courts previously established in accordance with pre-existing laws, and not to receive cruel, infamous, or unusual punishment. Right to due process of law.

Article XXVII

Every person has the right to seek and receive asylum in foreign territory, in case of pursuit not resulting from Right of asylum.

common law crimes, and in accordance with the laws of each country and with international agreements.

Article XXVIII

The rights of man are limited by the rights of others, by the security of all, and by the just demands of the general welfare and the advancement of democracy.

Scope of the rights of man.

Chapter Two Duties

Article XXIX

It is the duty of the individual so to conduct himself in relation to others that each and every one may fully form and develop his personality.

Duties to society.

Article XXX

It is the duty of every person to aid, support, educate, and protect his minor children, and it is the duty of children to honour their parents always and to aid, support, and protect them when they need it.

Duties toward children and parents.

Article XXXI

It is the duty of every person to acquire at least an elementary education.

Duty to receive instruction.

[8]

Article XXXII

It is the duty of every person to vote in the popular elections of the country of which he is a national, when he is legally capable of doing so.

Duty to vote.

Article XXXIII

It is the duty of every person to obey the law and other legitimate commands of the authorities of his country and those of the country in which he may be.

Duty to obey the law.

Article XXXIV

It is the duty of every able-bodied person to render whatever civil and military service his country may require for its defence and preservation, and in case of public disaster, to render such civil services as may be in his power.

Duty to serve the community and the nation.

It is likewise his duty to hold any popular elective office that devolves upon him in the state of which he is a national.

Article XXXV

It is the duty of every person to co-operate with the state and the community with respect to social security and welfare, in accordance with his ability and with existing circumstances.

Duties with respect to social security and welfare.

Article XXXVI

It is the duty of every person to pay the taxes established by law for the support of public services.

Duty to pay taxes.

Article XXXVII

It is the duty of every person to work, as far as his capacity and possibilities permit, in order to obtain the means of livelihood or to benefit his community.

Duty to work.

[9]

Article XXXVIII

It is the duty of every person to refrain from taking part in political activities that, according to the law, are reserved exclusively to the citizens of the state in which he is an alien.

Duty to refrain from political activities in a foreign country.

E/CN.4/124

10 June 1948

United Kingdom: Draft Preamble to the International Declaration on Human Rights

Whereas it is a purpose of the United Nations to achieve international co-operation in promoting and encouraging respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms for all;

And whereas this purpose can be attained only on the basis of a common understanding of the nature of these rights and freedoms;

The Declaration of Human Rights sets forth the rights and freedoms which are essential to the highest expression of human dignity and worth and which every person and every organ of society, national and international, should strive to promote by teaching and education and by progressive measures to secure their universal recognition and observance.

E/CN.4/SR.67
10 June 1948<sup>122</sup>

Summary Record of the Sixty-Seventh Meeting
[of the Commission on Human Rights]

Held at Lake Success New York, on Thursday,
 10 June 1948, at 11 a.m.

Chairman: Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, United States of America. Rapporteur: Mr. Charles Malik, Lebanon. Members: Mr. Jockel, Australia; Mr. Steyaert, Belgium; Mr. Stepanenko, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic; Mr. Larrain, Chile; Mr. Chang, China; Mr. Loutfi, Egypt; Mr. Cassin, France; Mrs. Mehta, India; Mr. de Quijano, Panama; Mr. Ingles, Philippines; Mr. Klekovkin, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic; Mr. Pavlov, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics; Mr. Wilson, United Kingdom; Mr. Fontaina, Uruguay; Mr. Vilfan, Yugoslavia. Also Present: Mrs. Ledon, Commission on the Status of Women. Representatives of specialized agencies: Mr. Metall, International Labour Organization (ILO); Mr. Lebar, United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO). [2] Consultants from Non-Governmental Organizations: Miss Sender, American Federation of Labor; Mr. van Istendael, International Federation of Christian Trade Unions; Miss Drennan, Catholic International Union for Social Service; Mr. Prentice, Commission of the Churches on International Affairs; Mr. Brotman, Co-ordination Board of Jewish Organizations; Mr. Strahler, International Committee of the Red Cross; Mr. Bienenfeld, World Jewish Congress; Miss Schaefer, International Union of Catholic Women's Leagues. Secretariat: Mr. Humphrey, Director, Human Rights Division; Mr. Lawson, Secretary of the Commission.

Continuation of the Consideration of the Report of the Drafting Committee to the Commission on Human Rights
(Document E/CN.4/95)

New article

THE CHAIRMAN read the following text which the Sub-Committee had unanimously recommended to the Commission for adoption as an article of general principle to be added at the end of the Declaration:

“Everyone has the right to a good social and international order in which the rights and freedoms set out in this Declaration can be fully realized.”

She then read a second text prepared by the French representative for inclusion in the Declaration preceding the articles on economic and social rights.

<sup>122</sup> This was the date of the meeting. The document was issued on 25 June 1948.

“Everyone as a member of society has the economic, social and cultural rights enumerated below, whose fulfilment should be made possible in every State separately or by international collaboration.”

MRS. MEHTA (India) wondered whether the adjective “good” was altogether necessary. It was obvious that a social order guaranteeing all [3] the rights and freedoms set out in the Declaration on Human Rights would of necessity be “good”. Conceptions of good and evil were relative. To speak of a “good” social order in which rights and freedoms could be fully realized led to the supposition that there could be a “bad” or “less good” social order which offered the same guarantees to mankind.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) was in favour of retaining the adjective “good”; he did not think it infringed on or affected the sense of the second part of the Sub-Committee’s text, for the adjective qualified the social order, while the second part of the sentence laid down the conditions unnecessary to justify the adjective.

MR. CHANG (China) suggested that the place to be given to the new articles should not be decided upon immediately. It was sufficient to agree that the articles would be added towards the end of the Declaration.

While supporting the idea that an article of general principle establishing everyone’s right to a good social and international order should be included in the Declaration, he thought that the Commission should go further, and should affirm that it was the duty of all to contribute towards the establishment and maintenance of that order. While stressing the importance of the question, he thought that there was no need for an immediate vote on the text proposed by the Sub-Committee.

The Commission should reflect on what improvements might be made in it. He, therefore, suggested that the consideration of the question should be postponed till a later date. If, however, the Commission decided on an immediate discussion of the two new articles, he would propose the inclusion in the first text of a phrase expressing the idea he had just set forth, namely, the need to affirm, side by side with the duties of the State, the individual’s duty to contribute to the good social order he demanded. He therefore suggested adding [4] after the words “everyone has the right” either “and the duty to assist in the realization of” or “and the duty to bring about”.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) entirely agreed with the idea Mr. Chang wished to have included in the Declaration, and realized its importance. That idea should, however, be stated in the Preamble which would mention the rights of States as well as the duties of the individual. To introduce the idea of the individual’s duties into an article would be a departure from the form given to the other articles of the Declaration. The Commission should decide whether it considered such a departure justified by the importance of the article in question.

MR. CHANG (China) said in answer to a question by the Chairman that article 2 did not fully meet the idea he wished to express by the new article. The duties of the individual mentioned in article 2 were those which he owed to the State of which he was a national, or to other nationals of that State. The article, the addition of which had been recommended by the Sub-Committee, introduced a new idea, namely the individual's right to a good social order. As, however, the social order which the individual was entitled to demand, under the terms of that article, depended in the first instance on the individual's contribution to its establishment and maintenance, that right was dependent on the fulfilment of a duty which should be clearly stated.

MR. CASSIN (France) referred to the circumstances which had led to the preparation of the two texts. As a result of the difficulties encountered during the consideration of article 23 and the following articles, the Commission had been struck by two defects in the text originally drawn up in Geneva: excessive length and repetition, on the one hand, and too much detail on the other. It should be remembered that the Commission was not called upon to draft the provisions of a national constitution but the [5] articles of an international Declaration.

The Lebanese representative had at that time proposed that the articles of the Declaration should be drafted with a view to simplicity and clarity and that they should include a sort of prefatory article which would, in a sense, be a statement of general principle and would obviate the need to mention throughout the text of the Declaration the duties of the State to the individual.

The Sub-Committee entrusted with the drafting of the prefatory article had reached unanimous agreement on the first text which affirmed the need for a good social order which would permit the enjoyment of all the rights and freedoms set out in the Declaration on Human Rights. That text was, therefore, of a very general nature and covered all the articles of the Declaration. The unanimity shown in the Sub-Committee was proof that it answered a real need.

The second text proposed by the French delegation was more specific and applied to the economic, social and cultural rights which the Commission was examining at present. The Sub-Committee had not thought it necessary to retain it; the French delegation was today formally submitting it to the Commission.

MR. JOCKEL (Australia) said that the text proposed by Mr. Cassin seemed to his delegation to be much more important and of greater scope than the one agreed upon by the Sub-Committee. His delegation would vote for the first text on condition that that text did not exclude Mr. Cassin's text.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) said that the majority in the Sub-Committee was of the opinion that the first text covered the second, and, therefore, made it redundant. To make a special reference to the economic, social and cultural rights would be to favour them in comparison with other rights and freedoms, which was inadmissible. The Commission should decide whether it wished to retain both texts or not.

[6]

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) agreed that this represented the view of the majority of the Sub-Committee.

MISS SENDER (American Federation of Labor) thought both texts should be retained. The need for an article on general principle had become obvious during the consideration of the articles on economic and social rights. The Commission had realized that those rights had not been clearly enough defined in the Geneva text which, moreover, was far from complete. It was mainly in order to fill that gap that the Sub-Committee had been set up.

The original idea had not been accepted by the majority in the Sub-Committee, but it had been raised again by the French representative. The latter's text, therefore, corresponded more closely to the task entrusted to the Sub-Committee as well as to the idea which the Commission desired to express. Furthermore, the Commission had taken a formal decision regarding the inclusion of an article which would deal especially with economic, social and cultural rights.

MR. JOCKEL (Australia) repeated that his delegation did not object to the adoption of the Sub-Committee's text, but it saw in it only a restatement of principle. The desired aim was to affirm the economic, social and cultural rights of the individual. In their present form, the articles of the Declaration on those rights were inferior to those of the Geneva text, which clearly established the responsibilities of both the State and society. Those articles had been altered, to improve their form and style; but their importance should be established by the adoption of a prefatory article. The text proposed by Mr. Cassin was very complete in the sense that it stated the rights of the individual and indicated the State, as an entity or in collaboration with other States, as the guarantor of such rights.

[7]

MR. VILFAN (Yugoslavia) pointed out that there was a link between the new article which the Sub-Committee wished to be adopted, and article 2 which governed the relations between the individual and society; the ideas expressed in those articles were not identical but were very close. The Commission had decided to instruct the Sub-Committee to prepare a fresh draft of article 2; he wondered how far the fresh draft would make the new article useless. It would be difficult to vote before being sure of that point. That was why he thought the discussion of the new article premature.

Should the Commission decide to take a vote on Mr. Cassin's text immediately, he reserved the right to amend it so as to read "... whose fulfilment should be made possible by the State." That amendment was in line with the ideas he had put forward the previous day when the Commission had decided to draw up a prefatory article on economic, social and cultural rights.

MR. STEYAERT (Belgium) said his delegation would be sorry if the first article were adopted to the exclusion of the article proposed by Mr. Cassin. The first had an altogether general bearing while the second stressed, to some extent, social, economic and cultural rights which were less well known.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) thought it was premature to pass judgment on the fate of either of the proposals, or on the Chinese amendment, which introduced an absolutely new idea. Since the articles in question were to come at the end of the Declaration, their consideration should be postponed until the end of the examination of the articles of the Declaration. Should the Commission decide, however, to discuss them in substance at once, the USSR delegation would have some serious objections to raise.

[8]

THE CHAIRMAN agreed that the final placing of the articles should be discussed later. It could be decided by the Style Committee. The Commission should first make known its position in regard to the two texts submitted to it and should decide whether it would consider both of them at once, or only one of them, or would not deal with them until a later stage of its work.

MR. CHANG (China) asked for some enlightenment on the functions of the Style Committee. He thought that that Committee would deal mainly with questions of style and with the uniformity of translations, and he was surprised that it should be entrusted with important decisions such as the placing of articles.

THE CHAIRMAN, supported by MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) said that the Style Committee would only deal with questions of form and construction, and would take no decisions of substance.

A short discussion of procedure took place in the course of which MR. CASSIN (France) pointed out the great difference between his text, which referred specifically to article 23 and the following articles, which the Commission was in the process of considering, and the Sub-Committee's text, which was a general text, and could quite suitably be considered when the Commission started revising the general texts.

THE CHAIRMAN called on the Commission to vote on whether it would proceed to the consideration of the two texts immediately, or would postpone such consideration until later.

The Commission decided by 8 votes to 4 with 2 abstentions, to postpone until later the consideration of the text proposed by the Drafting Sub-Committee.

The Commission decided by 6 votes to 6, with 2 abstentions, to postpone until later the consideration of the text proposed by Mr. Cassin.

[9]

Articles 27 and 28

THE CHAIRMAN read out the text of article 27 as adopted at the Commission's second session, the alternative texts proposed by the French and United States delegations, the text of article 28 as adopted at the Commission's second session and the alternative text submitted by the French delegation (document E/CN.4/95). She also read out the draft article proposed by the Indian and United Kingdom delegations in place of articles 27 and 28 (document E/CN.4/99), reminding the meeting that the text submitted by the Chinese delegation had been withdrawn.

MR. QUIJANO (Panama) emphasized his delegation's wish to contribute towards the establishment of the principle of the right to education.

The Panama delegation felt that it would be unthinkable if a human right as elementary as the right to education were not included in the Declaration. Mr. de Quijano pointed out that the constitutions of forty countries proclaimed the principle of free and compulsory education. In those countries, everyone without any distinction whatsoever had the right to primary education. Certain countries, including Panama, extended that right to secondary and even to higher education, in the sense that both those stages of education were free.

The representative of Panama drew the Commission's attention to the fact that article 12 of the Declaration on Human Rights adopted at the Inter-American Conference at Bogotá established the right to education for everyone. In the opinion of the Panama delegation, that fact was a weighty argument in favour of proclaiming the same right in the International Declaration on Human Rights.

[10]

Mr. de Quijano agreed that the text adopted at the Commission's second session was drafted in terms which were rather too broad, but he thought that it could easily be re-drafted in a more concise form without affecting the basic principle involved. It was, for instance, unnecessary to include provisions regarding the manner in which the State should apply the principle of the right to education, as provisions dealing with the State's obligations were out of place in a Declaration designed to establish the rights of the individual. The principle itself, however, should be proclaimed with full force.

The Panama delegation had prepared the following draft article which it now submitted to the Commission as a substitute for articles 27 and 28:

“Everyone has the right to education and to free primary schooling. Education shall be inspired by the principles of human freedom, morality and solidarity. It shall be accorded to everyone without distinction as to sex, race, language, religion or political opinion and shall promote the spiritual, intellectual and physical development of the people.”

[11]

MR. JOCKEL (Australia) stated that his delegation supported the alternative version of article 27 submitted by the United States delegation. He suggested, however, that the word "fundamental" should be replaced by "elementary".

Speaking as the representative of the United States of America, THE CHAIRMAN agreed to that amendment.

MR. LEBAR (UNESCO) remarked that it was hardly necessary to stress UNESCO's interest in the work of the Commission on Human Rights.

After a war in which the most fundamental human rights had been trodden in the dust, UNESCO felt that it was extremely important once again to proclaim those rights firmly and clearly in a document of solemn significance such as the International Declaration on Human Rights.

Ignorance and illiteracy which, unfortunately, still prevailed in some parts of the world, were among the principal obstacles to international understanding. For that reason UNESCO was devoting a considerable part of its activities to the work of ensuring the necessary minimum of education to all the peoples of the world. It was also trying to contribute towards better international understanding by carrying out a series of investigations of factors which could improve or hinder such understanding.

Mr. Lebar also pointed out that his organization was considering with the closest attention the Economic and Social Council's resolution on UNESCO's contribution to the struggle against discrimination and for the protection of minorities.

Mr. Lebar thought that the Declaration on Human Rights would give valuable aid to UNESCO's work by proclaiming the right to education and culture as one of the fundamental rights; it would thus provide a common ground for understanding among all men of good will.

[12]

As regards articles 27 and 28 which were now under discussion, Mr. Lebar recalled that it had often been stated in the course of the Commission's debates that the Declaration should, as it were, place on record the general trend of world opinion with regard to certain principles at the time when the Declaration was issued. An article drafted in the terms proposed by the Indian and United Kingdom delegations, which merely established the right to education without specifying the right to different stages of education and higher education in particular, would therefore, not fully correspond to the Declaration's aims.

The adoption of that text would automatically involve the deletion of article 28. Mr. Lebar warned the Commission of the danger of such a step. In that connection, he cited the example of Germany where, under the Hitler regime, education had been admirably organized but had, nevertheless, produced disastrous results. It was absolutely necessary to make it clear that education to which everyone was entitled should strengthen respect for the rights set forth in the Declaration and combat the spirit of intolerance. The text proposed by the representative of Panama fulfilled that purpose.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) stated that with the consent of the Indian delegation he would be prepared to withdraw the India-United Kingdom draft text and to support the alternative version submitted by the United States representative.

MRS. MEHTA (India) agreed to withdraw the India-United Kingdom text but explained that her delegation had considered it unnecessary to specify the different kinds of education to which everyone was entitled, since that question was within the competence of UNESCO.

She added that she agreed to the United States text but would insist on the word “fundamental”, which conveyed more clearly than “elementary” the conception of basic education which was the right of everyone.

[13]

THE CHAIRMAN invited the representative of the World Jewish Congress to expound his organization’s views on articles 27 and 28 of the Declaration.

MR. BIENENFELD (World Jewish Congress) recalled the circumstances in which the Commission had adopted article 28 at its second session in Geneva. As the result of interventions on the part of the World Jewish Congress and certain other organizations, the Commission had recognized that a Declaration which failed to indicate the spirit in which everyone was to be educated would not fulfil its purpose, and had agreed to devote a separate article – article 28 – to that question.

As the representative of UNESCO had pointed out, education in Germany and other fascist countries had been carried out in compliance with the principle of the right of education for everyone; yet the doctrines on which that education had been founded had led to two world wars. If the Declaration failed to define the spirit in which future generations were to be educated, it would lose its value as a guide for humanity.

The Declaration was not merely an appeal to the State; it was an appeal also to parents, teachers and educators. It was necessary to stress the importance of the article devoted to the spirit of education, which was possibly greater than that of all the other articles of the Declaration.

Mr. Bienenfeld stated that while the last part of article 27 was a repetition and might be deleted, article 28 should be retained in view of the fact that its provisions did not appear in any other section of the Declaration. Stating that at its last session UNESCO had adopted the entire text of article 28 as a basis for its efforts in Germany and in all other countries where it was necessary to work a change in the spirit of education, Mr. Bienenfeld appealed to the Commission to retain article 28 in the Declaration.

[14]

MR. LOUTFI (Egypt) stated that his delegation would support the text proposed by the United States delegation, as it contained all the elements of the text of article 27 as adopted at the second session of the Commission, except the provision against discrimination. The Egyptian delegation did not, however, think that such a provision was necessary since it appeared more than once in other parts of the Declaration and particularly in article 3.

As regards article 28, Mr. Loutfi thought that some of the ideas contained in it might be included in the Preamble to the Declaration.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) supported Mr. Bienenfeld's remarks regarding the importance of article 28. The human being was, by definition, a creature gifted with the power of reason, and the study of the ways in which that power could be developed was the Commission's concern. It was not enough to say that everyone had the right to education; it was necessary to specify the nature of such education. That was the only possible guarantee that future generations would not be educated in a spirit contrary to the aims of the United Nations as defined in the Preamble to the Charter.

In connexion with the part played by the family in the education of children, Mr. Malik stressed the need to exclude the possibility of situations in which dictators had the power to prevent parents from educating their children as they wished. Control of education could not be left entirely to the discretion of the State; parents should be allowed the freedom to determine the spirit in which they wished their children to be brought up.

The Lebanese delegation would support the text of article 27 as proposed by the United States delegation. It did not think, however, that the United States text was sufficiently comprehensive. The Commission was in duty bound to guard against the possibility that the education [15] of future generations could again be poisoned by doctrines opposed to the letter and the spirit of the Declaration. In that respect, the text proposed by the Panama delegation seemed entirely satisfactory.

MR. CASSIN (France) was inclined to agree in substance with the version of article 27 proposed by the United States delegation. However, he thought that it should be redrafted and that article 27 should confine itself to stating the right to education and the principle that elementary education was free and compulsory. The French delegation considered it unnecessary to repeat in article 27 that higher education would be accessible to everyone, without discrimination; on the other hand, it hoped that the text which it had proposed for adoption and which was intended to protect the economic, social and cultural rights of man would make it unnecessary for the Commission to insert the words "as can be provided by the State or community" in article 27.

Mr. Cassin suggested the following text for article 27: "Everyone has the right to education. Fundamental education shall be free and compulsory."

Mr. Cassin said that his delegation could not agree to the deletion of article 28; moreover it felt that it should be amended only after thorough study. Article 28 had given rise to long and earnest discussion in Geneva and the draft adopted there reconciled two trends of thought on the subject, one favouring the right of the State to determine the system of education and the other favouring the right of the family. At that time, the Commission had felt that, in the interest of the child and of mankind in general, the Declaration should not set forth directives regarding the system of education, but should, however indicate the factors which would favour the development of human personality. Consequently, the text adopted in Geneva contained no allusion to the State and to the family. The version of the article proposed by the French delegation was a drafting amendment [16] in the interest of greater clarity and it followed the Geneva text very closely. Mr. Cassin asked the Commission to retain article 28 as drafted by his delegation.

THE CHAIRMAN asked the representative of the International Union of Catholic Women's Leagues to express the views of her organization on the articles under discussion.

MISS SCHAEFER (International Union of Catholic Women's Leagues) also emphasized the importance of articles 27 and 28, declaring that the spirit and aims of education should be made clear.

She observed, however, that those articles failed to mention the fundamental right and responsibility incumbent upon parents to educate their children as they saw fit. If that right were not stated in the Declaration, there might very well be a recurrence of situations such as that which prevailed in Germany under Hitler. The sentence: "Elementary education is free and compulsory" might be interpreted to mean that if the State provided free education, it was entirely free to determine the system of education. It would be better to say:

"The State shall maintain adequate and free facilities for education."

MR. CHANG (China) proposed the adoption of the following text:

"1. Everyone has the right to education, including free fundamental education and equal access on the basis of merit to higher education.

"2. Education shall be directed to the full development of the human personality and to the strengthening of respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms."

Mr. Chang pointed out that the first paragraph of that single article retained the two ideas contained in the joint United Kingdom-India text, while the second paragraph set forth, in condensed form, the substance of [17] article 28, the importance of which the Chinese delegation had stressed time and again.

In reply to a question from the representative of the USSR, the Chairman stated that it was the understanding of the United States delegation that the new text suggested for article 27 was intended to replace articles 27 and 28 of the text adopted at the Commission's second session in Geneva.

MR. KLEKOVKIN (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) pointed out that the phrase "on the basis of merit" was vague and rather ambiguous.

He, personally, was opposed to any statement of a restrictive nature. In the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, everyone had a right not only to elementary education, but equally to higher education; the only qualification required of the student was the desire to educate himself. The delegation of the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic could not accept any restriction of the aspirations to higher education.

Mr. Klekovkin did not understand why articles 27 and 28 should be combined in a single article which failed to mention the spirit in which education should be given. In connection with the articles regarding the right to work, the Commission had recognized the need to enter into matters of detail; it likewise appeared necessary to be more precise in defining the right to education.

The text adopted at the Commission's second session in Geneva and the draft suggested by the French delegation contained the essential factors upon which the concept of free education in modern democratic society should be based. Those texts were defective neither in form nor substance, and nothing justified the deletion of article 28, which had been approved unanimously in Geneva. The Commission should decide whether to combine the ideas expressed in articles 27 and 28 in a single article, but it should not sacrifice any of these basic ideas.

[18]

Speaking as the representative of the United States, THE CHAIRMAN observed that access to higher education in the countries of the USSR was subject to the same conditions as those prevailing in the United States: entrance examinations had to be passed. The selection of persons for admission to advanced study was made on that basis. Therefore, the reservation contained in the United States draft simply laid down a principle which had already been recognized.

THE CHAIRMAN then announced that a drafting sub-committee would be asked to submit suggestions for redrafting articles 27 and 28. It would be composed of the representatives of China, France, Lebanon, Panama, the United Kingdom, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and the United States.

The meeting rose at 1:15 p.m.

E/CN.4/SR.68

10 June 1948<sup>123</sup>

Summary Record of the Sixty-Eighth Meeting
[of the Commission on Human Rights]

Held at Lake Success, New York, on Thursday,
 10 June 1948, at 3:30 p.m.

Chairman: Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, United States of America. Rapporteur: Mr. C. Malik, Lebanon. Members: Mr. G. Jockel, Australia; Mr. L. Steyaert and Mr. R. Lebeau, Belgium; Mr. A. S. Stepanenko, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic; Mr. G. Larrain, Chile; Mr. P. C. Chang, China; Mr. O. Loutfi, Egypt; Mr. R. Cassin, France; Mrs. H. Mehta, India; Mr. M. de J. Quijano, Panama; Mr. J. D. Ingles, Philippines; Mr. M. Klekovkin, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic; Mr. A. P. Pavlov, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics; Mr. G. Wilson, United Kingdom; Mr. R. Fontaina, Uruguay; Mr. J. Vilfan, Yugoslavia. Also Present: Mrs. A. Ledon, Representative of the Commission on the Status of Women. Representatives of Specialized Agencies: Mr. A. Metall, International Labour Organization; Mr. P. Lebar, United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization. [2] Consultants from Non-Governmental Organizations: Miss Sender, American Federation of Labor; Mr. van Istendael, International Federation of Christian Trade Unions; Miss Drennan, Catholic International Union for Social Service; Mr. Prentice, Jr., Commission of the Churches on International Affairs; Mr. B. Janner and Mr. Brotman, Co-ordinating Board of Jewish Organizations; Miss Strahler, International Committee of the Red Cross; Miss C. Schaefer, International Union of Catholic Women's Leagues; Mr. Bienenfeld and Mr. Wolkowicz, World Jewish Congress. Secretariat: Mr. J. Humphrey, Director of the Human Rights Division; Mr. E. Lawson, Secretary of the Commission.

Continuation of the Discussion on the Draft Declaration
 of Human Rights (document E/CN.4/95)

Articles 27–28

THE CHAIRMAN recalled that the drafting sub-committee composed of the representatives of China, France, Lebanon, Panama, USSR, United Kingdom and the United States of America had agreed on a combined text for Articles 27 and 28. The first sentence "Everyone has the right to education" had been unanimously accepted by the sub-committee. Two alternatives for the second sentence had been drafted for consideration by the Commission, as follows: (1) "This right includes free, compulsory elementary education", or (2) "This right includes free fundamental education". Finally, the drafting committee had reached agreement on the third part of the paragraph: "and equal access on the basis of merit to higher education."

<sup>123</sup> This is the date of the meeting. The document was issued on 14 June 1948.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the first sentence:

“Everyone has the right to education.”

That sentence was approved unanimously.

[3]

THE CHAIRMAN then opened discussion on the two alternatives for the second sentence and explained that the word “fundamental” was intended by several members of the drafting sub-committee to include the broader concept of education for adults as well as for children and adolescents.

MRS. MEHTA (India) objected to the use of the word “compulsory” in a Declaration of Rights.

MR. CASSIN (France) said that he would vote in favour of the original text of Article 27 as adopted at the second session of the Commission, as it contained the concepts which his delegation supported: fundamental education should be free and compulsory. The word “compulsory” should be interpreted to mean that no one (neither the State, nor the family) could prevent the child from receiving elementary education; the idea of coercion was in no way implied. Moreover, he saw no objection to the word “fundamental” which the French text had translated “élémentaire”. Incidentally, Mr. Cassin thought that the French text of the original draft should be corrected to read éducation élémentaire rather than instruction élémentaire.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) stressed the importance of free and compulsory elementary education. It should be free so that millions who could not afford the high costs involved might not be deprived of it. Elementary education should be free in order to give everyone the opportunity for schooling, and to combat illiteracy. In that connection, Mr. Pavlov felt that the word “fundamental” seemed to imply that education should be broad and intensive, rather than superficial; it tended to weaken and confuse the definition. Finally, the representative of the USSR emphasized the importance of retaining the word “compulsory”. The concept contained in that word was closely linked with the concept of the right to education. It presupposed that the obligations of society corresponded [4] to the rights of every human being to free education. The State had the obligation to furnish opportunities for education to everyone and to ensure that no one could be deprived of those opportunities. In his own country, almost fifty million persons of all ages were receiving education. On the other hand, millions of inhabitants of countries of the Far East were receiving no education at all. He had learned from United States sources that almost ten million persons were not fully literate in that country. Therefore, Mr. Pavlov strongly supported the inclusion of the word “compulsory” in the definition of the right.

MR. LEBAR (UNESCO) wondered whether the Commission might be able to combine the concept of compulsory education with that of fundamental education. The word “fundamental” contained the more recent and much broader concept of adult education and represented great progress in the thinking of the past educators over several decades. Mr. Lebar strongly favoured “fundamental” to replace “elementary”.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom), while he saw no difference between the words “fundamental” and “elementary”, preferred the latter word. On the other hand, he agreed with the representatives of India and Australia that it was dangerous to include the word “compulsory” in the draft Declaration because it could be interpreted as acceptance of the concept of State education. Although the United Kingdom had enjoyed free and compulsory education for several generations, Mr. Wilson found it difficult to reconcile the statement of the right to education with the notion of the compulsory nature of that education.

MR. CHANG (China) pleaded for support of the concept of “fundamental” education as elucidated by the representative of UNESCO. That new and modern concept was particularly well adapted to countries where adult education became [5] imperative for those persons who had not enjoyed the opportunities of grade-school instruction. Mr. Chang agreed with the representative of the United Kingdom that the word “compulsory” should be deleted.

MR. LARRAIN (Chile), while he could not agree fully with the arguments presented by the representatives of France and the USSR, would vote to retain the terms “free, compulsory, elementary education”. The constitution of Chile contained identical terms and the implementation of that constitutional provision had proved an effective weapon in combatting illiteracy.

In order to avoid mention of the word “compulsory” and to safeguard more adequately the right of the individual to education, MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) offered a compromise amendment which he tentatively drafted as follows:

“Parents have the right to control their children’s education, but cannot prevent them from receiving education.”

Mr. Azkoul explained that the right to education was not in the hands of the individual alone; the family and the State shared in ensuring that right. However, neither the family nor the State could deprive the individual of it. The concept of compulsion was in contradiction with the statement of a right and his amendment was intended to eliminate any implication of coercion. The representative of Lebanon thought that the word “compulsory” could be isolated from the remainder of the text and voted on after all the other amendments had been put to the vote. He would welcome the suggestions of the Commission regarding the final drafting of his amendment.

MR. STEPANENKO (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) thought that the Lebanese amendment neither clarified nor simplified the definition of the right to education. The first alternative agreed upon by the drafting sub-committee ensured the right to free and compulsory elementary education and should be maintained. It meant that the individual had the right to education himself and should discharge his obligation to society to do so. [6] Since no one could prevent him from exercising his right, he would benefit himself and his community. In the Byelorussian SSR, the exercise of the right had contributed greatly to stamping out illiteracy.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) agreed with Mr. Stepanenko that the Lebanese proposal could be covered in the simple statement: “free and compulsory education.” The word “compulsory” should not be feared for it could only work to the advantage of the child whose parents might not understand his vital interests and to the improvement of society, which would receive educated individuals. The first alternative text should therefore be voted as it stood, including the word “compulsory”.

The Lebanese representative might then wish to re-introduce his amendment. MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) accepted the procedure suggested by the representative of the USSR and reserved the right to re-introduce his amendment after the other amendments had been voted.

MRS. MEHTA (India) reminded the Commission that it was discussing the rights of all human beings and should not concern itself either with the rights of children or with the obligations of parents. She reiterated her objection to the word “compulsory” for the contradictory concepts of a right and a compulsion could not be reconciled in the draft Declaration.

MR. LEBAR (UNESCO) called attention to the fact that the phrase “free and compulsory education” had become traditional in all countries. Its omission from the Declaration of Human Rights would constitute a backward step. Mr. Lebar wished to dispel the confusion surrounding the use of the word “compulsory”. It did not mean that the State exercised a monopoly over education, nor did it infringe the right of parents to choose the school facilities they wished to offer their children.

[7]

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) gave vigorous support to the explanation offered by the representative of UNESCO. However, he continued to question the use of the term “fundamental education”. While elementary education was free in many countries, he doubted whether free fundamental education was possible at the present time in view of existing cultural conditions.

MR. FONTAINA (Uruguay) felt that the word “compulsory” should be removed from the first paragraph of Article 27 proposed by the drafting subcommittee, and should be inserted in the second paragraph (former Article 23), which dealt with the manner in which education was to be directed.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the deletion of the word “compulsory” from “This right includes free, compulsory. . .”

The deletion of the word “compulsory” was rejected by eight votes to seven.

The Chairman stated that in its next vote the Commission would choose between the words “elementary” and “fundamental”.

The phrase “This right includes free, compulsory elementary education” was approved by seven votes to five, with three abstentions.

MR. CHANG (China) felt that it would be tragic to omit the word “fundamental” from that phrase. He urged the Commission to insert the words “and fundamental” after “elementary”, thus making a reference to education for adults.

The Chinese representative’s amendment was approved by ten votes to one, with five abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN directed the Commission’s attention to the phrase, “and equal access on the basis of merit to higher education”.

[8]

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) questioned the words, “on the basis of merit”. The Russian translation which he had before him was unsatisfactory. To avoid the possibility that such factors as wealth might be included, he suggested, instead, the words “on the basis of personal capabilities and knowledge.”

THE CHAIRMAN, supported by MR. CASSIN (France) and MR. CHANG (China) stated that the words “on the basis of merit” represented precisely the safeguard sought by Mr. Pavlov. They excluded such factors as wealth, personal or political favour, and ensured that higher education would be open to those who had the ability to receive it.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) accepted the suggestion of MR. LEBEAU (Belgium) that the Russian text might contain the very words proposed by Mr. Pavlov himself, as an equivalent for the English “on the basis of merit”.

The phrase “and equal access on the basis of merit to higher education” was approved unanimously.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) proposed the addition of the following sentence: “Access to education shall be without distinction as to race, sex, language, religion, social standing, financial means or political affiliation.”

THE CHAIRMAN, speaking as the representative of the United States, remarked that the USSR amendment seemed unnecessary, as injunctions against discrimination appeared in a separate article devoted to that subject. If the USSR amendment were adopted, the same addition would logically have to be made in a number of other articles.

MR. DE J. QUIJANO (Panama) stated that he would vote for the USSR amendment, as the same idea was contained in the draft of Article 27 which he had submitted.

[9]

The USSR amendment was rejected by eight votes to five, with two abstentions.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) remarked that his delegation had voted against the inclusion of the word “compulsory”, lest it be interpreted as making it imperative for children to be sent to schools designated by the State. Now that the word had been approved, the Lebanese amendment was all the more necessary; it was designed to guarantee the right of the family to determine the education of its children, but not to prevent such education. He proposed two versions of the amendment; while he himself preferred the first, he would be content with the milder second one. The versions were as follows:

1. “Parents have the primary right to determine the education of their children.”
2. “This does not exclude the right of parents to determine the education of their children.”

MISS SCHAEFER (International Union of Catholic Women’s Leagues) appealed to the Commission to adopt the first of the two versions submitted by the Lebanese representative. The inclusion in the article of the word “compulsory” introduced an element of obligation by the State which might be misinterpreted. While the State should guarantee education to children, the primary responsibility for that education and the right to determine it rested with the parents. She urged the Commission to recognize that right and to state it in the Declaration of Human Rights.

THE CHAIRMAN said that, in her understanding, it was the general view of the Commission that acceptance of the word “compulsory” in no way put in doubt the right of a family to choose the school which its children should attend.

Speaking as the United States representative, she said that she considered the Lebanese amendment unwise. The obligation of the State to provide free and compulsory education meant that children had to attend school, [10] but not necessarily the school provided by the State. While the latter was distinctly obligated to provide schools for all children without distinction, the choice of the school was left to the parents.

In the United States there was a difference of opinion on what should be provided by the State to non-public schools; the limits were extremely difficult to define. The Lebanese amendment might well give rise to an endless discussion in which she urged the Commission not to engage.

MR. KLEKOVKIN (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) agreed with the Chairman that the word “compulsory” did not exclude the right of the family to choose the school to which its children would go. The Lebanese amendment was therefore not necessary in the first paragraph of Article 27. It might possibly be discussed in connection with the second paragraph.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) thanked the Chairman and the Ukrainian representative for their interpretation of the text approved by the Commission.

As that text did not deprive parents of the right to choose the school to be attended by the children, there was no objection of substance to the Lebanese amendment, which was intended to safeguard that right by stating it explicitly. In spite of the explanations and interpretations given at the present meeting, it was not excluded that a State might understand the word “compulsory” as depriving the parents of the right to choose their children’s school.

He consequently urged the Commission to adopt his amendment in a still milder version, repeating, in fact, the very words used by the Ukrainian representative: “This does not exclude the right of the family to choose the school to which its children will go.”

MR. LEBEAU (Belgium) shared the view of the Lebanese representative that it was important, in the Declaration of Human Rights, to state explicitly [11] a basic right of parents. While he preferred the second version of the Lebanese amendment, because it was stated in more general terms, he was prepared to vote in favour of the third.

MR. FONTAINA (Uruguay) and MRS. MEHTA (India) observed that the Lebanese amendment represented an unnecessary repetition; they could not support it.

MR. KLEKOVKIN (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) repeated that he was willing to consider the Lebanese amendment as a possible addition to the second paragraph of Article 27, but not to the first. The Lebanese amendment, in its final version, was rejected by ten votes to three, with one abstention.

THE CHAIRMAN stated that the second paragraph of Article 28, as proposed by the drafting sub-committee, read as follows: “Education shall be directed to the full development of the human personality, to the strengthening of respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms and to the promotion of international good will.” To that text there was a USSR amendment, re-introducing a portion of the text approved by the Commission at its second session.

MR. FONTAINA (Uruguay) suggested that the words “compulsory and shall be” should be inserted before the word “directed”. The second paragraph was intended to show what direction the education mentioned in the first paragraph should take; it was necessary for that education to be compulsory.

MR. CHANG (China) pointed out that in the first paragraph the word “compulsory” referred only to elementary and fundamental education. He did not think it should be used in a paragraph which applied also to higher education.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) agreed with the Chinese representative. He questioned the practical possibility of making higher education compulsory at the present time.

[12]

The Uruguayan amendment was rejected by five votes to three, with seven abstentions.

MRS. MEHTA (India) stated that she would have to abstain from voting on the second paragraph of Article 27. She did not think the type of education to be provided should be defined.

MR. INGLES (Philippines) wished to express the views of his delegation on the proposed second paragraph, which did not differ substantially from the draft approved at the second session. The Philippine delegation felt that it was necessary not only to sanction the right to education, but to outline the objectives of that education. If the determination of the objectives were left entirely to Governments, there was a danger that some of them might pursue anti-social aims. He supported the draft proposed by the drafting sub-committee; in his opinion, the addition of the words "promotion of international good-will" was a sufficient substitute for the previously approved phrase, "combating of the spirit of intolerance and hatred against other nations or racial or religious groups everywhere", which the USSR representative wished to reinstate.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom), supported by Mr. Jockel (Australia) requested that consideration of the second paragraph might be postponed until the Secretariat could prepare and distribute to delegations a copy of the proposed text.

The Commission approved Mr. Wilson's request by eight votes to four, with two abstentions.

The Commission decided, by six votes to four, with three abstentions, to rise the following afternoon at 3.30 p.m. in order to enable its committees to meet.

The meeting rose at 5:50 p.m.

E/CN.4/125

11 June 1948

Original Text: French

France: Amendment to Article 30 of the Draft International Declaration on Human Rights (Document E/CN.4/95)

Add this second paragraph to Article 30:

"Everyone is also entitled to the protection of his moral and material interests relating to the inventions of any literary, scientific or artistic work of which he is the author."

The previous French amendment on this subject is withdrawn.

E/CN.4/126

11 June 1948

Original Text: French, English

France: Amendment to Article 30 of the Draft International Declaration of Human Rights

Insert the words “in scientific research” between the words “share” and “in the benefits”.

E/CN.4/127

11 June 1948

Report of the Sub-Committee Consisting of the Representatives of France, India and the United Kingdom on Articles 25–26 of the Draft International Declaration on Human Rights

1. Everyone has the right to social security. This includes the right to a standard of living and social services adequate for the health and wellbeing of himself and his family and to security in the event of (against the consequences of) unemployment, sickness, disability, old age or other lack of livelihood in circumstances beyond his control.

2. Mother and child have the right to special care and assistance.

Note: The Drafting Committee, in proposing the above text, recommends that a preliminary vote should be taken as to whether the words “against the consequences of” (proposed by France) should be substituted for “in the event of” (proposed by the United Kingdom).

E/CN.4/129

11 June 1948

Suggestions for a Preamble to the Draft International Declaration on Human Rights

(Submitted by the American Federation of Labor)

Whereas indifference toward the happiness and the welfare of the individual in any part of the world makes possible the spreading of suffering and of conflict between peoples;

Whereas it is obvious that international co-operation can be effective for the peace of the world only when based on the respect for the human person;

Whereas it is the purpose of the United Nations to assist the people of the world in obtaining freedom from fear, freedom from want, freedom of thought and religion and freedom of speech and of the press.

This Declaration of Human Rights sets down the basic principles which all Nations, members of the United Nations, pledge themselves to respect in their relations with their own nationals as well as internationally.

E/CN.4/SR.69

11 June 1948<sup>124</sup>

Summary Record of the Sixty-Ninth Meeting
[of the Commission on Human Rights]

Lake Success, New York, on Friday,

11 June 1948, at 11 a.m.

Chairman: Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, United States of America. Rapporteur: Mr. Malik, Lebanon. Members: Mr. Gordon-Jockel, Australia; Mr. Steyaert, Belgium; Mr. Stepanenko, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic; Mr. Larrain, Chile; Mr. Chang, China; Mr. Loutfi, Egypt; Mr. Cassin, France; Mrs. Mehta, India; Mr. Quijano, Panama; Mr. Ingles, Philippines; Mr. Klekovkin, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic; Mr. Pavlov, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics; Mr. Wilson, United Kingdom; Mr. Fontaina, Uruguay; Mr. Vilfan, Yugoslavia. Also Present: Mrs. Ledon, Commission on the Status of Women. Specialized Agencies: Mr. Metall, International Labour Organization; Mr. Lebar, United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization. [2] Non-Governmental Organizations: Miss Sender, American Federation of Labor; Mr. van Istendael, International Federation of Christian Trade Unions; Miss Stuart, World Federation of United Nations Associations; Miss Drennan, Catholic International Union for Social Services; Mr. Nolde and Mr. Prentice, Commission of the Churches on International Affairs; Mr. Moskowitz, Consultative Council of Jewish Organizations; Mrs. Van den Berg, International Alliance of Women; Mrs. Parsons, International Council of Women; Miss Schaefer, International Union of Catholic Women's Leagues; Miss Robb, Liaison Committee of Women's International Organizations; Mr. Bienenfeld, World Jewish Congress. Secretariat: Mr. Humphrey, Director, Division of Human Rights; Mr. Lawson, Secretary of the Commission.

Continuation of the Consideration of Articles 27 and 28
of the Declaration on Human Rights

THE CHAIRMAN said that the Commission had before it a draft submitted by the Drafting Sub-Committee suggesting the addition to article 27 of a paragraph 2 as follows:

<sup>124</sup> This was the date of the meeting. The document was issued on 25 June 1948.

“Education shall be directed to the full development of the human personality, to the strengthening of respect for human rights and fundamental freedom and to the promotion of international goodwill.”

There was also an amendment proposed by the Soviet Union to add the following at the end of the second paragraph:

“. . . and to the combatting of the spirit of the intolerance and hatred against other nations or racial or religious groups everywhere.”

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that it would be best first to take a vote on the USSR amendment, since his delegation’s attitude to paragraph 2 would depend on the Commission’s decisions on the USSR amendment.

[3]

The experience of the World War, which had been a war of the democratic countries against the Fascist countries, made certain conclusions evident. Different conceptions of the aims of education might have been and might still be put forward in the Commission. But it was for the Commission to draw up a text acceptable to all the members of the United Nations, based on the principles of the Charter and the experience gained during the war.

The program prepared by the Drafting Sub-Committee was quite positive and acceptable. But education also had a political side which it was essential to stress, if it was to be an effective instrument for peace. The State should assume responsibility for the political education of its people, so as to lead it towards peace, condemning any attempts at a revival of Fascism. Under the USSR constitution anti-Semitism and racial and religious hatred was considered as a crime. How could the prohibition of propaganda of hatred or intolerance be considered an intolerable restriction of the democratic freedoms? He recalled the disastrous results of the education given the German youth by the Nazis. The education of young people in a spirit of hatred and intolerance had been one of the fundamental factors in the development of Nazism and Fascism. It should be made impossible for young people to be brought up in a spirit of hatred. There were certain circles in New York where one could see the development of a new racial theory which alleged the superiority of the Anglo-Saxon race. The origins of that theory could be traced to Mr. Churchill’s speech at Fulton.<sup>125</sup> One could read in certain organs of the press articles on the number of atomic bombs required to destroy particular towns, or of scientific discoveries capable of poisoning millions of human beings. All such propaganda became extremely dangerous the moment it affected the education of young people. He, therefore, called on the Commission to accept the [4] USSR amendment, the purpose of which was to promote the education of people who would combat hatred and would work for a new international understanding.

<sup>125</sup> In an address delivered at Fulton, Missouri, on 5 March 1946, at Westminster College, Winston Churchill said: “From Stettin in the Baltic to Trieste in the Adriatic an iron curtain has descended across the Continent.” He had used the term “iron curtain” earlier, in a 12 May 1945 letter to United States President Truman, and in the House of Commons on 16 August 1945.

THE CHAIRMAN, speaking as United States representative, pointed out that it would be difficult to assert that the United States upheld racial theories favouring the Anglo-Saxon race, since its population was made up of groups which differed so much that any racial theory would be devoid of any basis. It was true that the United States published, perhaps even too often, information about its scientific discoveries, while the government of the Soviet Union was rigorously silent on similar research in the Soviet Union. What was published was certainly no more of a threat to the peace than what was kept secret.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) agreed with the Chairman. The United Kingdom text which was meant to replace articles 27 and 28 actually amounted to the complete deletion of article 28. That proposal was still before the Commission and, as it was the earliest, it should be the first to be put to the vote. He thought it dangerous to try to summarize in three or four lines all the theories on the aims of education.

MR. KLEKOVKIN (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) could not see how an article, which simply stated the need for respecting all human rights and for developing international goodwill to prevent any kind of hatred, could be dangerous. He agreed with Mr. Pavlov's statement on the danger of a racial theory favouring the Anglo-Saxon race. As far as the publishing of scientific discoveries was concerned, it was not a question of publicity or the lack of publicity, but of the way in which such publications were used in the education of young people. When the press mentioned that, thanks to new scientific discoveries the cities of the [5] Soviet Union could be bombed, it was clear that, if that was how these discoveries were explained in the schools, it amounted to war propaganda. There was no such propaganda in the Soviet Union against the United States. A refusal to accept the USSR amendment would, in his opinion, amount to an admission that it was intended, under the guise of free education, to teach that war was necessary and to prepare young people for such a war. The Soviet Union intended to fight for peace everywhere and always, and that was why his delegation asked that the amendment be adopted.

MR. CHANG (China) recalled that the Commission had discussed the question of education at length at its last meeting, and that it was essential that the declaration should not be silent on that point. Paragraph 2, as re-drafted by the Drafting Sub-Committee, appeared to him to express adequately the aim which positive education should pursue.

MR. CASSIN (France) asked whether the deletion of article 26 proposed by the United Kingdom also entailed the deletion of paragraph 2 proposed for article 27 by the Drafting Sub-Committee.

THE CHAIRMAN replied that the United Kingdom proposal to delete article 28 also applied to paragraph 2 proposed by the Drafting Sub-Committee, as that paragraph merely brought up certain points of article 28.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) thought that the Commission should not consider the Indian and United Kingdom proposal on article 28 until it had completed the discussion of article 27. He therefore suggested that the Commission begin by taking a vote on the USSR amendment to paragraph 2 of article 27.

[6]

MR. CHANG (China) suggested that the United Kingdom representative should modify his proposal by applying it not only to article 26, but to the whole of paragraph 2 of article 27, since that paragraph embodied the ideas contained in article 28.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) pointed out that the Commission was working on the Drafting Sub-Committee's original text. It had adopted a new text for article 27. There were three proposals regarding article 28: (1) to replace it by the Drafting Sub-Committee's text; (2) the USSR proposal; (3) to delete the whole of the article.

THE CHAIRMAN, referring to the procedure which had been followed with regard to the discussion of article 27, recalled that it had been decided to examine that article first with the understanding that articles 27 and 26 might be merged into a single article. After several proposals had been received, a sub-committee had been appointed and, in view of the Commission's wish to merge the two articles, it had suggested that a new version of article 26 should be included as a second paragraph in article 27. The ideas contained in article 26 were therefore produced in the second paragraph of article 27. The Commission, however, was still seized of a proposal to delete article 26. Only if that proposal were rejected would the Commission examine the Sub-Committee's text and decide whether it should be included as a second paragraph in article 27 or form a separate article 23.

MR. STEPANENKO (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) supported Mr. Pavlov's suggestion that paragraph 2 of article 27 should be examined before the question of whether or not it was necessary to retain article 28.

[7]

THE CHAIRMAN remarked that such a procedure was impossible since article 28 was incorporated in paragraph 2 proposed for insertion in article 27 by the Sub-Committee.

MR. CASSIN (France) stressed that the correct procedure was to decide in the first place whether the Commission wished to add the definition of the principles of education to article 27. If that were the case, the Commission should then proceed to establish such a definition, and lastly to decide where it should be placed. If a vote on the deletion of article 28 were taken, some members might be compelled to vote against their own opinion.

MR. KLEKOVKIN (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) supported the remarks made by Mr. Stepanenko.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) suggested that, in view of the course the discussion had taken, it might avoid misunderstanding if a vote were first taken on the deletion of the second paragraph of article 27 as drafted by the Sub-Committee and then on the deletion of article 28.

MR. KLEKOVKIN (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) observed that the simplest procedure would be to vote on paragraph 2 separately. As the United Kingdom representative wished to have that paragraph deleted, he could vote against its insertion.

THE CHAIRMAN proposed that the deletion of paragraph 2 of article 27 should be put to the vote first, being the one furthest removed from the original proposal.

The Chairman's proposal was adopted by 11 votes to 3, with 1 abstention.

[8]

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the deletion of paragraph 2 of article 27.

The proposal was rejected by 10 votes to 5.

MR. QUIJANO (Panama) announced that he would vote against the USSR amendment not because he disagreed with it in principle but because he thought that the adoption of that amendment would amount to interference in domestic jurisdiction.

The amendment submitted by the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics was adopted by 6 votes to 5 with 4 abstentions.

MR. CHANG (China) proposed the deletion of the words: "and foster international understanding", in order to avoid two repetitions of the same idea in a single paragraph.

It was decided to retain the words: "and foster international understanding" by 4 votes to 4, with 5 abstentions.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) proposed the following wording:

"The aim of education is the full development of the human personality. Such development demands the strengthening of respect."

MR. CASSIN (France) accepted Mr. Malik's proposal but suggested that the second sentence should read as follows: "Such education should strengthen respect . . ."

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) withdrew his proposal.

MR. FONTAINA (Uruguay) was in agreement with the substance of the paragraph but stated that he would vote against its adoption for grammatical reasons.

[9]

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the first part of paragraph 2 as far as the words "... fundamental freedoms".

*The first part of paragraph 2 was adopted by 13 votes to none, with 2 abstentions.
Paragraph 2 as a whole was rejected by 7 votes to 5, with 2 abstentions.*

MR. CHANG (China) proposed the following text:

"Education shall be directed to the full development of the human personality, to the strengthening of respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms and to the promotion of international goodwill."

MR. VILFAN (Yugoslavia) suggested that the following phrase should be added to the text proposed by the Chinese representative:

"and to the combatting of the spirit of intolerance and hatred against the nations or racial or religious groups."

The amendment proposed by the representative of Yugoslavia was adopted by 6 votes to 4, with 3 abstentions.

The text submitted by the representative of China was adopted in its amended form by 7 votes to 5, with 2 abstentions.

Article 27 as a whole was adopted by 7 votes to 4, with 3 abstentions.

Article 28

It was decided to delete Article 28 by 11 votes to 1, with 3 abstentions.

[10]

Article 29

THE CHAIRMAN recalled that the following drafts had been placed before the Commission; the draft adopted at the Commission's second session, a French proposal to merge articles 29 and 30, and a United Kingdom-India proposal to delete paragraph 2 of article 29.

Speaking as the representative of the United States of America, the Chairman announced that she would support the United Kingdom-India proposal, since paragraph 1 contained by implication the provisions of paragraph 2. She added that she thought it preferable to discuss articles 29 and 30 separately.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) did not think there was anything in common between articles 29 and 30, and felt that they should be examined separately. Furthermore, he thought that there was a marked difference between the two paragraphs of article 29; paragraph 2 dealt with vacations with pay which were not mentioned in paragraph 1. Suppressing the second paragraph would be tantamount to depriving the workers of their vacations. He was opposed, therefore, to the deletion of the reference to vacations with pay from the Declaration.

Moreover, limitations on working hours was an important point, for a worker could not possibly enjoy his leisure if he worked 12 hours or more a day.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the Declaration had no juridical value. Consequently, mentioning that right in the Declaration was a meaningless gesture. In the United States it was recognized by law and, in the majority of cases, established by collective contracts. Mentioning it in the Declaration would be tantamount to expressing a pious wish, without any legal guarantee whatever, and would do more harm than good.

[11]

MR. CASSIN (France) noted that there was no objection to the first paragraph. As regards the provisions of the second paragraph, it was not the first time that objections of that kind had been raised. If there had to be a general article on the implementation of all economic and social rights, he saw no objection to the deletion of the second paragraph of article 29.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) pointed out, in connexion with the Chairman's argument, that the same objection could be raised against all the articles of the Declaration. If that argument therefore stood, it was useless to go on with the drafting of the Declaration. He thought that the Declaration would derive its value from the moral strength and authority of the United Nations. The workers' right to rest should, therefore, be written into the Declaration.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) agreed with the Chairman and pointed out that the substance of article 29 was largely covered by article 23. Furthermore the Declaration was a statement of principles and there was no reason why it should describe the implementation of various rights. Such implementation usually varied according to the country.

MISS SENDER (American Federation of Labor) preferred the existing wording of article 29 but did not object to its deletion if there had to be a general article on all economic and social rights.

MR. FONTAINA (Uruguay) pointed out that, in the text adopted at Bogotá, one article alone – article 13 – contained all the substance of articles 28, 29 and 30 of the Declaration. Every State was left to decide how it should implement the [12] provisions of the article. He thought that that was a logical method.

Replying to a question asked by the Chairman, he said that he had only tried to show how the Declaration could be implemented, that is to say by confining itself to a statement of the rights in question.

MR. STEPANENKO (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) thought that the aim of the Indian-United Kingdom proposal was to express a pious wish; the workers would gain nothing unless the Declaration stated how the implementation of that right was to be ensured. Workers would not be able to afford vacations unless there was a provision for vacations with pay. In addition to receiving vacations with pay, workers in the Byelorussian SSR also had their travelling expenses paid.

He did not think that the Commission would succeed in drafting an article on all social and economic rights. It would be more logical, therefore, to retain the second paragraph of article 29. That would enable any worker reading the text to understand the question immediately.

The meeting rose at 1:10 p.m.

E/CN.4/SR.70
11 June 1948<sup>126</sup>

Summary Record of the Seventieth Meeting
[of the Commission on Human Rights]

Held at Lake Success, New York, on Friday,
11 June 1948, at 2:30 p.m.

Chairman: Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, United States of America. Rapporteur: Mr. Charles Malik, Lebanon. Members: Mr. J. D. L. Hood, Australia; Mr. R. Lebeau, Belgium; Mr. A. S. Stepanenko, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic; Mr. G. Larrain, Chile; Mr. P. C. Chang, China; Mr. Omar Loutfi, Egypt; Mr. René Cassin, France; Mrs. Hansa Mehta, India; Mr. M. de J. Quijano, Panama; Mr. Jose D. Ingles, Philippines; Mr. M. Klekovkin, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic; Mr. A. P. Pavlov, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics; Mr. G. Wilson, United Kingdom; Mr. R. Fontaina, Uruguay; Mr. Josa Vilfan, Yugoslavia. Also Present: Mrs. Amalia Ledon, Commission on the Status of Women. [2] Representatives of Specialized Agencies: Mr. R. A. Metall, International Labour Organization (ILO); Mr. Pierre Lebar, United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO). Consultants of Non-Governmental Organizations: Miss Toni Sender, American Federation of Labor; Mr. A. J. van Istendael, International Federation of Christian Trade Unions (IFCTU); Miss J. H. Drennan, Catholic International Union for Social Service; Mr. Sartell Prentice, Jr., Commission of the Churches on International Affairs; Mr. Barnett Janner, Co-ordinating Board of Jewish Organizations for Consultation with the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations; Mrs. W. B. Parsons, International Council of Women; Mrs. M. B. Vandenberg, International Alliance of

<sup>126</sup> This was the date of the meeting. The document was issued on 21 June 1948.

Women; Miss Catherine Schaeffer, International Union of Catholic Women's Leagues; Mr. F. R. Bienenfeld and Mr. Stephen D. Wolkowicz, World Jewish Congress.

[3]

Continuation of Consideration of the Draft International Declaration on Human Rights (Document E/CN.4/95)

Article 29

THE CHAIRMAN read a statement submitted by the representative of the International Federation of Christian Trade Unions supporting the French position on paragraph 2 of Article 29 and the statement of the AF of L representative. The Federation favoured both the content and the spirit of the Article. It considered that its implementation on the international level was the responsibility of ILO, while on the national level it should be implemented by both the legislatures and the trade unions. The Federation however made its acceptance of the Article dependent on the adoption of an article covering the whole social and economic field.

MR. LOUTFI (Egypt) supported the joint India-United Kingdom amendment suggesting the deletion of paragraph 2. He considered that the statement of principle contained in paragraph 1 was sufficient and did not need further elaboration.

MR. VILFAN (Yugoslavia) favoured retention of paragraph 2. He was ready to accept the "umbrella article" proposed by the French representative but thought that a decision on that point should be reached only after examining all the social, economic and cultural rights. In its present form the paragraph did not adequately cover the field. It was not enough to speak of "limitation of working hours" or of "periodic vacations with pay" since it might be argued that that requirement could be met for instance by giving workers a free Sunday. The Declaration should lay down the principle towards the realization of which international development should be directed.

THE CHAIRMAN put paragraph 1 of Article 29 to the vote.

Paragraph 1 of Article 29 was unanimously adopted.

[4]

In answer to a question by MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics), the Chairman explained that the India-United Kingdom amendment proposed the deletion of paragraph 2 of Article 29.

MR. STEPANENKO (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) pointed out that since paragraph 2 contained an important principle the Commission would place itself in the strange position of voting against it if it adopted deletion of the paragraph.

THE CHAIRMAN stressed that no question of opposing the principle was involved. It was merely a matter of deciding whether it should be inserted in the Declaration at that point.

The India-United Kingdom proposal to delete paragraph 2 of Article 29 was adopted by 9 votes to 6.

Consideration of Article 30

MR. CASSIN (France) introduced his amendment suggesting the insertion of the words “in scientific research and” between the words “share” and “in the benefits”. In answer to questions and suggestions by MR. MALIK (Lebanon), MR. LEBEAU (Belgium), the Chairman and MR. CHANG (China), the French representative explained that cultural life included science but that he wished to lay particular stress on the participation of even uneducated persons in scientific progress.

MR. CHANG (China) proposed the replacement of the last part of the sentence after “share” by “in scientific advancement” and recalled that the phrase was derived from Bacon.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) favoured the article because it emphasized the right of “everyone” to participate in cultural life. The benefits of science were not the property of a chosen few but the heritage of the people. He stressed that the task of science [5] was to work for the advancement of peaceful aims and to make human life better. In the USSR science and culture belonged to all and tremendous progress had been achieved in making the benefits of culture accessible to broadest masses.

After MR. CHANG (China) had drawn the Commission’s attention to the fact that the time originally set aside for the plenary meeting of the Commission had elapsed, MR. CASSIN (France) moved that the discussion should be continued until a decision on the Article could be reached.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) seconded the motion of the French representative.

It was decided by 11 to 1 to continue consideration of the Article.

THE CHAIRMAN requested the members to limit their remarks to the issues presented by the Article and not to introduce extraneous matter.

In answer to MR. STEPANENKO (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic), who had pointed out that the USSR representative had not finished his observations, she said that Mr. Pavlov had been making a general statement not directly linked with the Article under consideration.

MR. CHANG (China) maintained that his amendment was furthest removed from the original text and consequently should be voted first.

MR. CASSIN (France) withdrew his own amendment and supported the Chinese proposal.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) submitted the following amendment:

[6]

“In the advancement of science which should serve the interests of the progress of mankind, the cause of peace, and co-operation amongst peoples”.

THE CHAIRMAN put the USSR amendment to the vote as furthest removed from the original draft.

The USSR amendment was rejected by 9 votes to 4, with 3 abstentions.

After a short discussion the Chinese amendment was adopted by 8 votes to 3, with 5 abstentions.

MR. CASSIN (France) proposed the addition of a second paragraph to Article 30. The paragraph in question would read:

“Everyone is also entitled to the protection of the moral and material interests relating to the inventions or any literary, scientific or artistic work of which he is the author.”

He stated that the Bogotá Conference had adopted a similar provision.

MRS. MEHTA (India) considered that article 14 of the Declaration made sufficient provisions for the problem at issue. She would oppose the inclusion of a separate Article which would single out only a section of the people.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) shared the view of the Indian representative. He felt that no special category of people should be singled out because this might lead to the necessity of mentioning other groups.

MR. LARRAIN (Chile) strongly supported the French proposal and was gratified that it was based on the Bogotá Declaration.

MR. FONTAINA (Uruguay) favoured the French proposal and associated himself with the representative of Chile. He disagreed with the views of the Indian and United Kingdom representatives and pointed [7] out that the Declaration of Human Rights had made provisions for the right of other groups but had left intellectual workers without protection.

THE CHAIRMAN, speaking as the representative of the United States of America, pointed out that the United Nations Declaration was shorter than that adopted at Bogotá. The latter document dealt with copyright which was a problem of international law. She opposed inclusion of the French amendment.

The French amendment was rejected by 6 votes to 5, with 5 abstentions.

Consideration of Draft Articles 25/26 Prepared by the Drafting Sub-Committee (Document E/CN.4/127)

THE CHAIRMAN read the following new draft for Articles 25/26 prepared by the Drafting Sub-Committee:

“1. Everyone has the right to social security. This includes the right to a standard of living and social services adequate for the health and wellbeing of himself and his family and to security in the event of (against the consequences of) unemployment, sickness, disability, old age or other lack of livelihood in circumstances beyond his control.

“2. Mother and child have the right to special care and assistance.”

She pointed out that the Drafting Sub-Committee in proposing that text, had recommended that a preliminary vote should be taken as to whether the words “against the consequences of” (proposed by the representative of France) should be substituted for “in the event of” (proposed by the representative of the United Kingdom).

[8]

MR. CASSIN (France) said the words “against the consequences of” appeared in the text adopted at the second session of the Commission and also in the Bogotá Convention. He felt they were more appropriate than the words “in the event of”.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) replying to a question raised by MR. MALIK (Lebanon), said his delegation had proposed the words “in the event of unemployment, sickness etc.” because one of the consequences of sickness or old age, for instance, might well be death, and no one could be assured security against such a possibility.

THE CHAIRMAN, speaking as the representative of the United States of America, said her delegation supported the words “in the event of” as there were many consequences of sickness, disability etc. against which the individual could not possibly be protected.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said he had compared the texts of Articles 25 and 26 in the draft adopted at the second session of the Commission with the new text proposed by the Drafting Sub-Committee, and considered that the latter was not an improvement. All reference to housing and medical assistance had been deleted. He asked for clarification of the word “security” as used in the text.

THE CHAIRMAN considered that the words “everyone has the right to social security”, which appeared in the new draft, meant that everyone had a right to a standard of living and social services adequate for the health and wellbeing of himself and family.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) supported the Chairman's remarks. The Drafting Sub-Committee had not deleted reference to medical assistance and housing – those services were included in the broad terms used in the new text.

[9]

The term “security” meant security against unemployment, etc. To use the term “social security” would be a mistake because in the United Kingdom, for example, the meaning of that term went far beyond that of the word “security”.

MR. METALL (International Labour Organization), referring to the new text of Articles 25/26, felt the Commission was placing a new definition on the words “social security” and giving it the same meaning as the right to a standard of living and adequate social services etc. He suggested that the phrase “security in the event of” should be redrafted to read “protection in the event of”.

The word “sickness” should either be deleted, as sickness was a form of disability, or the word “disability” changed to read “invalidity”. He suggested that the first paragraph of Articles 25/26 should be redrafted to read:

“Everyone has the right to a standard of living, and to social services adequate for the health and wellbeing of himself and family, and to social security including protection in the event of unemployment, sickness, invalidity, old age and the loss of livelihood in circumstances beyond his control.”

THE CHAIRMAN felt that it would be unwise for the Commission to use the term “social security” in a different sense from that in which it was used by the International Labour Organization. The term “disability” might be used to cover both sickness and invalidity, and in that connection she supported the text adopted at the second session of the Commission.

[10]

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) pointed out that sickness in itself did not always result in disability. He doubted the value of the amendment suggested.

MR. HOOD (Australia), referring to an ambiguity in the English text of Articles 25/26 prepared by the Drafting Sub-Committee, suggested that the word “to” should be inserted in the second line before the words “social services”.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) said Articles 25/26 should be drafted in such a way as to leave no doubt that sick people who could still work were also entitled to security.

MR. CASSIN (France) supported the amendment suggested by the representative of the International Labour Office, provided that it was divided into two sections as follows:

“(1) Everyone has the right to a standard of living and to social services adequate for the health and wellbeing of himself and his family.

“(2) Everyone has the right to social security including protection in cases of unemployment, sickness, invalidity, etc.”

THE CHAIRMAN suggested that the term “loss of livelihood” should be changed to read “lack of livelihood” in order to cover the case of children.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) considered that the last part of the amendment should be redrafted to read: “sickness, disability, old age or other lack of livelihood, in circumstances beyond his control.”

[11]

THE CHAIRMAN, replying to MR. MALIK (Lebanon), said the clause “adequate for the health and wellbeing of himself and his family” covered both the right to a standard of living and the right to social services.

MR. METALL (International Labour Organization), replying to MR. WILSON (United Kingdom), who questioned the use of the words “social security”, said that he considered those words had too wide a definition only when they appeared at the beginning of the paragraph. As they at present appeared in the middle of the paragraph they covered what was simply a fact in the legislation of most countries. The Declaration was not defining social security, it was merely saying what should be provided under social security.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) considered that Articles 25/26 should contain some mention of social insurance.

MR. METALL (International Labour Office) pointed out that the words “social security” as used in the draft text of Articles 25/26 included all measures of social insurance.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) emphasized the fact that it might be dangerous to use the term “social security” as it did not mean the same thing in all countries. The insertion of those words in the middle of paragraph 1 of Articles 25/26 did not improve the text, and he would therefore vote against their inclusion.

MR. LEBEAU (Belgium) supported the amendment suggested by the representative of the International Labour Office.

MR. CASSIN (France) considered that the words “social security” should be retained. The Commission would not be carrying out its task in a proper manner if those words were omitted from the Declaration.

[12]

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) reiterated his previous remarks regarding Articles 25/26, and suggested that the amended text proposed by the representative of the ILO should be circulated in writing.

After a brief discussion, in which the Chairman and the representatives of Uruguay, Belgium, Yugoslavia, and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics took part, the last-named formally moved, under rule 52 of the rules of procedure, the adjournment of the debate on the amended text for Articles 25/26 submitted by the representative of the International Labour Organization.

MR. VILFAN (Yugoslavia) supported the proposal of the USSR representative.

THE CHAIRMAN said the discussion of the draft text submitted by the representative of the International Labour Organization would be adjourned until Monday morning, 14 June.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) having proposed that the Commission should take up the discussion of Article 31, the Chairman asked members of the Commission to vote on whether they wished to continue the discussion of the “umbrella” clause or of Article 31 or to adjourn immediately in order that the sub-committees might meet.

The Commission decided to adjourn by ten votes to none, with six abstentions.

The meeting rose at 5:15 p.m.

E/CN.4/131

14 June 1948

Original Text: Russian

Union of Soviet Socialist Republics: Proposal for Articles 25 and 26 of the Draft International Declaration of Human Rights

1. Everyone has the right to social security and to a standard of living adequate to the maintenance of his own welfare and health as well as those of his family and, in particular, the right to material security in case of unemployment, sickness, disability, old age or the loss of means of subsistence for reasons beyond his control and, if he is employed, the right to social insurance at the expense of the State or of his employers, in accordance with the legislation of each country.

2. Everyone has the right to medical care and the help of physicians in case of illness.

3. Everyone has the right to housing fit for a human being. The State and society shall take all necessary steps including legislation, to ensure that every person has a real opportunity of enjoying all these rights.

E/CN.4/132

14 June 1948

Lebanon: Suggested Preamble for the Draft International Declaration on Human Rights

Whereas recognition of the inherent dignity and the equal and inalienable rights of all persons is the foundation of peace, freedom and justice in the world, and

Whereas ignorance and contempt for human rights have before and during the last world war resulted in barbarous acts which outraged the conscience of mankind, and

Whereas the opening lines of the Charter reaffirm faith in fundamental human rights, in the dignity and worth of the human person and in the equal rights of men and women, and

Whereas it is a purpose of the United Nations to achieve international co-operation in promoting and encouraging respect for human rights and for fundamental freedoms for all, and

Whereas this purpose can be attained only on the basis of a common understanding of the nature of these rights and freedoms,

Now therefore the General Assembly recognizes in the following solemn Declaration the essential rights and freedoms which, constituting the dignity and worth of the human person, should form a common standard of achievement for all nations, and calls upon every individual and every organ of society, national and international, to strive by teaching and education to promote their respect and by progressive measures to secure their universal recognition and observance.

E/CN.4/133

14 June 1948

United States of America: Suggestion for New Article of the Draft International Declaration on Human Rights

Every person, as a member of society, has the economic, social and cultural rights enumerated below, and is entitled to their realization, through national effort and international co-operation, in accordance with the social system and economic and political organization in each State.

E/CN.4/135

14 June 1948

Original Text: Russian

Union of Soviet Socialist Republics: Substitute for New Article of the Draft International Declaration on Human Rights

It is the duty of the State and of society to take all the necessary measures, including legislative measures, to ensure for every individual a real opportunity to enjoy the rights mentioned in the present Declaration.

In view of the special importance of the economic, social and cultural rights enumerated in Articles 23–30 of the present Declaration, and, in particular, of the right to social security, it is considered desirable that they be implemented by means of both national efforts and international co-operation, due consideration being given to the social, economic and political organization and resources of each State.

E/CN.4/SR.71

14 June 1948<sup>127</sup>

Original Text: French

Summary Record of the Seventy-First Meeting [of the Commission on Human Rights]

Held at Lake Success, New York, on Monday,
14 June 1948, at 10:30 a.m.

Chairman: Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, United States of America. Rapporteur: Mr. Charles Malik, Lebanon. Members: Mr. Hood, Australia; Mr. Steyaert, Belgium; Mr. Stepanenko, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic; Mr. Larrain, Chile; Mr. Chang, China; Mr. Loutfi, Egypt; Mr. Cassin, France; Mrs. Mehta, India; Mr. Quijano, Panama; Mr. Ingles, Philippines; Mr. Klekovkin, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic; Mr. Pavlov, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics; Mr. Wilson, United Kingdom; Mr. Fontaina, Uruguay; Mr. Vilfan, Yugoslavia. Also Present: Mrs. Ledon, Commission on the Status of Women. Representatives of specialized agencies: Mr. Metall, International Labour Organization (ILO); Mr. Lebar, United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO). Observer from inter-governmental organization: Mr. Stone, Preparatory Commission of the International Refugee Organization (IRO). [2] Consultants from non-governmental organizations: Miss Sender, American Federation of Labor; Mr. van Istendael, International Federation of Christian Trade Unions (IFCTU); Mr. Rubinow, World Federation of United Nations Associations;

<sup>127</sup> This was the date of the meeting. The document was issued on 28 June 1948.

Mrs. Drennan, Catholic International Union for Social Service; Mr. Nolde and Mr. Prentice, Commission of the Churches on International Affairs; Mrs. Van den Berg, International Alliance of Women; Miss Schaffer, International Union of Catholic Women's Leagues; Miss Robb, Liaison Committee of Women's International Organizations. Secretariat: Mr. Humphrey, Director, Human Rights Division; Mr. Lawson, Secretary of the Commission.

Continuation of the Discussion on the Draft International Declaration on Human Rights (document E/CN.4/95)

Articles 25 and 26

THE CHAIRMAN read the text proposed by the International Labour Organization for paragraph 1 of the article intended to replace articles 25 and 26:

“Everyone has the right to a standard of living, and to social services adequate for the health and wellbeing of himself and his family (and to social security) including protection in the event of unemployment, sickness, disability, old age or other lack of livelihood in circumstances beyond his control.”

A separate vote had to be taken on the words which appeared in brackets. The representative of the USSR had also asked that the following phrase should be included in the ILO text: “social insurance, housing and medical care.”

Speaking as United States representative, the Chairman thought that the text proposed by the representative of ILO was both complete and adequate. She would prefer the term “social insurance” not to be used, as its meaning varied in different countries. She would agree, however, to the inclusion somewhere in the text, either before or after the expression “social security”, [3] of the words “food, clothing, housing and medical care”.

Owing to the absence of some representatives, the Commission decided to consider the covering article (document E/CN.4/120) proposed by MR. CASSIN (France) for inclusion in the Declaration before the series of articles on social and economic rights.

Covering articles (document E/CN.4/120)

THE CHAIRMAN read the article proposed by MR. CASSIN (France).

MR. LOUTFI (Egypt) wished the French text amended so as to say that the fulfilment of rights should be guaranteed “in accordance with economic and social possibilities. . .” It was to be understood, moreover, that that question was within the competence not only of the State, but of any organization which might be entrusted with those functions.

THE CHAIRMAN, speaking as the United States representative, proposed the following amendment:

“... be made possible in every State separately or in collaboration with other States, in accordance with the social and economic system and political organization.”

MR. CASSIN (France) welcomed the comments to which his proposal had given rise. The two suggestions which had just been made, though similar, were not, however, identical. While the Egyptian representative wished to obtain the maximum possible rights compatible with the potentialities of the social, economic and political system of each country, the text proposed by the United States representative tended rather to insist on the need for such measures to be fit in with the prevailing system. It might be possible to merge these two ideas into a single amendment.

He would like to hear the Australian representative's views on his proposal.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) thought that the text proposed by MR. CASSIN (France) raised a serious difficulty. In the articles adopted [4] up till then the Commission had not defined how the other rights were to be applied. To introduce into a covering article on social and economic rights the question of the method of applying those rights gave them priority. The Declaration on Human Rights would be publicized throughout the entire world, and would serve as a basis of education. It would be unfortunate were such an important text to give priority to those rights, thus placing them before all others. The text agreed upon by the Drafting Subcommittee for insertion at the end of the Declaration covered all rights enumerated in the Declaration, and appeared to be amply sufficient. Objections had been raised against other articles because they contained, in addition to a statement of rights, provisions for applying such rights.

Such details which were justified in the Covenant should not appear in the Declaration. In a question of such importance the Commission should proceed circumspectly, and should avoid giving the impression that the fulfilment of social and economic rights was more important than that of the other human rights.

It was his delegation's view that no distinction should be made between the rights and freedoms enumerated in the Declaration. The French text, by using the expression “whose fulfilment should be made possible etc.” implied that there was less need to implement the other rights. He would vote against the text submitted by the French delegation.

THE CHAIRMAN suggested that the further discussion of the covering article should be postponed until the afternoon meeting, and that the Commission should resume the consideration of the article which was intended to replace articles 25 and 26.

Articles 25 and 26 (continued)

THE CHAIRMAN read the wording submitted by the representative of the USSR for the new article:

“1) Everyone has the right to social security and to a standard of living sufficient for the maintenance of his own welfare and health as [5] well as those of his family, and in particular the right to material security in case of unemployment, sickness, disability, old age or the loss of means of subsistence for reasons beyond his control, and in case of employment, the right to social insurance at the expense of the State or of employers, in accordance with the legislation of each country.

“2) Everyone has the right to medical care and physician’s help in case of sickness.

“3) Everyone has the right to housing worthy of the dignity of the human being.

“The State and community should take all necessary measures, including legislative ones, to insure for every person real possibilities of enjoying all these rights.”

She then read again the text proposed by the ILO for paragraph 1 of the new article, and the USSR amendment thereto.

MR. CASSIN (France) considered that the draft proposed by the representative of the ILO, based as it was on the Drafting Sub-Committee’s text, was highly satisfactory. The words “to a standard of living and to social services adequate for the health and wellbeing” covered the points enumerated in the USSR draft. However he had no objection to the words “housing and medical care” being added.

As to the term “social insurance” he himself had submitted a text in which that expression had been used, and which had been rejected by the Commission as too narrow. The words “social security” used in the ILO text were broader. It would be a mistake to re-introduce a term already considered inadequate. He was in favour of the text proposed by the representative of the ILO.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) was unable to accept the USSR draft for articles 25 and 26. In his country, social insurance was the joint responsibility of the State, employer and the worker. It was impossible to adopt any text which would compel a country to alter completely a system of social insurance which was entirely satisfactory.

Moreover, he agreed with Mr. Cassin that the term “social insurance” had a much narrower meaning than had “social security”.

The ILO text covered all the points contained in the USSR draft. Medical care was covered twice; once by the words “standard of living” and again “by “health and wellbeing”. Housing – as well as food and clothing – was covered by “well-being of himself and his family”. He was prepared to accept the ILO text if the words in brackets were left out. The meaning of the term “social security.” differed in the various countries. If it had only a vague meaning it could be accepted, but in practice it was not universally applied, as the ILO had pointed out to the Commission.

THE CHAIRMAN, speaking as United States representative, supported the ILO text for the same reasons as those of MR. WILSON (United Kingdom). The text was sufficiently complete. For the sake of unanimity she was prepared to accept the addition of the words "housing and medical care".

MR. HOOD (Australia) also thought that all the principles enounced in the text of the representative of the USSR were included, in general terms, in the draft submitted by the ILO. He thought the words "social security" should be retained in the ILO text. The text was very useful and, if it were left out, the clearness of the rest of the text would suffer, and it would be left uncertain where the protection would come from in the cases listed at the end of the paragraph. The article should contain the concept of social security which should, in every State, be the basis of the "protection" mentioned in the text.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) replying to the comments put forward, did not accept the argument that the right to medical care was inferred in the ILO draft. It was true that the text spoke of standards of living and of social services adequate for health, but there was [7] no provision for cases where health was lost or threatened. The principle of the right to medical care which was admitted in all countries, could not be opposed. The USSR text went further than merely admitting a principle; it stipulated that the right to such care would be guaranteed by legislative measures. Such an important right should be stated categorically and its application should be guaranteed.

The United States of America might, as its representative had told the Commission, have a million hospital beds, but other countries were less advanced in that field and the article should call on them to make an effort. The USSR had spent twenty-thousand million roubles on medical care in 1948. One million hospital beds were available to the population in free hospitals in the USSR, in addition to the four hundred and fifty thousand beds in the clinics and sanatoria.

In regard to paragraph 3 of this draft, he did not agree with some representatives, that the ILO text was satisfactory. It was not enough to talk about standards of living and wellbeing. The workers' right to adequate housing should be stated in concrete terms. There was no equality of housing in many countries. Now that industrialization was going forward steadily it was intolerable that people should be housed in a way which was incompatible with human dignity. All States should take the measures called for in the Declaration. He could see nothing to object to in paragraph 3.

He reminded the United States representative of the difficulties with which the USSR had been faced in the matter of housing after the German occupation. One thousand seven hundred towns, seventy thousand villages and over six million houses had been destroyed, leaving twenty-five million persons homeless; as the United States representative had rightly remarked, the USSR had been faced with difficulties. The figures he had quoted gave an idea of the size of the task which had had to be tackled and which still had to be carried through. Since the end of the war five million persons had been re-housed as a result of the reconstruction of eight hundred and thirty-nine thousand houses in rural districts and nine million square metres of dwelling in the towns.

[8]

THE CHAIRMAN, speaking as United States representative, pointed out to the USSR representative that she thought that the main objection to paragraph 3 of his draft arose from the difficulty of precisely defining the expression “worthy of the dignity of the human being”. Every country had its own conception of what constituted housing worthy of the dignity of the human being.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) replied that he had in mind a memorandum from the President of the United States to Congress, which dealt with the question of millions of young people forced to live in slums. It was clearly impossible to use the same form of words for everyone. But his text was sufficiently clear: human beings should not live like animals; they should not be forced to live in shacks, hovels or caves. They should be provided with adequate housing which would not endanger their health or that of their families. He would accept any amendment which would state that idea in even stronger terms. It was also important that the words “every person” in the last paragraph should be emphasized so that the article should appeal to the feeling of social justice. He did not object to the amendment of the words “worthy of the dignity of the human being”, but he insisted on the retention of the principle that every person had a right to adequate housing, and that that objective could only be attained with the help of the State and society.

He asked that when the vote was taken, his text should be voted on paragraph by paragraph in the following order: paragraph 2, paragraph 3, paragraph 1 and the last paragraph.

[9]

MRS. MEHTA (India) preferred the shorter text proposed by the representative of the International Labour Organization. The reference to a “standard of living adequate for health and wellbeing” adequately covered the points raised by the USSR amendment.

Mrs. Mehta did not, however, think that the reference to “social security” should be deleted altogether, and suggested by way of compromise that the phrase “and to such measures of social security as would include protection in the event of. . .” should be inserted after the word “family”.

MR. METALL (International Labour Organization) thought that the USSR amendment, by speaking of “the right to social security at the expense of the State or of the employer” raised insurmountable difficulties, as methods of social insurance varied from country to country and social insurance could be financed in at least seven distinct ways, by the State, the employer, the employee or by part contributions by two or all three of the above.

Mr. Metall supported the Chinese representative's suggestion that the words "including housing and medical care, food and clothing" should be inserted after the words "social services" in the ILO text. He pointed out, however, that if that amendment were adopted, the phrase "and to social security" would no longer be apposite as the principal elements of social security would have been listed already. He preferred the wording "and to social insurance including protection in the event of unemployment etc.", which, he thought, should satisfy both the United Kingdom and USSR representatives. The point at issue was to define the means by which it was proposed to put social security into effect; and the reference to social insurance seemed to him appropriate in that connexion.

THE CHAIRMAN, speaking as representative of the United States of America, thought that it would be very difficult to accept such an [10] amendment, since the term "social insurance" inevitably implied payments made in advance. That conception excluded the possibility of social security in its wider sense, comprising donations or contributions from other sources made at the actual moment of need.

MR. METALL (International Labour Organization) explained that the reference to social services in the first part of his proposal made sufficient provision for countries such as the United States, which preferred the system outlined by the Chairman for the protection of the health and wellbeing of its citizens.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) pointed out that the concept of social insurance which his delegation defended was fundamentally different from that upheld by the others. In the eyes of the USSR delegation, a system of social insurance based only on contributions deducted from the employee's wages did not constitute real social insurance but merely a system of compulsory savings imposed on the employee. Contributions to social insurance should, in his opinion, be made either by the State or by the employer.

The USSR delegation was aware of the fact that methods of social insurance were not identical everywhere and had included the phrase "in accordance with the legislation of each country" in its text with that fact in mind. Moreover, the first part of the USSR text, in referring to social security, provided for the protection of everyone, including those who were not employees. The USSR amendment thus covered all the points which could be considered necessary.

In conclusion, Mr. Pavlov repeated that a system under which the worker paid the entire contribution towards his insurance was antidemocratic and did not constitute real social insurance. He suggested that other countries, and especially the United Kingdom, should ponder that question.

[11]

MR. CASSIN (France) thought that the ILO text as amended by the Chinese delegation was adequate. He stated that France was a country with one of the most highly developed systems of social insurance. He would, however, be unable to vote in favour of the USSR amendment for two reasons, firstly, on account of the difficulties connected with the existence of different systems in various countries, and secondly because France, like many other countries, had millions of working citizens who were neither employers nor employees but independent workers. It was, therefore, impossible to establish a uniform system of social insurance or to issue rigid directives to individual States.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) remarked that whatever system seemed the most desirable, a Declaration on Human Rights could not call on States to change the systems which were in force in their countries. The discussion on social security and insurance had convinced him that it was inadvisable to include those concepts in the Declaration in view of the difficulties of interpretation to which they were bound to give rise.

As a compromise, Mr. Wilson proposed to replace the words “including protection” in the ILO text by “and to social security”.

He added that he did not think that there was any need for the words “food and clothing” proposed in the Chinese amendment.

MR. METALL (International Labour Organization) agreed to the changes proposed by Mr. Wilson.

In compliance with the wish of the USSR representative, THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote paragraph 2 of the USSR proposal, reading as follows: “Everyone has the right to medical care and physician’s help in case of sickness”.

[12]

Paragraph 2 of the USSR amendment was rejected by 7 votes to 4 with 2 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote paragraph 3 of the USSR amendment.

Paragraph 3 of the USSR amendment was rejected by 6 votes to 14, with 3 abstentions.

MR. FONTAINA (Uruguay) thought that the paragraph was simply an injunction to States to supply free housing.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) replied that the context and especially the last paragraph of his amendment clearly showed that it had no such meaning. There were naturally other possibilities varying from country to country, such as rent reductions, assistance given by organizations and so on.

MR. CHANG (China) wished to point out before a vote was taken on the first part of paragraph 1 that its provisions were fundamentally the same as those contained in the ILO text. To vote against the USSR text would, therefore, signify disagreement with its wording only, but not with the principles on which it was based.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the first part of paragraph 1 of the USSR amendment down to the word “control”.

The first part of paragraph 1 was rejected by 9 votes to 4 with 1 abstention.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) regretted that while it had been admitted that his text was fundamentally identical with that submitted by the ILO, the former should have been rejected simply because it emanated from the USSR delegation. He drew the Commission’s attention to the fact that the second part of paragraph 1 [13] contained a reference to social insurance which did not appear in the ILO text and which was in danger of being omitted altogether if his amendment were rejected.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the second part of paragraph 1 of the USSR amendment.

The second part of the USSR amendment was rejected by 9 votes to 4, with 1 abstention.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the last paragraph of the USSR text.

The last paragraph was adopted by 6 votes to 4, with 4 abstentions.

The Commission then proceeded to consider the question of the vote, to be taken on the text submitted by the International Labour Organization as amended by the Chinese and United Kingdom representatives.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) was in favour of a separate vote as to whether special reference should be made to “food and clothing”.

MR. CHANG (China) did not see what possible objection there could be to that phrase when millions of people throughout the world were deprived of food and clothing.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) was surprised that the representative of China should have voted against the last paragraph of the USSR amendment which made provision for the means to ensure those very rights which he wished to safeguard.

MR. CHANG (China) stated that the question raised in that paragraph would form the subject either of a separate “umbrella” clause or of a paragraph to be inserted in the Preamble. He added that his reasons for voting against the USSR text were connected with its wording.

[14]

MR. FONTAINA (Uruguay) observed that the practical application of the provisions of the Declaration would depend on the domestic legislation of each State, provided of course that such legislation corresponded to the principles and purposes of the United Nations. He did not think that the words “food and clothing” were necessary, since the phrase “standard of living adequate for health and wellbeing” was sufficiently clear.

MR. CHANG (China) did not agree that the term “standard of living” was sufficiently precise. The question involved concerned not only the quantity but also the quality of food. The Chinese representative did not understand the wish to avoid reference to the two principal factors of an adequate standard of living.

THE CHAIRMAN suggested that the words “including food and lodging, housing and medical care” should be inserted after the words “standard of living”.

MR. CHANG (China) agreed to that proposal.

THE CHAIRMAN called for a vote on the question as to whether the words “food and clothing” should be included in the text.

It was decided to include those words by 11 votes to 3.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the Chinese amendment as a whole.

The Chinese amendment was adopted by 12 votes to none with 2 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the United Kingdom amendment.

The amendment was adopted by 6 votes to 2 with 5 abstentions.

A vote was then taken on the ILO text thus amended.

[15]

The ILO text was adopted in its amended form by 8 votes to none, with 6 abstentions.

The Commission proceeded to vote on the second paragraph of Article 26 dealing with special protection for mothers and children.

In reply to a question by MR. FONTAINA (Uruguay), the Chairman explained that the article referred to mothers and children in general and not to motherhood and childhood in particular.

The second paragraph of article 26 was adopted unanimously.

MR. CASSIN (France) stated that he had abstained from voting on paragraph 1 because it contained no reference to social security, Mr. Cassin declared that world public opinion would fail to understand why such an omission had been allowed to occur, and reserved the right to raise the whole question again when the “umbrella” clause came under discussion.

MR. HOOD (Australia) shared Mr. Cassin’s attitude. The Chairman put to the vote the whole of the joint article 25/26, as amended.

The article was adopted by 8 votes to none with 6 abstentions.

The meeting rose at 1 p.m.

E/CN.4/SR.72
14 June 1948<sup>128</sup>

Summary Record of the Seventy-Second Meeting
[of the Commission on Human Rights]

Held at Lake Success, New York, on Monday,
 14 June 1948, at 2:30 p.m.

Chairman: Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, United States of America. Rapporteur: Mr. Malik, Lebanon. Members: Mr. Hood, Australia; Mr. Steyaert, Belgium; Mr. Stepanenko, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic; Mr. Larrain, Chile; Mr. Chang, China; Mr. Loutfi, Egypt; Mr. Cassin, France; Mrs. Mehta, India; Mr. Quijano, Panama; Mr. Lopez, Philippines; Mr. Klekovkin, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic; Mr. Pavlov, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics; Mr. Wilson, United Kingdom; Mr. Fontaina, Uruguay; Mr. Vilfan, Yugoslavia. Also present: Mrs. Ledon, Commission on the Status of Women. Representatives of Specialized Agencies: Mr. Metall, International Labour Organization (ILO); Mr. Lebar, United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO); Mr. Stone, Preparatory Commission for the International Refugee Organization. Consultants from Non-Governmental Organizations: Miss Sender, American Federation of Labor; Mr. van Istendael, International Federation of Christian Trade Unions. [2] Consultants from Non-Governmental Organizations: (continued) Mrs. Drennan, Catholic International Union for Social Services; Mr. Nolde and Mr. Prentice, Jr., Commission of the Churches on International Affairs; Miss Schaeffer, International Union of Catholic Women's Leagues; Dr. Robb, Committee of Women's International Organizations; Dr. Bienenfeld, World Jewish Congress; Mrs. Baker Vandenberg, International Alliance of Women. Secretariat: Mr. Humphrey, Director of the Human Rights Division; Mr. Lawson, Secretary of the Commission.

Continuation of the Discussion of the Draft Declaration of Human Rights (Document E/CN.4/95)

THE CHAIRMAN read document E/CN.4/120, containing the report of the drafting sub-committee on two suggested additional articles. The first had been unanimously accepted by the sub-committee; the second had been suggested by the French representative, in addition to the first, as an introduction to articles on economic and social rights.

THE CHAIRMAN remarked that, at the request of the United Kingdom representative, who believed that the first article obviated the need for the second, the two would be discussed in relation to each other. She called for comments on the proposed articles.

<sup>128</sup> This was the date of the meeting. The document was issued on 24 June 1948.

MR. HOOD (Australia) called the attention of the United Kingdom representative to a basic difference between the articles contained in document E/CN.4/120 and the articles previously adopted. The latter, for the most part, dealt with the natural rights of individual human beings; the former viewed human beings as members of organized society. Mr. Hood agreed with the statement previously made by the Lebanese representative that the difference should be noted in the Declaration.

As the article accepted by the sub-committee appeared somewhat general, the Australian delegation would support the idea expressed in the French [3] proposal, as well as the Egyptian amendment, suggested at the previous meeting, to the effect that States should take such action as was within the limits of their possibilities. On the other hand, the words "should be made possible" in the French proposal could with advantage be replaced by "should be ensured"; the article would be strengthened thereby.

MR. VILFAN (Yugoslavia) agreed that the Declaration should contain an article mentioning implementation. He felt, like the United Kingdom representative, that no distinction should be made between social and economic rights and civil rights. He consequently moved, as a substitute for the two suggested articles, a portion of the amendment proposed earlier by the USSR representative to articles 25–26, reading as follows: "The State and community should take all necessary measures, including legislative ones, to ensure for every person real possibilities of enjoying all these rights." Such an article would show plainly that the obligation to ensure the exercise of the various rights stated in the Declaration rested upon the State.

Mr. Vilfan agreed with the Chairman that his proposal might be considered as a substitute for the first article only.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon), in reply to a remark by the Byelorussian representative, stated that there was only a distant relationship between the first article in document E/CN.4/120 and paragraph 3 of article 21 as approved by the Commission. A "good social order" was not necessarily identical with a good Government; moreover, the present article also mentioned an international order and then proceeded to define those concepts; it thus went considerably further than the paragraph referred to by the Byelorussian representative.

[4]

MR. CASSIN (France) observed that now that the Commission had approved the articles dealing with economic and social rights, the general situation was clearer. It was plain, for instance, that the Commission should follow the example to be found in all constitutions adopted in recent years, and should treat those rights separately from the rights of the individual. Economic and social rights, in order to be fully realized, required material assistance to be furnished by the State – a practical difference which the Declaration could not ignore. He did not agree with the United Kingdom representative that the insertion of a covering article to precede the articles on economic and social rights would over-emphasize the importance of those rights. The Commission would merely be following the method which it had used in connection with the rights of the individual.

As regards the text of the French proposal, Mr. Cassin was prepared to accept both the Australian and the Egyptian amendments; the first strengthened the principle involved, while the second was a qualification to the execution of that principle. The two amendments balanced each other.

The French representative felt that it would be a grave error to omit from the Declaration the modern and widely accepted concept of social security. Mention of it could be made in his proposal; as that article was of a general nature, the precise interpretation of the concept would be left to the individual States. He urged the Commission to accept the idea contained in his proposal.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) said that he failed to find anywhere in the beginning of the Declaration an article parallel to that proposed by the French representative. While there was a declaratory statement of the rights and freedoms of human beings, there was no statement to the effect that society must be as organized as to guarantee those rights and freedom to the individual. Consequently, the adoption of the French proposal would mean that economic and social rights, the importance of which none could [5] deny, would be given preferential treatment over other rights of equal importance.

In support of his remarks, Mr. Malik cited articles 5 and 6 as approved by the Commission. Those articles prohibited slavery and unjustified arrest; yet nowhere in the Declaration was there an article guaranteeing those provisions. The French proposal, if adopted, would create a bias in favour of economic and social rights; the first article contained in document E/CN.4/120 dealt adequately with all rights without exception, and should alone be approved by the Commission.

MR. CASSIN (France) replied that the covering test which applied to fundamental human rights did not contain a guarantee because rights to life and liberty were unconditional. The realization of economic and social rights, on the other hand, involved material assistance on the part of the State, and therefore required a guarantee. There was no intention to place undue emphasis on such rights; the intention was merely to recognize their importance. It was noteworthy that all States which had rewritten their constitutions during the past thirty years had given special and separate attention to economic and social rights.

THE CHAIRMAN asked the Commission to vote whether it wished to have a second covering article, the exact wording of which would be determined later, or a single article covering all the rights in the Declaration.

The Commission, by ten votes to six, approved the idea of having a second covering article.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) supported the Yugoslav proposal. It applied equally to all articles contained in the Declaration, and could come either at the beginning or at the end.

[6]

As regards the first article in document E/CN.4/120, he agreed with the Indian representative's previous statement that the meaning of the word "good", as applied to social and international order, was extremely debatable. The Lebanese representative, the original proposer of the article, thought that an order which granted all the rights and freedoms enumerated in the Declaration must be "good". Mr. Pavlov could not agree with that conclusion. Thus, the Declaration stipulated equality between the sexes and among the various races and religions. Even if that formal equality were realized, however, social inequalities would not be abolished. The inequality between rich and poor, that basic criterion of a social order, would remain; all the rights listed in the Declaration missed that fundamental point.

On the other hand, it was impossible for the Commission to agree upon a concrete definition of the word "good" in that particular context. The ideal social order, to some of its members, meant socialism; the views of the others were widely divergent. A discussion of the ideal social order could not bring any positive results.

If the word "good" were omitted, the proposed article would become merely tautological: everyone would have a right to the realization of his rights. Mr. Pavlov preferred the wording proposed by the Yugoslav representative, which stated the obligation of the State and society to ensure real possibilities of enjoying the rights formulated in the Declaration, and mentioned legislative measures which might be required. He hoped the Lebanese representative would be able to accept that wording.

Mr. Pavlov recalled that his delegation had wished to have included, in the article granting each right, a mention of how that right was to be realized. Since that had been defeated, it was necessary to have a single article, dealing with the realization of economic, social and political rights, either at the beginning or at the end of the Declaration.

[7]

He thought that the French representative might accept, in lieu of his own proposal, the wording proposed by the Yugoslav representative, which could, of course, be amended as the Commission wished. It should, in any case, be taken as the basis for discussion.

THE CHAIRMAN, as the representative of the United States of America, proposed the following amendment to replace the French proposal: "Every person, as a member of society, has the economic, social and cultural rights enumerated below, and is entitled to their realization, through national effort and international co-operation, in accordance with the social system and economic and political organization in each State.”

She accepted the suggestions of the Egyptian and United Kingdom representatives that the final clause should be amended to read: “in accordance with the organization and resources of each State.”

MR. CASSIN (France) proposed that there should be a mention of social security in the opening clause.

THE CHAIRMAN, as the United States representative, accepted the suggestions of MR. MALIK (Lebanon) that her text should begin: “Every person, as a member of society, is entitled to the realization of the economic, social and cultural rights enumerated below. . .”

As the words “social security” did not appear in any of the articles dealing with economic and social rights, she agreed with the French representative that they should be included in her text. Several possible ways of introducing those words were proposed by the Chairman and by the United Kingdom representative.

MR. CHANG (China), supported by MR. MALIK (Lebanon), remarked that the original phrase, “economic, social and cultural rights enumerated below”, appeared preferable. It contained a general statement, the meaning [8] of which was wider than social security. If the Commission felt it necessary to use the term in the Declaration, it could do so when it revised the articles dealing with social rights.

MR. CASSIN (France) felt that the term “social security” – which had originated in English-speaking countries – had to be included in the Declaration. It represented a stage in human development; its inclusion would strengthen the whole document. As no place had been found for the term in any of the other articles, it was necessary to introduce it into the article under consideration.

THE CHAIRMAN, in reply to the USSR representative, remarked that the United States [sic] contained no mention of political rights because, like the French proposal, it was designed to precede articles dealing with economic and social rights.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) thought it would be incorrect to have a covering article stressing the realization of economic and social rights unless the other rights mentioned in the Declaration were covered as well. When he had voted in favour of a covering article, he thought that it would apply to all rights, though particular emphasis would be placed on the realization of economic, social and cultural rights, which, historically speaking, had been more recently recognized.

MR. FONTAINA (Uruguay) said that he had voted in favour of a covering article in the hope that it would contain a reference to social security, which had been left out of articles 25 and 26. The concept of social security was of paramount importance and had been recognized as such in the Bogotá Declaration. Unless reference to it was made in the covering article, he would vote for a reconsideration of articles 25 and 26.

[9]

He was supported by the representative of the Philippines, MR. LOPEZ, and MR. VILFAN (Yugoslavia).

MR. CASSIN (France) doubted the utility of reconsidering the article which had raised such deep controversy earlier in the day. The objections which had been raised to the inclusion of social security then would undoubtedly be raised again. It was far better to include a reference to social security in the covering article, because the welfare of workers had long since ceased to be a purely national concern; the mass unemployment of 1932 showed that action was needed on an international level. The clause referring to "international co-operation" in his proposal would satisfy that necessity.

In response to the desire of the representative of Yugoslavia, the Chairman suggested that the covering article should start with the words "Every person has the right to social security and . . . etc."

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) advanced the following text, which, in his opinion, would satisfy all the desires expressed by the various members: "The State and society shall undertake all necessary measures, including legislation, for ensuring to every person a real possibility of enjoying all the rights listed in this Declaration. In view of the particular significance which social, economic and cultural rights have, as listed in articles 23 to 30, (particularly the right to social security) it is recognized desirable to have them implemented both through material national efforts and through international co-operation, taking into account the social and economic systems and resources of each State."

He wondered whether the wishes of the French representative would be met if a separate vote were taken on the clause referring to social security.

[10]

MR. CASSIN (France) preferred his proposal with the amendments suggested by the representatives of the United States, Egypt and Australia. If that were defeated, a vote could be taken on other proposals.

THE CHAIRMAN read the proposed text, as amended by the representatives of India, the United Kingdom and China:

"Everyone as a member of society has the right to social security and is entitled to the realization of the economic, social and cultural rights enumerated below, in accordance with the organization and resources of each State, through national effort and international co-operation."

She thought that the USSR proposal would have to be considered as an alternate text because it placed emphasis on different ideas, and would have to be voted upon first because it was further removed from the original text. The United States delegation preferred the French proposal, as amended, and would vote for it rather than for the USSR text.

MR. CHANG (China) wondered whether it was the intention of the Commission, by placing the covering article at the head of the articles dealing with economic and social rights, to create for them the name of “social security articles”. He suggested that the clause referring to social security should be voted upon separately in both proposals.

The clause reading “particularly the right to social security” of the USSR proposal was adopted by 5 votes to 1, with 9 abstentions.

The first sentence of the USSR proposal was rejected by 11 votes to 4.

The second sentence of the USSR proposal was rejected by 10 votes to 4 with 1 abstention.

The phrase “Everyone... has the right to social security” of the amended French proposal was adopted by fifteen votes, with two abstentions.

The French proposal, as amended, was adopted by twelve votes, with five abstentions.

The meeting rose at 5:15 p.m.

E/CN.4/137

15 June 1948

United States of America: Proposal for Clause to be added to Article 19 of the Draft International Declaration on Human Rights

Everyone has the right to freedom of assembly and association, and especially for the promotion and protection of the rights and freedoms set forth in this Declaration.

E/CN.4/138

15 June 1948

Preamble

The Committee on the Preamble, composed of the officers of the Commission on Human Rights, proposes the following text:

Whereas recognition of the inherent dignity and the equal and inalienable rights of all members of the human family is the foundation of freedom, justice and peace in the world, and

Whereas ignorance and contempt for human rights resulted, before and during the Second World War, in barbarous acts which outraged the conscience of mankind and made it apparent to all that the fundamental freedoms were the supreme issue of the conflict, and

Whereas it is essential, if mankind is not to be compelled as a last resort to rebel against tyranny and oppression that human rights should be protected by a regime of law, and

Whereas the Charter of the United Nations reaffirms faith in fundamental human rights, in the dignity and worth of the human person and in the equal rights of men and women, and

Whereas the Members of the United Nations are pledged to achieve international co-operation in promoting and encouraging respect for human rights and for fundamental freedoms for all (without distinction as to race, sex, language, or religion), and

Whereas this pledge can be fulfilled only through a common understanding of the nature of these rights and freedoms,

Now therefore the General Assembly

Recognizes in the following solemn Declaration the rights and freedoms which, being essential for the dignity and worth of the human person, should form a common standard of achievement for all nations, to the end that every individual and every organ of society, national and international, keeping this Declaration constantly in mind, shall strive by teaching and education to promote respect for these rights and freedoms and by progressive measures to secure their universal and effective recognition and observance.

E/CN.4/139

15 June 1948

Original Text: Russian

Union of Soviet Socialist Republics: Draft Preamble to the International Declaration on Human Rights

In accordance with the principle of respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction of race, sex, language and religion, and for the dignity and worth of the human person, proclaimed by the Charter of the United Nations;

With the aim of guaranteeing the observance of all the said rights and freedoms, and of promoting the common progress and the improvement of the living conditions of the people and the development of friendly relations among the nations;

The General Assembly recommends to all the States Members of the United Nations the following Declaration on Human Rights;

For use at their discretion in taking appropriate legislative and other measures and in their systems of upbringing and education; and for the dissemination of the provisions of this Declaration throughout the populations of the States Members themselves, of territories over which such States are performing the functions of the administering authority, of territories under trusteeship, and of non-self-governing territories.

E/CN.4/140

15 June 1948

Lebanon: Proposal for Addition to Article 30

Cultural groups shall not be denied the right to free self-development.

E/CN.4/141

15 June 1948

Report of the Sub-Committee Consisting of the Representatives of Egypt, France, United Kingdom, and Union of Soviet Socialist Republics on Re-Examination of Article 2, Paragraph 2 of the Draft International Declaration on Human Rights

In the exercise of his rights everyone shall be subject only to such limitations as are necessary to secure due recognition and respect for the rights of others and to the requirements of morality, of general welfare and of public order in a democratic society.

E/CN.4/SR.73

15 June 1948<sup>129</sup>

Summary Record of the Seventy-Third Meeting [of the Commission on Human Rights]

Held at Lake Success, New York, on Tuesday,
15 June 1948, at 10:45 a.m.

Chairman: Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, United States of America. Rapporteur: Mr. Malik, Lebanon. Members: Mr. Hood, Australia; Mr. Lebeau, Belgium; Mr. Stepanenko,

<sup>129</sup> This was the date of the meeting. The document was issued on 24 June 1948.

Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic; Mr. Larrain, Chile; Mr. Chang, China; Mr. Loutfi, Egypt; Mr. Ordonneau, France; Mrs. Mehta, India; Mr. Quijano, Panama; Mr. Lopez, Philippines; Mr. Klekovkin, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic; Mr. Pavlov, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics; Mr. Wilson, United Kingdom; Mr. Fontaina, Uruguay; Mr. Vilfan, Yugoslavia. Also Present: Mrs. Ledon, Commission on the Status of Women. Representatives of Specialized Agencies: Mr. Lebar, United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO). Consultants from Non-Governmental Organizations: Mrs. Sender, American Federation of Labor (AFL); Mr. van Istendael, International Federation of Christian Trade Unions (IFCTU); Miss Stuart, World Federation of United Nations Associations. [2] Consultants from Non-Governmental Organizations (Cont'd): Mrs. Drennan, Catholic International Union for Social Service; Mr. Sartell Prentice Jr. and Mr. Nolde, Commission of the Churches on International Affairs; Mr. Moskowitz, Consultative Council for Jewish Organizations; Miss Schaeffer, International Union of Catholic Women's Leagues; Dr. Bienenfeld, World Jewish Congress. Secretariat: Mr. Humphrey, Director of the Human Rights Division; Mr. Lawson, Secretary of the Commission

[A discussion of implementation is omitted.]

[5]

Continuation of Discussion on the Draft Declaration on Human Rights, Document E/CN.4/95 (Article 31)

THE CHAIRMAN then outlined the Commission's further procedure and turned to the consideration of article 31 dealing with the rights of minorities. China, India and the United Kingdom had proposed the deletion of the article. France had presented a different text in document E/CN.4/82/Add.8, page 6, article 27. The United States delegation supported deletion of article 31, considering that provisions relating to rights of minorities had no place in a declaration of human rights. She further pointed to the decision taken at the Lima Conference in 1938<sup>130</sup> and reiterated in Chapultepec, that minority questions did not exist on the American continent. United States experience with foreign groups residing within its borders had been happy, assimilation having been emphasized throughout. Since there was need for the substance of article 31 to be covered by other provisions of the declaration, the United States delegation, wishing to give members of minorities the protection of group action, proposed the following addition to article 19:

"Everyone has the right to freedom of assembly and association, and especially for the promotion and protection of the rights and freedoms set forth in this Declaration."

<sup>130</sup> The Eighth Pan-American Conference took place in Lima from 9 to 26 December 1938 among representatives of the Organization of American States. The Declaration of Lima was adopted on 24 December 1938.

If there were any objections against re-considering the article previously adopted by the Commission, the United States delegation would present its amendment later.

MR. LOUTFI (Egypt) favoured deletion of article 31 and supported the United States of America amendment to article 19. The Commission was concerned with a declaration of rights of individuals, and not minorities; the rights of the latter were safeguarded by international conventions. Furthermore, the problem of minorities would be automatically solved by complete implementation of the human rights declaration.

[6]

MRS. MEHTA (India) opposed article 31 as unnecessary. Members of minority groups were protected as human beings by other articles of the declaration. Article 1 stated that all human beings were equal; article 3 ensured protection of members of minority groups by stating: “. . . and entitled to equal protection of the law against any arbitrary discrimination”, and article 30 covered the cultural life of communities, among which minority groups were obviously included. Consequently, since human rights were to be enjoyed equally by all, there was no need to grant special rights to minority groups.

MR. LEBEAU (Belgium) felt that the question of minority rights was essentially one of tolerance and strict application of human rights to members of minority as well as majority groups. He agreed with the representative of India that scrupulous enforcement of the principles of the declaration would obviate the need for article 31. Mr. Lebeau also pointed to the inconvenience of mentioning in international agreements independent rights of minority groups; he referred, in that connection, to Hitler's policy of raising the problem of treatment of German minorities in countries adjacent to Germany as a means to further his own political and military ends. On the other hand, it was also true that some minorities had been subjected to forced assimilation, as in the case of Tyroleans who had come under Italian rule after the first World War;<sup>131</sup> still, it would be better to settle that problem by giving minorities opportunity for redress rather than by including such a clause in the present declaration. In view of those considerations, he supported the United States proposal to article 19.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) supported article 31 which was important, even in its imperfect form. Replying to the argument that a statement on minority rights had no place in a declaration of rights of individuals, he said that the clause was in complete conformity with the [7] Charter where equal rights of men and of states were mentioned in the same sentence. The clause adopted at the Commission's second session protected the members of minority groups against discrimination by providing equal rights to minorities. Existing inequalities in law as well as in practice were against the Charter principles and should be prevented by such provision. He therefore supported the draft of article 31 adopted at the Commission's second session, proposing, however, the deletion of the words "... as far as compatible with public order. . ." in the fourth line of that text. He explained that there was nothing incompatible with public order in the right of minorities to use their own language in their schools. He equally objected to a similar phrase in the text proposed by the Sub-Commission on the Prevention of Discrimination and the Protection of Minorities. Article 31, while not fully adequate, having no provision for implementation of the minorities rights mentioned there, was, nevertheless, important and justifiable in the light of the Charter.

<sup>131</sup> Part of the Austro-Hungarian Empire, the German-speaking South Tyrol was promised to Italy if it joined the Entente forces in the First World War. The territory was annexed by Italy in 1919. In 1992 Italy and Austria reached an agreement by which the territory enjoys a large degree of autonomy.

THE CHAIRMAN recalled that previous debates on that question had brought out that the aim of States was to assimilate and absorb large foreign groups, and to make them part of the nation. Unless all the citizens of a given country could speak the same language, there was the danger that public order might be disrupted by persons who might not understand their duties as citizens of the country in which they were a minority. It was not a question of teaching children in a language different from that of the majority, but of adult persons who would be unable to assume their duties as citizens of the larger country.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) stressed the importance of the problem raised in article 31 and pointed out that it arose from two different basic conceptions of the States: the uni-national, uni-cultural State which incorporated various ethnic, racial, religious and linguistic groups and practised a [8] policy of assimilation of those groups in the general "melting-pot"; and the multi-national, multi-cultural State which encouraged the development of diversified groups and was best exemplified in the USSR. It was significant that article 31 referred not to minority groups, as the term was generally understood, but to distinct ethnic and cultural groups constituting the component parts of the State.

The United States and most countries of South America had apparently based their policy toward ethnic and cultural groups on the principle of assimilation and had found it well adapted to their needs. Likewise, the countries of Western Europe had been able to create fairly homogeneous States by the amalgamation and fusion of various ethnic and linguistic elements of the population. France was an outstanding example of that homogeneity. However, the principle of assimilation did not appear to be applicable to many countries of Eastern Europe and Asia, such as India. Moreover, the tiny country of Lebanon was a multi-religious State and had been exerting every effort to protect the freedom of religious belief of its heterogeneous population.

In view of its importance, the problem raised in article 31 deserved careful study. While it might not be desirable that it form a separate article, some clause should be introduced in the declaration to ensure adequate protection of distinct ethnic groups in multi-national States.

MR. VILFAN (Yugoslavia) vigorously supported the remarks made by the representative of Lebanon. The Commission should recognize that the conception of the "melting-pot" could not be applied to Eastern Europe and Asia. Yugoslavia, for example, might be described as one State, with two scripts, three religions, four languages, five nationalities, six republics and many ethnic groups. After the First World War, the Yugoslav minority in Italy had suffered persecution. Consequently, Yugoslavia had learned from its own historical experience the importance of recognizing the rights of specific linguistic or cultural groups.

[9]

Mr. Vilfan further pointed out that the rights of ethnic groups did not coincide in every respect with the rights of the individual and could not always be protected by general bills of rights for which the State bore responsibility. While it was true that Hitler had made an international convention on minorities the pretext for aggression, as the representative of Belgium had demonstrated, the protection of the rights of minority groups could hardly be considered the reason for that aggression. The abuse of a right in no way detracted from the inherent value of the right; nor did it militate against the defence of that right. The successful co-existence of two distinct national groups in Belgium itself should encourage the representative of Belgium to support an extension of such excellent relationships among different ethnic groups in all countries of the world.

MR. KLEKOVKIN (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) emphasized that the co-existence in many States of various ethnic, religious, and cultural groups had been a source of discord and had often led to open conflict between nations. The events recalled by the representative of Belgium should not discourage the Commission from seeking to ensure to minority ethnic groups the rights granted to all human beings. However, in doing so, an earnest effort should be made to prevent the recurrence of situations which might lead to international complications.

Mr. Klekovkin recalled the experience of the large Ukrainian minority which had been incorporated into the Austro-Hungarian Empire. For many years, all efforts to assimilate the group had failed. The very fact that the Ukrainians had preserved their cultural, linguistic and national characteristics had made possible their rapid integration into the new Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic. Within the Ukrainian SSR, various ethnic groups, such as the Uzbeks, had been permitted to develop their culture and language freely without compromising their social, economic or political advancement. The contention of the United States representative that such group development would retard progress was therefore unfounded.

[10]

Mr. Klekovkin strongly favoured retention of article 31 in order to promote the development of the cultures of distinct groups within multi-national States. That purpose was not served by the statement of the rights of individuals to free development without discrimination. For example, the article concerning education ensured the right to education; it did not ensure the right of a member of a special group to be educated in his own language.

Finally, the representative of the Ukraine observed that, in some cases, the practice of a policy of assimilation might be misinterpreted and considered an extension of colonialism. For example, if Hawaii were to become a state of the United States and its population were deprived of the right to continue to develop its own culture and languages, the United States might be accused of following a colonial policy. The State should give more attention to raising the cultural level of many small groups by encouraging the free development of their particular characteristics.

MR. HOOD (Australia) felt that the ideas contained in article 31 went beyond the scope of the declaration. The declaration enumerated the rights of the individual and included his right to form associations, while article 31 conferred certain rights upon groups as such. Basically, it raised a problem which directly affected the fundamental structure of States and the science of government, that of reconciling the rights and interests of all groups within the State. While he did not question the wisdom of the policy of free development of diversified groups in other countries, Mr. Hood pointed out that Australia had adopted the principle that assimilation of all groups was in the best interest of all in the long run. Therefore, although he wished to delete article 31, he felt that it might be stated more explicitly elsewhere in the declaration that individuals belonging to special groups should enjoy the rights granted to all human beings.

[11]

MR. FONTAINA (Uruguay) stressed that the protection of the rights of distinct ethnic, linguistic and cultural groups was essentially a political problem within the jurisdiction of every sovereign nation and covered by its national legislation. Since, however, the declaration was confined to the legal question of the protection of the rights of the individual, the political question raised in article 31 should be eliminated.

MR. STEPANENKO (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) did not agree with the representative of Uruguay that article 31 was primarily political. Moreover, not all the articles contained in the declaration had a non-political character and there was no valid reason for excluding mention of the rights of national groups.

Although article 31 was not wholly satisfactory, it should be included as a minimum statement of those rights.

Mr. Stepanenko reviewed the experience of his own people which had suffered economic and social oppression as a special linguistic and cultural group under the Czarist regime. Only with the establishment of the Byelorussian SSR after the October Revolution had it become free to develop its culture and language. In the thirty years since its inception, the Byelorussian Republic had achieved more than had been possible during several centuries towards raising the cultural level of its people. For the problem was essentially cultural; it did not infringe on citizenship, as the representative of the United States had seemed to imply. Members of distinct ethnic and linguistic groups remained full citizens of the State, despite the fact that they spoke their own languages in addition to the common language. Those minority groups had not been artificially created; they were the product of the historical development which could not and should not be curtailed. Retention of article 31 would broaden the scope of the rights which they could enjoy.

[12]

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) pointed out that several representatives were interpreting the same objective in the light of their particular national backgrounds and problems. For valid, historical reasons, different countries followed different policies in resolving the problem of national minorities. The choice of the basic principles they had adopted depended upon their historical development, and were well adapted to the countries in which they were applied. Mr. Wilson was opposed to proclaiming the principle of assimilation in the Declaration. At the same time, implementation of the principle of diversity in some States, far from raising cultural levels, might create minority problems. Since it was difficult to satisfy the needs of all States without imposing a solution which had only been found practicable in a few, it was better to restrict the Declaration to a statement of rights applicable to all sections of humanity, and delete article 31.

MR. ORDONNEAU (France) recalled that the historical development of France into a homogeneous State had resulted from the extensive and rigorous application of universal human rights to all sections of the population. If it could be assumed that all the rights stated in the Declaration would be applied in that manner, article 31 would become superfluous. On the other hand, Mr. Ordonneau agreed with the representative of the United Kingdom that the specific statement of the rights of national groups might defeat the very purpose of the Declaration by increasing intolerance of minorities and hindering their integration within a State.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) again stressed the importance of finding a formula to reconcile the two conceptions of the State under discussion. Some of the worst crimes against humanity had been committed against helpless national minorities. While he would oppose vehemently any [13] statement which might have the effect of disrupting a uni-national, uni-cultural State, it was the duty of the United Nations to reassure national groups that their right to free development would be protected. To that end, the Commission should concentrate on the fundamental factor: protection of the cultural group, rather than the minority.

Mr. Malik suggested that the following text might be inserted, either as a separate article or as an addition to Article 18:

“Cultural groups shall not be denied the right to free self-development.”

He expressed readiness to withdraw the amendment if it were likely to create difficulties for some States.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) proposed an amendment which might be introduced either as a separate article or as a second part of article 30. He drafted the first sentence roughly as follows:

“Everyone has the right to his ethnic, national culture, regardless of whether he belongs to a minority or majority group of the population.”

THE CHAIRMAN suggested that the representatives of the United States, Lebanon and the USSR should form a drafting committee to reconcile the amendments they had proposed. After a decision on the resulting text, the Commission could proceed to vote on article 31.

The meeting rose at 1:20 p.m.

E/CN.4/SR.74

15 June 1948<sup>132</sup>

Original Text: French

Summary Record of the Seventy-Fourth Meeting [of the Commission on Human Rights]

Held at Lake Success, New York, on Tuesday,

15 June 1948, at 2:30 p.m.

Chairman: Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt (United States of America). Rapporteur: Mr. Malik (Lebanon). Members: Mr. Hood (Australia); Mr. Steyaert (Belgium); Mr. Stepanenko (Belgium); Mr. Larrain (Chile); Mr. Chang (China); Mr. Loutfi (Egypt); Mr. Ordonneau (France); Mrs. Mehta (India); Mr. Azkoul (Lebanon); Mr. de Quijano (Panama); Mr. Lopez (Philippines); Mr. Klekovkin (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republics); Mr. Pavlov (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics); Mr. Wilson (United Kingdom); Mr. Fontaina (Uruguay); Mr. Vilfan (Yugoslavia). Also Present: Mrs. Ledon (Commission on the Status of Women). Representative of a Specialized Agency: Mr. Lebar (United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization). [2] Consultants from Non-Governmental Organizations: Miss Sender (American Federation of Labor); Mrs. Drennan (Catholic International Union for Social Service); Mr. Prentice (Commission of the Churches on International Affairs); Mr. Nolde and Mr. Brotman (Co-ordinating Board of Jewish Organizations for consulting with the Economic and Social Council); Miss Schaefer (International Union of Catholic Women's Leagues); Mr. Bienenfeld (World Jewish Congress).

<sup>132</sup> This was the date of the meeting. The document was issued on 28 June 1948.

Continuation of the Consideration of the Report of the Drafting
Committee to the Commission on Human Rights (document E/CN.4/95):
Consideration of the Draft Declaration and Amendments Submitted by Various Delegations

Article 30

The Chairman asked whether the Commission wished to consider the addition to article 30 of the Declaration of certain texts submitted by members of the Commission.

The Commission decided by 10 votes with 4 abstentions to consider the additions to article 30.

THE CHAIRMAN recalled that two proposals had been made, one by the USSR representative and the other by the representative of Lebanon.

She put the proposed USSR addition to article 30 to the vote.

The addition was rejected by 8 votes to 4, with 3 abstentions.

The Chairman asked for observations on the additional text proposed by the Lebanese representative, which read as follows: "Cultural groups shall not be denied the right to free self-development."

MR. LOPEZ (Philippines) observed that the expression "cultural groups" was ambiguous and that in the context of article 30 it might mean any cultural, literary or musical organization.

[3]

MR. FONTAINA (Uruguay) supported the Philippines representative's objection; he considered the addition proposed by the Lebanese representative unnecessary, since the principle it introduced was a political and not a legal one.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) stated that the text he had submitted already represented, in an attenuated form, the idea he would like to see embodied in the Declaration. He had deliberately drafted that idea in a form which would be acceptable to the Commission. There was some truth in the objection raised by the Philippine representative, but the ambiguity might perhaps be an advantage in the present case, since it would indicate that the text had no controversial meaning.

MISS SENDER (American Federation of Labor) suggested replacing the words: “cultural groups” by “groups of common cultural background”. If the Philippine representative accepted that suggestion, the ambiguity to which he had referred might disappear.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) and MR. LOPEZ (Philippines) accepted that suggestion.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) suggested replacing the words: “cultural groups” by “groups of common ethnical background”. National minority groups must at least be guaranteed the right to retain the culture associated with their ethnical origin.

MR. HOOD (Australia) pointed out that the words: “free self-development” were even more ambiguous. Did they refer to cultural development or to national emancipation?

MR. CHANG (China) remarked that the ambiguity was caused by the fact that the word “cultural” could have two meanings; it could refer either to the practice of science and the arts, or the ethnical origin of a community. There could be no doubt that in article 30 the word “cultural” was [4] used in the former sense, and in the context of the words: “cultural groups” could mean nothing but “cultural organizations”. That article was perhaps not the best place to insert the text proposed by the Lebanese representative.

After a brief discussion, THE CHAIRMAN, at the request of the Lebanese representative, decided to put to the vote the additional text submitted by him and the proposed amendments to that text.

The Chairman first put to the vote the amendment proposed by the Philippine representative, which proposed replacing the words: “cultural groups” by “groups of common cultural background”.

The amendment was rejected by 8 votes to 6, with 2 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the amendment proposed by the representative of the Soviet Union, which proposed replacing the words “cultural groups” by: “groups of common ethnical background”.

The amendment was rejected by 10 votes to 6.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the original text submitted by the representative of Lebanon.

The text was rejected by 7 votes to 4, with 5 abstentions.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) suggested that, in view of the Chinese representative's remarks, it would perhaps be more appropriate to add his text to the new article 18 of the Declaration (formerly article 19). He asked the Chairman to put that proposal to the vote.

THE CHAIRMAN asked whether the Commission was prepared to consider the addition of the text to article 18.

The proposal was rejected by 6 votes to 3, with 4 abstentions.

[5]

Article 31

THE CHAIRMAN observed that, in her view, the amendment furthest removed from the original proposal appeared to be that of China, India and the United Kingdom, which proposed the deletion of the article.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that the Commission, having rejected every provision which guaranteed the rights of national minorities, still had an opportunity, by deciding that the amendment to article 30 submitted by the representative of the Soviet Union should become a separate article 31, to declare that those minorities were entitled to the preservation of their culture, to the use of their mother tongue in scholastic establishments, and generally speaking to protection. He therefore made a formal proposal that the amendment to article 30 submitted by him should become a new article 31.

MR. STEPANENKO (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) observed that that proposal would be in harmony with the suggestion of the Chinese representative that it would be inappropriate to include those ideas in article 30.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the deletion of article 31, and remarked that, if it were deleted, the Commission would not have to decide upon the replacement of article 31 by the text proposed by the representative of the Soviet Union.

It was decided by 10 votes to 6 to delete article 31.

MR. CHANG (China) pointed out that the Commission should not give the impression that it had completely ignored the question of the protection of special religious or ethnical groups. In the article relating to the right to education there was a provision in favour of religious minorities.

[6]

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) remarked that the Declaration contained no provision relating to the right of national minorities to have schools in their mother tongue. Furthermore, the Commission had just decided to delete article 31 of the text approved at the second session of the Commission, but he urged that the USSR proposal should be put to the vote.

THE CHAIRMAN put the USSR proposal to the vote.

The proposal was rejected by 10 votes to 5.

Article 32

THE CHAIRMAN, speaking as representative of the United States of America, pointed out that in many cases the Commission might have inserted a sentence or an article in the Declaration merely because no one had had sufficient reason to vote against its inclusion. In general, the Commission had followed the course of stating fundamental rights very briefly, so as to distinguish the Declaration from the Covenant. Such, for example, had been the case with the proposed amendment to the article on arbitrary detention. That amendment had been rejected, not because the Commission was opposed to the rights it set forth, but because the majority had considered the list too detailed.

Article 32, on which the Commission had to take a decision, certainly expressed an idea that could hardly be opposed. There was no doubt that all laws should be in conformity with the purposes and principles of the Charter in so far as they dealt with human rights. But what would be gained by including that article in the Declaration? The Declaration was in no way binding, so that the article could not appropriately be included. Moreover, the words: “purposes and principles of the Charter” were very difficult to define when the question of their application to specific law arose.

[7]

The United States delegation would therefore vote against the inclusion of article 32, since it might lead to misunderstanding and would be out of place in the Declaration.

THE CHAIRMAN put the deletion of article 32 to the vote.

The proposal was adopted by 9 votes to 1, with 4 abstentions.

Article 33

THE CHAIRMAN supported the proposal put forward by India, the United Kingdom and China, for the deletion of the article. It was vague and lacking in precision; its application did not seem clear and it would be unwise to include in the Declaration an article that obscured its meaning.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) was against the proposal supported by the Chairman. During the discussion of the articles of the Declaration, whenever there had been any question of inserting provisions designed to eliminate the remains of Nazism or fascism, the Commission had rejected those provisions on the pretext that they would be covered later by a general article. But the Commission was at present deleting those general articles. The USSR representative urged that even though the relevant USSR proposals had been rejected, the Commission should retain article 33, which had been adopted during the Geneva session and which provided, although in a restricted form, the indispensable elements of defence against the possible rebirth of Nazism or fascism. He emphasized that that article was the only one which could be used as a weapon against Nazism and favoured the French text which seemed to express the idea best. Consequently, he appealed to the Commission to consider its responsibilities before rejecting the article, which might in future serve as a weapon against Nazism and fascism.

[8]

MR. ORDONNEAU (France) thought it essential that the Declaration should at least recall the dangers of Nazism; such a reference would also have a legal value of its own, for as the USSR representative had said, it would be a weapon against any possible recurrence of that doctrine. It was wrong to deny a possible recurrence, and the danger against which article 33 was aimed was a serious one. The cautious wording of the article had also been emphasized by the USSR representative. The French text differed only in drafting from the text adopted at Geneva.

THE CHAIRMAN proposed putting to the vote the deletion of article 33: that being the amendment farthest removed from the original.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that a proposal for deletion could be considered as the farthest removed from the original. Negation was not an amendment; the only amendment was the French one. Moreover, if the deletion were put to the vote first, the Commission could not know which text was being deleted: the text adopted at Geneva or the French one.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that she was conforming to the procedure always followed by the Commission so far without any objection arising. However, she was prepared to put the French amendment to the vote; those in favour of deleting the article should vote against it.

MR. ORDONNEAU (France) observed that the Chairman's ruling seemed perfectly logical. The practice of moving the deletion of an article was bad. Logically, the vote must be against an article, not in favour of its deletion. Those wishing the article to be deleted could vote against each part of it or against the whole.

MR. STEPANENKO (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) recalled that the USSR representative had twice drawn the Commission's attention to [9] that point. Moreover, Rule 54 of the Rules of Procedure was quite clear on the matter.

He favoured the French text of article 33 and supported the views expressed by the USSR representative.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) said that, since he was not allowed to vote as an alternate, he wished to state his delegation's views on article 33. That article was necessary. As article 2 contained a reference to the limitation of human rights in the general interest, the possibility of abusing that reference and violating human rights under cover of the general interest, must be prevented. His delegation was also in favour of the French text.

THE CHAIRMAN put the French amendment to article 33 to the vote.

The amendment was adopted by 10 votes to 1, with 2 abstentions.

Preamble

THE CHAIRMAN read out the draft preamble prepared by the Committee on the Preamble, composed of the officers of the Commission (document E/CN.4/138). She requested the members of the Commission to express their views regarding that text.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) proposed a shorter text (document E/CN.4/139).

The delegation of the Soviet Union thought that the text it proposed was more suitable than the one prepared by the Committee on the Preamble, because it was concise and contained all the elements that should appear in the Preamble to a Declaration on Human Rights.

MR. CHANG (China) stressed the importance of the Preamble and the necessity of taking the utmost care in drafting it, and suggested that the consideration of the two texts submitted to the Commission should be deferred until the following day.

[10]

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) pointed out that it would be advisable to decide without delay which of the texts the Commission would take as a basis for its discussions. Although the delegation of the United Kingdom had itself prepared a draft preamble, it proposed that the text of the Committee on the Preamble should be chosen as a working document, since the text had been drafted with due regard to all the suggestions that had been made.

MR. ORDONNEAU (France), supported by MR. CHANG (China), concurred with that proposal.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) pointed out that it would be premature to decide, without previous consideration, which of the two texts submitted to the Commission should serve as a basis for discussion. The Commission should study on an equal footing all the proposals that were submitted to it. It could discuss the Preamble on the basis of the two texts that had been submitted, and adopt certain clauses from one text and certain ideas from the other. It could not decide before studying those texts that it would not consider one of them.

MR. ORDONNEAU (France) recalled that the Commission had instructed the Committee on the Preamble to draft a text on the basis of all the proposals which had been made with regard to the Preamble. For that reason the Committee's text appeared to have priority over the draft submitted by the various delegations. That did not mean, however, that the latter texts would not be considered by the Commission; they would constitute amendments or variants to the Committee's text.

THE CHAIRMAN confirmed that the text prepared by the Committee was the result of the examination of all the drafts that had been submitted; the latter could be proposed again by the delegations.

[11]

The Commission decided to defer the discussion of the Preamble to the Declaration until the following day.

Article 2, paragraph 2

MR. LOUTFI (Egypt) submitted the following text for article 2, paragraph 2, which his delegation had drafted in consultation with the delegations of France and the United Kingdom:

“In the exercise of all the rights and freedoms enumerated in this Declaration, everyone shall be subject only to such limitations as are necessary to secure due recognition and respect for the rights of others and to the requirements of morality, of general welfare and of public order in a democratic society.”

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that there were only two differences between that text and the draft prepared by the Style Committee: (1) the beginning of the sentence was shortened in the latter draft, being couched as follows: “In the exercise of his rights, everyone shall be subject only. . .”; (2) the words “morality” and “public order” had been added to the expression “general welfare” which alone appeared in the Style Committee's text.

MR. LOUTFI (Egypt) agreed to revert to the wording adopted by the Style Committee for the beginning of the sentence, but he insisted on the addition of the words: “morality” and “public welfare”.

In reply to a question by MR. CHANG (China), he pointed out that, according to the French and Latin idea, the expression “general welfare” did not include morality and public order.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) said that in English that expression included both morality and public order. Since that was not the case in French, his delegation had not opposed the insertion of the three terms so [12] that the French might be more accurate. However, since the expression “general welfare” had a wider significance than the expression “public order”, he suggested that the order of the terms should be transposed and that the text should read as follows: “. . .and to the requirements of morality, public order and general welfare in a democratic society.”

MR. FONTAINA (Uruguay) drew attention to the danger of using an expression such as “public order” which, given a wide definition, might lend itself to various interpretations. He pointed out that arbitrary acts could be committed under the pretext of defending public order. He suggested the use of the expression: “security for all”, which appeared in the draft submitted by the delegation of India and the United Kingdom (document E/CN.4/99).

MR. ORDONNEAU (France) stated that the English expression “general welfare” was untranslatable and had very little meaning in French. It was in order to solve the translation difficulty that the French delegation had added “la morale” and “l’ordre publique” to the expression “bien-être général”, so as to cover everything that was contained in the English idea of “general welfare”.

He pointed out that there was no danger to individual liberty in the expression “public order”; public order was, in fact, intended to preserve public security. Moreover, the French delegation had taken the precaution of stating that it was public order “in a democratic society”, so as to leave no room for any restrictive interpretation.

MR. HOOD (Australia) preferred the word “order” without any qualification, since the expression “public order” generally conjured up the idea of arbitrary measures. [13]

MR. ORDONNEAU (France) said that the word “ordre” would make the French text incomprehensible. If the English expression “general welfare” corresponded to the French idea of “l’ordre public”, the former could be used in the English text and the latter in the French.

MR. CHANG (China) supported that suggestion. He pointed out that, in the article which dealt with limitations to which human rights were to be subject, it would be well to avoid any enumeration which might give the impression that the Commission was inclining towards too much restriction.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) saw no valid reason why the three expressions should not be retained. In that connexion, he remarked that the terms “peace”, “order” and “good government” were to be found together in several federal Constitutions and expressing the same idea.

MR. FONTAINA (Uruguay) repeated his objection to the use of the expression “public order”. The meaning of words changed according to the use that was made of them; that use sometimes became abusive, as in the case of the word “propaganda”, which had acquired a pejorative meaning and could no longer be used to mean “publicity”. So many crimes had been committed in the name of public order that the meaning of the expression had been distorted. The fact that the text spoke of public order “in a democratic society” did not solve the difficulty, since there were many different ideas of democratic society.

Mr. Fontaina urged the Commission to adopt the more simple expression “security for all”, which was not open to misinterpretation.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) supported the remarks of the representative of Uruguay regarding the expression “public order”. He proposed the following text: “. . . and to the requirements of general welfare and interest”.

[14]

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) emphasized that it was the laws of States that fixed the limits for the exercise of human rights and freedoms. He suggested, therefore, that the following phrase should be added to the text proposed by the Egyptian representative: “in accordance with the just requirements of the democratic State”.

MR. FONTAINA (Uruguay) proposed to be guided by article 28 of the Declaration of Human Rights adopted by the Inter-American Conference at Bogotá, according to which the exercise of human rights was subject only to such limitations as were necessary in order to respect the rights of others, the security of all and the just requirements of the democratic State.

MR. ORDONNEAU (France) stressed the special interest his delegation attached to the article dealing with limitations to the exercise of human rights. He reminded the Commission that, during the course of its discussion, it had deleted the provisions concerning limitations to certain rights from the text of the articles in question, because those limitations would be expressed in general terms in one single article. Thus, for example, the Declaration proclaimed freedom of conscience, of association and of assembly, without a single reservation. It was absolutely essential to re-establish the balance between the various provisions of the Declaration.

Mr. Ordonneau repeated that in French the idea of public order was in no way associated with political theories; it had a purely administrative significance, and corresponded to public morality, peace and security. Since the Declaration was a legal text, it was better to adopt an expression such as “public order”, which had a definite legal meaning, rather than use vague philosophical and literary terms, such as those proposed by the Lebanese representative.

[15]

Replying to the remarks of the USSR representative, Mr. Ordonneau pointed out that freedom was not exercised only within the framework of the State, but also, for example, within that of municipalities. For that reason, the French delegation had preferred to use the expression “democratic society”, which covered communal groups.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the USSR proposal to add the following words to the text submitted by the Egyptian delegation: “in accordance with the just requirements of the democratic State”.

The USSR proposal was rejected by 11 votes to 4, with 1 abstention.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the Uruguayan proposal to substitute the expression: “security for all” for the expression “public order”.

The Uruguayan proposal was rejected by 6 votes to 5, with 5 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN then put the text proposed by the Egyptian delegation to the vote.

The text proposed by the Egyptian delegation for paragraph 2 of article 2 of the Declaration was adopted by 8 votes to 1, with 7 abstentions.

...

E/CN.4/143

16 June 1948

Philippine Amendment to Operative Clause of Preamble

Now therefore the General Assembly

Proclaims this Declaration on Human Rights as a common standard of achievement for all nations, to the end that every individual and every organ of society, keeping this Declaration constantly in mind, shall strive by teaching and education and by appropriate national legislation and international action to promote respect for these rights and freedoms and to secure their universal and effective recognition and observances.

E/CN.4/144

16 June 1948

China and the United States: Proposal Concerning Education for the Declaration on Human Rights

It is recommended that the Economic and Social Council pass a resolution containing the following proposal.

Immediately after action is taken by the General Assembly on the Declaration on Human Rights, the Secretary-General of the United Nations shall be requested, acting with the advice of the Commission on Human Rights and interested specialized agencies and in co-operation with Member States, to institute a comprehensive programme of education designed to bring before the people of the world the principles set forth in the Declaration in such a manner that they and their Governments may be encouraged to take steps within their own borders to bring about the conditions which the Declaration envisages as being essential to the full realization of human rights and fundamental freedoms.

E/CN.4/146

16 June 1948

Report of the Sub-Committee Consisting of the Representatives of Australia, China, Philippines, United Kingdom and United States of America on Paragraphs 4 and 5 of the Preamble on the Draft International Declaration on Human Rights

First Alternative

Whereas the peoples of the United Nations are determined to promote social progress and better standards of life in larger freedom, and

Whereas the Members of the United Nations are pledged to co-operate in promoting and encouraging respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms for all

(Sixth paragraph replace “through” by “on the basis of” or “with”)

Second Alternative

Whereas the Members of the United Nations are pledged to cooperate in promoting and encouraging respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms for all and are determined to promote social progress and better standards of life in larger freedom

(Replace “pledge” in sixth paragraph by “purposes”)

Note: Delete the fourth paragraph.

E/CN.4/147*16 June 1948*Original Text: French

Statement by Mr. René Cassin, Representative of France, on the Implementation of Human Rights

Madam Chairman,

I want first to thank you and all my colleagues on the Commission for granting me this opportunity, – before my quite unavoidable premature departure – of broaching the question of the “implementation” of human rights which appeared under Item 2 of our agenda, and allowing me to hold up for a few moments the approaching completion of our laborious discussion on the International Declaration, the Preamble, Articles 2 and 20, and the last but extremely important articles designed to link the Declaration to the Conventions between States, the first of which has been studied by the Drafting Committee.

1. As has been well said, we must not only proclaim the essential human rights and briefly specify on whom the obligations rest, but also delimit these rights and specify how they can be ensured.

This last part of our work is by no means irrelevant to the Declaration, for the human rights which existed before the Charter of the United Nations, a fortiori exist long before we formulate them in the Declaration. Nor must it be forgotten that a Declaration, basic instrument of the General Assembly, implies certain aspects which are binding per se, for example, the decision of the United Nations to offer its assistance to States Members and the specialized agencies in drawing up future Conventions, or the decision to set up an auxiliary body. In other respects, however, the Declaration will have the character of a recommendation. Such will be the case when it calls on States Members generally to bring their legislation into conformity with the principles formulated in it, and to set up, within the sphere of their jurisdiction, [2] systems of appeal to judicial and administrative bodies, in order to prevent and, if necessary correct or suppress such violations of human rights as may have been committed within their territory.

...

E/CN.4/152*16 June 1948

Report of the Drafting Sub-Committee on the 6th Paragraph of the Preamble of the Draft International Declaration
on Human Rights

Whereas a definition (a common understanding) of these rights and freedoms is necessary (of the greatest importance) for the fulfilment of this pledge.

E/CN.4/SR.75
16 June 1948<sup>133</sup>

Summary Record of the Seventy-Fifth Meeting
[of the Commission on Human Rights]

Held at Lake Success, New York, on Wednesday,
 16 June 1948, at 10:45 a.m.

Chairman: Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, United States of America. Rapporteur: Mr. Azkoul, Lebanon. Members: Mr. Hood, Australia; Mr. Lebeau, Belgium; Mr. Stepanenko, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic; Mr. Larrain, Chile; Mr. Chang, China; Mr. Loutfi, Egypt; Mr. Ordonneau, France; Mrs. Mehta, India; Mr. Quijano, Panama; Mr. Lopez, Philippines; Mr. Klekovkin, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic; Mr. Pavlov, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics; Mr. Wilson, United Kingdom; Mr. Fontaina, Uruguay; Mr. Vilfan, Yugoslavia. Representatives of specialized agency: Mr. Lebar, United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO). Consultants from non-governmental organizations: Miss Sender, American Federation of Labor (AFL); Mr van Istendael, International Federation of Christian Trade Unions (IFCTU); Miss Stuart, World Federation of United Nations Associations (WFUNA). [2] Consultants of non-governmental organizations (continued): Mrs. Drennan, Catholic International Union for Social Service; Mr. Nolde, Commission of the Churches on International Affairs; Mr. Moskowitz, Advisory Board of Jewish Organizations; Mrs. Van den Berg, International Women's Alliance; Miss Strahler, International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC); Miss Robb, Liaison Committee of International Women's Organizations; Mr. Bienenfeld, World Jewish Congress (WJC). Secretariat: Mr. Humphrey, Director of the Human Rights Division; Mr. Lawson, Secretary of the Commission.

Continuation of the Discussion on the Draft Declaration of Human Rights:
Continuation of the Report of the Style Committee

THE CHAIRMAN said that the alterations proposed by the Style Committee were submitted for the approval of the Commission. She pointed out that the changes affected only the drafting and the order of the articles and did not alter their substance.

THE CHAIRMAN suggested the substitution of the word "of" for the word "on" in the English title. That change would not affect the French. Moreover, she suggested that the present title "Draft Declaration of Human Rights" should be replaced by "United Nations Declaration of Human Rights".

At the request of MR. ORDONNEAU (France), the French text of the second paragraph of the revised article 2 was amended as follows:

<sup>133</sup> This was the date of the meeting. The document was issued on 30 June 1948.

“... limitations as are necessary to secure respect for the rights of others and to (satisfy) the requirements ...”

At the request of MR. WILSON (United Kingdom), the English text of the second paragraph of the revised article 2 was amended by deletion of the word “to” in the phrase: “... for the rights of others and (to) the requirements...”

[3]

MR. CHANG (China) suggested that the order of the articles should be altered as follows: (a) the revised article 2 should be placed immediately before article 33 which had been adopted at the previous meeting; the article proposed by the representative of Lebanon should be placed before article 2; (b) the two paragraphs which made up article 3 might become two separate articles: the first paragraph would become article 2 and the second paragraph would become article 5 preceding the provisions concerning legal rights; (c) articles 4 and 5 would then become respectively articles 3 and 4; articles 6, 7 and 8 would remain unchanged.

MR. LEBEAU (Belgium) thought that the Commission was faced with two separate questions, namely, the approval of the text drawn up by the Style Committee, and the order of the articles in the Declaration. He asked that the text drawn up by the Style Committee should be approved before the consideration of the proposal submitted by the representative of China.

MR. CHANG (China) pointed out that his proposal should be taken as an amendment to the report of the Style Committee and should, therefore, be considered at the same time as that report.

THE CHAIRMAN proposed that the Commission should defer consideration of the Style Committee’s report until the next meeting.

Discussion of the Preamble to the Draft International Declaration of Human Rights

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the Commission had before it three draft preambles: the first had been submitted by the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics; the second had been drawn up by the Committee on the Preamble which had taken account of the drafts presented by France, Belgium, the United States and the American Federation of Labor; the third draft had been submitted by the United Kingdom (document E/CN.4/124).

[4]

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) thought that the draft drawn up by the Committee on the Preamble should be taken as the basic text and the two other drafts considered as amendments.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) thought that the order of discussion suggested by the Chairman was preferable inasmuch as the draft submitted by his delegation could not be considered merely as an amendment to the text drawn up by the Committee on the Preamble. He observed that the Committee had failed to observe the principle of brevity which had been advocated in the course of previous discussions. He also pointed out that if the Commission were to adopt the preamble as drafted by the USSR delegation possibly with a few amendments, it would be unnecessary to consider any other draft.

Mr. Pavlov requested that the USSR draft of the preamble should be voted in parts: the first part, consisting of the first two paragraphs, recalled the principles of the Charter; the second part constituted the recommendation to the General Assembly.

THE CHAIRMAN read the draft preamble submitted by the USSR (document E/CN.4/139) and put it to the vote in parts, as requested by the representative of the USSR.

The first part was rejected by 9 votes to 5, with 2 abstentions.

The second part was rejected by 8 votes to 5, with 3 abstentions.

The draft preamble submitted by the USSR was rejected.

THE CHAIRMAN opened the discussion on the draft prepared by the Style Committee and proposed that it should be examined paragraph by paragraph.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) drew attention to the logical way in which the text had been prepared. Paragraph 1 laid down an absolute and general [5] principle, which was independent of the existence of the United Nations; paragraph 2 declared that that principle had been violated; paragraph 3 showed the importance of averting the dangers of such a violation in the future; paragraph 4 was a reminder that the Charter provided that human rights should be respected; paragraph 5 recalled that the members of the United Nations had undertaken to respect those rights; paragraph 6 showed how those rights could be respected; lastly, a concluding paragraph consisted of the General Assembly's resolution.

THE CHAIRMAN read the text of paragraph 1.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) proposed a drafting amendment which would not affect the French text: that the word "of" should be inserted before the words "the equal".

The proposal was adopted.

MR. CHANG (China) hoped this paragraph would be adopted in view of its special importance and intrinsic value.

Paragraph 1 was adopted by 11 votes to none, with 5 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN read out paragraph 2.

MR. LEBEAU (Belgium) proposed that in the French text the words “à la veille de” should be replaced by the word “avant”.

MR. ORDONNEAU (France) preferred the words “dans la période précédente”. This suggestion was supported by the representative of Belgium, and the amendment was adopted.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) asked for the insertion in the English text of the word “of” after the word “ignorance”, an alteration which did not affect the French text. He also proposed that the last part of the paragraph should be omitted, from the words “and made it apparent to all . . .”

[6]

THE CHAIRMAN put the proposal for the omission of these words to the vote.

*The proposal was rejected by 6 votes to 3 with 5 abstentions.
The last sentence of paragraph 2 was retained.*

MR. CHANG (China) pointed out that the addition of the word “of” in the English text would narrow the meaning of the word “ignorance”. Most of the members of the Style Committee had had in mind ignorance in general and not simply ignorance of human rights.

THE CHAIRMAN agreed with the representative of China.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) thought that the word as understood by the representative of China was weaker than in the sense of ignorance of human rights; he thought ignorance of human rights should be mentioned, and that there was no question of referring to ignorance in general in the Preamble.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that as the Preamble submitted by the USSR had been rejected in a manner which he considered far too hasty, he would abstain in principle throughout the voting on the Preamble. He would, nevertheless, make any observations he might deem necessary. He agreed with the representative of the United Kingdom. The Second World War had not been the result of ignorance of human rights but had been caused by the policy of Germany. The conclusions of paragraph 2 were faulty and might confuse the man in the street.

MR. ORDONNEAU (France) pointed out to the representative of the USSR that his remarks had unfortunately come too late, as a vote had already been taken on the retention of the last words of the paragraph.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) asked that the insertion of the word “of” should be put to the vote. He had thought its omission had been [7] a grammatical error, but if the present wording was intentional, it would be difficult for him to accept it.

MR. LEBEAU (Belgium) pointed out that the French text used the word “méconnaissance”, which could not be taken here as having a general sense; it definitely meant ignorance of human rights. He would support the United Kingdom amendment.

MR. CHANG (China) explained that he had not approved the drafting of this paragraph. It was true that the Germans and the Japanese were to blame for their contempt of human rights, but it could not be said that they had been ignorant of those rights. The word “ignorance” in the English text was not the right word, and he would propose that it should be replaced in the English text by the words “indifference to”.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that the retention of the word “ignorance” would give the impression that the acts of the Germans and Japanese were being excused because they did not know that they were violating human rights. This was the most serious error in the whole paragraph. There had been no ignorance on the part of the aggressors, but a natural development of a system which had led to war. Public opinion had been shocked by the measures which the Fascists had deliberately taken, first in their own countries and later, during the war, in occupied countries.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) thought it would be preferable to adopt the Chinese representative’s proposal that the word “ignorance” should be omitted.

MR. ORDONNEAU (France) pointed out that the difficulty did not arise in the French text, as the word “méconnaissance” meant intentional ignorance.

[8]

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) agreed with the representative of France, but drew attention to the fact that there was a difference of degree between “méconnaissance” and “mépris”. Consequently, if the word “méconnaissance” (“ignorance” in the English text) were omitted, that would give the impression that only contempt for human rights was condemned and not ignorance of those rights.

MR. LEBEAU (Belgium) also thought that the distinction between ignorance and contempt should be preserved and suggested that “disregard of” should be used in the English text.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) accepted the Belgian representative’s proposal.

MR. CHANG (China) proposed that the substitution of the words “disregard of” for “ignorance” should be put to the vote.

The amendment was adopted by 10 votes to 1 with 5 abstentions.

[9]

MR. HOOD (Australia) spoke again on the wording of the second paragraph. Although the Commission had decided to retain the much too dogmatic statement it contained, he wondered whether, in spite of that, it would not be wiser to define its scope more precisely by saying, in the English text, at the end of the sentence “and made it apparent to all that the fundamental freedoms were a (instead of “the”) supreme issue of the conflict.”

MR. CHANG (China) pointed out that as the idea underlying the sentence was saved, it would be perfectly in order to submit amendments to that sentence.

THE CHAIRMAN agreed.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) said that the adjective “supreme” had an absolute meaning. It would, therefore, be incorrect to speak of a supreme issue since there could be only one supreme issue.

MR. HOOD (Australia), while agreeing with the Lebanese representative in regard to grammar, nevertheless, maintained that in ordinary language it was often possible to have several supreme issues.

THE CHAIRMAN suggested that the expression “an essential issue” should be used.

MR. LARRAIN (Chile) who shared Mr. Azkoul’s views on the use of the word “supreme” said that he would agree to: “one of the essential issues”.

MR. FONTAINA (Uruguay) said that, like the USSR representative, he had abstained from voting during the debate on whether to delete the words under discussion, as he too considered that those words raised a question of substance, and that he disagreed with the idea they expressed.

[10]

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that all those difficulties would have been avoided had the Commission adopted the text proposed for the Preamble by the USSR. The second paragraph of the Preamble drafted by the Commission’s office gave the impression that the war had been caused by ignorance. It should not be forgotten that contempt for human rights had been taught by political groups which belonged to a well-defined system and were based on a capitalist economy aided by overseas countries. If the causes of the war were mentioned, the real ones should be given and those lay at the roots of the political system of the Nazi and Fascist groups, and in the lack of balance caused by capitalist economy. That system and that economy carried within themselves, and would always carry inherently the seeds of war. If the course of war was to be mentioned, that should be said; otherwise the matter should be left alone.

MR. ORDONNEAU (France) pointed out that the paragraph under discussion in no way dealt with the causes of war. It stated that respect for human rights was at stake. Victory had undeniably led to the establishment of a system which respected human rights certainly more than the Nazis had.

Discussion followed on the correct translation into Spanish of the English word “ignorance”. The Chairman asked the Spanish-speaking representatives to agree on a translation which the Commission could approve.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) suggested the wording “that the fundamental freedoms were at stake in that conflict” so as to emphasize that respect for the fundamental freedoms depended on the outcome of the conflict.

[11]

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) was still convinced that the host solution would be to delete the last part of the sentence. The Lebanese proposal gave the text a meaning which was nearer reality, but at the same time weakened it so much that one wondered whether it would be worth including in the Preamble.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the proposal to delete from the second paragraph, third line of the English text the words “to all”.

It was decided by 7 votes to none, with 8 abstentions, to delete the words “to all”.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the Lebanese amendment to say “. . . and made it apparent that the fundamental freedoms were at stake in the conflict.”

The amendment was rejected by 3 votes to none, with 11 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the Australian amendment to change the last part of the sentence so as to read: “. . . the fundamental freedoms were one of the supreme issues of the conflict.”

The amendment was adopted by 7 votes to none, with 9 abstentions.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) proposed putting to the vote the sentence as amended.

MR. LOPEZ (Philippines) and Mr. Larrain (Chile) objected to that procedure, pointing out that the Commission had weakened the sentence to please the United Kingdom representative in the hope of contributing to a result which the Commission could accept. One should not trade on that spirit of co-operation by asking for the deletion of the sentence. In effect, the Chilean representative had voted in favour of its retention and Mr. Wilson had criticized the sentence because its wording was too strong but had now been toned down. A vote had already been taken on that part of the sentence.

[12]

MR. ORDONNEAU (France) said that the Commission had decided at its last meeting not to vote on proposals to delete paragraphs.

MR. FONTAINA (Uruguay) pointed out that since they were dealing with a historic document of great importance, the rules of procedure should be applied so that the question could be settled. A vote should first be taken on the question of whether the vote, already taken, to delete the sentence, should be retaken.

MR. VILFAN (Yugoslavia) would abstain from voting as he was in favour of the draft Preamble submitted by the USSR, but thought that the second paragraph followed logically from the ideas stated in paragraph 1. Since the first paragraph spoke of the importance of observing the respect due to all the members of the human family and their equal and inalienable rights, one naturally expected the second paragraph which spoke of the war to say that the Second World War had imperilled the value and existence of those rights and freedoms.

MR. CHANG (China) pointed out that the Preamble had not been drafted in accordance with a concept acceptable to all the members of the Committee. That was why the second paragraph had not been unanimously supported.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the question of whether a vote should be retaken on the deletion of the last part of the second paragraph.

The proposal to retake the vote was adopted by 7 votes to 4, with 5 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN took a vote on whether the last part of the sentence should be retained.

It was decided by 7 votes to 3, with 6 abstentions, to retain the last part of the sentence.

[13]

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the last part of the sentence as amended, i.e., the English text to read “and made it apparent that the fundamental freedoms were a supreme issue of the conflict.”

The text was adopted by 7 votes to none, with 8 abstentions.

Paragraph 3

MR. LOUTFI (Egypt) said that in order to make the Preamble as brief as was fitting, all proposals of secondary importance should be avoided. The paragraph did not express a single essential idea. It mentioned revolts “against tyranny and oppression”. There was no need to retain that idea in the Preamble. The paragraph also referred to the protection of human rights by “a regime of law”, an idea which should be retained but which was already included in paragraph 5. In effect, paragraph 5 spoke of promoting and encouraging respect for human rights and for fundamental freedoms, which could only be assured by appropriate legislation conferring on such rights and freedoms the protection of the law. The third paragraph could, therefore, be dropped in toto.

MR. ORDONNEAU (France) raised a question of procedure. To delete a sentence, a negative vote should be recorded when it was put to the vote. The method of voting on proposals to delete certain sentences was wrong, and the Commission had found, in regard to the preceding paragraph, that it led to several votes on the same question, which should have been decided by a single vote.

The provisional French wording used the expression “le régime de la loi”, as being the equivalent of the English “a regime of law”. The expression had no exact meaning. It would be better to use an old expression, namely “le regne de la loi” (the rule of law”).
[14]

MR. LOPEZ (Philippines) would vote against the adoption of paragraph 3 for the reasons already referred to by the Egyptian representative, and also because that paragraph referred to the right of the people to rebel, a reference which might be misconstrued. That was a right which had not been mentioned anywhere in the body of the Declaration.

He would prefer the legal protection to be given to the rights and freedoms to be mentioned in another part of the Preamble, and suggested its inclusion in the operative part of the Preamble, to which his delegation had submitted an amendment.

THE CHAIRMAN put paragraph 3 to the vote.

Paragraph 3 was adopted by 8 votes to 6, with 2 abstentions, thus being retained in the Preamble.

Paragraphs 4 and 5

THE CHAIRMAN opened the debate on paragraphs 4 and 5, which were closely linked.

MR. HOOD (Australia) suggested merging the two paragraphs, and thought that paragraph 4 might even be completely omitted. It was quite appropriate to quote the Charter, but if a quotation was to be made it would be best to use a passage conceived in more explicit and energetic terms.

Articles 55 and 56 of the Charter were ideal for that purpose. He, therefore, suggested that the following text be adopted for paragraph 5:

“Whereas the Members of the United Nations are pledged to take joint and separate action in co-operation with the Organization to promote and encourage respect for human rights and for fundamental freedoms. . .”

[15]

MISS SENDER (American Federation of Labor) said that the draft Preamble submitted by her Organization was among the drafts which the Committee on the Preamble had used as a basis for discussion before presenting a text for consideration. The draft submitted by the American Federation of Labor stressed the concept that indifference towards the happiness and the welfare of the individual made possible the spreading of suffering. The draft also emphasized the need to improve economic and social conditions to assist the people of the world in obtaining freedom from fear and want, thereby providing one of the most effective guaranties that human rights would be respected.

The Charter propounded the same idea.

MR. CHANG (China) also wanted the need for an improvement in economic and social conditions mentioned. It could be done by borrowing the words of the Charter on that subject. He suggested setting up a small committee to choose the appropriate quotations from the Charter.

THE CHAIRMAN agreed with the Chinese representative's request and appointed a committee for that purpose, consisting of the representatives of China, the United Kingdom, Australia, the United States and Yugoslavia, which would meet in the early afternoon.

MR. VILFAN (Yugoslavia) declined the offer as the Preamble as a whole, either wittingly or unwittingly, was based on a conception to which he could not subscribe; he could not note any concrete contributions to the preparation of a text based on a conception he did not share.

[16]

In reply to a question by MR. CHANG (China), he pointed out that the Preamble spoke only of the rights of the individual, whereas it could also have mentioned, as a compromise, and in deference to the ideas of all the members of the Commission, the rights of the Nation and of peoples.

The Preamble as submitted failed to recognize the duty of the individual to his Nation and to his State.

THE CHAIRMAN asked the representative of the Philippines to take the place of the Yugoslav representative on the Committee to choose the paragraphs from the Charter to be mentioned in the Preamble.

The meeting rose at 1:05 p.m.

E/CN.4/SR.76

16 June 1948<sup>134</sup>

Original Text: French

Summary Record of the Seventy-Sixth Meeting
[of the Commission on Human Rights]

Held at Lake Success, New York, on Wednesday,
 16 June 1948, at 10:45 a.m.<sup>135</sup>

Chairman: Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, United States of America. Rapporteur: Mr. Charles Malik, later, Mr. Azkoul, Lebanon. Members: Mr. Hood, Australia; Mr. Lebeau, Belgium;

<sup>134</sup> This was the date of the meeting. The document was issued on 1 July 1948.

<sup>135</sup> According to document E/CN.4/SR.76/Corr:1, the seventy-sixth meeting began at 2.30 p.m. and not at 10.45 a.m.

Mr. Stepanenko, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic; Mr. Larrain, Chile; Mr. Chang, China; Mr. Loutfi, Egypt; Mr. Ordonneau, France; Mrs. Mehta, India; Mr. Quijano, Panama; Mr. Lopez, Philippines; Mr. Klekovkin, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic; Mr. Pavlov, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics; Mr. Wilson, United Kingdom; Mr. Fontaina, Uruguay; Mr. Vilfan, Yugoslavia. Representative of specialized agency: Mr. Lebar, United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (UNESCO). Consultants from non-governmental organizations: Miss Sender, American Federation of Labor (AFL); Mr van Istendael, International Federation of Christian Trade Unions (IFCTU); Miss Stuart, World Federation of United Nations Associations (WFUNA); Mrs. Drennan, Catholic International Union for Social Service; Mr. Nolde, Commission of the Churches on International Affairs; Mr. Moskowitz, Consultative Council for Jewish Organizations; Mrs. Vandenberg, International Women's Alliance; Miss Strahler, International Committee of the Red Cross; Miss Parsons, International Women's Council; Miss Burgess, International Federation of Business and Professional Women. [2] Consultants from non-governmental organizations (continued): Miss Schaefer, International Union of Catholic Women's Leagues; Miss Robb, Liaison Committee of International Women's Organizations. Secretariat: Mr. Humphrey, Director, Human Rights Division; Mr. Lawson, Secretary of the Commission.

...

[16]

Proposals Worked out by the Sub-Committee Appointed to Redraft the Fourth Paragraph of the Preamble
(Document E/CN.4/138)

MR. CHANG (China) submitted the two proposals drawn up by the Sub-Committee and pointed out that the text of those proposals was taken from the preamble of the Charter.

MR. ORDONNEAU (France) remarked that the text of the original document had also been taken from the Charter, and asked exactly which passage was being dealt with at the present time. He added that the expression "... in the dignity and worth of the human person..." had disappeared from the text at present before the Commission. It was impossible, however, to doubt the importance of mentioning that principle; such an omission could be interpreted as a deviation from certain principles laid down in the Charter.

MR. CHANG (China) admitted that the work of the Drafting Committee had been unduly hurried and that it might be desirable to refer the matter to the next meeting.

Following a discussion in which the representatives of Lebanon, France, the United Kingdom, China and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics took part, the Chairman requested the Drafting Committee to meet immediately after the meeting.

The meeting rose at 5:45 p.m.

E/CN.4/148

17 June 1948

Draft Report of the Commission on Human Rights to the Economic and Social Council

1. The third session of the Commission on Human Rights opened on 24 May 1948 at the Interim Headquarters of the United Nations, Lake Success. The Commission held _____ plenary meetings and terminated its work on _____ June 1948.

2. The following representatives of Member Nations on the Commission attended: Chairman: Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt (United States) Representative. Vice-Chairmen: Dr. P. C. Chang (China) Representative; Prof. René Cassin (France) Representative. Rapporteur: Dr. Charles Malik (Lebanon) Representative. Members: Mr. A. J. D. Hood (Australia) Alternate; Mr. R. Lebeau (Belgium) Alternate; Mr. A. S. Stepanenko (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) Representative; Mr. Herman Santa Cruz (Chile) Representative; Mr. Omar Loutfi (Egypt) Representative; Mrs. Hansa Mehta (India) Representative; Mr. M. de J. Quijano (Panama) Alternate; Mr. S. Lopez (Philippines) Alternate; Mr. M. Klekovkin (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) Representative; Mr. A. P. Pavlov (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) Alternate; Mr. Geoffrey Wilson (United Kingdom) Alternate; Mr. Jose Mora (Uruguay) Representative; Mr. Josa Vilfan (Yugoslavia) Alternate.

[2]

3. Mrs. Amalia C. Ledon (Mexico), Vice-Chairman of the Commission on the Status of Women, was present and participated without vote when sections of the draft of the International Bill of Human Rights relating to the particular rights of women were being considered.

4. The following representatives of specialized agencies were also present at the session: Mr. R. W. Cox and Dr. R. A. Metall, International Labour Organization; Mr. Pierre Lebar, United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization; Miss B. Howell and Mr. Hill, World Health Organization; Mr. Oliver Stone, Preparatory Commission for the International Refugee Organization.

5. The following consultants from non-governmental organizations were also present: Category A: Miss Toni Sender, American Federation of Labor; Mr. August J. A. van Istendael, International Federation of Christian Trade Unions; Miss Julia Stuart, World Federation of United Nations Associations; Category B: Dr. Salomon Goldsmith, Dr. Isaac Levin and Dr. M. L. Munk, Agudas Israel World Organization; Miss Juliet H. Drennan, Catholic International Union for Social Service; Dr. O. Frederick Nolde and Mr. Sartell Prentice Jr., Commission of the Churches on International Affairs; Mr. Moses Moskowitz, Consultative Council of Jewish Organizations; Mr. Barnett Janner, Mr. A. G.

Brotman and Mr. Arthur C.A. Liverhant, Co-ordinating Board of Jewish Organizations for Consultation with the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations; Mrs. Marian Baker van den Berg, International Alliance of Women; Miss Marguerite Strahler, International Committee of the Red Cross; [3] Mrs. W. F. Parsons, International Council of Women; Miss Mildred Burgess, International Federation of Business and Professional Women; Miss Catherine Schaefer, International Union of Catholic Women's Leagues; Dr. Janet Robb, Liaison Committee of Women's International Organizations; Dr. F.R. Bienenfeld and Mr. Stephen D. Wolkowicz, World Jewish Congress; Miss Elizabeth A. Smart, World Women's Christian Temperance Union; Miss Anne Guthrie, World's Y.W.C.A.

6. Although its session opened on 24 May, the Commission was unable to begin its work on substantive questions until the afternoon of 26 May, owing to the delay in arriving at Lake Success of Mr. Stepanenko, Representative of the Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, and of Mr. Klekovkin, Representative of the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic. The Commission drew the attention of the Secretary-General of the United Nations to the fact that these Representatives could not arrive in time for the beginning of the third session of the Commission, for reasons independent of their will and in violation of the agreement adopted by the General Assembly on 31 October 1947; and called the attention of the Secretary-General to the necessity of taking measures to prevent a repetition of such incidents in the future.

7. Mr. Herman Santa Cruz (Chile) participated from the forty-ninth to the fifty-second meetings; Mr. Jose Mora (Uruguay) from the forty-sixth to the fifty-second meetings; and Prof. René Cassin (France) from the forty-sixth to the seventy-third meetings. Mr. Santa Cruz was represented from the fifty-fourth to the final meeting by Mr. J. Larrain; Mr. Mora was represented from the fifty-third to the final meeting by Mr. Roberto Fontaina; and Prof. Cassin was represented from the seventy-third to the final meeting by Mr. Pierre Ordonneau; these alternates were given the right to vote. In various meetings during the session Mr. G. Jockel (Australia) substituted for Mr. Hood, Mr. L. Steyaert (Belgium) for Mr. Lebeau, Dr. T. Y. Wu (China) for Dr. Chang, Dr. K. Azkoul (Lebanon) for Dr. Malik, and Mr. Jose D. Ingles for Mr. Lopez; these alternates were not given the right to vote. The Representative of Iran did not participate in the session. An observer representing the Government of New Zealand attended various meetings of the session.

[4]

8. The Commission re-elected Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt (United States of America) as Chairman, Dr. P.C. Chang (China) as Vice-Chairman, and Dr. Charles Malik (Lebanon) as Rapporteur. It elected Prof. René Cassin (France) as a Second Vice-Chairman.

9. Prof. John P. Humphrey, Director of the Division of Human Rights, represented the Secretary-General. Mr. Edward Lawson acted as Secretary of the Commission. [5]

10. The Commission adopted the Provisional Agenda (document E/CN.4/88) as its Agenda.

11. The expression of the views of the Members of the Commission is embodied in the summary records of the plenary meetings (document E/CN.4/SR.46 to _____).

12. Plan of Work in Regard to the International Bill of Human Rights

[There is no text following paragraph 12.]

13. The Prevention of Discrimination and the Protection of Minorities

The Commission decided to postpone reconsideration of the terms of reference of the Sub-Commission on the Prevention of Discrimination and the Protection of Minorities, as it had decided to do at its second session, until it had drawn up its draft International Bill of Human Rights, including implementation. It expressed the view that there was no need for the Sub-Commission to meet prior to the next meeting of the [5] Commission, since the Draft International Bill of Human Rights had not been completed at this session; and decided that reconsideration of the terms of reference of the Sub-Commission would be on the agenda of its next session.

...

E/CN.4/149
17 June 1948

Second Report of the Drafting Sub-Committee on the Preamble to the Draft International Declaration of Human Rights

4. Whereas the peoples of the United Nations have in the Charter determined to reaffirm faith in fundamental human rights and in the dignity and worth of the human person and to promote social progress and better standards of life in larger freedom; and

5. Whereas Member States have pledged themselves to achieve, in co-operation with the Organization, the promotion of universal respect for and observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms; and

6. Whereas this pledge can be fulfilled only on the basis of a common understanding of the nature of these rights and freedoms,

Now therefore the General Assembly

Proclaims this Declaration of Human Rights as a common standard of achievement for all nations, to the end that every individual and every organ of society, keeping this Declaration constantly in mind, shall strive by teaching and education to promote respect for these rights and freedoms and by progressive measures, national and international, to secure their universal and effective recognition and observance.

E/CN.4/150

17 June 1948

France-United States of America: Proposal on the Next Session of the Commission on Human Rights

The Commission recognizes that, in approving this Declaration, it has not completed its task of preparing a bill of human rights. The bill consists of a Declaration, a Covenant and measures of implementation.

The Declaration forms part only of the bill of rights. Completion of a Covenant including measures of implementation is essential.

The Commission recommends to the Economic and Social Council that a meeting of the Commission be held immediately after the eighth session of the council in 1949 for the completion of the Covenant and the measures of implementation.

E/CN.4/SR.77

17 June 1948<sup>136</sup>

Original Text: French

Summary Record of the Seventy-Seventh Meeting [of the Commission on Human Rights]

Lake Success, New York on Thursday,

17 June 1948 at 11 a.m.

Chairman: Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, United States of America. Rapporteur: Mr. Malik, Lebanon. Members: Mr. Jockel, Australia; Mr. Lebeau, Belgium; Mr. Stepanenko, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic; Mr. Larrain, Chile; Mr. Chang, China; Mr. Loutfi, Egypt; Mr. Ordonneau, France; Mrs. Mehta, India; Mr. Quijano, Panama; Mr. Lopez, Philippines; Mr. Klekovkin, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic; Mr. Pavlov, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics; Mr. Wilson, United Kingdom; Mr. Fontaina, Uruguay; Mr. Vilfan, Yugoslavia. Representative of a specialized agency: Mr. Lebar, United Nations

<sup>136</sup> This was the date of the meeting. The document was issued on 28 June 1948.

Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization. Consultants from non-governmental organizations: Mr. Garvan, American Federation of Labor (AF of L); Miss Stuart, World Federation of United Nations Associations; Miss Drennan, Catholic International Union for Social Service; Mr. Nolde, Commission of the Churches on International Affairs; [2] Mr. Moskowitz, Consultative Council of Jewish Organizations; Mrs. Vandenberg, International Women's Alliance; Mr. Bienenfeld, World Jewish Congress. Secretariat: Mr. Humphrey, Director, Human Rights Division; Mr. Lawson, Secretary of the Commission.

Consideration of the Proposal Submitted by the Chinese Delegation Regarding the Order of the Articles of the Declaration

MR. CHANG (China) proposed making article 2 the penultimate article of the Declaration. An article which dealt with the limitations on the exercise of the rights, and freedoms proclaimed in the Declaration should not appear at the beginning of the Declaration before those rights and freedoms themselves had been set forth.

MR. LOUTFI (Egypt) did not agree with that view, article 2 was among the articles which set forth the general principles and, as such, should appear at the beginning of the Declaration.

MR. FONTAINA (Uruguay) supported the Chinese representative's proposal.

He recalled his delegation's objections to the use of the words: "ordre public" (public order) in article 2, paragraph 2 (see document E/CN.4/SR.74). To place that article towards the end of the Declaration immediately before article 33 would reduce the possibility of misinterpreting that term.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) pointed out that the general scope of the Declaration would not change with the order in which the articles were placed. Article 2 should not be placed towards the end of the Declaration so as to avoid giving the reader the impression that the individual was granted unlimited rights; the reader would not realize, until he had reached the penultimate article, that the rights and freedoms laid down were subject to certain restrictions.

[3]

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) agreed with Mr. Wilson that the reader should know from the outset that the rights and freedoms set forth in the Declaration were to be enjoyed within the framework of society. Logically, the general provisions should precede the more specific clauses.

MR. LEBEAU (Belgium) entirely agreed with Mr. Pavlov.

MR. LOPEZ (Philippines) supported the Chinese representative's proposal; since they were dealing with a Declaration on Human Rights, the rights of the individual should be stressed before his duties to society.

THE CHAIRMAN, speaking as United States representative, thought that the article regarding the general limitations on the enjoyment of rights would be better placed towards the end of the Declaration.

The Chinese representative's proposal was adopted by 8 votes to 7 with 1 abstention.

MR. CHANG (China) proposed changing the order of the first five articles of the Declaration as follows: article 1 to remain where it was; article 3, paragraph 1 (principles of non-discrimination) to become article 2; article 3, paragraph 2 (principles of equality before the law) to become article 5; article 4 (right to life) to become article 3; article 5 (respect for human dignity) to become article 4.

The Chinese representative's proposal was adopted by 9 votes to 1 with 6 abstentions.

MR. CHANG (China) proposed placing article 13, which dealt with marriage, after article 9 which dealt with the family.

MR. LOUTFI (Egypt) pointed out that article 9 did not deal exclusively with the family. He was, therefore, opposed to the proposed change.

The Chinese representative's proposal was rejected by 5 votes to 4, with 7 abstentions.

[4]

MR. CHANG (China) proposed placing article 15, on nationality, after article 12, which dealt with the right to recognition as a person before the law.

MR. LOUTFI (Egypt) supported the proposal.

MR. LOPEZ (Philippines) pointed out that article 12 itself had not been properly placed; it should follow article 3 which dealt with the right to life and freedom.

MR. CHANG (China) thought it would be better to place article 12 after article 5 which dealt with equality before the law.

MR. ORDONNEAU (France), while remarking that his delegation did not attach much importance to the order of the articles in the Declaration, thought that there was no strong reason to alter the present order.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics), supported by MR. MALIK (Lebanon), suggested adopting both the proposals which had been made, namely, to place article 12 after article 3, which would be immediately followed by article 15. His delegation would only vote for the Chinese representative's proposal to place article 19 after article 12 if the latter followed article 3 concerning the right to life and to liberty.

THE CHAIRMAN called on the Commission to vote on the proposal to place article 12, which dealt with the right to recognition as a person before the law, after article 3 on the right to life and to liberty.

The proposal was rejected by 7 votes to 6, with 3 abstentions.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) then proposed placing article 12 immediately after article 4 on slavery and respect for human dignity. Article 12 would thus become article 5 and the numbers of the following articles would be altered accordingly.

[5]

The Lebanese representative's proposal was adopted by 9 votes to 1, with 6 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN, speaking as United States representative, suggested placing article 15, regarding nationality, immediately after article 11, on the right to asylum.

The proposal was adopted by 15 votes to none, with 1 abstention.

Continuation of the Consideration of the Preamble to the Declaration on Human Rights (documents E/CN.4/138 and E/CN.4/139)

THE CHAIRMAN recalled that the Commission had adopted at its earlier meetings the first three paragraphs of the Preamble to the Declaration. She then read the text prepared by the Drafting Sub-Committee on the Preamble:

“4. Whereas the peoples of the United Nations have in the Charter determined to reaffirm faith in fundamental human rights and in the dignity and worth, of the human person and to promote social progress and better standards of life in larger freedom; and

“5. Whereas Member States have pledged themselves to achieve, in co-operation with the Organization, the promotion of universal respect for and observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms; and

“6. Whereas this pledge can be fulfilled only on the basis of a common understanding of the nature of these rights and freedoms,

“Now therefore the General Assembly

“Proclaims this Declaration of Human Rights as a common standard of achievement for all nations, to the end that every individual and every organ of society, keeping this Declaration constantly in mind, shall strive by teaching and education to promote respect for these rights and freedoms and by progressive measures, national and international, to secure their universal and effective recognition and observance.”

[6]

THE CHAIRMAN called on the Commission to consider the text paragraph by paragraph, and opened the discussion on paragraph 4.

MR. ORDONNEAU (France), supported by MR. LEBEAU (Belgium) considered the French version of the text unsatisfactory. They would prefer the expression: “larger freedom” to be translated as: “une liberté plus complète”.

MR. FONTAINA (Uruguay) would also prefer the expression: “the human person” to be replaced by: “human being”.

THE CHAIRMAN reminded the Commission that the wording of paragraph 4 had been borrowed from the Charter, and thought that it would be best not to depart from that wording.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) and MR. CHANG (China) also thought that, as long as the wording of the Charter had not been officially modified by the General Assembly, no changes could be made to it.

MR. JOCKEL (Australia), although unable as alternate to take part in the vote, said that his delegation approved of the text submitted by the Drafting Sub-Committee for the second part of the Preamble.

Paragraph 4 of the Preamble was adopted by 11 votes to none with 5 abstentions.

Paragraph 5 of the Preamble was adopted by 12 votes to none with 4 abstentions.

MR. FONTAINA (Uruguay) proposed amending paragraph 6 so as to read:

“Whereas this pledge can be fulfilled mainly through a common understanding of the nature of these rights and freedoms.”

[7]

The Uruguay representative's proposal was rejected by 10 votes to 4 with 2 abstentions.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) wished paragraph 6 to be deleted, as he thought it introduced not only an erroneous but a dangerous conception. To make the Declaration on Human Rights dependant on the application of a common conception of the nature of rights and freedoms would destroy its very purpose. The Commission's discussions had clearly shown the divergences which existed between the members in the fields of philosophy and ideology; that difference of ideas had not prevented fruitful co-operation, because even though there had been disagreement on the nature of the rights, the Commission has, nevertheless, come to a satisfactory agreement as to their practicable application.

Paragraph 6 in its present wording seemed to require a unity of thought and ideas which was impossible to achieve. His delegation, however, held that, in spite of philosophical differences, international co-operation was possible, as it considered that the minimum of rights, as set forth in the Declaration, could be applied in every detail by all. Its application should not be threatened by an unacceptable provision such as was contained in paragraph 6, at present submitted for the Commission's consideration.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the realization of the purposes of the Declaration depended above all on a common understanding of the essential human rights and freedoms. If a common view on the nature of those rights and freedoms could not immediately be attained, that identity of views nevertheless retained the supreme aim to be sought. There had been disagreement in the Commission, but the decision of the majority had prevailed in the choice of articles, and the Declaration, as drafted, indicated as effectively as was possible at present the degree of agreement which had been reached.

[8]

MR. CHANG (China) said that there was something to be said for the USSR representative's interpretation: the paragraph, as drafted could mean that the obligation assumed by the Members of the United Nations would not be binding should agreement on a common conception not be reached.

THE CHAIRMAN, speaking as United States representative, emphasized that the pledge in question was incumbent on the Members of the United Nations by virtue of the Charter and not of the Declaration which they would be asked to approve. In order to remove any ambiguity she proposed saying:

“Whereas this pledge can be fully fulfilled only through a common understanding of these rights and freedoms.”

The deletion of the words: “of the nature” answered Mr. Pavlov's comments regarding the various philosophical and ideological differences which existed.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) advised the Commission to be very cautious in a matter which might lend itself to misinterpretation. The pledge of the Members of the United Nations to ensure the respect of fundamental human freedoms and rights had been taken more than three years ago; their task would obviously be facilitated if they could reach a common understanding of those rights and freedoms. Without making that common conception a sine qua non for international co-operation, the usefulness of such an identity of views could be recognized. He therefore suggested saying: “Whereas this pledge could be best fulfilled through a common understanding of those rights and freedoms.”

[9]

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) recognized the merit of those various proposals which improved the text, but nevertheless insisted on the deletion of paragraph 6.

MR. ORDONNEAU (France) agreed with the USSR representative that it would be wiser to avoid adopting a text which, owing to hasty drafting, might lead to criticism. The Commission agreed that, in spite of the difference in philosophical and political systems, it was still possible to find grounds for common action, and that it was on that conviction that the work it had just completed was founded. As regards paragraph 6, the difficulty was more in the wording than in the substance as there was no doubt as to the authors' intentions. His delegation would, therefore, welcome any amendment which would satisfy the USSR representative and which would make it quite clear that the Commission had tried to find a common understanding and had succeeded in doing so.

THE CHAIRMAN and MR. CHANG (China) agreed that paragraph 6 was not essential and could, therefore, be deleted. Mr. Chang pointed out that any reservation regarding the pledge taken under the Charter would weaken that pledge.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) thought on the contrary that it should be emphasized in the Preamble that the Commission had reached a remarkable degree of understanding and that the Declaration was the result of that identity of views. He reminded the Commission that the terms of paragraph 6 had been taken from a draft submitted by his delegation, and that they had been linked with an earlier paragraph which had not been retained; they should, therefore, be somewhat amended to bring them into line with the paragraph immediately preceding them in the present draft, but they should not be deleted, as they fulfilled a useful function by providing a transition. He therefore suggested adopting [10] the amendments suggested by the Lebanese representative and by Mrs. Roosevelt.

MR. ORDONNEAU (France) said that he would only agree to the complete adoption of paragraph 6 if no satisfactory formula could be found. He suggested that the Commission should acknowledge its common effort by saying:

“Whereas this pledge can be fulfilled only through a common effort to reach as broad as possible a common understanding of these rights and freedoms.”

MR. CHANG (China) proposed appointing a small committee to draft a formula acceptable to all, bearing in mind the various comments made during the meeting.

MR. JOCKEL (Australia) supported that proposal. His delegation considered paragraph 6 the most important of all the paragraphs of the Preamble, and it should be retained while an attempt was made to satisfy the USSR representative's justifiable objections.

THE CHAIRMAN announced that the Drafting Committee to amend the form of paragraph 6 would be composed of the representatives of the following countries: China, France, Lebanon, the United Kingdom and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

MR. ORDONNEAU (France) pointed out a translating error in the French text of the last paragraph of the Preamble. The text gave the impression that, in the national and international spheres, the efforts of nations would be directed only to teaching and education, whereas the text should read:

“...de développer le respect de ces droits et libertés et d'assurer par des mesures progressives, réalisés dans le domaine national et international, leur reconnaissance et leur application universelles et effectives.”

[11]

The Commission took careful note of the correction.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) drew the Commission's attention to the fact that the wording of the English and French versions did not exactly agree, and he feared that the difference in the texts might entail a difference in substance. The English text spoke of a “common standard” while the French text referred to “un idéal commun”.

MR. LEBEAU (Belgium), supported by MR. WILSON (United Kingdom), said that the difference was one of form and did not affect the substance of the paragraph which was clearly the same in both texts. The term “common standard of achievement” was the aim which the nations should try to achieve: “l’idéal commun” used in the French text corresponded quite well with the idea expressed.

MR. FONTAINA (Uruguay) stressed the difficulty of translating accurately the full sense of the English word “standard” into a single French or Spanish word.

MR. ORDONNEAU (France) pointed out that the difference in form was due to the inherent difference in the spirit of the two languages. His delegation considered that the two texts corresponded as to substance.

MR. LOPEZ (Philippines) recalled that the Commission had decided in principle, that, whenever it was faced with the difficulty of a translation of that type, it would adopt texts which agreed in substance rather than in form.

The Commission adopted the last paragraph of the Preamble by 12 votes to none with 4 abstentions, on the understanding that the translations would endeavour to reproduce the meaning of the original English text paying more attention to substance than to form.

[12]

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) proposed adding the following paragraph to the Preamble:

“Recommends to all the States Members of the United Nations the following Declaration on Human Rights.

“For use at their discretion in taking appropriate legislative and other measures and in their systems of upbringing and education; and for the dissemination of the provisions of this Declaration throughout the populations of the States Members themselves, of territories over which such States are performing the functions of the administering authority, of territories under trusteeship, (non-self-governing territories.)”

The text was taken from the Draft Preamble submitted by his delegation (document E/CN.4/139).

He proposed dividing the vote on the addition proposed by him as follows: the first vote to be taken on the measures necessary for the development of teaching and education; the second on the principle of the dissemination of the Declaration throughout the population of the non-self-governing territories.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) approved of the second part of the addition suggested by the USSR representative, but feared that the first part would weaken the preceding paragraph just adopted by the Commission.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) raised an objection with regard to the form. The USSR representative’s proposal would give that part of the Declaration the character of a General Assembly resolution.

He was likewise opposed to the apparent discrimination made in the USSR text by especially mentioning the trust and non-self-governing territories, when it was clearly laid down in paragraph 5 of the Preamble that States Members of the United Nations were pledged to guarantee not only effective but universal respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms.

[13]

MR. ORDONNEAU (France) said that the first part of the USSR proposal corresponded almost exactly to the last article of the Draft Declaration proposed by Mr. Cassin (document E/CN.4/82/Add.8, article 28).

While agreeing with the USSR delegation on the need to include such a provision, his delegation considered that its logical place was at the end of the actual Declaration and not in the Preamble. Thus placed, the provision would serve as a link between the declaration of rights and the statement of the enforcement measures to be taken, thereby achieving the maximum legal force.

He also wholeheartedly agreed with the USSR representative that the Declaration should be universal. In that regard he pointed out that the Declaration on the Rights of Man of 1793 applied to all French territories. But it would not serve any useful purpose to include in the Preamble any special provision on non-self-governing territories which would seem to imply that the populations of those territories did not enjoy the essential rights and freedoms on an equal footing with the populations of the metropolitan territories.

On the suggestion of MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics), the Chairman instructed the Drafting Committee, which had just been set up, to prepare a text which would take into account both Mr. Pavlov's and Mr. Cassin's drafts and to submit its recommendations to the Commission.

The meeting rose at 1:20 p.m.

E/CN.4/SR.78***

17 June 1948<sup>137</sup>

Summary Record of the Seventy-Eighth Meeting [of the Commission on Human Rights]

Held at Lake Success, New York, on Thursday,
17 June 1948 at 2:30 p.m.

Chairman: Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, United States of America. Rapporteur: Mr. Malik, Lebanon. Members: Mr. Jockel, Australia; Mr. Steyaert and later Mr. Lebeau, Belgium;

<sup>137</sup> This was the date of the meeting. The document was issued on 24 June 1948.

Mr. Stepanenko, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic; Mr. Chang, China; Mr. Loutfi, Egypt; Mr. Ordonneau, France; Mrs. Mehta, India; Mr. Quijano, Panama; Mr. Lopez, Philippines; Mr. Klekovkin, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic; Mr. Pavlov, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics; Mr. Wilson, United Kingdom; Mr. Fontaina, Uruguay; Mr. Vilfan, Yugoslavia. Consultants from Non-Governmental Organizations: Category A: Mr. P. Garvan, American Federation of Labor; Category B: Dr. I. Lewin, Agudas Israel World Organization; Mrs. Drennan, Catholic International Union for Social Service; Mr. S. Prentice and Mr. Nolde, Commission of the Churches on International Affairs; Mr. Moskowitz, Consultative Council of Jewish Organizations.

[<sup>1</sup>] The 79th meeting of the Commission was held in closed session, and the summary record (document E/CN.4/SR.79) is distributed as a restricted document to members of the Commission only.

[2]

Consultants from Non-Governmental Organizations: (continued) Category B: Miss Schaefer, International Union of Catholic Women's Leagues; Mr. S. Wolkowicz and Mr. Bienenfeld, World Jewish Congress; Mrs. M. Baker Vandenberg, International Alliance of Women. Secretariat: Mr. Humphrey, Director of the Human Rights Division; Mr. Lawson, Secretary of the Commission.

Continuation of the Consideration of the Draft International Declaration on Human Rights (document E/CN.4/95)

Article 20

THE CHAIRMAN recalled that the Drafting Committee had decided not to consider the text adopted at the second session of the Commission until the articles on implementation had been drafted. She asked the members of the Commission to decide whether or not the Commission could take any action in the matter until the Covenant had been drafted and the manner in which petitions should be dealt with had been settled. If the decision was a negative one the Commission could vote against the immediate inclusion of the article in the Declaration, and could take it up again at the proper time.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) thought consideration of article 20 should be postponed until implementation was considered. He pointed out that if the article were retained the Declaration could not be considered as complete. He did not wish to discuss the substance of the matter for the time being, but merely asked the Commission to remove the article from the Declaration, where he considered it was out of place.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) said there were two alternatives before the Commission: either to delete the article from the Declaration, with a mental reservation that it might be considered again at a later [3] stage, or else to leave it in the Declaration with a note to the effect that it should be reconsidered in the light of later decisions on implementation. He would prefer the second alternative.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the question whether to retain article 20 of the Draft Declaration.

The Commission decided, by 7 votes to 5 with 1 abstention, to retain the article.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) proposed the insertion of a note to the effect that “the Commission decided not to consider the following text, since measures on the implementation of the Bill of Rights had not been considered at its third session.”

MR. QUIJANO (Panama) considered that the article should be adopted at once. The Commission had included in the Declaration all the articles it considered necessary, with the sole exception of that one. The article was clear, and it was undeniable that everyone had the right to submit petitions to a competent public authority and to obtain a response; that right was provided for in the constitutions of all the American nations and in those of many others. The Commission could not be making a mistake in including such a provision in the Declaration.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) contended that under the second part of the article the United Nations would have to constitute an organ to consider complaints of nationals against their own State. That was contrary to the Charter, which did not confer on the United Nations the right to interfere between a State and its nationals. Secondly, such a provision would multiply the possible causes of international conflict, which were already sufficiently numerous. He agreed with the United Kingdom representative that the article should be placed in brackets with a note to the effect that it had not [4] yet been considered, but thought it should be placed at the end of the Declaration as an addendum, without a number.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) agreed.

The Commission decided, by 12 votes to 1 with 1 abstention, to retain the article and to place it, unnumbered, at the end of the Declaration, with a note as suggested by the United Kingdom representative.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon), Rapporteur, submitted the following alternative text of paragraph 6 of the Preamble:

“Whereas a (definition) (common understanding) of these rights and freedoms is (necessary) (of the greatest importance) for the fulfilment of this pledge,”

MR. CHANG (China) stated that he preferred “definition” to “common understanding” and “necessary” to “of the greatest importance”. He further suggested replacing “fulfilment” by “full realization”.

The Commission decided, by 9 votes to 1 with 4 abstentions, in favour of the words “common understanding”.

The Commission decided, by 6 votes to 4 with 4 abstentions, in favour of the words “of the greatest importance”.

The Commission decided, by 8 votes to 2 with 4 abstentions, in favour of the words “full realization”.

The Commission adopted the amended text by 13 votes to none, with 1 abstention.

THE CHAIRMAN read the following draft text which the USSR representative had proposed should be added at the end of the Preamble:

“...and recommends it to the States Members of the United Nations for use at their discretion, both in taking the appropriate legislative and other measures and for the dissemination of the provisions contained in this Declaration among the population of the Member States themselves and among the populations [5] of such territories in regard to which these States are carrying out the functions of the Administering Authority, and populations of territories under Trusteeship and the populations of Non-Self-Governing Territories.”

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) preferred the following wording:

“...recommends to all States Members of the United Nations the following Declaration for use at their discretion both in taking the appropriate legislative as well as other measures, and equally for the dissemination of the provisions contained in this Declaration...”

The phrase “recommends to all States Members . . . for use at their discretion” was equivalent to a statement that the States themselves would decide what legislative or other measures they would take. He pointed out that the word “colonial” was not used in the proposed text, which however emphasized the principle of equality between all peoples, an idea which appeared nowhere else in the Declaration. He did not agree with the suggestion which had been put forward that it was covered by the general nature of the Declaration; it should be stated in concrete terms. He thought the text should be voted upon in two parts: first up to and including the words “. . .among the populations” and second from the words “of the Member States themselves. . .”

MR. CHANG (China) concurred in the idea behind the USSR proposal, i.e. there should be no doubt that peoples who did not at present enjoy self-government should be included in the Declaration. He thought, however, that the addition of the words “and peoples” after “all nations” would remove any possibility of misunderstanding.

MR. FONTAINA (Uruguay) suggested that the last paragraph of the Preamble should begin: “Proclaims this Declaration of Human Rights [6] as a common standard of achievement for all nations, independent or non-self-governing, to the end. . .” He thought that would meet Mr. Pavlov’s contention, while avoiding any direct reference to Trust Territories or Non-Self-Governing Territories.

MR. LOUTFI (Egypt) considered the idea embodied in the USSR proposal to be extremely important. It was essential that the Declaration should state that it was applicable to nations or peoples that were not autonomous or were under Trusteeship, and if the USSR proposal were not adopted he reserved the right to make another proposal on the same lines. He proposed the phrase: “. . .both among the populations of Member States themselves as well as among the populations of territories under their jurisdiction.”

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) would vote for the proposal of the Chinese representative, which appeared to him the simplest way of making even clearer that the Declaration applied to all peoples, whatever their status. With regard to the USSR proposal, he considered it took the Commission outside the scope of the Preamble and into the sphere of implementation.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) pointed out that the phrase “human rights and fundamental freedoms” occurred in a number of places in the Charter, including Article 76(c). He therefore thought some mention of the absolute universality of the Declaration would be in harmony with the Charter.

Of the three amendments which had been proposed, he would vote for the Egyptian one, which he thought expressed in the happiest manner the idea common to them all. He would also be prepared to vote for the Chinese proposal, but would abstain from voting on the USSR proposal, which went into more detail than was appropriate in a Preamble.

[7]

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) opposed the Chinese amendment, which he considered too indefinite. The question of the populations of non-self-governing territories should be faced squarely and not evaded by vague general statements.

MR. CHANG (China) agreed with the USSR representative that the problem should be faced, but thought the Preamble was not the place to deal with it. If the USSR would propose the adoption of such a clause at the General Assembly, after the adoption of the Declaration, he would support it.

With regard to the USSR proposal, he pointed out that there were many more independent peoples than non-self-governing peoples in the world today. From a purely drafting point of view, therefore, the two phrases did not balance. Furthermore, the addition of the sentence proposed by the USSR made the paragraph unduly long.

THE CHAIRMAN, speaking as representative of the United States of America, considered both the Egyptian and the Uruguayan amendments to be acceptable, but thought the Chinese amendment expressed the same idea in fewer words. She would therefore take a vote first on the Chinese amendment.

With regard to the USSR proposal, she felt the Preamble was not the right place for it. Moreover, it might be argued that a document such as the Declaration should not recognize the status of Non-Self-Governing Territories as a permanent one; it would therefore be preferable to speak of “all peoples”.

MR. LOPEZ (Philippines) recognized the validity of the point raised by the USSR representative.

The representative of France had stated that there was no difference in the observance and recognition of rights and freedoms as between independent [8] and non-self-governing countries; but the representative of France was a national of a metropolitan power and was perhaps not in a position to know all the facts. The Philippines had enjoyed the widest political and civil freedom during the period when it was not self-governing, but their case had been exceptional. He would therefore vote in favour of including in the Preamble a reference to the inhabitants of non-self-governing territories. He would vote for the Chinese proposal, which added something to the operative clause, though he did not agree that it stated the point exactly as it should be stated. He would also vote for the Egyptian proposal if none other was put forward to embody the idea. He could not vote for the USSR proposal, since he did not consider the idea should be embodied in a separate paragraph. Like Dr. Chang, he would be prepared to support a proposal for a separate resolution containing the same idea for submission to the General Assembly at its forthcoming session or during the session at which the Declaration was adopted.

MR. STEYAERT (Belgium), while not having the right to vote, stated that the Belgian delegation supported the Chinese amendment.

MR. ORDONNEAU (France) supported the Egyptian amendment.

THE CHAIRMAN said she would put to the vote, first the first and second parts of the USSR proposal, secondly the Egyptian proposal, thirdly the Uruguayan proposal and fourthly the Chinese proposal.

The first part of the USSR proposal was rejected by 9 votes to 4 with 1 abstention.

The second part of the USSR proposal was rejected by 6 votes to 5 with 3 abstentions.

The Egyptian proposal was adopted by 9 votes to 3 with 2 abstentions.

The Chinese proposal was adopted by 8 votes to none with 5 abstentions.

[9]

THE CHAIRMAN turned to consideration of an article originally suggested by the Lebanese representative and subsequently proposed, by the Drafting Sub-Committee in the following form:

“Everyone has the right to a good social and international order in which the rights and freedoms set out in this Declaration can be fully realized.”

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) pointed out that the idea contained in the proposed article was to some extent expressed in the preamble just adopted. He nevertheless felt that the Declaration should clearly set forth the right of mankind to have a United Nations a world organization [sic], as well as a social order, in which the rights and freedoms could be realized.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom), a member of the Drafting Sub-Committee, observed that the article had originally been proposed in connexion with a heading for economic and social rights. However, in view of the fact that another heading had been adopted and of the further fact that the preamble contained much of what the proposed article would include, he no longer favoured its adoption.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) proposed that the word “such” should be substituted for “good” before “social and international order”, as a “good” social order could not be achieved except through a socialistic society in which there was real equality. Even the enjoyment of the rights and freedoms set forth in the Declaration would not be sufficient to ensure a “good” social order; that could be brought about only if the interests of all were identical with the interests of each individual, as had been proved in practice during the last third of a century.

[10]

MR. CHANG (China) drew attention to two drafting points. Firstly, he questioned the juxtaposition of “social” and “international”, which were not contrasting terms. “Social order, national and international” might be preferable. Secondly, he raised the point that “is entitled” might be substituted in the first line for “has the right” since the word “rights” was used further on in the article.

MR. FONTAINA (Uruguay), stressing the duty of each individual to co-operate in achieving a society in which the rights and freedoms could be enjoyed, suggested that the words “and the duty to co-operate in the fulfilment of” should be inserted between “international order” and “rights and freedoms”.

THE CHAIRMAN, speaking as the United States representative, supported the proposed article, with the drafting changes mentioned by the Chinese representative.

Reverting to her position as Chairman, she put to the vote the USSR proposal to substitute “such” for “good”.

The USSR proposal was rejected by six votes to four with three abstentions.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) referred to the drafting point raised in connexion with “social and international”. Those two words were intended to express two different ideas, and in order not to change the meaning of the article, the drafting change would have to be: “social – national and international – and international order”.

After a short discussion of drafting in which the representatives of the Philippines, China and Lebanon took part, the Chairman put to the vote the first part of the article in the following form: “Everyone is entitled to a good social and international order. . .”.

The text was adopted by seven votes to none, with six abstentions.

[11]

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the article as a whole.

The article was adopted by six votes to three with six abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN drew attention to the article proposed by the French delegation and contained in document E/CN.4/82/Add.8 as article 28.

MR. ORDONNEAU (France) explained that the purpose of the proposed article was to serve as a transition between the Declaration and the Covenant and to make clear in the Declaration that the United Nations recognized the necessity for further provisions such as the Covenant was to contain. For that reason, the French delegation considered that the article should be the last one in the Declaration. The wording of the article was not necessarily final.

MR. CHANG (China) pointed out that the proposed article belonged more properly with measures for implementation.

MR. ORDONNEAU (France) was willing to have the article included tentatively, with a footnote such as had been agreed to in connexion with article 20.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) did not think the article could be treated in the same way as article 20. In the latter case, no decision was at all practicable until measures of implementation had been decided upon. The article under discussion however dealt solely with implementation; and the Commission should follow the principle agreed to at its second session, namely, that measures of implementation should not be included in the Declaration.

THE CHAIRMAN, speaking as the United States representative, thought that the first paragraph of the proposed article went too far.

[12]

Some of the principles stated in the Declaration for example, the right to health could not be realized immediately. What would be the good of passing laws to punish countries for failing to supply what they did not have and could not get? Furthermore, the Declaration was not intended to state exactly what the States should do to ensure the rights to their citizens. If such provisions were included, interest in the Covenant might be markedly lessened; yet the Covenant was of very great importance.

The second paragraph of the proposed article clearly dealt with implementation. Moreover the world was not yet ready for the international court it envisaged. She would therefore vote against the paragraph.

MR. ORDONNEAU (France) pointed out that the French proposal did not give detailed recommendations for implementation but stressed primarily the need for implementation.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) was opposed to the French draft. A USSR proposal to mention in the preamble legislative measures to ensure the rights and freedoms stated in the Declaration had been criticized as too concrete; yet the French proposal which spoke of judicial and administrative measures was far more concrete, and its specific recommendations for implementation were not appropriate for the Declaration.

The second part of the proposed article, in suggesting the adoption of international conventions to ensure the full realization of the provisions of the Charter, went beyond the Commission's competence.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the question of whether or not the proposed article should be inserted in the Declaration.

It was decided not to insert the article by eight votes to three, with two abstentions.

[13]

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) raised the point of the order of the articles at the end of the Declaration.

The Commission decided that the article dealing with a "good social and international order" should be third from the last; the article covering the duties of the individual, adopted at its previous meeting, should be next to the last; and the article beginning "Nothing in this Declaration shall be considered to recognize the right. . ." should be the last.

Discussion of Procedure for Considering the Rapporteur's Report

After a short discussion, the Chairman stated that the Rapporteur's report would include the Declaration in the form proposed by the Style Committee, but any changes the Committee had made in the original texts voted by the Commission might be put to the vote as amendments.

In reply to a point raised by MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics), MR. MALIK (Lebanon) explained that the report would include a statement to the effect that the views of the various delegations could be found in summary records of the meetings of the Commission.

French-United States Proposal for Statement to Accompany the Commission's Report

THE CHAIRMAN asked for consideration of the French-United States proposal to transmit the Commission's report to the Council with the following statement:

"The Commission recognizes that in approving this Declaration it has not completed its task of preparing a Bill of Human Rights. The Bill consists of a Declaration, a Covenant and measures of implementation.

"The Declaration forms part only of the Bill of Rights. Completion of a Covenant including measures of implementation is essential.

[14]

“The Commission recommends to the Economic and Social Council that a meeting of the Commission be held immediately after the eighth session of the Council in 1949 for the completion of the Covenant and the measures of implementation.”

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) thought the statement should include a reference to the work on the Covenant done by the Drafting Committee; the statement by the French representative, Mr. Cassin, on implementation; and the work on implementation done by a Sub-Committee at the Commission’s second session.

MR. CHANG (China) considered the first two paragraphs of the French-United States proposal unnecessary. He further suggested an amendment to the third paragraph so that “after the eighth session of the Council in 1949” would be changed to “early in 1949”. The date of the Council’s eighth session was not as yet fixed.

THE CHAIRMAN explained that the first two paragraphs of the proposal were designed to ensure that there should be no doubt of the fact that the Commission did not consider the Declaration a complete Bill of human rights.

MR. CHANG (China) thought that idea might be included in the Rapporteur’s report.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) said he intended to propose at a later time that a conference similar to the Conference on Freedom of Information and the Press should be held to consider the Bill of Rights before it was presented to the General Assembly, [15] as otherwise some thirty Governments would have had no opportunity to make oral statements on the Bill prior to its consideration by the Assembly.

He hoped that the members of the Commission would bear in mind the possibility that such a conference might be held in making recommendations concerning the date of the next session.

The meeting rose at 6:25 p.m.

E/CN.4/148/Add.1

18 June 1948

ANNEX A

Draft International Declaration of Human Rights (Draft United Nations Declaration of Human Rights)

Preamble

Whereas recognition of the inherent dignity and of the equal and inalienable rights of all members of the human family is the foundation of freedom, justice and peace in the world; and

Whereas disregard and contempt for human rights resulted, before and during the second world war, in barbarous acts which outraged the conscience of mankind and made it apparent that the fundamental freedoms were one of the supreme issues of the conflict; and

Whereas it is essential, if mankind is not to be compelled as a last resort to rebel against tyranny and oppression, that human rights should be protected by a regime of law; and

Whereas the peoples of the United Nations have in the Charter determined to reaffirm faith in fundamental human rights and in the dignity and worth of the human person and to promote social progress and better standards of life in larger freedom; and

Whereas Member States have pledged themselves to achieve, in co-operation with the Organization, the promotion of universal respect for and observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms; and

Whereas a common understanding of these rights and freedoms is of the greatest importance for the full realization of this pledge,

Now therefore the General Assembly

Proclaims this Declaration of Human Rights as a common standard of achievement for all peoples and all nations, to the end that every individual and every organ of society, keeping this Declaration constantly in mind, shall strive by teaching and education to promote respect for these rights and freedoms and by progressive measures, national and international, to secure their universal and effective recognition and observance, both among the peoples of Member States themselves and among the peoples of territories under their jurisdiction.

[2]

Article 1

All human beings are born free and equal in dignity and rights. They are endowed by nature with reason and conscience, and should act towards one another in a spirit of brotherhood.

Article 2

Everyone is entitled to all the rights and freedoms set forth in this Declaration, without distinction of any kind, such as race, colour, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, property or other status, or national or social origin.

Article 3

Everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of person.

Article 4

1. No one shall be held in slavery or involuntary servitude.
2. No one shall be subjected to torture or to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.

Article 5

Everyone has the right to recognition everywhere as a person before the law.

Article 6

All are equal before the law and are entitled without any discrimination to equal protection of the law against any discrimination in violation of this Declaration and against any incitement to such discrimination.

Article 7

No one shall be subjected to arbitrary arrest or detention.

Article 8

In the determination of his rights and obligations and of any criminal charge against him, everyone is entitled in full equality to a fair hearing by an independent and impartial tribunal.

Article 9

1. Everyone charged with a penal offence has the right to be presumed innocent until proved guilty according to law in a public trial at which he has had all the guarantees necessary for his defence.

2. No one shall be held guilty of any offence on account of any act or omission which did not constitute an offence, under national or international law, at the time when it was committed.

[3]

Article 10

No one shall be subjected to unreasonable interference with his privacy, family, home, correspondence or reputation.

Article 11

1. Everyone has the right to freedom of movement and residence within the borders of each State.

2. Everyone has the right to leave any country, including his own.

Article 12

1. Everyone has the right to seek and be granted, in other countries, asylum from persecution.

2. Prosecutions genuinely arising from non-political crimes or from acts contrary to the purposes and principles of the United Nations do not constitute persecution.

Article 13

No one shall be arbitrarily deprived of his nationality or denied the right to change his nationality.

Article 14

1. Men and women of full age have the right to marry and to found a family and are entitled to equal rights as to marriage.

2. Marriage shall be entered into only with the full consent of both intending spouses.

3. The family is the natural and fundamental group unit of society and is entitled to protection.

Article 15

1. Everyone has the right to own property alone as well as in association with others.

2. No one shall be arbitrarily deprived of his property.

Article 16

Everyone has the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion; this right includes freedom to change his religion or belief, and freedom, either alone or in community with others and in public or private, to manifest his religion or belief in teaching, practice, worship and observance.

Article 17

Everyone has the right to freedom of opinion and expression; this right includes freedom to hold opinions without interference and to seek, receive and impart information and ideas through any media and regardless of frontiers.

Article 18

Everyone has the right to freedom of assembly and association.

Article 19

1. Everyone has the right to take part in the government of his country, directly or through his freely chosen representatives.

2. Everyone has the right of access to public employment in his country.

3. Everyone has the right to a government which conforms to the will of the people.

[4]

Article 20

Everyone, as a member of society, has the right to social security and is entitled to the realization, through national effort and international co-operation, and in accordance with the organization and resources of each State, of the economic, social and cultural rights set out below.

Article 21

1. Everyone has the right to work, to just and favourable conditions of work and pay and to protection against unemployment.

2. Everyone has the right to equal pay for equal work.

3. Everyone is free to form and to join trade unions for the protection of his interests.

Article 22

1. Everyone has the right to a standard of living, including food, clothing, housing and medical care, and to social services, adequate for the health and wellbeing of himself and his family and to security in the event of unemployment, sickness, disability, old age or other lack of livelihood in circumstances beyond his control.

2. Mother and child have the right to special care and assistance.

Article 23

1. Everyone has the right to education. Elementary and fundamental education shall be free and compulsory and there shall be equal access on the basis of merit to higher education.

2. Education shall be directed to the full development of the human personality, to strengthening respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms and to combating the spirit of intolerance and hatred against other nations and against racial and religious groups everywhere.

Article 24

Everyone has the right to rest and leisure.

Article 25

Everyone has the right to participate in the cultural life of the community, to enjoy the arts and to share in scientific advancement.

Article 26

Everyone is entitled to a good social and international order in which the rights and freedoms set out in this Declaration can be fully realized.

Article 27

1. Everyone has duties to the community which enables him freely to develop his personality.

2. In the exercise of his rights, everyone shall be subject only to such limitations as are necessary to secure due recognition and respect for the rights of others and the requirements of morality, public order and general welfare in a democratic society.
[5]

Article 28

Nothing in this Declaration shall imply the recognition of the right of any State or person to engage in any activity aimed at the destruction of any of the rights and freedoms prescribed herein.

Note: The Commission has not considered the following article since measures of implementation have not as yet been considered in its third session:

“Everyone has the right, either individually, or in association with others, to petition or to communicate with the public authorities of the State of which he is a national or in which he resides, or with the United Nations.”

E/CN.4/SR.80

18 June 1948<sup>138</sup>

Original Text: French

Summary Record of the Eightieth Meeting
[of the Commission on Human Rights]

Held at Lake Success, New York on Friday,
 18 June 1948, at 10:45 a.m.

Chairman: Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, United States of America. Rapporteur: Mr. Charles Malik, Lebanon. Members: Mr. Hood, Australia; Mr. Steyaert, Belgium; Mr. Stepanenko, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic; Mr. Larrain, Chile; Mr. Chang, China; Mr. Loutfi, Egypt; Mr. Ordonneau, France; Mrs. Mehta, India; Mr. Quijano, Panama; Mr. Lopez, Philippines; Mr. Klekovkin, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic; Mr. Pavlov, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics; Mr. Wilson, United Kingdom; Mr. Fontaina, Uruguay; Mr. Vilfan, Yugoslavia. Consultants from Non-Governmental Organizations: Miss Sender, American Federation of Labor (AF of L); Mr. van Istendael, International Federation of Christian Trade Unions; Mrs. Drennan, Catholic International Union for Social Service; Mr. Nolde, Commission of the Churches on International Affairs; Mr. Moskowitz, Consultative Council for Jewish Organizations; Mrs. Van den Berg, International Union of Catholic Women’s Leagues; Miss Robb, Liaison Committee of Women’s International Organizations; Mr. Bienenfeld, World Jewish Congress. Secretariat: Mr. Humphrey, Director of Division of Human Rights; Mr. Lawson, Secretary of the Commission.

[2]

Consideration of the Draft Report Presented by the Rapporteur
(document E/CN.4/148)

THE CHAIRMAN laid before the Commission the draft report presented by the Rapporteur.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon), Rapporteur, said that there would be several annexes to the report; annex “A”, the draft International Declaration, was being presented to the Commission with the draft report itself. He proposed that the Commission should consider and adopt each paragraph separately, provided there were no objections to them. He would read out each paragraph and supply the necessary consents.

<sup>138</sup> This was the date of the meeting. The document was issued on 29 June 1948.

After the Commission had approved the proposed procedure, the first five paragraphs were adopted without any changes other than some alterations in the spelling of certain names.

Mr. Malik (Lebanon), Rapporteur, read out paragraph 6 relating to the delayed arrival of the representatives of the Byelorussian and Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republics.

THE CHAIRMAN, speaking as representative of the United States, proposed an amendment to that paragraph, calling for the deletion of the words “and in violation of the agreement adopted by the General Assembly on 31 October 1947”. She felt that to accuse any Government of a violation of a treaty or an agreement was a very delicate matter. The Commission had come to the conclusion that the blame for their late arrival could not be attributed to the two representatives in question and that the matter should be brought to the attention of the Secretary-General; it had not said that there had been formal violation of the agreement in question. The summary record E/CN.4/SR.46 was wrong on that point. She pointed out that she had said that the incident was regrettable and that she hoped it would never happen again.

[3]

MR. VILFAN (Yugoslavia) felt that the text of paragraph 6 was not exact in so far as it was too general. At the first meeting of the present session, the Commission had examined the whole question at length and had come to the conclusion that the two representatives were late in arriving because they had not been granted visas in time. He, therefore, moved an amendment proposing to delete the words “for reasons independent of their will” and to replace them by the words “because the United States Embassy denied them visas”.

He thought that the question was a very important one, the more so as a similar attitude had been adopted towards a representative of Yugoslavia: The United States Government was not entitled to take measures the result of which was to prevent certain representatives from attending meeting of United Nations institutions. He recalled that the Chairman had admitted the error committed by the United States Embassy in Moscow. In his view, that error was a violation of the agreement of 31 October 1947 and he thought that the Commission would be acting within its competence in stating that there had been in fact violation of that agreement.

He moved a second amendment proposing the addition of the words “between the Government of the United States of America and the United Nations” after the words “31 October 1947”.

THE CHAIRMAN fully agreed that there had been a delay in granting the visas, but she felt it was impossible to allege that they had been denied. She thought that the Commission was not qualified to pass judgment on the agreement approved by the Congress of the United States and the United Nations. The Commission had never had an opportunity to study that agreement. Furthermore, such a study would not be within its competence. She proposed that the report should state that “certain members felt that there was violation of the agreement. . .”

[4]

MR. VILFAN (Yugoslavia) could not agree to the Chairman’s proposal to say that there had merely been a delay in granting the visas; the visas had first been refused and had been granted only after a certain time and as a result of various interventions. The Chairman herself had said at the first meeting that the representatives of Byelorussia and Ukraine had been denied visas because they had refused to answer a questionnaire presented by the United States Embassy in Moscow. His opinion was that the United States Embassy was not entitled to require representatives to the United Nations to answer such questionnaires.

Mr. Vilfan said he would agree to change his amendment so that it should read as follows: “their visas having first been denied and then, after a delay, granted by the United States Embassy in Moscow”.

THE CHAIRMAN said that the opinion of the Yugoslav representative constituted the contentious point of the question. There had never been an interpretation of that part of the agreement of 31 October 1947 and it was not for the Commission to interpret it, for it had not the necessary competence. The Commission’s report should confine itself to relating the facts as they actually happened. She proposed that the Yugoslav amendment should be put to the vote, and said that she would vote against for reasons she had already outlined.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that there would have been no discussion on paragraph 6 of the draft report if the Chairman had not proposed an amendment to the Rapporteur’s text.

On the suggestion of the USSR representative, the Commission had, at its first meeting, decided to draw the Secretary-General’s attention “to the fact that these representatives could not arrive in time for the beginning of the Third Session of the Commission, for reasons independent of their will and in violation of the agreement adopted by the General Assembly on 31 October 1947. . .” That resolution had not been [5] put to the vote because the Commission had reached unanimous agreement on that point. In his view, it was impossible, therefore, to allege now that the resolution had never been adopted.

He pointed out that his delegation had in its possession a note from the United States Embassy in Moscow dated 8 May stating that visas had been denied to Mr. Stepanenko and Mr. Klekovkin and that their passports had been returned to them. The representatives of the Byelorussian and of the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republics had not answered the questionnaire presented to them because of its discriminatory character. The visas had been granted two days before the opening of the session after representations by the USSR Ministry of Foreign Affairs and after the United Nations Secretary-General had intervened. The question was important for such an incident might arise with any delegation; the mistake made by the United States Embassy was, therefore, an incorrect act, not only towards the Byelorussian and Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republics but also towards the United Nations.

If paragraph 6 of the draft report was to be amended, it should be so as to give it greater accuracy; the denial of visas was proved by documents.

MRS. MEHTA (India) thought that the Commission's report should give an account of facts and decisions taken. She felt that the Commission had not decided during its first meeting that there had been violation of the agreement of 31 October 1947, and such a decision could not be taken now. It should only be said that the representatives of the Byelorussian and Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republics had not been able to arrive in time for the beginning of the session for reasons independent of their will.

She reminded the meeting that the Commission had not discussed the question in greater detail in view of the regrets expressed by the Chairman.

[6]

She would, therefore, vote against the Yugoslav amendment even if the facts stated by Mr. Vilfan were correct.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) shared the opinion of the Indian representative; the Commission could not pass judgment on the question under discussion and had to confine itself to a statement of the facts. He felt that as the resolution proposed by the USSR representative during the first meeting had not been voted upon it could not be mentioned in the Commission's report.

MR. STEPANENKO (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) thought that paragraph 6 as it stood was the least that should be said on the question; his delegation however, was prepared to accept it as it did not wish to return to a painful subject.

He made it clear that he had been denied a visa and that his passport had been sent back to him. It was granted, after representations made on 22 May, too late to obtain transport to arrive in time for the beginning of the session. Those facts had been disputed, but they were true and could be proved; the visas had first been denied and then granted after a certain delay and after the United Nations Secretary-General had intervened. He agreed with the USSR representative that such an incident could happen again with other delegations and that that should be avoided.

MR. KLEKOVKIN (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) could not accept the Indian proposal. To state merely that the representatives of the Byelorussian and Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republics had arrived late for reasons independent of their will might lead to the belief that their own Governments had been responsible for the delay, which obviously was not the case. He thought that the violation of the agreement was obvious since an intervention of the United Nations Secretary-General had been necessary in order to obtain visas.

[7]

MR. ORDONNEAU (France) associated himself with the Indian proposal. All the members of the Commission deeply regretted the incident but there was no need to pass judgment in the matter. As the United States Embassy had rectified the mistake, the agreement of 31 October 1947 had been respected.

MR. CHANG (China) recalled that he had been absent from the first meeting but that his alternate, Mr. Wu, had proposed the postponement of the second meeting until 26 May. The aim of that proposal had not been to await the arrival of the Byelorussian and Ukrainian representatives but to enable the members of the Commission to consider the various documents submitted to them.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) wished to point out once more that the resolution he had proposed at the first meeting had been adopted without a vote, but that he had forwarded it to the Chairman in writing. His proposal had not met with any objections and it had been decided to ask the Chairman to draw the attention of the Secretary-General to the fact that the representatives of the Byelorussian and Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republics had not arrived in time for reasons independent of their will and in violation of the agreement adopted by the General Assembly on 31 October 1947. The Commission had begun by entrusting this task to the Chairman, but at the latter's request it had decided that the Commission as a whole should draw the Secretary-General's attention to the above-mentioned facts. The opinion of the members of the Commission had been unanimous at the time. He felt that the correct facts should be mentioned for therein lay a question of principle.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the amendments proposed by the representative of Yugoslavia.

[8]

The first amendment proposed to delete the words "for reasons independent of their will" and to replace them by the words "and visas having first been denied and then, after a delay, granted by the United States Embassy in Moscow".

The amendment was rejected by 11 votes to 3.

The second amendment proposed the addition of the words "between the Government of the United States of America and the United Nations" after the words "31 October 1947".

The second amendment was not adopted, 5 votes being in favour and 5 against with 5 abstentions.

MR. FONTAINA (Uruguay) thought that an agreement could be reached. It was right to state that certain members of the Commission felt that there had been a delay in granting visas to the representatives of the Byelorussian and Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republics. Consequently, the Commission could adopt the USSR proposal to mention in the report that there had been a delay in granting the visas, while pointing out that certain members felt that there had been violation of the agreement of 31 October 1947.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that he would withdraw his amendment if the United States representative withdrew hers; that would lead to a retention of the text as drawn up by the Rapporteur.

THE CHAIRMAN could not agree to that suggestion of the USSR representative. The report should indicate that the belief that there had been violation of the agreement was held by certain members and not by the Commission as a whole.
[9]

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) thought that by acting in that way some members of the Commission were going back on the position they had taken up during the first meeting. In point of fact, it had been decided to state that the Commission as a whole, and not certain members, wished to draw the Secretary-General's attention to the facts now under discussion.

MR. ORDONNEAU (France) said that the Commission should verify whether such a decision had been taken at the meeting mentioned by the USSR representative and he proposed that the Secretary of the Commission should be asked to read out the summary record.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon), Rapporteur, said that he had used the wording of the summary record of the first meeting (document E/CN.4/SR.46) in paragraph 6 of his draft report. He read out the final part of that summary record: E/CN.4/SR.46 pages 15 and 16 – statements by Mr. Pavlov, the Chairman and Mr. Pavlov.

MR. ORDONNEAU (France) considered, in view of the explanations given by the Rapporteur, that no formal decision had been taken.

THE CHAIRMAN said that the last paragraph of the summary record was wrong: The USSR proposal had not been adopted as a formal notion.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) said that members of the Commission had agreed to draw the Secretary-General's attention to the fact that the representatives of the Byelorussian and Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republics had not been able to arrive in time for reasons independent of their will, but they had not stated that there had been violation of the agreement of 31 October 1947.
[10]

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) thought it incorrect to reverse a decision which had already been adopted and was embodied in the summary record of the forty-sixth meeting. If the Commission wished to reopen discussion on that point, it should take a preliminary vote. Mr. Pavlov repeated that no formal vote had been taken on the USSR proposal only because voting had appeared superfluous at that stage of the debate.

As regards the observations made earlier by the United States representative, Mr. Pavlov stated that, contrary to the information which she had received, all her speeches had been faithfully reproduced in the USSR press. That fact was easily confirmed by a perusal of the USSR newspapers.

THE CHAIRMAN stated that she was glad to hear that her speeches had been accurately reproduced in the USSR press.

As regards the USSR representative's suggestion that a vote should be taken on reopening the discussion, it was not possible to do so, as the summary record concerned had not yet been formally approved by the Commission and could not, therefore, be regarded as a document of incontestable authenticity.

MR. CHANG (China) pointed out that it appeared from the speech made by Mr. Wu as recorded in the summary record of the forty-sixth meeting that the Commission had postponed its work until 26 May following a proposal of the Chinese representative, not because the representatives of the Ukrainian and Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republics had not yet arrived, but because members had not had sufficient time to examine the necessary documents.

[11]

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) pointed out that under the rules of procedure the delegations were required to submit corrections to summary records within twenty-four hours. If no corrections were sent in within that period, the summary records were taken to be objective accounts of the debates.

MR. CHANG (China) quoted a passage of the summary record concerned, according to which the Chairman had expressed her willingness that the Secretary-General should be informed of the sense of the meeting and of the substance of the discussion. Apart from that, only one formal decision – that relating to the Chinese proposal – had been recorded.

Mr. Chang proposed that the Rapporteur should proceed to re-draft paragraph 6 of the report.

There being no objection, that proposal was accepted.

MR. KLEKOVKIN (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic), replying to Mr. Chang's statement to the effect that the meeting had been postponed to 26 May in order to enable members to study the documents, quoted a letter sent to him by the Secretary-General, according to which the Commission had decided to postpone the discussion on the agenda until 16 May pending the arrival of the two delegations.

THE CHAIRMAN read out paragraphs 7, 8, 9 and 10 of the draft report.

Those amendments were accepted without objection.

A decision on paragraph 11 was deferred until later, owing to the fact that the United States delegation felt that one of the summary records, namely that of the forty-sixth meeting contained inaccuracies.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) asked whether an attempt was being made to question the exactitude of the summary records, contrary to the provisions of the rules of procedure.

THE CHAIRMAN replied that it was not stated anywhere in the rules of procedure that the accuracy of summary records could not be questioned.

Discussion of paragraph 12 of the plan of work in regard to the International Charter on Human Rights

MR. CHANG (China) wondered whether it would not be better to include in that paragraph some explanation on the stage of the Commission's work on the Covenant and the measures to implement it.

MR. ORDONNEAU (France) was of the same opinion.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) recalled that the Commission had decided, at the end of its second session at Geneva, to append to its report to the Economic and Social Council drafts of the Declaration, the Covenant and the measures for their implementation.

In its present report the Commission would submit to the Council only the text of the Declaration. It was highly desirable to append to the report both the Draft Covenant prepared by the Drafting Subcommittee, accompanied by an explanatory note, and the old report on the measures of implementation which the Council had not yet considered, as the Council had referred it back to the Commission without comment.

THE CHAIRMAN said that the United States and French proposals on measures for implementation should also be attached to the report.

MR. CHANG (China) accepted the Rapporteur's proposal.

He went on to ask whether there was any special reason why certain members of the Commission did not wish a decision to be taken on the Declaration by the General Assembly at its next session, or whether the reason was that they preferred to present the drafts of the Covenant and the measures of implementation at the same time as the Declaration, so that they could be considered together. On the other hand, some members favoured the idea of submitting the Declaration to the Assembly at once. He was of the opinion that the Declaration should be proclaimed without delay. [13] The Commission should at least recommend that the Declaration should come before the General Assembly this year.

THE CHAIRMAN thought the Declaration should be submitted both to the Economic and Social Council and to the General Assembly, but it was for the latter to decide what it wished to do. The Assembly should, in any event, consider it this year.

MR. KLEKOVKIN (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) said that they had already had a disappointing experience in that respect. They all knew that the Economic and Social Council had returned to the Commission, without comment, the two annexes to the Covenant and the measures of implementation which had been communication to the Council at the end of the Commission's last session. It was senseless to risk making the Commission ridiculous in the eyes of the Council by repeating the same procedure. He was not averse to telling in the report what had already been done in those two matters, without however attaching drafts which were incomplete and had not been considered by the Commission.

MR. HOOD (Australia) recalled the existence of an Australian proposal which should also be annexed to the report together with the other documents.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon), Rapporteur, explained that by appending to the report the Draft Covenant, prepared by the Drafting Committee, no dangerous precedent would be established. They would merely be doing what had been done at Geneva in connection with the draft on the measures on implementation. The Council had only referred those questions back to the Commission so as to enable it to carry on its work according to the plan drawn up by the Council itself, and not out of a spirit of contempt, as the Ukrainian representative thought. It was quite logical to submit to [14] the Council the work achieved on the Covenant, as had been done, during the last session, with the draft on the measures of implementation.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) agreed with the Rapporteur. It was only natural that in submitting its report to the Council the Commission should say how far it had got in regard to the three parts of the International Charter on Human Rights. As to the Assembly's adoption of the Declaration, he hoped that the Chinese representative would submit a resolution to that effect. That was a new idea, as the Declaration was only part of the Charter, all parts of which were supposed to be considered and proclaimed at the same time.

THE CHAIRMAN agreed with the Rapporteur.

MRS. MEHTA (India) thought that the three documents should be submitted at the same time, thus leaving the Council to decide what it wanted to do with them.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that the Declaration should clearly be submitted to the Council which would decide whether to transmit it to the Assembly. On the other hand, there were many gaps in the Covenant, notably the absence of any provision for the implementation of economic rights, and it was far from ready for submission to the Council. The substance of the draft measures of implementation had not been discussed at all and had already been referred back by the Council to the Commission. The Commission as such was only entitled to transmit documents, the preparation of which had been completed.

He thought that the Australian proposal was most unjust and was categorically opposed to its submission to the Council.

If, however, the Commission wished to submit all three documents to the Council at the same time, it would have to prolong its session in order to complete the work. [15]

MISS SENDER (American Federation of Labor) thought that world public opinion would fail to understand why all three parts of the Charter had not been considered together. It was, therefore, important that the Commission should inform the Council of the state of its work on each part of the Charter.

MR. FONTAINA (Uruguay) also thought that the three documents should be submitted to the Council which would decide whether there was any need for another session of the Commission, or whether to refer the work to a different commission.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) proposed appending to the report in addition to the Declaration:

- (1) Annex B of Document E/CN.4/95 on the International Covenant on Human Rights, together with an explanatory note;
- (2) A reference to the third part of the report on the Commission's second session, and an Annex C containing Professor Cassin's statement, as well as the Chinese, United States and Australian proposals.

MR. LEBEAU (Belgium) also said that the Commission should, of necessity, indicate the state of the work on each part of the International Charter on Human Rights. He would, therefore, vote for the Rapporteur's proposal.

MR. KLEKOVKIN (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republics) again reminded the Commission that during its last session the Council had refused to consider the draft proposal on measures of implementation, as it was still incomplete: why, therefore, should the Commission wish to submit that document again?

He asked that the Rapporteur's proposal should be submitted in writing.

The meeting rose at 1:20 p.m.

E/CN.4/SR.81

18 June 1948<sup>139</sup>

Original Text: French

Summary Record of the Eighty-First Meeting
[of the Commission on Human Rights]

Held at Lake Success, New York on Friday

18 June 1948, at 2:30 p.m.

Chairman: Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, United States of America. Rapporteur: Mr. Malik, Lebanon. Members: Mr. Hood, Australia; Mr. Lebeau, Belgium; Mr. Stepanenko, <sup>139</sup> This was the date of the meeting. The document was issued on 1 July 1948.

Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic; Mr. Larrain, Chile; Mr. Chang, China; Mr. Loufi, Egypt; Mr. Ordonneau, France; Mrs. Mehta, India; Mr. Quijano, Panama; Mr. Carpio, Philippine Republic; Mr. Klekovkin, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic; Mr. Pavlov, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics; Mr. Wilson, United Kingdom; Mr. Fontaina, Uruguay; Mr. Vilfan, Yugoslavia. Consultants from Non-Governmental Organizations: Miss Sender, American Federation of Labor; Mr. van Istendael, International Federation of Christian Trade Unions; Mr. Rubinow, World Federation of United Nations Associations; Miss Drennan, Catholic International Union for Social Service; [2] Mr. Nolde, Commission of the Churches on International Affairs; Mr. Moskowitz, Consultative Council of Jewish Organizations; Mrs. Van den Berg, International Women's Alliance; Mrs. Parsons, International Council of Women; Miss Schaefer, International Union of Catholic Women's Leagues; Miss Robb, Liaison Committee of Women's International Associations; Mr. Bienenfeld, World Jewish Congress. Secretariat: Mr. Humphrey, Director of the Division of Human Rights; Mr. Lawson, Secretary of the Commission.

[3]

Continuation of Discussion of the Draft Report of the Commission on Human Rights to the Economic and Social Council (document E/CN.4/148)

THE CHAIRMAN proposed that, in order to speed up its work, the Commission should restrict the discussion in the following way: speeches would be limited to five minutes and only one speech for and one against would be allowed for each question under discussion.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) did not think the discussion should be restricted to that extent at a time when the Commission had reached the end of its work.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) and MR. LEBEAU (Belgium) admitted the need for gaining time but wished to reserve their delegations' right to state briefly their views, particularly on the question of implementation, which had not yet been discussed.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) and MR. FONTAINA (Uruguay) supported the Chairman's proposal.

The Commission decided, by 11 votes to 1, with 4 abstentions, that each speaker would be allowed to speak only once on the same subject and that speeches would be limited to five minutes.

Paragraph 6

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) reminded the Commission that two amendments had been proposed to paragraph 6 of the report: (1) the Chinese representative had requested the insertion of the words: "because of the necessity for members to have ample time to examine the various documents" after the words: "of 26 May"; (2) the United States representative had requested that the words: “and in violation of the agreement” be replaced by the words: “and that certain members felt the delay was in violation of the agreement”. It was for the Commission to decide on those two amendments.

[4]

THE CHAIRMAN opened the discussion on the Chinese amendment first.

MR. VILFAN (Yugoslavia) said that the Chinese amendment did not respect the chronological order of events. The Chinese representative’s proposal to convene the second meeting of the Commission for the afternoon of 26 May “because of the necessity for members to have ample time to examine the various documents” had been moved only after the Commission had agreed in principle to inform the Secretary-General of the Byelorussian and Ukrainian representatives’ delay in arriving.

MR. CHANG (China) reminded the Commission that his proposal had been moved and adopted during the discussion on the USSR representative’s proposal.

The Commission adopted the Chinese amendment by 11 votes to 4, with one abstention.

The Chairman then put to the vote the United States amendment.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said his delegation attached very great importance to the principle of paragraph 6 of the report. He had personally listened to recordings of the discussion during the first meeting of the Commission and had been able to ascertain that the summary record of that meeting was a correct report of what had happened.

During the first meeting of the Commission, the USSR delegation had asked the Chairman to draw the Secretary-General’s attention to the fact that the representatives of the Byelorussian and the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republics had not arrived in time for reasons beyond their control and because of a violation of the agreement adopted by the General Assembly on 31 October 1947; it had also asked the Commission to call the Secretary-General’s attention to the necessity of taking measures to prevent a repetition of such incidents. After a short discussion, the USSR delegation had agreed to change its proposal so [5] that it would be the Commission itself and not the Chairman who brought those facts to the Secretary-General’s knowledge. The Chairman had then formally stated that, as there were no objections, the USSR proposal thus amended was adopted by the Commission.

The summary record of the first meeting, which recorded both his proposal and the decision of the Commission, had not so far given rise to any objection or correction.

MR. STEPANENKO (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) felt that it would be better to state clearly the reasons which had prevented him and the Ukrainian representative from arriving in time for the beginning of the third session of the Commission, instead of saying that it was “for reasons beyond their control”.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that it would be completely outside the competence of the Commission to state that there had been violation of the agreement adopted on 31 October 1947 by the General Assembly. Speaking as representative of the United States, she said that, as some members of the Commission had expressed the opinion that Mr. Stepanenko and Mr. Klekovkin had been prevented from arriving in New York in time as a result of a violation of the said agreement, her delegation had moved an amendment to paragraph 6 of the report to make it clear that it was the opinion of “certain members” and not of the Commission itself.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said it had never been maintained during the discussion on his proposal that the question was outside the Commission’s competence.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) felt that there had been a misunderstanding at the first meeting of the Commission. The USSR delegation had believed, in all good faith, that the Commission had decided that there had been violation of the agreement of 31 October 1947. On the other hand, the United Kingdom delegation believed, also in all [6] good faith, that the Commission had expressed no opinion on that question. His delegation would vote for the United States amendment, because it was certain that the Commission had not decided that there had been violation of the agreement.

MR. LEBEAU (Belgium) said he remembered very well that the Commission had adopted, by 10 votes to 1, the proposal to adjourn its work, on the clear understanding that, if the representatives of Byelorussia and the Ukrainian SSR had not arrived in time for the following meeting, their alternates would have the right to vote. The USSR delegation had then asked that the Commission should establish that there had been violation of the agreement of 31 October 1947. He had pointed out at the time that, as the question had been settled in its practical aspect, he could not vote in favour of the USSR resolution. Indeed, he believed that the Commission was incompetent to express its opinion on the question of the approval of the agreement concerning the seat of the United Nations and access to the United States.

He recalled saying that the incidents were serious; that they were not isolated incidents; that his delegation had heard of similar cases and that he thought it advisable that the Commission should authorize the Chairman to report those facts to the United States authorities and to stress how the Commission felt on the subject. It had been argued that it would be more advisable to have those observations forwarded by the Secretary-General and the Commission had agreed to that. It could not be said that the USSR resolution which asked that the Commission should establish violation of the agreement of 31 October 1947, had been adopted by tacit consent. He personally would never have voted for the resolution if it had been put to the vote.

In his opinion the summary record of the first meeting was wrong when it stated that the USSR resolution had been adopted as there had been no objections. The Belgian delegation agreed with the observations made by the United States representative and would vote for her amendment.

[7]

MR. FONTAINA (Uruguay) said that, although he had not attended the first meeting, it seemed obvious to him that the Commission had unanimously deplored the regrettable incident which had happened and had expressed the hope that it would not happen again; furthermore, it seemed to him that there had been some confusion when a decision was taken on the opinion expressed by the USSR representative. It seemed that certain delegations would never have voted in favour of the USSR resolution, had they realized that it amounted to a kind of reprimand of the authorities of a Member State. It would be better therefore to state in the report that the Commission had regretted the incident and had brought it to the attention of the Secretary-General, without expressing any opinion on the international aspect of the question.

He formally moved the adjournment of the discussion on that point.

The Commission adopted the United States amendment to paragraph 6 of the report by 12 votes to 4.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) then proposed that the Commission should listen to the recordings of the discussion of the first meeting. It would thus be able to ascertain that the summary record of the meeting was correct.

THE CHAIRMAN, supported by MR. ORDONNEAU (France), stressed that the Commission would find it difficult to listen to recordings which gave the speeches in their original language without any interpretation.

The Commission rejected the USSR proposal by 10 votes to 4, with 2 abstentions.

MR. HOOD (Australia) wondered whether it was necessary to retain at the end of paragraph 6 of the report the following sentence from the resolution proposed by the USSR representative at the first meeting of the Commission: "and called the attention of the Secretary-General to the necessity of taking measures to prevent a repetition of such [8] incidents in the future."

THE CHAIRMAN reminded the Commission that Mr. Laugier, Assistant Secretary-General of the Department of Social Affairs, had attended that meeting and that it had been left to his discretion how to inform the Secretary-General of the fact that certain representatives could not arrive in time for the third session of the Commission on Human Rights; that the Commission had expressed its fears in case such an incident happened again, and that it had expressed the wish that measures should be taken to prevent a repetition of such incidents in the future. The Commission had not decided by vote on the instructions it wished to give the Secretariat.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) proposed that the drafting of the second sentence of paragraph 6 of the report should be changed as follows:

“The Commission drew the attention of the Secretary-General of the United Nations to the fact that these representatives could not arrive in time for the beginning of the third session of the Commission for reasons independent of their will, and that certain members felt the delay was in violation of the agreement adopted by the General Assembly on 31 October 1947; and to the necessity of taking measures to prevent a repetition of such incidents in the future.”

The Commission adopted the new draft by 13 votes to 1, with 1 abstention.

The Commission adopted paragraph 6 of the report as a whole by 10 votes to 4 with 2 abstentions.

...

[26]

...

Annex A

THE CHAIRMAN proposed the adoption of the title: “Draft United Nations Declaration on Human Rights.”

MR. LEBEAU (Belgium) stated his preference for the title: “Draft International Declaration on Human Rights”. The formula proposed by the Chairman was more restrictive; Mr. Lebeau felt that States which were not members of the United Nations but had applied for membership should also be able to conform to the Declaration.<sup>140</sup>

It was decided by 11 votes to 4 to substitute the word: “International” for: “United Nations”.

THE CHAIRMAN proposed that the word: “on” in the English title of the Draft Declaration should be replaced by the word: “of”. She made it clear that she proposed that alteration for purely grammatical reasons.

<sup>140</sup> In accordance with E/CN.4/SR.81/Corr.1 of 2 July 1948, the second sentence of Mr. Lebeau’s remarks is deleted and replaced with: “However, there were a certain number of States which, through no fault of their own, were not Members of the United Nations. The wording ‘International Declaration’ had the advantage, first of having acquired some popularity with the public, and secondly of making it easier for the States, which Mr. Lebeau had in mind, to apply the Declaration.”

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) supported the Chairman's view. He thought that the word: "of" was preferable because a Declaration on, concerning or about Human Rights did not necessarily list all those rights, while the word: "of" indicated quite clearly that the list was complete.<sup>141</sup>

It was decided by 10 votes to none, with 4 abstentions, to substitute the word: "of" for the word: "on".

It was decided, by 14 votes to none with one abstention, to adopt the title "Draft International Declaration of Human Rights".

[27]

Preamble of the Declaration

THE CHAIRMAN recalled that the United States delegation had voted against certain articles of the Declaration, but that it would vote in favour of the Declaration as a whole. She added that all members of the Commission would have the opportunity to raise certain points again.

MR. VILFAN (Yugoslavia) reserved his Government's freedom of action.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) read out the Preamble.

MR. LOUFI (Egypt) proposed that the French word "populations" in the penultimate line of the Preamble should be rendered in English as: "peoples".

It was decided by 14 votes to none, with 1 abstention.

MR. KLEKOVKIN (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) remarked that the Preamble as a whole had not been put to the vote at the previous meeting. There were considerable divergences between the Russian and English texts of the Preamble and his delegation was placed in an awkward position.

THE CHAIRMAN recalled that the Commission had adopted each paragraph of the Preamble separately and that, moreover, it had been understood that members of the Commission would check the accuracy of translations.

After a brief discussion on the agreement of the English and Russian texts the Preamble as a whole was adopted by 14 votes to none, with 4 abstentions.

Articles of the Declaration

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) read out the Declaration.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) asked that the commas in the English text of Article 5 should be omitted.

<sup>141</sup> Pursuant to E/CN.4/SR.81/Corr.1 of 2 July 1948, the opening words of this sentence are replaced with: "MR. MALIK (Lebanon) and MR. LEBEAU (Belgium) supported the Chairman's view. They thought that the..."

Agreed.

MR. ORDONNEAU (France) proposed that the wording of the French text of paragraph 3 of Article 21 should be changed as follows: “Toute personne peut librement former des syndicats et s’y affilier pour la défense de ses intérêts.”<sup>[*]</sup>

[*] This correction only affects the French text.

[28]

Agreed.

MR. ORDONNEAU (France) suggested that the word: “aux” should be submitted for the word “les” in the penultimate line of the French text of Article 27.*

Agreed.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) suggested that the second word: “of” in the English text of the second paragraph of Article 27 should be omitted.<sup>**</sup>

Agreed.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) stated that he would be unable to vote in favour of the Draft Declaration, which his delegation considered unsatisfactory. While it could not be said that the document contained nothing at all, since it did, in a somewhat vague way, reject certain generally accepted democratic concepts of fundamental rights; but it did nothing to ensure respect for human rights. Regardless of the insistence of the USSR delegation, the Commission had been unwilling to issue such a document as had been proposed by the USSR delegation on 4 and 27 May.

The chief faults of the Draft Declaration the Commission was about to vote lay in the absence of any effective measures to combat Fascism and Nazism and to protect against the possibility of their re-appearance; the deletion of all references to democracy; the rejection of the original article 31 and hence the limitation of certain rights; the absence of any provision for the implementation of human rights; and the rejection of any specific definition of the rights and obligations of individuals to the State.

Despite, however, the weak and inadequate document which was now before the Commission, the USSR delegation was confident that there would eventually emerge a Declaration which would effectively encourage the progress of democracy and the fight against Nazism and Fascism.

Mr. Pavlov asked to have his statement appended to the report of the Council as an expression of the minority view.

[*] This correction only affects the French text.

[**] This correction only affects the English text.

[29]

MR. VILFAN (Yugoslavia) associated himself with the statement of the USSR representative and supported his request that that statement should appear in the Commission’s report.

MR. STEPANENKO (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) expressed his whole-hearted support of the evaluation of the Draft Declaration given by the USSR representative. He felt confident that the future would see a declaration which would be in accordance with the spirit and letter of democracy and the principles of the United Nations.

MR. KLEKOVKIN (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) stated that he would abstain from voting on the Draft Declaration as a whole, as it was not acceptable to his delegation.

In taking part in drawing up the Draft Declaration, he had borne in mind the desire of people throughout the world for freedom from war and enslavement. He had striven to have incorporated in the Declaration some clear provision which would enable the people of the world to live in peace, free from the threat of Fascism and destructive wars. That idea had not received the support of the Commission, and the Draft Declaration he was now asked to vote upon was therefore quite inadequate.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the Draft Declaration as a whole.

The Commission approved the Draft Declaration by 12 votes, with 4 abstentions.

MR. CHANG (China) thought that the actual figures of the vote should be included in the Commission's report. The world should know that the Declaration produced after two years of serious work had obtained the support of twelve members, with four abstentions and no one opposed.

THE CHAIRMAN asked the Commission to vote upon the inclusion in its report of the USSR statement as a minority view. The proposal for its inclusion had been supported by the representatives of the Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic and Yugoslavia.

The Commission decided by 11 votes to 1, with 2 abstentions, to include the [30] USSR statement in the report.

A vote on the report of the Commission on Human Rights to the Economic and Social Council was taken by roll-call as follows:

In favour: Australia, Belgium, Chile, China, Egypt, France, India, Lebanon, Panama, United Kingdom, United States of America, Uruguay

Abstaining: Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Yugoslavia.

The report was adopted by 12 votes to none, with 4 abstentions.

MR. CARPIO (Philippines) explained that he would have voted for the adoption of the report, had he had the right to vote.

MR. QUIJANO (Panama) stated that his delegation deeply appreciated the honour of contributing to the drafting of such an important document.

Work on a Declaration on Human Rights had begun at San Francisco in 1945, on the proposal of the delegations of Mexico, Cuba and Panama. Panama had been the only country to submit a draft, and Mr. Quijano was pleased and proud to note that after months of arduous work the Commission had produced a Declaration which incorporated all the principles which had appeared in that original document.

The Draft Declaration seemed to him to combine brevity and clarity. Certain articles were perhaps rather long, and the document as a whole was not perfect. It did, however, represent a step forward in the road to perfection, and would, he thought, gain the recognition of the legislatures of the various countries of the world.

In conclusion, Mr. Quijano paid tribute to the Chairman, who had succeeded in instilling into the work something of the noble spirit of the late Franklin D. Roosevelt.

MR. FONTAINA (Uruguay) supported the statement of Mr. Quijano; he wished to stress that the representative of Panama had stated the views of all the Latin-American countries.

[31]

Out of respect for the USSR representative, whose work had been of the highest quality, Mr. Fontaina wished to explain that he had voted against the inclusion of the USSR statement in the report, not for any political reasons but for reasons of logic. Had Mr. Pavlov submitted an alternative draft declaration, he would gladly have voted for the inclusion of both draft declarations, as an expression of the majority and minority view.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) stated that he would hand in a list of all the texts proposed by the USSR to be appended to his statement.

MR. CHANG (China) expressed his appreciation for the great work of the Chairman.

In closing the third session of the Commission on Human Rights, the Chairman thanked the Commission for its patience and hard work, and expressed her satisfaction at the results achieved. On behalf of the Commission, she thanked the members of the Secretariat whose work had contributed to the success of the session.

The meeting rose at 7:20 p.m.

E/800

28 June 1948

Report of the Third Session of the Commission on Human Rights Lake Success, 24 May to 18 June 1948

...

[2]

1. The third session of the Commission on Human Rights opened on 24 May 1948 at the interim Headquarters of the United Nations, Lake Success. The Commission held thirty-six plenary meetings and terminated its work on 18 June 1948.

2. The following representatives of Member Nations on the Commission attended: Chairman: Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt (United States) Representative. Vice-Chairmen: Dr. P. C. Chang (China) Representative; Professor Cassin (France) Representative. Rapporteur: Dr. Charles Malik (Lebanon) Representative. Members: Mr. J. D. L. Hood (Australia) Alternate; Mr. R. Lebeau (Belgium) Alternate; Mr. A. S. Stepanenko (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) Representative; Mr. Herman Santa Cruz (Chile) Representative; Mr. Omar Loutfi (Egypt) Representative; Mrs. Hansa Mehta (India) Representative; Mr. M. de J. Quijano (Panama) Alternate; Mr. S. Lopez (Philippines) Alternate; Mr. M. Klekovkin (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) Representative; Mr. A. P. Pavlov (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) Alternate; Mr. Geoffrey Wilson (United Kingdom) Alternate; Mr. Jose Mora (Uruguay) Representative; Mr. Josa Vilfan (Yugoslavia) Alternate.

3. Mrs. Amalia C. Ledon (Mexico), Vice-Chairman of the Commission on the Status of Women, was present and participated without vote when sections of the draft of the International Bill of Human Rights relating to the particular rights of women were being considered.

4. The following representatives of specialized agencies were also present at the session: [3] Mr. R. W. Cox and Dr. R. A. Metall, International Labour Organization; Mr. Pierre Lebar, United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization; Miss B. Howell and Mr. G. E. Hill, World Health Organization; Mr. Oliver Stone, Preparatory Commission for the International Refugee Organization.

5. The following consultants from non-governmental organizations were also present: Category A: Miss Toni Sender and Mr. Peter Garvan, American Federation of Labor; Mr. August J. A. van Istendael, International Federation of Christian Trade Unions; Mr. Joseph Button and Miss Julia Stuart, World Federation of United Nations Associations; Category B: Dr. Salomon Goldsmith, Dr. Isaac Lewin and Dr. M. L. Munk, Agudas Israel World Organization; Miss Juliet H. Drennan, Catholic International Union for Social Service; Dr. O. Frederick Nolde, and Mr. Sartell Prentice Jr., Commission of the Churches on International Affairs; Mr. Moses Moskowitz, Consultative Council of Jewish Organizations; Mr. Barnett Janner, Mr. A. G. Brotman, and Mr. Arthur C. A. Liverhant, Co-ordinating Board of Jewish Organizations for Consultation with the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations; Mrs. Marian Baker van den Berg, International Alliance of Women; Miss Marguerite Strahler, International Committee of the Red Cross; Mrs. W. F. Parsons, International Federation of Business and Professional Women; Miss Catherine Schaefer, International Union of Catholic Women's Leagues; [4] Dr. Janet Robb, Liaison Committee of Women's International Organizations; Dr. F. R. Bienenfeld and Mr. Stephen D. Wolkowicz, World Jewish Congress; Miss Elizabeth A. Smart, World Women's Christian Temperance Union; Miss Anne Guthrie, World's Y.W.C.A.

6. Although its session opened on 24 May, the Commission was unable to begin its work on substantive questions until the afternoon of 26 May because of the necessity for the members to have ample time to examine the various documents and owing to the delay in arriving at Lake Success of Mr. Stepanenko, Representative of the Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, and of Mr. Klekovkin, Representative of the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic. The Commission drew the attention of the Secretary-General of the United Nations to the fact that these Representatives could not arrive in time for the beginning of the third session of the Commission for reasons independent of their will, and that certain members felt the delay was in violation of the agreement adopted by the General Assembly on 31 October 1947; and to the necessity of taking measures to prevent a repetition of such incidents in the future.

7. Mr. Herman Santa Cruz (Chile) participated from the 49th to the 52nd meetings; Mr. Jose Mora (Uruguay) from the 46th to the 52nd meetings; and Prof. René Cassin (France) from the 46th to the 73rd meetings. Mr. Santa Cruz was represented from the 54th to the final meeting by Mr. J. Larrain; Mr. Mora was represented from the 53rd to the final meeting by Mr. Roberto Fontaina; and Prof. Cassin was represented from the 73rd to the final meeting by Mr. Pierre Ordonneau; these alternates were given the right to vote. In various meetings during the session Mr. G. Jockel (Australia) substituted for Mr. Hood, Mr. L. Steyaert (Belgium) for Mr. Lebeau, Dr. T. Y. Wu (China) for Dr. Chang, Dr. E. Azkoul (Lebanon) for Dr. Malik, and Mr. Jose D. Ingles and Mr. V. D. Carpio (Philippines) for Mr. Lopez; these alternates were not given the right to vote. The Representative of Iran did not participate in the session. An observer representing the Government of New Zealand attended meetings of the session.

8. The Commission re-elected Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt (United States of America) as Chairman, Dr. P. C. Chang (China) as Vice-Chairman, and Dr. Charles Malik (Lebanon) as Rapporteur. It elected Prof. René Cassin (France) as Second Vice-Chairman.

9. Prof. John P. Humphrey, Director of the Division of Human Rights, represented the Secretary-General. Mr. Edward Lawson acted as Secretary of the Commission.

[5]

10. The Commission adopted the Provisional Agenda (document E/CN.4/88) as its Agenda.

11. The expression of the views of the Members of the Commission is embodied in the summary records of the plenary meetings (documents E/CN.4/SR.41 to E/CN.4/SR.81).

12. Plan of Work in Regard to the International Bill of Human Rights

The Commission had before it the Report of the Drafting Committee on an International Bill of Human Rights (document E/CN.4/95), which met at Lake Success from 3 to 21 May 1948. It decided to begin its work by dealing with the Draft International Declaration on Human Rights (Annex "A" of document E/CN.4/95), since the Drafting Committee already had carefully examined the Draft International Covenant on Human Rights; and after finishing this part of its work to proceed to examine the question of implementation and finally the Draft International Covenant on Human Rights in detail.

13. The Commission examined the proposed Articles for the Declaration, article by article, taking into consideration the amendments proposed by various Representatives. However, it did not have the time to consider the question of implementation, or the Covenant, in detail. On the basis of its deliberations as recorded in the summary records, the Commission prepared and adopted by twelve votes for, none against, and four abstentions,* the Draft International Declaration of Human Rights appended to this Report as Annex "A", which it submits to the Economic and Social Council.

14. The Commission also decided to forward to the Economic and Social Council the Draft International Covenant on Human Rights as it appeared in Annex "B" of the Report of the second session of the Drafting Committee on an International Bill of Human Rights; this Draft International Covenant on Human Rights, which the Commission did not have the time to examine, is appended to this Report as Annex "B".

[*] 1. The Representatives of Australia, Belgium, Chile, China, Egypt, France, India, Lebanon, Panama, the United Kingdom, the United States of America, and Uruguay voted in favour of the Draft International Declaration of Human Rights; no Representatives voted against it; the Representatives of the Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and Yugoslavia abstained; and the alternate for the Representative of the Philippines stated that if he had the right to vote, he would vote in favour.
2. The Representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics requested that a statement relating to the Draft International Declaration of Human Rights, prepared by him, be appended to this Report; this statement is attached hereto as an Appendix. The Representatives of the Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, and Yugoslavia associated themselves with this statement.

[6]

15. In addition, the Commission decided to refer the Council to Annex "C" of the Report of its second session (document E/600) and to various other proposals which have been made with respect to the question of implementation; these proposals, which have been distributed separately, are listed in this Report in Annex "C".

16. The Commission recognized that in approving the Draft International Declaration of Human Rights it had not completed its task of preparing an International Bill of Human Rights, which consists of a Declaration, a Covenant, and Measures of implementation. It agreed that the Declaration would form only part of the International Bill of Human Rights, and that completion of a Covenant, containing measures of implementation, is essential.

17. The Commission decided that further work on the question of implementation was of the utmost importance and that therefore it should embark upon this work together with work on the Covenant, at its fourth session on the basis of the Report of the Working Group on implementation which met during the second session of the Commission (Annex C of document E/600) taking into account the other documentation contained or listed in Annexes “B” and “C” of the present report. The Commission recommended to the Economic and Social Council that a meeting of the Commission be held early in 1949 for the completion of the Covenant and the measures of implementation.

18. The Prevention of Discrimination and the Protection of Minorities

The Commission decided to postpone reconsideration of the terms of reference of the Sub-Commission on the Prevention of Discrimination and the Protection of Minorities, as it had decided to do at its second session, until it had drawn up its draft International Bill of Human Rights, including implementation, it expressed the view that there was no need for the Sub-Commission to meet prior to the next session of the Commission, since the Draft International Bill of Human Rights had not been completed at this session; and decided that reconsideration of the terms of reference of the Sub-Commission would be on the agenda of its next session.

...

[10]

Annex A

Draft International Declaration of Human Rights

Preamble

Whereas recognition of the inherent dignity and of the equal and inalienable rights of all members of the human family is the foundation of freedom, justice and peace in the world; and

Whereas disregard and contempt for human rights resulted, before and during the second world war, in barbarous acts which outraged the conscience of mankind and made it apparent that the fundamental freedoms were one of the supreme issues of the conflict; and

Whereas it is essential, if mankind is not to be compelled as a last resort to rebel against tyranny and oppression, that human rights should be protected by a regime of law; and

Whereas the peoples of the United Nations have in the Charter determined to reaffirm faith in fundamental human rights and in the dignity and worth of the human person and to promote social progress and better standards of life in larger freedom; and

Whereas Member States have pledged themselves to achieve, in co-operation with the Organization, the promotion of universal respect for and observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms; and

Whereas a common understanding of these rights and freedoms is of the greatest importance for the full realization of this pledge,

Now therefore the General Assembly

Proclaims this Declaration of Human Rights as a common standard of achievement for all peoples and all nations, to the end that every individual and every organ of society, keeping this Declaration constantly in mind, shall strive by teaching and education to promote respect for these rights and freedoms and by progressive measures, national and international, to secure their universal and effective recognition and observance, both among the peoples of Member States themselves and among the peoples of territories under their jurisdiction.

Article 1

All human beings are born free and equal in dignity and rights. They are endowed by nature with reason and conscience, and should act towards one another in a spirit of brotherhood.

Article 2

Everyone is entitled to all the rights and freedoms set forth in this Declaration, without distinction of any kind, such as race, colour, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, property or other status, or national or social origin.

[11]

Article 3

Everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of person.

Article 4

1. No one shall be held in slavery or involuntary servitude,
2. No one shall be subjected to torture or to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.

Article 5

Everyone has the right to recognition everywhere as a person before the law.

Article 6

All are equal before the law and are entitled without any discrimination to equal protection of the law against any discrimination in violation of this Declaration and against any incitement to such discrimination.

Article 7

No one shall be subjected to arbitrary arrest or detention.

Article 8

In the determination of his rights and obligations and of any criminal charge against him, everyone is entitled in full equality to a fair hearing by an independent and impartial tribunal.

Article 9

1. Everyone charged with a penal offence has the right to be presumed innocent until proved guilty according to law in a public trial at which he has had all the guarantees necessary for his defence.

2. No one shall be held guilty of any offence on account of any act or omission which did not constitute an offence, under national or international law, at the time when it was committed.

Article 10

No one shall be subjected to unreasonable interference with his privacy, family, home, correspondence or reputation.

Article 11

1. Everyone has the right to freedom of movement and residence within the borders of each State.

2. Everyone has the right to leave any country, including his own.

Article 12

1. Everyone has the right to seek and be granted, in other countries, asylum from persecution.

2. Prosecutions genuinely arising from non-political crimes or from acts contrary to the purposes and principles of the United Nations do not constitute persecution.

[12]

Article 13

No one shall be arbitrarily deprived of his nationality or denied the right to change his nationality.

Article 14

1. Men and women of full age have the right to marry and to found a family and are entitled to equal rights as to marriage.
2. Marriage shall be entered into only with the full consent of both intending spouses.
3. The family is the natural and fundamental group unit of society and is entitled to protection.

Article 15

1. Everyone has the right to own property alone as well as in association with others.
2. No one shall be arbitrarily deprived of his property.

Article 16

Everyone has the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion; this right includes freedom to change his religion or belief, and freedom, either alone or in community with others and in public or private, to manifest his religion or belief in teaching, practice, worship and observance.

Article 17

Everyone has the right to freedom of opinion and expression; this right includes freedom to hold opinions without interference and to seek, receive and impart information and ideas through any media and regardless of frontiers.

Article 18

Everyone has the right to freedom of assembly and association.

Article 19

1. Everyone has the right to take part in the government of his country, directly or through his freely chosen representatives.
2. Everyone has the right of access to public employment in his country.
3. Everyone has the right to a government which conforms to the will of the people.

Article 20

Everyone, as a member of society, has the right to social security and is entitled to the realization, through national effort and international co-operation, and in accordance with the organization and resources of each State, of the economic, social and cultural rights set out below.

[13]

Article 21

1. Everyone has the right to work, to just and favourable conditions of work and pay and to protection against unemployment.
2. Everyone has the right to equal pay for equal work.
3. Everyone is free to form and to join trade unions for the protection of his interests.

Article 22

1. Everyone has the right to a standard of living, including food, clothing, housing and medical care, and to social services, adequate for the health and wellbeing of himself and his family and to security in the event of unemployment, sickness, disability, old age or other lack of livelihood in circumstances beyond his control.
2. Mother and child have the right to special care and assistance.

Article 23

1. Everyone has the right to education. Elementary and fundamental education shall be free and compulsory and there shall be equal access on the basis of merit to higher education.
2. Education shall be directed to the full development of the human personality, to strengthening respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms and to combating the spirit of intolerance and hatred against other nations and against racial and religious groups everywhere.

Article 24

Everyone has the right to rest and leisure.

Article 25

Everyone has the right to participate in the cultural life of the community, to enjoy the arts and to share in scientific advancement.

Article 26

Everyone is entitled to a good social and international order in which the rights and freedoms set out in this Declaration can be fully realized.

Article 27

1. Everyone has duties to the community which enables him freely to develop his personality.

2. In the exercise of his rights, everyone shall be subject only to such limitations as are necessary to secure due recognition and respect for the rights of others and the requirements of morality, public order and general welfare in a democratic society.

Article 28

Nothing in this Declaration shall imply the recognition of the right of any State or person to engage in any activity aimed at the destruction of any of the rights and freedoms prescribed herein.

[14]

Note: The Commission has not considered the following article since measures of implementation were not in its third session:

“Everyone has the right, either individually, or in association with others, to petition or to communicate with the public authorities of the State of which he is a national or in which he resides, or with the United Nations.”

[15]

[Annex B consists of the Draft International Covenant on Human Rights prepared by the Drafting Committee.]

[37]

Appendix

Statement Made by the Delegation of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, on 18 June 1948, in the Commission on Human Rights on the Results of the Commission’s Work

The Soviet delegation considers that the draft Declaration on Human Rights which has been drawn up by the Commission contains various provisions which do not give rise to objections and are, generally speaking, acceptable.

The delegation of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, together with certain other delegations, consistently defended these provisions in the Commission, thus safeguarding the democratic rights and freedoms of the peoples against any attempt to weaken or diminish them and, in a number of cases, the wording of the relevant articles containing these provisions, as drafted earlier at Geneva, was largely retained.

In doing so, the Soviet delegation considered that the repetition in the present Declaration on Human Rights of certain old democratic principles and provisions with which mankind has long been familiar is useful because in many countries of the world, more particularly in the case of<sup>142</sup> the populations of trust and other non-self-governing territories fundamental human rights and freedoms are still not applied, although they should be applied.

Furthermore, at a time when the resurgence and propagation of anti-democratic, Fascist and other reactionary regimes constitutes a real danger for many<sup>143</sup> countries in the world, it is undoubtedly useful in a document such as the Declaration on Human Rights to restate some of the more<sup>144</sup> important democratic rights and freedoms, to the destruction of which<sup>145</sup> Fascist states, organizations and elements directed some of their efforts during the war and are still continuing to do so.

It should also be noted that the draft Declaration introduces into the complex of fundamental human rights certain new rights, which are not included in old constitutions, but which are typical of the new, modern, democratic constitutions (above all, in the Constitution of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) – rights such as the right to work, leisure, education, social security, etc. This is the positive aspect of the draft.

Since, however, the problem is to make an appraisal of the<sup>146</sup> Declaration as a whole, the Soviet delegation is bound to say that the draft is unsatisfactory, and is not calculated to guarantee either human rights and freedoms or respect for them.

In spite of the unremitting insistence of the Soviet delegation and certain other delegations, the majority of the Commission did not see fit<sup>147</sup> to prepare a document which would meet the fundamental requirements proposed for the Declaration on behalf of the Government of the Union of Soviet [38] Socialist Republics by the Soviet representative on the Drafting Committee on 4 May and at the Commission's meeting on 27 May this year.

As is known, these requirements were as follows:

- (a) The Declaration on Human Rights should ensure respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms for all, without distinction as to race, nationality, social position,<sup>148</sup> religion, language or sex, in accordance with the principles of democracy, national sovereignty and political independence for each State.
- (b) The Declaration on Human Rights should not only proclaim rights, but should guarantee their implementation, taking into account, of course, the economic, social and other peculiarities of each country;

<sup>142</sup> The words "more particularly in the case of" were replaced with "and particularly in respect of" by E/800/Corr.1.

<sup>143</sup> The word "many" was replaced with "a number of" by E/800/Corr.1.

<sup>144</sup> The word "more" was replaced with "most" by E/800/Corr.1.

<sup>145</sup> The word "in particular" was added by E/800/Corr.1. <sup>146</sup> The word "draft" was added by E/800/Corr.1.

<sup>147</sup> The words "see fit" were replaced with "wish" by E/800/Corr.1.

<sup>148</sup> The words "social position" were replaced with "status in society" by E/800/Corr.1.

- (c) The Declaration on Human Rights should define not only the rights but also the obligations of citizens towards their country, their people and their State.

The Soviet delegation wishes to draw special attention to the following specific serious omissions and shortcomings in the Declaration and the work of the Commission:

- (a) The ignoring of such a fundamental requisite of democracy as the struggle against Fascism and Nazism, against the activities of Fascist and Nazi elements and their abuse of democratic rights and freedoms and against the danger of the expansion, retention and resurgence of Fascist regimes; and, in particular, the failure to prohibit Fascist and Nazi propaganda and to enforce responsibility for such propaganda;
- (b) The failure to enlarge the democratic rights and freedoms of the peoples and to defend some of the most important democratic principles in the Declaration; the omission from the Declaration (except for one paragraph in Article 27) of any mention even of democracy and the actual concepts of “the democratic state”; “democratic principles”, etc.
- (c) The limitation and restriction of a number of democratic rights and freedoms in the Declaration as compared with the Geneva draft; the refusal to maintain consistently the principle of full equality for all, without distinction as to race, nationality, social position,<sup>149</sup> religion, sex and language; the omission from the Declaration of the provision regarding the right of every person to his own national culture, to be taught in school in his native language and to use that language in the press, at meetings, in courts and other public offices; the failure to wage a<sup>150</sup> serious fight against racialism and discrimination, to prohibit the propaganda of racial and national [39] hostility, and to lay down the principle that such propaganda should be punishable.
- (d) The failure, in most of the articles of the Declaration, to refer to ensuring and guaranteeing the implementation of rights and freedoms and to concrete forms, means and methods of applying the provisions of the Declaration; the unrealistic, formal and legal<sup>151</sup> nature of the Declaration (especially<sup>152</sup> Articles 21, 22, 24 and 25, relating to economic and cultural rights).
- (e) The failure to include in the Declaration any concrete obligations whatsoever on the part of the individual towards his native land, the people to which he belongs and the State; the direct ignoring in the case of several serious questions (freedom of information, freedom of transit) of these obligations,

<sup>149</sup> The words “social position” were replaced with “status in society” by E/800/Corr.1.

<sup>150</sup> The word “a” was replaced with “any” by E/800/Corr.1.

<sup>151</sup> The words “formal and legal” were replaced with “purely formal and legalistic” by E/800/Corr.1.

<sup>152</sup> The word “any” was added by E/800/Corr.1.

on the one hand and on the other hand, of the rights and sovereignty of States, and of the relevant provisions of the United Nations Charter concerning non-interference in the domestic affairs of States Members.

The Soviet delegation is certain that, instead of this weak and, in many ways, absolutely unsatisfactory Declaration, a Declaration will eventually be drawn up which will effectively serve the cause of historical progress, democracy, lead to a real improvement in the lives of millions of simple people throughout the world, as well as serve the aims of the fight against the danger of a recrudescence of Fascism and Nazism and, which will finally lead to an assertion<sup>153</sup> of the principles of equality of nations, real respect for human rights and freedoms and the strengthening of international peace.

The Soviet delegation has attached to this statement, for inclusion in the Commission's report, a list also of the main proposals and amendments to articles of the Declaration which were submitted by the Soviet delegation, but which were not adopted by the Commission. A perusal of this list will in itself serve largely to explain why the Soviet delegation must abstain from voting on the draft<sup>154</sup> Declaration as a whole.

[40]

Basic Proposals Advanced by the Soviet Delegation at the Third Session of the Commission on Human Rights and Rejected by the Commission during its Consideration of the Draft International Declaration on Human Rights

1. Draft Preamble to the Declaration Proposed by the Delegation of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics

“In accordance with the principles proclaimed in the Charter of the United Nations of respect for human rights and basic freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language and religion and for the dignity and value of the individual;

In order to ensure observance of all these rights and freedoms and with a view to promoting social progress and improving the living conditions of the peoples;

With a view also to promoting the development of friendly relations between nations;

The General Assembly recommends the following ‘Declaration of Human Rights’ to all States Members of the United Nations to be used at their discretion both in adopting<sup>155</sup> appropriate legislative and other measures, and in their systems of upbringing and education and<sup>156</sup> in extending the provisions of this Declaration to the peoples of States Members themselves and to the populations of all the territories in respect of which the States concerned discharge the function of the guiding<sup>157</sup> and administering authority (populations of trust and other non-self-governing territories).”

<sup>153</sup> The word “assertion” was replaced with “establishment” by E/800/Corr.1.

<sup>154</sup> The word “prepared” was added by E/800/Corr.1.

<sup>155</sup> The word “adopting” was replaced with “carrying out” by E/800/Corr.1.

2. Addition to Article 2

After the words “property or other status” add “class”<sup>158</sup>.

3. Addition to Article 4

“Slavery and the slave trade are prohibited in all their aspects; and all violations of this principle, whether they be of an overt or clandestine nature, must be punished according to law.”

4. Addition to Article 7

“Anyone deprived of his liberty has the right to be informed without delay of the grounds for his detention. Anyone who is arrested, detained or imprisoned is entitled to have immediately established<sup>159</sup> by the judicial authorities the<sup>160</sup> legality of his deprivation of liberty, and also to have his case brought before the court without undue delay or to be liberated.

No one may be imprisoned on account merely of failure to carry out his contractual obligations.

Everyone is entitled to compensation for illegal arrest or deprivation of liberty.”
[41]

5. Alterations<sup>161</sup> and Supplements to Article 8

Insert the following before the text as adopted by the Commission:

“All people are equal before the law. Judges must be independent and answerable only to the law. Legal procedure<sup>162</sup> in all States must be based on democratic principles.

<sup>156</sup> The word “and” was replaced with “as well as” by E/800/Corr.1.

<sup>157</sup> The word “guiding” was replaced with “ruling” by E/800/Corr.1.

<sup>158</sup> The word “class” was replaced with “status in society” by E/800/Corr.1.

<sup>159</sup> The words “have immediately established” were replaced with “the immediate establishment” by E/800/Corr.1.

<sup>160</sup> The word “of” was added by E/800/Corr.1. Obviously, the intent was for the word “of” to be placed before “the legality”.

<sup>161</sup> The word “Alterations” was replaced with “Amendments” by E/800/Corr.1.

<sup>162</sup> The word “procedure” was replaced with “proceedings” by E/800/Corr.1.

Hearings in all courts must be public, with the exception of cases for which provision is made by law for the purpose of complying with public morality or in the interests of national security. The accused shall be entitled to the services of a defence counsel in court.

Should the accused be unfamiliar with the national language, he must be enabled to acquaint himself with all the details of the case by means of<sup>163</sup> an interpreter, and he must be given the right to speak in court in his native language.”

6. Amendment to Article 9

Before the word “trial” delete “public”, and after the word “defence” add: “. . .and which must be public except in cases involving considerations of the protection of public morality or national security”.

7. Amendment to Article 10 (supplement to the text as adopted)

“and everyone is entitled to legal defence against such interference”.

8. Amendment to Article 11

- (a) Paragraph 1: After the words “residence within the borders of each State”, add: “in accordance with the laws of that State”.
- (b) Paragraph 2: After the words “to leave any country, including his own”, add: “in accordance with the procedure laid down in the laws of that country”.

9. Amendment to Article 12

Replace paragraph 1 by the following:

“The right of asylum is guaranteed to all persons persecuted in connection with their activity in defence of the interests of democracy or for their scientific activity or for their participation in the struggle for national liberation”.

10. Amendment to Article 13

The following wording is proposed:

“No one shall be arbitrarily deprived of his nationality, i.e. in any other manner or in any other case than as provided for in the laws of the country concerned”.

<sup>163</sup> The words “details of the case by means of” were replaced with “documents of the case through” by E/800/Corr.1.

11. Amendment to Article 14

Paragraph 2: Add after the first sentence of the text as adopted:

“Men and women shall enjoy equal rights both during marriage and when divorced”.

[42]

At the end of the third paragraph add the words “by society and the State”.

12. Amendment to Article 15

Replace the text as adopted by:

“1. Everyone has the right to own property alone as well as in association with others in accordance with the laws of the country where such property is situated.

2. No one shall be arbitrarily, i.e. illegally, deprived of his property.”

13. Amendment to Article 16

Replace the text as adopted by the following:

“Everyone must be guaranteed freedom of thought and freedom to perform religious services in accordance with the laws of the country concerned and the requirements of public morality”.

14. Text of Article 17

Replace the text as adopted by the following:

“1. In accordance with the principles of democracy and in the interests of strengthening international collaboration and world peace, everyone must be legally guaranteed the right freely to express his opinions and, in particular, freedom of speech and the press and also freedom of artistic expression. Freedom of speech and the press shall not be used for purposes of propagating Fascism, aggression and for provoking hatred as between nations.

2. For the purpose of enabling the wider masses of the people and their organizations to give free expression to their opinions the State will assist and co-operate in making available the material resources (premises, printing presses, paper, etc.) necessary for the publication of democratic organs of the press.”

14a. Second amendment to Article 17

The following changes should be introduced into the text as adopted:

“Everyone has the right to freedom of thought and its expression; wherein is included freedom of conviction and freedom of access to sources of information and means of communication for the transmission of information in the territory of his own country and also in other countries, within limits corresponding to the interests of national security”.

15. *Alternative text of Article 18

Replace the text as adopted by the following:

“In the interests of democracy a legal guarantee must be provided for<sup>164</sup> freedom of assembly and meeting, street processions, demonstrations and the organization of voluntary societies and unions<sup>165</sup>. All societies, unions and other organizations of a Fascist or anti-democratic nature, as well as their activity in any form, are forbidden by law under pain of punishment”.

[43]

16. *Amendment to Article 19

Include the following in paragraph 3:

“The State shall consider, the will of the people as expressed in elections, which shall be conducted periodically and must be universal and equal and be held by secret ballot”.

17. *Alternative Text of Article 20

Replace the text as adopted by the following:

“It is the duty of the State and society to take all the necessary measures, including legislative measures, to ensure for every individual a real opportunity to enjoy all the rights mentioned in the Declaration. In view of the special importance of the economic, social and cultural rights enumerated in Articles 21 to 26 of the Declaration and, in particular, of the right to social security, it is considered desirable that they be implemented by means of both national efforts and international co-operation, due regard being had to the social, economic and political organization and resources of each State”.

18. *Amendment to Article 21

After the words “right to work . . . and pay” add: “and the right to protection against unemployment. The State and society shall guarantee this right by measures calculated to provide everyone with the broadest opportunities for<sup>166</sup> useful work, and to prevent unemployment”.

18. (a) *Second amendment Add

“Everyone, without distinction as to race, nationality or sex, has the right to equal pay for equal work.”

<sup>164</sup> The words “a legal guarantee must be provided for” were deleted by E/800/Corr.1.

<sup>165</sup> The words “must be guaranteed by the law” were added by E/800/Corr.1.

<sup>166</sup> The words “taking part in” were added by E/800/Corr.1.

18. (b) Proposed supplementary clause to Article 21

“Women shall enjoy equal advantages in their work with men and shall receive equal pay for equal work.”

19. Amendment to Article 22

Include the right to social insurance by inserting in paragraph 1 (after the words “. . . In circumstances beyond his control”) the words:

“and also (if he is gainfully employed) to social insurance at the expense of the State or of his employers, in accordance with the legislation of each country”.

In addition, add the following points also to Article 22 in the form of two independent sentences:

2. “Everyone has the right to medical care and assistance in case of illness.”
3. “Everyone has the right to decent housing.”

“It is the duty of the State and society to take all necessary steps, including legislation, to ensure that everyone has a real opportunity of enjoying all these rights.”

[44]

20. Amendment to Article 23

Add in paragraph 1 after the first sentence:

“Access to education must be open to all without any distinction as to race, sex, language, material status or party allegiance.”

21. Amendment to Article 24

Add to the text adopted:

“Everyone shall be guaranteed rest and leisure either by law or by contractual agreements, particular provision being made for the reasonable limitation of working hours and for periodical paid holidays.”

22. Amendment to Article 25

Add to the text adopted:

“The development of science must serve, the interests of progress and democracy and the cause of international peace and co-operation.”

23. Amendment to Article 26

At the beginning of the sentence: “Everyone is entitled to a good social and international order in which. . .” delete the word “good” (or, in the second variant of the text, the word “just”).<sup>167</sup>

24. Amendment to Article 27

Add (after the words “democratic society”):

“. . . and also the corresponding requirements of the democratic State”.

25. Add to the text adopted a separate new paragraph in place of the corresponding Article 31 of the Geneva text rejected by the Commission

“All persons, irrespective of whether they belong to the racial, national or religious minority or majority of the population, have the right to their own ethnic or national culture, to establish their own schools and receive teaching in their native tongue, and<sup>168</sup> to use that tongue in the press, at public meetings, in the courts and in other official premises”.

E/SR.180<sup>169</sup>

21 July 1948

Summary Record of the One Hundred and Eightieth Meeting [of the Economic and Social Council]

Held at the Palais des Nations, Geneva, on Wednesday,
21 July 1948, at 3 p.m.

President: DR. CHARLES MALIK

9. Continuation of the discussion on working arrangements for the session.

Human Rights Committee

THE PRESIDENT announced that the first question before the Council was whether a Committee of the Whole on Human Rights should be established. There was the further question of the establishment of committees on procedure and co-ordination.

<sup>167</sup> The paragraph is replaced, by E/800/Corr.1, with the following: “At the beginning of the sentence: ‘Everyone is entitled to a social and international order of such a kind that the rights and freedoms set out in this Declaration may be fully realized.’”

<sup>168</sup> The word “also” was added by E/800/Corr.1.

<sup>169</sup> The document is taken from Official Records of the Economic and Social Council, Third Year, Seventh Session, 19 July–28 August 1948, pp. 60–74.

In connexion with those subjects the United Kingdom delegation had raised the question of the size of committees.

MR. THORN (New Zealand) believed that the Social Committee would have too heavy a programme if there were no separate Human Rights Committee. The items which would go before the Human Rights Committee would be items 17 (Report of the third session of the Commission on Human Rights), 18 (Final Act of the United Nations Conference on Freedom of Information) and 19 (draft Convention on the Crime of Genocide). The sole intention of the New Zealand delegation was to expedite the Council's business.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) recalled that he had suggested at the previous meeting that a decision could be taken on the establishment of a Human Rights Committee when the Report of the Commission on Human Rights came up for discussion. He would therefore vote against the establishment of such a committee, on the understanding that a final decision could subsequently be taken by the Council.

MR. DE CLERMONT-TONNERRE (France) said that the French delegation would vote for the establishment of a Human Rights Committee and pointed out that the Committee would probably not be called upon to sit until after the Economic Committee had finished its work. Only ten of the items on the agenda were concerned with economic problems, while the Social Committee had seventeen items to consider; it was therefore likely that the Social Committee would sit long after the Economic Committee had finished its work. Consequently, it would be advisable to set up a committee to examine questions concerning human rights in order to lighten the Social Committee's task.

MR. MCNEIL (United Kingdom) proposed that the Human Rights Committee should not be a committee of the whole, but should be limited to twelve members, to be nominated by the President. He put forward the proposal not in the interests of the United Kingdom, but in those of [61] the smaller delegations represented on the Council. The appointment of a third committee of the whole would result in no saving of time, because three committees could not meet simultaneously.

MR. D'ASCOLI (Venezuela) felt that the Human Rights Committee would have to consider important items, in the discussion of which all delegations should be represented; it should therefore be a committee of the whole.

MR. P. C. CHANG (China) and MR. WILGRESS (Canada) supported the Venezuelan representative's view.

After MR. ARUTIUNIAN (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) and MR. LANGE (Poland) had expressed themselves in a similar sense, MR. MCNEIL (United Kingdom) withdrew his proposal.

The Council decided, by 12 votes to 3, with 2 abstentions, to set up a Human Rights Committee as a committee of the whole.

...

[74]

Item 17

THE PRESIDENT pointed out that the Australian delegation maintained its proposal regarding item 17 (Report of the third session of the Commission on Human Rights).

MR. ARUTIUNIAN (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) emphasized that item 17 was a report made to the Council by the Commission on Human Rights, which had been set up under Article 68 of the Charter. The Commission had now completed its work, and had prepared a Declaration on Human Rights which it had submitted in its report for consideration by the Council.

The Australian delegation wished the matter to be referred direct to committee without prior examination and discussion in plenary. The Soviet Union delegation thought that the matter could and should be discussed in plenary first. The adoption of the Australian proposal would mean that what should be one of the major achievements of the Council would be relegated to the background where few people would notice its existence.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) felt that item 17 should be considered in plenary, as matters of principle were involved. He could not, therefore, support the Australian proposal.

THE PRESIDENT put to the vote the Australian proposal that item 17 should be sent direct to committee.

The proposal was adopted by 13 votes to 5; it was decided to refer item 17 to the Human Rights Committee.

E/965

13 August 1948

Note by the Representative of Canada

It is the view of the Canadian Delegation that the Economic and Social Council would be failing in the discharge of its duty if it passed on to the General Assembly without adequate study the subjects referred to the Human Rights Committee for the Seventh Session of the Council. Accordingly, the Canadian Delegation believes that the Human Rights Committee should continue to meet until its work is completed. In order, however, that the work of the Council on other subjects should not be impeded thereby, the Canadian Delegation is opposed to giving more than normal priority to the Human Rights Committee in the arranging of meetings. The Canadian Delegation considers that the other committees and the Council itself should proceed expeditiously to deal with all other subjects on the agenda, so that they can be disposed of as soon as possible, thereby releasing those members of delegations whose presence is not required to deal with the subjects referred to the Human Rights Committee. When all other work is disposed of the Human Rights Committee could then meet twice a day until its work is finished, after which it could resolve itself in Plenary Session to complete the work of the Seventh Session of the Council. The Canadian Delegation is of the opinion that this is the best means of assuring that the Council carries out the responsibilities which by the Articles of the Charter and the various resolutions of the General Assembly are placed upon it.

E/SR.201<sup>170</sup>

17 August 1948

Summary Record of the Two Hundred and First Meeting
[of the Economic and Social Council]

Held at the Palais des Nations, Geneva, on Tuesday,
 17 August 1948, at 9.30 a.m.

President: DR. CHARLES MALIK

47. Continuation of the discussion on working arrangements for the session<sup>1</sup> (E/965 and E/979)

...

<sup>[1]</sup> Resumed from the 199th meeting.

[417]

[MR. LANGE (Poland)] With regard to the work of the Human Rights Committee, the Polish delegation had already expressed the view, in that Committee, that its work could be shortened considerably, if it deferred consideration of the two remaining draft conventions on freedom of information until the eighth session, and passed on to the discussion of human rights and genocide. The Declaration on Human Rights and the Convention on the Crime of Genocide were well drafted and had reached an advanced stage, whereas the three draft conventions concerning freedom of information were less advanced. Even the first of them, which was of a technical nature, had taken up an inordinate amount of the Committee's time.

<sup>170</sup> The text of the document is taken from Official Records of the Economic and Social Council, Third Year, Seventh Session, 19 July–28 August 1948, pp. 412–32.

...

[418]

MR. KAMINSKY (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic), speaking as Chairman of the Human Rights Committee, said that many representatives were evidently labouring under a delusion concerning that Committee's work. . .

Should the Council decide to transmit the documents on all three items to the Assembly, it should pay special attention to the draft Convention on the Crime of Genocide and the draft Declaration on Human Rights. He could not agree that all the draft conventions referred to the Committee were equally important. Perhaps the Assembly could understand the difficulties with which the Committee had been faced.

...

[420]

...

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) recalled that he had opposed the setting up of a Committee on Human Rights when the Council had discussed that point.<sup>2</sup> His experience in the Commission on Human Rights had taught him that the Council and its Committees would not be able to study in detail, in five weeks, either the draft Convention on the Crime of Genocide or the draft Declaration on Human Rights. The Council should take note of the work of the Conference on Freedom of Information, of the Commission on

[2] See supra, 179th and 180th meetings.

[421]

Human Rights and of the Ad Hoc Committee on Genocide, make a general statement on them, and transmit it, together with any reservations made by delegations, to the General Assembly, which would discuss the documents in detail before adopting them. But his previous suggestions had been rejected.

He agreed with the representative of the Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic that the Human Rights Committee would not be able to complete its examination of the three conventions before 27 August.

He thought that the Council should adopt course A, as outlined by the President. If that were done he suggested that human rights should be dealt with first. Some representatives believed that all the items referred to the Human Rights Committee were equally important, but that the promotion for the respect for human rights was one of the basic purposes of the United Nations laid down by the Charter.

[426]

MR. HODGSON (Australia) recalled that in the discussion which had taken place in the Human Rights Committee the previous afternoon, it had been argued that the Council was under a specific obligation to examine the three draft conventions on freedom of information. He thought there was no need to remind the Council that it had a similar, but prior, obligation in respect of the Declaration on Human Rights.

The Australian delegation was deeply interested in the Declaration on Human Rights and in the draft Convention on the Crime of Genocide, and was perturbed at the proposal to transmit them to the General Assembly after only general statements in plenary by individual representatives. His delegation was opposed to the irregular discrimination against two such important items which was clearly involved in the United Kingdom proposal.

...

Replying to Mr. Phillips (United Kingdom), Mr. Hodgson (Australia) said that he agreed with the suggestion that certain items should be deferred. The Council should direct the Human Rights Committee to complete examination of the draft Convention on the Gathering and International Transmission of Information, then to pass on at once to the Declaration on Human Rights, [427] and finally to the draft Convention on the Crime of Genocide; all that work should be completed by 27 August.

...

[429]

...

[MR. MENDÈS-FRANCE (France)] Thirdly, the United Kingdom representative had proposed that the draft Declaration on Human Rights and the draft Convention on the Crime of Genocide should be transmitted to the General Assembly as they stood. The French delegation accepted that proposal for the reasons given by the representative of Poland – namely, that the texts on human rights and genocide had been fully studied and were satisfactory in form.

...

[430]

...

[MR. P. C. CHANG (China)] The United States representative had said that the action of the General Assembly should not be restricted and that the different items referred to the Human Rights Committee should be treated with equal respect. Those principles were not contravened by course A suggested by the President, which would have the effect of returning to the plenary Council the three items relating to freedom of information, human rights and genocide, perhaps in different degrees of unpreparedness but none of them fully prepared. But the degree of unpreparedness did not affect the status of the texts. If the Human Rights Committee were instructed to consider the three draft conventions on freedom of information, the draft Declaration of Human Rights and the draft Convention on the Crime of Genocide over the next ten days, their state of preparedness might be improved; but it could not be hoped that, within ten days, the five documents could be fully examined and recommendations made on them.

He agreed with the representative of Chile that human rights was the most important question before the Committee. The implications of the Charter, and especially of Article 55, could not be clearly and comprehensively brought out without a declaration on human rights. Genocide and freedom of information were subjects of great importance, but they had not the same close connexion with the Charter. If course A were adopted, the Council should deal first with human rights, then with genocide, and finally with freedom of information, however far that item had advanced in the Human Rights Committee. In that connexion, he felt that it would be unwise to limit the Human Rights Committee too strictly to one meeting per day.

MR. EREN (Turkey) said that it was generally agreed that none of the items before the Human Rights Committee was of greater importance than the others. But in view of the shortage of time it was inevitable that the Council should single out one of those items for treatment, without prejudice to the importance of the other two. As freedom of information was already under discussion in the Committee on Human Rights, he supported the United Kingdom proposal.

MR. ARUTIUNIAN (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) stated that his delegation fully supported the right of all representatives to make, and to defend against criticism, any amendments they wished. But if the delay in the work of the Human Rights Committee was to be ascribed to obstruction, as it had been by the French representative, [431] then the responsibility lay with the French, United Kingdom and United States delegations, which had introduced basic amendments to the recommendations of the Commission on the Status of Women and to the draft Convention on the Gathering and International Transmission of News. In the case of article 5 of that draft Convention, for example, the Soviet Union amendments had not related to the original text, but to the joint amendment submitted by the delegations of France, the United Kingdom and the United States. The purpose of the Soviet Union amendments had usually been to restore the original text. The tendency of those delegations was to regard any opposition to their views as obstruction; that attitude was inconsistent and provocative.

He repeated that the Soviet Union delegation was interested in any proposal to speed up the work of the Council. He agreed that that work should be completed by 25 or 27 August. But it could not agree to freedom of information being given priority over genocide and human rights. It was only natural that the Human Rights Committee should deal first and foremost with human rights.

MR. PHILLIPS (United Kingdom) accepted the French amendment to his proposal.

THE PRESIDENT asked whether the Council wished the Human Rights Committee to resume work before a decision had been reached on the Council's business in plenary.

MR. KAMINSKY (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) felt that there was no point in the Human Rights Committee meeting before the Council had reached a decision on a question which might fundamentally alter its existing programme of work.

MR. THORP (United States of America) felt that the Council's decision would be unlikely to alter the immediate programme of work of the Human Rights Committee. There seemed to be general agreement that examination of the draft Convention on the Gathering and International Transmission of News, which was then under consideration by the Committee, should be completed.

MR. KAMINSKY (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) said that he had raised no objection when, contrary to normal procedure, items under consideration in the Human Rights Committee had been discussed in plenary at a time when no members of the Committee could be present. He did feel it necessary, however, to object to the argument advanced by the United States representative. Until a decision had been reached by the Council on whether the Committee should continue its examination of the draft Convention on the Gathering and International Transmission of News, the Committee would not know what to discuss and might well enter into a debate that would duplicate the discussion in plenary.

[432]

THE PRESIDENT put to the vote the proposal that the Human Rights Committee should continue its work during plenary meetings devoted to consideration of working arrangements for the session.

The proposal was adopted by 12 votes to 2, with 4 abstentions.

The meeting rose at 1:30 p.m.

E/SR.202<sup>171</sup>

17 August 1948

Summary Record of the Two Hundred and Second Meeting
[of the Economic and Social Council]

Held at the Palais des Nations, Geneva, on Tuesday,
 17 August 1948, at 3 p.m.

President: DR. CHARLES MALIK

<sup>171</sup> The text of the document is taken from Official Records of the Economic and Social Council, Third Year, Seventh Session, 19 July–28 August 1948, pp. 432–49.

...

[434]

...

49. Continuation of the discussion on working arrangements for the session<sup>1</sup> (E/979, E/984 and E/Conf.6/79)

...

<sup>[1]</sup> Resumed from the 201st meeting.

[435]

MR. P. C. CHANG (China) explained that he had made two informal proposals: (1) to examine in plenary, and not in the Human Rights Committee, first the draft Declaration on Human Rights and then the draft Convention on the Crime of Genocide...

...

[438]

...

There being no objection, THE PRESIDENT announced that the Council would adopt a method of work conforming to the principle laid down in course A (E/979).<sup>172</sup>

He then put to the Council the Danish representative's suggestion that each delegation should be given an opportunity to state its final position on items 17, 18 and 19, in one short statement in plenary.<sup>173</sup>

The suggestion was adopted.

...

E/1009*24 August 1948

Brazil: France: Draft Resolution

The Economic and Social Council

Takes Note of the Report of the Third Session of the Commission on Human Rights (Document E/800) and the Annexes thereto; and <sup>172</sup> "Course A", set out in E/979, provided that the draft Declaration would be withdrawn from the Council's Human Rights Committee and returned to the agenda of the Plenary Economic and Social Council.

<sup>173</sup> Item 17 was the Report of the Commission on Human Rights.

Decides

1. to transmit the said Report and the Annexes thereto to the General Assembly of the United Nations;

2. to submit the Draft International Declaration drawn up by the Commission to the United Nations General Assembly in order to enable the latter, at its next regular session, to pass judgment on this first element of the International Bill of Human Rights promised to the peoples of the world by the signatories of the United Nations Charter at San Francisco; and

3. to convene a session of the Commission on Human Rights for the beginning of 1949 and to invite the Commission to fulfil the terms of reference entrusted to it in connection with the Bill of Human Rights by completing as soon as possible the formulation of the Draft Covenant on Human Rights as well as the provisions relating to implementation.

E/SR.215<sup>174</sup>

25 August 1948

Summary Record of the Two Hundred and Fifteenth Meeting
[of the Economic and Social Council]

Held at the Palais des Nations, Geneva, on Wednesday,
 25 August 1948, at 10 a.m.

President: DR. CHARLES MALIK

70. Report of the third session of the Commission on Human Rights<sup>1</sup> (E/800, E/800/Corr.1, E/800/Add.1, E/AC.27/W.1, E/857 and E/1009)

THE PRESIDENT drew attention to the decisions taken at the 202nd plenary meeting regarding the treatment of items 17, 18 and 19 of the agenda. He reminded the Council that delegations would have an opportunity to make one general statement of position on each of those items, and that there would be no further debate. He then called for general statements on the Report of the third session of the Commission on Human Rights (E/800).

MR. THORP (United States of America) said that in the opinion of his delegation the draft Declaration of Human Rights was one of the most important documents which had ever come before the Council, and that it constituted an urgent and essential step in the achievement of the purposes of the United Nations and the implementation of the pledge which all Members had taken under Article 56 of the Charter.

[<sup>1</sup>] See Supplement No. 2 (E/800).

[643]

<sup>174</sup> The text of the document is taken from Official Records of the Economic and Social Council, Third Year, Seventh Session, 19 July-28 August 1948, pp. 642-60.

Although the draft Declaration of Human Rights (E/800) was not a legislative document, it was much more than a statement of hopes and desires; it clearly and positively asserted the human rights which were the birthright of mankind everywhere. It was probable that in no country in the world had those rights been fully attained by all people, and the Declaration would therefore serve as a beacon towards which all nations should strive.

The United States delegation supported the Declaration, in the spirit expressed by Abraham Lincoln with reference to the United States Declaration of Independence. Quoting Lincoln's words, he emphasized that it was upon the basis of the Declaration of Independence that the founders of the American Republic had written the Constitution of the United States, which had given legal force to the high principles embodied in the original Declaration of Independence. By the same token, the great constitutional instruments of the French Republic would have been unthinkable without the Déclaration des Droits de l'Homme, and British laws and customs derived their inspiration from Magna Carta. It was his first hope that, at some future date, historians would be able to rank the Declaration before the Council among those great documents of history.

It was to be hoped that the Declaration of Human Rights, once approved by the General Assembly, would be the next step towards a Covenant on Human Rights embodying obligations binding in international law, with provisions designed to ensure the implementation and enforcement of those obligations.

The Declaration was only part of the International Bill of Human Rights which it was expected would emerge from the labours of the Commission, the Economic and Social Council and the General Assembly. In addition to the framing of a Covenant on Human Rights, special conventions should be drafted to deal with specific issues such as the protection of stateless persons. The conventions on freedom of information were also an elaboration and implementation of certain aspects of the Declaration of Human Rights.

The Declaration before the Council was not a perfect document, and his delegation would have liked to see a number of changes made by the Council; it might bring that matter up again in the General Assembly. But realizing that the Declaration was a symposium of the views of many nations, his delegation valued it for that very reason, and felt that the result of the Commission's combined effort was something better than any one nation could have produced.

The Council was considering a joint effort, which must be carried on jointly by all Members. [644] The American people firmly believed in that joint effort and felt that it was a step towards the realization of their best hopes for the future, a world of peace and plenty in which all human beings would be able to develop their gifts and abilities to the full.

MR. VAN DER MANDELE (Netherlands) said that the Netherlands Government had followed with the greatest interest the proceedings which had led to the drafting of the Declaration of Human Rights, and drew attention to the fact that a national commission for the study of human rights had been set up in the Netherlands. That commission had held several meetings, and as a result of its work the Netherlands Government had submitted a number of observations to the Commission on Human Rights.<sup>2</sup>

The Netherlands delegation felt that a Declaration of Human Rights without a corresponding Covenant with provisions for implementation would have little meaning; it therefore considered that the Declaration should be referred back to the Commission for later submission to the Council together with a draft Covenant and the proposals for its implementation. If, however, the Council decided otherwise, the Netherlands Government considered that it would be useful if some of its observations were placed on record.

Referring to article 27, paragraph 2, of the Declaration, he said that his Government felt that the religion and beliefs of others should also be mentioned. Tolerance had been a pillar of the constitutional and social structure of the Netherlands for hundreds of years, and in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, when those who practised a religion other than that of the head of the State had been persecuted in many countries, nonconformists had been able to practise their religion in peace, if not openly, in the Netherlands. The people of the Netherlands therefore attached the highest importance to the principle of religious toleration and felt that it should be incorporated in the Declaration.

The Netherlands Government warmly welcomed article 14 of the Declaration, but felt that mention should be made of the source from which its principles derived. His Government also deeply appreciated the proposal submitted by the Lebanese delegation, that article 13 of the Declaration should recognize the Creator as the source of certain inalienable rights,<sup>3</sup> and regretted that that proposal had not been accepted by the Commission. It was to be hoped that it would again be put forward when the relevant article was discussed at a later stage; if the Lebanese delegation did not wish to take the matter up his own delegation would do so.

THE PRESIDENT, speaking as the representative of Lebanon, assured the Netherlands representative

[<sup>2</sup>] See document E/CN.4/82/Rev.1.

[<sup>3</sup>] See Official Records of the Economic and Social Council, third year, sixth session, Supplement No. 1, page 23.

[645]

that the proposal in question would be submitted again by his delegation.

MR. GUERREIRO (Brazil) said that the adoption of a Declaration on Human Rights might lead to considerable changes in present concepts of international law.

Extreme caution was advisable if the Council wished to avoid disappointing those who expected a just solution, imbued with a progressive spirit, of the problem of human rights.

The Council had before it, in addition to the draft Declaration, a draft Covenant and a number of suggestions for implementation (E/800, annex C). Neither the Covenant nor the suggestions for implementation, which would be the most important parts of the International Bill of Human Rights, had been sufficiently studied. Hence his delegation, and apparently other delegations also, were in some doubt as to the attitude they should adopt. He would like to see initial steps taken immediately to guarantee certain human rights. If those steps were not taken, the United Nations would be lagging behind ideas which had been accepted even before the San Francisco Conference. The United Nations Charter had laid down, three years previously, specific legal obligations in respect of human rights and fundamental freedoms which Members were obliged to respect; hence such rights had been removed from the purely domestic jurisdiction of States, and had become of international concern.

Since the Charter, by its nature, could not provide specific means of promoting respect for human rights in practice, there remained only two ways of achieving real progress:

- (1) To delimit and define as clearly and unequivocally as possible the fundamental rights and freedoms of the individual; and
- (2) To create effective means of safeguarding those rights and freedoms internationally.

He was inclined to believe that the Declaration could serve a useful purpose only if it provided a clear and detailed definition of rights and freedoms. The principles contained in such a Declaration might lend themselves to interpretations varying according to the needs of the case. If the terms of the Declaration were not sufficiently clear, the most diverse and unfortunate conclusions might be drawn from them and used for propaganda purposes.

The only efficient procedure would be to approve at the same time the Declaration, the Covenant and the measures for implementation, since those three instruments made up an organic whole.

However, since the Declaration had been sufficiently studied for the General Assembly to be able to take a decision on it, his delegation considered it desirable that that decision should be taken at the next session. It nevertheless reserved the right to urge, at the appropriate time, that several of the amendments proposed by the Brazilian Government should be adopted.

[646]

He then gave the following examples of his Government's views:

Article 1: His Government appreciated the advantage of adopting formulas to impress public opinion. Nevertheless, it saw no reason why a Declaration on Human Rights should be introduced by philosophical postulates taken from outdated theories of natural law. It considered that the Declaration on Human Rights might profitably omit article 1 altogether and begin with article 2.

Article 5: Personality before the law should be recognized in an article preceding any enumeration of human rights. No one could have rights or obligations until he had been recognized as a person in the eyes of the law;

Article 7: Article 5 of the texts adopted at the second session of the Commission<sup>4</sup> was preferable, because it was fuller;

Article 10: A clause should be inserted ensuring the protection of the individual against threats, intimidation and oppression;

Article 13: Further improvement was required, although the article was already an advance on article 15 of the earlier text;

Article 14: His Government wished the following clause to be included: "Parents shall have parental authority over their minor or non-emancipated children, and shall have the obligation to provide for their sustenance and education";

Article 18: The permissible restrictions on freedom of association should be explicitly stated; the limitations mentioned in article 27 were too general to fulfil the purpose desired.

In conclusion, he expressed the hope that the Council would adopt the draft resolution submitted jointly by the Brazilian and French delegations (E/1009).

MR. KATZ-SUCHY (Poland) said the Polish delegation had wholeheartedly supported all measures adopted by the General Assembly and the Economic and Social Council with a view to the preparation of the Declaration and the Covenant and had welcomed the setting up of a Commission on Human Rights.

His delegation regretted that a Covenant on Human Rights had not been completed, as that document would possess the legal status of an international treaty. The character of the Declaration of Human Rights was controversial, and although some delegations considered that it should be treated as an authentic, interpretation of the principles stated in the Charter, others felt that it should be regarded only as an expression of general principles of law recognized by the various nations. The Commission on Human Rights had accepted the Declaration as possessing moral value only – as creating a standard for education. The way in which it had been drafted showed clearly that the Declaration was not calculated either to guarantee or to implement human rights and freedoms, and it was therefore unsatisfactory to the Polish delegation. It was a statement of general principles; the preamble was entirely abstract; the aims were not clearly stated; and it was open to interpretation as justifying intervention in the domestic affairs of States.

<sup>[4]</sup> See Official Records of the Economic and Social Council, third year, sixth session, Supplement No. 1, annex A.

[647]

It was not sufficient merely to say that human rights had been violated during the war. It should be emphasized that violation of human rights and contempt of human dignity lay at the very roots of fascist ideology. The Declaration must condemn fascism first of all, and then make it impossible for fascism to rise again.

In its present form, the Declaration made no reference to democracy; he felt that the Commission on Human Rights had purposely omitted that word. The declarations of the Allied Powers, the Yalta Declaration and the Potsdam Agreement had made it clear that fascism must be destroyed. His delegation could not understand, therefore, why the Declaration contained no reference to democracy and to the eradication of fascism.

For the Polish people, the existence of the United Nations and the Declaration of Human Rights were the outcome of a struggle in which they had been engaged for many years, and which had cost the lives of 6,000,000 Polish citizens. The fight for freedom still continued in the mountains of Greece and elsewhere in the world, and fascism still reigned in Spain. The Declaration failed to emphasize the great difference between a democratic State and a fascist dictatorship.

The fact that human rights involved the duties of the individual towards his neighbour, his family, his nation and society was not clearly stated in the Declaration. Article 27 stated that everyone had duties to his community, and created the impression that those duties were simply debts of gratitude, the performance of which was left to the discretion of the individual. A Declaration of Human Rights should strike a balance between the rights and the duties of an individual, and he considered that the document before the Council was no more than a compilation of traditional human rights and freedoms of the old liberal school of thought. Articles 19 and 26 should both be redrafted. The Declaration should also include an article stating the right of every person to retain his or her native language and culture, and the Polish delegation would press for the addition of such an article.

It was not known whether the Declaration would apply to non-self-governing and trust territories, or how it would be implemented. The Polish delegation felt that it should guarantee all economic rights, the right to work, rest and education, and that it should be drafted in simple language which everyone could understand.

[648]

Pointing out that it had been necessary to rebuild the structure of the Polish State, he said that one of the first acts passed by the Polish Parliament had been a declaration of the rights of citizens. The principles of that declaration were being applied in Poland in the political, economic and social fields, and the Polish delegation would like to see them applied universally. It felt that the General Assembly should draw up a Declaration which would serve the cause of progress and democracy, which would lead to the betterment of the lives of people all over the world, and which would define the new relationship between individuals and society.

MR. CASSIN (France) said that the effective defence and protection of human rights was one of the cornerstones of the independence of nations and the maintenance of peace. He regretted that the Commission on Human Rights had not had sufficient time to carry out more completely its work on the preparation of an International Bill of Human Rights, as it had been requested to do two years previously. President Truman had promised, at the end of the San Francisco Conference, that an International Declaration of Human Rights would be prepared. That promise had been reviewed at every United Nations Assembly. Although the Commission on Human Rights had not been able to complete its mission entirely, it had at least prepared a draft Declaration of Human Rights. The draft Covenant was also almost completed, but the Commission was somewhat behind schedule in working out measures for international implementation and application. That part of its task was much more delicate.

The question before the Council was whether to wait until the whole task was finished, or to proceed by stages.

He believed that the Council had its own responsibilities in that sphere, and that despite the lack of time available, it had the power and the means to fulfil its main tasks, there were two steps which it should take: (1) to transmit the Commission's Report with its annexes and appendix to the General Assembly, so that the latter could take a decision on it; and (2) to call a session of the Human Rights Commission early in 1949, so that it might complete as rapidly as possible both the draft Covenant and the proposed measures of implementation.

His delegation urged that the draft Declaration of Human Rights should be submitted to the Assembly. The possible objections might be expected to be twofold. The first, raised by some members of the Commission, was that the three parts of the International Bill of Human Rights formed a complete and indivisible whole and could not be separated. It was feared that if the Assembly adopted only the Declaration, world public opinion would entertain false hopes. It was argued that such a Declaration would be of purely theoretical value. That was a dangerous objection, because it only left the alternative of all or nothing. Moreover, it was based upon the idea that time would help; but [649] time worked only for those who worked themselves. If it hesitated, the Council would ill requite the patience of its members, of the bodies with consultative status which, over a long period, had assisted the work of the Human Rights Commission, of the specialized agencies and, above all, of the peoples who needed to know that the promises made during the war would be kept.

He recalled that when Germany had been questioned in the thirties, not far from the Palais des Nations,<sup>175</sup> about her treatment of the German Jews, she had replied that every man was master in his own home. As soon as the idea of human rights had been mentioned, Germany had left the League of Nations, which could do nothing to remedy the situation because it had no power to take action. There must be no possibility that it could be said that the fate of nationals of any country did not interest the community of nations; for if any nation oppressed its subjects, it was obviously capable of extending oppression to its neighbours, and even further. That was the overriding reason why the Declaration of Human Rights should be voted on without the least delay.

The second possible objection to the course advocated by the French delegation was that the draft Declaration was not yet completely ready – that it might be improved once the general principles had been further defined in the course of drafting the Covenant. But though the text of the Declaration was not perfect, it should be remembered that the United Nations would be free to improve it later. The French Government had itself noted several defects, the chief one being, in its opinion, that the scope of the Declaration was not sufficiently universal or sufficiently international.

All the delegations had taken as their starting point the spirit of the declarations contained in their domestic legislation and the classic statements on human rights. However, it would be wrong to say that the Declaration of Human Rights, in the form in which it had been prepared by the Commission, was only a replica of various existing declarations. From the first, the Commission had taken up a position diametrically opposed to the Hitlerian concept, by proclaiming the equality of all human beings without distinction as to race. That point of view might have tremendous consequences if the logical conclusions were drawn from it.

However, when it dealt with the international order, certain defects could be seen in the Declaration. As it stood, it did not give sufficient prominence to rights which could not be enumerated in national declarations on the subject. At a time when there were so many stateless persons who were compelled to seek asylum somewhere, it should certainly be stated that one of the duties of the United Nations, as representing the community of nations, was to guarantee the right of asylum. It was the duty [650] of the United Nations, in agreement with each of its members, to seek means to ensure that there should be no human beings without roots in any national group.

The scope of other rights recognized in previous declarations had been narrowed or distorted, for example in the clauses referring to arbitrary arrest and equal pay.

<sup>175</sup> Cassin is referring to the Evian Conference, held in 1938. The French town of Evian, which is located near Geneva, hosted an international conference on the plight of Jewish refugees from Nazi Germany.

Equal pay presupposed equality of purchasing power if it were to become a reality, and that could not be achieved by decree. The Declaration gave no place to scientific and artistic pioneers, although those who contributed to the advance of civilization were entitled to have their interests protected.

Nevertheless, the plan and content of the Declaration were not merely a confirmation of old individual freedoms, but expressed two new ideas which showed that the lessons of two world wars had been taken to heart. It guaranteed both the economic and social rights of the individual. It gave form, too, to a third idea, by stating that no one had a right to use the freedoms it proclaimed for the destruction of freedom, thus laying down the principle that democratic regimes, too, had the right to defend themselves. The concept of democracy was mentioned, although apparently not often enough to satisfy everyone.

There was no doubt, therefore, that a step forward would be achieved if the Council placed the draft Declaration before the General Assembly with the request for a decision. His delegation was convinced that it was the duty of the Council to take a practical step, even if it were only to carry out the first part of the task entrusted to it at San Francisco.

A decision taken in 1948 would be all the more timely because three or four important conferences dealing with human rights were being held during the year, and the States taking part in them included non-members of the United Nations. Moreover, dates had their own importance, and a Declaration of Human Rights promulgated in 1948 would mark the centenary of 1848, a year in which a vast movement of emancipation, rich in international consequences, had shaken Europe, and in which slavery had been abolished in all the overseas territories under the flag of France. A decision on the Declaration of Human Rights might hasten the completion of the International Bill of Human Rights as a whole. In order to achieve that aim, the Council might convene the Human Rights Commission at the beginning of 1949, when it would be stimulated in its work on the Covenant and on implementation by the debates on human rights which would have taken place in the General Assembly.

The French Government considered that the Council had no alternative but to transmit the draft Declaration of Human Rights to the General Assembly, and it proposed that it indicate to the Assembly the links existing between that Declaration [651] and the Charter of the United Nations. It would be dangerous to tell the peoples that the Declaration lacked full legal validity and merely represented a beacon guiding humanity towards the final goal. The Declaration of Human Rights was a complement of the Charter which could not be included therein because of the lengthy preparation it had required. It was a clarification of the Charter and a basic instrument of the United Nations, having all the legal force of such an instrument. No one could disregard with impunity the principles it proclaimed.

The French Government reserved the right to propose that the General Assembly should (1) invite all States to take early action to bring their laws and practices into line with the Declaration of Human Rights and to set up the administrative and judicial instances of appeal necessary to ensure respect for human rights; and (2) recall the need for pursuing the study of conventions intended to ensure the practical observance of human rights and recommend the adoption of such conventions.

In that connexion, it was necessary to point out that the question of human rights had several aspects which should each be the subject of special conventions. The specialized agencies concerned would be the most competent bodies for the preparation of such conventions. If the draft Declaration of Human Rights were submitted to the Assembly separately, it would still be possible to establish a link between the Declaration and the work which the Human Rights Commission had yet to complete.

With regard to the draft resolution prepared by the Secretariat (E/AC.27/W.1), he wished to state that his Government was following attentively the work of the Sub-Commission on the Prevention of Discrimination and the Protection of Minorities. France had just prepared, on the basis of proposals made by the International Labour Organization and of its own metropolitan legislation, a new labour code applicable to non-self-governing territories, the aim of which was to prevent discrimination. At the current stage of its work the Sub-Commission did not seem to have a sufficiently concrete task. The French delegation hoped that the Council would request the Human Rights Commission to revise the Sub-Commission's terms of reference so that it could accomplish more useful work. The procedure of asking governments to reply to communications brought to their attention in accordance with paragraph (e) of Council resolution 75(V) was in many ways imperfect, and should only be considered as a provisional procedure. As to the treatment of the replies, his delegation approved paragraph 3 of the resolution prepared by the Secretariat; it also supported the amendment in paragraph 5 of the same document, regarding alternates for members of the Commission. Those members had been chosen from lists of candidates designated by their governments; if a member was unable to be present at meetings, it would be better to choose a new one rather than appoint an alternate having the right to speak but not to vote.

[652]

In conclusion, he expressed the hope that the Council would adopt the draft resolution submitted jointly by the French and Brazilian delegations (E/1009).

MR. THORN (New Zealand) observed that the protection of human rights and fundamental freedoms was a question with which New Zealand was much concerned. His Government's interest therein had taken a material form. It had forwarded to the Commission on Human Rights comments<sup>5</sup> on the draft Declaration and Covenant prepared at the second session of the Commission. Moreover, New Zealand had sent a qualified observer to the third session of the Commission. His Government therefore felt that it was in a position to understand the intrinsic complications and difficulties of the question.

Members of the United Nations had reached varying stages of economic and social development; their internal structures did not conform to a single pattern; and their philosophies had developed from different historical backgrounds. Consequently, the New Zealand delegation believed that however desirable the early adoption of a Bill of Human Rights might be, it was preferable not to move too fast. Sufficient time should be allowed for each government to consider the views and comments of other governments, for differing views to be reconciled, and for the greatest possible measure of agreement to be achieved. Delay would be preferable to the early adoption of texts which Members might have cause, on reflection, to regret.

The New Zealand delegation had intended to ask the Council to refer the draft Declaration of Human Rights to governments for their comments. Those comments could have been reconsidered by the Commission at its fourth session and there would have been some assurance that the Declaration, when it came before the General Assembly, would have been a generally acceptable document. However, because of the delay in the work of the Human Rights Committee, that course had not been immediately possible. It was nevertheless satisfactory that the Council did not intend to refer the Declaration to the General Assembly with a recommendation for its approval.

The New Zealand delegation felt that the discussion in the General Assembly should be of a general nature only. The Declaration should not be adopted until it had been reconsidered by the Commission in the light of detailed comments by governments. It might then be possible to present an acceptable draft to the 1949 Assembly.

[<sup>5</sup>] See document E/CN.4/82/Add.12.

[653]

The report of the Commission had not been issued until 28 June, and governments, particularly those not represented on the Commission, had not had an opportunity to consider it in detail. The Declaration dealt expressly, or by implication, with practically every field of human activity. Time was required to examine its significance in relation to domestic laws and practices.

The New Zealand Government had two further reasons for not wishing action to be taken at the coming Assembly. It had frequently been emphasized that the Declaration would not be legally binding. It was the Covenant which would create legal obligations. The New Zealand delegation hoped that the original plan – that Declaration and Covenant should be adopted at the same time – might be adhered to. If the Declaration were adopted by itself, there was less likelihood of a Covenant ever being concluded.

In the second place the existence of the Declaration by itself would give it greater importance than had originally been intended. Although the majority of the members of the Human Rights Commission had agreed that the Declaration would have no legally binding effect, there were at least two members who had claimed for it a weight beyond that given to a General Assembly resolution. There was a very real danger that the Declaration, intended to be a statement of principles only, might be used for the purpose of defining provisions of the Charter. On the other hand, if the Covenant existed side by side with the Declaration, there could be no question as to which document created legally binding obligations.

The New Zealand Government considered that the Declaration of Human Rights should not be adopted by the coming General Assembly. The Assembly should hold a general discussion and then refer the Declaration to governments, asking them to submit comments to the Commission on Human Rights.

The Commission should be asked to consider those comments and also to proceed with its work on the Covenant and on implementation measures, with a view to all three parts of the Bill of Human Rights being discussed together at the 1949 General Assembly.

MR. SOERENSEN (Denmark) thought that insufficient time had been left for governments to consider the draft Declaration. The Commission's report had been issued only three weeks before the opening of the session, as the New Zealand representative had noted. The procedure now adopted would leave Governments a very short time to consider it. Nevertheless, a matter of such importance, within the competence of a number of different government departments, should be examined in great detail.

The Danish delegation would not formally propose postponement, although other good reasons might have been adduced, including the fact that the Declaration was only part of the proposed International Bill of Human Rights. The Declaration should not be isolated from the other parts [654] of the Bill. If it were, the conclusion might be drawn that the Declaration should be only provisionally examined by the Council and the General Assembly and that definite action should be postponed until the Covenant and the proposals for implementation had been placed before the Council.

The Declaration had one serious shortcoming. The draft prepared by the second session of the Commission on Human Rights<sup>6</sup> had included a special clause regarding minority rights. The text before the Council contained no special reference to minority rights, and the report of the Commission did not indicate the reasons for the omission. It was true that article 2 stipulated that the rights and freedoms set forth in the Declaration should be recognized without distinction of race, colour, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, property or other status, or national or social origin; and when read in connexion with other articles in the draft, that article might be considered to give national minorities a right to constitute own associations, form their own political parties, and establish their own schools. But it was unsatisfactory that a Declaration intended to be a guide for world public opinion should not expressly state the rights of minorities.

The Declaration should embody either a general clause similar to that proposed in article 31 of the former draft, or at least a special clause referring to the focal question of education, which added to the rights proclaimed in article 23 the rights of persons belonging to racial, national, religious or linguistic minorities to establish their own schools and to impart and receive teaching in the language of their own choice.

The right of asylum, dealt with in article 12, was one with which the Danish Government had always been in sympathy. It had never refused asylum to any refugee who was in personal danger. Nevertheless Denmark, situated at one of the cross-roads of Europe and exposed to a great influx of refugees in times of political upheaval, felt that her acceptance of the article must be conditional upon adequate international measures being taken for the eventual distribution of refugees among all countries able to absorb them.

The Danish delegation was sincerely interested in the future of the Declaration, and although it recognized the urgency of the problems involved, it was anxious that there should be no negligence in its preparation. It was important that the document finally adopted by the General Assembly should stand for many years to come as a true and the full expression of the high ideals to which the United Nations had already pledged themselves in the Charter.

On behalf of the Canadian delegation MR. STEPHENS (Canada) congratulated the Commission on Human Rights on the draft Declaration before the Council. For the first time in history an international body had been able to produce a comprehensive enunciation of the rights of mankind. That fine statement of principles would certainly influence the course of legislation in States which considered themselves, or would come to consider themselves, bound by it.

<sup>[6]</sup> See Official Records of the Economic and Social Council, third year, sixth session, Supplement No. 1, annex A.

[655]

Early in 1948, the Canadian Senate and House of Commons had established a Joint Parliamentary Committee on human rights which had examined the draft Declaration as it then was, and had been able to report on it in highly favourable terms.<sup>176</sup> The present draft Declaration could not, however, be considered the final and perfect text. The third session of the Commission had improved the previous draft, but more remained to be done and in due course the Canadian delegation would have suggestions to make.

<sup>176</sup> Canada, Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence, Ottawa: King's Printer, 1947; Canada, Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, Minutes of Proceedings and Evidence, Ottawa: King's Printer, 1948.

Meanwhile, it was the Canadian delegation's view that the preamble to the Declaration might be written more simply and directly. There were too many "whereases" and "ands". At the appropriate time, the Canadian delegation might wish to propose some substantive changes to the preamble.

The Canadian delegation fully agreed with the views of the Netherlands representative in regard to Article 1, and was glad that the Lebanese delegation to the General Assembly could be expected to introduce a suitable amendment. No doubt the Canadian delegation to the General Assembly would be anxious to support such an amendment.

The Canadian delegation was not convinced of the necessity to include articles 5 and 23 in the Declaration. The second paragraph of Article 23 enunciated some of the purposes of education and might have been more appropriate in a UNESCO resolution. The reference to "incitement to discrimination" in article 6 was vague and should either be clarified or deleted. Article 10 might be covered by a slight elaboration of article 3. In articles 20–22 the Declaration went beyond its purpose and became, in effect, a declaration of governmental responsibilities in the social field. A simple general statement of the right to social security would have been preferable.

Those were minor criticisms, however, and did not detract from the admiration which the Canadian delegation felt for the Declaration in general. It would support the Declaration, with the necessary modifications, in the conviction that its adoption would add to the sum total of human dignity, happiness and decency.

Finally, the Canadian delegation emphatically supported the French delegation's view that the Sub-Commission on the Prevention of Discrimination and the Protection of Minorities should not meet until after the next session of the Commission on Human Rights. It would be undesirable for the Sub-Commission to meet before its terms of reference had been revised.

MR. PÉREZ PEROZO (Venezuela) believed that the General Assembly's consideration of the draft Declaration would lead to some much needed [656] improvements. Such improvements were required, because the Declaration would be the instrument by which the United Nations would proclaim its faith [sic] fundamental human rights.

The Venezuelan delegation would have preferred the Declaration to be accompanied by a Covenant defining precise obligations. It realized, however, why the Commission had been unable to submit all three parts of the Bill of Human Rights – Declaration, Covenant and Measures for implementation – at the same time.

It was satisfactory to note that the Declaration included not only human rights long recognized in other historic documents, but also new rights, such as the right to work, the right to education and the right to social security. Those additional rights had become necessary because of the ever-increasing part which the individual played in collective life. They had been recognized in the domestic legislation of many countries, but needed to be proclaimed by the community of nations.

The draft Declaration left something to be desired, especially in the matter of form. The preamble followed the oratorical style of older documents. It should be written much more simply. The reference in the third paragraph to rebellion as a last resort, would have been more appropriate in a resolution of the General Assembly.

There also appeared to have been a systematic exclusion of any reference to the state, throughout the Declaration. The Declaration was of course primarily concerned with the rights of the individual. Nevertheless, the essential problem was to reconcile individual rights with the rights of the State. In that respect the former draft had been more logical.

Article 3 of the Declaration referred to the "right to life". That right should have been more explicitly defined. It should have been stated, for example, that the right to life existed from the moment of conception, and that the incurably ill also had a right to life.

It was understandable that the Declaration should not include all human rights. There was therefore, perhaps all the more reason to state that it should not be considered as an exhaustive recital. The Declaration could not then be interpreted as denying rights not enumerated.

The Venezuelan delegation favoured immediate transmission of the Declaration to the General Assembly, in which all members of the United Nations were represented. Further delay could not be justified. The peoples of the world expected results soon.

MR. EREN (Turkey) expressed the great interest of his country in the work of the Commission on Human Rights and its appreciation of the draft Declaration. The Declaration included all the principles which had ennobled man since the time of Plato, and for the first time brought them together on an international plane. It was encouraging to reflect that after two world wars men of all creeds and climes had been able to devise a common standard of rights for all mankind. The Turkish delegation generally approved [657] of the Declaration, all the principles of which were in conformity with the spirit of the Turkish Constitution.

During the second session of the Commission on Human Rights, there had been a tendency to use declaratory language, on the assumption that the Covenant would be mandatory while the Declaration would imply no legal obligation. The Commission's third session had, in general, followed the same lines, but not without introducing some controversial phraseology. The contrast between the absolute rights proclaimed in the Declaration and the conditions for their application stated in the Covenant appeared to some delegations to be incongruous; the Turkish delegation thought it would be necessary to effect some reconciliation. It was not so much a matter of substance as of legal form.

There might be two ways of dealing with the question. One would be to aim at greater consistency between corresponding articles of the Covenant and the Declaration; but that might weaken the language of the Declaration. The other would be to add to the Declaration an article referring specifically to the Covenant.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) referred to the appendix to the Report of the Commission on Human Rights, in which the views of his delegation on the draft Declaration were expressed.

The Soviet Union delegation considered that the draft Declaration contained various provisions which were, generally speaking, acceptable. Together with certain other delegations, it had consistently defended those provisions in the Commission, thus safeguarding the democratic rights and freedoms of the peoples against any attempt to weaken or diminish them; in many cases, the wording of the articles in question, as drafted at the second session of the Commission, had been largely retained.

The Soviet Union delegation had considered that the repetition of certain old democratic principles and provisions with which mankind had long been familiar was useful, because in many countries of the world, and more particularly in trust and other non-self-governing territories, fundamental human rights and freedoms were still not respected.

Furthermore, at a time when the resurgence and propagation of anti-democratic, fascist and reactionary regimes constituted a real danger for many countries, it was undoubtedly useful, in a document such as the Declaration of Human Rights, to restate some of the more important democratic rights and freedoms. During the war fascist States, organizations and elements had directed their efforts to the destruction of those rights and freedoms and they were continuing to do so.

It should be noted that the draft Declaration introduced into the complex of fundamental human rights certain new rights, which were not included in old constitutions, but which [658] were typical of the new, modern, democratic constitutions – above all, the Constitution of the Soviet Union. Those new rights related to work, leisure, education, social security, etc. Such was the positive aspect of the Declaration.

But in making an appraisal of the Declaration as a whole, the Soviet Union delegation was bound to say that it was unsatisfactory, and was not calculated to guarantee either human rights and freedoms or respect for them.

In spite of the unremitting insistence of the Soviet Union delegation and certain other delegations, the majority of the Commission had not seen fit to prepare a document which met the fundamental requirements proposed by the Soviet representative in the Drafting Committee on 4 May<sup>7</sup> and at the Commission's meeting on 27 May 1948.<sup>8</sup>

Those requirements were as follows:

- (1) The Declaration should ensure respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms for all, without distinction as to race, nationality, social position, religion, language or sex, in accordance with the principles of democracy, national sovereignty and political independence of each State;
- (2) The Declaration should not only proclaim rights, but should guarantee their implementation, taking into account, of course, the economic, social and other characteristics of each country;
- (3) The Declaration should define not only the rights, but also the obligations of citizens to their country, their people and their State.

The Soviet Union delegation wished to draw special attention to the following serious omissions and shortcomings in the Declaration and in the work of the Commission:

- (1) The failure to take into account such a fundamental requisite for democracy as the struggle against the activities of fascist and nazi elements and their abuse of democratic rights and freedoms and against the danger of the expansion, continuation or resurgence of fascist regimes; in particular, the failure to prohibit fascist and nazi propaganda and to hold the authors responsible;
- (2) The failure to extend the democratic rights and freedoms of the peoples and to defend some of the most important democratic principles; the omission from the Declaration (except for one paragraph in article 27) of any mention of democracy of the modern concepts of the democratic State, democratic principles, etc.
- (3) The limitation and restriction of a number of democratic rights and freedoms in the Declaration, as compared with the former draft; the failure to maintain consistently the principle of full equality for all, without distinction as to race, nationality, social position, religion, sex or language; the omission from the Declaration of the right of every person to his own national culture, to be taught in school in his native language and to use that language in the Press, at meetings, in courts and public offices; the failure seriously to combat racialism and discrimination, to prohibit propaganda for racial and national hostility, and to lay down the principle that such propaganda should be punishable.

[<sup>7</sup>] See document E/CN.4/AC.1/SR.21.

[<sup>8</sup>] See document E/CN.4/SR.49.

[659]

- (4) The failure, in most of the articles of the Declaration, to refer to guarantees of rights and freedoms and to concrete means and methods of applying the provisions in question; the unrealistic, formal and legal nature of the Declaration (especially articles 21, 22, 24 and 25).
- (5) The failure to include in the Declaration any concrete obligations of the individual to his native country, to the people to which he belonged or to the State; the complete disregard, in such important questions as freedom of information and freedom of transit, not only of those obligations, but also, of the rights and sovereignty of States, and of the relevant provisions of the Charter concerning non-interference in the domestic affairs of Members.

The Soviet Union delegation was certain that instead of the weak and, in many ways, absolutely unsatisfactory draft before the Council, a Declaration would eventually be drawn up which would effectively serve the cause of historical progress and democracy. Such a Declaration would bring a real improvement in the lives of millions of simple people throughout the world, would help to guard against a recrudescence of fascism and nazism, and would finally lead to an assertion of the principles of the equality of nations, to real respect for human rights and freedoms and to the strengthening of international peace.

He then read the basic proposals advanced by the Soviet Union delegation, and rejected at the third session of the Commission on Human Rights (E/800, appendix).

He added that the list of proposals which he had cited was incomplete, but that all the Soviet Union proposals had been rejected by the majority. As a result, the Declaration was a much less comprehensive document than it might have been and, in general, was less satisfactory than the former draft. Nevertheless, the Soviet Union delegation would not object to the transmission of the Declaration to the General Assembly without any specific recommendation.

The Soviet Union delegation had noted the emphasis which many delegations had placed on the unsatisfactory work on the draft Covenant. It could not but agree. The Covenant failed to recognize any of the economic or social rights mentioned in the Declaration. It was also unbalanced. Article 5, for example, proclaimed the right to life in four lines, but the proposed restrictions on that right ran to about thirty lines. Article 9 took two lines to proclaim the right to freedom from arbitrary arrest and some thirty-five lines to define the limitations of that freedom.

[660]

If the Council were to adopt the Covenant it would not be adopting a Covenant on Human Rights but a Covenant on the Restriction of Human Rights.

The Commission's suggestions for implementation (E/800, annex 3) were even more unsatisfactory. The Australian, United States, French and other proposals would undermine the domestic jurisdiction of States and might lead to international conflict. Every incident would be exaggerated and international security and peace would be endangered. As it was the purpose of the United Nations to strengthen international security and goodwill, the Soviet Union delegation would oppose all the proposals on implementation.

The meeting rose at 1:15 p.m.

E/SR.218<sup>177</sup>

26 August 1948

Summary Record of the Two-Hundred and Eighteenth Meeting
[of the Economic and Social Council]

Held at Palais des Nations, Geneva, Thursday,
 26 August 1948, at 3 p.m.

President: DR. CHARLES MALIK

Acting President: MR. HERNÀN SANTA CRUZ

75. Continuation of the discussion<sup>1</sup> on the Report of the third session of the Commission on Human Rights<sup>2</sup> (E/800, E/800/Corr.1, E/800/Add.1, E/AC.27/W.1, E/857 and E/1009)

THE PRESIDENT announced that the Council would hear the remainder of the series of general statements on the Report of the Commission on Human Rights.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) said that his Government's sincere wish to see the principles of the Charter applied had been reflected in the part played by the Chilean delegation in the drafting of the Declaration of Human Rights. The essence of the Declaration, he thought, was contained in articles 3, 20 and 26, which represented all that was positive and living in the results achieved.

Liberty, one of man's greatest treasures, was now in great danger because of the legacy left by the war and because of the ideology which maintained that in the evolution towards ultimate freedom there must first be a stage involving the curtailment of individual freedoms. Nevertheless, as in the past liberty had survived the worst trials in history, so in the future it would survive any new totalitarian attempts to destroy it.

<sup>177</sup> The text of the document is taken from Official Records of the Economic and Social Council, Third Year, Seventh Session, 19 July–28 August 1948, pp. 694–702.

He agreed with the French representative that the Declaration of Human Rights should be put before the next session of the General Assembly. Although the Declaration, unlike the Covenant, might not have the force of a legal obligation, it would have a future of moral force. The Declaration was far from perfect, but it contained the essence of the ideals of the United Nations. It had now reached a stage where the General Assembly could perfect it.

[<sup>1</sup>] Resumed from the 215th meeting.

[<sup>2</sup>] See Supplement No. 2 (E/800).

[695]

He regretted that an apparent lack of co-operation by the Soviet Union delegation in his early drafting stages, and the reluctance of other delegations to discuss matters of principle, had prevented both the Commission and the Drafting Committee from undertaking to define the relations between the individual and the State. Had that been done, a common denominator might have been found, which might have made it possible to draft a universally acceptable document.

Nevertheless, the Declaration was not sterile or vague and he believed that its principles would one day inspire men with self-respect.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) protested that the Chilean representative's remarks had not been in order, since unlike other representatives, including the representative of the Soviet Union, who had already spoken on the Report of the Commission on Human Rights (E/800), he had not confined himself to a general statement of position on behalf of his Government.<sup>3</sup>

THE PRESIDENT ruled that in their general statements representatives were free to refer to any conditions affecting human rights.

MR. EVATT<sup>178</sup> (Australia) opposed the suggestion made by certain representatives that the draft Declaration of Human Rights should be referred back to the Commission on Human Rights. It had already been under discussion for approximately two years, and during that time the Commission had dealt with twenty-four drafts and approximately two hundred proposals on the subject. At its third session, beginning in May 1948, the Commission had shortened the draft Declaration, and he considered that an improvement. But, in his opinion, it should not be referred back to the Commission again; it should be submitted as soon as possible to the General Assembly for approval.

<sup>178</sup> Herbert V. Evatt (1894–1965) was an Australian judge and Member of Parliament who served as Minister of Foreign Affairs in the Labour Government. He was president of the United Nations General Assembly in 1948.

There were three matters to be considered in connexion with human rights – namely the Declaration, the Covenant and implementation measures. In conformity with the attitude maintained by the Government of Australia, he attached great importance to implementation and enforcement. When the Peace Treaties had been drawn up at the 1946 Paris Peace Conference, the representative of Australia had urged that provision be made for implementation of the human rights articles.

[<sup>3</sup>] See President's opening remarks at the 215th meeting.

[696]

He pointed out that under the English legal system the remedy was equal in importance to the right, for without the remedy there was no right. He was aware that other legal systems differed in that respect, but measures should be taken to ensure that the human rights proclaimed by the United Nations should not become dead letters as soon as they were infringed. The declarations of rights in the 1919 peace treaties had been subject to wholesale infringement, largely because there had been no competent tribunal to adjudicate in cases of infringement. The wholesale infringement of the rights of minorities laid down in the peace treaties had been a major cause of the outbreak of World War II.

When the question came before the General Assembly, the Government of Australia intended to stress again the importance of implementation. In the Charter, an obligation was laid upon the Assembly to promote respect for human rights. There must be an international tribunal for enforcement. The General Assembly itself was a kind of international tribunal before which Member Governments could bring, for adjudication, cases of alleged infringement of the rights laid down in the Charter; but there must be an international tribunal before which individuals, or groups of individuals, who could not obtain the backing of governments, could bring cases of infringement of their rights.

Expressing his gratitude to those who, by their work, had been responsible for so great a step forward in promoting the aims of the United Nations, he voiced the hope that the report of the Commission on Human Rights would receive the attention it deserved at the next General Assembly.

MR. CHA (China) said that the new Chinese Constitution, which had recently come into force, contained a bill of rights. After closely comparing that bill of rights with the draft Declaration under discussion, he had come to the conclusion that they were very similar, and that the Declaration was a great document, particularly in view of its comprehensiveness and the recognition of social security. In his view, social security was the greatest benefit to be derived from such a declaration, and, for that reason, he was glad that the concept had been so fully brought out.

MR. MIKAOUI (Lebanon) said that his country was happy to have made its contribution to the work of the Commission on Human Rights. The text of the Declaration was admittedly not perfect, but the results were quite acceptable. The [697] formulations of the text appeared to be sound, and worthy of the edifice the world was anxiously awaiting. His country would count it a pleasure and an honour to be one of the genuine defenders of the Declaration in the General Assembly.

Lebanon was deeply attached to liberty. Her Constitution affirmed the individual freedoms without which there could be no liberty. All the legal formulas which man had invested for the supposed purpose of guiding his fellows, and which he used to restrict the freedom of others, should disappear for ever, so that respect for human dignity might be ensured.

Freedom was an organic whole: no part of it could be impaired without prejudice to the rest.

The Declaration of Human Rights, which he hoped would be accepted by all States, certainly represented a great step forward towards the common ideal of all peoples. Nevertheless, the Commission on Human Rights would have to return to its tasks after the next session of the General Assembly in order to prepare the draft Covenant and determine the measures for implementation.

He thought the draft resolution (E/AC.27/W.1) prepared by the Secretariat excellent, and would like his vote in favour of it to be regarded as an expression of thanks to the Commission and to the Secretariat for the work they had accomplished.

MR. PHILLIPS (United Kingdom) recalled that at its second session the Commission on Human Rights had decided that the International Bill of Human Rights should consist of a Declaration, a Covenant, and measures for the implementation of the Covenant. The United Kingdom Government felt strongly that the Covenant should be the core of the Bill, and that it should be a precise legal document without escape clauses. Only such a document would provide an effective safeguard for human rights and freedoms.

The Declaration was a statement of ideals, to which it was hoped that all people would aspire, but not an instrument imposing legal obligations on any State. It fell far short of being an adequate Bill of Rights for the purposes of the United Nations. He considered that the Declaration should not be adopted alone, but in conjunction with an adequate and enforceable Covenant on Human Rights. He did not wish to give the impression that he set a low value on the draft Declaration; it was a satisfactory document and represented substantial progress in the defence of human rights and freedoms, even though agreement had not been reached on the Covenant.

If the Declaration were adopted by the General Assembly at its next session, that would be a step forward in fulfilling the obligations laid down in the Charter. He therefore supported the draft resolution submitted jointly by the delegations of Brazil and France (E/1009) to transmit the Report of the Commission on Human Rights to the General Assembly; he hoped that the Report would serve as a basis for the General Assembly's discussion, and that a Declaration on Human Rights would be adopted at its next [698] session. He supported the draft resolution on the understanding that there would be no slackening of the efforts to reach agreement on an adequate Covenant on Human Rights; for until the United Nations had adopted such a Covenant, it would not have completed the task entrusted to it under the Charter.

He agreed with the representative of the United States that there was no country in which all the rights envisaged by the Commission had been won, and that the draft was valuable because it was the work of representatives of many Governments.

Referring to the criticism that the Declaration contained insufficient reference to democracy, he quoted a passage on page 321 of the Yearbook on Human Rights for 1946:

“Recent statements by two Prime Ministers of the United Kingdom have affirmed the nature of the democratic liberty to which the British aspire:

“The essential aspects of democracy are the freedom of the individual, within the framework of laws passed by Parliament, to order his life as he pleases, and the uniform enforcement of tribunals independent of the Executive.’

“Democracy is not just majority rule, but majority rule with due respect to the rights of minorities. It means that, while the will of the majority must prevail, there shall be a full opportunity for all points of view to find expression. It means toleration for opposition opinions. Wherever you find suppression of minority opinion, there is no real democracy.’

“The first quotation is from a speech by Mr. Churchill, in January 1939; the second is from one by Mr. Attlee,<sup>179</sup> when he was addressing the Trades Union Congress in September 1945, soon after a general election had brought the Labour Party into power with a substantial majority. The two speakers lead political parties whose views are often in strong conflict. Their statements on the origins of human rights in Britain command the support of all their fellow countrymen.”

What counted in democracy was the application of its principles; the aim of the United Nations in both the Covenant and the Declaration should be to provide for the realities which went to make up democracy. That was more important than referring repeatedly to a word which had depreciated in value, which had become a catch-phrase, and which was subject to many different interpretations.

With regard to the criticism that the Declaration did not refer to the struggle against fascism, he pointed out that the word “fascism” had also lost its value.

<sup>179</sup> Clement Richard Attlee (1883–1967) served as leader of the Labour Party in the United Kingdom from 1935 to 1955 and Prime Minister of the United Kingdom from 1945 to 1951.

Indeed, a responsible representative at the General Assembly had named one of the United Kingdom Prime Ministers, whom he had just quoted, a fascist. That showed that it was most important to base the Covenant not on [699] words which were subject to different interpretations but on the underlying realities which made possible the human rights and freedoms which all those present desired.

MR. MARUTKO (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) associated himself with the general statement made by the Soviet Union representative on the Report of the Commission on Human Rights. He regretted that there were a number of serious omissions from the draft Declaration. Consequently, in his opinion, it fell far short of constituting a statement of all the true rights of mankind.

MR. MONGE (Peru) recalled that the Peruvian delegation had taken part in the drafting of the document before the Council.

The Constitution of Peru affirmed most of the rights and freedoms proclaimed in the draft Declaration. In Peru, democracy was a reality and everyone enjoyed the wellbeing to which all mankind was entitled. It might be that further changes would be made in the Declaration when it came before the General Assembly but it was essential that the General Assembly should adopt it.

The United Nations, and the Economic and Social Council in particular, should set themselves to improve the Declaration in which the various rights were proclaimed, and to prepare and approve the future Covenant which would give legal backing to those rights in every country throughout the world, thus establishing a new society on the ruins left by the recent war.

THE PRESIDENT pointed out that the general statements on the report of the Commission on Human Rights had been made by representatives of all the eighteen members of the Council. In accordance with the decision taken by the Council at its 202nd meeting, there could be no further debate.

As promised on that occasion, he had circulated a draft resolution<sup>4</sup> which read:

“The Economic and Social Council

“Decides to transmit to the General Assembly the draft International Declaration of Human Rights submitted to the Council by the Commission on Human Rights in the Report of its third session (E/800), together with the records of the proceedings of the Council at its seventh session on this subject.”

He had submitted that form of words in view of the decision taken by the Council, at its 202nd meeting, that there should be, in plenary, “an opportunity for general statements of position by representatives, without other debate or decisions other than a decision to transmit the documents to the General Assembly together with the statement of position”.<sup>5</sup> The wording of the draft resolution submitted jointly by the delegations of [4] Subsequently issued, as amended and adopted, as document E/1040.

[5] See document E/979, paragraph 3, A.

[700]

Brazil and France (E/1009) was not in accordance with that decision, and he therefore ruled that it was out of order. The only resolution on the item which it was in order for the Council to adopt was one similar to that which he had submitted; any debate on the addition of points of substance to that draft resolution would also be out of order.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) shared the President's opinion on the draft resolution submitted by the Brazilian and French delegations. Nevertheless, he had observed that, during the discussion, practically all the Council members had expressed the desire that the General Assembly should adopt a Declaration. He asked whether it would be in order to add to the draft resolution the following words: "expressing its hope that the General Assembly, at its next session, will approve a Declaration of Human Rights". The Council would not be referring specifically to the Report or the draft Declaration, but only expressing the general desire to see a hypothetical Declaration adopted at the next session.

The President said that he could not accept the Chilean representative's proposal. It would only have been in order before the relevant decision had been taken. His ruling was not based on a personal opinion, but was dictated by that decision. He deprecated any further discussion of such points, since the decision taken was a decision of substance and could not be rescinded during the current session.

In reply to a question by the Australian representative, he confirmed that under the terms of his draft resolution the whole of the Commission's Report, together with its annexes and appendix, would be transmitted to the General Assembly, as well as the draft Declaration of Human Rights.

MR. CASSIN (France) said that he would like to facilitate the President's very difficult task, but he did not think that they should tie themselves down to a form of words so rigid that it could not meet the needs of the time or even the desires of the Council.

In the first place, the Australian representative's question showed that the text submitted was not completely in accordance with the facts. It should read: "decides to transmit to the General Assembly the Report of the Commission on Human Rights, together with the annexes and appendix thereto and the records of the Council's discussions on the subject".

Secondly, it was understood that the resolution would not contain any comment on or evaluation of, the Declaration; he wished to point out that he was not asking that that understanding be altered. But when the Council had reached its decision, the French representative had formally reserved his delegation's right to submit a proposal on the wording of the resolution<sup>6</sup> which was not necessarily so hard and fast that nothing could be added to it.

[6] See supra, 202nd meeting.

Thirdly, to avoid all friction, he was prepared, with the agreement of the Brazilian representative, to remove from their joint draft anything that might raise difficulties, while nevertheless leaving what was necessary for the future of the work. The Council, under whose responsibility the Commission had worked for two years, should not place so important a text before the General Assembly without even calling it by its name. There was a certain minimum wording that must be used out of respect for the subject-matter. Hence, a slight amendment to the President's draft seemed to him to be necessary; he proposed the following wording:

“The Economic and Social Council

“Decides to transmit to the General Assembly, in order that it may pass judgment on the draft International Declaration of Human Rights drawn up by the Commission on Human Rights, the Report of the said Commission, together with the annexes and appendix thereto (E/800) and the records of the relevant Council discussions.”

That text was almost identical with the wording proposed by the President, but it was more satisfactory because it provided for transmission of the whole Report to the General Assembly and drew its attention to the question which had been best prepared, by referring to the draft Declaration.

He did not think that he was out of order in submitting that proposal.

THE PRESIDENT repeated that any debate on the substance of the matter before the Council was out of order. He regretted that he could not rule the French representative's proposal in order, since the decision taken by the Council did not permit him to do so.

The drafting point raised by the Australian representative's question was in order, and to meet it, he would add the words “remainder of this report and the” after the words “together with the” in the draft resolution he had submitted.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) urged that the Council vote immediately on the draft resolution submitted by the President, as amended. If there was the slightest attempt to alter the previous decision of the Council he would have to insist that the debate be re-opened and would then speak on the subject.

MR. CASSIN (France) recalled that at the 202nd meeting of the Council, according to the summary record, the head of the French delegation had expressly stated that “the French delegation reserved the right to make proposals on the wording of those resolutions”. Consequently, the position of the French delegation with respect to the draft resolution was unassailable.

THE PRESIDENT ruled that the debate was closed, with the understanding that the Council adopted the resolution he had submitted on the Report of the third session of the Commission on [702] Human Rights. As amended, that resolution read:

“The Economic and Social Council

“Decides to transmit to the General Assembly the draft International Declaration of Human Rights submitted to the Council by the Commission on Human Rights in the Report of its third session (E/800), together with the remainder of this report and the records of the proceedings of the Council at its seventh session on this subject.”

He hoped that the conclusion of the general statements on genocide and freedom of information would not be marked by a discussion similar to that which had just taken place, since the only resolutions which the Council could adopt on those items were resolutions along exactly the same lines as that which he had just read out.

MR. GUERREIRO (Brazil) said that the joint draft resolution (E/1009) of the delegations of Brazil and France had been submitted in good faith, for he had interpreted the decision of the Council to mean that it should not deal with the substance of the item when discussing the resolution and transmitting it to the General Assembly. No recommendation had been made in the joint draft resolution regarding the decision which the General Assembly should take.

THE PRESIDENT replied that he had never questioned or doubted the good faith of the proposers of the joint draft resolution.

...

E/1046

28 August 1948

Report of the Third Session of the Commission
on Human Rights
Resolution of 26 August 1948<sup>180</sup>

The Economic and Social Council

*Decides to transmit to the General Assembly the Draft International Declaration of Human Rights submitted to the Council by the Commission on Human Rights in the report of its third session (document E/800), together with the remainder of this report and records of the proceedings of the Council at its seventh session on this subject.**

[*] Documents E/SR.180, E/SR.201, E/SR.202, E/SR.215 and E/SR.218.

<sup>180</sup> E/RES/151(VII).

A/625

September 1948

Report of the Economic and Social Council to the General Assembly Covering the period from 18 August 1947 to 29 August 1948

...

[34]

Social, Humanitarian and Cultural Questions

Section I. Human Rights

International Bill of Rights

127. The following seven stages were laid down by the Council at its fourth session<sup>1</sup> for the preparation of an International Bill of Human Rights.

- (i) Preparation of a draft by a drafting committee on the basis of documentation prepared by the Secretariat;
- (ii) Consideration of the draft at the second session of the Commission on Human Rights;
- (iii) Submission of the resulting draft to Members of the United Nations for observations, suggestions and proposals;
- (iv) Consideration of the above observations, suggestions and proposals as a basis of a re-draft, if necessary, by the Drafting Committee;
- (v) Consideration of the resulting draft by the Commission on Human Rights;
- (vi) Consideration by the Council of the resulting text;
- (vii) Submission of the draft bill by the Council to the General Assembly.

At its second session, which took place in Geneva from 2 to 17 December 1947, the Commission on Human Rights based its work on the report of the first session of its Drafting Committee.<sup>2</sup> Two views had there been expressed regarding the form which the draft bill should take. Some representatives thought that it should be in the form of a declaration or manifesto, others that the declaration should be supplemented by a convention or conventions on specific rights. Both documents were presented to the Commission. The draft declaration had been discussed in some detail, but consideration of the draft convention had been limited to a general examination of the possible substantive contents of a draft convention. No decision was taken by the Drafting Committee as to whether there should be a draft declaration only or a draft declaration together with a draft convention.

The Commission decided to draw up simultaneously a draft declaration, which would be a declaration of general principles, and a draft convention, which would be a convention on such specific rights as would lend themselves to binding legal obligations, and at the same time to consider the question of implementation. The three documents – to be known respectively as the Draft International Declaration on Human Rights, the Draft International Covenant on Human Rights, and Measures for

<sup>[1]</sup> See resolution 46(IV).

<sup>[2]</sup> Document E/CN.4/21.

[34, column 2]

Implementation – would together form “The International Bill of Human Rights”.

In preparing this preliminary draft of the Bill, the Commission took into account suggestions made by its Sub-Commission on the Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities on five articles of the Draft Declaration covering subjects within the terms of reference of the Sub-Commissions.<sup>3</sup> In accordance with resolution 46(IV) of the Council, the Chairman and Vice-Chairman of the Commission on the Status of Women were present at the second session of the Commission on Human Rights and took part in its deliberations without vote when sections of the draft Bill concerning particular rights of women were discussed.

In order to prepare the documents on the draft Declaration, draft Covenant and Implementation, the Commission established three working groups. It considered in detail the resulting draft Declaration and in somewhat less detail, the draft Covenant, but decided to take no decision on any specific principle or recommendation contained in the report on implementation. Thus it presented to the sixth session of the Council a draft Declaration and a draft Covenant prepared with unequal thoroughness, together with the report of its working group on Measures for Implementation.<sup>4</sup>

In the first week in January 1948, the report of the Commission was submitted to all Member States of the United Nations for observations, suggestions and proposals. The Commission requested the Secretary-General to fix the date of 3 April 1948 as the time limit for the reception of replies from Governments on the Draft International Bill.

128. At its sixth session, the Council confined its action on the Bill to directing the Commission, through its Drafting Committee, to give particular attention to the implementation aspect of the Bill of Human Rights, in order to ensure that draft articles on implementation might be submitted to Member Governments at the earliest possible date.<sup>5</sup>

129. Comments were received from thirteen Member Governments and were taken into consideration by the Drafting Committee<sup>6</sup> at its second session, which took place at Lake Success from 3 to 21 May 1948. The Drafting Committee also took into account the suggestions of the United Nations Conference on Freedom of Information, on articles on freedom

[3] See document E/CN.4/52, Section I.

[4] See Official Records of the Economic and Social Council, Third Year, Sixth Session, Supplement No. 1, Annexes A, B and C respectively.

[5] See resolution 116(VI)F; see records of the Social Committee, meetings 34, 35, 39; of plenary meetings 128, 159, 160.

[6] See documents E/CN.4/82, 82/Rev.1, E/CN.4/82/Add.1–10.

[35]

of information in the draft declaration and the draft Covenant,<sup>7</sup> as well as suggestions made by the Commission on the Status of Women on two articles in the draft declaration.<sup>8</sup> It redrafted the entire draft Covenant; but had time to re-draft only parts of the draft Declaration, and did not consider the question of implementation.

130. The Commission on Human Rights, at its third session which took place at Lake Success from 24 May to 18 June 1948,<sup>9</sup> based its work on the report of the second session of its Drafting Committee.<sup>10</sup> As this Committee had examined the draft Covenant in detail, the Commission decided to begin its work by discussing the draft Declaration, then to proceed to examine the question of implementation and finally the draft Covenant. It was able to complete a re-draft of the Declaration but had no time to consider the Drafting Committee's re-draft of the Covenant, nor to discuss implementation as requested by the Council at its sixth session. It therefore presented to the seventh session of the Council<sup>10</sup> the draft Declaration as re-drafted at its third session, the draft Covenant as re-drafted by the Drafting Committee at its second session, but not re-examined by the Commission itself, and the report of the working group on Implementation, drawn up at the second session of the Commission, but not examined in detail by the full Commission.

Throughout its deliberations on the International Bill of Human Rights, the Commission was assisted by specialized agencies and non-governmental organizations. Representatives of the International Labour Organization, the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization, and the Preparatory Commission of the International Refugee Organization, and consultants from the American Federation of Labor, the International Federation of Christian Trade Unions, the Inter-Parliamentary Union, the World Federation of United Nations Associations, the Agudas Israel World Organization, the Catholic International Union for Social Service, the International Union of Catholic Women's Leagues, the Commission of the Churches on International Affairs, the Consultative Council of Jewish Organizations, the Co-ordinating Board of Jewish Organizations for Consultation with the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations, the International Alliance of Women, the International Committee of the Red Cross, International Council of Women, the International Federation of Business and Professional Women, the Women's International Democratic Federation, the World Jewish Congress, the Liaison

Committee of Women's International Organizations, the World Women's Christian Temperance Union, and the World's Young Women's Christian Assoc-

[7] Document E/CONF.6/79, Annex B.

[8] Document E/615, chapter V.

[9] See Official Records of the Economic and Social Council, Third Year, Seventh Session, Supplement No. 2.

[10] Document E/CN.4/95.

[35, column 2]

citation, took part in the proceedings of the Commission at its second and third sessions.

131. Because of pressure of business at its seventh session, the Council decided on 17 August 1948<sup>11</sup> that the report of the Commission, which had been referred to its Human Rights Committee, should be recalled to the plenary session; and that in plenary there would be an opportunity for each member to make one general statement of position, without other debate or decisions than a decision to transmit the documents to the General Assembly together with the statements of position.

Statements were made on 15 and 26 August 1948 by all members of the Council.<sup>12</sup> It was generally recognized that a draft Declaration in the form in which it was presented to the Council was still imperfect. Criticisms were made that it was not sufficiently universal, or precise; that sufficient time should be allowed to produce a better draft having regard to the novel and difficult character of the task; that it did not give sufficient prominence to rights which could not be enumerated in national declarations, such as the rights of stateless persons; that it was inadequate in respect of the protection of and the promotion of respect of human rights, particularly rights of an economic and social character, as in respect of the proper emphasis on duties to the State.

Amendments and suggestions relating to specific articles were also put forward. All members stressed the importance of the draft Declaration. While no formal decision was taken other than the decision of transmittal mentioned below, the majority considered that the Declaration should be referred to the next session of the General Assembly for consideration and possible adoption, recognizing at the same time that the Bill of Rights was incomplete without the draft Covenant and measures for implementation.

The Council then decided<sup>13</sup> to transmit to the General Assembly the draft International Declaration of Human Rights submitted to it by the Commission on Human Rights in the report of its third session,<sup>14</sup> together with the remainder of the report of the Commission and the records of the proceedings of the Council on the subject.<sup>15</sup>

...

[11] See records of plenary meeting 202.

[12] See records of plenary meetings 215 and 218.

[13] See resolution 151(VII).

[14] See Official Records of the Economic and Social Council, Third Year, Seventh Session, Supplement No. 2.

[15] See records of plenary meetings 180, 201, 202, 215 and 218.

A/632

13 September 1948

Draft International Declaration of Human Rights Report of the Economic and Social Council

1. Article 68 of the Charter provides that the Council should “set up commissions in economic and social fields and for the promotion of human rights, and such other commissions as may be required for the performance of its functions.”

2. The Economic and Social Council, at its first session, established a Commission on Human Rights (resolution 5(I)). It decided that the work of the Commission should be directed towards submitting proposals, recommendations and reports to the Council regarding, inter alia, “(a) an international bill of rights . . .”

3. At its second session, the Council in its resolution 9(II), adopted on 21 June 1946, expressed the view “that the purpose of the United Nations with regard to the promotion . . . of human rights, as defined in the Charter of the United Nations, can only be fulfilled if provisions are made for the implementation of human rights and of an international bill of rights.” The Council requested the Commission on Human Rights “to submit at an early date suggestions regarding the ways and means for the effective implementation of human rights and fundamental freedoms, with a view to assisting the Economic and Social Council in working out arrangements for such implementation with other appropriate organs of the United Nations”.

4. The Commission on Human Rights, at its first session, requested its Chairman, Vice-Chairman and Rapporteur to undertake, with the assistance of the Secretariat, the task of formulating a preliminary draft international bill of human rights to be submitted to the second session of the Commission (document E/259, paragraph 10).

5. At the fourth session of the Economic and Social Council, the President was informed, by a letter of the Chairman of the Commission dated 24 March 1947 (see resolution 46(IV)) that she intended to appoint a drafting committee of the Commission which would be convened prior to the second session of the Commission and which would prepare, on the basis of documentation supplied by the Secretariat, a preliminary draft of an international bill of human rights.

[2]

6. The Council, in its resolution 46(IV) adopted on 28 March 1947, approved this action and requested the Secretariat to prepare a documented outline concerning an international bill of human rights. It decided that the draft prepared by the above-mentioned drafting committee would be submitted to the second session of the Commission on Human Rights; that the draft as developed by the Commission on Human Rights would be submitted to all States Members of the United Nations for their observations, suggestions and proposals; that these observations, suggestions and proposals would then be considered as a basis of a redraft, if necessary, by the drafting committee; that the resulting draft would then be submitted to the Commission on Human Rights for final consideration; and that the Council would consider the proposed international bill of human rights as submitted by the Commission, with a view to recommending an international bill of human rights to the General Assembly in 1948.

7. On the basis of the Secretary-General's documented outline (E/CN.4/AC.1/3/Add.1) and various proposals submitted by its members, the Drafting Committee prepared two documents (E/CN.4/21), one a draft declaration or manifesto of human rights, the second a draft convention on human rights. It also discussed the question of the implementation of human rights (see E/CN.4/AC.1/SR.1–19).

8. On the basis of the report of the Drafting Committee (E/CN.4/21), the Commission on Human Rights, at its second session, prepared a draft International Bill of Human Rights consisting of (a) a draft International Declaration of Human Rights, (b) a draft International Covenant on Human Rights, and (c) suggestions for implementation (E/600, Annexes A, B and C).

9. The Commission was assisted in this work, at both its second and third sessions, by one or more officers of the Commission on the Status of Women, who, in accordance with resolution 46(IV) of the Council, participated without vote in its deliberations when sections of the Bill concerning the particular rights of women were being considered.

10. The drafts prepared by the Commission at its second session were sent to all States Members of the United Nations on 9 January 1948. Comments, suggestions and proposals were received from the Governments of Australia, Brazil, Canada, Egypt, France, India, Mexico, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Pakistan, Sweden, Union of South Africa, United Kingdom and United States of America.

11. At the request of the Council, contained in resolution 118(VI), the United Nations Conference on Freedom of Information considered and reported (E/CONF.6/79, Annex B) on articles 17 and 18 of the draft International Declaration on Human Rights and article 17 of the draft International [3] Covenant on Human Rights. Its suggestions for amendments to these articles were taken into consideration by the Commission on Human Rights at its third session.

12. At its sixth session, the Economic and Social Council (resolution 116(VI)F) directed the Commission, through its Drafting Committee and at its next session, to give particular attention to the implementation aspect of the Bill of Human Rights in order to ensure that draft articles on implementation might be submitted to Member Governments at the earliest possible date.

13. On the basis of the comments, suggestions and proposals received from Governments (E/CN.4/82 and E/CN.4/82/Add.1–12) the Drafting Committee at its second session prepared a redraft of the International Declaration of Human Rights and the International Covenant on Human Rights (E/CN.4/95, Annexes A and B), but did not have time to discuss the question of implementation.

14. The Commission on Human Rights considered the draft International Declaration of Human Rights at its third session, and forwarded it to the Economic and Social Council (E/800, Annex A). It had not time to redraft the draft International Covenant on Human Rights, but forwarded it to the Council in the form in which it appeared in the report of the second session of the Drafting Committee (E/800, Annex B). The Commission was also unable to consider in detail the various suggestions for implementation, but drew the attention of the Council to such proposals as had been made (E/800, Annex C).

15. Owing to the pressure of business, the Council decided that, at the final plenary stage, there should only be general statements of position by members regarding the draft International Declaration of Human Rights, without other debate or decisions other than a decision to transmit the documents to the General Assembly, together with statements of position.

16. At the final plenary stage, the Council accordingly adopted the following resolution:

“The Economic and Social Council

“Decides to transmit to the General Assembly the draft International Declaration on Human Rights<sup>1</sup> submitted to the Council by the Commission on Human Rights in the report of its third session (document E/800), together with the remainder of this report and records of the proceedings of the Council at [4] its seventh session on this subject”<sup>2</sup>.

<sup>[1]</sup> For the text of the draft Declaration of Human Rights, see Official Records of the Economic and Social Council, third year, seventh session, Supplement No. 2 (document E/800).

<sup>[2]</sup> Documents E/SR.180, E/SR.201, E/SR.202, E/SR.215 and E/SR.218.

A/PV.139

23 September 1948

Verbatim Record of the One Hundred and Thirty-Ninth
Meeting [of the General Assembly]

Held at the Palais de Chaillot, Paris, on Thursday, 23 September 1948,
at 10.30 a.m.

President: DR. EVATT (Australia).

...

[13]

...

[GENERAL ROMULO (Philippines):] Through the Human Rights Commission and the Conference on Freedom of Information, progress has been made in defining and enlarging the scope of the rights and freedoms of man. The text of a proposed Declaration on Human Rights and the various conventions and resolutions guaranteeing freedom of information await final action by the General Assembly. They constitute a vital portion of the pattern of peace and freedom, to which I have referred, whose validity does not depend on the conflicts and prejudice of the moment. They call for immediate action, and, on no pretext whatever should they be made to await a prior political settlement.

...

[18–20]

...

MR. MARSHALL (United States of America): We are particularly happy to meet here in Paris. France has, through the centuries, nourished the arts and sciences for the enrichment of all mankind and its citizens have striven persistently for expanding freedom for the individual. It is entirely fitting that this General Assembly, meeting in France which fired the hearts of men with the Declaration of the Rights of Man in 1789, should consider in 1948 the approval of a new Declaration of Human Rights for free men in a free world.

[21]

Not only is it appropriate that we should re-affirm our respect for the human rights and fundamental freedoms but that we should renew our determination to develop and protect those rights and freedoms. Freedom of thought, conscience and religion, freedom of opinion and expression, freedom from arbitrary arrest and detention, the right of a people to choose their own government, to take part in its work, and, if they become dissatisfied with it, to change it, the obligation of government to act through law – these are some of the elements that combine to give dignity and worth to the individual.

The Charter of the United Nations reflects these concepts and expressly provides for the promotion and protection of the rights of man as well as for the rights of nations. This is no accident. For in the modern world the association of free men within a free state is based upon the obligation of citizens to respect the rights of their fellow citizens. And the association of free nations in a free world is based upon the obligation of all states to respect the rights of other nations.

Systematic and deliberate denials of basic human rights lie at the root of most of our troubles and threaten the work of the United Nations. It is not only fundamentally wrong that millions of men and women live in daily terror of secret police, subject to seizure, imprisonment or forced labour without just cause and without fair trial, but these wrongs have repercussions in the community of nations. Governments which systematically disregard the rights of their own people are not likely to respect the rights of other nations and other people, and are likely to seek their objectives by coercion and force in the international field.

The maintenance of these rights and freedoms depends upon adherence to the abiding principles of justice and morality embodied in the rule of law. It will therefore always be true that those members of the United Nations which strive with sincerity of purpose to live by the Charter, and to conform to the principles of justice and law proclaimed by that Charter, will be those states which are genuinely dedicated to the preservation of the dignity and integrity of the individual.

Let this Third Regular Session of the General Assembly approve by an overwhelming majority the Declaration of Human Rights as a standard of conduct for all; and let us, as Members of the United Nations, conscious of our own shortcomings and imperfections, join our effort in good faith to live up to this high standard.

...

A/PV.144

27 September 1948

Verbatim Record of the One Hundred and Forty-Fourth
Meeting [of the General Assembly]

Held at the Palais de Chaillot, Paris, On Monday, 27 September 1948,
at 10.30 a.m.

President: DR. EVATT (Australia)

...

[16]

...

[MR. THORN (New Zealand):] Then there is the great question of human rights, about which a convention has to be shaped. This, in the main, has been the responsibility of the Human Rights Commission which in recent months has been drafting a Bill of Human Rights. The work already done is a considerable contribution to the raising of international standards.

...

A/PV.145

27 September 1948

Verbatim Record of the One Hundred and Forty-Fifth
Meeting [of the General Assembly]

Held at the Palais de Chaillot, Paris, On Monday, 27 September 1948,
at 3 p.m.

President: DR. EVATT (Australia)

...

[41]

...

[MR. MALIK (Lebanon):]<sup>1</sup> Finally, I wish to speak about the problem of human rights. The problem of human rights is another matter concerning which I propose to dwell separately. The Economic and Social Council is transmitting to the General Assembly three types of documents in this field: a draft Declaration of Human Rights, three draft Conventions concerning freedom of information and a draft Convention on Genocide. All three documents are of the utmost importance, but I shall confine my remarks to the Declaration of Human Rights.

The problem of human rights certainly belongs to the heart of our compact as Members of this Organization. The last war was fought in part because fundamental human rights were contemptuously trampled on by Nazi Germany. This particular origination of the war was given its classical expression by the four freedoms of President Roosevelt. Nothing could be more tragic than if this partial cause of the war were now forgotten, for then indeed the war itself would have been fought in vain. We can therefore say that the United Nations is itself the outcome of a war whose whole moral planning was saturated with the issue of human rights.

Now human rights are mentioned seven times in the Charter. The first few lines of the Preamble read:

“We, the peoples of the United Nations, determined

“to save succeeding generations from the scourge of war, which twice in our lifetime has brought untold sorrow to mankind, and

“to reaffirm faith in fundamental human rights, in the dignity and worth of the human person, in the equal rights of men and women and of nations large and small . . .”

<sup>1</sup> A version of Malik’s remarks in the General Assembly on 27 February 1948 is reproduced in Habib C. Malik, ed., The Challenge of Human Rights, Charles Malik and the Universal Declaration, Oxford: Centre for Lebanese Studies, 2000, pp. 113–16. There are slight differences, of no substantive significance, with the version in A/PV.145, reproduced in this compilation.

Thus, our determination concerning human rights comes second only to our determination concerning peace and war. The Charter goes even further than that, for in Article 55 peace and war themselves are made functions of human rights.

Furthermore, apart from the five principal organs of the United Nations and the Military Staff Committee, the Commission on Human Rights is the only other organ mentioned by name in the Charter. This Commission, therefore, enjoys a unique statutory position. And the Charter does not only speak in such vague terms as “promotion” and “encouragement” of human rights; the Charter lays equal emphasis on their actual “observance”. It is thus impossible for us to disown our origin; it is impossible for other issues no matter how urgent and important, to displace the question of human rights from the centre of our vision.

But it is patent that the Charter in this respect is incomplete. For nowhere does it define human rights and fundamental freedoms. The Charter “reaffirms” our “faith in fundamental rights”; it pledges us to “promote” and encourage respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms”. But what are these rights and freedoms concerning which all this is affirmed and pledged? On this crucial question the Charter is completely silent.

The Economic and Social Council was quick to perceive this lacuna in the Charter and to set about filling it. It instructed its Commission on Human Rights to proceed at once to the elaboration of a Bill of Human Rights which will give content and meaning to the pregnant phrase of the Preamble, “the worth and dignity of man”. Under the inspiring leadership of Mrs. Roosevelt, who brings to this task dignity, authority, understanding and an unusual breadth of sympathy, the Commission has laboured for two years now on this assignment.

The first fruit of its labours is the draft Declaration on Human Rights now before the General Assembly. In my opinion this is one of the most fundamental texts so far put out by the United Nations – perhaps is even the most important such text. [43–5] After it is reviewed and adopted by the General Assembly – and my delegation believes that it should be adopted at this session – it will not be an ordinary resolution like any other resolution; it will be an integral filling out of a lacuna which was unavoidably left by the framers of our basic law. It will complete the Charter itself by defining what was intentionally left undefined in it, and thus, the ordinary citizen throughout the world will be able to say, “Now the ambiguity is removed; this is what my government pledged itself in San Francisco to have faith in and to promote and encourage and respect and observe and realize.” Decision on this Declaration of Human Rights will entail decision on some of the deepest issues of the present day.

There is first the proper dialectic between right and duty. Am I a bundle of rights unrelieved by duties? Is not my freedom precisely for the sake of certain essential duties which I ought to perform? There is next a question of my material economic rights. How far do these economic rights extend without upsetting other values? Thirdly there is the question of my relationship to society. Am I wholly socially determined or could I criticize and rebel and say no? Fourthly there is the question of my relationship to the state. Is the state an original, uncreated, unanswerable absolute so that, in the determination of my rights and freedoms, I am wholly its creature, or is it answerable to something higher than itself? Fifthly there is a question of the intermediate institutions between the state and the individual, institutions like the trade unions, the home, the church, the university and the intimate circle of friends. Do these intermediate institutions possess a certain autonomy of their own and are they totally overwhelmed by the determinations of the state? Could I ever be free if I belonged to a society where these intermediate grounds of freedom were not themselves free? There is next the question of the order and structure of my rights? Do they all fall flat on one plane with equal validity and equal importance, or do they articulate themselves in an order of depth and hierarchy?

[46]

Finally, there is the question of their nature and their origin. Where do they come from? Are they conferred upon me by an external visible power such as the State – or now by the United Nations – that what is now granted me may some day be conceivably withdrawn from me? Or do they belong to my essence, so that if they were violated in any way, I cease to be a human being at all? If they did belong to my essence, should they not also be grounded in a supreme being who, by being the lord of history, could guarantee their meaning and their stability?

It is these final issues which will be explicitly or implicitly decided in our treatment of the Declaration of Human Rights. There is no happier augury for this decision than the fact that it will take place in Paris, this matchless city of light and freedom. I know that the topics which will be examined by the First Committee are full of excitement, but such excitement comes and goes, and what abides is the final issue of principle in the present world situation. For everybody knows by now that the ultimate issues today are all ideological, and therefore it must be clear that even the political excitement of the First Committee derives its pathos and significance from the underlying ideological conflict.

Superficial people in the late nineteenth and early twentieth century have ridiculed the classical ages of faith. They are now paying the price of their faithless superficiality by landing in the middle of the twentieth century, in one of the most fearful ages of faith the world has ever known. Faith has thus come back on man with a vengeance, the vengeance of the dark and primitive. For it is dangerous to neglect the mind and spirit of man; it is dangerous to poke fun on the logos. The neglected logos will always avenge itself by perverting both itself and the world.

The most important issue in the order of truth today is what constitutes the proper worth and dignity of man. This will be the central theme in the debate of the Declaration of Human Rights. Unless this issue is rightly settled, there is no meaning to any other settlement. Do not tell me that you are going to settle Korea, and Germany, and Palestine, and atomic energy, and leave this central issue unsettled. For what is the use of a peace and a settlement in which man is left ambiguous, estranged from himself and from the truth?

...

A/PV.147

28 September 1948

Verbatim Record of the One Hundred and Forty-Seventh Meeting [of the General Assembly]

Held at the Palais de Chaillot, Paris, on Tuesday, 28 September 1948,
at 3.15 p.m.

President: DR. EVATT (Australia)

...

[121]

...

[MR. GARCIA-SAYAN (Peru) (Interpretation from Spanish):] We have associated ourselves decisively with the efforts of the United Nations to reach international co-operation in the field of protection of human rights and implementation of basic freedoms, without regard to sex, language, religion or race.

We therefore attribute the greatest importance to the work which has culminated in the Declaration of Human Rights. But we must also consider that a declaration to the same effect has been promulgated at the Bogotá Conference. It is not enough for the Assembly to approve this declaration. We must be concerned with the patient and continuous implementation of these rights; we must watch how they are implemented in every nation throughout the world.

...

A/PV.148

29 September 1948

Verbatim Record of the One Hundred and Forty-Eighth Meeting [of the General Assembly]

Held at the Palais de Chaillot, Paris, on Wednesday, 29 September 1948,
at 10.30 a.m.

President: DR. EVATT (Australia)

...

[37]

...

[MR. FERNANDEZ (Chile):] The draft declaration on human rights which the Economic and Social Council has sent to the General Assembly is perhaps somewhat imperfect. Nevertheless, it cannot be denied that the right of the individual to life, liberty and security must be recognized as an integral part of those ideas which animated those who formulated the Charter and who, in so doing, followed the guidance of those who had formulated the principles of the Four Freedoms.

[38–40]

Humanity has undergone untold sufferings. It is now asking whether these sufferings have been in vain. It wishes to have the United Nations define those rights which would constitute an answer to humanity's anxieties, to have the United Nations guarantee those rights.

...

A/C.3/SR.88<sup>2</sup>

30 September 1948

Summary Record of the Eighty-Eighth Meeting
[of the Third Committee]

Held at the Palais de Chaillot, Paris, on Thursday, 30 September 1948,
at 11:45 a.m.

Chairman: MR. CHARLES MALIK (Lebanon).

[26]

...

9. Draft international declaration of human rights (E/800)<sup>1</sup>

THE PRESIDENT drew the attention of the members of the Committee to the following documents:

The report of the third session of the Commission on Human Rights (E/800)<sup>1</sup> which contained, as an annex, the draft international declaration of human rights (annex A);

<sup>2</sup> The text of the document is from Official Records of the General Assembly, Third Session, 1948, pp. 23–32.

Resolution 151(VII) adopted by the Economic and Social Council<sup>2</sup> which transmitted to the General Assembly the draft international declaration of human rights, together with the remainder of the report of the third session of the Commission on Human Rights and the records of the proceedings of the Council on the rights of man during its seventh session; and

The report of the Economic and Social Council to the General Assembly (A/625)<sup>3</sup> of which section

[<sup>1</sup>] See Official Records of the Economic and Social Council, Third Year, Seventh Session, Supplement No. 2.

[<sup>2</sup>] See Resolutions adopted by the Economic and Social Council during its seventh session, page 15.

[<sup>3</sup>] See Official Records of the third session of the General Assembly, Supplement No. 3.

[27]

I of chapter III dealt with the question of human rights.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) having pointed out that the Assembly had before it not only the draft international declaration of human rights, but also the draft Covenant and the suggestions for implementation. The Chairman agreed that that was correct, since the Council resolution stated explicitly that the Council decided to transmit to the Assembly not only the draft declaration, but also the remainder of its report.

Consequently, the Assembly was obliged to consider the whole of the report of the Commission on Human Rights (E/800).

MR. RAMÍREZ MORENO (Colombia) asked that a general discussion should be held on the entire question of human rights so that each member could define his position on the question as a whole before submitting his observations on each article.

THE CHAIRMAN asked the members of the Committee to state their views on the desirability of having a general discussion.

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) could quite understand that those members who had not been represented on the Commission on Human Rights should wish to state their views, but she pointed out that the Commission on Human Rights had requested the Governments of all Member States to submit their comments in writing on the draft declaration and that all Governments had had time to do so.<sup>1</sup> The comments submitted had been read and weighed by the Committee.

She therefore suggested that a general debate should be held, but that it should be restricted by giving priority to the representatives of Member States which were not members of the Commission on Human Rights and to representatives of Governments which had not submitted comments on the draft declaration. It was to be hoped that the general debate would not become unduly prolonged.

MR. ALVARADO (Peru), MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba), MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) and MR. COROMINAS (Argentina) supported the Colombian proposal.

MR. ALVARADO (Peru) requested, in addition, that the American Declaration of the Rights and Duties of Man signed at Bogotá by twenty-one nations, not long before should be circulated to the members of the Committee for their information.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) supported that suggestion and pointed out that the draft declaration worked out by the Commission on Human Rights had to a certain extent been inspired by the Bogotá declaration. He felt it would be useful if the Secretariat prepared a comparative table of the corresponding articles of the two Declarations.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) recalled that the Commission on Human Rights had taken note of the Bogotá declaration and, during the discussion in the Drafting Committee, the Chilean representative had drawn inspiration from the Bogotá text.

<sup>[1]</sup> See Official Records of the Economic and Social Council, Third Year, Sixth Session, Supplement No. 1, Chapter I, paragraph 13.

[28]

COUNT CARTON DE WIART (Belgium) pointed out that the Inter-Parliamentary Union, which was a non-governmental organization with category A consultative status, had held a conference in Rome two weeks previously, at the conclusion of which it had adopted a declaration on the principles which should form the basis of international morality.

He thought it might be used to request the Secretariat to circulate that document.

THE CHAIRMAN said that the Bogotá Declaration had been distributed at Lake Success under the document symbol E/CN.4/122. He would nevertheless request the Secretariat to make the text available to the members of the Committee as soon as possible. He stressed, however, that the Third Committee had before it only the draft declaration submitted by the Commission on Human Rights, and that documents such as the Declaration of Bogotá would be made available for information only. Discussion, therefore, would have to limit itself officially to the draft worked out by the Commission on Human Rights.

MR. COROMINAS (Argentina) believed that, if the Committee wished to give to the question of human rights its due importance, no restrictions should be placed on the length of the general discussion. If the current session of the Assembly succeeded in solving that problem, that, in itself, would justify the convening of the Assembly. Instead of limiting the duration of the general discussion, it seemed to him that on the contrary, the time devoted to that discussion would show the importance which the United Nations attributed to the question of human rights.

MR. SAINT-LOT (Haiti) pointed out that the discussions in committee should deal with practical matters which might lead to constructive results, and that general statements could be made at plenary meetings.

MR. COROMINAS (Argentina) observed that the Third Committee was part of the General Assembly and that all the representatives who had not yet had an opportunity to state their views should be given the opportunity to do so.

MR. ANZE MATIENZO (Bolivia) shared the views of the Argentine representative. He was of the opinion that a preliminary debate should be held to bring out the principles on which the declaration of human rights must be based.

MR. CHANG (China) suggested, as a compromise, that the discussion on the preamble might begin immediately, a procedure which would permit every member to state his principles, since the preamble set out the principles on which the declaration was based. He proposed that the discussion should be divided into two parts, a discussion on principles and a discussion on drafting, so as to ascertain what wording would best express the principles accepted by the Commission.

There followed a brief discussion on the question whether the debate should deal with the draft declaration of human rights alone, or with [29] all the drafts relating to human rights, including the covenant and the suggestions for implementation.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) recalled that, in the opinion of certain members, the study of the last two drafts was not sufficiently advanced to permit the Assembly to discuss them forthwith.

MR. GARCÍA BAUER (Guatemala) also felt that it would be premature to consider the draft covenant on human rights and the suggestions for implementation during the current session of the Assembly. He asked the Committee to decide whether the debate should be limited to the draft declaration, or whether it should also cover the other two drafts.

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) pointed out that the Commission on Human Rights intended to terminate its work on the draft covenant and the suggestions for implementation during the following spring, so as to present those two drafts to the following session of the General Assembly.

MISS BERNARDINO (Dominican Republic) considered that the Committee should first of all decide whether there would be a general discussion; since the Commission on Human Rights was not composed of all Member States, it was quite natural that those Members which were not represented on it wished to make their positions known.

MR. RAMÍREZ MORENO (Colombia) emphasized that the problem of human rights must be considered in its entirety and that the views of various countries should be ascertained.

He disagreed with the draft declaration, which too often adopted a preaching tone and was vaguely, imbued with the idea of compulsion, an idea from which a free mind sought to liberate itself. He criticized the ideas expressed in the draft declaration and emphasized the importance of differences in philosophic outlook.

In conclusion he said he wished his criticisms to be constructive; he would first have to explain his own conception of the rights of man which made him reject certain formulae adopted in the draft declaration and which would prompt the criticisms he would make about certain articles.

THE CHAIRMAN asked the Committee to decide how the draft international declaration of human rights was to be examined.

The first proposal made was that a general discussion should take place in which priority would be granted to representatives of the countries that had not taken part in the work of the Commission on Human Rights. The second proposal put forward by the representative of China, was that the draft declaration of human rights be examined forthwith, beginning with the preamble, the substance and form of which would be considered in turn.

He asked the representatives to choose between those two proposals.

[30]

MR. CONTOUMAS (Greece) supported the proposal of the representative of China.

COLONEL HODGSON (Australia) said the Committee should first examine the report as a whole, that is, the draft declaration of human rights, the covenant and the suggestions for implementation. During its session in December 1947, the Commission on Human Rights had decided that these three matters should be taken together and three working parties had been set up to study them.<sup>1</sup> At the session held in May 1948 at Lake Success the covenant and the suggestions for implementation had not been sufficiently studied and at the sixth session of the Economic and Social Council, the draft declaration of human rights had not been examined. The Committee was asked to continue the work on the covenant and the suggestions for implementation.

He maintained that a general discussion should take place, and that that discussion should not be limited to the preamble but should cover the three points he had enumerated in his opening remarks.

MR. COROMINAS (Argentina) asked that a vote be taken by roll-call.

MRS. BEGTRUP (Denmark) agreed with the representative of the United States that it would be advisable to limit discussion to the draft declaration of human rights which should, in accordance with the recommendation of the Economic and Social Council, be adopted by the General Assembly at its current session. The covenant had not yet been sufficiently elaborated for a useful study to be made.

She supported the Chinese proposal calling for a general discussion on the preamble, to be followed by an examination of the other parts of the draft declaration.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the members of the Third Committee had before them the whole report of the Commission on Human Rights, that is, the declaration, the covenant and the suggestions for implementation.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) supported the proposal of the representative of Australia but saw no reasons why certain representatives should be granted priority to speak in the course of discussion.

THE CHAIRMAN replied that it seemed natural to grant priority to the representatives of Countries that had not participated in the work of the Commission on Human Rights, in accordance with the suggestion of the representatives of the United States and Chile.

MR. ANZE MATIENZO (Bolivia) supported the Australian proposal and associated himself with the request made by the representative of the Argentine that the question be immediately put to the vote by roll-call.

MR. CHANG (China) said that as his colleagues were in favour of a general discussion he would withdraw his proposal that the Committee should start immediately by studying the preamble. He would request the President, however, to ask the representatives whether they wished the discussion to deal solely with the draft declaration or with the whole report, including the covenant and the suggestions for implementation.

<sup>[1]</sup> See E/CN.4/50.

[31]

MR. CASSIN (France) supported the proposal of the representative of Australia because a general discussion, which was in any case inevitable, was always profitable. Speakers taking part in the discussion should naturally observe some sort of discipline. The States represented in the Commission on Human Rights should give way to others in order that the work on the Commission should not be prolonged unnecessarily; it was essential that the declaration on human rights should be adopted at the current session of the General Assembly.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) was in favour of a general discussion covering all the questions in hand, but pointed out with regard to the suggestions for implementation that certain relevant documents were not yet available. Thus the question had been raised of the setting up of an international court or permanent commission on human rights, two points on which the Committee lacked information.

He was opposed to the granting of priority to certain representatives in the debate.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) wished for a discussion which would be full, general, and entirely free, in which all representatives would take part without discrimination and which would cover the whole question of the declaration, the covenant, and the suggestions for implementation, for it was impossible to separate the questions under consideration. Certain restraints would have to be applied; the Chairman might decide that the list of speakers should be closed on a certain date and that speeches be limited to, say, half an hour.

He moved the adjournment of the discussion until the afternoon meeting, so that the various delegations could reach a decision on the matter.

THE CHAIRMAN referring to rule 107 of the rules of procedure said he would immediately put the motion for adjournment to the vote.

MR. CHANG (China) asked what exactly was the proposal before the Committee and upon what question would the vote be taken.

THE CHAIRMAN stated the proposal in the following terms:

“The Third Committee

“Decides to proceed immediately to a general discussion of item 2 of its agenda (Draft international declaration of human rights: item submitted by the Economic and Social Council), which includes the report of the Commission on Human Rights in its entirety.”

He asked the representative of Belgium whether he agreed to that proposal and would withdraw his motion for adjournment.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) agreed.

MR. COROMINAS (Argentina) withdrew his request that a vote be taken by roll-call.

[32]

THE CHAIRMAN put his proposal to the vote.

The proposal was adopted.

The meeting rose at 1:15 p.m.

A/C.3/SR.89<sup>3</sup>

30 September 1948

Summary Record of the Eighty-Ninth Meeting
[of the Third Committee]

Held at the Palais de Chaillot, Paris, on Thursday, 30 September 1948
at 3 p.m.

Chairman: MR. CHARLES MALIK (Lebanon).

10. Draft international declaration of human rights (E/800) (continued)

THE CHAIRMAN declared open the general debate on the draft international declaration of human rights, prepared by the Commission on Human Rights, and on the report of the Commission's third session (E/800).

He called on Mrs. Roosevelt (United States of America), Chairman of the Commission, to present the draft declaration to the Committee.

<sup>3</sup> The text of the document is from Official Records of the General Assembly, Third Session, 1948, pp. 32–6.

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) stated that the members of the Commission on Human Rights considered that the draft declaration represented a great step forward in the protection and promotion of human rights and fundamental freedoms and their application. As Mr. Marshall had made clear at a plenary meeting of the General Assembly,<sup>4</sup> the United States delegation attached great importance to the genuine respect for human rights in general and to the declaration in particular. The United States delegation looked forward to the adoption of the declaration by the General Assembly at its current session.

As the Commission on Human Rights had pointed out in its report, the declaration of human rights was only the first step in the elaboration of the human rights programme called for by the Charter; it was essential that it should be followed by a covenant of human rights, drafted in the form of a treaty and containing provisions for implementation. Mrs. Roosevelt hoped that the covenant, with which the Commission would deal at its following session, might be approved by the General Assembly in 1949.

The draft declaration was not a treaty or international agreement and did not impose legal obligations. It was rather a statement of basic principles of inalienable human rights, setting up a common standard of achievement for all peoples and all nations. Although it was not legally binding, the declaration would nevertheless, have considerable weight. Its adoption would commit Member States, in the words of the preamble, "to strive by teaching and education to promote respect for these rights and freedoms and by progressive measures, national and international, to secure the universal and effective recognition and observance, both among the peoples of Member States themselves and among the peoples of territories under their jurisdiction". The declaration listed basic rights for all men, [33] without which the full development of the individual was impossible.

As Chairman of the Commission on Human Rights and as United States representative, Mrs. Roosevelt appealed to the Committee to strive for a majority agreement on the declaration, and urged its members not to allow themselves to be turned aside from its goal by a search for absolute perfection. Her delegation was aware that the declarations might be improved upon; it did not think, for instance, that article 14, which dealt with marriage, should be included in the declaration at all. Article 19, paragraph 2, which stated that everyone has the right of access to public employment in his country, was too broadly phrased. The United States Government did not feel that it was infringing any basic human right by excluding individuals with subversive ideas from its civil service. It did not believe that the economic, social and cultural rights listed in the latter part of the declaration implied the need for direct governmental action, except as stated in the covering article 20. Nevertheless, the United States delegation considered the declaration, as a whole, a good document and was prepared to accept it in its existing form, without further amendment, if the majority so agreed.

<sup>4</sup> A/PV.139.

Mrs. Roosevelt warned the Committee of the time which might be wasted if numerous amendments were to be considered. The declaration had already undergone minute scrutiny. Every Member State had had the opportunity to submit comments, and all comments received had been given careful attention, so that the document as it stood was widely representative of the views of Members of the United Nations. Mrs. Roosevelt expressed the hope that the Third Committee and the General Assembly would approve the product of two years' painstaking work by the Commission on Human Rights.

She supported the statement made by Mr. Marshall, at a plenary meeting, that there could be no compromise on basic principles. No such compromise was to be found in the declaration. The General Assembly should at its current session, proclaim the great principles contained in the declaration, for which the peoples of the world were waiting.

MRS. NEWLANDS (New Zealand) stated that her delegation still maintained the position it had taken at the seventh session of the Economic and Social Council.<sup>1</sup> While it recognized the importance granted to human rights in the Charter and was anxious to help in the early adoption of a declaration of human rights, it felt that the declaration should not be approved by itself, but together with documents which would provide means of implementation.

Mrs. Newlands pointed out that Members of the United Nations had achieved varying stages of economic and social development. Their internal structures did not conform to a single pattern; and the historical conditions from which they drew their philosophical ideas were not uniform. Sufficient time should therefore be allowed for each Government to consider the views and comments of other Governments, for differing points of view to be reconciled, and for the greatest possible measure of agreement to be achieved. Some delay would be preferable to the hasty adoption of a text which Member States might later have cause to regret.

<sup>[1]</sup> See Official Records of the Economic and Social Council, Third Year, Seventh Session, 218th meeting.

[34]

The draft declaration before the Committee was only the first part of an international bill of human rights. It had been prepared by only eighteen Member States. The Economic and Social Council, at its seventh session, had not had time to deal with it thoroughly, but had merely referred it to the General Assembly together with a statement of positions taken by its representatives. The New Zealand delegation felt that the draft declaration was not yet a mature document, reflecting the views of all the Members of the United Nations. Not all Governments had as yet examined it in relation to their systems of law. A declaration of human rights by fifty-eight States would be a great event; further study was required to make the document worthy of the occasion.

It had frequently been emphasized that the declaration would not be legally binding. The covenant, which would have such effect, was the more important document of the two, and it was highly desirable that they should be adopted at the same time. If the declaration were adopted first, there was less likelihood that the covenant would be adopted at all; by the time it was ready for adoption, some States, having already accepted the declaration, might be unwilling to vote for it.

Moreover, separate adoption of the declaration might give it greater weight than was intended. It was the opinion of the majority in the Commission on Human Rights that the declaration would not be binding; it would rather be a statement of basic human rights for the observance of which nations should strive.

Yet the French representative who had taken part in the work of the Commission had subsequently stated in the Economic and Social Council that he considered the declaration of human rights to be a complement to the Charter of the United Nations which could not be included in it because of the lengthy preparation it required, a clarification of the Charter, and an organic act of the United Nations having all the legal validity of such an act. The French representative had held that it would be dangerous to tell the peoples of the world that the declaration had no legal validity and merely showed the way towards a better future.

While the New Zealand delegation did not share the French representative's view with respect to the legal validity of the declaration, it felt that there was a real danger that, if the declaration were accepted without the covenant, undue importance might be ascribed to it; it might be used for the purpose of definition of provisions of the Charter, a purpose for which the Commission on Human Rights had never [35] intended it. The declaration should be adopted at the same time as the covenant, and it should be made clear that it was the latter document which created legally binding obligations.

Mrs. Newlands hoped that the views of her delegation would be taken into account. She urged the Committee, after a thorough discussion, to refer the draft declaration back to the Commission on Human Rights for further study in the light of additional comments by Governments. The Commission could also continue to work on the covenant, and both documents could be adopted by the General Assembly at its fourth session.

She added that should the Committee decide to undertake a detailed consideration of the declaration, the New Zealand delegation would be prepared to take part.

MRS. BEGTRUP (Denmark) observed that her country attached great importance to the clause on minority rights, which had originally appeared in the declaration, but was not to be found in the text then before the Committee. She would make a definite proposal on that subject at a later time.

MR. CASTBERG (Norway) said that his Government was anxious to see the draft declaration approved at the current session. While the declaration was designed to set moral standards rather than to impose legal obligations, it would be of practical value, since it would undoubtedly serve as a basis for the discussion in the United Nations of any question of human rights. Human rights should not be regarded as falling within the domestic jurisdiction of States.

His delegation whole-heartedly supported the declaration as it stood.

MR. COROMINAS (Argentina) stated that the declaration of human rights was perhaps the most important question with which the current session had to deal, as it was the latest step forward in humanity's march towards larger freedom.

The declaration before the Committee might require amendments and additions. It involved moral obligations only, and should be followed by a document which would impose legal obligations but which would, at the same time, be in harmony with the existing constitutions of democratic States. All those constitutions granted civil and political rights: the declaration marked an advance in that it also guaranteed social rights, and thus kept abreast of the progress made by human aspirations in the preceding half-century.

The Argentine representative said that the declaration should contain an enumeration of social rights, stated so clearly and simply that they could be readily understood by all. It should also, possibly in a separate chapter, list the social duties which men must assume if the corresponding rights were to be guaranteed. Each article it contained should be self-explanatory, self-contained and capable of enforcement. Finally, the declaration should be applicable equally to the peoples of the Member and non-member States; the tradi-[36]tions and legal systems of the latter should consequently be taken into account.

The members of the Committee were responsible to their people; they could not return from the current session empty-handed. They must respond to the civic and social aspirations of mankind and adopt the declaration of human rights for which the world was waiting.

In conclusion, the Argentine representative paid a tribute to the representative of the United States, whose untiring efforts were largely responsible for the excellence of the draft declaration.

MR. CONTOUMAS (Greece) said that there was little need for the representative of Greece to put forward his country's views on human rights; the Greek people had striven for that sacred cause since the days of antiquity. It could be said that they were still striving for the same ideal.

His delegation endorsed the general principles of the draft declaration, although it reserved the right to speak again during the detailed examination of the document.

MR. RAMÍREZ MORENO (Colombia) asked if the meeting could be adjourned, in order that he and other representatives might have the opportunity to study the draft declaration further.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) made a formal proposal for adjournment under rule 107 of the rules of procedure.

THE CHAIRMAN, having assured the representative of Argentina that he would be given an opportunity to speak again if he so desired, put the motion for adjournment to the vote.

The motion was adopted by 27 votes to 8, with 15 abstentions.

The meeting rose at 4.30 p.m.

A/C.3/214

1 October 1948

Colombia and Cuba:
Table of Correlation of Articles of the Draft International Declaration of Human Rights and the American Declaration of the Rights and Duties of Man (E/800 and E/CN.4/122)

Articles of the draft International Declaration	Corresponding articles of the American Declaration
1	Preamble
2
3	I
4	XXVI(2)
5	XXVII
6	II
7	XXV
8	XXVI
9	XXVI
10	V–IX–X
11	VIII
12	XXVII
13	XIX
14	VIII
15	XXIII
16	III
17	IV
18	XXI–XXII
19	XX

Articles of the draft International Declaration	Corresponding articles of the American Declaration
20	XVI
21	XIV
22	XI–XVI–VII
23	XII
24	XV
[2]
25	XIII
26
27	XXVIII and duties
28
Additional article	XXIV
	II
Articles of the American Declaration	Corresponding articles of the draft International Declaration
I	3
II	6
III	16
IV	17
V	10
VI	14
VII	22(2)
VIII	11
IX	10
X	10
XI	22
XII	23
XIII	24
XIV	21
XV	24
XVI	20, 22
XVII	5
XVIII	8
XIX	13
XX	19
XXI	18
XXII	18
XXIII	15
XXIV	Additional article
XXV	7
XXVI	4, 8, 9
XXVII	12

XXVIII

27(2)

Duties

XXIX

to

XXXVIII

A/C.3/SR.90<sup>5</sup>*1 October 1948

Summary Record of the Ninetieth Meeting
[of the Third Committee]

Held at the Palais de Chaillot, Paris, on Friday,
 1 October 1948, at 10.30 a.m.

Chairman: MR. CHARLES MALIK (Lebanon).

11. Draft international declaration of human rights (E/800) (continued)

MR. CARRERA-ANDRADE (Ecuador) said he had voted for the adjournment of the previous meeting because he felt the Committee had reached the core of the question of human rights and needed time for reflection. The international declaration of human rights was the most important document of the century, and, indeed, was a major expression of the human conscience. Human rights did not stop at national frontiers; hence, the supreme importance of the present debate. For the first time, fifty-eight States, representing five continents, had come [37] together to discuss the lot of man and to seek means to make his existence a fuller one.

There could be no better place than France for such a meeting, for France was the birthplace of the rights of man. From the discussions there should emerge a true charter of human rights. The international bill – the declaration and the covenant – would represent a well-constructed and indivisible whole and for that reason he was not in favour of taking the dramatic step of adopting the declaration separately.

Although the Commission on Human Rights had been assisted in its work by both intellectual and workers groups, the draft was not perfect, nor could it be expected to be. Much time would be needed to perfect the international bill; what was needed just then was the enthusiasm necessary to bring it into existence.

<sup>5</sup> The text of the document is from Official Records of the General Assembly, Third Session, 1948, pp. 36–45.

If to article 3, or in special clauses, there could be added the right to work, to rest, to freedom of thought and religion, the essential minimum would be guaranteed. Man was fighting for a peaceful, civilized existence. War was a barbarity and for the sake of the following generation at least, an attempt should be made to adjust the differences between the two blocs and to eliminate the possibility of atomic death.

Ecuador formed part of a new continent which derived its inspiration from the American Bill of Rights. It would therefore support the adoption of the declaration.

MRS. IKRAMULLAH (Pakistan) said her delegation fully supported the adoption of the declaration because it believed in the dignity and worth of man. It was imperative that the peoples of the world should recognize the existence of a code of civilized behaviour which would apply not only in international relations but also in domestic affairs. It was her hope that the declaration would mark a turning-point in history of no less importance than the works of Tom Paine and the American Declaration of Independence.

Whenever liberty, equality and fraternity were threatened, the divine element in men manifested itself. Such a crisis had arisen, but man, created in God's image, would save the world from bondage and ensure the birth of a new and better civilization.

MR. CAMPOS ORTIZ (Mexico) said that his Government was deeply interested in having human rights consecrated in an international document. At San Francisco, it had been suggested that a declaration of rights should be annexed to the Charter.<sup>1</sup> Similarly, the Latin American countries had annexed such a declaration to the Final Act of the Bogotá conference.<sup>2</sup>

Respect for human rights was an urgent necessity and to achieve it, those rights had to be defined. For that reason, his Government recognized that the draft declaration was of the greatest importance. It would not involve legal obligations, but that would not diminish the value of the document. It would define the human rights which States undertook to recognize and would serve as a criterion to guide and stimulate them. At the moment it would be difficult to go further. He recommended the inclusion in the declaration of a provision similar to article XVIII of the declaration of Bogotá<sup>3</sup> which would ensure that the law would defend individuals against violation of human rights. The draft before the Committee was generally acceptable and the Mexican delegation was ready to co-operate with other delegations in making the necessary improvements.

<sup>[1]</sup> See United Nations Conference on International Organization, San Francisco 1945, Volume I, 8th plenary session.

<sup>[2]</sup> Sec E/CN.4/122.

[38]

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) reminded the Committee that it had been the Cuban delegation which had fought for the inclusion of a declaration of human rights in the United Nations Charter. It had taken the same position during the first session of the General Assembly. The Commission on Human Rights had carried out a detailed technical study and the time had come for the adoption of the declaration. Mention had to be made not only of the Commission's excellent work but also of the formulation of the rights of man in the declaration of Bogotá. It was the result of careful study carried on by a legal committee for many years. Further, the representatives at Bogotá had had the advantage of being able to study the Geneva text of the declaration with most of which they had agreed.

In certain respects, however, he felt that the Bogotá text was superior to the Geneva draft and he was grateful to the Chilean representative for having tried to introduce some of the principles of the former into the latter. During the current session, the Cuban delegation would attempt to ensure that the efforts of the twenty-one Latin American Republics would be approved by the General Assembly.

He suggested that a sub-committee should be set up to study and compare the two texts. It should have a membership of perhaps eleven or fifteen, with adequate representation of Latin American countries.

He pointed out that article 1 of the draft was a statement of fact and not the statement of a right and that, owing to its importance, it would be better to insert it in a special preamble. There was also some confusion between rights and duties; to obviate that it would be desirable, as a natural consequence of article 27, for the text of the declaration to indicate clearly and precisely what the duties were.

The right of freedom of religion should be expressed in a separate article and not included along with the right to freedom of thought and conscience in article 16. Article 23, on education, was inadequate and could be improved by the insertion of the words "at least" after "elementary and fundamental education", as had been done in the Bogotá text.

[<sup>3</sup>] See E/CN.4/122.

[39]

The social rights had not been clearly defined and a reference to women's rights should also be inserted. His delegation was eager to see a provision inserted concerning the right to resist, such as the one contained in the Cuban Constitution. It had to be recognized that the instrument of justice could at times become an instrument of oppression and for that reason, the individual had to be granted the right to resist.

THE CHAIRMAN drew the Cuban representative's attention to the fact that the draft declaration had been re-drafted at Lake Success after the Ninth International Conference of American States and therefore, the relevant portions of the Bogotá declaration had already been taken into consideration.

MR. LOUW (Union of South Africa) wanted to be quite sure that, after the declaration had been adopted, there would be no unforeseen legal or moral obligations with which certain countries might not be able to comply. A declaration was not a convention and as such, had no legal significance. However, some might insist on interpreting its provisions in the light of certain passages of the Charter and might likewise insist on the existence of legal obligations. Further, only parties were bound by a convention, while Members who abstained in the vote on the declaration still would be bound by its provisions.

The South African Government had good reason to take care before it committed itself, for in the past, clear statements had been given distorted interpretations for political reasons. The declaration should refer only to those fundamental rights the universal applicability of which was recognized all over the world. The declaration as it stood went beyond those generally accepted rights.

The South African delegation could not possibly accept the thesis that human dignity would be impaired if a person were told he could not reside in a particular area. Such a thesis would destroy the whole basis of the multi-racial structure of the Union of South Africa and would certainly not be in the interests of the less advanced indigenous population. It had to be remembered that large tracts of the territory in that country had been set aside for the exclusive use and development of the non-European population, and no European was permitted to acquire or occupy land in such areas.

Similarly, the right to participate in government was not universal; it was conditioned not only by nationality but also by qualifications of franchise. Certainly there were many countries which could not give effect to the terms of article 19.

The draft declaration also included a certain number of what might be described as economic rights, such as the right, not only to work, but to do useful work and to be remunerated according to ability and skill; the duty of the State to ensure employment; and the right of women to equal pay for equal work as compared with men. It was to be wondered how many States were in a position to say that they could assume any international [40] responsibility for the full exercise of such rights.

The South African delegation submitted, therefore, that the declaration should contain only such generally recognized fundamental rights as freedom of religion and of speech, the liberty of the person, the inviolability of person and property, and free access to courts of impartial justice. It was not, after all, the function of the Committee to codify a whole philosophy of life. If the observance of those fundamental rights could be secured, man would be fully protected against the inhumanities of his fellow-men. It would be wiser not to attempt too much including things which might be accepted without meaning, but rather to confine the declaration to those rights which were practical in the world as it was. It would be a tragedy if human rights became a cliché or developed into a political slogan.

MISS BERNARDINO (Dominican Republic) said that, although the draft declaration was not perfect, it was a valuable document meriting careful study. She congratulated the Human Rights Commission on its work and paid a special tribute to its Chairman, Mrs. Roosevelt, who had contributed towards the speedy acceptance of many of the suggestions made by the Commission on the Status of Women. The mention of the rights of women in a number of articles of the draft declaration greatly increased the value of the document.

In her opinion, equal rights naturally entailed equal obligations and her delegation would accept any amendment intended to make that fact clear.

The rights mentioned in the draft declaration were already embodied in the Constitution of her country, which was one of the signatories of the Bogotá agreement. Her delegation would support the draft declaration in its existing form as a working document and would be prepared to accept any suitable amendments.

MR. MAYBANK (Canada) said that previous speakers had made it clear that all representatives believed firmly and sincerely in the concept of human rights. Unless human rights and fundamental freedoms were assured throughout the world, people would have little faith in the United Nations. The Committee had the opportunity of contributing something of value to humanity's progress towards a better life. His country had no national declaration of human rights but long precedent and daily practice had established a sensitive and deep-rooted devotion to the further development of individual human rights.

As an example of the constant interest which the Canadian Government and people took in the subject, he mentioned that, a few months previously, the Canadian Senate and House of Commons had established a Joint Parliamentary Committee to examine an earlier text of the draft declaration of human rights. That Committee had reported favourably on the general objectives of the draft declaration and had suggested a number [41] of amendments to which he would refer at a later stage.

He congratulated the Human Rights Commission on its work and regretted that the Economic and Social Council had not found time, at its seventh session, to examine the draft before the Committee. The matter had been specifically referred to the Council by the Assembly; he hoped that the Council would find time to examine all the subjects referred to in it, as the United Nations machinery would, otherwise, be prevented from operating efficiently. In the absence of any recommendations from the Council, the Committee would have to study the draft declaration with more than usual care.

His delegation was in agreement with the objectives of the draft declaration. He pointed out, however, that the Canadian Constitution provided that matters relating to property and civil rights came exclusively within the competence of the various provincial legislatures. The extent to which his Government could act in the field of human rights was therefore circumscribed and the subject would have to be carefully studied by competent legal authorities at the proper time.

In conclusion, he reaffirmed his conviction that, with goodwill and a common belief in the importance of defining human rights in simple and unmistakable terms, the Committee would be able to approve a declaration which would be of real significance in the history of man's striving towards a greater measure of dignity and freedom.

MR. COROMINAS (Argentina) recalled that at the 89th meeting he had emphasized the necessity of including a definition of social rights in the draft declaration together with an enumeration of the social duties which men would have to assume if the rights were to be guaranteed. He had also stated that the declaration should be couched in simple terms and should be completely universal in character. It should also take into account the existing constitutions of the various countries so that it would have a juridical as well as a moral value.

He thought that, in studying the draft declaration, undue emphasis should not be placed on political considerations. The world was passing through a critical period; there was still evidence of the desire for conquest, not only territorial but also spiritual. It was therefore essential to proclaim fundamental human rights, especially social rights, which, in his opinion, should serve as a basis for the whole declaration. Throughout the world men should be given freedom from fear and should be assured of complete security. The whole cause of progress would be hindered if backward conditions were allowed to remain in any part of the world.

In his opinion, the chief objectives of the declaration were the promotion of culture, and the protection of the social rights of man. He felt sure that it would be possible to reconcile the conflicting ideological trends which were apparent in [42] the world. The declaration would encourage men to live according to humanitarian ideals after the terrible sufferings of the war.

In conclusion, he re-emphasized the importance of including basic social rights in the declaration, which was to be universal in its application. Only if those basic social rights were guaranteed to all men would they be able to develop spiritually and live together in harmony and concord.

MR. ANZE MATIENZO (Bolivia) congratulated the Human Rights Commission on its work. His delegation agreed in principle with the draft declaration under discussion but would make suggestions for the improvement of individual articles at a later stage.

Latin America had, at one time, prepared a document setting forth basic human rights, to be guaranteed to all people without any distinction. Since then the world had been plunged into war and the sufferings of mankind during that war had made even clearer the necessity of proclaiming and protecting human rights throughout the world. An international declaration would have immense moral and political value and it should be universal in its application. In order to maintain peaceful internal conditions in each State, the legitimate rights of citizens and the corresponding duties of Governments should be recognized.

It was one of the duties of the United Nations to proclaim fundamental human rights, but it should also ensure the implementation of the principles which it proclaimed. The declaration of human rights, when adopted, should provide effective protection against persecution. Such protection was a fundamental right and that principle was included in the constitutions of many Latin American States. The declaration would have to go beyond national frontiers, and national sovereignty would have to be subordinated to international requirements. He emphasized the need for the right of asylum, which had been included in the agreements drawn up both at Montevideo and at Bogotá. The need for the protection of minorities and ethnical groups should also be remembered.

He regarded the draft declaration as a new international constitution, whereby the rights of States were limited in the interests of the rights of individuals and he hoped that it would become an integral part of international law.

THE CHAIRMAN said that, as well as the document prepared at Bogotá, the Committee should consider the document drawn up by the XXXVIIth Inter-Parliamentary Conference (A/C.3/221). He also drew attention to a document compiled by the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization which contained the opinions of eminent contemporary philosophers on the subject of human rights.<sup>4</sup>

MR. DE LEÓN (Panama) stated that his delegation attached great importance to the declaration of human rights: at the San Francisco Conference it had submitted a draft on the subject which had been used as a basis for discussion. It was to be hoped that the declaration would serve as a complement to the United Nations Charter.

[4] See UNESCO/PHS/3(Rev.).

[43]

He wished to object to the oft-repeated sophistry that the United Nations was helpless to prevent violation of human rights because under Article 2, paragraph 7 of the Charter it could not interfere in matters which were within the domestic jurisdiction of States. The Charter also included provisions concerning human rights. Article 2, paragraph 7 dealt only with questions which fell exclusively within domestic jurisdiction, and could not apply to matters covered under international law. Consequently, it could not be invoked in the case under discussion. If the Charter had any significance at all, human rights were international; they were the common property of all mankind. He reserved the right to propose certain amendments when the declaration was considered article by article.

MR. CAÑAS (Costa Rica) said that, although the Committee was meeting in a time of crisis, his delegation's attitude was an optimistic one. It was a matter for pride that, at a time when individual rights seemed fated to bow before the tyranny of State rights, an international meeting had produced a draft declaration of human rights. While the draft declaration was not perfect, and contained certain passages which required clarification, the Committee would undoubtedly improve it. Mr. Cañas was prepared to vote in favour of all amendments tending to that end.

Certain clauses and articles should be added to the declaration which would make it clear that the individual human being was not to be regarded as subordinate to the State. The Costa Rican delegation had opposed and would continue to oppose USSR proposals tending to place the interests of the State above those of the individual. The Government of a State could fall into the hands of a small group which could exploit and oppress the rest of the population. The declaration should ensure primary importance to the rights of the individual. Mr. Cañas could not agree to any compromise of that principle, nor to the exclusion of any rights already stated in the draft declaration.

He called attention to the fact that article 11 of the draft declaration was in practice disregarded in a number of countries. The same might be true of a number of other articles. It was necessary to ensure that the domestic legislation of the various States gave any men the right to live and to express themselves freely. The case of Hitlerite Germany had shown that a State which placed its interests above those of its individual citizens entered upon the path which led to war. The declaration should be a weapon with which to oppose and combat that concept.

In the struggle between man and the State, the Costa Rican delegation was proud to embrace the cause of man.

[44]

It supported the Colombian proposal that the declaration should contain a mention of the inalienable right of all men to resist oppression.

MR. SAINT-LOT (Haiti) said that his Government nurtured in the tradition of the Declaration of the Rights of Man and of the Citizen of 1789, and practising political, economic and social democracy, wished to congratulate the Human Rights Commission on the fact that most of the rights granted by the Constitution of Haiti had found expression in the declaration.

Haiti wished to lend its support to all those who fought for freedom, equality and justice, and would do its utmost to make the declaration not an abstract document but an instrument of practical value to the oppressed everywhere. It would cooperate with all men of goodwill to ensure the universality of the application of the human rights enumerated in the draft declaration.

MR. RAMÍREZ MORENO (Colombia) said that, having studied the documents before the Third Committee exhaustively, he wished to congratulate the Human Rights Commission on its splendid work. The Chairman of that Commission, in particular, served as an example and inspiration to all those who were fighting for human rights.

The covenant on human rights was, of course, a more important document than the declaration of human rights. The declaration, good as it was, would gain in stature if its provisions were more concrete and its style were more forceful and passionate, as befitted a document of that nature.

There appeared to be basic agreement concerning the broad lines of the declaration; it was to be hoped that no rift would become evident later. The Colombian representative observed that each delegation had the right to express its opinion with respect to the draft declaration, but that direct criticism of any given country should be avoided. Personal considerations should be forgotten in dealing with the noble concepts contained in the draft declaration.

The authors of the draft declaration did not intend to interfere in relations between Governments or in relations between the Government and the citizens of any State; they intended simply to establish a set of principles, which should, if possible, be implemented. The declaration expressed the same love of mankind that had moved all great political thinkers since Plato; it should contain philosophical precepts as well as basic principles of human rights and should represent a step forward in human progress.

Mr. Ramírez Moreno proclaimed his faith in mankind and in the United Nations' ability to serve it. Eventually mankind would triumph over all the obstacles in its path. The results of the work upon which the Committee was engaged [45] should be of great significance, even though they might be merely the seed of a tree which would bear fruit at a much later time.

A great deal of painstaking and methodical work had gone into the drafting of the declaration. Nevertheless, it could still be improved. As men lived in social and family groups, the declaration ought to recognize that fact and state the rights of such groups as well as of individuals. The Colombian representative had certain criticisms to make with respect to a few articles in the draft declaration. Thus, the words "involuntary servitude" in article 4, paragraph 1, did not appear satisfactory; servitude of any kind was inadmissible. Article 10, on the other hand, combined a number of totally unrelated items. Those items should be separated and restated in clearer terms.

The draft declaration might also make mention of the right to own property jointly, and of the mutual obligation existing between capital and labour. It should deal with the whole problem of the grinding and humiliating poverty which permitted man to survive but broke his spirit. It should state the right of the worker to share in profits. If it could thus come to grips with the problem of economic insecurity, it would indeed constitute a great achievement on the part of the United Nations.

Article 21 did not go far enough; it should contain measures to prevent exploitation of workers by trade unions as well as by employers, and should protect both capital and labour. In the field of education, there should be no official interference between parents and children. The declaration could not and should not impose a standard of family relationships.

Mr. Ramírez Moreno recalled that democracy meant the rule of the majority in the interests of all. Several minority groups banding together to impose their will upon the rest could not properly be called a democratic Government; a democratic Government was one which, chosen by the majority, gave equal opportunities to majority and minority groups.

The meeting rose at 1:30 p.m.

A/C.3/215

2 October 1948

Original Text: French

Brazil: Amendment to second part of Article 1

Amend the second sentence to read:

“Created in the image and likeness of God, they are endowed with reason and conscience, and should act towards one another in a spirit of brotherhood.”

A/C.3/216

2 October 1948

Original Text: French, Spanish

Cuba: Amendment to the Draft Declaration

Insert in the text of the Declaration an Article worded as follows:

“Any person shall have the right to offer appropriate resistance to manifest acts of oppression or tyranny.”

A/C.3/SR.91<sup>6</sup>

2 October 1948

Summary Record of the Ninety-First Meeting [of the Third Committee]

HeId at the Palais de Chaillot, Paris, on Saturday,
2 October 1948, at 10:30 a.m.

Chairman: MR. CHARLES MALIK (Lebanon).

<sup>6</sup> The text of the document is from Official Records of the General Assembly, Third Session, 1948, pp. 45–53.

12. Draft international declaration of human rights (E/800) (continued)

MR. ALVARADO (Peru) expressed his country's keen interest in the subject of human rights, emphasizing in particular freedom of thought and of information. The principle of liberty had always inspired his country. He was, therefore, [46] pleased to welcome the draft declaration on behalf of his delegation and to congratulate the Human Rights Commission, and especially the Chairman on the important work accomplished in an extremely critical period of the world's history.

He referred to the brilliant analyses of the draft declaration made at the seventh session of the Economic and Social Council<sup>1</sup> by the representatives of Brazil and the United States and suggested that the Committee should take them into account in its consideration of the subject.

In his opinion the draft declaration had some defects, such as confusion between rights and obligations and the omission of any mention of the problem of minorities. The document, therefore, required careful study and he thought that a comparison with the Bogotá declaration would be helpful.

He supported the proposal made by the representative of Cuba (90th meeting) that a sub-committee should be set up to study the draft declaration in detail and to compare it with other relevant documents, especially the declaration drawn up at Bogotá.

MR. MODZIELEWSKI (Poland) said that the constitution of his country was based on the principle of equality for all citizens without any discrimination whatever. Freedom of the Press, freedom of religion and of conscience and all the social rights were fully guaranteed. The principal objective of his country's economic plan was to raise the standard of living of the workers and to guarantee full employment. Not only were the rights of the people guaranteed in the constitution, but there were also provisions in the Polish penal code whereby any incitement to a war of aggression or to national, racial or religious hatred was punishable by varying terms of imprisonment. In that field the achievements of his country went beyond the provisions of the draft declaration, which was, in his opinion, too abstract to be of much practical value. It was essential to put its principles into practice and to do away with all inequality in the social field.

The world was passing through a critical stage; in order to justify the hopes placed in it, the declaration should strengthen the forces of peace and democracy. It had been alleged that the word "democracy" was difficult to define but that had not been the case during the war when all truly democratic peoples had been united against fascism. The task of democracy was still to fight against fascism and it should be stated that the basic purpose of the declaration was to prevent any renewal of fascism. It should also be stated that anyone attempting to revive fascism and to provoke a new war should not be entitled to enjoy the rights set forth in the declaration. The draft declaration in its existing form was unsatisfactory in that respect, as it contained only one mention of the word “democracy” and made no provision for limiting the application of the rights.

He thought that the application of article 12, granting the right of asylum, article 17 granting freedom of opinion and expression and article

<sup>[1]</sup> See Official Records of the Economic and Social Council, Third Year, Seventh Session, 215th meeting.

[47]

18 granting freedom of assembly and association, should be limited so that fascists would not be able to profit by those provisions in order to overthrow democracy.

In his opinion, the draft declaration should include the following principles:

1. That the granting of political rights was useless unless social and economic rights were also guaranteed;
2. That the granting of rights was dependent on the fulfilment of obligations;
3. That the rights should be granted to all without discrimination, to the peoples of Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories as well as to those of sovereign States;
4. That the adoption of the declaration should not entail any interference in the domestic jurisdiction of sovereign States.

Several articles of the draft were unsatisfactory in that last respect.

There were several omissions in the draft before the Committee, such as the omission of the right of nations to use their own language and to develop their own culture. The document did, however, contain many good points and it was urgent that a declaration of human rights should be adopted and implemented as soon as possible. In his opinion, many of the defects of the draft were the result of an arbitrary rejection of the proposals put forward by his delegation and that of the USSR. He therefore urged representatives to give all amendments due consideration so that a satisfactory document could be produced and speedily adopted.

SIR BENEGAL NARSINGA RAU (India), whose country had been represented on the Human Rights Commission, agreed in principle with the draft declaration as it stood.

His country's draft constitution, which would soon be considered by the Constituent Assembly, embodied most of the rights set forth in the draft declaration. Those rights could be divided into two broad categories, justiciable rights, and those requiring positive action on the part of the State but which could not be enforced through courts of law. The justiciable rights were recognized as fundamental in the new Indian constitution and other rights, such as those mentioned in article 21 of the draft declaration: “the right to work, to just and favourable conditions of work and pay and to protection against unemployment”, were included in a separate chapter. That chapter set forth the guiding principles of State policy and the rights mentioned in it, though not enforceable by law were regarded as fundamental.

The draft declaration was not strictly a legal document and it was not therefore necessary to examine the wording in great detail. Its meaning was reasonably clear and he urged its speedy adoption, for, although it would not be legally binding, it would have a certain amount of force and might help to dispel pessimism and disillusionment and to relieve the tension of the current world situation.

MR. CHANG (China) stated that the draft international declaration of human rights which [48] the General Assembly was about to adopt was a timely and noble document, for which there was urgent need. The Charter committed all Member States to the observance of human rights; the declaration stated those rights explicitly. It was only proper that their final formulation should take place in France, the birthplace of modern ideas of freedom.

In the eighteenth century, when progressive ideas with respect to human rights had been first put forward in Europe, translations of Chinese philosophers had been known to and had inspired such thinkers as Voltaire, Quesnay and Diderot in their humanistic revolt against feudalistic conceptions. Chinese ideas had been intermingled with European thought and sentiment on human rights at the time when that subject had been first speculated upon in modern Europe.

Stress should be laid upon the human aspect of human rights. A human being had to be constantly conscious of other men, in whose society he lived. A lengthy process of education was required before men and women realized the full value and obligations of the rights granted to them in the declaration; it was only when that stage had been achieved that those rights could be realized in practice. It was therefore necessary that the declaration should be approved as soon as possible, to serve as a basis and a programme for the humanization of man.

A declaration of human rights should be brief and readily understandable by all. It should be a document for all men everywhere, not merely for lawyers and scholars. It was with that object in mind that the Chinese delegation had introduced, at the third session of the Commission on Human Rights, a brief declaration containing ten articles<sup>2</sup> and it was gratified by the fact that the document had aided in making the present draft declaration clear and relatively brief.

The Chinese delegation would give its general support to the draft declaration in its existing form, and reserved the right to present suggestions during the detailed examination of that document.

COUNT CARTON DE WIART (Belgium) stated that his country and his Government welcomed the draft declaration of human rights, a document which gave full recognition to the "dignity and worth of the human person". The declaration, even when followed by the covenant, would necessitate no changes in Belgium's liberal constitution. In fact, too narrow an interpretation of article 12, dealing with the right of asylum, might present the only difficulty, as Belgium's tradition of hospitality and laws regarding extradition were perhaps more generous than the corresponding provisions in the declaration. It was, however for each country to make its own interpretation.

The draft declaration was the result of a compromise between differing points of views. It could therefore not be perfect, but it was eminently satisfactory. The Belgian delegation welcomed particularly the addition of social rights to those proclaimed in the Declaration of the Rights of Man and of the Citizen of 1789; the progress achieved since those days was thus put on record.

<sup>[2]</sup> See E/CN.4/102.

[49]

The draft declaration assigned to the institution of the family and to the rights of women the importance they deserve. The rights of the child were mentioned only in article 22; those rights had, however, been fully covered in a special declaration on the subject published some years previously.

While article 27 mentioned man's duties to the community, no mention was made of his duties towards his neighbour, his family, or himself. In dealing with that subject, mankind had as yet been unable to improve upon the precept underlying the Ten Commandments: "Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself".

The Belgian representative hoped that the General Assembly would adopt the draft declaration at its current session, both as a tribute to France and because it was important for the United Nations to give to the waiting world a tangible proof of its activity and usefulness. He reserved the right to make further comments at a subsequent discussion.

MR. BARODY (Saudi Arabia) briefly called attention to the fact that the declaration was based largely on Western patterns of culture, which were frequently at variance with the patterns of culture of Eastern States. That did not mean, however, that the declaration went counter to the latter, even if it did not conform to them.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) remarked that the statements made by previous speakers proved that there had been a need for a general debate.

The Chilean delegation had participated in the drafting of the declaration from the very beginning; it shared, in the main, the views of other Latin-American delegations, having been nurtured in the same traditions and therefore having a similar conception of the rights and duties of man.

According to the suggestion made by the Cuban representative at the previous meeting, Mr. Santa Cruz, as one of those who had helped to draft the declaration, was prepared to furnish explanations to other representatives concerning the reasoning which had made the declaration what it was.

Tremendous difficulties had been involved in preparing a declaration of human rights which would meet the frequently divergent views of fifty-eight States. It had been necessary to reconcile the different ideologies of the Soviet Union and other Eastern European countries and of the other Members of the United Nations; the difference between the economic and social rights recognized by Christian Western civilization and those recognized by the Oriental civilization; the varying legal systems of Latin and Anglo-Saxon countries.

[50]

It should not be forgotten that the draft declaration was a result of two years' painstaking effort by several organs of the United Nations to reach a compromise, acceptable at least to the majority, of all those conflicting views. The text of the Bogotá declaration had not been overlooked. While there was not complete concordance between it and the draft declaration, it had been given thorough consideration, and many of its articles had been accepted. Mr. Santa Cruz did not think, therefore, that it was advisable to form a sub-committee to effect a concordance, as had been suggested by the Cuban representative (90th meeting). Every delegation that wished to do so could, of course, propose any portion of the Bogotá text as an amendment to the draft declaration.

The Chilean representative agreed with the Chairman of the Commission on Human Rights, Mrs. Roosevelt, that the draft declaration was not perfect; in the circumstances, it could not be perfect. It was essential, however, that it should be adopted at the current session, so that the world might know what, according to the United Nations, were the basic rights of man within society and the State. An adequate statement of those rights was contained in the draft declaration.

Thus, article 3, which was the spiritual basis of the declaration, stated that everyone had the right to life, liberty and security of person. Article 20 contained a promise of social security. Article 26 stressed the need for a good international, as well as social, order. Finally, article 28 represented a guarantee against abuses.

In reply to the criticism of the representative of the Union of South Africa, who had said that the draft declaration went beyond the Charter, Mr. Santa Cruz remarked that the draft declaration merely stated, explicitly, rights granted by the Charter. Considerable emphasis had been laid on the difference between the declaration and the covenant on human rights. While he agreed that the covenant alone would be legally binding, violation by any State of the rights enumerated in the declaration would mean violation of the principles of the United Nations.

The views expressed by the Polish representative and shared by the USSR delegation resulted from a different conception of life and man. The draft declaration rested on the assumption that the interests of the individual came before those of the State and that the State should not be allowed to deprive the individual of his dignity and his basic rights. The opposing conception was that the rights of the individual must give precedence to the interests of society.

With respect to the detailed criticism given by the Polish representative, Mr. Santa Cruz remarked that article 12, far from extending protection to fascists, guaranteed freedom from persecution. Paragraph 2 of that article made clear that acts contrary to the purposes and principles of the United Nations – as fascist acts certainly were – should be punished. The social rights which the Polish representative had championed were adequately covered in articles 20, 21 and 22. It was precisely those social rights which represented [51] a degree of progress over previous declarations of a similar nature, and the General Assembly could feel justifiable pride in approving them.

The Chilean representative reserved the right to make further comments at a later stage.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) said it was perhaps superfluous to emphasize his country's concern for human rights, since from the time of the San Francisco Conference, the records of the Organization gave ample evidence of its great interest. His country was also anxious to see the declaration adopted at the current session of the General Assembly.

Most countries owed their formation to geographical, economic or political factors; Lebanon on the other hand, owed its existence to the concept of the rights of man. It was its faith in those principles that justified its existence and should it lose that faith, it would be because it had no wish to exist. This attitude gave it no feeling of superiority; on the contrary, it was a serious responsibility. Further, the fact that other countries respected those rights even though their existence had not been based upon them, aroused its admiration.

From the great Western democracies, Lebanon hoped to learn more about the implementation of civic and social rights; from the USSR, more concerning economic rights, and perhaps from other countries more about legal and political rights. However, it was not enough for men to have a belief in economic, social and political rights; they had also to have the intelligence and the will to pursue the ultimate good.

The Lebanese delegation was generally satisfied with the draft of the declaration, although it would have a certain number of amendments to put forward at the appropriate time.

Even if the declaration had to be considered as nothing more than a recommendation, it would still have more force than any other recommendation, for it was not a judgment passed by certain States on the behaviour of others. Nor was it mere pious talk, for no State could violate its principles without also violating the terms of the Charter. In actual fact, the resolution for its adoption was more than a recommendation because there already existed a place in the Charter for a declaration of human rights. Human rights were mentioned too many times throughout the Charter for that not to be so. The implicit agreement concerning human rights, which was reflected in the Charter, was stated clearly in the declaration.

If it was true that political rivalries influenced decisions in the economic and social sphere, it should be made clear that the declaration was free from any political taint. Through its adoption, the peoples of the world would be able to renew their badly-shaken faith and belief in the value of man.

MR. IMPERIAL (Philippines) said that after hearing the distinguished speakers who had preceded him and in particular, the representatives of the Latin-American countries, and after having [52] taken into consideration the documentation from the Secretariat he had come to the conclusion that a declaration on the rights of man was an absolute necessity.

The Committee in general seemed to share his point of view and the disagreement which existed related to the formulation of the various rights. In accordance with the principles embodied in the Philippine Constitution, he supported the adoption of a complete code which would include duties as well as rights.

In his opinion, the primary purpose of the declaration was not simply to achieve a moral success, but to enable man, all over the world, to develop his rights and, in consequence, his personality. It was essential that man should feel confident that executive, legislative and judicial powers could not impair his fundamental rights. To that end, he supported the adoption of a simple declaration which would not contain possible points of controversy.

The most difficult thing to achieve would not be agreement on the basic human rights but on the measures by which they were to be implemented. He hoped that members of the Commission on Human Rights would explain the reasons for the inclusion of the various articles of the draft declaration when that part of the question came before the Committee for discussion.

MR. QUADROS (Uruguay) pointed out that his country was a small one, whose strength rested on its respect for civil liberties and for international law. Since all were members of the human species, it was difficult to understand how discrimination could exist. Moreover, the State was simply a system of co-operation, to which man should never be sacrificed.

In his opinion, there were no circumstances in which a Government could be permitted to do away with individual liberties. The inviolability of the person had to be respected. The government had to safeguard the individual and his family in respect of housing, in health, old age, etc. The social order of a State would be disrupted if those fundamental rights were not recognized not only for men but also for women and for aliens.

A Government had to be established by free popular vote. There should exist a certain amount of private enterprise, regulated but not controlled by the Government.

The Uruguayan delegation supported the draft declaration in general and would submit its amendments at the appropriate time. It was convinced that the declaration would not simply remain a historic document, but that its various provisions would be implemented.

MR. KAYALY (Syria) observed that the proposal to adopt a declaration on human rights was not unprecedented, for the history of man was the story for his struggle for liberty. An attempt was being made to formulate, in the name of the Member States and under the terms of the Charter, a code of social behaviour which would set forth the elements necessary for spiritual and material happiness.

[53]

The State had to recognize its duty towards the individual and each individual had to come to a knowledge of his rights and duties. The adoption of the declaration would not be a useless gesture, for there would be no point in committing those principles to paper if they were not to be respected in international behaviour.

He said his delegation would support the draft declaration.

The meeting rose at 1:5 p.m.

A/C.3/SR.92<sup>7</sup>

2 October 1948

Summary Record of the Ninety-Second Meeting
[of the Third Committee]

Held at the Palais de Chaillot, Paris, on Saturday,
2 October 1948, at 3:15 p.m.

Chairman: MR. CHARLES MALIK (Lebanon).

13. Draft international declaration of human rights (E/800) (continued)

MR. PUZA (Venezuela) stated that his delegation wished to take an active part in considering the question of human rights, one of the most important items on the Third Committee's agenda. His delegation was actuated by a sense of understanding and the desire to achieve a code of specific rules.

The rights of man were guaranteed in the Constitution of Venezuela, which was inspired by the same lofty principles as those contained in the preamble to the draft declaration of human rights. Moreover, his country had recently signed a similar declaration.

The delegation of Venezuela would confine itself to presenting its views on the best procedure for arriving at a satisfactory agreement. Previous debates had shown a unanimous desire to draw up an international instrument of definite value. The time had come to make that desire a reality. A difficulty, however, had arisen. These were differences not only between the various national bodies of law but also between such national legislation and many of the provisions contained in articles of the draft declaration. Every point was liable to give rise to prolonged discussion, and detailed consideration article by article, would increase the length of the debates.

<sup>7</sup> The text of the document is from Official Records of the General Assembly, Third Session, 1948, pp. 53–64.

The delegation of Venezuela therefore made the following proposal:

“To create a working sub-committee consisting of a small number of members who, on the basis of texts on human rights submitted for the Third Committee’s consideration, would make a preliminary draft, listing the points on which the legislations of Member States coincided, and propose a draft recommendation on points with regard to which divergences existed. In drafting those texts the sub-committee would also give due consideration to the American Declaration of the Rights and Duties of Man signed at Bogotá, as well as to all other documents pertinent to the matter, such as the declaration of the XXXVIIth Inter-Parliamentary Conference held at Rome. As soon as those texts were drafted, they would be submitted for the Committee’s consideration.”

[54]

Although at first sight the proposal might appear likely to delay the Committee’s work, it would, in fact, help to speed it up by avoiding unnecessary discussion, at least in so far as points on which there was agreement were concerned. The objection might be raised that the texts before the Committee were the result of long deliberations in the course of which divergences of doctrine and law had been considered. Nevertheless, the greatly divergent views expressed during the previous two days showed the need to set up a working sub-committee where not only personal views, but also the different national legislations would be compared.

Moreover, the only completed text was that of the draft declaration of human rights. It would, of course, have to be supplemented by the covenant, in which the general principles laid down in the declaration would be further defined. In view of the need for a thorough drafting of the texts before the Committee, the creation of a working sub-committee seemed essential. Such a sub-committee would also be necessary in order to co-ordinate the texts of the amendments submitted by various delegations.

The Committee would thus have to consider two texts, one acceptable to all and the other a recommendation from countries of more advanced legislation, designed to induce less-advanced countries to review their laws on the subject.

The delegation of Venezuela requested the Chairman to submit that proposal to the Committee’s consideration immediately upon the termination of the general discussion and before the examination of any other point, in view of the fact that it concerned the method of work.

MR. DE ATHAYDE (Brazil) paid a tribute to the work of the Commission on Human Rights and its distinguished Chairman, Mrs. Roosevelt. He stressed the importance which his Government attached to an early and satisfactory conclusion of the Committee's work so as not to disappoint the general public.

The historical development of the Brazilian people had taken place under the influence of the philosophic principles which had come to their full development in France. The draft declaration of human rights was based on the most ancient ideas of the great philosophers and on the concept that the power of the State must rest on the respect for the human person. It was a concrete expression of that trend of thought which now shaped the conscience of nations.

The delegation of Brazil pressed for the early adoption of measures to guarantee human rights on an international level, for without them it was to be feared that the principles of the Charter would remain ineffective. By making human rights international, the United Nations Charter had placed upon States positive legal obligations; it was the greatest of the victories achieved at the cost of the sacrifices made during the Second World War. Although the Brazilian delegation would like to see the declaration, the covenant and the suggestions for implementation discussed and approved together, it recognized that, at the present stage of the work, only the declaration could be adopted during the current session of the [55] General Assembly. It would demand, however, that adoption should not be postponed.

In order to safeguard the rights it proclaimed, the declaration should not be couched in too general terms. It should include, in the preamble, a reference to God as the absolute origin of the rights of man and of all rights. That would be an acknowledgment of the importance of the great spiritual trends towards the maintenance and development of international co-operation among the nations. That importance, recognized in many constitutions, was fully brought out by the current crisis in which many historians would see the crisis of a society which had permitted its ties to God to be weakened. The work of the Committee would reflect much more clearly the desires and hopes of the popular masses if, instead of being merely the expression of a barren agnostic philosophy, it also reflected the religious faith of the greater part of humanity.

The delegation of Brazil therefore suggested that the second part of article 1 of the declaration should read as follows (A/C.3/215):

“Created in the image and likeness of God, they are endowed with reason and conscience, and should act towards one another in a spirit of brotherhood.”

Without wishing to enter on a philosophic or religious discussion, the delegation of Brazil thought that its proposal corresponded to the ideals of the members of the Committee.

It would demand, however, that adoption should not be postponed.

MR. WATT (Australia) pointed out that his country had made its opinion known in the Commission on Human Rights, and that he would therefore limit his remarks to a few general comments.

The Australian delegation considered that the draft declaration of human rights represented a considerable advance towards a satisfactory definition of the “fundamental human rights” referred to in the Charter. It was not a perfect document, either in substance or form, and in both respects it was of course open to amendment in the Committee. The declaration, however, was the product of months of hard and conscientious work during which very different points of view had been taken into consideration, and for that reason the amendments proposed by the Committee should not be allowed to destroy its basic balance. While it was the right of every delegation to request a complete recasting of the document, the Australian delegation considered that, generally speaking, the draft declaration before the Committee was adequate for its purpose, and that it was advisable to “leave well enough alone”.

Furthermore, the Third Committee should examine that part of the report of the Commission on Human Rights (E/800) dealing with the work already done on a draft covenant and on the suggestions for implementation. The fact that the work on those two last instruments was not as advanced as the work on the declaration did not mean that the two former were less important than the latter. In the belief that the effective exercise of human rights was at least equal in importance to the proclamation of those rights, Australia had proposed, at the Peace Conference of 1946, the establishment of an international [56] tribunal to which individuals, or groups of individuals, could bring cases concerning infringement of their rights. In spite of doubts in some quarters as to the immediate practicability of such a suggestion, several Members of the United Nations had given their support to the idea. Furthermore, the Congress for Europe, held recently at The Hague, had adopted a resolution calling for the establishment of a court of justice to which any citizen of the associated countries could submit any case concerning violation of his rights as formulated in a bill of human rights.<sup>8</sup>

There could be no proper safeguard for human rights until an adequate remedy for infringement of rights had been provided. The Commission on Human Rights had itself stressed in its report the importance of that subsequent part of its work. Mr. Watt hoped that after the work on the declaration was completed, the Third Committee would be able to hear the views of the delegations on the subject of the means for ensuering the exercise of human rights.

<sup>8</sup> The Congress of Europe was held in The Hague from 7 to 11 May 1948 under the auspices of the International Committee of the Movements for European Unity, with Winston Churchill as its honorary president. At the opening session, Churchill said: “In the centre of our movement stands the idea of a Charter of Human Rights, guarded by freedom and sustained by law” (cited in A. W. Brian Simpson, Human Rights and the End of Empire, Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2001, at p. 605). The following year, the Council of Europe was created and drafting of its central human rights instrument, the European Convention on Human Rights, begun. The Convention, which entered into force in 1953, provides for the European Court of Human Rights, although the Court was not established until 1959.

The Australian delegation expressed its appreciation of the American Declaration of the Rights and Duties of Man drawn up at Bogotá by the Ninth International Conference of American States. His delegation sympathized with the wish expressed by certain delegations that the draft declaration before the Committee should contain certain amendments based on the Bogotá declaration. It did not, however, consider it advisable to set up a small sub-committee to compare the two texts. Such a task would involve long delay and the risk of upsetting the basic balance of the draft which had been drawn up by the Commission after months of hard work, during which many national and cultural points of views had been considered as well as many texts, including the Bogotá declaration itself, which represented the point of view of the Latin-American nations. The Third Committee should not take over the work of the Commission on Human Rights. He reserved the right to submit observations later on certain specific points of the draft under discussion.

MR. INSFRAN (Paraguay) spoke highly of the work of the Commission on Human Rights and its Chairman, Mrs. Roosevelt. The practical application of the principles set forth in the declaration would be very difficult if they remained purely theoretical. The framing of the declaration and of the measures for its implementation must be carried on side by side. The delegation of Paraguay would heartily support all efforts to that end.

It also endorsed the view expressed by the representative of Argentina that the declaration of human rights should be accompanied by a similar declaration on the duties of man. A close tie existed between those two questions which should find expression in the proposed document. The lofty principles proclaimed in the declaration should be accompanied by a definite instrument providing for their application.

The delegation of Paraguay affirmed its devotion to the cause of human rights which had also been manifested in its attitude at the Bogotá [57] Conference and at the conference of the Inter-Parliamentary Union held in Rome.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) thought that the speakers who had taken part in the general discussion could be divided into three classes.

First, there were those who considered that the declaration went too far and who desired to retrace their steps. They, like the representative of the Union of South African for example, were unwilling to grant certain peoples all the rights specified in the declaration. Mr. Pavlov described such an attitude as reactionary. Another class, to which the United States representative belonged, expressed their lack of enthusiasm about certain articles and felt that the draft represented the maximum which could be accepted. They were unwilling to make any concession to progressive ideas, because that acceptable maximum was an indication of the existing state of bourgeois society.

The third class, to which the USSR belonged, felt that the draft was not sufficiently democratic and that it should go beyond the stage of incomplete and purely formal democracy which characterized bourgeois society.

He drew the Committee's attention to the opinion of his delegation, expressed in the report of the Commission on Human Rights (E/800). The three conditions which were, in the opinion of the USSR delegation, indispensable to the completion of the declaration of human rights were specified herein: a guarantee of basic freedoms for all, without distinction as to race, religion, language, occupation or sex, with due regard to the national sovereignty of States; a guarantee that human rights could be exercised with due regard to the particular economic, social and national circumstances prevailing in each country; a definition of the duties of citizens to their country, their people and their State.

He considered that the basic draft did not satisfy those three requirements. He mentioned the various defects and omissions. Many clauses (for example articles 21, 22, 24 and 25) were purely legal and formal in nature.

The declaration did not sufficiently widen the field of the democratic rights of peoples. The word "democratic" was mentioned only once in the entire document, in article 27.

A great many democratic rights were too limited, even more limited than they had been in the original draft studied in Geneva.

It was likewise to be regretted that fascism was nowhere condemned in the draft.

He deplored the fact that the declaration did not define the obligations of citizens to their State and that it did not bring out the principle of national sovereignty.

The majority of the Commission on Human Rights had rejected all the proposals which the USSR delegation had submitted with a view to improving the draft declaration.<sup>1</sup> They had rejected the proposals for extending the democratic rights to colonial peoples and of the populations of Non-Self-Governing Territories. They had also opposed the proposal for granting equal rights to both sexes. The Soviet Union proposal that the State should ensure freedom of the Press by making available every possible facility, had been interpreted as a request for the nationalization of the Press. That was only one example of the way in which the USSR point of view was being libellously misrepresented.

<sup>[1]</sup> See Official Records of the Economic and Social Council, Third Year, Seventh Session, Supplement No. 2, appendix, page 31.

[58]

He pointed out that his delegation had vainly urged that freedom of the Press and the right of assembly should not be permitted to serve the ends of fascist propaganda. He was astonished to find that, in the capital of a country which had suffered so much at the hands of the fascists, some people went so far as to defend the principle of freedom of propaganda for fascists.

The delegation of the Soviet Union had supported the principle of free general elections by secret ballot. The United Kingdom had, however, opposed extending that right to the populations of Non-Self-Governing Territories on the pretext that they were not yet sufficiently mature from the political point of view.

The USSR delegation had likewise emphasized the right of asylum for those who were persecuted for their part in the struggle for the liberation of peoples or for their scientific activities, but that right had been rejected by the majority of the Commission on Human Rights. The colonial Powers had also succeeded in securing the rejection of the proposal which asserted that minorities had the right to national culture, although that right had been included in the original draft.

Finally, the principle that national sovereignty should be respected had also been rejected, although it was in accordance with Article 2, paragraph 7 of the Charter.

He recognized, nevertheless, that a number of rights did not appear in the declaration. That to his mind, was due to the influence on world opinion of the existence of the progressive constitutions of the Soviet Union and the new democracies. But the rights specified in the drafts were illusory as they lacked effective guarantees.

The USSR delegation felt that the draft declaration could not contribute to democratic progress, nor could it prevent the reappearance of fascism or help to strengthen world peace. His delegation therefore reserved the right to put forward numerous amendments.

He then made some observations on the draft international covenant on human rights which in his opinion was not sufficiently developed. He noted that there was no adequate definition of the right to work. He pointed out that some articles merely laid down a principle in a few lines whereas the exceptions to the right thus defined were subsequently treated at great length. That was particularly the case in article 5, on the right to life, and in article 9, on the right to freedom.

With regard to the suggestions for implementation, he observed that there was no general plan. The various plans submitted by the representatives of the United States, China, France and [59] Australia and by the Drafting Committee were far from being in agreement. They did, however, show a common tendency to appeal to existing international institutions, such as the International Court of Justice, or to set up similar institutions to implement the guarantees bearing on human rights. That procedure would represent interference in the domestic affairs of States, in disregard of national sovereignty. They would furthermore tend to transform internal disputes into international disputes, thus endangering world peace. The USSR delegation considered that those proposals were in contradiction to the Charter.

For the moment, however, the delegation of the Soviet Union felt that the Committee should restrict itself to considering the declaration on human rights.

Mr. Pavlov finally drew the Committee's attention to the Yearbook on Human Rights put out by the Secretariat, which listed the constitutional provisions in the various national legislations with regard to human rights.

BADAWI BEY (Egypt) congratulated the Commission on Human Rights and its Chairman, Mrs. Roosevelt, on the results of their work.

He stressed the difficulty of adopting a complete charter of human rights. As soon as the examination of the declaration began, differences of opinion had become evident. They would only increase when the covenant was considered. He drew the attention of the members who had advocated the drafting of a complete bill of human rights to the necessity of proceeding with care. The Charter of the United Nations had been worded with deliberate care and mentioned only faith in fundamental human rights, in the dignity and worth of the human person and in the equality of men and women. The first step should be a definition of what was meant by human rights and the adoption of a declaration of those rights.

Members of the Committee all recognized that the General Assembly should adopt, at the current session, a resolution concerning the declaration of human rights. That was to be recommended for two reasons. On the one hand, the declaration of human rights would, for the first time, be put on an international level. On the other hand, the declaration would be effective, not only in States Members of the United Nations, but also in territories over which they had jurisdiction. It was perhaps in that respect that the declaration might mark the greatest progress.

The Assembly could refer the covenant, and the measures of implementation, to the Economic and Social Council for further consideration. The Egyptian representative stated that he would then be ready to vote for the declaration.

In order to facilitate discussion, he proposed that, as soon as the general debate had ended, the Committee should take a decision on the four following questions of principle:

1. The scope of the work assigned at the current session to the Assembly. In the opinion of the Egyptian delegation, it would be preferable merely to adopt the declaration;

[60]

2. The delimitation of the sphere of the declaration on human rights and that of the declaration on the rights and duties of States respectively. The Egyptian delegation thought it would be better to omit any reference to the duties of States;

3. The nature of human rights. Those rights included public freedoms, social and economic rights. The latter must certainly be included. It was, however, very difficult to bind all States without taking into account their material potentialities.

Article 20 of the draft declaration already included a reservation on that point and, if the latter was not sufficiently explicit, a general statement might be added to the effect that the nature and scope of the measures which would have to be taken to ensure respect for all the rights included in the declaration would be specified in a subsequent instrument;

4. A statement on the duties of the individual. The Egyptian delegation felt that it would be desirable to adopt the Cuban representative's proposal. The Committee's work would be rendered easier by the setting up of a working group to consider the Bogotá declaration and also the amendments submitted by delegations before those amendments were discussed by the Committee.

His delegation would contribute to the Committee's work in the hope of reaching unanimous agreement on the draft declaration.

MR. CASSIN (France) began by expressing his delegation's gratitude to all those who, during the discussion, had recognized both France's traditional role in the definition of human rights and her share in the work of the United Nations. He also wished to pay tribute to the Secretariat's work, which had proved of great value to the Commission on Human Rights. He had no doubt that the different views expressed so far in the general discussion had helped to define the problem clearly and would make it easier to carry out the task entrusted to the Third Committee.

His delegation would, however, have desired that that task should not have been limited to the drafting of an international declaration of human rights; it would also have liked to see a complete bill of human rights prepared at the current session, comprising, in addition to the declaration, a first international convention which however imperfect, could have served as a basis for future conventions.

France, for its part, was ready to sign such a convention. His delegation had made and would continue to make a positive contribution in everything relating to the declaration, the covenant, and the measures of implementation, with a view to giving to the peoples of the world the guarantees they expected from the United Nations in the matter of their fundamental rights.

The Commission on Human Rights had unfortunately not had the necessary time to complete the whole of the programme it had mapped out. In those circumstances, he thought it prudent for the Third Committee to limit its discussion to the declaration, leaving it for the Assembly to make it understood, in one way or another, that the adoption of the declaration was merely a point of [61] departure for other measures, and that it hoped to complete in the following year the work undertaken at the current session.

His delegation, while agreeing to limit the discussion to the problem of drafting an international declaration on human rights, did not underestimate either its moral importance or its legal aspects.

From the moral point of view, it must not be forgotten that it was at the end of the San Francisco Conference that the President of the United States had, speaking in the name of the United Nations, promised the peoples of the world that respect for their essential rights would be ensured by an international bill. The time had come to fulfil that promise. The declaration of human rights was to be the expression of the rights of all the peoples of the world and not only of the fifty-eight nations then constituting the United Nations. It was therefore essential that the declaration should be universal.

The declaration was also destined to guide Governments in the determination of their policy and their national legislation. Such a declaration would not have any coercive legal force but it would, none the less, have a very real value because, on the one hand, it could be considered as an authoritative interpretation of the Charter of the United Nations and as the common standard towards which the legislations of all the Member States of the United Nations should aspire and, on the other hand, although it had no coercive power, it could not be considered as weakening in any way the pledges made by States subscribing to the Charter of the United Nations. States, for example, are compelled by the terms of the Charter to recognize the competence of the main bodies of the United Nations.

In his country's opinion, the United Nations' competence in the question of human rights was an established fact and the provisions of Article 2, paragraph 7 of the Charter, relating to matters within the domestic jurisdiction of Member States, could not be invoked against such competence when, by adoption of the declaration, the question of human rights was a matter no longer of domestic, but of international concern.

Once the competence of the United Nations was established, the latter would have to show moderation in its exercise. It was the duty of the United Nations to reassure the States which assumed the main responsibility of guaranteeing human rights within their own frontiers, without at the same time neglecting the danger represented by excessive respect for national sovereignty in questions going beyond the domestic jurisdiction of States. The violation of human rights in a given country, as shown by the precedent of Hitler, could in fact be a preliminary to an attack upon the independence of other nations. Summing up, he stated that if the competence of the United Nations should be exercised with moderation, the United Nations should not nevertheless fail to be inflexible when human rights were violated.

Regarding the guiding principles of the declaration, he observed that there could be no question of allowing the particular philosophy of one State [62] or group of States to prevail; a common denominator acceptable to all should be sought. The list of essential freedoms and rights in the draft declaration submitted to the Committee could not be considered as entirely satisfactory; but the document was as near to being well-balanced as it could be. Analysing the draft, he showed that it was not planless, as certain members of the Committee believed. It contained both the statement of the political liberties already proclaimed in the eighteenth century and the statement of the economic, social and cultural rights asserted in the twentieth century, which it was a question of establishing on an international level.

He recalled that the implementation of those rights had been a subject of lengthy discussion. His country was ready to examine the question when the time came to do so. It was possible that for the first stage of implementation a whole series of conventions might have to be considered, which would be concluded with the assistance of the specialized agencies; the assistance of the latter in that field could be very valuable.

The Commission on Human Rights had not failed to consider drawing up, at the same time as the list of human rights, a list of human duties. It had nevertheless felt it sufficient to limit itself to mentioning those duties and to note the relationship existing between human rights on the one hand and restrictions on those rights on the other. Those reservations were contained in article 27. He did not think that that article occupied the place in the declaration that its importance deserved; for it set the problem of human rights in the framework of international democratic society. While the word "democratic" appeared only once in the body of the declaration – a fact which some had criticized – it would nevertheless have had its full value if article 27, in which it appeared, thus giving its real meaning to a declaration which proposed, while recognizing the predominance of law over arbitrary action, to affirm that law could have no other source than the will of the people.

Stressing the universal aspect of the declaration, Mr. Cassin stated that it would be the first declaration accepted by an international group having its own legal competence. In fulfilling their function, the members of the Third Committee should not forget that they were something more than representatives of all humanity. It was incumbent upon them to ensure the pre-eminence of certain rights, such as the right to asylum, and the right to nationality, which had so far been proclaimed only by certain national constitutions, but which should be granted not by the State but by human society as a whole.

Dealing with the criticisms raised in connexion with the draft submitted to the Third Committee he admitted that some were justified. For his own part, his strongest criticism related to the form rather than to the substance. The declaration, which was intended to be understood by the peoples of all the countries of the world, ought to be direct and precise. But, to take only one example the preamble, while denouncing the dreadful acts of barbarism which the world had witnessed not long previously, hesitated to assign responsibility and did not denounce with proper vigour the [63] racist and racial doctrines which had been the cause of the last war. He thought that more boldness might be shown in drafting the preamble.

Dealing finally with the question of procedure, he said that from the experience gained in two years it did not seem desirable to set up small working committees, especially at the current stage of work on the declaration of human rights. The Committee could itself examine the amendments submitted; and as far as the inclusion of duties as well as rights was concerned, the question could be dealt with as it arose during the clause-by-clause examination of the draft declaration. Similarly, it did not seem necessary to entrust the study of the declaration of Bogotá to a sub-committee; the representatives who wished to draw inspiration from it need only submit amendments based on it.

In conclusion, he repeated his delegation's willingness to assist as much as possible in the drafting of a document which would secure the support of a majority of the Members of the United Nations.

MR. KAMINSKY (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic), while admitting the difficulties of the task entrusted to the Economic and Social Council by the General Assembly, regretted he had to say that after two years of work the Council and the Commission on Human Rights had not succeeded in submitting a satisfactory text to the Assembly. The declaration of human rights suffered in particular from defects of such a type that it could not be called "international". In that respect his delegation agreed entirely with the views expressed by the representative of the USSR.

Criticizing various particularly negative aspects of the draft submitted for the consideration of the Committee, he stressed the fact that the document proclaimed certain economic and social rights, but did not guarantee their implementation: the absence of any concrete measures formed one of the fundamental defects of the draft.

The declaration was also limited in its aims and showed a tendency to refuse to apply certain universally recognized democratic rights to certain groups; the preamble did not adequately stress the equality of mankind without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion; the cultural rights of national minorities were not safeguarded; and finally the declaration made no mention of individual or collective responsibility in the struggle against fascism and racialism. It was impossible to say that the draft had been prepared with the intention of ensuring the real defence of human rights. Democracy was not even mentioned, except in a reference to democratic society in the article dealing with restrictions on the exercise of certain rights.

Moreover, the draft did not establish the responsibilities of the individual towards the State: that seemed to be the result of an odd philosophy which endangered the very existence of all democratic society. The duties of the individual should be recognized as much as the duties of the State.

[64]

All the USSR delegation's proposals, which aimed at ensuring the really democratic character of the declaration of human rights, had been systematically rejected, both by the Commission on Human Rights and the Economic and Social Council. The result was that, as it stood, the declaration could not play an important part in the progress of humanity.

For that reason his delegation would give its full support to the amendments that the delegation of the Soviet Union proposed to submit to the Third Committee. It considered that the Committee should not depart from the path indicated to it. Its task was to draft an international declaration of human rights; only in carrying out that task could the Committee make a lasting contribution to the progress and development of democracy.

The meeting rose at 6:15 p.m.

A/C.3/217

4 October 1948

Dominican Republic: Amendments to the Draft Declaration of Human Rights<sup>9</sup>

Preamble

In paragraph 4, line 2, delete the word "and" and substitute a comma; line 3, after the words "human person", insert the words: "and in equality of rights as between men and women".<sup>10</sup>

Article 22

Delete paragraph 2 and substitute Article VII of the American Declaration of Rights and Duties of Man, adopted at Bogotá, which reads as follows:

"All women, during pregnancy and the nursing period, and all children have the right to special protection, care and aid."<sup>11</sup>

<sup>9</sup> The words "Draft Declaration of Human Rights" were changed to "Draft Declaration (E/800)" by A/C.3/217/Corr.1 of 6 October 1948.

<sup>10</sup> The words "and in equality of rights as between men and women" were changed to "and in the equal rights of men and women" by A/C.3/217/Corr.1 of 6 October 1948.

<sup>11</sup> This sentence was changed, pursuant to A/C.3/217/Corr.1 of 6 October 1948, to "All expectant and nursing mothers and all children have the right to special protection, care and aid."

A/C.3/224*6 October 1948*Original Text: French*Cuba: Amendments to the first nine Articles of the Draft Declaration (E/800)Article 1*

Insert the text of this article in a Preamble worded as follows, to precede the enumeration of rights:

“All men are born free and equal in dignity and rights; being endowed by nature with reason and conscience, they should act towards one another like brothers.”

Respect for the rights of all requires that each shall do his duty. In all human activity, both social and political, rights and duties are indissolubly linked with one another, while rights embrace individual freedom, duties express the dignity of that freedom.

Duties of a legal nature presuppose other duties of a moral nature which facilitate their understanding and serve as their foundation.

It is the duty of man to practise, uphold and promote culture by all means at his disposal, for culture is the highest social and historical expression of the human spirit.

Morality being the noblest product of culture, it is the duty of all to respect it at all times.”

Article 2

This article in the following wording should become Article 2 of the Declaration:

“All men are equal before the law and are entitled to the rights, and subject to the duties, laid down in this Declaration without distinction of race, birth, sex, language, religion, political opinion, or property or other status.”

This wording would also make it unnecessary to include Article 6.

Article 3

This article in the following wording should become Article 1 of the [2] Declaration:

“Every human being has the right to life, liberty, security and integrity of person.”

Article 4

Delete the first paragraph as being unnecessary after Articles 1 and transfer the second paragraph to the section dealing with purely juridical rights (Article 26: “Right to fair trial”) in the following wording:

“No one shall be subject to cruel, degrading and non-customary punishment.”

It should be noted that the idea of Article 4 is embodied by the Cuban delegation in its proposed new draft of Article 7.

Article 5

Transfer this text, worded as follows, to the beginning of the section relating to purely juridical rights (Articles 16 and following):

“Everyone has the right to recognition everywhere as possessing rights and obligations and enjoying fundamental civil rights.”

Article 6

No longer serves any purpose in view of the re-drafting of Article 2 as proposed by the Cuban delegation, and of the wording of Article 5.

Article 7

Transfer this text, worded as follows, to the section relating to purely juridical rights (Article 25: “Protection against arbitrary detention”):

“No one may be deprived of his freedom except in such cases as are covered by existing laws and in conformity with the procedure prescribed by them.

“No one may be detained for failure to carry out obligations of a purely civil character.

“Any person who has been deprived of his freedom is entitled to have the legality of the measures to which he has been subjected immediately confirmed by a judge, and to be tried without unjustifiable delay or, failing that, to be released.

“He is also entitled to humane treatment while under detention.”

Articles 8 and 9

Transfer these texts, worded as follows, to the section relating to purely juridical rights (Article 26: “Right to a fair trial”):

“Any person against whom a charge is made is presumed to be [3] innocent until proved guilty according to law.”

“Everyone charged with a penal offence has the right to an impartial and public hearing and trial by previously established tribunals in accordance with existing laws.

“Such person shall not be subjected to cruel, degrading or non-customary punishment.”

It is pointed out that the improvements made in Article 5 by the Cuban delegation’s amendments render Article 8 almost superfluous.

A/C.3/218

4 October 1948

Original Text: Spanish

Cuba: Draft Plan of Work

In order to make the International Declaration of Human Rights clearer, more precise and more easily accessible to all countries, the Cuban delegation proposes that the Third Committee adopt the following general plan for the final draft of the text under consideration:

A

Preamble

Fundamental Principles

B

Rights

- I. Fundamental rights of the person and the family.
- II. Social rights.
- III. Political and legal rights.
- IV. Scope of rights.

C

Duties

In accordance with the foregoing plan, the articles of the Draft and those of the Bogotá Declaration would be set out as follows:

APreamble*Fundamental Principles*

Freedom, equality, reason, conscience, brotherhood.

International: 1

American: Preamble

Correlation of rights and duties.

International:

American: Preamble

[2]

Supreme aims of men: spirit, culture, morality.

International:

American: Preamble

BRights*I. Fundamental rights of the person, the family and the home*

Life, liberty and security.

International: Art. 3

American: Art. I

Equality without distinctions as to sex, race or religion.

International: Art. 2

American: Art. II

Religion.

International: Art. 16

American: Art. III

Freedom of opinion and expression.

International: Art. 17

American: Art. IV

Protection of reputation.

International: Art. 10

American: Art. V

Protection of the family.

International: Art. 14

American: Art. VI

Mother and child.

International: Art. 22(2)

American: Art. VII

Home.

International: Art. 10

American: Art. IX

Correspondence.

International: Art. 10

American: Art. X

Health and wellbeing.

International: Art. 22(1)

American: Art. XI

II. Social Rights

Education.

International: Art. 23

American: Art. XII

Culture and intellectual interests.

International: Art. 25
American: Art. XIII

[3]

Work and fair remuneration.

International: Art. 21
American: Art. XIV

Leisure and its enjoyment.

International: Art. 24
American: Art. XV

Social Security.

International: Art. 20, 22
American: Art. XVI

III. Legal and Political Rights

Recognition as a person before the law.

International: Art. 5
American: Art. XVIII

Nationality.

International: Art. 13
American: Art. XIX

Participation in the government.

International: Art. 19
American: Art. XX

Movement and resident.

International: Art. 11
American: Art. VIII

Assembly.

International: Art. 18

American: Art. XXI

Association.

International: Art. 15

American: Art. XXIII

Right of petition.

International: Additional Art.

American: Art. XXIV

Protection against arbitrary arrest.

International: Art. 6, 7

American: Art. XXV

Proper trial.

International: Art. 4, 8, 9

American: Art. XXVI

[4]

Asylum.

International: Art. 12(1)

American: Art. XXVII

IV. Scope of Human Rights

International: Art. 27(2)

American: Art. XXVIII

CDuties

Society.

International: Art. 27(1)

American: Art. XXIX

Family.

International:

American: Art. XXX

Education.

American: Art. XXXI

Suffrage.

American: Art. XXXII

Law and Authority.

American: Art. XXXIII

Public Service.

American: Art. XXXIV

Social Security and Welfare.

American: Art. XXXV

Taxes.

American: Art. XXXVI

Work.

American: Art. XXXVII

Political Activities in Foreign Countries.

American: Art. XXXVIII

Note:

All the Articles of the International Declaration have been taken into account in drafting the foregoing scheme, with the exception of Articles 26 and 28, which the Cuban Delegation considers rather as duties of the State than as human rights.

A/C.3/219*4 October 1948*Netherlands: Amendment to the first paragraph of the preamble

Insert after the words “human family” the following text:

“based on man’s divine origin and immortal destiny.”

A/C.3/220*4 October 1948*Panama: Amendments to the first nine articles of the Draft DeclarationArticle 1

It is proposed that it be eliminated.

Article 2

It is proposed that this article be merged with Article 6 in order to have one single article dealing with the right to equality, as proposed in connection with Article 6.

Article 3

Its total elimination is proposed.

It is proposed that the rights to life and liberty be defined as follows:

Article – Every human being has the right to exist and to maintain, develop, protect and defend his existence.

Article – No one shall be subjected to arbitrary arrest or detention. Every person who has been detained has a right to have the legality of his detention judicially without any delay.

Neither shall anyone be held in slavery or involuntary servitude (Paragraph 1, Article 4 of Draft).

An additional article is proposed containing the text of Paragraph 2 of Article 4 of the Draft, as follows:

Article – No one shall be subjected to torture, or to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.

Article 4

It is proposed that this article be suppressed in its present form and that its text be used as stated above.

Article 6

It is proposed to have the text of this article combined with those of Articles 2 and 8, as follows:

[2]

Article – All are equal before the law and are entitled to equal protection of the law and to enjoy all the rights and freedoms set forth in this Declaration without distinction of any kind, such as race, colour, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, property or other status or national or social origin.

Article 7

It is proposed that this article be replaced in the manner above stated in connection with Article 3.

Article 8

It is proposed that the phrase “in full equality” be eliminated from this article inasmuch as the subject of equality is covered by another article.

It is further proposed that an article dealing in toto with the subject of fair trial be made up of Article 8, modified as stated above, and the first paragraph of Article 9, as follows:

Article –

1. In the determination of his rights and obligations and of any criminal charge against him, everyone is entitled a fair hearing by an independent and impartial tribunal.
2. Everyone charged with a penal offence has the right to be presumed innocent until proved guilty according to law in a public trial at which he has had all the guarantees necessary for his defence.

Article 9

It is proposed that the second paragraph of this article be made part of a separate article dealing with the right to security against ex post facto laws, as follows:

Article – No one shall be held guilty of an offence on account of any act or omission which did not constitute an offence under national or international law, at the time when it was committed. Neither can anyone be imposed a heavier penalty than the one that was applicable at the time the offence was committed.

A/C.3/SR.93

4 October 1948

Original Text: French

Summary Record of the Ninety-Third Meeting
[of the Third Committee]

Held at the Palais de Chaillot, Paris, on Monday, 4 October 1948,
at 3:15 p.m.

Chairman: MR. C. MALIK (Lebanon). Vice-Chairman: MRS. B. BEGTRUP (Denmark).
Rapporteur: Mr. E. SAINT-LOT (Haiti).

[2]

Draft international declaration of human rights (A/632, E/800)
(continuation of the general discussion)

MR. MAYHEW (United Kingdom) thanked Mrs. Roosevelt, Chairman of the Commission on Human Rights, for her important contribution to the preparation of the draft declaration.

After reviewing the work that had been accomplished, the United Kingdom representative stated that human rights and fundamental freedoms would have to be clearly laid down in a covenant which would legally bind its signatories. While awaiting the completion of such an international instrument, the Declaration of Human Rights would have great moral authority, through the proclamation of an ideal even though it could not impose specific obligations. He did not agree with Professor Cassin that the declaration could be considered to have legal authority as an interpretation of the relevant provisions of the Charter. No General Assembly resolution could establish legal obligations. The moral authority of the document that would be adopted by the Assembly, however, would serve as a guide to Governments in their efforts to guarantee human rights by legislation through their administrative and legal practice. In that connexion, he pointed out that the United Kingdom applied all those rights even though they did not form part of a written constitution. Further, his Government was firmly resolved to extend the sphere of application of the declaration to all of its dependent territories and had entered into consultation with their authorized representatives with that end in view.

While regretting that it would not be possible to sign a convention on human rights at the same time as the declaration, the United Kingdom representative emphasized the value of the latter document. A great number of countries had approved its aim, either in the Commission on Human Rights or in the Third Committee of the Assembly.

He agreed with the representatives of Chile and Australia that the best procedure to follow would be to take the present draft as a basis for discussion, it being understood that most of the basic rights incorporated in the Bogotá declaration were already incorporated in the text under discussion. He did not think it would be necessary to follow the precedent established at Bogotá and include a list of human duties. The Committee would be doing useful work if it concentrated its efforts on producing a short document, without too many amendments, and without a prolonged discussion on details, which always proved to be more controversial than questions of principle.

[3]

The United Kingdom delegation did not support the proposal for a special committee. It thought that the Committee should determine the broad lines of the draft, after which, several drafting committees could be set up to perfect the various articles.

The USSR representative had indulged in a polemic of completely unjustified accusations with respect to the United Kingdom. It was not the first time that such distortions of the truth had been heard, accompanied by an equally unrealistic picture of the USSR. The authors of those statements apparently hoped that at least one part of that enormous edifice of fiction would remain and that the truth would be unable to penetrate the secrecy with which the communist countries were surrounded.

Mr. Mayhew observed that those who believed sincerely in human rights would not be able to remain silent much longer. Communism was one of the cruelest forms of political and economic dictatorship that the world had ever known. That was not an expression of propaganda but simply a conclusion drawn from observing current events. The representatives of the communist countries had cited many articles from the USSR Constitution which explicitly guaranteed all the rights of the individual. Nevertheless, the fact that thousands of democrats, socialists, peasant or trade union leaders, men who had distinguished themselves in the struggle against fascism, had now fled, from countries under communist control, was sufficient to reduce the mountain of USSR legends to nothingness.

Communist speakers depicted the countries of the West as hotbeds of oppression and exploitation. Why, then, if that were so, was there not a flood of refugees in the other direction? In the United Kingdom, alone, there were more Poles who refused to return to their own country than there were letters in the “democratic” text of the Polish Constitution. Displaced persons had preferred to commit suicide rather than return to their countries of origin.

As with Hitlerite Germany, the communist countries had a one-party government. USSR propaganda stated that once the bourgeoisie was liquidated, the interests of the workers and the peasants would coincide, depriving the opposition of any reason for existence. That explanation was ridiculous. It was only necessary to mention land collectivization to realize that the attitude of the peasants could differ greatly from that of the regime without those agrarian elements being allowed to express their views on a measure that had turned their life upside down.

However, it was never possible for the people to express its opinion in communist countries.

[4]

Mr. Mayhew then cited the case of Soviet women who had married British subjects and who were not allowed to accompany their husbands home. No newspaper, no representative of the people, no USSR court had taken the grievance of those women into consideration. Millions of citizens of communist countries were thus dumb, deprived of all rights and all recourse, before a resounding Constitution which was nothing but a mockery to them. If there were no signs of opposition at meetings, in the press or in speeches, it was not because the opposition had no reason to exist, it was because it had been smothered by the secret police.

It was claimed that at least the communist countries were in the vanguard with respect to “new-rights”, in contrast with the reactionary western nations. The United Kingdom representative declared that there was nothing in any one of the communist countries which would bear comparison with the social security system of the United Kingdom. The old age pension of a soviet miner was 240 rubles per month at the most; that of a railway worker or a metallurgical worker, 225 rubles, and that of other categories of workers, 190 rubles. It was absolutely impossible to live on those amounts. Old people had the choice of being a burden to their already sorely-trying children or of continuing to work until the point of complete exhaustion. The most obvious proof of a lack of social security was the great number of beggars who wandered the streets of Soviet cities.

The right to work was also an illusion. There was no system of protection against unemployment, unless the forced labour camps could be considered reception centres for the unemployed.

Freedom of work did not exist. No trade union in a western country would accept the heavy work discipline which was borne by Soviet workers.

As regards the right to education in the USSR, Mr. Mayhew quoted from the remarks of a high USSR official of the revolutionary propaganda bureau, in the review "Culture and Life" of 11 July 1948 to the effect that the local authorities showed a "complete indifference to the fate of the rising generation".

Finally, the United Kingdom representative drew attention to the frequent use of the words "democracy" and "fascism" in the speeches of the USSR representatives and recalled that during the second session of the Assembly, the USSR representative had included Mr. Churchill in the list of "fascists".<sup>12</sup> Mr. Hector McNeil had been forced then to point out that Mr. Churchill had contributed more to the struggle against fascism than any communist in any country.<sup>13</sup> Everyone realized that by "democracy", the communists meant "people's democracy", which was nothing [5] more than the communist oppression of the people.

The spokesmen for the USSR posed as champions of the liberty of the masses. Yet, was it not the USSR which, in the space of a few years, had annexed an immense amount of territory and had imposed her authority over the Lithuanians, the Estonians, the Letts, the Czechoslovaks, the Hungarians, the Romanians and the Albanians? The representatives of communist countries had frequently criticized the regime in territories under British administration. The least that could be said in that respect was that those countries were evolving from colonial status to complete independence; the exact opposite was true for the peoples under Soviet control.

In spite of the fact that he had little taste for polemics, the United Kingdom representative felt that there were occasions when it was necessary to use clear and precise language in the defence of liberty.

In making an historical analysis of the struggle for human rights, MR. GARCÍA BAUER (Guatemala) drew a distinction between on the one hand, the classical doctrine of natural rights which derived from the teachings of the Stoics and had been translated into positive rights by the Declaration of the Rights of Man of the French Revolution and by the United States Bill of Rights, and, on the other hand, the contribution of socialist thought which had led to the inclusion of guarantees of the social rights of the individual in most modern constitutions. The Atlantic Charter, which had proclaimed the four fundamental freedoms, and the United Nations Charter, which affirmed again the rights of man, showed it was a question which at the present moment, preoccupied the whole world.

The Guatemalan delegation felt that the draft Declaration submitted for the consideration of the Committee, while not perfect, provided a good basis for discussion. He shared the opinion of the Cuban representative that it would be more appropriate to transfer the general principles set forth in the first article of the draft to the preamble. He also thought that the Third Committee should draw inspiration from the Bogotá Declaration on the Rights of Man for the improvement of the present text, even though that document had already been used in the work of the Commission on Human Rights.

<sup>12</sup> A/PV.84.    <sup>13</sup> A/PV.88.

The Guatemalan representative emphasized the necessity of asking the Economic and Social Council to continue the work of drawing up a convention on human rights and also on measures of implementation. He congratulated the Commission on Human Rights on the very useful work [6] it had accomplished.

MR. BAKARIC (Yugoslavia) recalled that after the Second World War his country had been among the first to request the drafting of a declaration on human rights and that Yugoslavia had taken an active part in the work of the Commission on Human Rights. Nevertheless, since the delegation of Yugoslavia had not been completely satisfied with the draft adopted by the Commission on Human Rights, it had abstained when the Commission had voted on the text as a whole.<sup>14</sup>

The international declaration on human rights should have been the work of forces fighting for progress, as in the case of the Declaration of the Rights of Man during the French Revolution and the Declaration of Independence in the United States. In modern times, and particularly during the Second World War, fascism had trampled on the rights of individuals and of nations. The German doctrine of the “master race” was aimed at the enslavement of peoples and even at the physical destruction of certain people. Fascist tendencies had not been destroyed, as was evident from the continued attacks on the rights of man and the campaigns of incitement to war.

The primary task of the United Nations was to defend man against the dangers of war, which would again lead to unspeakable suffering, and to direct the efforts to all nations in the struggle against the enemies of liberty and peace. That was the objective which should have been striven for by an international declaration on human rights.

The representatives of certain countries had, however, taken advantage of the discussions on the draft declaration to give way to propaganda campaign against another group of countries, and particularly against the USSR. That attitude was dangerous, because it deprived the declaration of the significance which it should have had. Certain essential questions did not appear in the current draft while still others were presented in a deformed manner.

Mr. Bakaric stated that certain speakers had defended traditional forms of racial discrimination.

While paying tribute to the goodwill and to the untiring efforts of Mrs. Roosevelt, the representative of Yugoslavia pointed out that the representative of the United States had used expressions which recalled the classic forms of political discrimination in the field of the rights public office.

<sup>14</sup> E/CN.4/SR.81.

The representative of Yugoslavia expressed the fear that through [7] the lack of real content the declaration might be forgotten even before the ink of the signatures affixed to the document had dried. For that reason he urged the members of the Committee to exert every possible effort to draw up a text which would fulfil the legitimate aspirations of the peoples.

MR. DEMCHENKO (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) expressed the opinion that a declaration of human rights should not only recognize fundamental liberties for all men regardless of race, nationality, social status, religion or language, in accordance with democratic principles, but should also guarantee respect for those liberties while taking economic and social conditions into account. In addition it should define the obligations and duties of the citizen towards his country and his people. As the Ukrainian delegation had already pointed out in the course of the work of the Commission on Human Rights, the draft declaration did not fulfil those requirements. Therefore, Mr. Demchenko was of the opinion that the draft required extensive modification on the basis of the statement made by the delegation of the USSR in the Commission on Human Rights on 18 June 1948. That statement appeared as an appendix to the draft (E/800, page 29).

The representative of the Ukrainian SSR recalled that in a previous speech the representative of the Union of South Africa had championed the theory of discrimination in discussing the indigenous populations of Africa. In colonial and non-self-governing territories millions of human beings were deprived of the most elementary rights. On the other hand, the constitution of the USSR guaranteed equal rights and equal privileges to all without distinction as to nationality, race, language or sex.

Mr. Demchenko considered that the draft declaration contained a purely formal enumeration of rights without any guarantee of their enforcement. For example, the right to work was listed, but there was no statement as to how that right would be ensured. Unemployment existed in several States which provided no protection for the unemployed, while in socialist countries not only was there no unemployment, but unemployment was not even remembered. A planned economy eliminated unemployment. There was no lack of work but rather a lack of workers in certain areas.

Mr. Demchenko pointed out another important omission in the draft declaration: it contained no reference to the indispensable measures which had to be taken against fascism and against the revival of Nazi propaganda. Replying to the representative of [8] Costa Rica who had found it impossible to define fascism exactly, the representative of the Ukrainian SSR recalled the suffering of the peoples of the USSR and the occupied countries of Europe. Those peoples knew all too well what fascism was. The representative of the United Kingdom had stated that the current danger which threatened Europe was not fascism but communism. How was it, then, that during the struggle against Hitlerite Germany his Government had not hesitated to ally itself with the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics? Could it be said that fascism no longer constituted a danger when it was rife<sup>15</sup> in Spain, was trying to raise its head again in Greece and when in many countries fascist tendencies still remained?

Mr. Demchenko repeated that the statements of the USSR delegation referred to above should appear in the declaration of human rights which would then be of concrete value and make a useful contribution to historical progress.

In reply to the representative of the United Kingdom, Mr. Demchenko stated that the constitution of Lenin was not merely theoretical. It was a set of real and concrete rights for the entire working population of town and country. Could the USSR be criticized for not having an opposition party? That merely proved that the entire population was united behind its Government. Could it be maintained that individual liberty was not respected in the USSR? If that was a reference to Russian nationals who had married foreigners, many of them had returned to their country because it had been impossible for them to be assured a suitable life elsewhere. The Union of Soviet Socialist Republics did not need the advice of anyone regarding the enforcement of its laws.

If the question of refugees was involved, could that term be applied to individuals who had betrayed the new democracies? And if “displaced persons” were involved, should not their refusal to return to the countries of their origin be regarded as an indication of propaganda and pressure exerted on them in that direction? Finally, to claim that socialist countries practised interference in the internal affairs of other countries was a false allegation which the USSR had long ago refuted.

[9]

MR. KURAL (Turkey) stated that the Turkish delegation most sincerely supported the draft declaration of human rights as submitted to the Committee, particularly as the rules contained in the declaration were in accord with the Charter of the United Nations. Turkish legislation was based on the principles which had inspired the draft. Finally that declaration would contribute effectively to the maintenance of world peace.

Certain parts, however, could be improved. The Turkish delegation would like to see the principle of free education extended so that it should not be limited to primary instruction.

Certain delegations had requested that the declaration should take into account not only the rights but also the duties of the individual. It would obviously be useful to have those duties clearly defined. However, because of differences of opinion which existed between the various juridical and social systems as well as between various countries, Mr. Kural considered it very unlikely that an agreement could be reached regarding the nature of the scope of the duties of the individual towards the State. Article 27 of the draft therefore constituted an acceptable minimum which could be considered as satisfactory. The question of duties of the individual towards his community did not involve any particular issue of urgency. The legislation of States was currently composed of provisions which defined the duties of citizens. Those duties could not be considered as equitable in so far as they did not depart from the standards set by the declaration of human rights.

<sup>15</sup> There is a blank in the original. The word “rife” is added in Official Records of the General Assembly, Third Session, 1948, p. 69.

The Turkish delegation reserved the right to intervene in the discussions which would follow and to present amendments which might improve certain parts of the draft.

MR. HOFFMEISTER (Czechoslovakia) noted the similarity between the draft declaration now under discussion and the Declaration of Rights of Man and the Citizen voted by the French Constituent Assembly on 26 August 1789 at Versailles. That Declaration had in fact been the death certificate of the Old Regime and, inspired by the doctrine of the philosophers, had embodied the ideals of the rising social class. Ratified by the King under pressure of a popular movement, it stood for the ideal of the rights of the middle class, a circumscribed ideal which was to be subjected to the searching criticism of Karl Marx and of Frederic Engels in the Communist Manifesto. The authors of the Manifesto had analysed the problem of human rights with acumen and had expressed ideas, as for instance on the Jewish question, which retained all their relevance today. Marx criticized the conception of freedom as stated in the Declaration of 1789; he perceived its ambiguity in that it considered man [10] as an isolated monad; man's right was that of the individual within the individual's limitations; the practical application of the right to freedom was the right to private property, that was, the right to selfishness. That individual liberty and its applications serving as the foundations of bourgeois society, revealed to each individual the limitations in the freedom of another individual. The draft declaration now being examined by the Third Committee harked back to the Declaration of the Rights of Man and was equally far from ensuring the rich and complete freedom that millions of men desired, but which some feared.

In Mr. Hoffmeister's view, the draft declaration was no more than an abstract idea and merely reaffirmed the existing order. The representative of Czechoslovakia was not opposed to the codification of the rights acquired by citizens in the majority of the civilized countries of the world, but he held that what was most fitting to proclaim was such fundamental human rights as had already been proclaimed by certain States, or been provided in certain constitutions. The fundamental right of man to a free and full life, to security, and to peace must be formulated. Furthermore, a declaration of human rights born of the concrete realities of the post-war period must include the right to annihilate fascism by ensuring the defence of democratic rights – and those rights were still being threatened – against reactionary aggression.

The Czechoslovak delegation would not be able to append its signature to a declaration which failed to guarantee the application and the enjoyment of those rights, the obligations deriving therefrom being taken into account, and that for all persons without distinction as to race, nationality, religion, social position, sex and language. The draft declaration was too abstract. How, for instance, could a Government apply Article 22 on the standard of living if there existed no guarantees with regard to economic equality? Mr. Hoffmeister considered that Article 21 had only a theoretical value. He contrasted it with Article 3 of the Czechoslovak Constitution, an article, in his opinion, far more concrete. The Declaration on Human Rights, which evolved from the present discussion, must be clear, concrete, and must take into account humanity's revolutionary aspirations. The Declaration drawn up in the year 1948 was to serve for the years to come.

The Czechoslovak delegation reserved its right to submit amendments when the Committee began its discussion of the draft chapter by chapter.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics), having raised his hand, THE CHAIRMAN asked whether, since the general discussion was closed, he wished to speak on a point of order.

[11]

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) asked for the right of reply in accordance with the provisions of Article 104 of the rules of procedure.

THE CHAIRMAN drew attention to the fact that Article 104 did not impose an obligation on the Chairman to grant the right of reply, but merely allowed him to do so. He regretted that he was unable to grant the request of the representative of the USSR because the speech of the representative of the United Kingdom was already a reply to a preceding statement by Mr. Pavlov. Furthermore, three representatives of the Slav countries had already taken part in the discussion after the representative of the United Kingdom had spoken, and had consequently had the opportunity of replying to the latter.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) drew attention to the fact that Article 104, referred to by the Chairman, had been drafted expressly to guarantee the right of reply after the closure of the debate. He demanded that the right of reply be granted him.

THE CHAIRMAN replied that he would not have failed to accede to the request of Mr. Pavlov had the application of Article 104 been a case in point in the present instance. But Mr. Mayhew's statement was a reply to the statement of the representative of the USSR and did not constitute an attack against the latter country. The Chairman therefore maintained his ruling and reiterated that the general debate was closed.

The Chairman was authorized by the Third Committee to discuss with the Chairman of the Second Committee the filling of the positions of Chairman and Rapporteur at the meetings which the two Committees would hold jointly.

The Chairman recalled that the Committee must now choose between the two methods of procedure proposed with regard to the examination of the Draft International Declaration of Human Rights. The proposal of the delegation of Cuba, seconded by that of Venezuela, was that a drafting committee be set up in order to harmonize the two different texts; the text drawn up by the Commission on Human Rights and that deriving from the Conference at Bogotá. That drafting committee would in due course make recommendations to the Third Committee. The second proposal was that the draft be examined by the Committee in a plenary meeting and that any points upon which amendments might be submitted should be referred to a small drafting committee.

[12]

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba), believing that his proposal might have been wrongly interpreted and might, for instance, have been taken as implying a criticism of the text drawn up at Geneva, wished to explain the reasons underlying it. He explained that the work done at the Conference of Bogotá had not been intended to lead to a rejection of the text drawn up at Geneva, but to form a supplement to it. He therefore merely suggested that both texts should be studied, the Geneva text being naturally considered as the basic working paper; the Bogotá text seemed in his opinion to have the advantages of better structure and a clearer statement of issues.

THE CHAIRMAN reminded Mr. Pérez Cisneros that the only question before the Committee was the choice between the setting up of a drafting committee or the examination of the draft by the plenary Committee sitting as a drafting committee.

MR. COROMINAS (Argentina) noted that there were two conflicting proposals, the aim of the Cuban delegation's proposal being that the work should be done by a more limited body than the whole Committee. That proposal was valuable. He suggested that the Committee proceed straightaway to a vote.

BADAWI BEY (Egypt) recalled that it behoved the Committee also to come to a decision on certain questions of principle. The Committee must, for instance, decide whether it proposed to limit its study solely to the International Declaration of Human Rights, without touching the Covenant and the Suggestions for Implementation, whether the Committee wished to examine the Declaration alone without reference to the obligations of States or, lastly, whether the Committee proposed to decide that the declaration must deal not only with the rights but also with the duties of man.

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) considered that there had arisen yet another misunderstanding. Thus, members of the Committee did not seem clearly to be aware of the fact that the draft now before the Committee represented the most advanced stage reached in the work since it took into consideration the work of the Conference of Bogotá. It was desirable to avoid doing again work which had already been done. The Committee should therefore examine the draft submitted to it, paragraph by paragraph, and refer to a drafting committee those points with regard to which differences of opinion might arise.

[13]

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) again assured the Committee that his criticisms of the Geneva text had referred solely to the form of the draft. In his opinion the declaration must have a logical structure and order. It should include a preamble in which the essential premises would be enunciated; it should then proceed to state the rights deriving from the premises, those rights being grouped in their proper order according as they fell within the social, political or legal categories; finally, the declaration should explain the extent of those rights and define the duties arising therefrom. However complete the Geneva text might be, it seemed to lack clarity, whereas the plan that he advocated<sup>16</sup> would have the advantage of being intelligible to everyone.

He added that his statement was intended to avoid the creation of a drafting sub-committee which, while offering obvious advantages, would also have certain drawbacks. He thought that if the plan of work he had prepared could be approved by the Committee, there would no longer be any need to set up a sub-committee. That was why he felt it necessary to make those observations.<sup>17</sup>

The representative of Cuba drew attention to the fact that his draft included all the provisions of the Geneva text with the exception of articles 26 and 28. He requested that that document, which he proposed as a basis for discussion, should be distributed to the delegations, and, pending distribution of it, moved that the meeting be adjourned.

THE CHAIRMAN stated that the only question before the Committee was to decide before which body – a drafting committee or plenary Committee sitting as a drafting committee – Mr. Pérez Cisneros should have stated his point of view as, infringing upon the rules of procedure, he had just done.

MR. PLAZA (Venezuela) assured the committee that his delegation, in supporting the point of view expressed by the representative of Cuba, was actuated solely by a desire to facilitate the work of the Committee. He believed that the text that Mr. Pérez Cisneros had been good enough to draft would be most useful to members of the Committee.

MR. GARCÍA BAUER (Guatemala) pointed out that the representative of Cuba had asked that the meeting be adjourned and that, in accordance with the rules of procedure, the motion of adjournment should be put to the vote immediately.

The Committee decided by 21 votes to 1 with 11 abstentions to adjourn the discussion.

The meeting rose at 6 p.m.

<sup>16</sup> Later distributed under the document symbol A/C.3/218.

<sup>17</sup> This paragraph was added by A/C.3/SR.93/Corr.1 of 9 October 1948.

A/C.3/221

5 October 1948

Original Text: English, French

Principles of International Morality Adopted at the XXXVIIth Inter-Parliamentary Conference
Rome, 6–11 September 1948

Seeing that the work of codification of international law, which has repeatedly figured on the agenda of Inter-Parliamentary Conferences since 1899, has now, under present international circumstances, again taken on increased importance;

Seeing that members of Parliament in all democratic countries play a foremost part in the direction and control of their country's international policy, and that, in the interests of the peoples who elected them, as in the collective interests of humanity, it is their duty to bring their contribution to, and to keep watch over, the application of the same principles of morality in relations between the nations as in relations between individuals;

Seeing that, during the second world war, declarations of paramount importance for the evolution of international law were made by the spokesman of victorious democracies;

Seeing that the Nuremberg Charter for the prosecution and punishment of the main war criminals has endowed international penal law with principles that are also worth codifying;

Seeing that those various declarations deserve to be preserved from oblivion and must continue to inspire the work of codification of international law undertaken by the United Nations;

Seeing that, moreover, such a vote would imply that the members of the various Parliaments affiliated to the Union endorsed those declarations (which, in most cases, were made by Governments), regarded themselves as directly bound by their terms and declared themselves ready to direct the foreign policy of their respective countries on the lines thus indicated;

Consequently, the XXXVIIth Conference recalls the leading principles of international morality contained in the Declaration of the Four Freedoms, the Atlantic Charter, the Moscow, Teheran<sup>18</sup> and Yalta Declarations, the United [2] Nations Charter, the Potsdam Declaration, the Act of Chapultepec, the Nuremberg Charter, the Bogotá Charter, and similar international documents, as also in the main international statements made during hostilities by the spokesmen of the great democracies, and transmits to the United Nations, as the contribution of the Inter-Parliamentary Union to the work of codification provided for in Article 13 of the Charter, the Declaration joined to the present text, in which the Inter-Parliamentary Union has endeavoured to summarize those principles.

<sup>18</sup> The first meeting between Stalin, Roosevelt and Churchill was held in Tehran from 28 November to 1 December 1943. Agreement was reached to open a second front against Nazi Germany and on a range of other matters. A declaration was adopted concerning the independence of Iran.

The Conference also recommends that the Inter-Parliamentary Committee on Juridical Questions continue its efforts for the development of the work it has undertaken with a view to proclaiming the principles of international morality.

Declaration on the Principles of International Morality

1. Relations between states are governed by principles of morality as are relations between individuals.

2. All states are solidary and form a de facto community of which it is desirable that the United Nations should, as soon as possible, become the universal juridical expression.

3. The members of the community of states are equal before the law, without prejudice to the limitation of sovereignty required for the benefit of the international community, in the interests of peace and security.

4. States have the strict duty to respect the obligations resulting from international conventions.

A Treaty may only be annulled or modified with the consent of the states concerned or in accordance with the provisions of the United Nations Charter.

5. No state may claim to be judge in its own cause. Every dispute between states which cannot be settled amicably must be settled by conciliation, arbitration, or in accordance with the provisions of the United Nations Charter. All states must carry out in good faith the decision reached.

6. The independence of states is inviolable. Respect for that independence excludes the use of political, economic, or other pressure on the part of the state for the purpose of modifying the political or social structure of another state, without prejudice to measures taken as a result of decisions of the United Nations Organization to safeguard peace and democracy.

7. No state may use its armed forces on the territory of another independent state except with the agreement of the state concerned for military action authorized by the terms of the United Nations Charter.

[3]

8. As all propaganda in favour of war and all forms of incitement to aggression constitute a threat to that peace towards which the efforts of all states should be directed, all governments should take active steps to implement the resolution condemning such propaganda voted unanimously at the second General Assembly of the United Nations in 1947 and at the Conference on Freedom of Information in 1948.

Furthermore, in the interests of peace, all states are required to encourage by publicity and propaganda and by any other means at their disposal friendly relations between peoples based on the aims and principles of the United Nations Charter.

9. As, under the terms unanimously adopted by the Conference on Freedom of Information which met in Geneva in March and April 1948, “the attainment of a just and lasting peace depends in great degree upon the free flow of true and honest information to all peoples and upon the spirit of responsibility with which all personnel of the press and other agencies of information seek the truth and report the facts”, it is in particular the duty of all governments to see that all official communications issued by foreign governments relating to international disputes in which they are concerned should be disseminated on their territory effectively and on a basis of reciprocity.

As the attainment of a just and lasting peace depends largely on freedom of opinion, it is the duty of states to give their nationals the right to express different opinions, including even opinions contrary to those of the party in power.

10. Since aggression is a crime, those who prepare, promote and execute it must be prosecuted and punished by joint action of states.

The collectivity of states must adopt as soon as possible an international penal code and create an international penal court for the punishment of crimes against peace, war crimes and crimes against humanity, including in particular the crime of genocide.

Mutual assistance between states in the matter of prosecution and punishment of war criminals and persons guilty of genocide or other crimes against humanity must take place without restrictions and without time limits contrary to the spirit set forth above.

A state victim of aggression has the right of legitimate defence and the community of states must lend its support.

11. Armaments, which are a heavy burden on world economy, cannot legitimately serve any other purpose than that of protecting the nations individually and collectively against aggression. Their arbitrary fixation by sovereign states and the competition arising between those states in this [4] field have often been stigmatized as a cause of insecurity. It is therefore the urgent duty of states to collaborate for their limitation and progressive reduction under international control, inspection, and supervision.

Under that same guarantee, international morality makes it the duty for states to agree upon international control, inspection and supervision of atomic weapons, as also other instruments of war making possible mass destruction of human life and material wealth, in view of the final abolition of those arms.

12. Peoples have the inalienable and imprescriptible right of free self-determination and the international community the duty to secure the exercise of that right.

13. States must not exploit for their own profit populations of a different civilization placed under their trusteeship. It is their duty to co-operate for the improvement of their material, moral and intellectual condition in such a way as to lead them as rapidly as possible towards autonomous administration, independent government, or any other solution desired by those populations. In the territories inhabited by them no privilege must be granted, of a commercial or industrial nature, to nationals of the state responsible for administration.

14. It is the duty of states to collaborate for the general welfare of mankind. They must grant one another mutually, as regards access to raw materials and foreign trade, the facilities necessary to the economic prosperity of each one of them.

15. In every state there should be granted to all citizens, without distinction of religion, race, sex or nationality, the exercise of rights which will ensure the free development of their individuality.

16. Since every human being has a right to life it is the duty of states to bear, within the limits of their respective means, the burden resulting from the harbouring of displaced persons, refugees, stateless persons or persons fleeing from war pestilence or natural catastrophes.

Except in the case of persons guilty of crimes of common law and in the case of war criminals, a state has the right to give asylum on its territory to individuals, without distinction of age, who have fled from their own country through fear of political, religious or racial persecution.

17. Further, states having on their territories, or on territories occupied or controlled by them, displaced persons, refugees, émigrés, etc., shall refrain from any form of propaganda the aim of which is to influence the said persons in a tendentious manner with a view to preventing them from taking a decision to return to their own country, and they shall use all the legal means at their disposal to combat propaganda of this sort.

[5]

The removal of children from their own country without the consent of their parents or legal guardians and the placing of obstacles in the way of their repatriation are a flagrant violation of international morality.

Any displaced person or refugee wishing to return to his home has the right to do so; it is the duty of the international collectivity and, particularly, of the state concerned to lend them all effective aid and assistance.

18. Each state must endeavour to secure for all manual and intellectual workers respect for their dignity, their right to work, to rest and leisure, and a fair remuneration for their labours.

A/C.3/222

5 October 1948

Original Text: French

Egypt: Proposal

1. With regard to Item 2 of its Agenda, the Third Committee decides to examine only the Draft International Declaration of Human Rights transmitted by the Economic and Social Council with a view to preparing a text for adoption by the General Assembly during the present Session, without thereby ruling out statements of opinion on the other Sections of the International Bill of Human Rights or any decisions which may be reached concerning existing connections between the Declaration and the other sections of the Bill.

(proposal adopted on 5 October 1948)

2. The Third Committee decides that the Declaration of Human Rights shall be limited to the formulation of principles relating to human rights which presuppose the existence of corresponding duties on the part of states and defers the foundation of principles relating to the duties of States for incorporation in an appropriate instrument.

3. The Third Committee decides that the Declaration of Human Rights shall deal both with human rights and with the duties corresponding thereto.

A/C.3/223

5 October 1948

United States of America: Amendments to the Draft Declaration of Human Rights

Article 9

Insert the word “penal” before the word “offence” in the second paragraph of Article 9, so as to read:

Article 9

* * * *

2. No one shall be held guilty of any penal offence on account of any act or omission which did not constitute a penal offence, under national or international law, at the time when it was committed.

Article 18

Substitute the following text for the present text of Article 18:

Article 18

Everyone has the right to freedom of assembly and association, especially for the promotion and protection of the rights and freedoms set forth in this Declaration.

Article 21

Substitute the following text for the present text of the second paragraph of Article 21:

Article 21

* * * *

Men and women have the right to equal pay for equal work.

Article 27

Amend the second paragraph of Article 27 to read as follows:

Article 27

* * * *

2. In the exercise of his rights and freedoms, everyone shall be subject only to such limitations as are necessary to secure due recognition and respect for the rights of others and the requirements of morality, public order and general welfare in a democratic society.

A/C.3/SR.94<sup>19</sup>

5 October 1948

Summary Record of the Ninety-Fourth Meeting
[of the Third Committee]

Held at the Palais de Chaillot, Paris, on Tuesday, 5 October 1948,
 at 10:30 a.m.

Chairman: MR. CHARLES MALIK (Lebanon)

<sup>19</sup> The text of the document is from Official Records of the General Assembly, Third Session, 1948, pp. 74–83.

15. Draft international declaration of human rights (E/800) (continued)

THE CHAIRMAN drew attention to the fact that the Committee had to decide whether it would itself act as a drafting committee or whether it would adopt the suggestion of the representative of Cuba that a sub-committee should be set up.

The Committee had also to decide on the questions raised by the Egyptian representative, namely, whether or not it should examine only the draft declaration and not the covenant and measures for implementation; whether the draft declaration should formulate principles relating to the duties of States as well as principles relating to the rights of the individual; and finally, whether the draft declaration should mention the duties of the individual as well as his rights.

MR. SAINT-LOT (Haiti) thought that the questions raised by the representative of Egypt should be settled first. The Committee should decide whether it should consider only the draft declaration of human rights or whether it should include also the international covenant and the suggestions for implementation. In his opinion the draft covenant was not yet complete and a sub-committee should be set up in order to elaborate it.

He opposed the proposal made by the representative of Cuba, but would state his attitude towards it when it came up in the discussion.

MR. ANZE MATIENZO (Bolivia) said that the tendency to form sub-committees only complicated the issue. The text should be examined by the full Committee, and the plan of work proposed by Cuba (A/C.3/218) should be adopted as a basis.

BADAWI BEY (Egypt) said that time would be lost if the text were considered article by article by the Committee and he repeated his desire for [75] a working group (92nd meeting). The Committee should also decide whether it wished to include duties as well as rights in its discussion. The question whether the draft declaration alone should be considered had logically to be decided first.

MR. CASSIN (France) thought the proposal made by the representative of Egypt should be dealt with first and agreed that the Committee must decide whether or not the questions of rights and duties were to be dealt with in separate chapters. If so, the Bogotá declaration might serve as a useful guide.

COUNT CARTON DE WIART (Belgium) agreed with the representative of Egypt and asked that the substance of the debate should be defined. It was necessary for the Committee to know whether the draft declaration alone was to be considered or whether the question of duties and rights was to be included. The Committee should limit itself to the draft declaration, for that was the task entrusted to it by the General Assembly and anything which tended to widen the debate should be excluded.

MR. WATT (Australia) had no objection to a decision being taken on whether only the draft declaration was to be considered. But if the Committee limited itself in that way, it might be thought that it did not want to complete the draft covenant and was overlooking the view of the Assembly. His delegation had stated earlier that the Committee should not preclude members from stating their opinions on the question of implementation as a guide to the Commission on Human Rights.

THE CHAIRMAN hoped that a resolution might be formulated which would combine the views of the representatives of both Egypt and Australia.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics), speaking first on the question of what the Committee should consider, noted that the Committee had previously almost reached unanimity on that point. The Declaration of Human Rights should be used because it was the only developed document available, unless members wished the whole bill of human rights to be redrafted, and that was impossible.

Concerning the question of what basis should be used in considering the draft declaration, he said that some members had shown dissatisfaction with the draft declaration. It would be useless, however, to consider the Bogotá declaration, as it had already been examined and parts of it incorporated in the draft declaration before the Committee. Although the draft declaration was by no means perfect, the Committee should consider it. It should also examine the USSR amendments (E/800, page 31); his delegation was formally presenting them again as amendments.

With regard to the way in which the draft declaration and the amendments were to be considered, he opposed the creation of a sub-committee; although it would imply, quite correctly, that the work of the Commission on Human [76] Rights had been inadequate, it would only mean a postponement of discussion followed by a repetition in full Committee of what had already been discussed in the sub-committee. The proposal made by the representative of France was perfectly logical and the draft declaration should be dealt with article by article. If at any point they encountered any difficulty, they could still set up a sub-committee to deal with it.

In the general debate (93rd meeting) the United Kingdom representative had attacked the social structure in the Soviet Union and the latter had not been given the opportunity to defend itself. He wished to point out that in his own speech in the general debate (92nd meeting), he had not attacked the social structure of the United Kingdom in any way.

He thought it unnecessary for the Committee to vote each time it wished to adjourn the meeting at the usual hour.

THE CHAIRMAN assured the representative of the USSR that the amendments submitted by his delegation were before the Third Committee and would be considered when the draft declaration was examined article by article.

He then read the text of the resolution submitted by the representative of Egypt:

“With regard to item 2 of the agenda, the Third Committee decides to examine only the draft international declaration of human rights transmitted by the Economic and Social Council with a view to preparing a text for adoption by the General Assembly during the present session, without thereby ruling out statements of opinion on the other sections of the international bill of human rights.”

MR. PLAZA (Venezuela) said that the basic document should be the draft declaration. If the proposal submitted by the representative of Cuba (A/C.3/218) were adopted, it would mean a change only in the order in which the articles were considered.

A sub-committee should be set up, not in order to express dissatisfaction with the draft declaration but in order to study the text in the best and most effective way.

His delegation favoured the adoption of the Cuban proposal and the creation of a sub-committee.

THE CHAIRMAN hoped that the representative of Venezuela would agree to his putting the Egyptian proposal to the vote.

MR. PLAZA (Venezuela) replied that he would have no objection to his doing so.

MR. DE ALBA (Mexico) approved of the Egyptian proposal that the Committee should examine only the draft declaration at the current session.

He also supported the Australian point of view that the way should be left open for a general discussion later, if possible, of the draft covenant and suggestions for implementation.

The full Committee should use the draft declaration prepared by the Commission on Human [77] Rights as a basis for discussion and should itself consider that document article by article. It should not shirk its responsibility by referring the draft to a sub-committee.

The Cuban delegation's proposal contained important suggestions regarding changes in the structure of the draft declaration and deserved careful attention. Those suggestions could, however, be dealt with, perhaps by a small drafting sub-committee, after the substance of the declaration had been agreed upon.

MR. CASSIN (France), while accepting in general the Egyptian proposal, suggested adding at the end of the text which the Chairman had just read the words: "or any decisions which may be reached concerning existing connexions between the declaration and the other sections of the bill". In order to ensure that the Committee would have an opportunity to express itself fully on that point.

BADAWI BEY (Egypt) accepted the French amendment.

MR. KURAL (Turkey) agreed with the first part of the Egyptian proposal but had some doubts regarding the procedure to be followed if the second part were adopted. He therefore asked that the Chairman should put the proposal to the vote in parts.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) fully supported the proposal under discussion, the second part of which he interpreted to mean that after the text of a declaration had been agreed upon, the Committee would freely debate the question of the connexion between the declaration and the other parts of the international bill of human rights. Such a debate would undoubtedly be very useful to both the Commission on Human Rights and the Economic and Social Council in their consideration of the draft covenant and suggestions for implementation.

The Chilean delegation thought that the draft declaration was the only part of the bill of human rights that could be fully examined at the current session, as the preliminary work on the other parts had not been completed. The declaration should, moreover, be dealt with separately, for the proposed covenant would be legally binding and therefore involved very delicate problems which could not be solved quickly.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) expressed his delegation's approval of the Egyptian proposal as amended by the French representative.

He wondered, however, whether a decision to accept the draft declaration prepared by the Commission on Human Rights as the sole basis for discussion would preclude the possibility of adding a section concerning duties, which he considered highly desirable.

THE CHAIRMAN explained that the point raised by the Cuban representative would be covered by a later part of the Egyptian proposal, not yet under consideration by the Committee.

[78]

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) agreed completely with the Egyptian proposal as amended by France. She emphasized, however, that the amendment referred merely to the question of the connexion between the draft declaration and the other parts of the proposed bill of human rights and in no way implied that any decision would be taken on the draft covenant or on the suggestions for implementation.

THE CHAIRMAN confirmed that the representatives of Chile and the United States had correctly interpreted the proposal under discussion.

MRS. NEWLANDS (New Zealand) explained that her delegation would abstain from voting on the Egyptian proposal because it felt that the General Assembly would be acting too hastily if it adopted a declaration of human rights at the current session. The fact that New Zealand had abstained in the vote would not commit that country with regard to the action it would take when the final text of the draft declaration was presented for the Committee's approval.

MR. SAINT-LOT (Haiti) made a plea for action that would meet the needs of the millions of human beings who, for so long, had been looking to the United Nations to carry out the promises made in the Charter and who were expecting more than empty words. The task originally assigned to the Commission on Human Rights by the General Assembly had been threefold: the preparation of a declaration, a covenant and means of implementation. The Third Committee should see that the entire task was carried out. If the declaration were dissociated from the rest of the proposed international bill of human rights, it might give States an opportunity to limit themselves to a mere declaration of human rights and to avoid the implementation which was the essential goal.

He therefore formally proposed that the Committee should defer consideration of the draft declaration until such time as the preliminary work on the draft covenant and the suggestions for implementation might be considered at the same time.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics), referring to the Egyptian proposal, which the Chairman had read, asked that it should be put to the vote in three parts: first, the part ending with the words “a text for adoption by the General Assembly during the present session”; secondly, the phrase, “without thereby ruling out the statements of opinions on the other sections of the international bill of human rights”; and thirdly, the amendment proposed by the French representative.

The French amendment particularly should be voted on separately, as its adoption would seem to commit the Committee in advance to acceptance of the principles that the declaration and the other parts of the bill of human rights were necessarily interdependent. The connexion between them could not be fully understood, however, until the bill of human rights had been completed. The draft declaration, if it stood alone, might be acceptable to many delegations that would not later be able to agree to the covenant. His Gov-[79]ernment, certainly, disagreed with much that was included in the draft covenant which, by omitting social rights, might actually restrict human rights.

Since the Committee had to decide between the Egyptian proposal and the proposal just submitted by the representative of Haiti, Mr. Pavlov requested that both should be put in writing and circulated to members of the Committee before a vote was taken on either. Moreover, as the Haitian proposal involved an important new point of principle, members of the Committee should have time to consider it further and to get in touch with their Governments before voting on it.

THE CHAIRMAN did not think the submission of the Haitian proposal should delay action on the Egyptian proposal, which had been presented first.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) sympathized fully with the views that had been expressed by the Haitian representative as he, too, was anxious to see all parts of the bill of human rights adopted. He pointed, however, to the danger of linking too closely the three parts of the bill. States determined to evade their obligations would surely find a way to do so even though they had signed a covenant that should be legally binding. If the declaration and the covenant were inalterably linked, the declaration would share with the covenant the discredit caused by such action on the part of States. It might well be that the declaration would become part of the bill of human rights which would have the greatest effect on public opinion and on the conscience of the world.

MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA<sup>20</sup> (Uruguay) understood the Haitian representative's anxiety lest failure of the General Assembly to take concrete action, such as was provided for in the draft covenant, would cause bitter disappointment among the peoples of the world. Even though the preliminary work on the draft covenant and the suggestions for implementation had not been completed, tentative solutions for almost all of the difficult points had been suggested. The Uruguayan delegation still hoped, therefore, that the General Assembly, at its current session, could agree to a covenant that would be strong enough to be effective.

<sup>20</sup> Eduardo Jiménez de Aréchaga (1918–94) was a distinguished international lawyer who sat as judge on the International Court of Justice from 1970 to 1979 and served as its President from 1976 to 1979.

For that reason his delegation could not vote for either the Egyptian resolution or the French amendment.

MR. KAMINSKY (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) supported the USSR's request that no decision should be taken on either the Egyptian or the Haitian proposal at the current meeting, as adoption of the one would automatically exclude the other.

He did not agree with the Chairman that the Egyptian proposal could be voted on before both proposals had been circulated in writing to the members of the Committee.

THE CHAIRMAN ruled that, according to rule 83 of the rules of procedure, the Egyptian proposal, having been presented first, should be put to the vote first.

[80]

MR. SAINT-LOT (Haiti) explained that his proposal did not contradict the Egyptian proposal, but rather supplemented it. The Egyptian representative wanted the Committee to decide first just what its work would be and whether it should deal with all parts of the draft bill of human rights or merely with the draft declaration. Mr. Saint-Lot felt that the declaration should not be isolated from the rest of the bill, but that all parts should be considered together. If the declaration alone were adopted, States and peoples would come to the conclusion that the United Nations was merely formulating principles which were meaningless, as no provisions had been made for their implementation. Only if all three parts of the draft bill were adopted at the same time could conditions really be changed and therefore the Committee should not agree to recommend the adoption of one part alone. He recalled, moreover, that the Economic and Social Council had transmitted to the General Assembly not only the draft declaration but the draft covenant and the suggestions for implementation as well.

With regard to the draft covenant, he thought the General Assembly should not hesitate to propose a covenant that might require that changes be made in national legislation as Member States had voluntarily renounced their absolute sovereignty when they signed the Charter.

COUNT CARTON DE WIART (Belgium), speaking on a point of order, called for closure of the debate and asked that, under rule 120 of the rules of procedure, the two proposals before the Committee be put to the vote in the order in which they had been submitted.

MR. KAMINSKY (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) opposed closure of the debate. Concerning the order in which the proposals should be put, he believed that rule 119, rather than rule 120, was applicable, inasmuch as the Haitian representative appeared to consider his proposal as constituting an amendment to the Egyptian proposal. Moreover, previous to the Belgian motion, the USSR representative had requested, in accordance with rule 109, that the Haitian proposal should be submitted in writing and circulated. He asked that the debate be continued.

MR. PAVLOV called the Chairman's attention to the fact that rules applying to the work of Committees rather than those applying to the plenary meetings of the General Assembly should be followed.

THE CHAIRMAN assured the USSR representative that the Haitian proposal would not be voted upon at the current meeting. As it constituted a separate proposal, the latter would be put to the vote first.

[81]

MR. SAINT-LOT (Haiti) accepted that procedure.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the motion for closure of the debate.

The motion was adopted by 42 votes to none, with 12 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the second part of the Egyptian proposal to the vote in parts as requested by the USSR representative.

He put the first part to the vote.

That part was adopted by 42 votes to 5, with 4 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the second part of the Egyptian proposal.

That part was adopted by 47 votes to none, with 3 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the third part of the Egyptian proposal.

That part was adopted by 36 votes to none, with 13 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the Egyptian proposal as a whole.

The proposal was adopted by 41 votes to 3, with 7 abstentions.

MR. SAINT-LOT (Haiti) thereupon withdrew his proposal.

MR. KAMINSKY (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) maintained that violation of the rules of procedure had made it impossible for representatives to put forward and maintain proposals which they had every right to make. He felt that numerous instances of such violation had occurred.

THE CHAIRMAN denied categorically that any breach of the rules of procedure had taken place.

MR. SAINT-LOT (Haiti) called attention to the fact that the proposal stated orally by the Egyptian representative at the 93rd meeting had merely consisting in asking whether the declaration alone was to be considered by the Committee, or all three documents relating to human rights. The written proposal which had been put to the vote had been radically different. As it had been accepted by the Egyptian representative, he could make no formal objection; he felt, however, that in the course of the meeting far more sacred matters than rules of procedure had been violated.

THE CHAIRMAN put before the Committee, the second proposal of the Egyptian representative, which read as follows:

“The Third Committee decides that the international declaration of human rights shall confine itself to the formulation of principles concerning the rights of man, leaving aside the rights and duties of States.”

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) enquired whether the second part of that proposal meant that all mention of the duties of man was also to be excluded from the declaration. His delegation was not in favour of such exclusion.

THE CHAIRMAN replied that the point raised by the Cuban representative was dealt with in the [82] third proposal submitted by the representative of Egypt.

MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) observed that the text before the Committee went considerably further than the Egyptian representative had done in his statement. It was one thing to say, as had frequently been said, that the declaration imposed no legal obligations upon States, and quite another to maintain that all mention of the duties of States towards individuals should be excluded from it. Such a declaration would be a document of less than academic value. The distinction between the declaration and the covenant with regard to legal obligations had been sufficiently stressed; the present Egyptian proposal was consequently unnecessary.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) thought that the Egyptian proposal went counter to accepted practice. The Committee was asked, before it had so much as glanced at the draft declaration, to take a decision which would pre-judge the contents of that declaration. Although the document drafted by the Commission on Human Rights was not satisfactory in all respects, it did represent a basis for discussion. If the Egyptian proposal were accepted, the Committee would have to begin the task of drafting a declaration all over again.

Moreover, it was clear that a declaration of human rights must contain some mention of the duties of States, as the former necessarily implied the latter. Any human rights – such as the right to vote – implied an obligation on the part of the State to ensure conditions under which it could be exercised. That the declaration would have moral and political rather than legal weight was a different question entirely. The Egyptian proposal was aimed not at the nature, but at the contents of the document. It was quite impossible to draft a declaration of human rights without enumerating the duties of States which correspond to those rights.

Further, if all mention of the rights of States were omitted, it would be impossible to include in the declaration any reference to the duties of individual citizens. The declaration already stated some of those duties, although others should be added, to ensure that selfish interests of individuals did not infringe the interests of society.

Mr. Pavlov urged that the Egyptian proposal should be rejected on the grounds that it pre-judged a question which had not yet been discussed. Decisions concerning human rights and duties, as well as the rights and duties of States, should be taken on a priori, but during the detailed discussion of each article, on the merits of each separate case. If the Egyptian proposal were [83] accepted, it would be impossible to adopt a declaration, since, in practical life, rights and duties were inextricably bound together.

He expressed the hope that the Egyptian representative would withdraw his proposal.

MR. CASSIN (France) thought that there was a misunderstanding. The Egyptian representative had merely wanted to confine the discussion to the subject of human rights, excluding rights and duties of States which were extraneous to that subject. However, as some fear had been expressed that too narrow an interpretation might be put on the Egyptian proposal, he suggested, as an amendment, the addition at the end of some such phrase as "having no relation to human rights". The effect would be to exclude relations between States and problems of international law only.

BADAWI BEY (Egypt) observed that, in his opinion, the declaration should contain a statement of human rights alone. All the duties of States should be enumerated in another document, such as the covenant on human rights, or a separate covenant on the rights and duties of States.

THE CHAIRMAN asked the French and Egyptian representatives to submit a joint proposal at the following meeting.

The meeting rose at 1:5 p.m.

A/C.3/225

6 October 1948

Peru: Amendment to the draft Declaration (E/800)

Delete Article 16 of the text as it appears in document E/800 and insert instead the following:

"Every person has the right freely to profess a religious faith, and to express it in thought and in practice, both in public as well as in private."

A/C.3/226

6 October 1948

Union of South Africa: Amendments to the Draft
Declaration (E/800)

Preamble

In paragraph 3, delete the words “protected by a regime of law”, and substitute the words “respected and observed”.

In paragraph 4, delete the words “and to promote social progress and better standards of life in larger freedom”.

Article 1

Delete the words “in dignity and rights”, and substitute the words “in fundamental human rights and freedoms”.

Article 6

Delete the words “against any discrimination in violation of this Declaration and against any incitement to such discrimination”.

A/C.3/227

6 October 1948

Original Text: French

Bolivia: Amendment to the Draft Declaration (E/800)

Add to Article 11, paragraph 1 a second sentence reading as follows:

“This right shall extend to asylum in embassies or legations.”

A/C.3/228

6 October 1948

Original Text: French

Guatemala: Amendment to the Draft Declaration (E/800)

Articles 1 and 2

Delete Articles 1 and 2 of the Draft Declaration and transfer their contents to the Preamble.

A/C.3/229

6 October 1948

Mexico: Amendment to article 7 of the draft
Declaration (E/800)

“All human beings are born free and equal in dignity and rights. The right of sustenance, health, education and work is considered essential in order to guarantee social justice and the full development of the human being.”

A/C.3/230

6 October 1948

Original Text: English, French

Compilation of Amendments to the Draft Declaration of Human Rights Submitted to the Third Committee before 4 p.m. 6 October in Chronological Order

Draft International Declaration of Human Rights

Preamble

Whereas recognition of the inherent dignity and of the equal and inalienable rights of all members of the human family is the foundation of freedom, justice and peace in the world; and

Whereas disregard and contempt for human rights resulted, before and during the Second World War, in barbarous acts which outraged the conscience of mankind and made it apparent that the fundamental freedoms were one of the supreme issues of the conflict; and

Whereas it is essential, if mankind is not to be compelled as a last resort to rebel against tyranny and oppression, that human rights should be protected by a regime of law; and

Whereas the peoples of the United Nations have in the Charter determined to reaffirm faith in fundamental human rights and in the dignity and worth of the human person and to promote social progress and better standards of life in larger freedom; and

Whereas Member States have pledged themselves to achieve, in co-operation with the Organization, the promotion of universal respect for and observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms; and

Whereas a common understanding of these rights and freedoms is of the greatest importance for the full realization of this pledge,

Now therefore the General Assembly

Proclaims this Declaration of Human Rights as a common standard of achievement for all peoples and all nations, to the end that every individual and every organ of society, keeping this Declaration constantly in mind, shall strive by teaching and education to promote respect for these rights and freedoms and by progressive measures, national and international, [2] to secure their universal and effective recognition and observance, both among the peoples of Member States themselves and among the peoples of territories under their jurisdiction.

Amendments:

Netherlands: Amendment to the first paragraph of the preamble (Document A/C.3/219)

Insert after the words “human family” the following text: “based on man’s divine origin and immortal destiny”.

Dominican Republic (Document A/C.3/217)

In paragraph 4, line 2 delete the word “and” and substitute a comma; line 3, after the words “human person”, insert the words: “and in equality of rights between men, and women”.

Union des Républiques Socialistes Soviétiques (Document E/800)

(Draft Preamble)

“In accordance with the principles proclaimed in the Charter of the United Nations of respect for human rights and basic freedom for all without distinction as to race, sex, language and religion and for the dignity and value of the individual;

In order to ensure observance of all those rights and freedoms with a view to promoting social progress and improving living conditions of the peoples;

With a view also to promoting the development of friendly relations between nations;

The General Assembly recommends the following “Declaration of Human Rights” to all States Members of the United Nations to be used at their discretion both in adopting appropriate legislative and other measures, and in their systems of upbringing and education and in extending the provisions of this Declaration to the peoples of State Members themselves and to the populations of all the territories in respect of which the States concerned discharge the function of the guiding and administering authority (populations of trust and other non-self-governing territories).”

Cuba (Document 4/C.3/224)

Before the enumeration of Rights insert the following text:

“All men are born free and equal in dignity and rights; being endowed by nature with reason they should act towards one another like brothers.”

Respect for the rights of all requires that each shall do his duty. In all human activity, both social and political rights and duties are indivisibly linked with one another. While rights enhance individual freedom, duties express the dignity of that freedom.

[3]

Duties of a legal nature presuppose other duties of a moral nature which facilitate their understanding and serve as their foundation.

It is the duty of man to practise, uphold and promote culture by all means at his disposal, for culture is the highest social and historical expression of the human spirit.

Morality being the noblest product of culture, it is the duty of all to respect it at all times.”

Union of South Africa (Document A/C.3/226)

In paragraph 3, delete the words “protected by a regime of law”, and substitute the words “respected and observed”.

In paragraph 4, delete the words “and to promote social progress and better standards of life in larger freedom”.

Article 1Text adopted by the Commission on Human Rights

All human beings are born free and equal in dignity and rights. They are endowed by nature with reason and conscience, and should act towards one another in a spirit of brotherhood.

Amendments:Brazil (Document A/C.3/215)

Amendment to the second part of Article 1

Amend the second sentence to read:

“Created in the image and likeness of God, they are endowed with reason and conscience, and should act towards one another in a spirit of brotherhood.”

Panama (Document A/C.3/220)Article 1

It is proposed that it be eliminated.

Amendments:Cuba (Document A/C.3/224)

Delete this article and insert its substance in the preamble (see “Preamble”).

Union of South Africa (Document A/C.3/226)

Delete the words “in dignity and rights”, and substitute the words “in fundamental human rights and freedoms”.

Guatemala (Document A/C.3/228)

Delete articles 1 and 2 of the Draft Declaration and transfer their contents to the Preamble.

[4]

Mexico: (Document A/C.3/229)

“All human beings are born free and equal in dignity and rights. The right of sustenance, health, education and work is considered essential in order to guarantee social justice and the full development of the human being.”

Article 2

Text adopted by the Commission on Human Rights

Everyone is entitled to all the rights and freedoms set forth in this Declaration, without distinction of any kind, such as race, colour, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, property or other status, or national or social origin.

Amendments:Panama (Document A/C.3/220)Article 2

It is proposed that this article be merged with Article 6 in order to have one single article dealing with the right to equality, as proposed in connection with Article 6.

Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (Document E/800)

Addition to Article 2

After the words “property or other status”, add “class”.

(Amendments)Cuba (Document A/C.3/224)

Replace this article by the following text:

“All are equal before the law and are entitled to the rights, and subject to the duties, laid down in this Declaration without distinction of race, birth, sex, language, religion, political opinion, or property or other status.”

The wording would make it unnecessary to include Article 6.

[5]

Article 3Text adopted by the Commission on Human Rights*

Everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of person.

Amendments:

Panama (Document A/C.3/220)

Article 3

Its total elimination is proposed.

It is proposed that the rights to life and liberty be defined as follows:

Article – Every human being has the right to exist and to maintain, develop, protect and defend his existence.

Article – No one shall be subjected to arbitrary arrest or detention. Every person who has been detained has a right to have the legality of his detention [sic] judicially without any delay. Neither shall anyone be held in slavery or involuntary servitude. (Paragraph 1, Article 4 of Draft).

An additional article is proposed containing the text of Paragraph 2 of Article 4 of the Draft, as follows:

Article – No one shall be subjected to torture, or to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.

(Amendments)

Cuba (Document A/C.3/224)

“Every human being has the right to life, liberty, security and integrity of person.”
[6]

Article 4Text adopted by the Commission on Human Rights*

1. No one shall be held in slavery or involuntary servitude.
2. No one shall be subjected to torture or to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.

Amendments:

Panama (Document A/C.3/220)

It is proposed that this article be suppressed in its present form and that its text be used as stated above.

Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (Document E/800)

Addition to Article 4

“Slavery and the slave trade are prohibited in all their aspects; and all violations or this principle, whether they be of an overt or clandestine nature, must be punished according to law.”

AmendmentsCuba (Document A/C.3/224)

Delete the first paragraph.

Replace the second paragraph by the following text:

“No one shall be subject to cruel, degrading and non-customary punishment.”

Insert this text in the part related to the purely juridical rights (see Article 26).

Article 5Text adopted by the Commission on Human Rights*

Everyone has the right to recognition everywhere as a person before the law.

AmendmentCuba (Document A/C.3/224)

Replace this article by the following text:

“Everyone has the right to recognition everywhere as possessing rights and obligations and enjoying fundamental civil rights.”

Place this text at the beginning of the part related to the purely juridical rights (see Article 16).

Article 6Text adopted by the Commission on Human Rights*

All are equal before the law and are entitled without any discrimination to equal protection of the law against any discrimination in violation of this Declaration and against any incitement to such discrimination.

[7]

Amendments:Panama (Document A/C.3/220)

It is proposed to have the text of this article combined with that of Articles 2 and 8, as follows:

Article – All are equal before the law and are entitled to equal protection of the law and to enjoy all the rights and freedoms set forth in this Declaration, without distinction of any kind, such as race, colour, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, property or other status, or national or social origin.

Article 6Cuba* (Document A/C.3/224)

Delete this article.

Union of South Africa (Document A/C.3/226)

Delete the words “against any discrimination in violation of this Declaration and against any incitement to such discrimination”.

Article 7Text adopted by the Commission on Human Rights

No one shall be subjected to arbitrary arrest or detention.

Amendments:Panama (Document A/C.3/220)

It is proposed that this article be replaced in the manner above stated in connection with Article 3.

Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (Document E/800)

Addition to Article 7

“Anyone deprived of his liberty has the right to be informed without delay of the grounds for his detention. Anyone who is arrested, detained or imprisoned is entitled to have immediately established by the judicial authorities the legality of his deprivation of liberty, and also to have his case brought before the court without undue delay or to be liberated.

No one may be imprisoned on account merely of failure to carry out his contractual obligations.

Everyone is entitled to compensation for illegal arrest or deprivation of liberty.”

Article 7Cuba (Document A/C.3/224)

Replace the following text:

“No one may be deprived of his freedom except in such cases as are covered by existing laws and in conformity with the procedure prescribed by them.

[8]

“No one may be detained for failure to carry out obligations of a purely civil character.

“Any person who has been deprived of his freedom is entitled to have the legality of the measures to which he has been subjected immediately confirmed by a judge, and to be tried without unjustifiable delay or, failing that, to be released.

“He is also entitled to humane treatment while under detention.”

Insert this text in the part related to the purely juridical rights (Article 25: Protection against arbitrary arrest).

Article 8Text adopted by the Commission on Human Rights*

In the determination of his rights and obligations and of any criminal charge against him, everyone is entitled in full equality to a fair hearing by an independent and impartial tribunal.

Amendments:Panama (Document A/C.3/220)

It is proposed that the phrase “in full equality” be eliminated from this article in as much as the subject of equality is covered by another article.

It is further proposed that an article dealing in toto with the subject of fair trial to be made up of Article 8, modified as stated above, and the first paragraph of Article 9, as follows:

Article –

1. In the determination of his rights and obligations and of any criminal charge against him, everyone is entitled to a fair hearing by an independent and impartial tribunal.

2. Everyone charged with a penal offence has the right to be presumed innocent until proved guilty according to law in a public trial at which he has had all the guarantees necessary for his defence.

Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (Document E/800)

Alterations and Supplements to Article 8:

Insert the following before the text as adopted by the Commission:

“All people are equal before the law. Judges must be independent and answerable only to the law. Legal procedure in all States must be based on democratic principles.

Hearings in all courts must be public, with the exception of cases for which provision is made by law for the purpose of complying with public morality or in the interests of national security. The accused shall be entitled to the services of a defence counsel in court.

[9]

Should the accused be unfamiliar with the national language, he must be enabled to acquaint himself with all the details of the case by means of an interpreter, and he must be given the right to speak in court in his native language.”

Articles 8 and 9Cuba (Document A/C.3/224)*

Replace by the following text:

“Any person against whom a charge is made is presumed to be innocent until proved guilty according to law.

“Everyone charged with a penal offence has the right to an impartial and public hearing and trial by previously established tribunals in accordance with existing laws.

“Such person shall not be subjected to cruel, degrading or non-customary punishment.”

Insert these texts in the part relating to the purely juridical rights (see Article 26).

Article 9

Text adopted by the Commission on Human Rights

1. Everyone charged with a penal offence has the right to be presumed innocent until proved guilty according to law in a public trial at which he has had all the guarantees necessary for his defence.

2. No one shall be held guilty of any offence on account of any act or omission which did not constitute an offence, under national or international law, at the time when it was committed.

Amendments:

Panama (Document A/C.3/220)

It is proposed that the second paragraph of this article be made part of a separate article dealing with the right to security against ex post facto laws, as follows:

Article – No one shall be held guilty of any offence on account of any act or omission which did not constitute an offence, under national or international law, at the time when it was committed. Neither can anyone be imposed a heavier penalty than the one that was applicable at the time the offence was committed.

Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (Document E/800)

Before the word “trial” delete “public”, and after the word “defence” add: “. . .and which must be public except in cases involving considerations of the protection of public morality or national security.”

[10]

United States of America (Document A/C.3/223)

Insert the word “penal” before the word “offence” in the second paragraph of Article 9, as to read:

Article 9

2. No one shall be held guilty of any penal offence on account of any act or omission which did not constitute a penal offence, under national or international law, at the time when it was committed.”

Article 10Text adopted by the Commission on Human Rights*

No one shall be subjected to unreasonable interference with his privacy, family, home, correspondence or reputation.

Amendment:

Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (Document E/800)

Supplement to the text as adopted “and everyone is entitled to legal defence against such interference”.

Article 11Text adopted by the Commission on Human Rights*

Everyone has the right to freedom of movement and residence within the borders of each State.

Everyone has the right to leave any country, including his own.

Amendments:

Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (Document E/800)

Paragraph 1. After the words “residence within the borders of each State”, add “in accordance with the laws of that State”.

Paragraph 2. After the words “to leave any country, including his own”, add “in accordance with the procedure laid down in the laws of that country”.

Article 12Text adopted by the Commission on Human Rights*

Everyone has the right to seek and be granted, in other countries, asylum from persecution.

Prosecutions genuinely arising from non-political crimes or from acts contrary to the purposes and principles of the United Nations do not constitute persecution.

Amendments:

Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (Document E/800)

Replace paragraph 1 by the following:

“The right of asylum is guaranteed to all persons persecuted in connexion with their activity in defence of the interests of democracy [11] or for their scientific activity or for their participation in the struggle for national liberation.”

Article 12

Bolivia (Document A/C.3/227)

Add to Article 12, paragraph 1, a second sentence which reads as follows:

“The right shall extend to asylum in embassies or legations.”

Article 13

Text adopted by the Commission on Human Rights

No one shall be arbitrarily deprived of his nationality or denied the right to change his nationality.

Amendments:

Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (Document E/800)

The following wording is proposed:

“No one shall be arbitrarily deprived of his nationality, i.e. in any other manner or in any other case than as provided for in the laws of the country concerned.”

Article 14

Text adopted by the Commission on Human Rights

1. Men and women of full age have the right to marry and to found a family and are entitled to equal rights as to marriage.

2. Marriage shall be entered into only with the full consent of both intending spouses.

3. The family is the natural and fundamental group unit of society and is entitled to protection.

Amendments:

Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (Document E/800)

Paragraph 2. Add after the first sentence of the text as adopted: “Men and women shall enjoy equal rights both during marriage and when divorced.”

Paragraph 3. At the end of the third paragraph add the words “by society and the State.”

[12]

Article 15

Text adopted by the Commission on Human Rights

1. Everyone has the right to own property alone as well as in association with others.

2. No one shall be arbitrarily deprived of his property.

Amendments:

Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (Document E/800)

Replace the text as adopted by:

Everyone has the right to own property alone as well as in association with others in accordance with the laws of the country where such property is situated.

No one shall be arbitrarily, i.e. illegally, deprived of his property.”

Article 16

Text adopted by the Commission on Human Rights

Everyone has the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion; this right includes freedom to change his religion or belief, and freedom, either alone or in community with others and in public or private, to manifest his religion or belief in teaching, practice, worship and observance.

Amendments:

Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (Document E/800)

Replace the text as adopted by the following:

“Everyone must be guaranteed freedom of thought and freedom to perform religion services in accordance with the laws of the country concerned and the requirements of public morality.”

Amendments:

Cuba (Document A/C.3/224)

Place the text replacing article 5 before this article.

Peru (Doc.<sup>21</sup>)

Delete article 16 and replace it by the following text:

“Every person has the right freely to profess a religion faith, and to express it in thought and in practice, both in public as well as in private.”

Article 17

Text adopted by the Commission on Human Rights

Everyone has the right to freedom of opinion and expression; this right includes freedom to hold opinions without interference and to seek, receive and impart information and ideas through any media and regardless of frontiers.

[13]

Amendments:

Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (Document E/800)

Replace the text as adopted by the following:

“1. In accordance with the principles of democracy and in the interests of strengthening international collaboration and world peace, everyone must be legally guaranteed the right freely to express his opinions and, in particular, freedom of speech and the Press and also freedom of artistic expression. Freedom of speech and the Press shall not be used for purposes of propagating fascism, aggression and for provoking hatred as between nations.

<sup>21</sup> The original text omits the document number.

“2. For the purpose of enabling the wider masses of the people and their organizations to give free expression to their opinions the State will assist and co-operate in making available the material resources (premises, printing presses, paper, etc.) necessary for the publication of democratic organs of the Press.”

Second Amendment:

The following changes should be introduced into the text as adopted:

“Everyone has the right to freedom of thought and its expression; wherein is included freedom of conviction and freedom of access to sources of information and means of communication for the transmission of information in the territory of his own country and also in other countries, within limits corresponding to the interests of national security.”

Article 18

Text adopted by the Commission on Human Rights

Everyone has the right to freedom of assembly and association.

Amendments:

Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (Document E/800)

Replace the text as adopted by the following:

“In the interests of democracy a legal guarantee must be provided for freedom of assembly and meeting, street processions, demonstrations and the organization of voluntary societies and unions. All societies, unions and other organizations of a fascist or anti-democratic nature, as well as their activity in any form, are forbidden by law under pain of punishment.”

United States of America (Document A/C.3/223)

Substitute the following text for the present text:

“Everyone has the right to freedom of assembly and association, especially for the promotion and protection of the rights and freedoms set forth in this Declaration.”

[14]

Article 19

Text adopted by the Commission on Human Rights

1. Everyone has the right to take part in the government of his country, directly or through his freely chosen representatives.
2. Everyone has the right of access to public employment in his country.
3. Everyone has the right to a government which conforms to the will of the people.

Amendments:Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (Document E/800)

Include the following in paragraph 3:

“The State shall consider the will of the people as expressed in elections, which shall be conducted periodically and must be universal and equal and be held by secret ballot.”

Article 20Text adopted by the Commission on Human Rights*

Everyone, as a member of society, has the right to social security and is entitled to the realization, through national effort and international co-operation, and in accordance with the organization and resources of each State, of the economic, social and cultural rights set out below.

Amendments:Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (Document E/800)

Replace the text as adopted by the following:

“It is the duty of the State and society to take all the necessary measures, including legislative measures, to ensure for every individual a real opportunity to enjoy all the rights mentioned in the Declaration. In view of the special importance of the economic, social and cultural rights enumerated in Articles 21 to 26 of the Declaration and, in particular, of the right to social security, it is considered desirable that they be implemented by means of both national efforts and international co-operation, due regard being had to the social, economic and political organization and resources of each State.”

Article 21Text adopted by the Commission on Human Rights*

1. Everyone has the right to work, to just and favourable conditions of work and pay and to protection against unemployment.
2. Everyone has the right to equal pay for equal work.
3. Everyone is free to form and to join trade unions for the protection of his interests.

Amendments:

[15]

Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (Document E/800)

After the words “right to work . . . and pay” add “and the right to protection against unemployment. The State and society shall guarantee this right by measures calculated to provide everyone with the broadest of opportunities for useful work, and to prevent unemployment.”

Second amendment

Add:

“Everyone, without distinction as to race, nationality or sex, has the right to equal pay for equal work.”

Proposed supplementary clause to article 21.

“Women shall enjoy equal advantages in their work with men and shall receive equal pay for equal work.”

United States of America (Document A/C.3/223)

Substitute the following text for the present text of the second paragraph:

“2. Men and women have the right to equal pay for equal work.”

Article 22Text adopted by the Commission on Human Rights*

1. Everyone has the right to a standard of living, including food, clothing, housing and medical care and to social services, adequate for the health and wellbeing of himself and his family and to security in the event of unemployment, sickness, disability, old age or other lack of livelihood in circumstances beyond his control.

2. Mother and child have the right to special care and assistance.

Amendments:Dominican Republic (Document A/C.3/217)

Delete paragraph 2 and substitute Article VII of the American Declaration of the Rights and Duties of Man, adopted at Bogotá, which reads as follows:

“All expectant and nursing mothers and all children have the right to special protection, care and aid.”

Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (Document E/800)

Include the right to social insurance by inserting in paragraph 1 (after the words “. . . in circumstances beyond his control”) the words “and also (if he is gainfully employed) to social insurance at the expense of the State or of his employers, in accordance with the legislation of each country”.

In addition, add the following points also to article 22 in the form of two independent sentences:

“2. Everyone has the right to medical care and assistance in case of illness.

“3. Everyone has the right to decent housing.

“It is the duty of the State and society to take all necessary steps including legislation, to ensure that everyone has a real opportunity of enjoying all these rights.”

[16]

Article 23Text adopted by the Commission on Human Rights*

1. Everyone has the right to education. Elementary and fundamental education shall be free and compulsory and there shall be equal access on the basis of merit to higher education.

2. Education shall be directed to the full development of the human personality, to strengthening respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms and to combating the spirit of intolerance and hatred against other nations and against racial and religious groups everywhere.

Amendments:Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (Document E/800)

Add in paragraph 1 after the first sentence:

“Access to education must be open to all without any distinction as to race, sex, language, material status or party allegiance.”

Article 24Text adopted by the Commission on Human Rights*

Everyone has the right to rest and leisure.

Amendments:Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (Document E/800)

Add to the text adopted:

“Everyone shall be guaranteed rest and leisure either by law or by contractual agreements, particular provision being made for the reasonable limitation of working hours and for periodical paid holidays.”

Article 25Text adopted by the Commission on Human Rights*

Everyone has the right to participate in the cultural life of the community, to enjoy the arts and to share in scientific advancement.

Amendments:Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (Document E/800)

Add to the text adopted:

“The development of science must serve the interests of progress and democracy and the cause of international peace and co-operation.”

Cuba (Document A/C.3/224)

Insert in this article the text replacing Article 7.

Article 26Text adopted by the Commission on Human Rights*

Everyone is entitled to a good social and international order in which the rights and freedoms set out in this Declaration can be fully realized.

[17]

Amendments:

Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (Document E/800)

At the beginning of the sentence: “Everyone is entitled to a good social and international order in which . . .” delete the word “good” (or, in the second variant of the text, the word “just”).

Cuba (Document A/C.3/224)

Insert in this article the texts replacing Articles 4, 8 and 9.

Article 27Text adopted by the Commission on Human Rights*

1. Everyone has duties to the community which enables him freely to develop his personality.

2. In the exercise of his rights, everyone shall be subject only to such limitations as are necessary to secure due recognition and respect for the rights of others and the requirements of morality, public order and general welfare in a democratic society.

Amendments:

Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (Document E/800)

Add (after the words “democratic society”):

“ . . . and also the corresponding requirements of the democratic State”.

United States of America (Document A/C.3/223)

Amend the second paragraph of this article to read as follows:

“Article 27

2. In the exercise of his rights and freedoms, everyone shall be subject only to such limitations as are necessary to secure due recognition and respect for the rights of others and the requirements of morality, public order and general welfare in a democratic society.”

Article 28Text adopted by the Commission on Human Rights*

Nothing in this Declaration shall imply the recognition of the right of any State or person to engage in any activity aimed at the destruction of any of the rights and freedoms prescribed herein.

NOTE:

The Commission has not considered the following article since measures of implementation were not in its third session:

“Everyone has the right, either individually, or in association with others, to petition or to communicate with the public authorities of the State of which he is a national or in which he resides, or with the United Nations.”

[18]

Additional Articles

Cuba (Document A/C.3/216)

Insert in the text of the Declaration an Article worded as follows:

“Any person shall have the right to offer appropriate resistance to manifest acts of oppression or tyranny”.

Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (Document E/800)

Add to the text adopted a separate new paragraph in place of the corresponding Article 31 of the Geneva text rejected by the Commission:

“All persons, irrespective of whether they belong to the racial, national or religious minority or majority of the population, have the right to their own ethnic or national culture, to establish their own schools and receive teaching in their native tongue, and to use that tongue in the press, at public meetings, in the courts and in other official premises.”

A/C.3/SR.95<sup>22</sup>

6 October 1948

Summary Record of the Ninety-Fifth Meeting
[of the Third Committee]

Held at the Palais de Chaillot, Paris, on Wednesday,
6 October 1948 at 3:15 p.m.

Chairman: MR. CHARLES MALIK (Lebanon).

16. Draft international declaration of human rights (E/800) (continued)

THE CHAIRMAN read paragraphs 2 and 3 of the Egyptian delegation’s proposal (A/C.3/222), paragraph 1 having already been adopted at the 94th meeting:

<sup>22</sup> The text of the document is from Official Records of the General Assembly, Third Session, 1948, pp. 83–95.

“2. The Third Committee decides that the declaration of human rights shall be limited to the formulation of principles relating to human rights which presuppose the existence of corresponding duties on the part of States and defers the formulation of principles relating to the duties of States for incorporation in an appropriate instrument.

“3. The Third Committee decides that the declaration of human rights shall deal both with human rights and with the duties corresponding thereto.”

BADAWI BEY (Egypt) stated that he did not intend to question the close relationships between human rights and the duties of States. The Egyptian representative read a passage from a statement he had made at the Committee’s 92nd meeting, in which, while admitting the relationship, he had felt it advisable to omit from the declaration any allusion to the duties of the State, because that would demand more direct and closer consideration.

[84]

The question was whether the duty of States to respect human rights belonged exclusively to internal legislation or whether it should be ratified by international law. The United Nations Charter had made the respecting of human rights a matter of concern to the entire international community (Articles 1 (paragraph 3), 13 (paragraph 1 b), 55 (paragraph c) and 76 (paragraph c)).

Furthermore, the statement on the “Principles of international morality adopted at the XXXVIIth Inter-Parliamentary Conference” (A/C.3/221) specifically mentioned some duties of the State, for example, the duty that “there should be granted to all citizens . . . the exercise of rights which will ensure the free development of their individuality” (article 15), the duty to grant asylum to refugees (article 16), and the duty to secure for manual and intellectual workers “respect for their dignity, their right to work, to rest and leisure, and a fair remuneration for their labours” (article 18).

The Egyptian representative thought that all the other duties of the State, corresponding to each of the various human rights, should be specified in a separate international document which would be a necessary complement to the declaration of human rights.

If a mere mention were made of some of the duties of the State, that would have the disadvantage of giving the impression that it was a comprehensive list. Moreover, the reference to the duties of States had a detrimental effect on the harmony of the declaration of human rights. Thus article 20 of the draft stated that the exercise of economic, social and cultural rights depended upon the resources of each country. That question, referring as it did to practical measures for implementation, should not appear in a text which aimed at defining an ideal.

The Egyptian delegation had submitted its proposal with the intention of fitting human rights into the international framework provided for by the Charter. The proposal was also intended to facilitate the Committee’s work. The Egyptian delegation did not therefore wish to have a rigid formula imposed. It had accepted the amendment submitted by the representative of France at the previous meeting, it being understood that that would in no way prejudice any decisions which the Committee on the Progressive Development of International Law and its Codification might make concerning the international duties of States.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) stated that, as it was drafted, paragraph 2 of the Egyptian proposal left no doubt that the human rights, with which the draft declaration dealt, necessarily implied duties on the part of States, as had been emphasized by the Uruguayan, USSR and French representatives.

Paragraph 3 of the Egyptian delegation's proposal touched on a question on which there had been divergences of opinion in the Committee. On the one hand, the countries of Latin America wanted the declaration to include a list of the duties of the individual; on the other hand, some members, among them Professor Cassin, felt that the reference, in article 27 of the draft, was adequate. So as not to prejudice the outcome of the discussion, Mr. Santa Cruz suggested that the wording of paragraph 3 of the proposal should be rendered less imperative, as follows: "the declaration of human rights may deal with . . . rights . . .", instead of saying: "the declaration . . . shall deal . . ."

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) pointed out that each human right implied a corresponding duty on the part of the State. The exact definition of the duties of States was a legal question, which necessarily placed it outside the scope of the international declaration of human rights.

With regard to paragraph 3 of the Egyptian proposal, the Commission on Human Rights had discussed at length whether the declaration should be completed by listing the duties of the individual. It had come to the conclusion that it was preferable to list the rights only, while making an explicit reference to the duties of the individual to society. Article 27 of the draft dealt with that matter.

The United States delegation was opposed to the adoption of paragraphs 2 and 3 of the Egyptian proposal.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) thought that paragraph 1 of the Egyptian proposal, which had already been adopted by the Third Committee, excluded the possibilities visualized in paragraphs 2 and 3 of the same proposal, since it had been decided to use the draft declaration as a basis for discussion.

The Committee should not lose itself in abstractions. Delegations which wished to have additional clauses inserted could do so when the draft was discussed article by article. If, however, the Egyptian proposal were accepted, the question as to which documents should embrace the rights and duties of States would be prejudged. That was an entirely new question, of which the Assembly had not been seized.

The USSR representative thought that the discussion of the draft article by article should be begun and that the Committee should not become involved in a discussion of principle which would involve reconsideration of all the work done so far.

THE CHAIRMAN expressed his satisfaction at the agreement reached on that question between the United States and USSR delegations. He asked the Egyptian representative if he would withdraw his proposal so that the Committee might benefit by that favourable circumstance.

BADAWI BEY (Egypt) remarked that item 2 of his proposal did not prejudge the question whether the duties of States should be included in the declaration or whether, on the contrary, they should be defined in a separate declaration.

With regard to the duties of the individual, any delegation was perfectly entitled to submit appropriate proposals when the matter was being discussed article by article. He had thought that he was giving the Committee the opportunity of clarifying the debate at the very outset by having it take a decision of principle on the matter.

[86]

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) thought that the discussion would become clearer if paragraphs 2 and 3 of the Egyptian proposal were examined separately.

He agreed with the Chilean representative that proclaiming the rights of man was tantamount to a statement of the corresponding duties on the part of States. That was beyond discussion.

Mr. Pérez Cisneros also agreed with the United States representative that the declaration could not be likened to a legal commitment. That document would, however, have to be worded in such a way as to eliminate any confusion and to impress the greatest number of people in all countries. In conclusion, the Cuban representative said he felt there was no need to put paragraph 2 of the Egyptian proposal to the vote.

Mr. Pérez Cisneros then went on to say that the declaration should list the obligations of the individual since his rights could exist only in correlation with its duties. The declaration should not convey the impression that it was fostering anarchic tendencies.

THE CHAIRMAN announced that the discussion would deal only with paragraph 3 of the Egyptian proposal.

MR. CASSIN (France) agreed with the USSR representative that the Committee's terms of reference were clear-cut; its task was to study human rights. The question of the duties of the individual covered an extremely large field, since it included not only duties to the State but also the individual's duties to all the social groups of which he was a part. The proposal under discussion did mention the duties of the individual explicitly in article 27. If the Committee were to follow the proposal of the Egyptian representative, however, it would become necessary to draft a declaration of duties corresponding to the declaration of rights. It was obviously impossible to complete such a task during the current session.

The French representative said he would vote against paragraphs 2 and 3 of the Egyptian proposal.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) asked The Chairman whether, in the event of the rejection of the Egyptian proposal, the concrete proposals indicating the duties of the individual in relation to various articles of the draft would be acceptable.

THE CHAIRMAN made it clear that the proposal did not bind the Committee with regard to the drafting of separate articles. Rejection of the proposal would mean that the Committee would make no decision of principle concerning the duties of the individual before starting to examine the draft.

MR. ALFARO (Panama) pointed out that the Charter of the United Nations, and the three instruments which were to form the Charter of Human Rights, were intended to meet the desire to have a definition of the duties of States. The Preamble and seven Articles of the Charter drawn up at San Francisco bound States to respect human rights. The preamble to the international declaration of human rights reiterated that commitment.

[87]

The practical task facing the Committee was to examine the articles of the existing draft. The representative of Panama would vote against the Egyptian proposal. That did not mean he did not appreciate the need for defining the duties of the individual but he felt that that should not be done at that stage.

MR. WATT (Australia) believed that the decision of principle recommended by the Egyptian delegation would be justified if it succeeded in shortening the discussions, but the contrary was the case.

The Australian representative suggested examining the articles of the draft one by one.

COUNT CARTON DE WIART (Belgium) also thought that the question of the rights and duties of States was different from the task assigned to the Committee. Article 27 of the draft declaration was well-worded, for it did not mention exclusively the obligations of the individual to the State. Indeed, man had duties to his family, to his neighbour, and to himself. The Belgian representative proposed that that article should be taken as a basis for discussion.

BADAWI BEY (Egypt) recalled that the aim of his proposal was to facilitate the work of the Committee but did not press for its adoption.

MR. PLAZA (Venezuela) also withdrew his proposal for the setting up of a special committee (92nd meeting).

MR. CHANG (China) expressed his sympathy with the feelings which had motivated the proposal of the Egyptian representative.

It was not sufficient to resolve the question by invoking formal considerations such as that of the Committee's terms of reference. The Chinese representative felt that ethical considerations should play a greater part in the discussion. The question was not purely political. The aim of the United Nations was not to ensure the selfish gains of the individual but to try and increase man's moral stature. It was necessary to proclaim the duties of the individual for it was a consciousness of his duties which enabled man to reach a high moral standard.

THE CHAIRMAN asked the Cuban representative if he still pressed for the immediate examination of his draft plan of work (A/C.3.218).

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) thanked the Chinese representative for raising the level of the debate by his last intervention. He felt that the Committee should recommend that the Commission on Human Rights should prepare for the following session of the General Assembly a draft text relating to the duties of the individual, which would draw its inspiration from the noble principles recalled by the Chinese representative. The Cuban delegation furthermore reserved the right to present a draft resolution on that subject.

The Cuban representative was glad to note that the Committee was ready to begin the productive phase of its work, that was to say to examine the draft declaration of human rights in detail. He had proposed the adoption of his plan of work – and he outlined its principles and advantages once [88] more – in order to gain time. The only aim of that proposal was to associate the Committee with the work of the Commission on Human Rights. He asked the Committee to express its opinion on the matter.

MR. COROMINAS (Argentina) felt it was his duty to ask two very important questions.

One was whether the Third Committee, which had been specially entrusted by the General Assembly with the task of examining social, humanitarian, and cultural questions, refused to consider the possibility of improving the incomplete document submitted by the Commission on Human Rights; whether it refused to express an opinion between human rights and human duties; and whether members of the Committee fully realized the importance of ensuring that those rights were guaranteed.

The second question was whether the Committee would have courage to alter an incomplete document or whether it would rest content with examining the text it received without showing any creative spirit and noble inspiration, and without attempting to give mankind the satisfaction it expected from the draft declaration.

It seemed as if the work of the Committee had had a different aim, but if its members had not recognized their duty, Argentina was ready to prepare a draft charter on the duties of the individual.

Mr. Corominas drew the Chairman's attention to the danger of an unduly strict interpretation of rule 109 of the rules of procedure which stated that: "As a general rule, no proposal shall be discussed or put to the vote at any meeting of the committee unless notice of it has been circulated to all delegations not later than the day preceding the meeting." If the Chairman followed the letter of the rule, the Committee's work might be delayed indefinitely.

He concluded by saying that the Committee would bear before the world the responsibility of not wishing, in the course of the discussion on human rights, also to examine the duties corresponding thereto.

Replying to the representative of Argentina, THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the Committee had not yet taken any formal decision regarding the first part of the survey made by the representatives. He also pointed out that he would enforce rule 109 only when the examination of draft amendments entailed difficulties for the members of the Committee. Otherwise, such amendments would be read and discussed immediately. In that connexion he would abide by the wishes of the Committee.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) spoke of the respective merits of the drafts put forward by the Commission on Human Rights and by the Cuban delegation.

Regarding the order of the various articles in the declaration, he suggested accepting the previous Mexican proposal (94th meeting) to examine the articles first and then to arrange them [89] in a rational order. He wanted articles that had points in common to be grouped together.

Lastly, as the preamble depended on the contents of the declaration, he suggested that it should be examined last along with articles 1 and 2, which formed a prefatory statement and to begin the examination of the draft at article 3.

MR. DE ALBA (Mexico) thanked the Cuban representative for the well-ordered, logical, clear and precise draft that he had made and for adding to it the text of the Bogotá declaration so that members of the Committee might consider what points there were in common between that declaration and the draft they were considering.

He supported the Chilean representative's proposal so far as consideration of the preamble was concerned but thought, on the other hand, that articles 1, 2 and 3, which were the keystone of the whole, should be considered each in their place.

It seemed possible that the Cuban representative might be willing that consideration of his plan should be deferred to the end of the work, when it might be given over to a drafting committee which could arrange the order of the articles of the declaration.

Mr. de Alba agreed with the USSR, United States and French representatives that the Committee should go on to consider the draft article by article.

MR. GARCÍA BAUER (Guatemala), supported by the representatives of India and Ecuador, also asked the Cuban representative to agree to refer his proposed plan of work (A/C.3/218) to the committee which would be entrusted with the final drafting of the declaration.

Unlike the Chilean representative, he thought that consideration of the draft should begin not with article 3 but with article 1. He agreed with Mr. Santa Cruz, however, that it would be necessary to consider the preamble after the various articles of the declaration.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) agreed temporarily to withdraw his proposal. He had achieved his aim as his plan of work would be used if it was felt that it provided for a more logical sequence than that adopted by the Commission on Human Rights.

He agreed with the representative of Chile regarding the examination of the preamble, but not regarding articles 1, 2 and 3. Those articles stated fundamental rights. Article 1 was almost like a credo of the whole of the declaration and he felt it should be used as a foreword to the final document.

THE CHAIRMAN thanked the representative of Cuba for agreeing to postpone consideration of his proposal. The Chairman said that the time had come for the Committee to proceed with the examination and preparation of the international declaration of human rights.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) was quite willing to begin by studying Article 1, but he maintained [90] that the preamble should be considered at the conclusion of the discussion of the various articles.

Replying to MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics), who wished the preamble to be considered first, THE CHAIRMAN asked if he would give way on that point for the sake of unanimity.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) thought unanimity was of value if it did not prejudice the orderly conduct of the work. The preamble must clarify an important question: it should define not only the principles of the declaration but also the extent of its application. The USSR delegation intended to propose that the rights should apply not only to the peoples of metropolitan territories but also to those of Non-Self-Governing Territories. A decision should therefore be taken on that important point at the outset.

The Human Rights Commission had drafted the preamble after the various articles of the declaration in order to make sure that the text of the preamble would be in conformity with the rest of the document. The situation was no longer the same since the preamble had already been drafted and it would seem more logical to start by considering it.

It was decided by 43 votes to 6, with 7 abstentions to start by discussing article 1.

Article 1<sup>1</sup>

THE CHAIRMAN read article 1 and said that it was the basis of the Committee's work. There were six amendments to that article submitted by the delegations of Panama (A/C.3/220), Brazil (A/C.3/215), Cuba (A/C.3/224), Mexico (A/C.3/229), the Union of South Africa (A/C.3/226) and Guatemala (A/C.3/228).

MR. ALFARO (Panama) thought that article 1 did not give a clear definition of the right to equality and individual freedom, a right which was mentioned in other articles, such as articles 2, 6 and 7. His proposal was, therefore, that article 1 should simply be deleted (A/C.3/220).

He agreed with the suggestion, made by the representative of Cuba among others, that the second part of article 1 should be included in the form of a principle in the preamble, as the rights to equality and individual freedom were inherent in the statement that all men are born free and equal.

Article 1 was therefore incomplete and unnecessary and it did not, in its existing form, constitute an operative or substantive part of the declaration.

THE CHAIRMAN said that, as motions for deletion always seemed slightly ambiguous, they could not be put to the vote until the conclusion of the discussion.

MR. ALFARO (Panama) agreed that his proposal should be considered as an amendment to the preamble.

[<sup>1</sup>] Article 1 of the draft declaration of human rights (A/777).

[91]

MR. DE ATHAYDE (Brazil) said that he did not wish to start a discussion on religious or philosophical matters but the amendment submitted by his delegation (A/C.3/215) was simply intended to express the religious sentiments of the Brazilian people, sentiments which were, moreover, shared by the peoples of countries represented on the Third Committee. He would leave it to the members to decide in accordance with their conscience and sense of responsibility whether to support or oppose his amendment, which he felt sure would be welcomed by an overwhelming majority of the peoples of the world.

MR. DE ALBA (Mexico) proposed that article 1 should read as follows (A/C.3/229):

“All human beings are born free and equal in dignity and rights. The right of sustenance, health, education and work is considered essential in order to guarantee social justice and the full development of the human being.”

That text corresponded to the ideals of the Mexican revolution.

It derived its inspiration from the ideas of Jefferson on the sanctity of the individual, from the principles of the French revolution, from the ideas of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries in general, especially those compounded during the emancipation movements which took place at the beginning of the nineteenth century, and from the principles expressed during the two world wars.

Mr. de Alba pointed out that the various declarations of human rights had been concerned in turn with the physiological, biological and juridical personality of man and with his development in the community. Jefferson had stated, in his declaration, that man was always striving towards happiness and the Declaration of the Rights of Man and of the Citizen drawn up during the French Revolution contained the idea of equality in the economic and social fields.

He emphasized the fact that the ideas of equality and fraternity implied the possibility of equal biological development; they were therefore in conformity with concrete requirements. He praised Franklin Delano Roosevelt for his great work and said that the four freedoms which he had enumerated should form a valuable source of inspiration. He mentioned in particular, the declaration adopted in 1944 at Philadelphia by the International Labour Conference,<sup>2</sup> a declaration which Roosevelt had considered as a climax in the development of ideas on human rights and freedoms. He hoped that the international declaration of human rights would give a specific approbation to the Philadelphia declaration.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the Mexican amendment amounted to a proposal that the first sentence of article 1 of the draft declaration should be retained and that the second sentence should be replaced by an enumeration of the rights set forth in other articles.

MR. TE WATER (Union of South Africa) proposed that the first sentence of article 1 should be amended (A/C.3/226) to read as follows:

[2] "Declaration concerning the Aims and Purposes of the International Labour Organization", adopted by the Conference at its 26th session.

[92]

"All human beings are born free and equal in fundamental rights and freedoms."

The South African representative explained that as far as fundamental human rights were concerned the universality of the principle of equality set forth in the first sentence of article 1 of the draft could not be denied. But the article's reference to equality of rights was an enunciation of the principle of equality in respect of all rights, personal, economic and political, whether or not those rights were fundamental. That, enunciated as a general principle, did not and could not correspond with the actual conditions in different countries, with their different legal, social, economic and political systems. Men and women had and always would have different rights. There were, for instance, marked divergences in the property rights as well as in the political rights of women.

There was no need to give examples of those differences in the modern world, which was divided between widely divergent economic and social systems. His delegation, therefore, felt that the article should be limited in its language and its scope to fundamental human rights. It wished once more to defend a realistic point of view.

If that principle were accepted, the word "dignity" would imply the equal enjoyment of the rights and freedoms. By the observance of those rights and freedoms, human dignity would be automatically protected to the full extent envisaged by the Charter.

As, in the opinion of the South African delegation, there could be no universality in the concept of equality, there could not be, neither was there, any universal standard among the peoples of the world in their different concepts of human dignity, which were, surely, determined by the differences in religious and social systems, usages and customs.

MR. DEDIJER (Yugoslavia) asked for the circulation of the complete text of the speech by the representative of the Union of South Africa, which had aroused his indignation.

THE CHAIRMAN mentioned that the word “dignity” had been inserted in the Charter of the United Nations on the suggestion of Field-Marshal Smuts.<sup>23</sup> He assured the representative of Yugoslavia that the complete text of Mr. Te Water’s speech would be circulated.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) pointed out that the need for verbatim reports was again being felt, as was shown by the request just made by the representative of Yugoslavia.

He recalled the fact that his delegation had requested verbatim reports of the discussions of the Third Committee and stated that the summary records were extremely condensed. He asked for fuller summary records on the pattern of those provided at the seventh session of the Economic and Social Council.

THE CHAIRMAN thought that the remarks made by the representative of Chile would give [93] rise to some discussion. He therefore interrupted the discussion of article 1 of the draft declaration of human rights and gave priority to the question of procedure.

...

A/C.3/231

7 October 1948

Original Text: French

Uruguay: Amendment to Article 1 of the Draft Declaration (Document E/800)

Article 1

Replace this Article by the following which will figure in a Preliminary Declaration:

“The rights set forth in this Declaration must be respected in order that men may live in conformity with their state as human beings endowed with reason and conscience and seek happiness in a spirit of brotherhood.

All the provisions of the present Declaration shall be construed in accordance with this principle.”

<sup>23</sup> Jan Christiaan Smuts (1870–1950) was Prime Minister of South Africa from 1939 to 1948. He played an important role in drafting the preamble of the Charter of the United Nations.

A/C.3/232

7 October 1948

Original Text: French

Cuba: Amendments to Articles 10–22 of the Draft Declaration

Article 10

Break up this article, which is too complex to be clear, and amend to read as follows:

(a) Protection of honour

Article No

“Every person has a right to the protection of the law against abusive attacks upon his honour and reputation and against unreasonable interference with his private and family life.”

(b) Inviolability of the home

Article No

“Every person has a right to the inviolability of his home.”

(c) Right of correspondence

Article No

“Every person has a right to the inviolability and unhampered transmission of his correspondence.”

Article 11

Amend this article to read as follows:

“Every person has the right to fix his residence within the territory of the state of which he is a national, to move about freely within such territory and not to leave it except by his own will”.

Article 12

Amend this article to read as follows:

“Every person has the right to seek and receive asylum in foreign territory, in case of persecution not resulting from common law crimes.”

[2]

Article 13

Amend to read as follows:

“Every person has a right to the nationality to which he is entitled by law and the right to change it, if he so wishes, for the nationality of any other country that is willing to grant it to him.”

Article 15

Amend to read as follows:

“Every person has the right to own such property, alone as well as in association with others, as meets the essential needs of decent living and helps to maintain the dignity of the individual and of the home.”

“Every person has the right to legal protection against arbitrary confiscation of his property.”

Article 16

Amend to read as follows:

“Every person has the right freely to profess a religious or philosophical belief. This right includes . . .”

Article 17

Amend to read as follows:

“Every person has the right to freedom of investigation, of opinion, and of the expression and dissemination of thought through any media and regardless of frontiers.”

Article 18

Break up and amend to read as follows:

(a) Right of assembly

Article No

“Every person has the right to assemble peaceably with others in a formal public meeting or an informal gathering, in connection with matters of common interest of any nature.”

(b) Right of association

Article No

“Every person has the right to associate with others to promote, exercise and protect his legitimate interests of a political, economic, religious, social, cultural, professional, trade union or other nature.”

Article 19 (1)

Amend to read as follows:

“Every person having legal capacity is entitled to participate [3] in the government of his country, directly or through his representatives chosen by free and periodic elections, which shall be by secret ballot.”

Article 20

Delete “set out below” and substitute the words:

“... essential for his dignity and the free development of his personality”.

Article 21

21 (1): Break up and amend to read as follows:

“Every person has the right to work, under proper conditions, and to follow his vocation freely, in so far as existing conditions of employment permit.”

“Every person has the right to protection against unemployment.”

“Every person who works has the right to receive such remuneration as will, in proportion to his capacity and skill, assure him a standard of living suitable for himself and his family.”

21 (3): Delete, if the Cuban amendment to Article 18 is adopted.

Article 22

22 (1): Break up and amend to read as follows:

(a) Right to health and wellbeing

Article No

“Every person has a right to the preservation of his health through sanitary and social measures relating to food, clothing, housing and medical care, to the extent permitted by public and community resources.”

(b) Right to social security

Article No

“Every person has the right to social security which will protect him from the consequences of unemployment, illness, old age, and any disabilities arising from causes beyond his control that make it impossible for him to earn a living.”

22 (2): Amend as follows, to form a separate article:

Article No

“All women, during pregnancy and the nursing period, and all children have the right to special protection, care and aid.”

A/C.3/233

7 October 1948

Yugoslavia: Amendments to the draft
Declaration (E/800)

After article 19, add the following

A

Any person has the right to the recognition and protection of his nationality and to the free development of the nation to which he belongs. National communities, which are in a state community with other nations, are equal in national, political and social rights.

B

Any national minority, as an ethnical community, has the right to the full development of its ethnical culture and to the free use of its language. It is entitled to have these rights protected by the State.

C

The rights proclaimed in this Declaration also apply to any person belonging to the population of Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories.

Article 22 – add paragraph 1

According to the rights proclaimed in this Declaration illegitimate children are equal to legitimate children and have the same right to social protection.

A/C.3/234*7 October 1948*Original Text: French*Belgium: Amendment to Article 1 of the Declaration (E/800)Article 1

In the second sentence of this article, delete the words “by nature”.

A/C.3/235*7 October 1948*Original Text: French*Lebanon: Amendment to Article 1 of the Draft Declaration (E/800)Article 1

Delete the word “born” in the first line.

A/C.3/236*7 October 1948*China: Amendment to Article I of the draft Declaration (E/800)

Delete:

– the word “born” in the first sentence;

- the words “by nature” in the second sentence;
- the comma between the words “conscience” and “and” in the second sentence.

A/C.3/237

7 October 1948

Iraq: Amendment to Article 1 of the draft Declaration (E/800)

Amend article 1 to read:

“All human beings should be free and equal in dignity and worth, and should be entitled to similar treatment and equal opportunities.”

A/C.3/238

1 October 1948

Original Text: French

Greece: Amendment to Article 1 of the Draft Declaration (Document E/800)

Article 1

The second sentence of Article 1, beginning with the words: “They are endowed . . .” to be included separately, as applying to human duties, in order to form an independent Article preceding or following Article 27 and reading as follows:

“Men, endowed by nature with reason and conscience should act towards one another in a spirit of brotherhood.”

A/C.3/239

7 October 1948

Philippines: Amendment to Article 24 of the Draft Declaration (E/800)

Everyone has the right to good health and is entitled to due rest and leisure.

A/C.3/240
7 October 1948

Saudi Arabia: Amendment to Article 14
of the Draft Declaration (E/800)

Article 14

It is proposed that paragraph 1 be modified in the following manner:

“Men and women of legal matrimonial age within every country have the right to marry and to found a family and are entitled to the full rights as defined in the marriage laws of their country.”

A/C.3/241
7 October 1948

Saudi Arabia: Amendment to Article 12
of the Draft Declaration (E/800)

Article 12

Delete from paragraph 1 the words: “and be granted”.

A/C.3/242
7 October 1948
Original Text: French

Ecuador: Amendment to Article 1

All men have the right, from birth, to be free and equal before the law and the State should enact the provisions necessary to ensure the enjoyment of that right.

A/C.3/243*7 October 1948

Recapitulation of Amendments to Article 1 of the Draft Declaration (E/800)

(In the chronological order, of their submission to the Third Committee)

Article 1

(Text adopted by the Commission on Human Rights)

All human beings are born free and equal in dignity and rights. They are endowed by nature with reason and conscience, and should act towards one another in a spirit of brotherhood.

Amendments:

Brazil (document A/C.3/215)

Amend the second sentence to read:

“Created in the image and likeness of God, they are endowed with reason and conscience, and should act towards one another in a spirit of brotherhood.”

Panama (A/C.3/220)

It is proposed that this article be eliminated.

Cuba (A/C.3/224)

Insert the text of this article in a Preamble worded as follows, to precede the enumeration of rights:

“All men are born free and equal in dignity and rights; being endowed by nature with reason and conscience, they should act towards one another like brothers.

“Respect for the rights of all requires that each shall do his duty. In all human activity, both social and political, rights and duties are indissolubly linked with one another. While rights enhance individual freedom, duties express the dignity of that freedom.

“Duties of a legal nature presuppose other duties of a moral nature which facilitate their understanding and serve as their foundation.

[2]

“It is the duty of man to practise, uphold and promote culture by all means at his disposal, for culture is the highest social and historical expression of the human spirit.

“Morality being the noblest product of culture, it is the duty of all to respect it at all times.”

Guatemala (A/C.3/228)

Delete articles 1 and 2 of the draft Declaration and transfer their contents to the Preamble.

Mexico (A/C.3/229)

“All human beings are born free and equal in dignity and rights. The right of sustenance, health, education and work is considered essential in order to guarantee social justice and the full development of the human being.”

Belgium (A/C.3/224)

Delete the words “by nature”, in the second sentence of this article.

Lebanon (A/C.3/235)

In the first line of this article, replace the words “are born” by the word “are”.

Iraq (A/C.3/237)

Amend this article to read:

“All human beings should be free and equal in dignity and worth, and should be entitled to similar treatment and equal opportunities.”

Greece (A/C.3/238)

The second part of this article beginning with the words: “they are endowed” should be separated as it applies to duties, and constitute a special article to be inserted before or after article 27.

Uruguay (A/C.3/231)

Replace this article by the following text to be inserted in a preliminary statement:

“The rights contained in this Declaration shall be necessarily recognized in order to allow all human beings to live in accordance with their condition of beings endowed with conscience and reason to pursue happiness in a spirit of brotherly solidarity.

All the provisions of the present Declaration shall be interpreted in accordance with this principle.”

China (A/C.3/236)

Delete:

- the word “born” in the first sentence,
- the words “by nature” in the second sentence,

[3]

- the comma between the words “conscience” and “and” in the second sentence, to read this article as follows:

“All human beings are free and equal in dignity and rights. They are endowed with reason and conscience and should act towards one another in a spirit of brotherhood.”

Ecuador (A/C.3/242)

Amend the first sentence to read:

“All human beings have the right from their birth to be free and equal before the law, and in order to make this right effective the State should take the necessary measures.”

A/C.3/SR.96<sup>24</sup>

7 October 1948

Summary Record of the Ninety-Sixth Meeting
[of the Third Committee]

Held at the Palais de Chaillot, Paris, on Thursday,
7 October 1948, at 10:30 a.m.

Chairman: MR. CHARLES MALIK (Lebanon).

18. Draft international declaration of human rights (E/800) (continued)

Languages to be used in submitting amendments

MR. GARCÍA BAUER (Guatemala), referring to an amendment to article 1 of the draft declaration of human rights submitted by his delegation, stated that the original text had been in Spanish. He wondered why, in document A/C.3/228, it was stated that the original text was in French.

MR. HESSEL<sup>25</sup> (Secretary of the Committee) reminded the Committee that according to the procedure agreed upon by all delegations, all amendments to proposals must be submitted in one of the two working languages of the Organization. The original Spanish text of the Guatemalan amendment had been translated into French and the translation had been shown to the representative of Guatemala for approval. For that reason the French translation had been considered to be the original text of the draft amendment.

MR. GARCÍA BAUER (Guatemala) thought that an important point of principle was involved. Until such time as the General Assembly had itself taken a decision to the contrary, any delegation should have the right to submit an amendment in any of the five official languages.

<sup>24</sup> The text of the document is from Official Records of the General Assembly, Third Session, 1948, pp. 95–102.

<sup>25</sup> Stéphane Hessel (1917– ) is an eminent French advocate for human rights. As recently as 2012, he was still lecturing and writing. Hessel described the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights on 10 December 1948 as “un des instants les plus émouvants de ma vie” (Stéphane Hessel, Danse avec le siècle, Paris: Seuil, 1997, p. 177).

[96]

He did not wish to press the point at the current meeting, but his delegation could not accept the procedure that was being followed.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that in the case of original proposals, not amendments, texts could be submitted in any of the five official languages.

Article 1 (continued)

MR. GARCÍA BAUER (Guatemala) explained why his delegation had proposed in its amendment (A/C.3/228), that article 1 should be deleted and its contents incorporated in the preamble of the draft declaration.

Article 1 stated a fact, namely that all human beings were born free and equal in dignity and rights. On that fact the rights enumerated in the various articles of the draft declaration were based. As the whole declaration was a declaration of rights, the fundamental statement of fact should not be listed among the rights, but should be a part of the preamble to the document. A decision regarding the proper place for the subject matter contained in article 1 should be made before it could be decided what amendments to the text were necessary.

MR. TE WATER (Union of South Africa) agreed with the Guatemalan representative that the substance of article 1 should be incorporated in the preamble. He therefore withdrew the amendment (A/C.3/226) he had submitted at the previous meeting in favour of the Guatemalan amendment, but at the same time he wished to clarify a misunderstanding that had arisen in connexion with the South African amendment.

The South African delegation sincerely desired to collaborate closely in the important work of drafting the declaration of human rights and was particularly concerned with the principle of human dignity. In trying to be realistic, however, it had questioned the advisability of the reference to dignity in article 1, since the various articles should be devoted to statements of fundamental rights whereas the dignity of the individual was actually a deeper and broader concept than a right. If the fundamental human rights were respected, the dignity of the individual person would be automatically recognized.

Mr. Te Water hoped that his explanation would reassure his colleagues who had seemed to feel some surprise at the position he had taken at the 95th meeting.

COUNT CARTON DE WIART (Belgium) could not agree with the draft amendment proposed by Guatemala and supported by the Union of South Africa. Article 1 was important as a first article of a solemn document, since it affirmed a principle which in some measure summed up the articles that followed.

The text of the article as it stood stated that human beings were endowed “by nature” with reason and conscience. Those words might be ambiguous and lead to long, philosophical arguments, and certain proposed amendments to them, such as the Brazilian proposal (A/C.3/215) to state that all human beings were “created in the image and likeness of God”, were of a particularly delicate character. The Belgian delegation, [97] therefore, proposed to simplify the text by deleting the words “by nature”, which were unnecessary, with the hope that the resultant wording would find general acceptance.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) observed that the Cuban proposals (A/C.3/224) were also submitted for the purpose of finding a common area of agreement.

He hoped that the draft of article 1 might be changed so that it would make clear that by man’s very nature he was endowed with reason and conscience. The Spanish text could be easily changed to give that idea, and he thought that could be done in the other languages as well. He agreed with the Belgian representative that there should be no question of implying that nature, as opposed to God, was the source of man’s reason and conscience.

Mr. Pérez Cisneros thought that the substance of article 1 should stand alone and so be given particular emphasis. It would be better to place it, not in the preamble, but between the preamble and the articles of the draft declaration.

A new wording of article 1 was suggested by the Cuban delegation in its draft amendment. Mr. Pérez Cisneros drew the Committee’s attention to the proposed new text which had the important advantage of stressing the close connexion between rights and duties.

The Cuban delegation also felt that the entire draft declaration would be strengthened if each article began with the words “Everyone has the right to . . .”. The value of repetition had been proven by its frequent use in ancient and sacred literature, and should not be ignored.

THE CHAIRMAN recalled that, in drafting article 1, the intention of the Commission on Human Rights had not been to imply that man had been endowed with reason and conscience by some entity beyond himself. The English text would be clearer if the order of the words were changed so that they read: “They are by nature endowed . . .”

MR. ALFARO (Panama) proposed that the Committee should first take a decision on the question whether or not the contents of article 1 should remain where they were or be transferred to the preamble. If it were decided to transfer them, the final text could be agreed upon when the preamble came up for discussion.

THE CHAIRMAN agreed that the question of the position of the substance of article 1 was preliminary to a decision on its final text. The Committee would be better able to take even that preliminary decision, however, after it had heard all the speakers who wished to present amendments.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) proposed that article 1 should be amended to read: "All human beings are free and equal . . ." There should be no implication that people, though born equal, might lose that equality for any reason.

[98]

Referring to the suggestion that the English text should be amended to read: "They are by nature endowed . . .", Mr. Azkoul said that a French translation might be: Ils sont doués de par leur nature de . . .

MR. ROZAKIS (Greece) drew attention to the solemnity of the statement in the first sentence of draft article 1 which seemed to summarize the whole contents of the draft declaration. In order not to weaken the effect of that statement, he proposed that it should be separated from the second sentence and that the latter should be included as an additional paragraph under draft article 27, which referred to duties. That arrangement seemed logical and, moreover, might facilitate the work of the Committee.

MR. CHANG (China) felt that article 1 of the declaration should remain where it was, and that the two sentences which made up that article should not be separated. A happy balance was struck by the broad statement of rights in the first sentence and the implication of duties in the second. Should article 1 be taken out of the body of the declaration, it would not claim as much of the reader's attention as it deserved to do; moreover, the various rights would appear more selfish if they were not preceded by the reference to "a spirit of brotherhood". Similar reasoning applied to Article 27, which contained a statement of duties. Statements of rights and duties should form an integral part of the declaration.

Mr. Chang supported the deletion of article 1 of the words "by nature", as suggested by the Belgian representative. That measure would obviate any theological question, which could not and should not be raised in a declaration designed to be universally applicable.

While the declaration would no doubt be accepted by a majority vote of Member States, in the field of human rights popular majority should not be forgotten. The Chinese representative recalled that the population of his country comprised a large segment of humanity. That population had ideals and traditions different from those of the Christian West. Those ideals included good manners, decorum, propriety and consideration for others. Yet, although Chinese culture attached the greatest importance to manners as a part of ethics, the Chinese representative would refrain from proposing that mention of them should be made in the declaration. He hoped that his colleagues would show equal consideration and withdraw some of the amendments to article 1 which raised metaphysical problems. For Western civilization, too, the time for religious intolerance was over.

Mr. Chang agreed with the Lebanese representative that the word "born" in the first sentence of the English text of article 1 should be deleted; without that amendment, the sentence was reminiscent of Rousseau and the theory that man was naturally good. For the purposes of the declaration it was better to start with a clean slate.

[99]

He also welcomed the fact that the delegation of the Union of South Africa had withdrawn its amendment to article 1 (A/C.3/226).

The second sentence of article 1 called upon men to act towards one another in a spirit of brotherhood. That attitude was perfectly consistent with the Chinese attitude towards manners and the importance of kindly and considerate treatment of others. It was only when man's social behaviour rose to that level that he was truly human. Decorum was an ideal which should not be lost sight of – as unfortunately it often was – in the struggle to uphold noble principles.

In conclusion, Mr. Chang urged that articles 1, 2 and 3 should be left where they were.

MR. MAYHEW (United Kingdom) suggested that, to save time, the Chairman might put to the vote first the question whether or not article 1 should be transferred to the preamble. If the Committee decided to transfer it, it could proceed immediately to a discussion of article 2, on the understanding that all the amendments submitted to article 1 would be taken into account during the consideration of the preamble.

MR. CASSIN (France) observed that only the Chinese representative had as yet spoken against such a transfer, and that others, himself included, also wished to submit arguments against it.

He felt strongly that if article 1 were transferred to the preamble, the whole conception of the declaration would be upset thereby. The declaration had to begin with a statement of the framework within which all the rights that followed were contained; article 1 represented that framework.

The objection that the principles contained in article 1 were too well known to need repetition was invalid in the light of recent events. Within the preceding ten years, millions of men had lost their lives precisely because those principles had been ruthlessly flouted. Barbarism, which men had thought safely buried, had risen once more to stalk the world. It was essential that the United Nations should again proclaim to mankind those principles which had come so close to extinction and should explicitly refute the abominable doctrine of fascism.

Mr. Cassin urged that the word "born" should be maintained. Men were born free and equal, although they might later lose those attributes. The sentence in its existing wording proclaimed the rights of human beings to freedom and equality, a right which was theirs from birth.

There was a direct connexion between articles 1 and 2 and article 27; the French delegation would later propose that article 27 should come immediately after the other two. Those three articles could then, if it was so desired, constitute a separate chapter, but it was essential that they should remain in the body of the declaration, instead of being relegated to the preamble.

MR. ABADI (Iraq) found article 1, as drafted, unsatisfactory. The declaration was not a piece of oratory, but a written document, which consequently required precise and meticulous phrasing. [100] It was not clear whether article 1 was a statement of rights or of fact. If the former, it should be in the imperative; if the latter, its place was elsewhere than in the body of the declaration.

The authors of the article had been apparently carried away by its emotional content. It was reminiscent of Rousseau and of the French Revolution; it was lacking both in clarity and originality. Logically, it was impossible for men to be both free and equal, for if they were free to develop all their latent possibilities, inequality would result. The change in the second sentence from the present tense to the conditional, in the English text was equally illogical. That sentence should be couched in the terms of a commandment.

Mr. Abadi agreed with the statement made by the Chinese representative at a previous meeting concerning the ethical content of article 1. He suggested replacing the text before the Committee by the following wording (A/C.3/237) which placed the whole article on an ethical plane:

“All men should be free and equal in dignity and worth and should be entitled to similar treatment and equal opportunities.”

MR. CARRERA ANDRADE<sup>26</sup> (Ecuador) observed that article 1 was a doctrinal statement, rather than a statement of human rights. In many parts of the world, men were not born free and equal; it was to remedy that situation that the United Nations was preparing the declaration of human rights.

He proposed that article 1 should be amended to read as follows (A/C.3/242):

“All human beings have the right from birth to be free and equal before the law and the State should enact the provisions necessary to ensure the enjoyment of that right.”

With respect to the Brazilian amendment (A/C.3/215), the representative of Ecuador said that the Committee should distinguish between the divine and the human, and should refrain from placing the divine on the political plane by introducing it into the declaration. That document was, moreover, intended for people of all faiths; in it, man was regarded in relation to the social structure.

Inasmuch as it was hoped that States would adopt laws to ensure the rights proclaimed in the declaration, the latter should contain not beautiful phrases, but principles readily translatable into legal terms. The declaration should not be a philosophical treatise but a document containing a minimum guarantee of human rights.

<sup>26</sup> Jorge Carrera Andrade (1902–78), in addition to his very distinguished diplomatic career, was one of Latin America's great poets.

THE CHAIRMAN said that his list of amendments to article 1 seemed to be complete. The amendment furthest removed from the original text was obviously the one which suggested the transference of the article to the preamble.

In the absence of any objection he ruled that the immediate question before the Committee was to decide on that amendment, and he asked members to confine their remarks to that point [101] only. If article 1 were transferred to the preamble, no decision on the substance of the article would be taken at the current stage.

MR. GARCÍA BAUER (Guatemala), referring to that amendment, said that it should be made clear that a decision should be taken on the basis of the proposal submitted by Guatemala. He agreed that the debate should be confined to a discussion on whether article 1 should be transferred to the preamble or not.

MR. ALFARO (Panama), in agreement with the proposals made by the delegations of Guatemala and Cuba, favoured the transference of article 1 to the preamble.

MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) said that the Committee could not decide what to put into the preamble unless it knew what the final wording of article 1 was to be. Moreover, if article 1 were to be discussed in connexion with the preamble, that would involve a repetition of the discussion.

He consequently suggested that article 1 should be modified and that it should stand neither as article 1 nor as a part of the preamble but should be given a position before article 1; it would thus serve as a basis for interpretation of the subsequent provisions.

Referring to the words "by nature", he said that rights were derived from the nature of man and not from the acts of States. As it stood, the article could give rise to objections on dogmatic grounds. It might be thought to imply nature as distinct from God. No reference to a godhead should be made in a United Nations document, for the philosophy on which the United Nations was based should be universal. The declaration was a legal document and therefore no transcendental source of rights should be stated.

Relations between people were determined not only by legal standards but also by social and moral principles. With regards to those, a common denominator had yet to be found between peoples of the world.

As the representative of Panama had already pointed out, the text was repetitious. The representative of France had said that article was of great value and should therefore be retained. In article 1 it was stated that men were equal in their right to freedom and security, but article 2 said the same, and therefore article 1 could be transferred without upsetting the balance. The representative of Mexico had suggested that certain other rights should be added in order to endow the declaration with a topical character. These rights were of a legal nature and should therefore be included in article 3 rather than article 1.

In reply to the representative of Belgium, who asked that priority should be given to his proposal, THE CHAIRMAN said that he had before him amendments which completely changed whole passages and were consequently more far-reaching. He ruled that the one to be discussed first was the amendment concerning the transfer of article 1 to the preamble.

[102]

MR. GARCÍA BAUER (Guatemala) said that the Committee should first debate whether article 1 should be transferred into the preamble. If that were done there would be no need to debate the wording of article 1 at the current stage as its substance would be discussed later when the preamble came up for discussion. If the Committee wished to consider the substance of article 1, it should first decide whether or not it was to remain where it was.

MR. CHANG (China) said that it would not be necessary to put that amendment to a vote because he could suggest another way of dealing with it. He wished to reserve the right to make that suggestion later.

MR. COROMINAS (Argentina) objected to the ruling made by the Chairman, and said that the debate on article 1 should have been exhausted before that ruling was made. Speakers who wanted to discuss amendments should be allowed to do so.

In order to save time, he suggested that a working committee should be set up.

THE CHAIRMAN said that the ruling had not been his decision but that of the Committee, as no objection had been raised at the time. The only matter before the Committee was the question whether article 1 was to be transferred to the preamble or whether it should remain where it was.

MR. DEDIJER (Yugoslavia) said that in accordance with rule 109 of the rules of procedure, amendments should be circulated twenty-four hours before their consideration. That rule had not been observed recently and he asked that it should be observed in future.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) wished to make a proposal. He asked whether a document could be drawn up which would include a complete list of the amendments submitted, before the next meeting. It would then be much easier to consider the amendments.

THE CHAIRMAN said that the USSR representative had anticipated a suggestion he had wished to make himself. Members would be supplied with a document containing all the amendments by the afternoon of the following day.

The meeting rose at 1:25 p.m.

A/C.3/244

8 October 1948

Original Text: French

France: Amendments to the Draft Declaration (Document E/800)

Between Articles 2 and 3

Insert Article 27 of the Draft.

Note: It is essential that the social framework in which man lives and the limitations of his rights should appear in the first group of general theses, before enumeration of the rights themselves.

Article 7

Add a Paragraph 2 worded as follows:

“Any person arrested or detained is entitled to have the legality of the action taken against him confirmed without delay by a judge. He is also entitled to demand a verdict or release within a reasonable period.”

Article 9, Paragraph 2

This amendment does not apply to the English text.

Article 12, Paragraph 1 (Right of Asylum)

Add the following sentence: “The United Nations, in concert with Countries concerned, is required to secure such asylum for him.”

Note: There is no point in proclaiming a right without at the same time stating whose duty it is to give effect to that right.

Article 13

(a) Begin with a new paragraph 1 worded as follows:

“Every human being has the right to a nationality.”

(b) The present Paragraph 1 should become Paragraph 2.

(c) Add a new paragraph 3 worded as follows:

“It is the duty of the United Nations to approach states for the purpose of preventing statelessness and, where necessary, to concern itself with the fate of stateless persons.”

Article 14

Word Paragraph 2 as follows:

“Marriage may be contracted only with the full consent of the intending spouses.”

Note: There is no point in specifying “both” spouses.

[2]

Article 19

Reword Paragraph 3 as follows:

“The authority of the law and of any government is founded on the will of the people as expressed at free and genuine periodic elections.”

Article 25

Add a Paragraph 2 in the following terms:

“Everyone has the same right to the protection of the moral and material interests that he may acquire through any inventions or literary, scientific or artistic works of which he is the author.”

A/C.3/SR.97<sup>27</sup>

8 October 1948

Summary Record of the Ninety-Seventh Meeting
[of the Third Committee]

Held at the Palais de Chaillot, Paris, on Friday, 8 October 1948,
at 4.15 p.m.

Chairman: MR. CHARLES MALIK (Lebanon).

19. Draft international declaration of human rights (E/800) (continued)

Article 1 (continued)

THE CHAIRMAN recalled that, at the preceding meeting, the Committee had decided to settle the question whether the substance of article 1 should remain in the position it then occupied in the declaration or whether it should be incorporated [103] in the preamble, as proposed by the delegations of Cuba (A/C.3/224) and Guatemala (A/C.3/228).

<sup>27</sup> The text of the document is from Official Records of the General Assembly, Third Session, 1948, pp. 102–98.

MR. WATT (Australia) concurred in the opinion of the representative of France that article 1 should remain where it was. Moreover, a similar discussion could occur subsequently in connexion with each article. Such might also be the case with the Sixth Committee which was examining the draft convention on genocide.

In order to avoid a confused debate on the content as well as the arrangement of the articles, he proposed that a co-ordinating committee should be set up composed of a small number of members, including representatives who had taken part in the work of the Commission on Human Rights. It would deal solely with the final arrangement of the declaration.

For the time being the Third Committee should restrict itself to a study of the content of the various articles without concerning itself with their position in the final text.

Stressing the importance of the question, MR. ANZE MATIENZO (Bolivia) agreed with the representative of France, whose arguments he considered most apposite. The statement of the principles in question would certainly carry greater weight if it constituted the first article of the declaration rather than if it formed part of the preamble.

He supported the Australian representative's suggestion but felt that the Cuban proposal should be put to the vote first.

THE CHAIRMAN thought the Australian proposal a useful one, but reminded the Committee that it must first proceed with the consideration of the Cuban proposal (A/C.3/224).

MR. CHANG (China), speaking on a point of order, proposed a vote on the establishment of a co-ordinating committee before continuation of the discussion of article 1.

THE CHAIRMAN interpreted the proposal of the representative of China as a motion for closure of the debate on article 1.

MR. GARCÍA BAUER (Guatemala) opposed the motion of closure because he thought the Committee should respect the decision it had already made to settle first of all the position of article 1.

While sympathizing with the Australian proposal, MR. CASSIN (France) was likewise opposed to the motion for closure of the debate. The Commission should not fail to profit from the discussions on the position of article 1 in the declaration.

MR. CHANG (China) withdrew his motion for closure of the debate.

Speaking on a point of order, MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) also proposed postponement of the discussion on the position of article 1. He felt that, to avoid a confused discussion, it was urgent first to settle the procedural question in the manner indicated by the Australian representative.

[104]

MR. DE ALBA (Mexico) pointed out that the various motions on points of order, no matter how pertinent, prolonged the discussion instead of simplifying it. Since the Committee had already decided on the question of the position to be given to the substance of article 1, he opposed the motion for postponement.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) proposed a compromise: as the tenor of article 1 was undeniably linked to that of the preamble, it would be preferable to postpone the entire discussion on article 1 until the end so that those two texts could be considered together.

He therefore supported the motion for postponement.

MR. KAMINSKY (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) also supported the motion for postponement, while MR. ANZE MATIENZO (Bolivia) opposed it.

THE CHAIRMAN put the motion for postponement to the vote.

The motion was rejected by 25 votes to 11, with 4 abstentions.

MR. BEAUFORT (Netherlands) did not agree with Mr. Cassin, that the statement of principle contained in article 1 would gain in forcefulness if presented as one of the articles of the declaration rather than if it were included in the preamble. To think so would be to misjudge the significance of the preamble.

The San Francisco Conference had had to consider a draft Charter without a preamble, the latter having been added only later, upon the intervention of Marshal Smuts; the Commission was acting under different circumstances, for it had already recognized the need for a preamble to the declaration. The function of the preamble was to furnish a basis upon which the whole structure of the declaration could be erected. It was, consequently, the logical place for the insertion of fundamental principles which would justify the existence of that international instrument.

The Netherlands representative therefore suggested that the text of article 1 should be transferred to the preamble.

MR. CASTBERG (Norway) pointed out that in the interpretation of texts of international law a distinction was always made between the preamble of the document and the clauses themselves. The provisions of the articles had, no doubt, greater weight, being as they were, definite pledges.

Any measure which might contribute to strengthen the position of the individual in relation to society and add to his dignity would be welcome; but on the other hand, the Committee must be careful not to upset the equilibrium of the structure so carefully planned by the Commission on Human Rights.

Mr. Castberg concluded that article 1 should remain where it was in the draft.

MR. PLAZA (Venezuela) considered that the logical place for article 1 was in the preamble, as the representative of Uruguay had pointed out. The principles stated in it constituted the very foundation for rights later defined in the other articles.

[105]

He supported the proposal for the creation of a working group to decide whether article 1 should be included in the preamble or not, and asked for an immediate discussion on the substance.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the discussion must only deal with the question whether or not article 1 should become part of the preamble; any other question would be considered out of order.

MR. DE ALBA (Mexico) thought that article 1 should not be inserted in the preamble. The document in question was a declaration, not an act or a convention, and since it was a declaration of rights, all the basic rights from which the others evolved should be enunciated first, as the representative of France had said. Article 1, as such, was essential and he suggested it should be studied forthwith. The Committee must decide whether to view the article as a separate entity, or as a basis for the other articles.

Once the article had been considered in principle and in form together with all the amendments, the Committee could, as had been suggested, set up a co-ordinating committee, that is a working group which would consider the article in the light of all the others; but it was for the Committee to discuss and adopt article 1.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) explained that when he had proposed the transfer of article 1 to the preamble, his intention was not to add an additional paragraph but to draft a sort of separate preamble, to precede the other articles.

The Cuban delegation would therefore propose that article 1, which was of special significance, should become a special chapter, which might be entitled for instance, "Essential Principles".

MR. SAINT-LOT (Haiti), Rapporteur, wished to recall that the Committee had decided that a sub-committee would later be set up to decide on the arrangement of the text of the draft declaration. That body would have to decide on the position of article 1. For the time being therefore, it would be advisable to discuss the substance of the question. A final draft of article 1 had not yet been made.

MR. ALFARO (Panama) thought article 1 was part of the preamble. Technically and juridically, the articles of a declaration were presumed to contain definitions of rights and freedoms, not philosophical postulates. Some representatives were opposed to the insertion of article 1 in the preamble because they feared that the recognition of rights contained in the article might lose value and effectiveness if it were not made the subject of a separate article; those fears must be dispelled.

A precedent had been set by the Preamble of the Charter of the United Nations. When the drafting of the Charter was being discussed at San Francisco, the delegations of Belgium, Chile and Panama has insisted that the principle of “respect [106] for the obligations arising from treaties and other sources of international law” should be stated as a separate article. The five great Powers objected, and the above-mentioned three delegations asked for a vote on their proposal. The proposal was rejected and the principle of respect for the obligations arising from treaties was included in the third paragraph of the preamble of the Charter. That paragraph was as important as any Article of the Charter.

There was no reason to believe that a preamble was less juridically important than an article. Each of the remaining articles of the declaration of human rights defined a right, whereas article 1 recognized a principle. That was why it belonged to the preamble, where in accordance with the precedent set by the United Nations Charter, it would lose none of its significance.

MR. GARCÍA BAUER (Guatemala) was in full agreement with Mr. Alfaro; nevertheless, he wished to add, in order to dispel the doubts expressed by some of his colleagues, and particularly by the representative of Cuba, that his delegation had proposed by an amendment (A/C.3/228) to delete articles 1 and 2 of the draft declaration and to transfer their contents to the preamble, so that the latter should include a second part, like the preamble of the Bogotá declaration. Each article should state a right. Article 1 did recognize a principle which must serve as a basis for the rights stated in the other articles. Moreover, the representative of Panama had shown that transferring an article to the preamble did not mean lessening its importance.

MR. CASSIN (France) had a technical objection to the argument of the representative of Panama. The precedent of the Charter did not apply to the declaration, for the Charter was a legally binding convention, whereas a declaration was a document of a different kind, as the representatives of Norway had shown. There was, moreover, the danger of setting up a real prejudice against the contents of the declaration, not only in the case of article 1, but also in the case of the other articles which did not merely list rights. For example article 27 dealt with limitations of rights. If the principles laid down in article 1 were included in the preamble, why not include also the limitations of rights? Such a preamble would then become disproportionate.

He reminded the Committee of the serious responsibility it would incur if it hesitated to formulate in article 1 – the article which would cause most impression on public opinion – a declaration of principles which might meet with general agreement, despite all differences of doctrine. It was a declaration of vital importance. If it were set out in a long preamble, public opinion of say that the United Nations General Assembly had been afraid to proclaim its ideals.

MRS. NEWLANDS (New Zealand) agreed with the representative of Panama that article 1 should be a part of the preamble. She suggested that the amendments to article 1 should not be examined before article 2 and the following articles had been studied. Article 1 should not be transmitted to a sub-committee, which would be likely to examine that article separately, whereas it [107] ought to be examined within the framework of the preamble as a whole, and as forming part of it.

MR. RAMÍREZ MORENO (Colombia) proposed the closure of the discussion.

MR. IMPERIAL (Philippines) opposed the motion for closure. A decision of such importance should not be postponed. The two conflicting arguments could be reconciled by converting article 1 into a chapter headed "Chapter 1", with the sub-title: "Statement of Principles". It would in fact amount to a special preamble.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) opposed the closure of the debate and requested that the third possibility, proposed by the representative of the Philippines, should be examined.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the motion for the closure of the debate.

The motion was adopted by 16 votes to 12, with 12 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to a vote the amendment proposed by the delegation of Guatemala (A/C.3/228).

MR. GARCÍA BAUER (Guatemala) requested that the vote should be taken by roll-call.

He explained that his proposal that the contents of article 1 should be transferred to the preamble did not prejudice any decision which might be taken subsequently to make that article a separate chapter, as had been done in the Bogotá declaration. Those representatives who thought that the principles set out in article 1 should form part of a separate chapter could therefore support the Guatemalan amendment.

A vote was taken by roll-call as follows:

Panama, having been drawn by lot by the Chairman, was called upon to vote first.

In favour: Panama, Union of South Africa, Venezuela, Guatemala, Netherlands, New Zealand.

Against: Paraguay, Peru, Siam, Syria, Turkey, United States of America, Australia, Belgium, Bolivia, Brazil, Canada, China, Colombia, Cuba, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, France, Greece, Haiti, India, Iran, Lebanon, Liberia, Mexico, Norway.

Abstaining: Philippines, Poland, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Kingdom, Yugoslavia, Afghanistan, Burma, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Egypt.

The amendment was rejected by 26 votes to 6, with 10 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that questions concerning the order in which articles were to be placed were not a matter for the Committee. They would have to be reviewed by the special sub-committee which would be set up for the purpose.

With regard to document A/C.3/243, which contained a recapitulation of amendments to article 1 of the draft declaration, he ruled that the amendments proposed by Guatemala, Panama (A/C.3/220) and Greece (A/C.3/238) had been eliminated. There were thus nine amendments before the Committee which would be examined [108] in the following order: Cuba (A/C.3/224), Mexico (A/C.3/229), Iraq (A/C.3/237), Ecuador (A/C.3/242), Brazil (A/C.3/215), Uruguay (A/C.3/231), China (A/C.3/236), Belgium (A/C.3/234), Lebanon (A/C.3/235), that is, beginning with those furthest removed from the text of the draft of article 1.

MR. GARCÍA BAUER (Guatemala) pointed out that his amendment was still before the Committee in so far as it affected article 2.

THE CHAIRMAN explained that the Guatemalan amendment would be discussed when the Committee began examining article 2, but that at the moment only article 1 was under discussion. Nevertheless, in so far as that amendment dealt with transferring the contents of article 2 to the preamble, it should be submitted to the special sub-committee responsible for the order of the articles.

The meeting rose at 6:20 p.m.

A/C.3/217/Corr.2

9 October 1948

Dominican Republic: Amendment to article 22 of the Draft Declaration (E/800)

Delete paragraph 2 and substitute the following:

“Expectant and nursing mothers and all children have the right to special care and assistance.”

A/C.3/245

9 October 1948

New Zealand: Amendment to Article 1 of the Draft Declaration (E/800)

Article 1

All human beings are born free and equal in dignity and rights, endowed with reason and conscience and bound in duty to one another as brothers.

A/C.3/246

9 October 1948

Original Text: English, French

Venezuela: Amendment to Article 1
of the Draft Declaration (E/800)

All human beings have the right to be free and equal. They are endowed with reason and conscience and should act towards one another in a spirit of brotherhood.

(Text intended to conciliate the amendments submitted by Belgium, Lebanon, Iraq, China and Ecuador)

A/C.3/247

9 October 1948

Saudi Arabia: Amendment to Article 16
of the Draft Declaration (E/800)

Delete the second part of this article, which begins with the words: “this right includes” etc., retaining only the first part which reads: “Everyone has the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion”.

A/C.3/248

9 October 1948

Colombia and Costa Rica: Amendment to Article 19
of the Draft Declaration (E/800)

Add a fourth paragraph:

4. “Every man has the right to make opposition to the Government of his country and to promote its replacement by legal means with equality of electoral opportunities and of access to the means of propaganda.”

A/C.3/249

9 October 1948

Chile: Amendment to Article 15 of the Draft
Declaration (E/800)

Replace article 15 by article 14 of the text adopted by the drafting Committee of the Commission on Human Rights to read as follows:

“Everyone has the right to own such property as meets the essential needs of decent living that helps to maintain the dignity of the individual and of the home, and shall not be arbitrarily deprived of it.”

A/C.3/250

9 October 1948

Denmark: Amendment to Article 23 of the Draft
Declaration (E/800)

Add as paragraph 3:

“All persons belonging to a racial, national, religious or linguistic minority have the right to establish their own schools and receive teaching in the language of their own choice.”

A/C.3/251

9 October 1948

Original Text: English, French

Argentina: Amendments to Articles 20, 21, 22, 23 and 24
of the Draft Declaration (E/800)

Article 20 – substitute the following:

“Every person has the right to social security which will protect him from the consequences of unemployment, old age and any disabilities arising from causes beyond his control that make it physically or mentally impossible for him to earn a living.”

Article 21

Paragraph 1 – amend as follows:

“Every person has the right to work, to be protected by society and to be treated with his rightful dignity in society, so that the spiritual and material needs of the individual and the community may be satisfied and that he may follow his vocation freely, in so far as existing conditions of employment permit.”

Paragraph 2 – substitute the following:

“Every person has the right to a fair remuneration for the work which he performs on the basis of equal pay for equal work.”

Paragraph 3 – substitute the following:

“Every person has the right to associate with others to promote, exercise and protect his legitimate interests of a political, economic, religious, social, cultural, professional, trade union or other nature.”

Article 22 – substitute the following:

“Every person has the right to the preservation of his health through sanitary and social measures relating to food, clothing, housing and care, to the highest extent permitted by public and community resources.”

Add thereafter the following paragraph:

“All women, during pregnancy and the nursing period, and all children have the right to such careful protection and special aid as will strengthen the spiritual and moral principles which form the basis of continual life in society.”

[2]

Article 23 – substitute the following:

“Every person has the right to an education, which should be based on the principles of liberty, ethics and human solidarity.

“Furthermore, every person has the right to an education that will prepare him to lead a decent life, to raise his standard of living and to be a useful member of society.

“The right to an education includes the right to equality of opportunity in every case, in accordance with natural talents, merit, and the desire to utilize the resources that the state or the community is in a position to provide.

“Every person has the right to receive free primary education.”

Article 24 – substitute the following:

“Every person has the right to leisure time, to wholesome recreation and to the opportunity for advantageous use of his free time to his spiritual, cultural and physical benefit.”

We consider that the numbers of the articles should be those under which they will figure in the final draft of the document which is to be prepared by the Rapporteur of the Third Committee.

A/C.3/252

9 October 1948

Sweden: Amendments to Articles 16, 19 and 21 of the draft
Declaration (E/800)

Article 16

In order to protect the individuals, who have religious beliefs, different from the officially acknowledged religion, or have no religious belief whatever, against manifestations of religious fanaticism, it is proposed that the following words be added to the end of this article after “. . . worship and observance”.

“provided that this does not interfere unduly with the personal liberty of anybody else”.

Article 19

To make more clear how the will of the people shall find its right expression, so that one can be sure that this will is the real basis of the government, the Swedish declaration proposes to add the following words to the sentence in paragraph 3:

“Everyone. . . to the will of the people, manifested in general and free elections or in equivalent, free voting procedures.”

Article 21

Being of the opinion, that freedom of organization is important as a citizenship freedom, only if completed by the natural liberty to abstain from work, when the individual worker feels that he should not go on working on the economic terms existing or offered, the Swedish delegation proposes adding the following sentence to the end of paragraph 1:

“Everyone has the right to cease work, when finding it impossible to work on the economic terms existing or offered.”

A/C.3/SR.98<sup>28</sup>

9 October 1948

Summary Record of the Ninety-Eighth Meeting
[of the Third Committee]

Held at the Palais de Chaillot, Paris, on Saturday,
9 October 1948, at 10:30 a.m.

Chairman: MR. CHARLES MALIK

<sup>28</sup> The text of the document is from Official Records of the General Assembly, Third Session, 1948, pp. 108–15.

20. Draft international declaration of human rights (E/800) (continued)Article 1 (continued)*

THE CHAIRMAN stated that, in the future, the order in which the various articles were to appear in the draft international declaration of human rights would not be before the Committee during discussions on substance. A sub-committee might later be appointed to consider the order.

The question before the Committee was the substance of article 1.

MISS BERNARDINO (Dominican Republic) remarked that her delegation would have an amendment to propose to the preamble when the latter was discussed.

As one who had taken an active part in the international feminist movement, she thought it appropriate to remind the Committee that the question of equality between men and women had been raised at the San Francisco Conference, and that the delegations of Brazil, Mexico, the Dominican Republic and several other countries, had submitted amendments the result of which had been the explicit recognition of that equality in the Charter of the United Nations. That had not been achieved without a certain amount of controversy; a group of delegations had held that women were included by implication in any reference to men. The fact that the Charter explicitly proclaimed the equality of the sexes was a triumph for the women of the world. It was not an empty triumph; legislators in various countries were proceeding to implement those provisions of the Charter.

Nevertheless, some States still had constitutions which granted rights, in particular suffrage, to men alone. Consequently, if the declaration of human rights were to be of practical value for [109] mankind, it should proclaim in the most explicit manner possible, leaving no room for doubt, that men and women were equal before the law. Discrimination against any group of human beings was wrong not only because it hurt that particular group but because, in the final analysis, the fact of its existence hurt all groups of society.

The delegation of the Dominican Republic was prepared to support article 1 in any version which made it clear that there was to be no “distinction as to race, sex, language or religion”.

MR. COROMINAS (Argentina) warmly supported the Brazilian amendment (A/C.3/215). That amendment introduced a philosophical question the full answer to which was beyond human knowledge. He wished to make it clear that in supporting that amendment he had no intention of imposing any one philosophy of faith on any group of human beings. To say that men were “created in the image and likeness of God” was to refer to a belief which all men held in common; the statement could be given the widest possible interpretation.

All men existed and struggled in the same world; their struggle was the basis of history and philosophy. The Argentine delegation felt strongly that there was no conflict between religion and politics. On the contrary, religion gave man the inspiration he needed to follow in the paths of peace; politics and religion should be harmonized and mankind should be guided in its pursuits by evangelical principles. It could properly be said that the Ten Commandments were the first declaration of human rights.

Article 1 of the draft declaration constituted a dogma rather than a statement of rights. That basic article would be given additional strength by the reference to God; it would then rise above mere politics and bring peace and tranquillity to the soul of man. There was no need to fear the results of the inclusion of such a reference: freedom of religion was guaranteed in one of the subsequent articles. All groups of human beings could still profess whatever faith or philosophy they chose. The Brazilian amendment would, however, give to article 1 an element of universality, a breath of the divine.

Mr. Corominas was prepared to bow to the will of the majority; but he recalled that in the past it had frequently been the minority that had espoused the highest causes, and he urged that the sentiments of the minority should be respected.

He stated in conclusion that his remarks had been made in the name of his country, its Constitution and its traditions.

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) said in reply to the representative of the Dominican Republic that the point raised by the latter had been discussed at length by the Commission on Human Rights. The words "all human beings" had been used in article 1 precisely in order that both men and women might be included.

[110]

The word "dignity", regarding which there was some question in the Committee, had also been considered at great length; the Commission had decided to include it in order to emphasize the inherent dignity of all mankind.

The Belgian and Chinese representatives were in favour of the deletion of the words "born" and "by nature". Mrs. Roosevelt stressed the fact that all those suggestions had already been discussed by the Commission on Human Rights, and that the text before the Committee was the result of careful thought and of compromise. It was of course to be expected that the Committee, composed as it was of the representatives of all the Member States, might introduce improvements in wording; but the Committee should remember that some of the imperfections in the text before it had resulted from the need to draft an article on which eighteen nations could agree.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) thought that the theory that all men were born free and equal represented a somewhat shaky basis for the declaration. He laid emphasis on the fact that equality of rights before the law was determined not by the fact of birth but by the social structure of the State, which had to promulgate laws to ensure that equality. Thus, it was obvious that in the days of feudalism men had not been born free and equal.

Mr. Pavlov questioned whether the declaration was the proper place to deal with the origin of human rights. If that was the intention of the Committee, however, it should be remembered that, for the purposes of the declaration, man had to be considered as a member of society. At the current level of development, it was that status which determined his rights and duties.

Consequently, it appeared that the Iraqi amendment (A/C.3/237), which stated that men "should be free and equal", was preferable to the text before the Committee. Mr. Pavlov would, however, say more on the subject when that amendment was discussed.

The second sentence of article 1, with its mention of the "spirit of brotherhood", was too far divorced from the realities of the modern capitalist world to be acceptable. The relations between the United Kingdom and Malaya, between the Netherlands and Indonesia, between different groups in Spain, between the rich and poor everywhere could not be described as brotherly unless the brothers referred to were Cain and Abel.

A real spirit of brotherhood was possible only in the absence of exploitation of men by their fellow men, of weak nations by strong nations. In a socialist society, where such exploitation had been abolished, the very basis for oppression had disappeared. The precept "Dog eat dog" had given way to the nobler motto, "One for all and all for one".

It could be said that article 1 was meant to be a goal for the future; but the declaration would in effect be a recommendation of the General Assembly. It should therefore be realistic, and state only what existed or could be attained at the current stage of human development. The [111] United Nations should not lay itself open to accusations of wishful thinking or hypocrisy.

The USSR representative opposed the Brazilian amendment. In his opinion that amendment should be considered first, as being furthest removed from the original text; the two were, in fact, as far apart as heaven and earth. The declaration should not include statements of a theological nature because such statements were not acceptable to a number of delegations. In view of the separation of Church and State in many countries, the Brazilian amendment might conflict with the constitutions of those countries. It represented the viewpoint of some nations; but the declaration should be a document to which all the nations, or at least the majority, could subscribe.

One of the rights explicitly stated in the declaration was that of the freedom of conscience; the basic article of the declaration should therefore not contain matters which were for each individual to determine. To try to force one's own faith or philosophy upon others would be to revert to concepts current at the time of the Crusades. Moreover, there was no need for a statement of a theological nature in the declaration of human rights; it could, and should, be dispensed with.

MR. PLAZA (Venezuela) supported the Lebanese amendment (A/C.3/235) which proposed deleting the word “born”, leaving only the word “are”; the latter might imply that equality existed only at birth. Venezuela was particularly interested in the rights of the individual and its Constitution guaranteed the protection of the child from its conception until its development had been completed. The text as amended would have a more modern character.

He also supported the amendment of Ecuador (A/C.3/242) to the effect that States should enact the provisions necessary to ensure enjoyment of the right to equality. When the United Nations declared that all men had a right to be equal, it implied that all States should strive to fulfil their obligations in that respect.

Mr. Plaza supported the Belgian amendment, which proposed the elimination of the words “by nature” for the same reasons as those given by that country’s delegation. He then submitted a text (A/C.3/246) which, he hoped, would reconcile the amendments proposed by Belgium (A/C.3/234), Lebanon (A/C.3/235), Iraq (A/C.3/237), Ecuador (A/C.3/242) and China (A/C.3/236). The text read:

“All human beings have the right to be free and equal. They are endowed with reason and conscience and should act towards one another in a spirit of brotherhood.”

The other amendments appeared to be so different from the original text that a sub-committee should be set up to study them.

MR. RAMÍREZ MORENO (Columbia) agreed that the philosophical basis of the phrase “all human beings are free and equal” was fragile. A certain materialistic school of thought considered man only as the material expression of evolution and denied that his rights were inherent. It might therefore wish to give him the same treatment as [112] it would to an animal. There was, however, another school of thought which believed that men were of spiritual origin. Those who wished to refute that school had no facts to bear out their argument.

It could be alleged that no equality existed, as men were not equally gifted or talented. Human equality, however, should be considered at a deeper level. It had been maintained moreover that there could be no brotherhood because imperialistic countries exploited Native tribes in their colonies; but it should be remembered that the document under discussion was designed to be not a chronicle of crime but an affirmation of a doctrine.

Exploitation of man by man had been mentioned in the debate. He wished to point out that as the representative of a Christian country, he could never be the mouthpiece of capitalism. He was speaking in the name of the worker of the future, of the man of the South American Continent who desired to place social consideration above economic ones. Man could be exploited in more than one way; it was possible to exploit his ignorance, his hunger, his resentment, and his desire to follow his instincts. A certain school of political thought advocated that States should spread suffering to the greatest possible number. But only one group of people – those who had come to power through a class war – was trying to bring about a dead uniformity of poverty and misery. Other countries advocated different political principles. Some had been guided by humanity and fraternity and had found strength in heroism and martyrdom. They did not defend capitalism, but they claimed prosperity for all and sought to abolish for ever the inequalities of men's rights. The conception of the divinity of man implied his capacity for suffering and for progressing through martyrdom; yet after centuries, that aim had still not been achieved.

The United Kingdom Foreign Secretary had said that the concepts of certain contemporary schools of thought were closer to those of the caveman than to those of the men of the twentieth century. Western thought would never break away from its high spiritual ideals and adhere to the reactionary principles which sought to demolish the soul and destroy idealism.

It had been said that no mention of God should be made in the declaration since there was a separation of Church and State in some countries. That argument had little foundation, for a reference to God would in no way contradict that separation. No one country should impose its religion upon another country but the reference to God could be interpreted by each country in accordance with its religious beliefs. It would, moreover, lend great weight to the article.

He therefore supported the amendment submitted by Brazil.

MR. ANZE MATIENZO (Bolivia), in reply to the USSR representative's statement that human rights were not inherent in man but rather derived from the social structure of the country in which he lived, said that the democratic countries of the West could not accept that point of view. He wished to support the text before the Committee, which said, "All human beings are born free and equal. . ." Men were born free and [113] equal before the law and before God and the consciousness of their freedom and equality was the determining factor in building their social structure.

Referring to the USSR representative's objection to the use of the word "brotherhood" on the ground that it was not realistic since all men obviously did not act as brothers, Mr. Anze Matienzo pointed out that there was no intention of claiming that human beings were perfect. The draft declaration was designed to set a goal for mankind. It should inspire men to transform into realities the principles it proclaimed.

The examples of the USSR representative had given of the failure of men to act like brothers were not the only examples that could be cited. In the Soviet Union, too, men fought against one another, and the current regime of that country was based on the denial of human rights.

The hopes which many men had had in the early days of the Soviet regime had been disappointed. The USSR had not taken the lead in promoting the advancement of mankind. Instead it had insisted on such outworn doctrines as that of absolute national sovereignty, which contradicted the beliefs of the age and undermined the very foundation of the United Nations.

If a common area of agreement could be found, it would be because there was mutual tolerance. Any attempt on the part of a particular group to impose its beliefs on others was in itself a flagrant violation of the freedom of man.

The Bolivian delegation supported the Brazilian draft amendment; in its opinion, the idea of God was not a debatable theological doctrine, but a positive reality. The argument put forward by the representative of the Soviet Union that no reference should be made to God because in many countries Church and State were entirely separate, was not valid. Although the two institutions had been separated, most States granted their citizens freedom of conscience. Even in the USSR, where an attempt had been made to abolish the idea of God, freedom of worship had been restored. The common factor in mankind and the most realistic basis for human understanding was the belief in a Supreme Being and that belief should therefore be mentioned in the Declaration of Human Rights.

MR. CHANG (China) thought that the basic text of article 1, with the amendments proposed by the Belgian (A/C.3/234) and Lebanese (A/C.3/235) representatives, would be acceptable to the Committee if it were understood on the basis of eighteenth century philosophy.

That philosophy was based on the innate goodness of man. Other schools of thought had said that man's nature was neutral and could be made good or bad, or again that his nature was all bad. The eighteenth century thinkers, whose work had led to the proclamation of the principles of liberty, equality and fraternity in France and, in the United States, to the Declaration of Independence, had realized that although man was largely animal, there was a part of him which distinguished him from animals. That part was the real man and was good, and that part should therefore be [114] given greater importance. There was no contradiction between the eighteenth century idea of goodness of man's essential nature and the idea of a soul given to man by God, for the concept of God laid particular stress on the human, as opposed to the animal, part of man's nature.

Mr. Chang urged that the Committee should not debate the question of the nature of man again but should build on the work of the eighteenth century philosophers. He thought the Committee should agree to a text beginning "all human beings are free. . ." – using "human beings" to refer to the non-animal part of man – as proposed by the Lebanese delegation and should further agree to delete the words "by nature", as proposed by the Belgian delegation. If the words "by nature" were deleted, those who believed in God could still find in the strong opening assertion of the article the idea of God, and at the same time others with different concepts would be able to accept the text.

Mr. Chang hoped that in the light of his explanation the Brazilian delegation would be willing to withdraw its amendment (A/C.3/215) and so spare the members of the Committee the task of deciding by vote on a principle which was in fact beyond the capacity of human judgment.

Mr. Chang paid a particular tribute to the contribution to the work of preparing the draft declaration made by Professor Cassin, the representative of France, who had so ably exposed French doctrines of the eighteenth century.

Concerning practical reality a point raised by the USSR representative, Mr. Chang said that all recognized the existence of wrongs, but the most efficacious way of correcting those wrongs was to set a common standard such as the draft declaration sought to establish. Recognition of the stark facts with which the world was faced should not, however, be termed realism but naturalism, for realism meant that which was truly real and which could be affirmed with the full force of the soul.

MISS BERNARDINO (Dominican Republic) wished to clarify an apparent misunderstanding of her previous statement. She fully appreciated the attention given to the question of the rights of women by the Commission on Human Rights and by its Chairman, and her delegation was prepared to vote in favour of the basic text of article 1 because it considered that that article gave a sufficiently clear guarantee that women's rights would be respected.

She reserved her right to speak later about the amendment she had proposed to the preamble.

MRS. CORBET (United Kingdom) thought that the basic text of article 1, with the Lebanese and Belgian amendments, should receive general support. The wording of the latter part of the article, however, might be improved. In that connexion she referred the Committee to the text submitted by the New Zealand delegation (A/C.3/245).

[115]

Speaking of the amendment proposed by the Brazilian representative, she pointed out that no obstacles should be put in the way of the adherence of the largest possible number of countries to the declaration. She therefore appealed to the Committee to take a practical view of the question and to accept the wording recommended by the Commission on Human Rights.

In order to speed up the Committee's work, she suggested that at future meetings the amendments should be taken up one by one, debated and then put to the vote. After all had been disposed of, the final text of the article could be voted as a whole.

Time Limit for Submission of Amendments

THE CHAIRMAN asked if there was any objection to setting 6 p.m. on Monday, 11 October, as the time limit for submitting amendments.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) was afraid certain members might wish to submit amendments after that date as the need for them might arise in the course of the debate.

He further suggested that there should be no time limit for all amendments, but rather a series of time limits for amendments to each separate article as it was taken up.

THE CHAIRMAN explained that he had intended that the time limit should apply only to matters of substance and that any drafting suggestions or matters likely to arise out of the discussion could naturally be made at any time.

MR. KAMINSKY (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) supported the views expressed by the USSR representative and added that it would be better to postpone any decision regarding a time limit for submitting amendments until after the first four or five articles of the draft declaration had been dealt with.

The meeting rose at 1:20 p.m.

A/C.3/253

11 October 1948

United Kingdom: Amendments to the Preamble and Article 12 of the Draft Declaration (E/800)

Preamble

“By a regime of law” should be replaced by “by the rule of law”. This appears to apply only to the English text.

Article 12 (1)

Amend to read: “Everyone has the right to seek, and to enjoy in other countries, asylum from persecution.”

A/C.3/254

11 October 1948

Original Text: English, French

Amendments to Article 1

Order Proposed by the Chairman

1. Mexico

(All human beings are born free and equal in dignity and rights.) The right of sustenance, health, education and work is considered essential in order to guarantee social justice and the full development of the human being.

2. Brazil

(All human beings are born free and equal in dignity and rights.) Created in the image and likeness of God, they are endowed with reason and conscience and should act towards one another in a spirit of brotherhood.

3. Cuba

(All men are born free and equal in dignity and rights, being endowed by nature with reason and conscience, they should act towards one another like brothers.)

Respect for the rights of all requires that each shall do his duty. In all human activity, both social and political rights and duties are indissolubly linked with one another. While rights enhance individual freedom, duties express the dignity of that freedom.

Duties of a legal nature presuppose other duties of a moral nature which facilitate their understanding and serve as their foundation.

It is the duty of man to practise, uphold and promote culture by all means at his disposal, for culture is the highest social and historical expression of the human spirit. Morality being the noblest product of culture, it is the duty of all to respect it at all times.

4. Iraq

All human beings should be free and equal in dignity and worth and should be entitled to similar treatment and equal opportunities.

[2]

5. Ecuador

Human beings have the right from their birth, to be free and equal before the law and the State should enact the provisions necessary to ensure the enjoyment of that right.

6. Uruguay

The rights contained in this Declaration shall be necessarily recognized in order to allow all human beings to live in accordance with their condition of beings endowed with conscience and reason and to pursue happiness in a spirit of brotherly solidarity.

All the provisions of the present Declaration shall be interpreted in accordance with this principle.

7. Venezuela

All human beings have the right to be free and equal. They are endowed with reason and conscience and should act towards one another in a spirit of brotherhood.

8. China

All human beings are free and equal in dignity and rights. They are endowed with reason and conscience and should act towards one another in a spirit of brotherhood.

9. Cuba

All men are born free and equal in dignity and rights; being endowed by nature with reason and conscience they should act towards one another like brothers.

10. Belgium

All human beings are born free and equal in dignity and rights. They are endowed with reason and conscience, and should act towards one another in a spirit of brotherhood.

11. Lebanon

All human beings are free and equal in dignity and rights. They are endowed by nature with reason and conscience and should act towards one another in a spirit of brotherhood.

12. New Zealand

All human beings are born free and equal in dignity and rights, endowed with reason and conscience and bound in duty to one another as brothers.

A/C.3/255

11 October 1948

Saudi Arabia: Amendment to Article 10 of the Draft Declaration (E/800)

Delete the word “unreasonable” and substitute the word “illegitimate”.

A/C.3/256

11 October 1948

Recapitulation of Amendments to Article 2 of the Draft Declaration (E/800)

(In the chronological order of their submission to the Committee.)

Article 2 (Text as adopted by the Commission on Human Rights)

“Everyone is entitled to all the rights and freedoms set forth in this Declaration without distinction of any kind, such as race, colour, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, property or other status, or national social origin.”

Amendments:Panama (A/C.3/220)

It is proposed that this article should be merged with article 6 in order to have a single article dealing with the right to equality, as proposed in connexion with article 6.

Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (E/800)

After the word “property or other status”, add “class”.

Cuba (A/C.3/224)

The following text is proposed for article 2:

“All are equal before the law and are entitled to the rights, and subject to the duties laid down in this Declaration without distinction of race, birth, sex, language, religion, political opinion, or property or other status.”

This wording would make it unnecessary to include article 6.

Guatemala (A/C.3/228)

Delete article 2 of the draft Declaration and transfer its contents to the Preamble.

A/C.3/257<sup>29</sup>

11 October 1948

Australia: Amendments to Preamble and Article 23 of the Draft Declaration (E/800)

Preamble

Amend second paragraph to read:

“Whereas disregard and contempt for human rights have resulted in barbarous acts which have outraged the conscience of mankind and have made apparent the supreme importance of the recognition and guarantee of fundamental freedoms”.

Amend fifth paragraph to read:

“Whereas Member States have pledged themselves to promote, in co-operation with the Organization, universal respect for the observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms”.

<sup>29</sup> This document was originally issued in error under the code A/C.3/254. See A/C.3/254/Corr.1.

Article 23, paragraph 1

For the second sentence substitute the following:

“Everyone is entitled to free elementary and fundamental education and to equal access on the basis of merit to higher education.”

A/C.3/280

11 October 1948

Panama: Amendments to Articles 10 to 28 of the Draft Declaration

Article 10

Add to this article the words: person, activities and property, so that the article read as follows:

“Article – No one shall be subjected to unreasonable interference with his person, his home, his family, his privacy, his activities, his property, his correspondence or his reputation.”

Article 11

Add to this article a paragraph reading as follows:

“This right is limited by the power of the State, temporarily to compel a person to reside within certain limits as a penalty for a criminal offence, or to enforce writs of ne exeat regno lawfully issued by courts in civil jurisdiction.”

Article 15

Add to paragraph 1 the words in accordance with general law, so that paragraph 1 read as follows:

“Article – Everyone has the right to own property, alone as well as in association with others, in accordance with general law.”

Article 17

It is proposed that two articles be substituted for this article, defining separately the freedom of opinion and the freedom of expression, as follows:

“Article – Everyone has the right to freedom of opinion which includes the right to hold opinions without interference and to seek and receive information and ideas through any media, regardless of frontiers.”

“Article – Everyone has the right to freedom of expression, which includes the right to freedom of speech, freedom of the press and freedom to use any media of communication to express opinions or impart information.”

[2]

Article 18

It is proposed to substitute for this article two different articles defining separately the freedom of assembly and the freedom of association, as follows:

“Article – Freedom to assemble peaceably with others for political, economic, religious, social, cultural and other purposes is the right of everyone.”

“Article – Freedom to form with others associations of a political, economic, religious, social, cultural or any other character, for purposes not inconsistent with these articles is the right of everyone.”

Article 20

Add after the words social security the phrase from the cradle to the grave, so that the article read as follows:

“Article – Everyone, as a member of society, has the right to social security from the cradle to the grave, and is entitled to the realization through national effort and international co-operation, and in accordance with the organization and resources of each State, of the economic, social and cultural rights set out below.”

Article 24

Add after the word leisure the following phrase: in such measure as may be required for the maintenance of the physical and mental health and well being of the working man or woman. The article would then read as follows:

“Article – Everyone has the right to rest and leisure in such measure as may be required for the maintenance of the physical and mental health and well being of the working man or woman.”

A/C.3/273

11 October 1948

Original Text: French

Turkey: Amendment to Article 23 of the Draft
Declaration (E/800)

After the words “higher education”, add “which should as far as possible be free of charge”.

A/C.3/SR.99<sup>30</sup>
11 October 1948

Summary Record of the Ninety-Ninth Meeting
[of the Third Committee]

Held at the Palais de Chaillot, Paris, on Monday,
11 October 1948, at 3 p.m.

Chairman: MR. CHARLES MALIK (Lebanon)

21. Draft international declaration of human rights (E/800) (continued)

Time Limit for Submission of Amendments (continued)

THE CHAIRMAN called for a decision on the suggestion that a time limit be fixed for the submission of substantive amendments to the draft international declaration of human rights.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba), supported by MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America), proposed that the time limit should expire on 12 October, half an hour after the opening of the morning meeting.

[116]

MR. CAÑAS (Costa Rica) and MR. KAMINSKY (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) supported the proposal made by the USSR representative at the 98th meeting, to the effect that a time limit should be fixed only for each separate article as it came up for discussion. After studying the amendments already submitted, representatives might wish to make further consequential changes. It would, therefore, be unfortunate if a rigid time limit were set for amendments to all the articles at the current stage.

At the request of MR. KURAL (Turkey), MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) agreed to alter his proposal and to fix 6 p.m. on Tuesday, 12 October, as the time limit.

THE CHAIRMAN said that, if a time limit were fixed, it would not apply to drafting changes. He would also be willing to interpret the rule in a flexible manner and to admit suggestions for compromise texts, which might arise in the course of the discussion.

He put to the vote the proposal submitted by the representative of Cuba that the time limit for the submission of substantive amendments should be 6 p.m. on Tuesday, 12 October.

The proposal was adopted by 31 votes to 6, with 6 abstentions.

<sup>30</sup> The text of the document is from Official Records of the General Assembly, Third Session, 1948, pp. 115–25.

Article 1 (continued)

MRS. MENON (India) said that, although different countries had different beliefs and political systems, they shared the same ideals of social justice and freedom. The purpose of the declaration was to set forth those ideals and to find a basis of agreement acceptable to all. As far as article 1 was concerned, there was general agreement that all men should live together in freedom and brotherhood. In that connexion lessons could be learnt from the democracies of both the East and the West. As the amendment submitted by the Brazilian representative (A/C.3/215) contained a statement of belief which was not shared by all the representatives, she appealed to him to withdraw it for the sake of unanimity.

MR. GRUMBACH (France) referred to the opposition raised by the USSR representative at the previous meeting to the substance of the first sentence of article 1. All representatives agreed that inequality did, in fact, exist, but the statement "All human beings are born free and equal. . ." meant that the right to freedom and equality was inherent from the moment of birth. The men who had drafted the Bill of the Rights of Man of 1789 had fully realized the existence of inequality and social injustice, but they had felt it essential to affirm their belief in man's inherent right to equality and freedom.

With regard to the Brazilian amendment, he respected the religious sentiments which had inspired it, but he did not think it would be appropriate to include in article 1 a statement on man's origin to which all representatives could not agree. Freedom of religion was a fundamental human right, but he agreed with the representative of [117] China (98th meeting) that it was useless to attempt to reach agreement with regard to man's origin, and that such controversial issues should be avoided. The Committee's essential aim was to reach agreement on fundamental principles which could be put into practice. That attitude would be endorsed by believers and non-believers alike. The great Catholic, Jacques Maritain,<sup>31</sup> had stated in relation to that very question that the nations should try to reach agreement on a declaration of human rights, but that it was useless to try to reach agreement on the origin of those rights. It had been that agreement on practical fundamental rights which had kept the leaders of his country strong and united during the terrible years of the occupation.

He supported the simple statement as it appeared in the draft submitted by the Commission on Human Rights but he agreed with the representative of China that the words "by nature" should be deleted from the second sentence of article 1.

<sup>31</sup> Jacques Maritain (1882–1973) was a French Catholic philosopher who influenced the debate about the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, although this is the only reference to his name anywhere in the travaux préparatoires. At the time he was involved with UNESCO and contributed to the document it submitted to the Commission on Human Rights in December 1947. On Maritain's involvement, see: A. Woodcock, "Jacques Maritain, Natural Law and the Universal Declaration of Human Rights", (2006) 8 Journal of the History of International Law 245.

He appealed to the representative of Brazil to withdraw his amendment, so that the article could be adopted unanimously.

MR. BEAUFORT (Netherlands) said that his delegation was in favour of the principle set forth in the Brazilian amendment, as was shown by the fact that it had submitted a similar amendment to the preamble. However, in view of the difficulties encountered, he urged the representative of Brazil to withdraw his amendment as the subject would be discussed again when the Netherlands amendment to the preamble came up for consideration.

MR. DE ATHAYDE (Brazil) reaffirmed his belief that the draft declaration should contain some reference to the belief in the existence of God, which, he felt, was held by most men.

However, in view of the difficulties that had arisen, he withdrew his amendment to article 1, reserving the right to raise the matter again during the discussion of the amendment to the preamble, submitted by the Netherlands delegation.

MR. COROMINAS (Argentina) said that his delegation would also support the Netherlands amendment to the preamble when it came up for discussion. He emphasized his support of the principle set forth in the Brazilian amendment but in a spirit of co-operation agreed to its withdrawal at that point in the debate.

MR. PLAZA (Venezuela) said that his delegation had supported the Brazilian amendment but, as it had been withdrawn, he congratulated the representatives of Brazil and Argentina for their co-operative attitude.

MRS. NEWLANDS (New Zealand) introduced the amendment submitted by her delegation (A/C.3/245).

She agreed with the United States representative that the basic draft presented a reasonably satisfactory compromise on the difficult philosophical issues involved in article 1. She also agreed with the representative of China that the article should contain an affirmative assertion that all [118] men were free and equal in dignity and rights. Her delegation wished, however, to retain the word "born".

With regard to the second sentence, she felt that the expression "should act towards one another in a spirit of brotherhood" was not sufficiently emphatic. Her delegation had, therefore, combined the first and second sentences of the draft article and redrafted the latter part of the second sentence to express the clear obligation that all human beings were bound in duty to one another as brothers. That amendment would strengthen the article and make it more in keeping with the Committee's decision that it should not be transferred to the preamble (97th meeting). The substitution of the words "as brothers" for the words "in a spirit of brotherhood" was merely a drafting change and did not imply any distinction between men and women.

The words "by nature" had been omitted in accordance with the views expressed by the representatives of Belgium, China, and Yugoslavia.

MR. BAGDADI (Egypt) thought that article 1 should set forth man's inherent right to freedom and equality. In his opinion, the article would be weakened if the amendment submitted by the representative of Iraq (A/C.3/237) were adopted. That amendment suggested that the phrase should read: "All human beings should be free and equal. . ."

His delegation would support the basic draft text of article 1, if the mention of the duty to act towards one another in a spirit of brotherhood were omitted and inserted in a later article.

He agreed with the representatives of Belgium and China that the words "by nature" should be deleted from the second sentence of article 1.

MR. KAYALY (Syria) said that article 1 was the cornerstone of the draft declaration. His delegation was satisfied that both rights and duties were mentioned in the article and would support the present draft.

The amendments submitted showed that differences of opinion existed on the following three points: the inclusion of the word "born" in the first sentence; the inclusion of the words "by nature" in the second sentence; and the mention of "brotherhood" in the second sentence.

With regard to the first point, he felt that the word "born" should be retained as it would exclude the idea of hereditary slavery.

With regard to the second point, he saw no reason to omit the words "by nature" as they were used in a figurative sense to describe the effect of outward circumstances on man. He agreed with the representative of China that the words "endowed with reason and conscience" should be retained as they served to differentiate man from the animals. In his opinion, most of the evils apparent in the world and most international misunderstandings were due to the fact that man's reason and conscience had been impaired.

With regard to the third point, the word "brotherhood" was not defined in the draft declaration. In his opinion, it was an expression of the ideal moral relationships which should exist between men and meant that all men should behave to others as they would wish others to behave to them. If that was the generally accepted meaning of the word, he thought that it should be retained.

His delegation supported the text submitted by the Commission on Human Rights and he congratulated the Commission on its work.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) pointed out that the lengthy discussions on article 1 indicated that that article was more than a mere summary of the detailed rights listed in the following articles; it was an important enunciation of the basic principle which was the source of all the later affirmations, and as such should lay a solid foundation for all that followed. Article 1 should not simply proclaim a common desire but should clearly state a universally recognized truth based on reason. In affirming the equality of all human beings, it should express a rational conviction, a decision that men were, in fact, to be equal.

For that reason Lebanon preferred the word “are” to the words “are born” in the first sentence.

The second sentence of article 1 should retain the words “by nature”. The draft declaration might even state that all human beings were born free and equal in dignity and rights because they were endowed by nature with reason and conscience. That latter fact laid upon man the duty to act in the spirit of brotherhood, as well as the right to equality and freedom. If man were endowed with reason and conscience by chance, then it could be claimed that his right to freedom and equality was equally accidental; if it were believed that the essence of man was determined by the social structure in which he lived, then his claim to freedom should be subordinated to the social order. If, however, reason and conscience were the distinguishing characteristics of man as distinct from animals, then nothing could change man’s essential right to freedom and equality. The expression “by nature” must not be interpreted as referring to some external power: it meant rather that man’s freedom and equality were based on his very nature, and were inseparable from it.

Concerning the idea of brotherhood included in the second sentence, Lebanon thought such a concept should be retained, as it logically followed from the fact that man was endowed with reason and conscience. The USSR representative had called attention to evidence of unkindness and hatred among men. There was, however, abundant evidence to the contrary. In the great campaigns for organizing assistance to the needy, the large majority of those who contributed did so because they were moved by the spirit of brotherhood. The friendly atmosphere which prevailed at the Committee’s meetings, in spite of serious disagreements among the members, was further proof of that spirit.

The Lebanese delegation would not insist on its views, but it wished to suggest that article 1 would be more adequate if it read (A/C.3/260):

“Since all human beings are endowed by their nature with reason and conscience, they are free [120] and equal in dignity and rights and in their duty to act towards one another in a spirit of brotherhood.”

The Brazilian amendment, which had been withdrawn, would have received the support of the Lebanese delegation because, if it had been accepted, it would have had the effect of deepening the impression which the declaration would make on the hearts and minds of men.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) welcomed the withdrawal of the Brazilian amendments, as that proposal would not have met with general agreement and would, moreover, have raised difficulties for individual members whose personal views were perhaps not in accord with the official views they represented.

Since the Brazilian amendment had been withdrawn, however, the words “by nature” should certainly be deleted from the second sentence of the article and no mention should be made of the origin of man’s reason and conscience.

Several of the proposed amendments were designed to make it clear in article 1 that man had a right to freedom and equality. In the view of the Chilean delegation, article 1 was a categorical affirmation of the essential qualities and rights of man, an affirmation of faith such as was included in the Preamble to the Charter of the United Nations. Whether to use the words “are born” or the word “are” in the first sentence was not a question of any great importance, for the purpose in both cases was to proclaim that freedom and equality were essential attributes of human personality, regardless of whether or not those rights were always recognized.

Referring to the Cuban proposal concerning article 1, which would include in the article a reference to the duties of man, Mr. Santa Cruz hoped that the Cuban delegation would agree to withdraw the amendment, as article 1 should be confined to an enunciation of the essential attributes of man. The Cuban delegation might wish, however, to re-submit its amendment in connexion with the Committee’s examination of article 27 and of the question of placing article 27 immediately after article 2, as had already been suggested by the French representative (96th meeting).

Turning to consideration of the Mexican proposal, Mr. Santa Cruz recalled that in the meetings of the Drafting Committee and of the Commission on Human Rights there had been a long discussion on the advisability of making a statement concerning man’s position in relation to society. The Chilean delegation had proposed a paragraph on that subject for inclusion in the preamble and had further suggested a paragraph to be included in article 3, which would refer to man’s right to enjoy conditions of life that would enable him to develop his personality adequately. Mr. Santa Cruz therefore agree with the substance of the Mexican proposal, but felt that it should not, logically, be placed in article 1, but rather in article 3.

The Chilean delegation was prepared to adopt either the basic text of article 1, with the deletion of the words “by nature”, or the text proposed by the Chinese delegation.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) thanked the Brazilian delegation for withdrawing its amendment in the interest of unanimity.

[121]

Referring to the Cuban draft amendment, Mr. Pérez Cisneros understood that delegations might find some difficulty in deciding on the question of man’s duties and he agreed that no attempt should be made to draw up an exhaustive list of duties.

He was therefore willing to accept the Chilean suggestion that his proposal should be considered in connexion with draft article 27. That article, however should not insist on the duties of the individual towards the community but should stress further the concept of social solidarity implicit in article 1. He also agreed with the French representative that article 27 should be placed elsewhere.

Concerning the procedure to be followed in voting, he thought that as the amendments furthest removed from the original text should be voted on first, the Committee might first consider the proposals made by Ecuador (A/C.3/242) and Uruguay (A/C.3/231), then the Cuban proposal (A/C.3/254), and finally the Mexican proposal (A/C.3/229), which dealt with the social rights of man.

MR. DE ALBA (Mexico) thought that the difficulties that had arisen in connexion with the text of article 1 were a natural result of the fact that the draft under consideration included so many different, and often somewhat contradictory, ideas.

To say in one sentence that all men were born free and equal and to speak in the next of reason and conscience was to cover too much all at once. The idea that men were born free and equal was in itself acceptable, but it was insufficient. As other representatives had already pointed out, a human being's right to freedom and equality began from the moment of his conception and continued after his birth. That broader period should be taken into account, if the word "born" were used. Mention should also be made of the health, education and general wellbeing of the child.

The reference to the spirit of brotherhood in the second sentence was not an a priori affirmation; it should therefore be clearly connected with the exercise of human rights, for otherwise it seemed to be extraneous to the article in which it was included.

The Mexican delegation supported the Belgian proposal (A/C.3/234) for the deletion of the words "by nature" in the second sentence of the article.

It also supported the Lebanese proposal (A/C.3/235) to substitute "are" for "are born", since freedom and equality were of the very essence of mankind and did not depend upon the accident of birth.

The Mexican delegation reserved its position, however, in regard to the concept of man's duties in relation to his rights.

Mr. de Alba hoped that in seeking to reach agreement, the members of the Committee would act in the spirit of tolerance invoked by the Indian representative and in a spirit of humility. Those delegations who had wished to see the word [122] "born" omitted might be willing to consider that point as being of minor importance, and those delegations who wished to raise the question of man's duties might agree to examine that question in connexion with a later article of the draft declaration.

Mexico was prepared to withdraw its amendment to article 1 but would reserve its right to re-submit it in connexion with article 3.

MR. CARRERA ANDRADE (Ecuador) drew attention to the fundamental similarity in draft amendments submitted by Iraq, Ecuador, Venezuela, China and Lebanon. He therefore suggested that the authors of those amendments should form a sub-committee to draw up a single text to be submitted to the full Committee.

MR. PLAZA (Venezuela) explained that the Venezuelan draft text (A/C.3/246) – “All human beings have the right to be free and equal. . .” – was intended to correct what was in reality a false statement in the original text. Nevertheless, if the majority preferred the original text, and if that draft could be interpreted to mean that freedom and equality were the source of the rights listed in the draft declaration, this delegation would withdraw its amendment.

He preferred, however, the word “are” to the words “are born”, as human rights began with the prenatal period.

He also supported the deletion of the words “by nature”.

The Venezuelan delegation was prepared to participate in the work of a sub-committee such as the one suggested by the representative of Ecuador.

MR. ABADI (Iraq) supported the proposal made by the representative of Ecuador for the creation of a sub-committee. To facilitate a compromise, he was willing to withdraw his own amendment (A/C.3/237), but he still felt that the words “are born” in the first sentence of the article should be changed to “should be” or perhaps “are” or “have a right to be”.

MR. BAROODY (Saudi Arabia) pointed out that to say that all human beings were endowed with reason and conscience was too broad a statement, one that was not, and had never been, true. Moreover, the words “dignity and rights” used in the first sentence were ambiguous and had different meanings in different countries.

With the hope of avoiding both metaphysical questions and words which would be subject to different interpretations, he suggested that the text of article 1 should read:

“Equality and freedom being the ultimate human goals, all men should act towards one another in a spirit of brotherhood.”

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) suggested that the work of the Committee would be speeded up if separate votes were taken on three clearly defined points: first, the substitution of “are” for [123] “are born” in the first sentence; secondly, the use of the words “should be” in the first sentence; and thirdly, the deletion of the words “by nature” in the second sentence.

In reply to a question by MR. QUADROS (Uruguay) THE CHAIRMAN explained that the Committee had decided at its 97th meeting that the substance of article 1 should remain in article 1 and should not be transferred to any other part of the draft declaration.

MR. QUADROS (Uruguay) protested that the President of the General Assembly had announced the cancellation of the meeting in question; the meeting had, however, taken place and a decision had been taken on the position of the article. His delegation, which had wished to be present in order to defend the proposal it had made at that point, had not been informed of the subsequent decision that the meeting should be held.

He stated that Uruguay would withdraw its draft amendment (A/C.3/231) and would support the basic text of article 1, if the words “by nature” were deleted.

THE CHAIRMAN explained that the President of the General Assembly had originally announced the cancellation of the Third Committee’s meeting on 8 October but had later announced a new decision that the Committee should meet.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) agreed with the Cuban representative concerning the procedure to be followed in the discussion. The Iraqi proposal to substitute “should be” for “are born” should be voted on first as it was farthest in substance from the original text.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) withdrew his proposal for the substitution of the word “are” for “are born”, in favour of the Chinese amendment (A/C.3/236) to the same effect.

MR. CARRERA ANDRADE (Ecuador), supported by the representatives of Mexico and Lebanon, maintained his proposal for a drafting subcommittee.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) felt that a subcommittee should be appointed after the Committee had taken a decision on the three points he had mentioned.

THE CHAIRMAN, supported by the representatives of Bolivia and France, was of the opinion that the Committee could come to a final decision on the wording of article 1 at the current meeting.

The Chairman pointed out that the Committee was in agreement on the uses of the expression “human beings” and called for a vote on the Iraqi proposal for the substitution of the words “should be” for “are born”.

The proposal was rejected by 24 votes to 16, with 1 abstention.

In reply to the representative of Lebanon, the Chairman explained that it would not be correct procedurally to take a vote on the proposal for the deletion of the words “by nature” before deciding the final wording of the first sentence. The words “are born and remain” had been suggested to him informally before the meeting; he wondered if any representative felt inclined to sponsor that proposal.

MR. CHANG (China) was in favour of the adoption of a strong affirmative statement without qualifications. If the word “born” were deleted, the question of whether human rights began at birth or at conception would not arise. However, if the majority of the Committee wanted the word “born” to be retained, he suggested a further vote on the insertion of the words “and remain”.

THE CHAIRMAN called for a vote on the Chinese proposal to delete the word “born”.

The proposal was rejected by 20 votes to 12, with 5 abstentions.

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) objected to the insertion of the words “and remain”. In the current period, it was obviously not true that human beings always remained free and equal in dignity and rights.

MR. CASSIN (France) pointed out that the Committee was not acting as a national parliament but as representatives of the human community and in that capacity was competent to proclaim such an ideal.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) agreed with the French representative and remarked that the United States representative’s objection could apply with equal force to the expression “All human beings are born free. . .”

MRS. CORBET (United Kingdom) considered it rather late to introduce the proposal to insert “and remain” and requested the Chinese and Chilean representatives not to press for its adoption.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) supported the Chilean proposal and drew attention to the fact that the phrase was used in the French Bill of Rights.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) felt it would be dangerous to leave the words “are born” without adding “and remain”, as it would imply that human beings were born free and equal, but later, for various economic, social and political reasons ceased to be so.

MR. ANZE MATIENZO (Bolivia) moved the closure of the debate.

MR. WATT (Australia) opposed the motion of closure for the reason put forward by the United Kingdom representative. In actual fact, there was not such a great difference in meaning between the expressions “are born” and “are born and remain so”, as between the interpretations given to them.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the motion to close the debate.

The motion was adopted by 23 votes to 6, with 4 abstentions.

[125]

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the Chinese proposal to insert the words “and remain”.

The proposal was rejected by 23 votes to 14, with 4 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the Belgian proposal to delete the words “by nature” in the second sentence of the article (A/C.3/234).

The proposal was adopted by 26 votes to 4, with 9 abstentions.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) drew attention to his amendment to the French text of article 1 and to the fact that there was a difference in meaning between par la nature and de par leur nature.

The representatives of Cuba and France agreed with the Lebanese representative concerning the difference in meaning between the two phrases.

After a short discussion in which it was agreed that a correct English translation of the two expressions would have to be provided, MRS. KALINOWSKA (Poland) moved the adjournment of the debate.

The motion was adopted.

The meeting rose at 7:15 p.m.

A/C.3/SR.100<sup>32</sup>
12 October 1948

Summary Record of the Hundredth Meeting
[of the Third Committee]

Held at the Palais de Chaillot, Paris, on Tuesday,
 12 October 1948 at 10.45 a.m.

Chairman: Mr. CHARLES MALIK (Lebanon); later, MRS. BODIL BEGRUP (Denmark).

22. Draft international declaration of human rights (E/800) (continued)

Article 1 (continued)

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the amendment proposed by the representative of Lebanon (99th meeting) to the effect that the words “by their nature” should be inserted after the words “are endowed”.

The amendment was rejected by 16 votes to 6, with 8 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the New Zealand amendment (A/C.3/245), suggesting the following wording for article 1:

“All human beings are born free and equal in dignity and rights, endowed with reason and conscience and bound in duty to one another as brothers.”

The amendment was rejected by 14 votes to 9, with 8 abstentions.

<sup>32</sup> The text of the document is from Official Records of the General Assembly, Third Session, 1948, pp. 125–34.

THE CHAIRMAN put article 1, as amended, to the vote, in the following form:

“All human beings are born free and equal in dignity and rights. They are endowed with reason and conscience and should act towards one another in a spirit of brotherhood.”

Article 1, as amended, was adopted by 26 votes to none, with 8 abstentions.

Prompted by a remark of the representative of Lebanon, the Chairman, supported by MR. COROMINAS (Argentina), stated that no further [126] change, not even of drafting, could be made in the article as adopted by the Committee. The subcommittee which would be set up subsequently to consider the order of the articles would be asked solely to decide where the article was to come.

Article 2<sup>1</sup>

THE CHAIRMAN read the text proposed by the Commission on Human Rights for article 2. He pointed out that the amendments thereto submitted by the delegations of the USSR (E/800, page 32), Panama (A/C.3/220), Cuba (A/C.3/224) and Guatemala (A/C.3/228) were recapitulated in document A/C.3/256.

MR. WATT (Australia) having pointed out that the Committee had formally decided to discuss only the substance of the various articles of the draft declaration and to leave the decision as to their final arrangement to a subcommittee which would be set up later, the Chairman ruled that the amendments presented by the delegations of Panama and Guatemala, proposing to place the content of article 2 in the preamble and in article 6 respectively, were out of order.

MR. GARCÍA BAUER (Guatemala) contested the Chairman's ruling, which contradicted the assurances he had previously received that his amendment was in order.

THE CHAIRMAN wished to dispel an obvious misunderstanding. The Committee had taken a specific decision with respect to article 1 and its possible connexion with the preamble of the declaration. At the same time it also took a general decision to set up a sub-committee, to determine the appropriate place for each article.

In the light of that decision, the Chairman felt compelled to rule that from then on, any amendment dealing solely with questions of form or arrangement would be out of order.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) shared the views expressed by the Chairman. Every delegation would have the right and the opportunity to state its opinion on the arrangement of the various articles of the declaration upon the termination of the substantive discussion. For the time being, it would be best to follow the procedure adopted for article 1.

MR. ANZE MATIENZO (Bolivia) thought, on the contrary, that the proposal of the Guatemalan delegation was interesting and constructive, and that the Committee should consider it without further delay instead of involving itself in a procedural discussion.

MR. GARCÍA BAUER (Guatemala) drew attention to the full significance of his proposal and stated that it was an amendment of substance rather than of form since its aim was not to delete article 2, but to incorporate in the preamble of the Declaration of Human Rights one of the fundamental principles of the United Nations Charter.

<sup>[1]</sup> Article 2 of the draft universal declaration of human rights (A/777).

[127]

THE CHAIRMAN repeated that the proposals of the delegations of Guatemala and Panama were equally out of order since they both dealt with the place in the declaration where the principle stated in article 2 should be inserted.

The Committee had to decide on the substance of article 2; there was no reason why it should be asked to vote first of all on its deletion.

MR. CASSIN (France) wished it to be understood that the Chairman's ruling, though generally binding on the Committee, was not to be considered irrevocable.

Thus, in the case in point, it seemed difficult to reach a decision on the substance of article 2 without first taking a decision in principle concerning the possibility of merging it with article 6, as proposed by the delegation of Panama.

THE CHAIRMAN replied that the delegation of Panama could raise the question anew when the Committee came to discuss article 6.

With regard to the Guatemalan amendment, in view of the fact that the Guatemalan representative had challenged his decision, he was compelled, by virtue of rule 102 of the rules of procedure, to put the challenge to an immediate vote.

By 29 votes to none, with 9 abstentions, the Committee upheld the Chairman's ruling.

MR. GARCÍA BAUER (Guatemala) reserved his delegation's right to submit its amendment again, either to the Committee itself, or to the General Assembly.

MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) explained that his delegation had abstained from voting because it considered that the issue was not sufficiently clear-cut. The delegation of Uruguay could not admit that it should be left to a subcommittee to decide whether the articles discussed by the Committee were to be placed as articles in the body of the declaration, or whether they were to be incorporated in the preamble.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) said that he had abstained from voting because he did not know what the Committee was voting on. He regretted the fact that representatives had not been given an opportunity to ask for explanations before the vote was taken. He felt that, in keeping with its decision to leave the arrangement of articles to a sub-committee, the Committee did not have to vote on the Guatemalan amendment, as the latter dealt precisely with the rearrangement of a text and not with its deletion.

Mr Pérez Cisneros stressed the importance of clarifying that question of principle if the Committee was to avoid similar procedural difficulties in connexion with the other articles of the declaration.

THE CHAIRMAN stated that the Committee had by a previous decision settled the question of principle.

The vote which had just been taken in accordance with rule 102 of the rules of procedure, had been made necessary by the challenge of the Chairman's ruling.

[128]

MR. KAMINSKY (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) suggested that the Committee should begin the substantive discussion of article 2 without further delay.

THE CHAIRMAN said that he would first put to the vote the Cuban amendment (A/C.3/224), which was the furthest removed from the original draft since it proposed to substitute a new text for the existing one. The Committee would then take a stand with respect to the amendment proposed by the USSR delegation (E/800, page 32).

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) pointed out to the Committee that the Cuban proposal did nothing more than present in a different form the idea of merging articles 2 and 6, an idea which had been rejected when presented by the Panamanian delegation.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) agreed that that was so. Explaining the reasons which had prompted his delegation to make that proposal, he stressed the fact that the new text retained all the ideas expressed in articles 2 and 6; by grouping them in a single article, by avoiding useless repetition, the declaration was lent both greater force and greater conciseness, qualities that were indispensable in any legal text.

In the opinion of the Cuban delegation, it would be preferable to decide immediately on the fusion of the two articles rather than to consider the provisions first of article 2 and then of article 6, separately.

MR. CHANG (China) wished to stress that it was only after mature consideration that the Commission on Human Rights had decided to state the principles of equality and liberty in two separate articles of the draft declaration of human rights which it was submitting to the General Assembly.

Article 2 did, in fact, aim at ensuring that everyone, without distinction of any kind, should enjoy all the rights and freedoms set forth in the declaration.

Article 6 aimed at translating that principle into practical reality by granting everyone protection of the law against discrimination in violation of that declaration.

The Chinese delegation was in whole-hearted agreement with the Commission on Human Rights and hoped that the Third Committee would make a point of retaining article 2 in its existing form.

Speaking on the Cuban delegation's amendment Mr. Chang pointed out that, as the declaration did not make specific mention of duties as well as rights, it would be preferable to delete the words "and subject to the duties" from the proposed text. It had indeed been agreed that duties would be referred to only in article 27 which had to be further defined and amplified at a later date, and in the general declaration of article 1 on the spirit of brotherhood which should inspire the actions of all men.

MR. CASSIN (France) expressed his complete agreement with the definition given by the Chinese representative of the fundamental difference between article 2 and article 6. Article 2, establishing that everyone was entitled to the [129] rights and freedoms set forth in the declaration, gave the declaration its full meaning, and followed logically therefore on article 1. Article 6 had a more limited field and defined the legal status of all human beings within the national limits of sovereign Powers and States. The former set forth the principle of non-discrimination, whereas, in the latter, the individual was ensured protection against discrimination within his own country. Those two ideas were very similar, but were not absolutely identical.

Although the French delegation had expressed itself in favour of retaining the two texts proposed by the Commission on Human Rights, it was inclined to think that it might be useful to examine them both at the same time as they were so closely related to each other.

COUNT CARTON DE WIART (Belgium) considered the Cuban delegation's desire for brevity to be praiseworthy. Nevertheless, in common with the delegations of China and France, the Belgian delegation thought it preferable to retain article 2 and article 6, the wording of which it approved on the whole.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) supported the views expressed by the preceding speakers and stated that he also was against the fusion of the two articles.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) emphasized that the views expressed by those of his colleagues who had taken part in the work of the Commission on Human Rights had only strengthened his belief in the usefulness of the amendment submitted by his delegation. The elimination of unnecessary repetition, by joining the two aspects of a same idea instead of separating them, would not only improve the form of the final text but would benefit the very substance of the declaration by ensuring that it was given all the necessary vigour of expression. The Cuban proposal was prompted only by the desire for brevity and logic and it was in that light alone that it should be interpreted.

In reply to the Chinese representative's remark with regard to duties, Mr. Pérez Cisneros said he appreciated the soundness of that criticism and accepted the deletion proposed by Mr. Chang.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) pointed out that article 2 aimed above all at giving expression to one of the basic provisions of the Charter. He recalled that the United Nations had been founded principally to combat discrimination in the world. Certain Latin American countries where discrimination was unknown, did not however give the concept all the importance it deserved. It was essential, nevertheless, to set forth in a separate article the basic postulates of the declaration, namely, the principles of liberty, equality and fraternity, even, if need be, at the expense of brevity and elegance of form.

Another article would have to be devoted to the application of the principle in the legal domain. That separation was essential and in keeping with the real facts of the existing situation.

Mr. Pavlov (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) drew the attention of the members of the Committee to the fact that they were straying from the plan of action they had set themselves. The study of the substance of article 2 [130] should be begun and there should be no further discussion of the question whether the two articles should or should not be amalgamated.

Mrs. Begtrup (Denmark) took the Chair.

THE CHAIRMAN thought that if the Committee were to express an opinion on the possible fusion of the two articles, it would make any decision which the sub-committee might later be called upon to take in that respect much easier.

MR. GARCÍA BAUER (Guatemala) held the view that as the Committee had decided not to admit his delegation's amendment because it dealt with a question of form, it could not therefore admit either the Panamanian or the Cuban proposal.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) pointed out that the question at issue was that of fusion and not of a rearrangement of the text. The Cuban delegation's amendment raised a preliminary question which had to be resolved before the Committee could begin to study the substance of article 2.

MR. CHANG (China) proposed, in order to simplify the procedure, that the new text submitted by the Cuban delegation for article 2 should be put to the vote. By voting for the adoption or rejection of that text, the Committee would show by implication whether it was for or against the principle of the fusion of texts.

The Chinese delegation could not, however, stress too much the importance which the fight against discrimination of any kind had for vast sections of the world's population. It was essential for those peoples that they should not only be protected within their national legislation against discrimination, but that the principle of equality in respect of all the fundamental freedoms and rights of mankind should be solemnly proclaimed.

Considered in that light, article 2 was of undeniable significance. For that reason, Mr. Chang requested the Cuban representative to withdraw his amendment, which tended to lessen the value of the article.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) was, on the whole, in agreement with the representative of China. He did not, however, believe that to combine the two articles would weaken the idea they expressed. On the contrary, the Cuban delegation thought that to link the principle and its application would ensure that discrimination could be more vigorously combated. In submitting that proposal, the Cuban delegation had been inspired by the provisions of its national Constitution which made any discrimination or incitement to such discrimination punishable as a criminal offence.

MR. SAINT-LOT (Haiti) regretted that he was unable to accept the Cuban representative's interpretation of the matter for, in his opinion, the combining of the two texts necessarily implied their rearrangement within the body of the declaration. The Committee had decided to appoint a sub-committee to which it would assign all questions of order and of form. It should abide by the decision it had taken, in order not to appear irresolute and thus hinder the satisfactory progress of its work.

[131]

Mr. Saint-Lot therefore supported the proposal to vote on the substance of the Cuban amendment, without definitely settling the question of possible fusion of article 2 and 6.

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) wished especially to draw the Committee's attention to the fact that by voting in favour of the text of the Cuban amendment, it would by implication vote for the deletion of article 6. The new text proposed by the Cuban delegation for article 2 contained in fact almost all the provisions of the original text of article 2, and, in addition, the first part of article 6. That should not be overlooked when the vote was taken.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) supported that view, which had been expressly recognized by the Cuban delegation (A/C.3/224).

MR. CASSIN (France) proposed that, as all discussion on procedure had in his opinion been exhausted, the substance of the Cuban amendment should be examined.

Although it fully appreciated the Cuban delegation's intention, the French delegation would have to vote against that motion, as its adoption would, in fact, be tantamount to the deletion of article 6, an article which specifically established legal protection against discrimination of any kind.

Mr. Malik (Lebanon) resumed the Chair.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) stated that the turn taken by the discussion made it necessary for him to consider in detail the motives which had led the Cuban delegation to propose the alterations to article 2 and the deletion of article 6. He did not consider that in point of fact the question at issue was one of drafting and of form. An effort was being made to do away with the precise provisions of article 6, and it was for that reason that the Cuban proposal was not as innocent as it might appear at first sight. By deleting article 6, the obligation on the part of States to decree legal sanctions against any measures of discrimination would also be deleted.

Furthermore, the Cuban amendment to article 2 made no mention of equality without distinction of national origin, which appeared in the original text of article 2.

The USSR delegation took a definite stand against any weakening of the principle set forth in article 2. Any attempt in that direction was an attack against the very concept of democracy.

In certain countries the question of discrimination was perhaps not of extreme importance. In many cases, however, discrimination existed. He recalled the petition addressed to the Economic and Social Council on behalf of 13,000,000 Negroes of the United States, protesting against the measures of discrimination directed against them. Representatives of the United States Government had confirmed that those appeals were justified. In that connexion, President Truman himself had admitted that, in the United States, coloured men and women were still suffering as regards their human dignity, that they were living in a state of constant moral and physical fear and could not fall back on the national conscience of the American people any more than on legislation.

[132]

A similar state of affairs was to be found in the Union of South Africa. In the province of Natal the Indians did not have a vote, and 80 per cent of their children could not attend school. Racial discrimination had become a veritable system.

The USSR representative mentioned similar facts concerning the British colonies of the Gold Coast and Nigeria, as well as Rhodesia where, for example, 28 pounds sterling were assigned for the education of each European child and only four shillings for that of each Native child.

He asked that practical measures should be taken against that state of affairs. No such situation existed in any of the republics in the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics; there more than sixty different peoples lived together peacefully, strife which from time to time led to bloodshed in some countries was unknown there, and all the peoples enjoyed complete equality in every field of political, economic and social life. That equality had been explicitly guaranteed in the USSR Constitution, and all discriminatory measures, whatever their nature, were punishable by law. He thought that that attitude should be adopted by the whole world.

For this reason article 6 should be retained. The principle of equality was laid down in the Charter of the United Nations; those persons who did not agree to this equality and who did not declare themselves enemies of racial discrimination could not be considered as true democrats.

The principle of the equality of men and women was also laid down in the Charter. Although that equality had been explicitly stated in certain constitutions, notably in those of the United States of America and of the United Kingdom, it had in reality not been applied. Thus, of the 640 members of the British Parliament only 24 were women, and only 9 women were members of the United States Congress. The Supreme Council of the USSR included 277 women, a much higher proportion than that found in any other Parliament in the world. Those figures were all the more remarkable, since in thirty countries of Europe and America women had no vote.

For those reasons he strongly opposed any limitation of the principle expressed by article 2, or the deletion of article 6. He was convinced that all true supporters of democracy would agree with him. Millions of human beings were watching the work of the Third Committee with anxiety. It would be an unpardonable mistake to yield to the tendencies of racial discrimination, however cleverly they were disguised. Mr. Pavlov hoped that the great majority of the Committee would share his opinion and that article 2 and 6 would be retained, since they provided a minimum of rights and guarantees for individuals and peoples.

MR. TE WATER (Union of South Africa), submitting a motion of order, objected to the terms used by the USSR representative in speaking of the United States and of the Union of South Africa. Such language would not be tolerated in any parliamentary discussion.

He asked the Chairman to make a ruling, forbidding the use of terms of that nature in order that the debate might retain the dignity which should characterize the discussion of the United [133] Nations. If that were not done, he would be unable to play a useful part in the work of the Committee.

THE CHAIRMAN, in reply to the representative of the Union of South Africa, said that the United Nations was fundamentally different from a parliament, that is, a body in which there was a recognized traditional uniformity of expression. In the United Nations, where fifty-eight nations were represented, it was impossible to lay down exact rules regarding the language to be used.

It was nevertheless very regrettable that any one member of the Committee should use terms likely to offend any other member.

MR. KAMINSKY (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) pointed out that Mr. Te Water's observations would apply to the statements made in the Third Committee by the representative of the United Kingdom rather than to the observations of the USSR representative, who had remained within the bounds of courtesy.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) recalled that during the debate on freedom of movement, the USSR representative had objected to remarks on the state of affairs prevailing in the Soviet Union. His attitude was quite different, however, when facts concerning the United States and other countries were concerned.

He reserved the right therefore to quote, when a suitable time came, certain facts which would show that it was not sufficient merely to lay down principles in a constitution.

MR. SAINT-LOT (Haiti) pointed out that his delegation could not vote in favour of the Cuban amendment, since the latter would weaken the provisions of articles 2 and 6 and the democratic guarantees provided by them.

He stressed the fact that in adopting that attitude, his delegation did not question the sincerity of the Cuban delegation's intentions; Cuba and Haiti were bound together by close ties of brotherhood. He recalled that 150,000 Haitians lived in the Republic of Cuba and that there had never been any interference either with their person or with their property.

MR. GARCÍA BAUER (Guatemala) strongly advocated that the ideas expressed in article 2 should be transferred to the preamble. For that reason he could not support the Cuban amendment.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) expressed his surprise that a representative had accused his delegation of wishing to abandon the principle of equality for all before the law. On the contrary, his delegation desired that the principle of non-discrimination should be linked with its application, its legal guarantee, in order that it might be reinforced. That was the aim of the amendment which it had submitted.

The USSR representative had made a detailed study of the Cuban amendment. He had pointed out that the words "national origin" were not included, but he had failed to remark that they had been replaced by the term "birth", which was more elegant and expressed the same idea.

Under the pretext of defending the principle of non-discrimination, Mr. Pavlov had violently [134] attacked the state of affairs in other countries. It should be noted, however, that he had not mentioned in the proposed text the presence of the words "without distinction of. . . political opinion". The Cuban delegation thought that the single party and single candidate system was a form of discrimination.

In conclusion he said that it was not sufficient to lay down principles; they must also be applied. The USSR representative was at liberty to come and see for himself how the principles of the Cuban Constitution were applied; he, however, could not do the same in the Soviet Union.

Mr. Pérez Cisneros thanked the representative of Haiti for his trust in the sincerity of his delegation's intentions. In view of the appeal submitted by Mr. Saint-Lot and of the bonds which united their two countries, the representative of Cuba withdrew his delegation's amendment.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the only amendment still before the Committee was that of the USSR (E/800, page 32) which proposed the addition of the word "class" after "property or other status".

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that the USSR amendment aimed at the abolition of differences based on social conditions, as well as the privileges enjoyed by certain groups in the economic and legal fields. On the eve of the Russian Revolution the situation in Russia was similar to that in France before its revolution; there were certain privileged classes, such as great landowners, the clergy, merchants and others. One of the first measures taken during the Russian revolution was to suppress those privileges and prevent their revival.

The use of the word "class" to translate the corresponding Russian word into English seemed defective to him; before the Committee took a decision, the text should be revised.

MR. CASSIN (France) was prepared to support the USSR amendment as far as its substance was concerned, although it could have been covered by the words "property or other status". A drafting sub-committee could undertake that work if the principle of the amendment were adopted.

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) recalled the fact that the words "or other" had been adopted after prolonged debate in order to take into consideration the difficulties of translation raised by the USSR representative. In these circumstances she thought that the existing text was adequate.

MR. DEDIJER (Yugoslavia) proposed that the discussion on the substance of article 2 should be adjourned, as the Yugoslav delegation wished to make a statement on the subject.

THE CHAIRMAN suggested that an informal drafting group, composed of the representatives of France, the United States and the USSR should be set up to draft the English and French translations of the USSR amendment. It was understood that the sub-committee would not take any final decisions on the matter.

It was so agreed.

The meeting rose at 1:20 p.m.

A/C.3/259

12 October 1948

Recapitulation of Amendments to Article 3 of the Draft Declaration

(In the chronological order of their submission to the Committee)

Article 3 (Text as adopted by the Commission on Human Rights)

Everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of person.

Amendment:

Panama (Document A/C.3/220)

Its total elimination is proposed.

It is proposed that the rights to life and liberty be defined as follows:

Article – Every human being has the right to exist and to maintain, develop, protect and defend his existence.

Article – No one shall be subjected to arbitrary arrest or detention. Every person who has been detained has a right to have the legality of his detention [sic] judicially without any delay. Neither shall anyone be held in slavery or involuntary servitude (Paragraph 1, Article 4 of Draft).

An additional article is proposed containing the text of paragraph 2 of Article 4 of the Draft as follows:

Article – No one shall be subjected to torture or to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.

Cuba (Document A/C.3/224)

Replace this article by the following text:

“Every human being has the right to life, liberty, security and integrity of person.”

Lebanon (amendment proposed 12 October 1948)

Delete the words: “and security of person” and replace them by the words “security and full development of his personality.”

[2]

This article will thus read: “Every human being has the right to life, liberty, security and development of his personality.”

A/C.3/260

12 October 1948

Original Text: French

Lebanon: Amendments to Draft Declaration (E/800)

Article 1

This article should be worded as follows: “Since all human beings are by their nature endowed with reason and conscience, they are free and equal in dignity and rights and in their duty to act towards one another in a spirit of brotherhood.”

Article 3

Delete the words: “and security of person” and replace them by the words: “security of person and the full development of his personality”.

Thus the article will read: “Everyone has the right to life, liberty, security of person and the full development of his personality.”

Article 10

Delete the word “unreasonable”.

Article 11

In paragraph 2 add at the end the words: “and to return to his country”.

Article 13

At the beginning of the article add the words: “Everyone has the right to a nationality”.

Article 14

Change the order of the paragraphs so that paragraph 3 becomes paragraph 1, paragraph 1 becomes paragraph 2, and paragraph 2 becomes paragraph 3.

In paragraph 2 in the original text add the words: “free and” before the words: “full consent”.

Article 21

In paragraph 1 add after the words “everyone has the right to work”, the words “and to a free choice of work and of his mode of life”.

[2]

Article 22

Transfer paragraph 2 of this article to Article 14 where it will become paragraph 4.

Article 23

Add a new paragraph which will become paragraph 2, and will read as follows: “Parents have a priority right to choose the kind of education that shall be given to their children.”

Paragraph 2 of the original text will become paragraph 3.

A/C.3/261

12 October 1948

Original Text: French

Cuba: Amendments to Articles 23 to 27 of the Draft
Declaration (E/800)

Article 23

Break up and amend the article as follows:

“1. Every person has the right to education.

“2. Education shall be directed to the full development of the human personality, to strengthening respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms and to combating the spirit of intolerance and hatred against other nations and against racial and religious groups everywhere.

“3. The right to education includes the right to equality of opportunity in every case, in accordance with natural talents, merit, and the desire to utilize the resources that the State or the community is in a position to provide.

“4. Every person has the right to receive, free, at least a primary education.”

Article 24

Amend as follows:

“Every person has the right to leisure time and to the opportunity for advantageous use of his free time to his spiritual, cultural and physical benefit.”

Article 25

Amend as follows:

“Every person has the right to take part in the cultural life of the community, to enjoy the arts, and to participate in the benefits that result from scientific advancement.”

“He likewise has the right to the protection of his moral and material interests as regards his inventions or any literary, scientific or artistic works of which he is the author.”

[2]

“Article on measures of implementation.”

Amend as follows:

“Every person has the right, either individually, or in association with others to petition or to communicate with any competent authority, for reasons of either general or private interest, and the right to obtain prompt action thereon.”

Article 27

Add the following text:

“Respect for the right of all requires that each shall do his duty. In all human activity, both social and political, rights and duties are indissolubly linked with one another. While rights enhance individual freedom, duties express the dignity of that freedom.

“Duties of a legal nature presuppose other duties of a moral nature which facilitate their understanding and serve as their foundation.

“It is man’s duty to practise, uphold and promote culture by all means at his disposal for culture is the highest social and historical expression of the human spirit.

“Morality being the noblest product of culture, it is the duty of all to respect it at all times.”

New article

Insert an article worded as follows:

“Every person may resort to the courts to ensure respect for his legal rights. There should likewise be available to him a simple, brief procedure whereby justice will protect him from acts of authority that, to his prejudice, violate any fundamental human rights.”

New article

Insert an article drafted as follows:

“Every person has the right to resist acts of oppression or tyranny.”

A/C.3/262

12 October 1948

Lebanon: Amendment to the Draft Declaration (E/800)

Add the following article 29 to the draft Declaration

“All laws in any State shall be in conformity with the purpose and principles of the United Nations, as embodied in the Charter, insofar as they deal with human rights.”

A/C.3/263

12 October 1948

Netherlands: Amendment to the Draft Declaration (E/800)

Article 23, paragraph 2, to read as follows:

“The primary responsibility for the education of the child rests with the family.”

“Parents have the right to determine the kind of education their children should have.”

Paragraph 2 of the present Draft to become paragraph 3.

A/C.3/264

12 October 1948

Original Text: French

Egypt: Amendments to the draft Declaration (E/800)

Preamble

After the third paragraph of the Preamble add the following text:

“Whereas the fundamental rights of man are not derived from his status as a national of a particular State, but constitute inherent attributes of his person.”

The other three Amendments do not concern the English text.

Article 8

Amendment does not concern the English text.

Article 11

Replace this article by the following text:

“Everyone has the right to establish his residence in the territory of the State of which he is a national, to have freedom of movement within it and to leave it only of his own accord.”

Article 12

At the end of paragraph 1 add the following words:

“in accordance with the rules of international law.”

Article 13

Replace this article by the following text:

“Everyone has the right to the nationality which legally belongs to him and has the right to acquire, if he so desires, the nationality of a country which is willing to grant it to him.”

Alternative

Replace the words “or denied the right to change his nationality” by the words: “or denied the right to acquire a new nationality.”

Article 14

Replace this article by the following text:

“Everyone has the right to found a family, which is a fundamental element of society, and is entitled to the protection of that family.”

Article 19

Amend paragraph 3 as follows: “Everyone has the right to a government which acts freely and conforms to the will of the people.”

[2]

Article 22

Replace the words “mother and child” in the second paragraph by the words “mothers, children and old persons”.

Article 24

Replace this article by the following text:

“Everyone has the right to rest, reasonable leisure and the opportunity of using his leisure for his mental, cultural and physical development.”

Article 26

To be deleted.

Article 27

Amend paragraph 2 as follows:

“In the exercise of his rights everyone shall be subject only to such limitations as are necessary to secure due recognition and respect for the rights of others and the requirements of loyalty, good faith, morality, public order and general welfare in a democratic society.”

Add a new paragraph with the following text:

“These rights can in no case be exercised contrary to the principles and purpose of the United Nations.”

Addition of a new article

After Article 28, add the following article:

“The nature and the extent of the measures to be taken to give effect to the rights laid down in this Declaration shall if necessary be defined in a subsequent instrument.”

A/C.3/265

12 October 1948

Original Text: French

Union of Soviet Socialist Republics: Amendment to Article 3
of the Draft Declaration (E/800)

Amend this article to read as follows:

“Everyone has the right to life. The State should ensure the protection of each individual against criminal attempts on his person. It should also ensure conditions that obviate the danger of death by hunger and exhaustion. The death penalty should be abolished in time of peace.”

A/C.3/266

12 October 1948

Mexico: Amendments to Articles 3, 6, 7, 14, 23 and 25 of the draft Declaration (E/800)

Article 3

Add, as a second paragraph, the following:

“The right to maintenance, health, education and work is considered essential in order to obtain an increase in the standard of living of the individual, as well as to secure the full existence of social justice and the full development of the human being.”

Article 6

Add, as a second paragraph, the following:

“There should likewise be available to every person a simple, brief procedure whereby the Courts will protect him from acts of authority that, to his prejudice, violate any fundamental Constitutional rights.”

Article 7

Add to the present text the following sentence:

“No one shall be subjected to imprisonment on account of civil debts, nor for breach of a work contract.”

Article 14

Insert at the beginning of the text before “Men and women” the following words:

“Without any limitation due to race, nationality or religion.”

Article 23

Add, at the end of paragraph 2, after “religious groups everywhere”, the following phrase:

“; education shall promote, by every possible means,<sup>33</sup> understanding and friendship among all peoples, as well as an effective support of the pacifist<sup>34</sup> activities of the United Nations<sup>35</sup>.”

[2]

Article 25

Add the following as the second paragraph:

“He likewise has the right to the protection of his moral and material interests as regards his inventions or any literary scientific, or artistic works of which he is the author.”

<sup>33</sup> The words “by every possible means” were replaced by “likewise” pursuant to A/C.3/266/Corr.1 of 17 October 1948.

<sup>34</sup> The word “pacifist” was deleted pursuant to A/C.3/266/Corr.1 of 17 October 1948.

<sup>35</sup> The words “for the maintenance of peace” were added pursuant to A/C.3/266/Corr.1 of 17 October 1948.

A/C.3/267

12 October 1948

New Zealand: Amendments to Preamble and Articles 10, 12, 20, 21, 22, 23 and 27 of the draft Declaration (E/800)

Preamble

Substitute the following for the present text:

“Whereas faith in fundamental human rights has been reaffirmed in the Charter of the United Nations,

“And whereas the Charter further provides that the United Nations shall promote universal respect for and observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms for all, without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion,

“And whereas a common understanding of these rights and freedoms is of the greatest importance for the full realization by progressive measures, national and international, of their universal and effective recognition and observance, both among the peoples of the member States themselves and among the peoples of the territories under their jurisdiction;

“Now, therefore, the General Assembly proclaims this declaration of Human Rights as a common standard for achievement by all peoples and nations.”

Article 10

Substitute the word “arbitrary” for the word “unreasonable”.

Article 12

Substitute the following for the present text of paragraphs 1 and 2:

“Everyone is entitled to seek asylum from persecution.”

Article 20

Delete the following words:

“has the right to social security and”

(Compare proposed New Zealand amendment to article 22).

[2]

Article 21

Substitute the following for the present text of paragraph 3:

“3. Everyone is entitled to the protection of his interests through the membership of trade unions.”<sup>36</sup>

<sup>36</sup> This was changed by A/C.3/267/Corr.1 of 15 November 1948 to: “Everyone has the right to the protection of his interests through membership of trade unions.”

Article 22

Substitute the following for the present text of paragraphs 1 and 2:

“Everyone has the right to social security adequate for health and wellbeing, including food, clothing, housing, medical care and social services, and protection in respect of unemployment, sickness, disability, old age, motherhood, childhood and widowhood.”

Article 23

- (a) Substitute the following two paragraphs for the present text of paragraph 1.
- “1. Everyone has the right to education.
  2. Education shall be free and universal with equal access on the basis of merit to higher education.”
- (b) Delete paragraph 2 of the present text.

Article 27

- (a) Delete paragraph 1.
- (b) Delete the words “morality, public order and the” from the present text of paragraph 2.

A/C.3/268

12 October 1948

Original Text: French

Uruguay: Amendment to the Draft Declaration (E/800)

Article 3

Amend to read as follows:

“Everyone has the right to life, honour, liberty, and to legal, economic and social security.”

Article 4

Amend paragraph (2) from this Article and include it in Article 9.

Article 5

Insert the word “physical” before the word “person”, or substitute the words “human being” for the word “person”.

Article 7

Delete the word “arbitrary” and add the following after “detention”:

“except in the case and according to the procedure prescribed by prior legislation. All persons subjected to arrest or detention have the right to have the legality of such action confirmed by a judge without delay and to be brought to trial within a reasonable period or set at liberty.”

Article 9

In paragraph 2 insert the word “punishable” before the word “under”.

Insert two new paragraphs as follows:-

“3. Laws which increase penalties or diminish means of or guarantees for defence may not be applied retroactively.

“4. No one shall be subjected to torture, to the death penalty or inhuman punishments, or to degrading treatment.”

Article 10

Amendment does not apply to the English text.

Article 12

Add the following sentence to paragraph 1:

“This right includes the diplomatic asylum in embassies and legations.”

[2]

Article 13

Amend to read as follows:

“1. Everyone has the right to a nationality.”

“2. (The present text of Article 13, substituting the word “unjustly” for “arbitrarily”.)

Article 15

Amendment does not apply to the English text.

Article 18

Insert the word “peaceful” before the word “assembly”, and add the following as Paragraph 2:

“No one may be compelled to belong to an association.”

Article 19

This Article is unacceptable in its present form.

- 1) This right does not belong to “everyone”, and
- 2) These acts cannot be performed in the territory of a foreign State.

Article 21

Add the following new paragraph 4:

“No one may be one be compelled to belong to a trade union.”

Article 27

In paragraph 2 substitute the words “prescribed by law solely for the purpose of securing” for the words “necessary to secure.”

Article 28

Substitute the words “perform any acts” for the words “engage in any activity.”

A/C.3/244/Rev.1

12 October 1948

Original Text: French

France: Amendments to Draft Declaration (Document E/800)

Between Articles 2 and 3

Insert Article 27 of the Draft.

Note: It is essential that the social framework in which man lives and the limitations on his rights should be in the first group of general theses, before enumeration of the rights themselves.

Article 7

Add a paragraph worded as follows:

“Any person arrested or detained is entitled to have the legality of the action taken against him confirmed without delay by a judge. He is also entitled to demand a verdict or release within a reasonable period.”

Article 9, Paragraph 2

This amendment does not apply to the English text.

Article 12, Paragraph 1

Add the following sentence:

“The United Nations, in concert with States concerned, is required to secure such asylum for him.”

Note: There is no point in proclaiming a right without at the same time stating whose duty it is to give effect to that right.

Article 13

(a) Begin with a new paragraph 1 worded as follows:

“Every human being has the right to a nationality.”

(b) The present paragraph 1 should become paragraph 2.

(c) Add a new paragraph 3 worded as follows:

“It is the duty of the United Nations to approach States for the purpose of preventing statelessness and, where necessary, to concern itself with the fate of stateless persons.”

[2]

Article 14

Word paragraph 2 as follows:

“Marriage may be contracted only with the full consent of the intending spouses.”

Note: There is no point in specifying both spouses.

Article 17

Between the words “impart” and “information”, insert the words “on his own responsibility” so that the Article reads as follows:

“Everyone has the right to freedom of opinion and expression; this right includes freedom to hold opinions without interference and to seek, receive and impart on his own responsibility information and ideas through any media and regardless of frontiers.”

Article 19

Re-word paragraph 3 as follows:

“The authority of the law and of any government is founded on the will of the people as expressed at free and genuine periodic elections.”

Insert a paragraph 2 in the following terms:

“Everyone likewise has a right, to the protection of the moral and material interests that he may acquire through any inventions or literary, scientific or artistic works of which he is the author.”

A/C.3/259/Add.1

13 October 1948

Recapitulation of Amendments to Article 3 of the draft
Declaration (E/800)

(In the chronological order of their submission to the Committee)

Amendments

Mexico (A/C.3/266)

Add as a second paragraph, the following:

“The right to maintenance, health, education and work, is considered essential in order to obtain an increase in the standard of living of the individual, as well as to secure the full existence of social justice and the full development of the human being.”

Uruguay (A/C.3/268)

Amend to read as follows:

“Everyone has the right to life, honour, liberty and to legal, economic and social security”.

Union of Soviet Socialist Republics: (A/C.3/265)

Amend this article to read as follows:

“Everyone has the right to life. The State should ensure the protection of each individual against criminal attempts on his person. It should also ensure conditions that obviate the danger of death by hunger and exhaustion. The death penalty should be abolished in time of peace.”

A/C.3/270

13 October 1948

Original Text: French

Uruguay: Proposal

When it has approved the English text of the Declaration as a whole, the Committee shall be supplied with a French translation of the text. The members of the Committee may then submit amendments to the translation with the sole object of ensuring complete concordance between that text and the English text.

A/C.3/SR.101<sup>37</sup>

13 October 1948

Summary Record of the Hundred and First Meeting
[of the Third Committee]

Held at the Palais de Chaillot, Paris, on Wednesday, 13 October 1948, at 3 p.m.

Chairman: MR. CHARLES MALIK (Lebanon).

23. Draft international declaration of human rights (E/800) (continued)

Article 2 (continued)

At the request of the Chairman, MR. CASSIN (France) read the report of the Informal Drafting Group. It read as follows:

“The Informal Drafting Group, composed of the representatives of France, the United States and the USSR met on Wednesday, 13 October in the forenoon.

“1. The Group accepted a USSR amendment to article 2 providing for the addition, between the words ‘property or other status’ (situation de fortune ou autre) and the words ‘or national or social origin’ (d’origine nationale ou sociale), of the word soslovie in the Russian text which is translated by the word naissance in the French text and ‘birth’ in the English text. The literal translation of the word soslovie would be état in French and ‘estate’ in English, but the Group noted that those words, as currently used, no longer had their former meaning.

“2. The Informal Drafting Group did not reach unanimity regarding the scope of its terms of reference in connexion with the suggestions of the French representative to substitute the word ‘opinion’ (opinion) for the words ‘political or other opinion’ (opinion politique ou autre) and the words ‘property or social status’ (situation de fortune et condition sociale) for the words ‘property or other status’ (situation de fortune ou autre).”

MR. DEDIJER (Yugoslavia) expressed his delegation’s dissatisfaction with the attitude taken by most of the members of the Committee in regard to article 2. That article raised one of the most important principles of the whole draft declaration, namely, the prohibition of discrimination; yet, with the exception of the USSR representative, no member had entered into a discussion of the substance of the article. There had in fact been an attempt to put the article to the vote prematurely, before due consideration had been given to the need to determine to what extent the conditions actually existing in the world corresponded to the ideal proclaimed. The Chilean representative had even said that no discussion of the article was necessary since all agreed that discrimination should be prohibited.

The Cuban representative’s statement that Cuba was the only country where discrimination was punishable by law was not accurate. Other countries had laws against discrimination. The Constitution of Yugoslavia had specific provisions against any kind of discrimination. In Yugoslavia discrimination had, indeed, existed before the Second World War as evidenced by the conditions in Macedonia at that time; but the Yugoslav people had solved that problem by their efforts during the war and no longer was there any discrimination whatsoever against any national [136] minorities. Yugoslavia was therefore able to speak with a clear conscience on the substance of article 2.

<sup>37</sup> The text of the document is from Official Records of the General Assembly, Third Session, 1948, pp. 134–41.

The Chilean representative had objected (100th meeting) to the fact that the USSR representative had repeatedly referred to the practice of discrimination in the United States and in the Union of South Africa. But no amount of discussion of such facts could be excessive, as they touched on a principle which it was the task of the Committee to defend. There was every reason for the Committee to ask why the Union of South Africa had failed to implement General Assembly's resolution 44(I) of 8 December 1946 regarding the treatment of Indians in South Africa, and why, in violation of the principles of the Charter, that country was following a racial policy that deprived four-fifths of its population of civil and human rights. The Union of South Africa was even preparing new legislation that was still more discriminatory. Moreover, at the 95th meeting the South African representative had made a statement in which he defended his country's right to practise racial discrimination.

The United States representative's amazement at such a statement was recorded in the Press of 9 October; but in the Committee the United States representative had kept silent, for in that country, also, there was discrimination, especially against coloured races and against women.

In order to avoid giving tacit encouragement to countries practising discrimination, the Committee must emphasize the great difference between the principles contained in article 2 and the actual situation existing in many countries.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) said that the Yugoslav representative was mistaken in his assertion that the representative of Chile had opposed discussion of the substance of article 2. What the latter had said was that the discussion on article 2 should not be used as a pretext for launching into political speeches directed against particular countries, as had been done by certain members of the Committee.

MR. TE WATER (Union of South Africa) observed that the question of the treatment of Indians in the Union of South Africa was not before the Third Committee and, in raising the point, the Yugoslav representative was making a patent attempt to bring two delegations into conflict. The South African delegation, however, would refuse to be drawn into the conflict. Moreover, if the question of discrimination against Indians in the Union of South Africa were discussed, discriminatory practices in other countries would inevitably be brought before the Committee.

The South African delegation was co-operating in the work on the draft declaration of human rights and was prepared to vote for draft article 2. Its vote, however, would be subject to the reservation that the rights and freedoms mentioned in the draft declaration would be interpreted by the Union Government to mean the [137] fundamental rights and freedoms laid down in the Charter of the United Nations.

THE CHAIRMAN said it was the usual practice to refer disputes, such as the one between India and South Africa, to the First Committee. He was sure that representatives would co-operate in limiting the discussion to questions which were the concern of the Third Committee.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba), referring to the suggestion that the word “birth” should be added to article 2, agreed fully with the idea behind the proposed addition, but he questioned the appropriateness of the word itself. Article 1, as adopted by the Committee, stated that all human beings were born free and equal. Article 2 then, should not appear to contradict that statement of faith by implying that a distinction could be made between human beings for reasons of birth.

He therefore suggested that some words such as “social condition” or “social status” might be used instead of the word “birth”.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) explained that the Informal Drafting Group had agreed that the Russian word soslovie referred to a legally-sanctioned inequality such as had existed in feudal Europe when different groups of people had, by reason of their birth, different rights and privileges. Although such inequalities no longer existed in most countries, there were still some remnants of that social structure left; the fight against those remnants should be continued by a definite statement in the draft declaration. If the Committee agreed that the declaration should contain the principle he had raised, the idea should be made perfectly clear. He therefore suggested that the word “estate” should be inserted, in parentheses, after the word “birth”.

MR. MAYHEW (United Kingdom) was prepared to accept the Informal Drafting Group’s suggestion for the insertion of the word “birth”, although he would have preferred a reference to “class”, in the sense of inherited privileges for the sons of noblemen, capitalists, party leaders and so on. The Government of the United Kingdom was working for the establishment of just such a classless society.

MR. DE LEÓN (Panama) moved the closure of the debate on article 2.

MR. HABIB (India) and MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) opposed the motion of closure on the grounds that the Committee had not yet found the appropriate word.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the motion for closure of debate.

The motion was rejected by 18 votes to 16, with 10 abstentions.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) agreed with the Cuban representative that the expression “social status” or “social condition” was preferable to “birth”. He would accept the informal drafting [138] group’s suggestion, however, on the understanding that that expression was implied in the word “birth”.

MR. HABIB (India) favoured the use of the word “caste” rather than “birth”, as the latter was already implied in the article.

He would not comment on the dispute concerning the Indians in South Africa because the Third Committee was not the appropriate place in which to discuss it. The silence of the Indian delegation should not be misinterpreted, however; the remarks of the USSR and Yugoslav representatives were true and at the appropriate place and time the Indian delegation would state its grievances.

COUNT CARTON DE WIART (Belgium) was opposed to the fusion of articles 2 and 6<sup>1</sup> because the former stated a principle, while the latter described how that principle should be implemented. After hearing the discussion, his delegation found the Drafting Group's suggestion was more comprehensible, although it still preferred the original USSR proposal (E/800, page 32) for the insertion of the word "class". A person not yet of age could not have the same rights as an adult, and in that sense, the proposal that there should not be discrimination on the grounds of birth was not very clear.

MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) said that the various words suggested were not altogether acceptable when translated into Spanish. The word "class", for example had an economic meaning. What was wanted was an expression to the effect that no discrimination should exist between groups. The word "birth" was more flexible, but neither "class" nor "caste" was accurate.

He suggested the insertion of the Latin word status; it was known in all countries and it implied that there should be no discrimination on either social, religious or economic grounds.

MR. DE ALBA (Mexico) felt it was natural that there should be some linguistic confusion. The Drafting Group's suggestion was not satisfactory and the Chilean representative's proposal was too vague. The USSR representative had wanted to state that there should be no inherited privileges, but even that expression was not sufficiently clear. Certain words might give rise to controversy and for that reason, he agreed with the Belgian representative who said he would prefer the use of the simple word "class". It had been in use long before the appearance of the Communist Manifesto, as was shown in the writings of Thomas Jefferson.

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) pointed out that the declaration was intended for ordinary, not learned people and from that point of view, the original text seemed the most satisfactory. Although class and caste distinction still existed, human beings were trying to outgrow the use of such words. In her opinion, the words "property or other status" took into consideration the various new suggestions that had been made.

<sup>[1]</sup> See 100th meeting.

[139]

She reminded the Committee that no country was without its faults and that article spoke of political, as well as racial discrimination. Every representative had to speak as he thought fit, but in so doing should be as courteous as possible towards other peoples and other Governments.

MR. IMPERIAL (Philippines) felt the discussion had shown that the Drafting Group's suggestion most closely approximated the Committee's intention. The words "class" and "caste" referred to certain specific systems while "birth" applied to everyone.

MR. CHANG (China) pointed out that the question had been discussed fully in the Human Rights Commission. The concept of race, colour, social origin, and in most cases sex, involved the question of birth, while social origin also embraced the idea of class or caste.

The Commission's text seemed to him the clearest and least confused and he hoped that a large majority of the Committee would support it.

MR. WATT (Australia) agreed with the Cuban representative that it might be dangerous to insert the word "birth" in article 2. Article 1 stated that all men were born equal; it was now suggested that article 2 should state that all men were not born equal.

The word "or other status" covered the various suggestions that had been made and he therefore, hoped that the USSR representative would find it possible to accept the original text.

MR. APPADORAI (India) said his delegation had only proposed the word "caste" because it objected to the word "birth". The words "other status" and "social origin" were sufficiently broad to cover the whole field; the delegation of India would not, therefore, insist on its proposal.

MR. SAINT-LOT (Haiti) agreed with the Indian representative. It was not possible to make all countries accept the word "class", because of its current Marxist implications. The word "caste" had never been properly defined. The Latin word status was not satisfactory because it was used in regard to the whole body of laws concerning the individual, whether he was slave or freeman. The original text took into consideration all the realities to which reference had been made, and he hoped the USSR representative would be able to accept it.

MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) was convinced that the Latin word status no longer had the connotation attributed to it by the Haitian representative. In modern law it was admitted that different groups could be governed by different laws. Those groups were not social classes but differed because of their organization. What the article had to make clear was that there could be no discrimination on the grounds of birth or political opinion, regardless of what might be the individual's legal group.

[140]

MR. IMPERIAL (Philippines) moved the closure of the debate.

THE CHAIRMAN put the motion for closure to the vote.

The motion was adopted by 26 votes to 8, with 10 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the Informal Drafting Group's proposal for the insertion of the word "birth" in the text of article 2.

The proposal was adopted by 19 votes to 16 with 7 abstentions.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) requested that a vote should be taken on his proposal for the addition of the word "estate" in parentheses after the word "birth". He did not think that the meaning would be sufficiently clear unless that addition were made.

MR. MAYHEW (United Kingdom) and MR. CASSIN (France) said that the word "estate" had completely changed in meaning since the eighteenth century. It would therefore, be inadvisable to make the addition suggested by the USSR representative. The insertion of the word "birth" in English and naissance in French clearly conveyed the meaning of the USSR amendment.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the proposal submitted by the USSR representative.

The proposal was rejected by 28 votes to 7 with 8 abstentions.

In reply to the request made by MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) that the Russian word soslovie should be used as a translation of the word "birth", which had just been inserted in the text, THE CHAIRMAN said that the Committee could not take a formal decision on the matter, but that word would in all probability be used in the translation, in view of the preceding discussion.

He read the English text of article 2, as amended:

"Everyone is entitled to all the rights and freedoms set forth in this Declaration, without distinction of any kind, such as race, colour, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, property or other status, birth, or national or social origin."

He called for a vote on the article as a whole.

MR. CASSIN (France) pointed out certain errors of style in the French text and thought that a final French version should be submitted to the Committee before a vote was taken on article 2 as a whole.

THE CHAIRMAN thought that the Committee should vote at once on the English text of article 2, so that the translators would have a basic text to work on. He pointed out that it had always been the practice of the United Nations to adopt texts in one of the working languages and to have them translated subsequently. That practice had been followed in the preparation of the United Nations Charter at San Francisco.

When the French translation of article 2 was prepared, representatives would be able to make [141] drafting changes, provided such changes did not involve a change in the adopted English text.

MR. COROMINAS (Argentina) and MR. DE ALBA (Mexico) agreed with the Chairman and emphasized the importance of accuracy in the translation.

MR. CASSIN (France) thought that, in the case of a solemn declaration, the responsibility for the French text should not be left entirely to the translators. If the vote were postponed until the French translation of the amended text of article 2 was prepared, there would be a chance of achieving unanimity. The English and French texts of the declaration were to be equally authentic and the French-speaking representatives should not be asked to vote on a text of which there was no official French translation.

That view was supported by the representatives of Cuba, Belgium, Lebanon, Uruguay, Egypt, Australia, Greece and the Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic.

MR. KURAL (Turkey) formally moved the adjournment of the meeting so that an approved French text could be prepared before the final vote on article 2 was taken.

THE CHAIRMAN put the motion for adjournment to the vote.

The motion was adopted by 37 votes to 6 with 2 abstentions.

The meeting rose at 5:50 p.m.

A/C.3/244/Rev.1/Corr.1

14 October 1948

Original Text: French

France: Amendment to the additional article in the Declaration concerning petitions and communications (E/800)

“Everyone has the right, either individually or in association with others, to petition or to communicate with the public authorities of the State of which he is a national or in which he resides. He also has the right to petition or communicate with the competent organs of the United Nations in matters relating to human rights.”

A/C.3/271

14 October 1948

Recapitulation of Amendments to Article 4 of the Draft Declaration (E/800)

(In the chronological order of their submission to the Committee)

Article 4 (Text adopted by the Commission on Human Rights)

- “1. No one shall be held in slavery or involuntary servitude.
2. No one shall be subjected to torture or to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.”

Amendments*Panama* (Document A/C.3/220)

It is proposed that this article be suppressed in its present form and that its text be used as stated above.

Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (Document E/800)

Addition to Article 4:

“Slavery and the slave trade are prohibited in all their aspects; and all violations of this principle, whether they be of an overt or clandestine nature, must be punished according to law.”

Cuba (Document A/C.3/224)

Delete the first paragraph as being unnecessary after Articles 1 and 3.
Transfer the second paragraph to the section dealing with purely juridical rights (Article 26: “Right to fair trial”) in the following wording:

“No one shall be subject to cruel, degrading, and non-customary punishment. It should be noted that the idea of Article 4 is embodied by the Cuban delegation in its proposed new draft of Article 7.

Uruguay (Document A/C.3/268)

Omit paragraph 2 from this Article and include it in Article 9.

A/C.3/272

14 October 1948

Recapitulation of Amendments to Article 5 of the Draft
Declaration (E/800)

(In the chronological order of their submission to the Committee)

Article 5 (Text adopted by the Commission on Human Rights)

Everyone has the right to recognition everywhere as a person before the law.

Amendments*Cuba* (A/C.3/224)

Transfer this text, worded as follows, to the beginning of the section relating to purely juridical rights (Articles 16 and following):

“Everyone has the right to recognition everywhere as possessing rights and obligations and enjoying fundamental civil rights.”

Uruguay (A/C.3/268)

Insert the word “physical” before the word “person”, or substitute the words “human being” for the word “person”.

A/C.3/274

14 October 1948

Original Text: French

Uruguay, Cuba, Lebanon: Joint Amendment to Article 3 of the Draft Declaration (E/800)

Replace this article by the following text:

“Everyone has the right to life, honour, liberty, physical integrity, and to the legal, economic and social security which is necessary to the full development of the human personality.”

A/C.3/275

14 October 1948

Recapitulation of Amendments to Article 6

(In the chronological order of their submission to the Committee)

Article 6 – Text adopted by the Commission on Human Rights

All are equal before the law and are entitled without any discrimination to equal protection of the law against any discrimination in violation of this Declaration and against any incitement to such discrimination.

Amendments

Panama (A/C.3/220)

It is proposed to have the text of this article combined with that of Articles 2 and 8, as follows:

Article – All are equal before the law and are entitled to equal protection of the law and to enjoy all the rights and freedoms set forth in this Declaration, without distinction of any kind, such as race, colour, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, property or other status, or national or social origin.

Cuba (A/C.3/224)

No longer serves any purpose in view of the re-drafting of Article 2 as proposed by the Cuban delegation, and of the wording of Article 5.

(Amendments to Article 6)

Union of South Africa (A/C.3/226)

Delete the words “against any discrimination in violation of this Declaration and against any incitement to such discrimination.”

Mexico (A/C.3/266)

Add, as a second paragraph, the following:

“There should likewise be available to every person a simple, brief procedure whereby the Courts will protect him from acts of authority that, to his prejudice, violate any fundamental Constitutional rights.”

A/C.3/276

14 October 1948

Recapitulation of Amendments to Article 7

(In the chronological order of their submission to the Committee)

Article 7 – Text adopted by the Commission on Human Rights

“No one shall be subjected to arbitrary arrest or detention.”

Amendments:

Panama (A/C.3/220)

It is proposed that this article be replaced in the manner above stated in connection with Article 3.

(“Article – No one shall be subjected to arbitrary arrest or detention. Every person who has been detained has a right to have the legality of his detention judicially determined without any delay. Neither shall anyone be held in slavery or involuntary servitude. (Paragraph 1, Article 4 of the draft).

Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (E/800)

Addition to Article 7:

“Anyone deprived of his liberty has the right to be informed without delay of the grounds for his detention. Anyone who is arrested, detained or imprisoned is entitled to have immediately established by the judicial authorities the legality of his deprivation of liberty, and also to have his case brought before the court without undue delay or to be liberated.

No one may be imprisoned on account merely of failure to carry out his contractual obligations.

Everyone is entitled to compensation for illegal arrest or deprivation of liberty.”

Cuba (A/C.3/224)

Transfer this text, worded as follows, to the section relating to purely juridical rights (Article 23: “Protection against arbitrary detention”):

[2]

“No one may be deprived of his freedom except in such cases as are covered by existing laws and in conformity with the procedure prescribed by them.

“No one may be detained for failure to carry out obligations of a purely civil character.

“Any person who has been deprived of his freedom is entitled to have the legality of the measures to which he has been subjected immediately confirmed by a judge, and to be tried without unjustifiable delay or, failing that, to be released.

“He is also entitled to humane treatment while under detention.”

France (A/C.3/244)

Add a paragraph 2 worded as follows:

“Any person arrested or detained is entitled to have the legality of the action taken against him confirmed without delay by a judge. He is also entitled to demand a verdict or release within a reasonable period.”

Mexico (A/C.3/266)

Add to the present text the following sentence:

“No one shall be subjected to imprisonment on account of civil debts, nor for breach of a work contract.”

Uruguay (A/C.3/268)

Delete the word “arbitrary” and add the following after “detention”:

“except in the cases and according to the procedure prescribed by prior legislation. All persons subjected to arrest or detention have the right to have the legality of such action confirmed by a judge without delay and to be brought to trial within a reasonable period or set at liberty.”

A/C.3/277

14 October 1948

Recapitulation of Amendments to Article 8

(In the chronological order of their submission to the Committee)

Article 8 – Text adopted by the Commission on Human Rights

“In the determination of his rights and obligations and of any criminal charge against him, everyone is entitled in full equality to a fair hearing by an independent and impartial tribunal.”

Amendments:

Panama (A/C.3/220)

It is proposed that the phrase “in full equality” be eliminated from this article in as much as the subject of equality is covered by another article.

It is further proposed that an article dealing in toto with the subject of fair trial be made up of Article 8, modified as stated above, and the first paragraph of Article 9, as follows:

Article:

1. In the determination of his rights and obligations and of any criminal charge against him, everyone is entitled to a fair hearing by an independent and impartial tribunal.
2. Everyone charged with a penal offence has the right to be presumed innocent until proved guilty according to law in a public trial at which he has had all the guarantees necessary for his defence.”

Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (E/800)

Alterations and Supplements to Article 8:

Insert the following before the text as adopted by the Commission:

“All people are equal before the law. Judges must be independent and answerable only to the law. Legal procedure in all States must be based on democratic principles.

“Hearings in all courts must be public, with the exception of cases for which provision is made by law for the purpose of complying with public morality or in the interests of national security. The accused [2] shall be entitled to the services of a defence counsel in court.

“Should the accused be unfamiliar with the national language he must be enabled to acquaint himself with all the details of the case by means of an interpreter, and he must be given the right to speak in court in his native language.”

Egypt (A/C.3/264)

Amendment does not concern the English text.

Cuba (A/C.3/224)

Articles 8 and 9

Transfer these texts worded as follows to the section relating to purely juridical rights (Article 26: "Rights to a fair trial"):

"Any person against whom a charge is made is presumed to be innocent until proved guilty according to law.

"Everyone charged with a penal offence has the right to an impartial and public hearing and trial by previously established tribunals in accordance with existing laws.

"Such person shall not be subjected to cruel, degrading or non-customary punishment."

It is pointed out that the improvements made in Article 5 by the Cuban delegation's amendment render Article 8 almost superfluous.

A/C.3/278

14 October 1948

Recapitulation of Amendments to Article 9

(In the chronological order of their submission to the Committee)

Article 9 – Text adopted by the Commission Human Rights:

"1. Everyone charged with a penal offence has the right to be presumed innocent until proved guilty according to law in a public trial at which he has had all the guarantees necessary for his defence.

2. No one shall be held guilty of any offence on account of any act or omission which did not constitute an offence, under national or international law, at the time when it was committed."

Amendments:

Panama (A/C.3/220)

It is proposed that the second paragraph of this article be made part of a separate article dealing with the right to security against ex post facto laws, as follows:

Article – No one shall be held guilty of any offence on account of any act or omission which did not constitute an offence under national or international law, at the time when it was committed. Neither can anyone be imposed a heavier penalty than the one that was applicable at the time the offence was committed.

Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (E/800)

Before the word “trial” delete “public”, and after the word “defence” add: “. . . and which must be public except in cases involving considerations of the protection of public morality or national security.”

United States of America (A/C.3/223)

Insert the word “penalty” before the word “offence” in the second paragraph of Article 9, so as to read:

“Article 9

2. No one shall be held guilty of any penal offence on account of any act or omission which did not constitute a penal offence, under national [2] or international law, at the time when it was committed.”

France (A/C.3/244)

Article 9, paragraph 2:

This amendment does not apply to the English text.

Uruguay (A/C.3/268)

In paragraph 2 insert the word “punishable” before the word “under”.

Insert two new paragraphs as follows:

“3. Laws which increase penalties or diminish means of or guarantees for defence may not be applied retroactively.

“4. No one be subject to torture, to the death penalty or inhuman punishments, or to degrading treatment.”

A/C.3/SR.102<sup>38</sup>

14 October 1948

Summary Record of the Hundred and Second Meeting
[of the Third Committee]

Held at the Palais de Chaillot, Paris, on Thursday, 14 October 1948,
 at 3 p.m.

Chairman: MR. CHARLES MALIK (Lebanon).

<sup>38</sup> The text of the document is from Official Records of the General Assembly, Third Session, 1948, pp. 142–51.

24. Draft international declaration of Human rights (E/800) (continued)Article 2 (continued)*

MR. GRUMBACH (France) read the French text of article 2, after which the Chairman read the English text and put the article to the vote, as amended.

Article 2, as amended, was adopted by 36 votes to none, with 1 abstention.

MR. TE WATER (Union of South Africa) said he had been absent during the vote and asked that it be noted in the record that he was in favour of article 2.

THE CHAIRMAN announced that Mr. Cassin, in consultation with the other French-speaking representatives, had agreed to keep abreast of the Committee's work in the preparation of French texts.

MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) withdrew his proposal (A/C.3/270), as the Chairman's announcement satisfied his wish.

[142]

Article 3<sup>1</sup>

THE CHAIRMAN drew attention to the various amendments to article 3, recapitulated in documents A/C.3/259 and 259/Add.1.

The Mexican (A/C.3/266), USSR (A/C.3/265) and Panamanian (A/C.3/220) amendments were furthest removed from the original text. The Uruguayan (A/C.3/268), Lebanese (A/C.3/260) and Cuban (A/C.3/224) amendments were similar in content and could perhaps be unified in a single text.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) considered his proposal furthest removed in substance from the original text. The article under discussion was an important one because it dealt with the right to life, yet at the same time, it said nothing about how that right was to be guaranteed. The USSR amendment suggested concrete measures for the implementation of the right to life and, therefore, was furthest removed from the article as it then read.

He drew attention to the practice of lynching which was still being carried on in the United States and referred to a document put forward by the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. In the years 1893 and 1923, the number of lynchings per year exceeded two hundred; as late as 1945 and 1946, more than several dozen barbaric lynchings had taken place. It was against such criminal acts that some provision had to be included in article 3.

Mr. Pavlov thought that the State should take adequate measures to protect human life from starvation and exhaustion. He recalled that, in the last quarter of the nineteenth century, 15 million people had died of starvation in India. He also said that, according to statistics published in the British Press, the life expectancy in India, in 1931, was 26.9 years, while the life expectancy in England and Wales, in 1933, was 60 years. Geographical and climatic factors were sometimes held to blame for such a state of affairs, but the mortality figures for Indians as compared with Europeans in India, proved that those conditions were the result of the practices of the colonial administration. Further, the statistics for 1933 showed that most of those Indians had died from exhaustion and not because of climatic factors.

He referred to the remarks of an American, Senator Caraway,<sup>39</sup> to the effect that more than 1,000 Americans had died of famine and exhaustion during the year 1931.

The death penalty had been abolished in the USSR and all efforts were directed towards creating a life that was worthy of man. The socialist humanitarianism practised in that country ensured that the death penalty could not be carried out except in times of special emergency, such as war.

There were other contemporary phenomena which threatened human life. In the presence of an aggressive weapon such as the atomic bomb, which would bring death and terror to defenceless civilian populations, it seemed ironic to speak of the right to life.

[<sup>11</sup>] Article 4 of the draft universal declaration of human rights (A/777).

[143]

His proposal was a concrete one and whether it was rejected or not, discussion of it would make a practical issue of article 3.

MR. DE LEÓN (Panama) felt it was inappropriate to state more than one right in a single article, as was done in article 3. The expression “security of person” was vague and did not indicate whether safety, or the absence of discrimination, was meant. Further, the right to liberty was nowhere clearly defined in the draft declaration. In his opinion, one article should be devoted to the right to life and liberty alone.

The declaration should also include a reference to the right of habeas corpus.

The meaning of the right to life might seem obvious, but it should be stated. Inspired by the Recommendations at Havana of 1917, the Panamanian delegation proposed the following wording (A/C.3/220):

“Every human being has the right to exist and to maintain, develop, protect and defend his existence.”

MR. DE ALBA (Mexico) realized that article 3 was the result of careful and prolonged study, but felt, nevertheless, that it might be wise to redraft the principle along the lines of the American Declaration of Independence. For the right to “the pursuit of happiness”, he suggested a more timely concept which would embrace the social security of the individual.

<sup>39</sup> Thaddeus Horatius Caraway (1871–1931) represented Arkansas in the United States Senate. In 1931 he condemned the Republican administration on the Senate floor, claiming 1,000 people were dying from hunger every day in the United States.

The Chinese representative had referred to Rousseau’s theory that man was naturally good (96th and 98th meetings). Such a confession of faith should be echoed throughout the United Nations and if it was held to be true, the declaration should lay emphasis on the social aspect and freedom of man.

The Mexican proposal was not a novel one and its aim was simply to strengthen the fundamental principles by the inclusion of economic concepts. It was based on a manifesto on the subsistence level, written by a famous Latin-American philosopher in 1929. In it, he stated that all human beings had the right to healthy remunerative work, healthy food, adequate housing, clothing, medical assistance, social justice, higher education and leisure.

MR. ROZAKIS (Greece) thought the mention of the right to life in article 3 was superfluous. That right was so basic and elementary that he felt it might weaken the force of the declaration to mention it specifically in article 3. It was fully recognized that many men of genius were weak physically and it was no longer the practice to exterminate cripples in order to maintain the race at a high level of physical health. He thought that the mention of the right to life might imply that that right was questioned and he therefore proposed that article 3 should be amended to read:

“Everyone has the right to liberty and security of person.”

[144]

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) said that the first three articles were extremely important as they gave a summary of the rights which were defined fully in the rest of the declaration. It was very important that the preliminary enumeration of rights in the first three articles should be complete. In the draft under discussion, they did not include any mention of economic and social rights or of the right to freedom of thought. His delegation had therefore suggested the wording “full development of his personality” (A/C.3/260) to cover that omission.

The delegations of Mexico, Uruguay and Cuba had submitted their amendments with the same aim of completing the preliminary summary of rights, but he felt that the phrase suggested by his delegation covered satisfactorily all the points raised in the other amendments.

He agreed with the substance of the amendment submitted by the delegation of Panama (A/C.3/220) and with the first part of the amendment submitted by the USSR (A/C.3/265), but he did not think that they should be included in article 3. He suggested that the relevant parts of those two amendments should be combined to form an additional article defining the right to life.

With regard to the last part of the amendment submitted by the representative of the Soviet Union, he thought that it was premature to recommend abolition of the death penalty.

MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) said that the first part of the USSR amendment was already covered in article 3. The second and third parts, providing for action on the part of the State to protect the right to life, were implicit in the original statement: "Everyone has the right to life". Article 20, dealing with social security, covered some of the points raised in the USSR amendment. It was well known that the average length of life differed in various parts of the world as a result, among other things, of differing geographical, economic and political factors. The declaration was, however, concerned with the proclamation of rights, while their application would depend on the conditions in each country and did not come within the scope of the document under consideration.

He thought that the recommendation concerning the death penalty, contained in the USSR amendment, would be more appropriately included in article 9.

With regard to the amendment submitted by the delegation of Panama, he agreed in substance with many of its provisions, but felt that they should be included in different articles. The right of habeas corpus should be included in article 7, the statement that no one should be held in slavery should be included in article 4, and the reference to torture would be more appropriate in article 9.

With regard to the Mexican amendment (A/C.3/266), he agreed that the inclusion of provisions to secure the full existence of social justice and the full development of the human being would bring the declaration up to date.

[145]

The amendments submitted by the delegations of Lebanon (A/C.3/260) and Cuba (A/C.3/224) resembled the one submitted by his delegation (A/C.3/268). He agreed with the representative of Lebanon that the first three articles should contain an enumeration of all the rights defined in the declaration and that the draft under discussion was incomplete in that respect. His delegation thought that mention should be made of the right to honour, so that actions which might lower human dignity or prejudice the self-respect of the individual would be explicitly condemned. It might be said that an attack on a man's honour was also an infringement of his liberty, but he felt that the right to honour should be mentioned separately for the sake of clarity.

The second part of his amendment, suggesting mention of legal, economic and social security, would cover in concise terms the points raised in the Mexican amendment.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) said that the amendment submitted by his delegation (A/C.3/224) contained an important new idea in suggesting the insertion of the word "integrity". That idea was linked with those contained in the amendments submitted by the delegations of Uruguay and Lebanon, but it was not covered by them. His amendment had been prompted by the terrible events which had taken place during the war, when human beings had been used for surgical experiments.

He, therefore, felt that the inclusion of the words “integrity of person” was essential to complete the enumeration of fundamental human rights.

With regard to the USSR amendment, its provisions were already taken into account in the Constitution of his country, but he thought that the duties of States should be mentioned in a covenant rather than in a declaration. He also referred to the fact that there was no mention of the right to liberty and security in that amendment.

He would support the amendment submitted by the delegation of Uruguay if the concept of integrity of person were added to it.

MR. ALTMAN (Poland) supported the USSR amendment and said that the right to life would have to be guaranteed by the State if it were to have any real meaning. In his country the death penalty was used only for the punishment of war criminals and, in all other cases, his delegation was in favour of the abolition of the death penalty in time of peace.

He appreciated the ideas contained in the Mexican amendment (A/C.3/266) but thought that they would be more appropriately included in article 20.

MR. GRUMBACH (France) was in favour of the draft submitted by the Commission on Human Rights. He feared that any additions to article 3 would only serve to weaken it. All the additions suggested were covered in the later articles of the draft declaration and he appealed to the members of the Committee to consider the document as a whole when submitting amendments to the individual articles.

With regard to the duties of the State, mentioned in the USSR amendment, he said that such [146] provisions belonged to the covenant rather than to the declaration. The final bill of human rights would have three parts: a declaration, a covenant and measures of implementation. The Committee was at present considering the declaration only and provisions for legislative measures to implement the general principles set forth in the declaration would be discussed at a later stage.

He was, himself, in favour of the abolition of the death penalty; but if a recommendation to that effect were included in the declaration, it would have to be carefully defined, so as to cover the practice of sending prisoners to concentration camps, where a lingering death awaited them, as well as capital punishment, in the normal acceptance of the term.

He referred to the remarks made by the representative of Greece to the effect that it was unnecessary to mention the right to life as it was self-evident and said that, on the contrary, it was more than ever necessary to proclaim the right to life after the terrible crimes that had been perpetrated during the war. Economic and social rights were generally recognized but the classic rights which had been considered as self-evident had been repeatedly violated in recent years. It was, therefore, essential to proclaim man's fundamental right to life. He thought it would be inadvisable to include social, legal and economic rights in article 3. The Commission on Human Rights had purposely mentioned those rights in separate articles so as to give each its full weight.

All the rights mentioned in the various amendments were included in other parts of the draft declaration and he therefore appealed to the members of the Committee to accept the wording of article 3 as it appeared in the basic draft, in which the fundamental right to life was set forth clearly and concisely.

BADAWI BEY (Egypt) said that, during the general debate, he had raised the question whether the duties of States should be mentioned in the declaration. He did not think that those duties should be mentioned, as the declaration was not intended to include legal obligations. He requested that the Committee should decide on the question of principle before a vote was taken on the USSR amendment.

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) fully supported the views expressed by the representative of France. She recalled that in drafting article 3, the purpose of the Commission on Human Rights had been to make a general declaration of principle from which the more detailed rights in the succeeding articles would logically follow. For the most part the various proposed amendments contained little that could be criticized with regard to substance, but the points they raised were almost all included in subsequent articles of the draft declaration. For example, the matter of legal rights, found in the Panamanian (A/C.3/220) and Uruguayan (A/C.3/268) amendments, was covered by articles 4 through 10; economic rights and social security by articles 20 through 26; the idea of honour, mentioned in the Uruguayan amendment, was implied in article 4, which prohibited “degrading” treatment of human beings; and the ideas in the first three sentences of the USSR proposal (A/C.3/265) were [147] certainly covered by the various articles that set forth legal, social and economic rights. The members of the Committee should therefore bear in mind the document as a whole before they agreed to make amendments to the basic text of article 3, and should realize that all the questions raised had already been fully discussed in the Commission on Human Rights.

Referring to the USSR proposal to include a statement concerning the abolition of the death penalty, Mrs. Roosevelt pointed out that the Third Committee was not attempting to write criminal law. Although many representatives undoubtedly agreed with the principle involved, the declaration of human rights was not an appropriate place for stating it. In the declaration there should be no attempt to outline the obligations of States, for that was a subject with which the proposed covenant on human rights should deal.

In reply to the Soviet Union representative’s statement regarding conditions in the United States, Mrs. Roosevelt observed that the document that had been cited in connexion with lynching was over a year old. She very much deplored the fact that there were some cases of lynching in her country, but such a practice was exceptional and clearly in violation of law. She regretted that the USSR representative had chosen to repeat again the attack he had made against the United States, in spite of the plea she had made for a different spirit among members of the Committee.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) agreed that article 3 should state the broad basis on which subsequent articles rested; to include additional matters in it would be to destroy its meaning. Since the Mexican and USSR amendments suggested additions that would tend to define the basic right expressed in article 3, he could not support those proposals.

On the other hand, the amendments suggested by Cuba, Lebanon and Uruguay did not attempt to develop the fundamental statement of principle but would merely add certain broad ideas such as social security, integrity of the individual, and the full development of personality. Mr. Santa Cruz hoped that the representatives of those three countries would consult with each other with a view to combining their proposed amendments to a single text.

Concerning the remarks made by the USSR representative, Mr. Santa Cruz wondered whether the Committee was receiving the constructive participation in its work that it had a right to expect from a great Power. He further wondered whether there did not exist in the USSR that same undue emphasis on the concept of the State that had, in recent years, led to the abuses which the draft declaration of human rights was especially designed to prevent.

MR. MAYHEW (United Kingdom) spoke in favour of the existing terse text of article 1, which was particularly effective. He observed, moreover, [148] that it followed closely the form of article 1 of the Bogotá declaration. As the concepts of liberty and security were expanded in articles 4 through 19 of the draft declaration and the concepts of social security and economic and cultural rights were laid down in the later articles, there seemed no need to elaborate in article 3 the general principle proclaimed.

He could not, however, support the USSR proposal for although he in no way objected to the substance of the first three sentences, it raised the question of enumerating in the draft declaration the duties of States. To accept that idea would be unwise and would mean that the whole of the draft declaration would have to be rewritten.

In regard to the inclusion of a statement prohibiting the death penalty, Mr. Mayhew pointed out that the question of the death penalty was highly controversial; while certain countries had abolished the death penalty, many others had not. It would therefore be a mistake to insert mention of it in the draft declaration, for some States might on that account find the declaration difficult to accept.

The remarks made by the representative of the Soviet Union had, unfortunately, seemed to strike a controversial note. Mr. Mayhew was sure that the USSR representative had not intended to give the impression that he was attacking the United States and the United Kingdom and he hoped that that impression would soon be dispelled.

MR. HOFFMEISTER (Czechoslovakia) felt that an article which began with the assertion that man had the right to life should logically conclude, as the representative of the Soviet Union had suggested, with the statement against the death penalty.

An important principle was involved, and even though the death penalty was still legal in some countries including his own, the declaration of human rights should set forth the principle that it should be abolished.

The evolution that had taken place in the matter of national security in Czechoslovakia was making the situation more favourable for the abolition of the death penalty. Although that step had not yet been taken, Mr. Hoffmeister stated that he had been authorized by his Government to support the USSR proposal.

MR. BEAUFORT (Netherlands) accepted, in general, the text proposed by the Commission on Human Rights, as it was a brief and clear statement of basic rights. The Netherlands delegation had intended, however, to suggest the addition of the words "bodily integrity" after the word "life"; but as that idea was covered by the Cuban proposal (A/C.3/224), the Netherlands would support that proposal. The inclusion of the principle of security and integrity of person was necessary, for even though the idea was to be found in the second paragraph of the preamble and in the second sentence of article 4, that right, which had been so barbarously violated by the Nazis before and during the Second World War, should be emphasized by being placed in the general statement of principle in article 3.

[149]

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon), while fully appreciating the value of the text proposed by the Commission on Human Rights, in the work of which his delegation had participated, still felt that some amendments to draft article 3 were necessary.

The very fact that article 3 should lay the general foundation for the more specific articles that followed was a reason why it should contain the addition his delegation suggested, for only in that way would the foundation be solid.

MR. PLAZA (Venezuela) supported the Uruguayan and Cuban amendments to article 3.

He could not, however, accept the USSR proposal: the first part of it was unnecessary in view of the other articles of the draft declaration; and the second part, referring to the abolition of the death penalty in time of peace, implied that such punishment would be legal in time of war. That idea was contrary to the laws of Venezuela which guaranteed the inviolability of human life at all times.

As far as the Mexican and Panamanian proposals were concerned, Mr. Plaza agreed with both in substance, but thought the former should be considered in connexion with article 20, and the latter in connexion with article 9.

MR. CARRERA ANDRADE (Ecuador) asked whether the USSR representative would be willing to have the discussion of his draft amendment postponed until the Committee began discussion of article 7.

He then suggested that articles 3 and 4 should be combined into a single article, with the two paragraphs of article 4 becoming the second and third paragraphs of article 3. As it stood, article 3 was not complete in itself; it needed the precise statements of article 4 to make clear the rights it was proclaiming.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) requested that his proposal (A/C.3/265) should be put to the vote in parts: first, the first and second sentences; secondly, the third sentence; and thirdly, the last sentence, on which he wished a vote by roll-call. Abolition of the death penalty was a vital question that was of concern to every human being; a roll-call vote on that point would be a means of testing the sincerity of representatives who had defended the right of the individual to life.

Referring to the Cuban representative's observations that the USSR draft amendment omitted mention of the rights to liberty and security, Mr. Pavlov explained that to ensure the protection of the individual against criminal attacks on his person would be to ensure the right of security in the most concrete way possible. The right to liberty had been omitted merely because it had already been stated in article 2. His delegation was prepared, however, to add those two rights to its draft amendment if that would make it acceptable to a majority of the delegations.

The Uruguayan argument against the USSR proposal was neither logical nor correct; it was based on the age-old device of rejecting proposals on the ground that if they added nothing new they were unnecessary and if they did in fact add [150] something new, they were necessarily wrong. Uruguay had stated its willingness to discuss the death penalty in connexion with article 9. A vote could therefore be taken immediately on the substance of the USSR proposal and the secondary question of where it would be placed in the draft declaration could be decided later.

In reply to the point raised by the French representative, namely that the death penalty should be defined to include a lingering death in concentration camps, Mr. Pavlov observed that under proper administration, concentration camps and penal institutions did not lead to death but rather to reform of the persons temporarily deprived of their liberty.

Speaking of the Egyptian representative's objection to the inclusion of the State's duties in the draft declaration, Mr. Pavlov recalled that his delegation had never accepted that idea. He had always maintained that the question of whether both rights and duties should be mentioned had to be decided for each article separately. Certainly there should be no objection to specifying the State's obligation to guarantee a right so vital as the right to life. Even though the declaration might have no legal force, it would have a powerful moral force and should therefore make clear the State's duty in regard to that right. The declaration must not be a theoretical document but must suggest methods for realizing the rights it set forth.

The United States representative had said that the proposed statement regarding the death penalty was not appropriate, as the Committee had not been asked to revise penal codes. That argument, however, was not valid; a statement should first be made in the declaration and then the individual States should revise their penal codes accordingly.

Mr. Pavlov was glad that the United States representative agreed with him in condemning lynching in the United States. He could not therefore understand why she should object to his having given that illustration of arbitrary, criminal and terroristic action against the lives of individual citizens. He himself made a clear distinction between the practice of lynching and the policy of the United States Government, but that country should adopt special legislation to enforce the existing laws against lynching.

Mr. Pavlov observed that the United States representative had not given any convincing reply to the statement by Senator Caraway which he had cited.

The Chilean representative had also spoken against the USSR amendment. That attitude was not surprising and was entirely in line with the anti-Soviet policy adopted by that country in the previous few months. The Chilean attack against the Soviet Union, however, had been wholly unfounded in fact; no evidence whatsoever had been presented to substantiate Chile's claim that the Soviet Union threatened the peace of the world.

Mr. Pavlov pointed out that no attempt had been made by the United Kingdom representative to deny any of the facts he had presented in regard to the former British colonial regime in [151] India. There was good reason to criticize a regime which had resulted in the death of millions of people. The United Kingdom representative had less reason to feel offended by such criticism than Mr. Pavlov himself had to feel offended by what the United Kingdom representative had said about the Soviet Union at the 93rd meeting. Whereas Mr. Pavlov had merely stated facts, Mr. Mayhew had made untrue assertions about the Constitution of the Soviet Union.

Each of those assertions would be answered in detail by the USSR representative during the Committee's discussion of the pertinent articles of the draft declaration.

The meeting rose at 6:10 p.m.

A/C.3/269

15 October 1948

Original Text: French

France and Lebanon: French version of article 2 of the Draft Declaration (E/800)

“Toute personne peut se prévaloir de tous les droits et de toutes les libertés proclamés dans la présente Déclaration, sans distinction aucune, notamment de race, de couleur, de sexe, de langue, de religion, d'opinion politique ou autres, de fortune ou de toute autre situation, de naissance, d'origine nationale ou sociale.”

A/C.3/279

15 October 1948

Original Text: French

Lebanon: Amendment to the USSR Amendment to Article 3 (Document A/C.3/265)

“Everyone has the right to existence and to protection against criminal attempts on his person and against the danger of death by hunger and exhaustion.”

A/C.3/SR.103<sup>40</sup>

15 October 1948

Summary Record of the Hundred and Third Meeting
[of the Third Committee]

Held at the Palais de Chaillot, Paris, on Friday, 15 October 1948,
at 10:45 a.m.

Chairman: MR. CHARLES MALIK (Lebanon).

25. Draft international declaration of human rights (E/800) (continued)

Article 3 (continued)

MR. WATT (Australia), said that, as the USSR delegation had asked for a vote by roll-call on the last sentence of its amendment (A/C.3/265) to article 3, he wished to explain his delegation's position.

Although the Australian delegation was in agreement with the substance of the USSR amendment, it would vote against it. Referring to the second and third sentences of the amendment, he expressed the view that the declaration should not include a list of the duties of States, and secondly, that the substance of those two sentences was already contained in the Charter.

At San Francisco, his delegation had urged the adoption of Article 56, whereby all Members pledged themselves to fulfil the obligations set forth in Article 55, which mentioned human rights and fundamental freedoms.

<sup>40</sup> The text of the document is from Official Records of the General Assembly, Third Session, 1948, pp. 151–61.

In regard to the USSR proposal for the abolition of the death penalty, he felt it was a question that would give rise to much discussion and on which it would be difficult to achieve agreement. The Committee had been confronted with a similar difficulty when the Brazilian delegation had expressed the wish to include in article 1 of the declaration the idea of a divine power. On that occasion, the Brazilian delegation had shown a laudable spirit of compromise and had agreed to withdraw its amendment (99th meeting).

The Australian delegation's attitude towards the abolition of the death penalty could not be questioned. Abolition of the death penalty was included in the election platform of the Australian Labour Party, which was assuming the responsibility of Government. Even in the parts of Australia where the death penalty was still in force, the authorities made extensive use of their right of pardon.

He then considered the amendment submitted jointly by the Uruguayan, Cuban and Lebanese [152] delegations (A/C.3/274). It raised a new and interesting concept of human dignity. However, article 1 of the declaration mentioned "dignity" and the following articles expanded the idea. The amendment was therefore superfluous. Moreover, it was too long, and was lacking in concision and clarity, whereas the basic text was particularly clear and would, on that account, awaken a response in the public conscience.

MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) felt that the right to life should not be included in article 3 and, therefore, that the second, third and fourth sentences of the USSR amendment were not acceptable. Further, the USSR delegation's definition of the concept was inadequate, for the social programmes of many countries had already gone beyond it. He was not opposed to the abolition of the death penalty; on the contrary, he went much further than the provisions of the USSR amendment and reserved his right, when article 9 was considered, to submit an amendment for the abolition of the death penalty in time of war as well as in peacetime.

He then defended the amendment submitted by his delegation jointly with the Lebanese and Cuban delegations. Defence of the physical integrity of the individual was particularly important to his delegation. He did not agree with the United States delegation that the right to honour should be mentioned in the second paragraph of article 4. In any case he thought that article 3 should contain a general statement of vital rights, without prejudice to the explanation and development of those rights in the following article. He therefore urged that the right to honour should be mentioned specifically in article 3.

The Australian representative had criticized the wording of the joint amendment and had said it was too long and lacked clarity. In his opinion, principles should not be sacrificed for reasons of drafting.

In conclusion he expressed the hope that all who had taken part in the preparation of the draft declaration would support the amendment.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) said that the amendment submitted jointly by the Lebanese, Cuban and Uruguayan delegations had been largely inspired by the Mexican proposal (A/C.3/229), which was to have been included in article 1. The amendment took into consideration all the points appearing in that proposal; he therefore asked the Mexican delegation to support the joint amendment.

Referring to the amendments submitted by the USSR (A/C.3/265) and Panama (A/C.3/220), he said he agreed entirely with the substance of the first article proposed by Panama in replacement of article 3 and with the whole of the USSR amendment. He agreed with the USSR in thinking that the right to life should be defined and explained. The joint amendment took into account all the ideas expressed in the USSR amendment. Nevertheless, the appropriate place for the USSR [153] proposal was not in article 3. It would be better to include it in article 4, or make it the subject of a separate article. If the USSR delegation withdrew its amendment, the Lebanese delegation would propose the following new text (A/C.3/279) for insertion in article 4:

“Everyone has the right to existence and to protection against criminal attempts on his person and against the danger of death by hunger and exhaustion.”

For the reasons he had given, he appealed to the representatives of Panama and the USSR not to insist on their amendments so that the Committee’s work would not be delayed.

MR. DE LEÓN (Panama) said his delegation had no preconceived idea concerning the order of the articles. It was prepared to change its views: the task of the sub-committee on co-ordination would be to harmonize the various opinions that had been expressed.

The important point was to find a definition of the right to life and to liberty that would include the idea of habeas corpus. The question where that definition should be inserted was secondary.

In regard to the joint Lebanese, Uruguayan and Cuban amendment, he submitted, first of all, that the expression “the right to honour” was not a reasonable one. Honour was not a right, but a sentiment; the individual had no right to honour; he had the duty to obey the precepts dictated by honour, and his enjoyment of the right to reputation, laid down in article 10 of the declaration, depended on the extent to which he performed that duty.

Further, the amendment was intended to include all the rights included in the declaration, and yet the list it gave was incomplete. In particular, the right to freedom of expression, and to equality, and certain other rights were not mentioned. For that reason the amendment was not acceptable.

MR. CHANG (China) observed that all the amendments that had been submitted, even including those which had not been favourably received by the majority, had made a constructive contribution towards the preparation of a common declaration.

Members should not, however, lose sight of the draft declaration itself, which was the basic document before the Committee. That draft was the result of assiduous efforts and it had been reviewed with meticulous care. The original text prepared at Geneva had been submitted to the various Governments for their comments. It had then been examined by the Commission on Human Rights and had been altered in the light of the various comments and suggestions to which it had given rise. The draft declaration before the Committee was the final product of all that work, and it constituted only two-thirds of the original Geneva draft. It had, in fact, been realized that the clearer and the more concise the declaration was, the more effective and lasting it would be. The declaration was not intended for legal experts or scholars but for the general public; it should therefore be as striking as possible, and, accordingly, as concise as possible. It would be [154] best if the declaration were limited to ten articles, but, if that were not possible, it should at least be limited to the twenty-eight articles which composed the draft under consideration.

Mr. Chang then stated that the Third Committee had not studied the structure of the declaration as a whole. In his opinion, such a study was essential and therefore, in examining the declaration, he would refer specially to its logical structure.

Articles 1, 2 and 3 expressed the three main ideas of eighteenth century philosophy; article 1 expressed the idea of fraternity, article 2 that of equality, and article 3 that of liberty.

The idea of liberty was then analysed and applied to the human being in article 3. Article 3 set forth a basic principle, which was then defined and clarified in the nine following articles. Article 4 dealt with slavery, article 5 with the right to recognition as a person before the law, article 6 with equality before the law, article 7 with the need to establish the legality of arrest, article 8 with the right to a fair trial, article 9 with the right to be presumed innocent until proved guilty, article 10 forbade interference with a person's privacy and article 11 affirmed the right to freedom of movement.

In that series of articles the idea of liberty was gradually and progressively enlarged; it was applied first to the individual, then to the family, and finally to the country. That series of articles therefore served to develop and clarify the idea of liberty.

Articles 13 to 20 dealt individually with the various social institutions.

Article 20, like article 3, expressed a general idea which was explained and developed in the following articles. Article 20 set forth the idea of social security and that idea was defined and developed in articles 21 to 25.

The structure of the draft declaration was, therefore, perfectly clear and logical. The joint amendment submitted by the delegations of Lebanon, Uruguay and Cuba and especially its second part, which expressed the same idea as article 20, was not in harmony with that structure. It was for that reason that Mr. Chang thought that the draft declaration should be left as it was, since it possessed the qualities of logic, clarity and brevity, qualities which were indispensable if the declaration was to prove effective.

MR. CASSIN (France) said that his delegation did not object to the principles embodied in the USSR amendment but it could not vote in favour of that amendment because it considered those principles to be out of place in article 3. His delegation felt, moreover, that the simple statement of the right to life, without anything further, would give the declaration more force. The Committee should try to draft a declaration which would be both effective and restrained, a declaration whose influence on men's lives would increase progressively with the signature of the conventions to which it would give rise. Moreover, the USSR amendment was incomplete in that it did not mention liberty and security of person, which were essential to complete the idea of the right to life.

He admitted that the Mexican amendment and the joint amendment submitted by the delegations [155] of Uruguay, Cuba and Lebanon, constituted an attempt to achieve a synthesis of fundamental human rights. He felt, however, that although such an attempt was praiseworthy in itself, it was Utopian in outlook and the first of rights contained in those amendments was incomplete. Moreover, the idea of the right to honour, which was mentioned in the joint amendment, was implicit in article 1 which stated that "all human beings are born free and equal in dignity and rights". As for the idea of the full development of man's personality, which was also included in that amendment, it would be unnecessary to include it if article 27 dealing with the duties of the individual towards the community, were given its logical position directly after articles 1 and 2, as requested by the French delegation.

Mr. Cassin pointed out to the authors of those amendments that all their proposals were already contained in the draft declaration and he suggested that the Committee should proceed to a vote on article 3 as it stood.

MR. COROMINAS (Argentina) said that the request made by the USSR delegation that its amendment should be put to the vote by roll-call and in parts, placed the Argentine delegation in a difficult position. That request meant that the members of the Committee would have to come to a decision on isolated phrases. All the ideas contained in the amendment were in conformity with the principles recognized in his country and he therefore could not vote against them in substance. The Argentine delegation could not, however, accept the USSR amendment, which proposed that all those principles should be combined and inserted in an article of the declaration where they would be out of place.

As the representative of China had said the chief aim of the declaration of human rights was to be brief, clear and explicit, so that everyone would be able to understand it. It was not to be a convention for the exclusive use of legal experts.

In those circumstances, and for purely drafting reasons, the Argentine delegation would abstain from voting on the USSR amendment. It would vote in favour of the joint amendment submitted by the delegations of Uruguay, Lebanon and Cuba.

MR. DE ATHAYDE (Brazil) thought that article in its existing form, was sufficiently clear and concise. Its wording was perfectly suited to a declaration, the aim of which was to set forth basic principles and which could not therefore be complete in every respect. The aims of the amendments were praiseworthy but their proposals did not add anything to the original text.

The death penalty was not provided for in the legislation of Brazil, but the Brazilian delegation felt, nevertheless, that it was not for the Third Committee to take a decision on a question which was essentially one of penal law. Brazil could not, therefore, vote in favour of the amendment submitted by the USSR.

MR. KAYALY (Syria), recalling a remark made on the previous day by the representative of the USSR, explained that the fire which had destroyed [156] the library of Alexandria in ancient times had been caused by the hostilities connected with Antony's invasion, a fact which disproved the theory put forward by the historian Abul Faraj, mentioned by Mr. Pavlov.

As far as the current discussion was concerned, the representative of Syria agreed with those speakers who had maintained that article 3 should not be changed either in substance or in form. It followed logically after articles 1 and 2 and it set forth the fundamental principles on which man's existence was based.

Mr. Kayaly was in complete agreement with the representatives of China and France: the text of article 3 was concerned with the human being and should be strictly limited to an enumeration of human rights. The legislation for the protection of the liberty and security of the individual was quite a different aspect of the problem. For the moment, the Committee's task was to define the fundamental rights of the individual. Consequently, the Syrian delegation felt that the USSR amendment was quite out of place in connexion with the article in question; moreover, it raised questions which were within the scope of the penal code. That amendment could be studied at a later stage and might, if necessary, form a separate recommendation.

The representative of Syria announced his intention of voting in favour of article 3 as it stood.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) said that he would vote for the first sentences of the amendment submitted by the USSR delegation, but would not vote on the last sentence.

He agreed with the Chinese representative that the Third Committee had not attached sufficient importance to the work so far accomplished by the authors of the draft declaration. Although the General Assembly was sovereign and in no way obliged to confirm drafts submitted to it, it was none the less true that the draft declaration of human rights had already been the subject of long and detailed study. Moreover, the composition of the Commission on Human Rights had taken into account the principle of geographical distribution; it was therefore probable that the text submitted to the Assembly already constituted a compromise, which it would be difficult to improve upon.

If a discussion on that text were prolonged indefinitely, each step would present new dangers, for it raised many problems, and it appeared that the stage where all controversies were insoluble or exhausted had already been reached. Some of those ideas had been debated throughout the whole course of human history.

In these circumstances it might be asked why the Belgian delegation was venturing along that road, and why it was declaring itself in favour of certain parts of the Soviet Union amendment. The reason was that, in its opinion, the wording of that amendment was better than that of article 3 as it stood at the moment. It gave a more factual character to that article and made explicit certain other points which were too vague; it brought out the important role which the State was bound to play in actually applying human rights.

It should be borne in mind that, when once the declaration was passed, it would be sent to the various States, and that the Governments would be [157] called upon to ensure its practical application. It was not clear what was the exact legal value of a declaration of that nature which, in its final form, would be a recommendation of the General Assembly. The Belgian declaration reserved the right to make a statement on that point at a suitable moment.

Mr. Dehousse said that he would not vote on the last sentence of the USSR proposal because the law of his country imposed the death penalty for certain categories of crime. Capital punishment was not inflicted for political offences or offences under the ordinary law of the land. War criminals and collaborators were, however, sometimes executed. Moreover, the text proposed by the USSR was vague on that point; if the letter of that text were to be applied, it would become impossible to shoot traitors in time of peace. His delegation would therefore abstain when the roll-call vote was taken.

Turning to the amendment submitted jointly by Uruguay, Cuba and Lebanon (A/C.3/274), he thought it contained valuable elements, such as the words "physical integrity". The expression "legal, economic and social security", however, was vague and ambiguous. It might in fact be asked whether that "social security" was equivalent to the "social security" which had a very definite legal sense in such countries as the United Kingdom and Belgium. A more precise terminology should therefore be adopted.

In conclusion, Mr. Dehousse asked that the amendment be voted on in parts.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) pointed out that any imperfection in the wording of his amendment was due to the fact that according to the rules of procedure, delegations who were neither French-speaking nor English-speaking were obliged to submit their amendments in a language which was not their own.

THE CHAIRMAN, replying to the Cuban representative, stressed the advantage of a rule providing for only two working languages in an organization which embraced so many countries speaking different languages.

MR. BEAUFORT (Netherlands) praised the effort made by the delegations of Uruguay, Cuba and Lebanon to find a wording which would be acceptable to all. He feared, however, that the result of that effort was not as happy as might have been wished. In all enumerations there were likely to be omissions, and that was the drawback of the amendment submitted by the three delegations.

In examining article 3 the Committee should not lose sight of the general structure of the declaration which it had been called upon to draw up. The Netherlands delegation had on the previous day (102nd meeting) supported the Cuban amendment because it thought that the principle of the physical integrity of the individual should be included in the declaration. If, however, as the Chinese representative had pointed out, it was understood that the individual's right to security meant the guarantee of his physical integrity, the Netherlands delegation would vote for article 3 in the form submitted by the Commission on Human Rights. [158]

As far as the USSR amendment was concerned, his delegation agreed in principle with the idea that the death penalty should be abolished in time of peace, it being understood that such a decision would not prevent its application in the case of war criminals and traitors convicted of acts committed during a war. It could not, however, vote in favour of the inclusion of that principle in article 3, for it thought that it had no place in a declaration of human rights. The principle should be reconsidered when a separate declaration of the rights and duties of the State – which his delegation considered necessary – was prepared.

MR. KURAL (Turkey), in explaining the position of his delegation, said it would vote against the second and third parts of the amendment submitted by the USSR because, while agreeing with them in substance, it believed that provisions such as those would be more appropriate in a declaration of the duties of the States than in a declaration of human rights. His delegation would vote against the fourth part of the amendment because it considered that it was not for the Committee to decide on the abolition of the death penalty, a highly controversial principle which a number of countries had not yet accepted. Finally, it would abstain in the vote on the first sentence of the USSR amendment because it preferred the fuller wording of the basic text of article 3.

MR. DEDIJER (Yugoslavia) said that the Committee's primary concern should be to draw up a truly useful document. To that end it was indispensable not only that it should discuss human rights theoretically, but that it should also take into account their practical application.

His delegation did not mean thereby that the Committee should interfere in the internal affairs of States or assume the role of an accuser. It recognized, on the contrary, that the declaration of human rights would be of a purely declaratory nature and the Governments would in no way be bound to apply it, although it would be desirable that they should. At the same time, however, the Committee must be wary of working in the abstract, lest the declaration which it was to draw up should fail to be an effective protection for all those whose rights were violated and whose security was threatened.

The text proposed for article 3 was too vague; the amendment submitted by the USSR delegation, and the Lebanese amendment to a lesser extent had the advantage of making it more precise.

He stressed the fact that the amendment submitted by the Soviet Union filled a real need. There were groups of people in the world whose personal security was constantly in danger. Thus, in the United States of America, the custom of lynching still prevailed; the President's Committee on Civil Rights set up by President Truman had acknowledged its evils in the report it published in 1947. By the exploitation of fear, lynching had in certain parts of the United States become an instrument of political discrimination. And yet, in spite of the efforts of numerous democratic organizations, the United States Congress had thus far refused on eight occasions to take measures to outlaw lynching.

Should the declaration of human rights fail to include provisions which would make such a state of affairs impossible in the future, it would be useless, and the Committee would have failed to fulfil its mission.

Those were the reasons why the Yugoslav delegation, having always taken an active part in the fight against discrimination, would vote for the USSR amendment.

MR. MAYHEW (United Kingdom) supported the statements of the French and Chinese representatives. While it duly appreciated the efforts of all the delegations which had submitted constructive suggestions and amendments, the United Kingdom delegation thought that the Third Committee should show greater respect for the draft prepared by the Commission on Human Rights.

With regard to the question of capital punishment, Mr. Mayhew wished to make it clear that a vote on the amendment submitted by the USSR could in no way be interpreted as a vote for or against the abolition of the death penalty.

To illustrate his point of view he recalled that in spite of the fact that the death penalty was applied in Czechoslovakia, the Czechoslovak delegation had stated that it would vote in favour of the USSR amendment. Similarly, countries which had abolished capital punishment were free to vote against the Soviet Union amendment if they felt that it was out of place in article 3.

Mr. Mayhew expressed the hope that the position of countries such as his, which had not abolished the death penalty, would be respected, and that they would not be forced to withhold their approval of the whole of the declaration.

He deplored the fact that the Third Committee was used by some delegations as a platform from which to make tendentious accusations for propaganda purposes against countries that did not share their ideology.

The representative of the USSR had attacked the United States of America on the question of lynching, and the Yugoslav representative had just done the same; he had attacked the United Kingdom on the question of the alleged exploitation of the populations of Non-Self-Governing Territories under its care. The United States delegation had confined itself to a brief and dignified reply; the United Kingdom delegation had preferred to make no reply. Both had hoped that their self-restraint would be rewarded; they had been mistaken.

He did not wish his silence to be mistaken for weakness or for inability to answer. The allegations of the representative of the Soviet Union were, however, easy to refute. To see that, it would be sufficient to refer to the information which the United Kingdom scrupulously supplied to the Division of Information from Non-Self-Governing Territories of the Secretariat, in accordance with the provisions of Article 73(e) of the Charter. It showed a constant decrease in the death rate in all the territories administered by the United Kingdom. Far from creating conditions which, as claimed by the USSR delegation, promoted hunger and death among the indigenous population, the activity of the United Kingdom expressed itself in the creation of conditions which compared favourably with those in other underdeveloped areas of the world. A comparison should be drawn between areas, whether autonomous or not, with the same degree of development, and not – as was insidiously done by the delegation of the Soviet Union when it contrasted India with the British Isles – between an underdeveloped area and one which, on the contrary, had reached a very high standard of living.

Not only did the United Kingdom delegation formally refute the allegations of the USSR representative, but it wished to state that it did not recognize his moral right to make such accusations against the United Kingdom. The Soviet Union claiming to be the only country qualified to speak on behalf of democracy, had erected within its borders a system which made slaves of millions of human beings. Such a phenomenon was unprecedented in all history.

Since 1930 the world had felt concern about the existence of forced labour in the USSR. But at the time it had been viewed as a normal phenomenon, the inevitable result of a vast social experiment. The Soviet Union had, for a long time, been accorded the benefit of the doubt, and even a certain amount of sympathy.

However, the war had taught the world a terrible lesson. The discovery of concentration camps in Nazi Germany had proved that it was possible for a totalitarian State to conceal its activities from its own population and even from its officials, and that once a State resorted to police methods it could no longer stop.

An ever-increasing amount of evidence had engendered doubts in the minds of those who were most ardently in favour of the Soviet regime. It showed that the statements which claimed the USSR to be the workers' paradise were nothing but shameful fraud. Mr. Mayhew recalled that as far back as 1931, Mr. Molotov had announced to the Sixth Congress of the Soviets that great public works would be undertaken with the help of "masses deprived of liberty"; and whereas the Soviet Union continued, on the one hand, to execute large-scale projects, it did not, on the other, grant any amnesty or liberate its prisoners. The most conservative estimate reached after a perusal of Soviet publications placed the number of prisoners in the USSR at 1,830,000; non-Soviet estimates placed that number at several million. Furthermore, tragic reports of the conditions prevailing in the detention camps of the Soviet Union came from prisoners who had escaped from those camps; such testimony was perhaps not to be accepted without a certain amount of scepticism, but it could not be discarded completely.

The anxiety of the free world was aroused; the free peoples of the world wished to have their questions answered. If there was nothing to hide, why did the USSR surround itself with so much secrecy? It was patent that the anxiety was justified, and that was why the United Kingdom could not allow Soviet propaganda to attack, as it was [161] doing, the freedom of democratic peoples and their way of life.

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) having asked for the closure of the debate, MR. KAMINSKY (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) drew attention to the fact that that was the second attempt to prevent the USSR delegation from answering the accusations made against its country.

Following a request for adjournment presented by MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) THE CHAIRMAN put that motion to the vote, in accordance with rule 108 of the rules of procedure.

The motion was adopted by 26 votes to 12, with 5 abstentions.

The meeting rose at 1:30 p.m.

A/C.3/274/Rev.1

16 October 1948

Original Text: French, English

Uruguay, Cuba, Lebanon: Joint Amendment to Article 3 of the Draft Declaration (E/800)

Replace this article by the following text:

“Everyone has the right to life, honour, liberty, physical integrity, to the security of his person and to the economic, social and other conditions necessary to the full development of the human personality.”

A/C.3/283

16 October 1948

Recapitulation of Amendments to Article 10 of the Draft Declaration (E/800)

(In the chronological order of their submission to the Committee)

Article 10 (Text adopted by the Commission on Human Rights)

No one shall be subjected to unreasonable interference with his privacy, family, home, correspondence or reputation.

Amendments:Lebanon (A/C.3/260)

Delete the word “unreasonable”.

New Zealand (A/C.3/267)

Substitute the word “arbitrary” for the word “unreasonable”.

Uruguay (A/C.3/268) (does not apply to the English text).

Panama

Add to this article the words: person, activities, and property, so that the article reads as follows:

“No one shall be subjected to unreasonable interference with his person, his home, his family, his privacy, his activities, his property, his correspondence or his reputation”.

A/C.3/287*16 October 1948*Recapitulation of Amendments to Article 14 of the Draft Declaration (E/800)

(In the chronological order of their submission
to the Committee)

Article 14 – Text adopted by the Commission on Human Rights.

1. Men and women of full age have the right to marry and to found a family and are entitled to equal rights as to marriage.
2. Marriage shall be entered into only with the full consent of both intending spouses.
3. The family is the natural and fundamental group unit of society and is entitled to protection.

Amendments:Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (E/800)

Paragraph 2. Add after the first sentence of the text as adopted:

“Men and women shall enjoy equal rights both during marriage and when divorced.”

Paragraph 3. At the end of the third paragraph add the words:

“by society and the State”.

Saudi Arabia (A/C.3/240)

It is proposed that paragraph 1 be modified in the following manner:

“Men and women of legal matrimonial age within every country have the right to marry and to found a family and are entitled to the full rights as defined in the marriage laws of their country”.

France (A/C.3/244)

Word paragraph 2 as follows:

“Marriage may be contracted only with the full consent of the intending spouses”.

(Note: There is no point in specifying “both” spouses.)

[2]

Lebanon (A/C.3/260)

Change the order of the paragraphs so that paragraph 3 becomes paragraph 1, paragraph 1 becomes paragraph 2, and paragraph 2 becomes paragraph 3.

In paragraph 2 in the original text, add the words: “free and” before the words: “full consent”.

Egypt (A/C.3/264)

Replace this article by the following text:

“Everyone has the right to found a family, which is a fundamental element of society, and is entitled to the protection of that family”.

Mexico (A/C.3/266)

Insert at the beginning of the text before “men and women” the following words:

“without any limitation due to race, nationality or religion”.

A/C.3/284/Rev.1<sup>41</sup>

16 October 1948

Recapitulation of Amendments to Article 11 of the draft Declaration (E/800)

(In the chronological order of their submission to the Committee)

Article 11

(Text adopted by the Commission on Human Rights)

1. Everyone has the right to freedom of movement and residence within the borders of each state.
2. Everyone has the right to leave any country, including his own.

Amendments:

Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (E/800)

- (a) Paragraph 1. After the words “residence within the borders of each State”, add “in accordance with the laws of that State”.
- (b) Paragraph 2. After the words “to leave any country, including his own”, add “in accordance with the procedure laid down in the laws of that country”.

Cuba (A/C.3/232)

Amend this article to read as follows

“Every person has the right to fix his residence within the territory of the State of which he is a national, to move about freely within such territory and not to leave it except by his own will”.

Lebanon (A/C.3/260)

In paragraph 2 add at the end the words: “and to return to his country”.

Egypt (A/C.3/264)

Replace this article by the following:

“Everyone has the right to establish his residence in the territory of the State of which he is a national, to have freedom of movement within it and to leave it only of his own accord”.

[2]

<sup>41</sup> A/C.3/284/Rev.1 was actually issued on 30 October 1948; this is the date of issuance of A/C.3/284. The revised document adds the Cuban proposal.

Panama (A/C.3/280)

Add to this article a paragraph reading as follows:

“This right is limited by the power of the State temporarily to compel a person to reside within certain limits as a penalty for a criminal offence, or to enforce writs of ne exeat regno lawfully issued by courts in civil jurisdiction.”

A/C.3/285/Rev.1<sup>42</sup>

16 October 1948

Recapitulation of Amendments to Article 12 of the Draft Declaration (E/800)

(In the chronological order of their submission to the Committee)

Article 12

(Text adopted by the Commission on Human Rights)

1. Everyone has the right to seek and be granted, in other countries, asylum from persecution.

2. Prosecutions genuinely arising from non-political crimes or from acts contrary to the purposes and principles of the United Nations do not constitute persecution.

Amendments:

Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (E/800)

Replace paragraph 1 by the following:

“The right of asylum is guaranteed to all persons persecuted in connexion with their activity in defence of the interests of democracy or for their scientific activity or for their participation in the struggle for national liberation.”

Bolivia (A/C.3/227)

Add to article 12, paragraph 1, a second sentence reading as follows: “This right shall extend to asylum in embassies or legations.”

Cuba (A/C.3/232)

Amend this article to read as follows:

“Every person has the right to seek and receive asylum in foreign territory, in case of persecution not resulting from common law crimes.”

<sup>42</sup> A/C.3/285/Rev.1 was issued on 30 October 1948; this is the date when A/C.3/285 was issued. The revised document adds the Cuban proposal.

Saudi Arabia (A/C.3/241)

Delete from paragraph 1 the words: “and be granted”.

France (A/C.3/244)

Add the following sentence:

[2]

“The United Nations, in concert with countries concerned, is required to secure such asylum for him.”

(Note: There is no point in proclaiming a right without at the same time stating whose duty it is to give effect to that right.)

United Kingdom (A/C.3/253)

Article 12 (1): Amend to read, “Everyone has the right to seek and to enjoy in other countries, asylum from persecution.”

Egypt (A/C.3/264)

At the end of paragraph 1 add the following words:

“in accordance with the rules of international law”.

New Zealand (A/C.3/267)

“Everyone is entitled to seek asylum from persecution.”

Uruguay (A/C.3/268)

Add the following sentence to paragraph 1:

“The right includes diplomatic asylum in embassies and legations.”

A/C.3/SR.104<sup>43</sup>

16 October 1948

Summary Record of the Hundred and Fourth Meeting
[of the Third Committee]

Held at the Palais de Chaillot, Paris, on Saturday, 16 October 1948,
at 10:45 a.m.

Chairman: Mr. Charles Malik (Lebanon).

<sup>43</sup> The text of the document is from Official Records of the General Assembly, Third Session, 1948, pp. 161–71.

26. Draft international declaration of Human rights (E/800) (continued)Article 3 (continued)

MR. DE ALBA (Mexico) recalled that at the previous meeting the Lebanese delegation had invited his own to associate itself with the joint amendment to article 3 submitted by the delegations of Cuba, Uruguay and Lebanon (A/C.3/274).

The Mexican delegation had no intention of insisting at any cost on its own amendment (A/C.3/266). It realized that it was perhaps too long and recognized that its central idea had been presented in a harmonious synthesis in the joint amendment. Mr. de Alba consequently accepted that joint amendment, at least as regards the substance, but he wished to make some reservations and clarifications.

The Mexican amendment mentioned the right to life, the right to a possibility to raise the standard of living, and economic and social rights.

Mr. de Alba admitted that by mentioning the right to life, the right to liberty and the right to physical integrity, the joint amendment included the essential points of the Mexican amendment. He therefore accepted it, on the understanding that it covered the right to work, the right to health and the right to education, to which the Mexican delegation attached particular importance.

With regard to the right to education, some representatives had pointed out that article 20 mentioned “cultural rights”. Mr. de Alba wished to stress that there was a difference between the “right to education” and the “cultural rights” mentioned in article 20. Culture was part of a country’s spiritual heritage; it was not learned, it was lived. Consequently, it differed from education, and that was why inclusion of the expression “cultural rights” – an expression which he criticized for its vagueness – should not prevent an explicit mention of the right to education.

[162]

Turning to the remarks made by the representative of Uruguay, Mr. de Alba thought it pointless to mention the right to honour. The concept of honour was indeed too general and its interpretation depended on emotional factors which varied with the individual. Furthermore, article 1 of the declaration mentioned human dignity, which, according to Mr. de Alba, covered the concept of honour.

Among those who had expressed their views on the joint amendment, the representative of China had pointed out (103rd meeting) that the greater part of the ideas in that amendment were already stated in the draft declaration; the amendment seemed to him, for that reason, to be superfluous. Mr. de Alba could not agree with that, for on the one hand, the amendment reinforced the provisions of article 3, and on the other, it spoke of the social rights which, in his opinion, it was indispensable to mention at the beginning of the declaration.

Mr. de Alba emphasized that the various observations submitted by Mexico or by other delegations in no way constituted a systematic criticism of the draft declaration. They were motivated by a sincere and fervent desire to improve the draft which, in his opinion, was neither sufficiently specific nor sufficiently complete. It must not be forgotten that the declaration was intended primarily for the common man and for that reason it was important that it should be as clear as possible. That was the spirit in which the observations of the various delegations should be viewed.

Mr. de Alba paid tribute to the tremendous work done by the Commission on Human Rights. Nevertheless, that Commission included only a minority of Member States. It was therefore both logical and just that the States which had not taken part in its work should be allowed to present their observations concerning the draft declaration which it had drawn up.

Mr. de Alba then considered the amendments submitted by Panama (A/C.3/220) and the USSR (A/C.3/265) respectively.

He thought that the former was perfectly reasonable but out of place in article 3.

The same could be said of the USSR amendment. No one could question its merit with regard to substance, for it set forth indisputable moral injunctions. Moreover, whatever the observations and criticisms it had aroused, all the delegations had unanimously accorded its content their unreserved approval. But as it mentioned not only the rights of individuals but also the duties of States it would be much better to include it in a different article or to make it the subject of a separate article.

The Mexican delegation had agreed to support the joint amendment which, as a matter of fact, took into account the main point of the USSR amendment – because it considered that representatives with the most divergent views could agree on lofty and high-minded principles, if they were presented with tact and in a conciliatory manner.

In that connexion, Mr. de Alba said that the tone of the discussions in the previous few days [163] had been regrettable. In the last few meetings the debate had in fact been in the main confined to a verbal duel between the representatives of the major Powers, with representatives of countries of lesser importance attending in the role of worried and helpless spectators.

The major powers should, he thought, take into account the views of the countries of lesser importance and not restrict them to the role of passive spectators of their disputes. The small and middle States had sufficient information and judgment to be able to discriminate between truth and propaganda in the speeches which had been made.

No State was perfect and each lent itself to a certain measure of criticism. That was why it was necessary to try to be indulgent and understanding. History offered striking examples of the excellent results that could be obtained by a spirit of conciliation. When President Roosevelt had re-established diplomatic relations with the USSR, he had emphasized that totally different ideologies could continue to exist side by side if each party respected the opinions of the other and did not try to advocate or impose its own.

In spite of divergences of ideas, the Allies had achieved close collaboration which made victory possible. It was that collaboration which had made it possible to draw up the Charter at San Francisco; if the labours of the Third Committee were to be crowned with success, such collaboration should govern the study of the declaration of human rights.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) stated that he had followed with great interest the discussion which had arisen in connexion with the amendment presented by his delegation jointly with the delegations of Uruguay and Lebanon (A/C.3/274).

He expressed particular appreciation to the representative of China, who had been the first to give the Committee a clear explanation of the mention which the Commission on Human Rights had had in preparing the draft declaration.

Referring to the arguments of the representative of Panama, he recognized the validity of some of Mr. de León's views, particularly with regard to the necessity of including the idea of honour in the declaration. He feared, however, that the formula which had been suggested might give rise to misinterpretation because honour could not really be considered as a right: honour was an inalienable attribute of the individual and the most that could be said was that society should devote its every effort to the protection of so valuable a possession.

Mr. Pérez Cisneros recalled that the Cuban delegation had already proposed the inclusion of the idea of honour in article 10 of the declaration and that it had submitted the following amendment in that connexion (A/C.3/232).

“Every person has a right to the protection of the law against abusive attacks upon his honour and reputation and against unreasonable interference with his family and private life.”

Those provisions could be given the importance which Mr. de León rightfully attributed to them by changing the position of article 10 and putting it back in the first part of the declaration.

[164]

If, as certain delegations had requested, the addition of the principle of honour were put to a separate vote, the Cuban delegation would vote for the inclusion of that principle. He would prefer, however, to have the Committee defer discussion of the matter until a vote had been taken on the amendment to article 10 proposed by his delegation. He had no doubt that the proposal would then receive unanimous approval.

He agreed with the representative of Mexico in refusing to recognize the draft declaration submitted by the Commission on Human Rights as a final text. That document was, indeed, the work of a minority of the Members of the United Nations. He recognized the praiseworthy efforts and the care which had been devoted to the draft. He recalled, however, that the experience of Dumbarton Oaks and Yalta had shown the unfortunate consequences which might result from decisions taken without the collaboration of the majority. The veto was a conclusive example.

Analysing the terms of article 3, Mr. Pérez Cisneros stated that he was not in agreement with certain representatives who felt that the idea of “physical integrity” of the individual was included in the words “security of person” which appeared in that article. The idea of physical integrity should be clearly expressed and the Cuban delegation requested a separate vote on its insertion.

With regard to juridical, economic and social rights, he recalled that his country had consistently supported the efforts of members of the Commission who had wished to include in the document the essential principles of the first declaration of the rights of man in 1789. He wholly approved the section devoted to those principles in the first article of the draft. But it must be borne in mind that man was no longer living in the eighteenth century. The twentieth century had witnessed the development of a new concept of liberty which it was important to clarify in the declaration.

The Charter clearly indicated the intentions of its authors: paragraph 2 of Article 62 authorized the Economic and Social Council to “make recommendations for the purpose of promoting respect for, and observance of, human rights and fundamental freedoms for all”. Mr. Pérez Cisneros recalled that at San Francisco there had been agreement among the representatives that the adoption of the words “fundamental freedoms” was a tribute to President Roosevelt who had been the first to proclaim the four new freedoms: freedom of speech and expression, freedom of worship, freedom from want and freedom from fear. Those four freedoms were characteristic of the thought of the twentieth century. They should be inscribed on the frontispiece of the document which was being studied by the Third Committee.

Mr. Pérez Cisneros believed that the joint amendment applied to those four fundamental freedoms. His insistence on the need for adopting that amendment could be ascribed to the fact that he hoped that the new declaration of human rights would not be a slavish repetition of the 1789 declaration but would present a statement of the most lofty ideals of the current century.

He then commented that while economic and social rights were mentioned in the draft declara-[165]tion, they did not appear in the first articles of that document. Those rights should appear in their appropriate place; the Cuban people had struggled to secure recognition of their economic and social rights and would be greatly disappointed if such were not the case.

He concurred in the Mexican delegation's forceful appeal that the representatives of the small powers in the Third Committee should not have to witness a duel between the major Powers. The Third Committee was not a political committee. Any direct reference to the internal conditions of a country was not in order; criticism should be kept on a general plane. The Committee should not lose sight of its essential function, which was to improve living conditions throughout the world.

MR. KAMINSKY (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) observed that for several days the amendment submitted by the USSR delegation had been the focal point of the Third Committee's discussions.

In the opinion of the delegation of the Byelorussian SSR, that amendment had the great merit of eliminating all the different interpretations which might arise from article 3 in its existing form. The Soviet Union amendment stated the fundamental principle of the right to life and defined its application in the practical field while the basic draft was devoid of any realistic character.

While expressing approval of the substance of that amendment, however, several delegations stated that it was unacceptable. The principal basis for their rejection of the amendment was that a statement of the duties of the State was inappropriate in article 3. In the opinion of Mr. Kaminsky, that objection was founded on a negative philosophy. In fact, those delegations were objecting to the drafting of an article which would be realistic, concrete and readily comprehensible to the great masses of humanity.

Other delegations based their objections on considerations of form and stated that the principles contained in the USSR amendment appeared in other articles of the draft declaration. That argument was not convincing. Modification of article 3 in accordance with the Soviet Union proposal would give concrete expression to the ideal embodied in the Charter of the United Nations. Without interfering with national sovereignty it would show States the road they should follow in order to attain that ideal. It would fulfil the hopes of the great masses of men throughout the world.

The previous day the representative of Uruguay had stated that the definition of the idea of the right to life, as given by the USSR delegation, corresponded more closely to the ideas of the eighteenth century than to those of the twentieth. Mr. Kaminsky, on the contrary, felt that its realistic character was incontestable, considering the conditions which still prevailed in the world, not only in certain capitalist countries but particularly in colonial territories.

In connexion with article 3 of the draft declaration of human rights, the Byelorussian delegation did not consider it inappropriate to raise the [166] question of colonial regimes and of the abuses to which they gave rise. The United Kingdom representative's statements regarding living conditions in Non-Self-Governing Territories administered by his Government did not bear criticism. As proof, it was sufficient to think of Polynesia or India. The Soviet Union amendment took actual realities into consideration and was therefore particularly useful.

With regard to the abolition of the death penalty in time of peace, the USSR proposal was perfectly acceptable to all countries which had already embodied that principle in their constitutions. For other countries, it seemed difficult to raise serious objections to the insertion in the declaration of human rights of a principle which was in complete harmony with the spirit of the Charter of the United Nations especially since, as had been emphasized on several occasions, that declaration would have no immediate legally binding effect.

Finally certain delegations, which felt that the Soviet Union proposal did not go far enough, wished to have the principle of the abolition of the death penalty in time of war as well as in time of peace accepted. Mr. Kaminsky believed that no country which had suffered aggression and occupation could accept that point of view. Had the world already forgotten the crimes against humanity committed by the fascists?

In that connexion, Mr. Kaminsky regretted to note that there was growing disinterest in the struggle against fascism. An example was the fact that the world did not rise up in indignation when certain statesmen tried to re-establish relations with Franco Spain. Mr. Kaminsky strongly denounced the attitude of those who, wittingly or unwittingly, were the pawns of fascist forces. By accepting the principle of the abolition of the death penalty in time of war, as certain delegations wished, the declaration of human rights would guarantee the defence of war criminals. That was inadmissible.

The USSR proposal took all those matters into consideration, and the delegation of the Byelorussian SSR therefore expressed unqualified approval of it.

Mr. Kaminsky then stated that it was both his duty and his right to answer the statements made by the United Kingdom representative at the previous meeting. Mr. Mayhew, ostensibly commenting on the Soviet Union amendment, had indulged in slanderous attacks against the Soviet people. Such an attitude was not to be tolerated. In exposing the abuses of the colonial system, the USSR was only carrying out the duty incumbent on all Members of the United Nations under the Charter to ensure the defence of the oppressed peoples of the colonial territories. The United Kingdom could not deny the Soviet Union that moral right. The USSR, however, was unjustified in denying Mr. Mayhew the moral right to defend the injustices perpetrated against the colonial peoples.

The United Kingdom delegation, which perhaps had reasons to be dissatisfied with the attitude of the Soviet Union delegation, was attempting by every possible means to compromise the position taken up by the latter. Mr. Mayhew maintained that he based his information on reliable sources, whereas, in point of fact, he drew [167] only on one source, the value of which was well known. Mr. Mayhew pretended to defend the workers of the world, and yet he did not hesitate to slander the USSR, which had created the first truly socialist country, and to discredit its 200 million citizens.

It was not the first time that the Soviet Union had been accused of enslaving a whole section of its population. During the period of crisis after 1930, the same argument had been used in order to distract the attention of the working masses of the capitalist world from the deplorable living conditions to which they had been reduced. As in 1930, that attempt was again doomed to failure.

MR. PLAZA (Venezuela) stated that, since the USSR delegation had requested that its amendment be put to the vote in parts and by roll-call, he would define his delegation's position with regard to the various parts of that amendment.

The Venezuelan delegation would vote in favour of the first sentence, which agreed with the original text. In his opinion, as he had stated (98th meeting) when article 1 was discussed, the right to life and, consequently, all the measures tending to protect it, originated at the moment of the conception of the human being.

The Venezuelan delegation would vote against the second and third sentences of the USSR amendment, although it was not opposed to the substance of its provisions. It had at first considered it important that the corresponding duties of the State with regard to each right should be set forth in the declaration, but had since been convinced of the soundness of proposals to limit the draft to a mere statement of the rights of the individual. If the Committee were to adopt the USSR proposal, it would compromise, or at least, delay, the adoption of the document as a whole.

The Venezuelan delegation had always been in favour of conciliation. Such an attitude of cooperation, in the best and most constructive sense of the word, implied certain sacrifices but was in keeping with the spirit of the United Nations Charter.

Venezuela would have voted in favour of the fourth part of the amendment dealing with the abolition of the death penalty in time of peace, if the USSR proposal had envisaged the complete abolition of the death penalty. The amendment, however, seemed implicitly to recognize the right to exercise the death penalty in wartime and was therefore incompatible with the principles of the Venezuelan Constitution.

Summing up his delegation's position, Mr. Plaza stated that he would continue to maintain the attitude he had held up till then, and would vote in favour of article 3 and of the joint amendment.

MR. ALVARADO (Peru) said that the amendment presented by the USSR delegation was inspired by legal principles similar to those on which the Peruvian Constitution was based. His country's legislation did not, in fact, prescribe the death penalty for crimes under civil or penal law. The Peruvian delegation was favourable to the substance of the Soviet Union amendment, but [168] would abstain from voting in order not to undermine the agreement reached by members of the Committee. It hoped nevertheless that the principle of the abolition of capital punishment, which was in keeping with the humanitarian and Christian traditions of his country, would be adopted by the United Nations and universally applied.

The Peruvian delegation would vote in favour of the first part of the USSR amendment and would abstain on the last sentence.

It would vote for the joint amendment.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) pointed out first of all that the amendment submitted by his delegation (A/C.3/279) to the Soviet Union amendment did not concern article 3. He reserved the right to submit it at the appropriate time.

Turning next to the remarks to which the draft amendment to article 3, submitted jointly by the delegations of Uruguay, Cuba and Lebanon (A/C.3/274), had given rise, Mr. Azkoul expressed his thanks to the Mexican delegation for the understanding it had shown. It was in the same spirit that the Lebanese delegation, wishing to take into account all the remarks made, had decided to modify the wording of that amendment.

In his study of the general structure of the declaration, the representative of China had explained the significance of article 3. According to him, the article had a general significance and formed the basis for the nine articles following it. That explanation might be satisfactory, but article 3 could be understood differently. It could be conceived as the basis, not only of the nine articles which followed, but of all the articles of the declaration. Article 3 was fundamental, and therefore should be complete. It dealt with human freedom. Since the eighteenth century however the idea of freedom had become much broader. The theoretical idea of liberty had evolved into the guarantee of certain rights and, in particular, of social rights. In modern times, the fundamental right was the right of the individual fully to develop his personality, which implied the right to all the factors essential to that development.

Taking into account all those considerations as well as certain criticisms of style made by the representative of Belgium, Mr. Azkoul submitted a new text, (A/C.3/274/Rev.1), reading as follows:

“Everyone has the right to life, honour, liberty, physical integrity, security of person and to the economic, social and other conditions necessary to the full development of the human personality.”

MRS. LIONAES (Norway), discussing the amendment proposed by the USSR delegation, said she was in agreement on the substance of the last part of that amendment. As certain other delegations had already pointed out, however, she considered that the amendment was out of place in article 3. For that reason, her delegation would abstain from voting and would declare itself in favour of article 3 as set forth in the draft declaration.

Mrs. Lionaes earnestly requested the members of the various delegations to confine themselves [169] to studying the articles of the declaration and to refrain from political discussion which would be more appropriate in the First Committee.

MR. CARRERA ANDRADE (Ecuador) recalled that the legislation of Ecuador provided for unconditional abolition of the death penalty. The results of that abolition had been successful: respect for the lives of others had grown among the people and the incidence of crime had disappeared. It had thus been shown that benevolent legislation inspired the individual with generous and peaceful sentiments.

The representative of Ecuador thought the last sentence of the USSR amendment was out of place in article 3. Although he was in agreement with the substance of the amendment, he reserved the right to support the insertion of abolition of the death penalty in another article of the draft declaration.

The first part of the amendment appeared to him irrelevant. To stipulate the rights of the State in a declaration such as the one which was being drafted, would be to introduce the concept of a State guardian of the people, which would, by trespassing on the domain of social doctrine, go beyond a mere statement of human rights.

He was in favour of the original text and approved the joint amendment of Uruguay, Cuba and Lebanon, which was in keeping with the spirit of the draft declaration of human rights as a whole, and therefore deserved the Committee's approval.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) pointed out that the amendment submitted by his delegation to article 3 of the draft declaration, had given rise to some interesting statements; several of the ideas expressed offered a constructive contribution and should be retained.

Before considering the reasons which had been given by the different delegations to explain their attitude to the USSR amendment, Mr. Pavlov wished to dwell on the statements made by Mr. Mayhew, the United Kingdom representative at the previous meeting. It should not be thought that his country could be attacked with impunity. Mr. Mayhew had been the first to launch the "cold war" which was being conducted against his country in the Third Committee. That attitude did not help the Committee's work.

The Committee had already discussed the possibility of criticizing practices which were contrary to the principles of the United Nations Charter. The USSR delegation thought that criticisms could be considered as well founded if they were honest, that was, if they had a credible basis, if they concerned the subject under discussion and if they rested on the principles of the Charter. Mr. Mayhew's criticisms however, did not satisfy any of those conditions.

In particular, Mr. Mayhew had stated that the Soviet peoples did not in fact enjoy the guarantees laid down in their Constitution. He had not supplied any proof to bear out his statement. His words bore an amazing similarity to the attacks against the USSR Constitution published by a [170] German newspaper in 1936, under the signature of Goebbels. It was indeed strange to hear the words of a Nazi from the lips of a British Socialist.

The 200 million people who lived in the Soviet Union bore witness that the USSR Constitution had not been merely an empty promise. Their achievements and their victorious battle against the invader which had led them as far as Berlin, were living proof of their unity and solidarity.

Mr. Mayhew had quoted from the evidence of émigrés, of refugees, of those whom in his country they called “those who refuse to return”: it was no more possible to form any judgment from such evidence than it was possible in the eighteenth century to judge the French Revolution by the statements of the aristocrats who had fled from France. The people mentioned by Mr. Mayhew had in fact left their country precisely to escape the provisions of that Constitution, which some of them would like to believe ineffective. It was because they hated the new regime, which did not allow the exploitation of man by man, that they had fled. Or else they were traitors and war criminals who were escaping from their country’s law.

In his statement Mr. Mayhew had exhibited complete ignorance of the real conditions that existed in the USSR. He had chosen to ignore the unanimity of interests and the political and moral unanimity which bound the Soviet people together. He had expressed surprise that the Soviet people did not criticize their leaders; should they criticize those who had led them to victory, and who, after the victory, had ensured their progress and wellbeing?

He said it was not true that the general collectivization carried out in 1930 had caused the death of millions of peasants; on the contrary, a comparison of the years 1928 and 1945 would show that the number of hectares cultivated had risen from 130 million to 185 million, that harvests and livestock had increased in the same proportions, and that the rural population had increased from 121 million to 140 million, the total population of the country being nearly 200 million. Those figures did not conjure up a picture of famine and death.

With regard to the accusation of slavery brought against the Soviet Union, he pointed out that from all evidence it seemed that Mr. Mayhew had taken his information chiefly from a book called Forced Labour in Soviet Russia, by Boris Nicolaevsky and David J. Dallin,<sup>44</sup> whom Mr. Pavlov regarded as traitors to their country.

When the United Kingdom representative quoted from official sources, he did so in such a manner that the information he communicated was completely tendentious. Thus the words attributed to Mr. Molotov took on a different meaning when they were taken out of their context.

<sup>44</sup> David J. Dallin and Boris I. Nicolaevsky, Forced Labour in Soviet Russia, London: Hollis & Carter, 1948.

At the beginning of the speech quoted by Mr. Mayhew (of which Mr. Pavlov in turn read some extracts) Mr. Molotov had stressed above all the principle of the liberation of the worker from the capitalist yoke. He then explained the methods used in labour camps, the aim of which was to allow the prisoners to regain their dignity through work and to become useful members of society. Finally he mentioned the conditions prevailing in those camps, which the thousands of unemployed in the capitalist countries might envy.

If the picture which the United Kingdom representative had painted of the USSR corresponded to the truth, would it not be reasonable to think that a people, subjected to such living conditions, would seize the first opportunity which presented itself, to turn against their Government and to rid themselves of a regime which they ought to abhor? And yet, the war, which had offered that opportunity to the Soviet peoples, had on the contrary consolidated their unity. The proof had been conclusive.

It was only because they were blessed with such a Constitution that the people of the Soviet Union had survived. Their victory was the best argument that could be put forward against the statements made by the United Kingdom representative.

The latter had, apparently, wished to turn the Committee's attention from the USSR amendment by an unjustifiable digression. The majority of the delegations had found that amendment acceptable, as far as its substance was concerned, though they thought that it had no place in article 3. The delegation of the Soviet Union thought, however, that that article, which laid down the principle of the individual's right to life, should take into account the necessity of abolishing the death penalty in time of peace, for, while the death penalty existed, the right to life was not absolute.

The Committee had not been asked to draft a penal code, but to formulate a recommendation for the General Assembly. It was not a question of violating the sovereign rights of States, which were free to modify their penal code or not, but of expressing the general feeling of the Assembly of the United Nations on as important a question as that of the death penalty.

In view of those considerations, the vote which would be taken on that proposal would, in the opinion of the USSR delegation, be of historic significance. The roll-call would show which of the countries had reached a sufficiently advanced stage of maturity to approve the abolition of the death penalty.

Mr. Pavlov reminded representatives that they were responsible, not only to their own peoples, but to all the peoples of the world who placed their confidence in them, and he urged them to vote in favour of his amendment.

MR. SAINT-LOT (Haiti) moved that the debate on article 3 should be closed.

The meeting rose at 1:30 p.m.

A/C.3/281*18 October 1948*Sweden: Proposal

1. In accordance with Rule 103 of the Rules of Procedure, the Committee fixes the following time limit on speeches during the further consideration of the International Declaration of Human Rights:
  - (a) Original speeches shall not exceed ten minutes;
  - (b) Second speeches shall not exceed five minutes.
2. Acting under authority of Rule 104 of the Rules of Procedure, the Chairman, with the consent of the Committee, shall declare the list of speakers closed at the end of one hour's debate on each Article. This is subject to the Chairman's authority under this Rule to accord the right of reply to any member if a speech delivered after he has declared the list closed makes this desirable.

A/C.3/282*18 October 1948*Original Text: French*Belgium: Proposal to Modify the Text of the Joint Amendment to Article 3 (A/C.3/274/Rev.1)

“Everyone has the right to life, liberty, and respect of the physical and moral integrity of his person.”

A/C.3/286/Rev.1<sup>45</sup>*18 October 1948*Recapitulation of Amendments to Article 13 of the Draft Declaration (E/800)

(In the chronological order of their submission to the Committee)

Article 13* – Text adopted by the Commission on Human Rights:

No one shall be arbitrarily deprived of his nationality or denied the right to change his nationality.

<sup>45</sup> A/C.3/286/Rev.1 was issued on 30 October 1948; this is the date of issuance of A/C.3/286. The revised document contains the Cuban proposal.

Amendments:Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (E/800)

The following wording is proposed:

“No one shall be arbitrarily deprived of his nationality, i.e. in any other manner or in any other case than is provided for in the laws of the country concerned.”

Cuba (A/C.3/232)

Amend to read as follows:

“Every person has a right to the nationality to which he is entitled by law and the right to change it, if he so wishes, for the nationality of any other country that is willing to grant it to him.”

France (A/C.3/244)

(a) Begin with a new paragraph 1 worded as follows:

“Every human being has the right to a nationality.”

(b) The present paragraph 1 should become paragraph 2.

(c) Add a new paragraph 3 worded as follows:

“It is the duty of the United Nations to approach states for the purpose of preventing statelessness and, where necessary, to concern itself with the fate of stateless persons.”

Lebanon (A/C.3/260)

At the beginning of the article add the words: “Everyone has the right to a nationality.”

[2]

Egypt (A/C.3/264)

Replace this article by the following:

“Everyone has the right to the nationality which legally belongs to him and has the right to acquire, if he so desires, the nationality of a country which is willing to grant it to him.”

Alternative

Replace the words “or denied the right to change his nationality” by the words: “denied the right to acquire a nationality.”

Uruguay (A/C.3/268)

Amend to read as follows:

“1. Everyone has the right to a nationality.”

2. (The present text of article 13 with the word “unjustly” substituted for “arbitrarily”.)

A/C.3/288/Rev.1<sup>46</sup>

18 October 1948

Recapitulation of Amendments to Article 14 of the Draft Declaration (E/800)

(In the chronological order of their submission to the Committee)

Article 15 – Text adopted by the Commission on Human Rights

1. Everyone has the right to own property alone as well as in association with others.
2. No one shall be arbitrarily deprived of his property.

Amendments:

Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (E/800)

Replace the text as adopted by:

“1. Everyone has the right to own property alone as well as in association with others in accordance with the laws of the country where such property is situated.

“2. No one shall be arbitrarily deprived of his property, i.e. illegally, deprived of his property.”

Cuba (A/C.3/232)

Amend to read as follows:

“Every person has the right to own such property, alone as well as in association with others, as meets the essential needs of decent living and helps to maintain the dignity of the individual and of the home”.

“Every person has the right to legal protection against arbitrary confiscation of his property”.

Chile (A/C. 3/249)

Replace article 15 by article 14 of the text adopted by the drafting Committee of the Commission on Human Rights to read as follows:

“Everyone has the right to own such property as meets the essential needs of decent living, that helps to maintain the dignity of the individual and of the home, and shall not be arbitrarily deprived of it.

Uruguay (A/C.3/268)

(does not apply to the English text)

[2]

Panama (A/C.3/280)

Add to paragraph 1 the words in accordance with general law, so that paragraph 1 read as follows:

“Everyone has the right to own property, alone as well as in association with others, in accordance with general law.”

<sup>46</sup> A/C.3/288/Rev. 1 was issued on 30 October 1948; this is the date of issuance of A/C.3/288. The revised document contains the proposals of Cuba, Chile and Panama.

A/C.3/289/Rev.1<sup>47</sup>
18 October 1948

Recapitulation of Amendments to Article 16
of the Draft Declaration (E/800)
(In the chronological order of their submission
to the Committee)

Article 16

(Text adopted by the Commission on Human Rights)

Everyone has the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion; this right includes freedom to change his religion or belief, and freedom, either alone or in community with others and in public or private, to manifest his religion or belief in teaching, practice, worship and observance.

Amendments:

Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (E/800)

Replace the text as adopted by the following:

“Everyone must be guaranteed freedom of thought and freedom to perform religious services in accordance with the laws of the country concerned and the requirements of public morality.”

Peru (A/C.3/225)

Delete article 16 and replace it by the following text:

“Every person has the right freely to profess a religious faith, and to express it in thought and in practice, both in public as well as in private.”

Cuba (A/C.3/232)

Amend to read as follows:

“Every person has the right freely to profess a religious or philosophical belief. This right includes. . .”

Saudi Arabia (A/C.3/247)

Delete the second part of this article, which begins with the words:

<sup>47</sup> A/C.3/289/Rev.1 was issued on 30 October 1948; this is the date of issuance of A/C.3/289. In the earlier version, the Cuban text is A/C.3/224, reading: “place the text replacing article 5 before this article.” In addition, the word “the” precedes “individuals” in the Swedish proposal.

“this right includes” etc., retaining only the first part which reads:
 “Everyone has the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion”.

[2]

Sweden (A/C.3/252)

In order to protect individuals who have religious beliefs different from historically acknowledged religion, or who have no religious belief whatever, against manifestation of religious fanaticism, it is proposed that the following words be added to the end of this article after “. . . worship and observance”:

“provided that this does not interfere unduly with the personal liberty of anybody else.”

A/C.3/SR.105<sup>48</sup>

18 October 1948

Summary Record of the Hundred and Fifth Meeting
[of the Third Committee]

Held at the Palais de Chaillot Paris, on Monday,
 18 October 1948, at 10:30 p.m.

Chairman: MR. CHARLES MALIK (Lebanon).

27. Draft international declaration of human rights (E/800) (continued)

Article 3

MR. SAINT-LOT (Haiti), replying to a question by the Chairman, said that he wished to renew [172] the motion for closure of the debate on article 3, which he had made at the previous meeting. If that motion were not adopted, he reserved the right to speak in the ensuing debate.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) was opposed to the closure of the debate. He suggested, as a compromise measure, that the list of speakers on article 3 should be closed and that a time limit should be set for speeches on the rest of the articles.

MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) was also opposed to the closure as some representatives had not yet had a chance to speak on article 3. He hoped that, in future, representatives would limit their speeches to really relevant matters and would not raise controversial issues, which were outside the scope of the declaration.

<sup>48</sup> The text of the document is from Official Records of the General Assembly, Third Session, 1948, pp. 171–80.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the motion for closure of the debate.

The motion was rejected by 18 votes to 9, with 11 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN referred to rule 104 of the rules of procedure and, with the consent of the Committee, declared the list of speakers on article 3 closed.

MR. SAINT-LOT (Haiti) agreed with those representatives who thought that the original draft of article 3 was incomplete.

He referred to Article 62, paragraph 2 of the Charter and said that the declaration should take into account new elements which had been brought into the traditional concept of human rights. He felt that some attempt should have been made to include in article 3 the four freedoms formulated by President Franklin D. Roosevelt. In his opinion the basic draft of article 3 was too vague, as it contained no mention of freedom from want or of freedom from fear. He therefore supported the first three sentences of the USSR amendment (A/C.3/265) which would fill that gap satisfactorily. The last sentence of that amendment, providing for the abolition of the death penalty in time of peace, was, in his opinion, too controversial for inclusion in a declaration, the aim of which was to set forth generally accepted principles which would be universally applied.

He thought that the draft prepared by the Commission on Human Rights had been too greatly influenced by the individualism of Jean-Jacques Rousseau. The doctrine of individualism carried to excess had brought about the reaction of totalitarianism, and an attempt should be made to avoid either extreme.

MISS BERNARDINO (Dominican Republic), referring to the discussion at the previous meeting, appealed to representatives not to bring national prejudices into the debate. It was too much to hope that a committee, composed of representatives of fifty-eight countries, would be able to reach unanimity on every issue, but an attempt should be made to reach unanimity on the main issues, which were vital to world peace. She emphasized the importance of the draft declaration and the hope that was placed in it by the peoples of the world. She felt sure that the women who were participating in the work on an equal foot-[173]ing with men would make a great contribution towards the completion of the task.

She was in favour of the provisions contained in the USSR amendment and would be able to support the clause concerning the abolition of the death penalty in time of peace as it had already been abolished in her country. She also supported the joint amendment submitted by the delegations of Uruguay, Cuba, and Lebanon (A/C.3/274/Rev.1) as she felt it would strengthen and clarify the article.

MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) replied to the arguments that had been raised against the inclusion of the word "honour" in the joint amendment. It had been said that honour was not in itself a right, but he maintained that life was not a right either. What was meant was that man had a right to the protection of his life and to the protection of his honour. It had also been said that it was unnecessary to mention honour specifically as it was included in the general statement of article 1 that "all human beings are born free and equal in dignity and rights". In his opinion, that statement was not sufficient and the right to the protection of honour should be specifically mentioned. Such mention would be particularly welcomed by Jews and by all who had suffered indignities at the hands of the Nazis.

In reply to those representatives who wished the declaration to be simple and clear, he said that it should also be complete and precise.

With regard to the USSR amendment (A/C.3/265), he stated that his delegation would vote in favour of the inclusion of a clause recommending the abolition of the death penalty in article 9, but it did not feel that such a recommendation was appropriate in article 3.

The representative of the Byelorussian SSR had rightly stated that Uruguay had had no experience of war crimes. His country's good fortune in that respect was due to its remoteness and to the fact that it had never attempted to seize any territory belonging to another country. It was understandable that people should be swayed by passion in time of war, but he appealed to representatives to approach the debate in a dispassionate manner.

COUNT CARTON DE WIART (Belgium) observed that the discussion seemed to be becoming polemical. He supported the theory that peoples, like individuals, were capable of perfection but he mentioned an old Chinese proverb to the effect that people should recognize their own faults before looking for those of others.

In his opinion, the concise wording of the basic draft of article 3 should be retained. Article 2 had already been overloaded and article 3 should be preserved from the same fate.

He referred to the speech made by the representative of Greece suggesting that the right to life should be omitted from article 3, as it was self-evident (102nd meeting). He felt, on the contrary, that it was more than ever necessary to affirm the right to life, as that right had been so gravely violated by the Nazis.

[174]

With regard to the last part of the Mexican amendment (A/C.3/266), which spoke of securing the full development of the human being, he agreed with the representative of Haiti that excessive individualism was to be avoided as it had caused much trouble in the past. He was therefore opposed to the Mexican amendment.

With regard to the USSR amendment (A/C.3/265), he felt that mention of the duties of the State would be out of place in article 3. It was not only the State which had duties; each individual also had a duty towards his neighbour. He thought that the clause concerning the death penalty would be more appropriately discussed in connexion with article 4. He would abstain from voting on the subject as the death penalty was still a controversial issue in his country. It was retained in the penal code but had only been applied twice in recent history. The USSR amendment referred to the abolition of the death penalty in peacetime but it did not take into account the fact that it would have to be applied in time of peace to deal with war crimes.

In connexion with the joint amendment (A/C.3/274/Rev.1), he thought that the word “honour” should not be included as it was not an inherent right but was dependent on the behaviour of each individual. He agreed, however, with the idea which had prompted the representative of Uruguay to suggest the inclusion of the word “honour”. In order to retain that idea without using that word, he proposed that the text of the joint amendment should be modified to read (A/C.3/282):

“Everyone has the right to life, liberty, and respect of the physical and moral integrity of his person.”

MR. ANZE MATIENZO (Bolivia) said that he still thought that a small, flexible drafting subcommittee would be useful. He had received instructions from his Government to retain the original text of the draft declaration as far as possible, subject to any improvements which might be suggested in the course of the discussion. The joint amendment had introduced useful new matter, but he feared that a list such as was proposed therein might be extended indefinitely. Were it not for that objection, he would have been prepared to support it.

With regard to the USSR amendment (A/C.3/265), he pointed out that the death penalty had not been applied for many years in his country, although it existed in Bolivian law. By abstaining from voting he did not wish to appear to approve the death penalty, but he considered that mention of it was out of place in the article under consideration. The whole question was extremely controversial and, therefore, inappropriate.

The USSR proposal that the vote should be taken by roll-call also seemed inopportune. In the circumstances it might even appear a form of moral coercion.

MR. CAÑAS (Costa Rica) said that the USSR amendment was tantamount to a proposal to delete from article 3 the idea of liberty and security of person. The second, third and fourth sentences in the USSR amendment were simply [175] amplifications of the right to life. They were measures for implementation, whereas the declaration should be an affirmation of rights; three rights – life, liberty and security – were already listed in the text of the article. In the USSR amendment no provision was made to compensate for the elimination of the rights of liberty and security. In the draft declaration the word “security” implied a conferring of legal status on what President Franklin D. Roosevelt had called freedom from fear.

He would vote against the first sentence in the USSR amendment, and would abstain from voting on the rest. He would abstain from voting on the proposed abolition of the death penalty because he considered it insufficient in that it was restricted to time of peace. Costa Rica had been at peace for eighty years and had not applied the death penalty in that time.

MR. DEDIJER (Yugoslavia) regretted that the Lebanese delegation had withdrawn its amendment (A/C.3/279). He would have supported it.

MR. DEMCHENKO (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) said that he maintained his opinion that article 3 was of the greatest importance. That was not surprising dealing as it did with the right to life, a matter of vital interest to all the delegations and to all the peoples of the world. None of the other articles in the draft declaration would have much meaning if the right to life were not fully and formally asserted. The representative of Greece was the only one who had proposed that that assertion should not be included. Perhaps he did so because that would conform to the current Greek Government's policy towards dissident elements.

The text of article 3 simply made a declaration of the right to life; but no guarantees were stated therein. Life should, however, be protected against criminal attempts, and it should not be lived under fear of the death penalty. Conditions that obviated the danger of death by hunger and exhaustion had to be ensured. It was impossible to speak of a full right to life unless that were guaranteed. The USSR amendment was the only proposal which explicitly stated such guarantees.

If the text of article 3 were amended as suggested by the delegation of the Soviet Union, it would become simple, clear and intelligible to precisely the people for whom it was intended – the common man. That was why many representatives had said that there could be no objection to the idea expressed in the USSR amendment. There could, indeed, be no argument of weight against that idea.

Replying to the representative of Costa Rica, he recalled that at the 102nd meeting the representative of the Soviet Union had stated that he had no objection to the inclusion of the mention of liberty and security of person.

It had been argued that the wording of the declaration had to be brief, whereas the USSR amendment would extend it. But clarity was also important. The inclusion of a recommendation that the death penalty should be abolished was clearly intelligible to the common man. The basic text was certainly brief; but it was neither [176] comprehensible nor comprehensive. The same reply might be made to those who did not wish to make the declaration too narrow; intelligibility should not be sacrificed to such restriction.

The representative of France had said that the sense of the USSR amendment was already included in the draft declaration. But no article anywhere mentioned the abolition of the death penalty.

Objections to that amendment had been raised on the grounds that the obligations of the State would be defined in another document. No decision had been taken to exclude those obligations. It had been decided that the rights and obligations of the State towards the individual and vice versa would be dealt with concretely, article by article. If that were not done, the declaration would lack substance when it came to the definition of human rights.

He could see no weight in arguments that certain countries would have to alter their constitutions or penal code if that amendment were adopted. The unanimous adoption of article 2 constituted a precedent. In that article discrimination of every kind was condemned; but certain countries which had voted for its adoption still had a constitution which did not forbid such discrimination. The vote meant, therefore, that those countries intended to alter their constitutions. Why, then, were arguments about legal procedure raised against the USSR amendment? The General Assembly could merely recommend a measure; it was a matter for the individual Governments to decide their own methods for implementing it. The representative of the United Kingdom had said that abolition of the death penalty was a matter too controversial to be included in the declaration. A recommendation from the General Assembly might help the United Kingdom Parliament to settle the controversy.

The statement made by the representative of Uruguay seemed inconsistent. He had said that limitation of the abolition of the death penalty in time of peace made the USSR amendment inopportune, but at the same time stated that the Government of his country was opposed to the death penalty. Something, however, was gained by including abolition in time of peace, even if agreement could not be reached on total abolition.

The representative of Costa Rica had argued that it would be inopportune to discuss such details because the declaration was intended as a universal document to reach millions of people. That was in fact an argument for the inclusion of such matter as that contained in the USSR amendment.

In reply to the contention of the representative of Bolivia that a roll-call vote might look like moral coercion, he pointed out that there was no compulsion to vote. The representative of the Soviet Union had been right, however, in saying that the vote would show what countries sincerely desired that the rights under discussion should be guaranteed.

The Ukrainian delegation would vote for the USSR amendment on the grounds that it made article 3 clearer and more intelligible.

[177]

MRS. IKRAMULLAH (Pakistan) suggested that the abolition of the death penalty should be made the subject of a separate resolution which could be discussed at a later General Assembly. She was not opposed to the abolition of the death penalty, but it was too controversial a matter to be included in the declaration.

The delegation of Pakistan would abstain from voting on the USSR amendment.

MR. CHANG (China) said he wished to give the correct version of the Chinese proverb mentioned by the representative of Belgium. It was: "Sweep the snow in front of one's own door. Overlook the frost on others' roof-tiles." That made for good neighbours.

He wished to lay great stress upon the need for careful consideration of the amendments before the Committee. Another Chinese proverb ran: "Matters allowed to mature slowly are free from sharp corners." That was the spirit in which the drafting of article 3 should be approached.

He had no objection to the drafting changes made in the revised version of the joint amendment submitted by Uruguay, Cuba and Lebanon (A/C.3/274/Rev.1). He agreed with the representative of Belgium, however, that the word "honour" in that amendment was not sufficiently concrete. The vote on that amendment should be taken only after mature consideration. If, however, it were decided to take an immediate vote, he would vote against inclusion of the word "honour" and in favour of the retention of the wording used in the basic draft declaration.

He would also make a formal amendment combining article 3 with article 20, since the ideas contained in the joint amendment were already stated in that article. It might be desirable to express them in a general covering article. He would insist, however, that the new text should be placed in a separate paragraph in order to bring out its importance. His proposal would be to retain as a first paragraph the text of article 3 as worded in the draft declaration and to add the text of article 20 as a second paragraph, deleting, however, the words "has the right to social security and", and substituting for the words "set out below" the words "necessary to the full development of the personality", that phrase being taken, with the omission of the word "human", from the joint amendment.

He would vote against the joint amendment because he considered it incorrect to express two sets of ideas in a single paragraph.

While he would abstain from discussing the substance of the USSR amendment, he would vote against it because it dealt with implementation; that did not come within the scope of the declaration.

MR. CASSIN (France) agreed with much that had been said by the Chinese representative. The USSR proposal (A/C.3/265) to include a reference to the obligations of States would, if adopted, introduce the whole question of implementation. The French delegation had always been of the [178] opinion that the subject of obligations should be included in the covenant on human rights and not in the declaration.

The suggestion for the abolition of the death penalty was certainly closely associated with the right to life, but so also were the problems of military service, abortion and the relations between doctors and nurses and the patient. France had not yet abolished the death penalty, but it should be noted that those Member States who applied that law with the greatest moderation had the most reservations with respect to the USSR proposal. From that it could be seen that political motives were not at the basis of their point of view.

The declaration did not conform to the 1789 Declaration of the Rights of Man and of the Citizen, but rather to the declaration of Bogotá, in its reference to the right to life. In his opinion, the first articles, among which article 27 should be included, should enumerate the various fundamental rights, after which should follow an analysis of those rights. President Roosevelt's statement on the four freedoms, to which reference had been made by the Haitian representative, was too general and incomplete to stand as an article of the declaration and should rather be inserted in the preamble.

It would not be appropriate to include economic, social and cultural rights in article 3 without also referring to the right to freedom of conscience and expression. To include the right to honour would be to repeat the content of article 1. He was strongly in favour of retaining the article in the concise form in which it stood.

The debate had been of great importance and had shown that both the preamble and article 20 needed further elaboration.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) felt that the Chinese representative's proposal might prove to be acceptable to a large majority of the Committee. He wanted to know, therefore whether the authors of the joint amendment would be prepared to collaborate with that representative in the preparation of a new text.

MRS. NEWLANDS (New Zealand) had always considered that the declaration, unlike the covenant, should be a concise statement of general principles and, for that reason, had approved, in particular, article 3. It was easy to appreciate the reasons for the submission of the joint amendment, but its adoption would impair the orderly arrangement of the text as it stood. Article 3 stated the fundamental rights of the individual and then, in article 20, referred to the other rights which belonged to man as a member of society. The former, therefore, was not the appropriate place for a reference to economic and social security. The right to honour was too vague a concept for inclusion in that article and was already implied elsewhere in the declaration.

She sympathized with the USSR proposal for the abolition of the death penalty. Her country had abolished it both for peace and wartime. However, it was a controversial issue, and, as in [179] the case of article 1, such controversial questions should be withdrawn.

Should the USSR delegation maintain the proposal, she would abstain when the vote was taken.

MR. GARCÍA BAUER (Guatemala) said the USSR representative's request for a roll-call on the vote on his amendment compelled him to speak.

The amendment was restrictive to the extent that it did not mention fundamental rights such as the right to liberty. He would, naturally, be able to accept the first sentence of the Soviet Union proposal. The second sentence was incomplete and referred to the duties of the State rather than to the rights of the individual. The third sentence was also incomplete, as was always the case when an enumeration was attempted.

Whole volumes had been written in support of and against abolition of the death penalty and much time could be saved by avoiding discussion of the various arguments. In 1945, after lengthy consideration, the death penalty had been written into the new Guatemalan Constitution. It had been included, however, in a very restricted form. His delegation was of the opinion that the matter of applying, or not applying, the death penalty depended upon the particular circumstances of each country and, in that regard, it had to be remembered that there was more than one way in which to condemn a man to death.

The declaration should contain principles which would be the goal for all national legislations and an undertaking for them to fulfil. More than one reservation had been expressed concerning the abolition of the death penalty and as it would be a legal provision, it was more suited for discussion in connexion with the covenant. For those reasons, he would vote against the final sentence of the USSR amendment.

The Mexican proposal (A/C.3/266) was interesting and he was in full agreement with its principle. The same ideas, however, were better expressed in articles 20 to 23.

The same criticism could be made in regard to the Panamanian amendments.

He agreed with the Uruguayan, Cuban and Lebanese representatives concerning the need to include a reference to the right to honour. The other proposals they had put forward were already implied in the declaration.

He requested that the joint amendment should be voted in parts: the right to life; the right to honour; the right to liberty; the right to physical integrity; and, finally, the rest of the amendment.

MRS. BEGTRUP (Denmark) said that the death penalty had been abolished in Denmark for many years. However, events arising out of the war had compelled her Government to introduce it again for a short while and for that reason, she would be unable to vote for the USSR amendment. In her opinion, a roll-call vote on that question would only result in confusion. Certain representatives whose countries still retained the death penalty would vote for the amendment, while [180] others whose countries had either abolished it or rarely put it into practice, would vote against it.

Representatives should not criticize conditions in each other's countries and in that regard, she drew attention to the tacit agreement of the Commission on the Status of Women, to use its time for constructive purposes only. The work of the Third Committee should be carried out in the spirit of brotherhood, referred to in article 1.

Although the list of speakers had been closed, THE CHAIRMAN said he would allow the Greek representative to reply to the Ukrainian representative. The former had not referred to the Ukrainian Government while, in his remarks, the latter had made accusations concerning the Greek Government.

MR. KAMINSKY (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) protested against the Chairman's interpretation of rule 104 of the rules of procedure.

MR. ROZAKIS (Greece) drew attention to the statement he had made at the 102nd meeting, in which he had expressed the view that it would be superfluous to include the right to life in article 3, as reference was already made to it in article 1. To repeat such an elementary and sacred right would only have the effect of weakening it.

THE CHAIRMAN interrupted the Greek representative as he had granted him the right to reply to the Ukrainian representative's allegations and not to speak on the substance of the question.

MR. KAMINSKY (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) asked that it should be recorded that the Chairman had granted the Greek representative the right to speak after he had moved the adjournment of the meeting.

THE CHAIRMAN informed the Byelorussian representative that he had not heard his motion for the adjournment of the meeting. He then put the motion to the vote.

The motion was adopted by 23 votes to 11, with 8 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN requested the representatives of Uruguay, Cuba, Lebanon, Australia, Belgium, China and France to meet together to prepare a joint text for consideration at the following meeting.

The meeting rose at 1:25 p.m.

A/C.3/SR.107<sup>49</sup>

19 October 1948

Summary Record of the Hundred and Seventh Meeting
[of the Third Committee]

Held at the Palais de Chaillot, Paris, on Tuesday,
19 October 1948, at 3 p.m.

Chairman: MR. CHARLES MALIK (Lebanon).

29. Draft international declaration of human rights (E/800) (continued)

Article 3 (continued)

THE CHAIRMAN declared the general discussion on article 3 closed. The Committee would therefore proceed forthwith to vote upon the various amendments proposed to that article.

He asked the Mexican representative whether he wished to maintain his amendment, or whether he would withdraw it.

<sup>49</sup> The text of the document is from Official Records of the General Assembly, Third Session, 1948, pp. 182–94.

MR. DE ALBA (Mexico) explained that his amendment (A/C.3/266) was intended to achieve the same object as that of the amendment submitted jointly by the delegations of Uruguay, Cuba and Lebanon delegations (A/C.3/274/Rev.1). He preferred the wording of his own amendment, but would agree to withdraw it and to support the proposal of those three delegations.

THE CHAIRMAN stated that the amendment submitted by the USSR (A/C.3/265) was farther than any of the others from the basic text prepared by the Commission on Human Rights. Before putting that amendment to the vote, the Chairman pointed out that the Egyptian delegation had requested that the Committee should first arrive at a decision as to whether or not mention should be made in article 3 of the rights and obligations of States.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) protested against that procedure. As it stood, the basic text did not mention the rights and obligations of States. A proposal not to include in a draft ideas which were not there could not be considered and treated as an amendment to that draft. The Egyptian proposal could, on the other hand, be submitted in the form of an amendment to the USSR amendment, which actually took those rights and obligations into account.

Mr. Pavlov therefore considered that the Committee ought first to arrive at a decision regarding the draft amendment submitted by the delegation of the Soviet Union.

The Chinese representative had expressed the opinion that the USSR amendment would be tantamount to deleting from the articles the right of any individual to liberty and security of person, which right was included in the basic text; and he had been in favour of the inclusion of that right. Mr. Pavlov said that the amendment submitted by the Soviet Union did not intend to exclude that right; it was meant simply to ensure [183] protection of the right to life. Should the corresponding clauses be adopted, and should the Chinese representative wish to add to the USSR amendment a paragraph affirming that every individual had a right to liberty and security of person, Mr. Pavlov would vote in favour of that amendment.

THE CHAIRMAN stated that the Egyptian proposal was not a request for the deletion of a phrase from article 3, but was made in order to obtain the Committee's decision as to whether the duties and obligations of States relative to the rights set forth in article 3 should or should not be mentioned in that article.

MR. KAMINSKY (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) stated that the Egyptian proposal involved the substance of the question.

It had been agreed that when each article was examined the Committee would decide whether it was advisable to mention the duties of a State arising from the statement of rights. If the Egyptian proposal were considered, it would be tantamount to reopening the discussion on the substance of article 3. No question of procedure was involved; and what had to be done was to put to the vote the amendments submitted before the close of the general discussion.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) also considered that the Egyptian proposal raised a question of principle. The Egyptian representative could attain his object when the part of the USSR draft amendment dealing with the duties of the State was put to the vote. The result of that vote would indicate the sense of the Committee. The Egyptian representative could vote in the negative, but it would be quite irregular to ask the Committee to decide the question of principle.

Mr. Dehousse would urge that there should be no vote on the question of principle.

MR. BAGDADI (Egypt) explained that his delegation had raised the question of principle during the general debate. The French and Egyptian representatives had been asked to try to reconcile their respective proposals (94th meeting) but no decision had been taken on the joint draft which they had submitted at the 95th meeting.

In order not to obstruct the voting on the amendments concerning article 3, the Egyptian delegation would not insist that its proposal be put to the vote, but it reserved the right to reopen discussion of the principle after the vote on the amendments.

THE CHAIRMAN asked the Committee to vote on the amendment proposed by the USSR delegation (A/C.3/265).

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) requested that his draft should be put to the vote in parts. The Committee should begin with the first sentence, should then deal with the two following sentences, and finally with the last sentences, for which he requested a vote by roll-call.

He repeated the proposal he had made to the Chinese representative that the latter should amend the draft by adding a paragraph to the effect that every individual had the right to liberty and security of person.

[184]

Replying to the USSR representative, MR. CHANG (China) pointed out that the sole object of his remarks had been to propose a more convenient voting procedure. The first sentence of the Soviet Union amendment was identical with the basic text, but it omitted the words "liberty and security of person". Mr. Chang therefore proposed that the new draft should be considered as an amendment calling for the deletion of those words.

MR. WATT (Australia) approved the remarks of the Chinese representative. Even if the first part of the amendment were submitted in an affirmative form and not as a deletion of a phrase, every member would interpret the proposal as an attempt to delete the clause which stated that every individual had the right to liberty and security of person.

THE CHAIRMAN asked the USSR representative if he would agree to the first phrase not being put to the vote. The Committee would only vote on the second and third part of his amendment, and then finally on the whole amendment.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) replied that all the members of the Committee recognized that every individual had the right to life. If no one raised any objections to the principle set forth in the first phrase of the draft amendment, it might be considered and unanimously acceptable. It would then be unnecessary to vote on the second and third parts of the amendment.

He perfectly understood that the Australian representative did not wish to exclude the right to liberty and security of person, and hastened to say that he himself wished those rights to be embodied in the declaration.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) agreed to the procedure outlined by the Chairman. He pointed out that the USSR delegation was really trying to substitute the wording of its own amendment for that of article 3 of the draft declaration of human rights. As the representative of the Soviet Union had asked for a vote in parts, each part adopted would constitute an amendment to the basic draft.

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) pointed out that those who wished to specify that every individual had the right to liberty and security of person would be obliged to vote against the first sentence of the USSR amendment, although they might vote for an identical phrase when voting on the joint amendment (A/C.3/274/Rev.1) and on the basic text.

MR. DE ALBA (Mexico) approved the procedure proposed by the Chairman.

MR. ROZAKIS (Greece) declared his willingness to vote for the adoption of the first phrase.

THE CHAIRMAN decided that only those parts of the amendment which differed from the original text should be put to the vote, namely, the second and third parts. He would deal with the other amendments in a similar manner.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) asked for a vote in parts on the second and third sentences of the second part of the amendment.

[185]

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the sentence: "The State should ensure the protection of each individual against criminal attempts on his person."

The sentence was rejected by 26 votes to 10, with 9 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the sentence: "It should also ensure conditions that obviate the danger of death by hunger and exhaustion."

The sentence was rejected by 28 votes to 10 with 10 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the third part of the USSR amendment: "The death penalty should be abolished in time of peace."

A vote was taken by roll-call, as follows:

The Union of South Africa, having been drawn by lot by the Chairman, was called upon to vote first.

In favour: Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Yugoslavia, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Dominican Republic, Mexico, Poland, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic.

Against: Union of South Africa, United Kingdom, United States of America, Uruguay, Yemen, Afghanistan, Australia, Brazil, Canada, Chile, China, France, Greece, Guatemala, Haiti, Luxembourg, Panama, Philippines, Siam, Syria, Turkey.

Abstaining: Venezuela, Argentina, Belgium, Burma, Costa Rica, Denmark, Ecuador, Egypt, Ethiopia, Honduras, India, Lebanon, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Peru, Saudi Arabia, Sweden.

The third part was rejected by 21 votes to 9, with 18 abstentions.

MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) explained that he had voted against the clause regarding the death penalty because his delegation considered that the death penalty should be abolished at all times. That had been the purport of the amendment which Uruguay had proposed (A/C.3/268).

MR. DE LEÓN (Panama) had voted against the second and third sentences of the USSR amendment because they referred to matters which were out of place in a declaration of human rights.

With regard to the death penalty, it had been entirely abolished by the Constitution of Panama. A vote in favour of the Soviet Union proposal would have constituted an admission that the death penalty could be legitimately exercised in time of war.

MR. BAGDADI (Egypt) explained that he had abstained for two reasons. He had always maintained that the obligations of the State were out of place in a declaration of human rights, and, furthermore, that the abolition of the death penalty was out of place in a declaration of a general character.

It was for each country to include the relevant provisions in its penal code.

MR. HABIB (India) stated that his country, which had only recently achieved independence, had not yet adopted a Constitution. He had [186] already expressed the belief that when the question of the death penalty in peacetime was considered in his country, legislation would abolish it. In view of the situation, the Indian delegation had abstained when the vote was taken on the Soviet Union amendment.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that, as all parts of the USSR amendment had been rejected, there was no need to proceed to a vote on the draft amendment as a whole.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) then asked for a vote on the first part of the amendment also.

THE CHAIRMAN recalled that that part reproduced the wording of the original text and could not therefore be considered as an amendment. A decision on that text would be taken later.

THE CHAIRMAN announced that the Panamanian amendment (A/C.3/220) would be put to the vote.

On a point of order, MR. GARCÍA BAUER (Guatemala) proposed that the Committee should vote only on the first of the three articles which the delegation of Panama had proposed to substitute for the basic text of article 3, since the two other articles proposed were a mere repetition of ideas which appeared in certain later clauses of the draft declaration and had not been discussed with regard to substance.

THE CHAIRMAN thought that, with the exception of the first of the three new articles proposed, the Panamanian amendment was principally concerned with the order of the texts.

On the Chairman's request, MR. DE LEÓN (Panama) agreed that the Committee should vote only on the first of the articles which he had proposed to substitute for the original text of article 3. His amendment, therefore, read as follows: "Every human being has the right to exist and to maintain, develop, protect and defend his existence."

The amendment was rejected by 25 votes to 1, with 19 abstentions.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba), explaining his abstention, paid a tribute to the efforts made by the delegation of Panama. He was convinced that the ideas advocated by that delegation would find expression during the discussion of other articles of the declaration.

THE CHAIRMAN having proposed that the Belgian delegation's amendment (A/C.3/282) to the joint amendment submitted by Uruguay, Cuba and Lebanon (A/C.3/274/Rev.1), MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) pointed out that the differences between the two texts were considerable enough to make it necessary to vote on each separately.

Following a discussion in which the representatives of China, Uruguay, Mexico and Belgium took part, MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) proposed that the joint text of Uruguay, Cuba, and Lebanon be put to the vote first.

It was so agreed.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the first amendment to article 3 proposed by the three delegations [187] which consisted in inserting after the words "Everyone has the right to life", the word "honour".

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) requested that the vote be taken by roll-call.

A vote was taken by roll-call, as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Argentina, Belgium, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Chile, Costa Rica, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, Ethiopia, Guatemala, Haiti, Lebanon, Peru, Uruguay, Venezuela, Yugoslavia.

Against: Australia, Canada, China, Denmark, France, Greece, India, Luxembourg, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Panama, Philippines, Siam, Sweden, Syria, Turkey, Union of South Africa, United Kingdom, United States of America.

Abstaining: Brazil, Burma, Honduras, Mexico, Poland, Saudi Arabia, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Yemen.

The amendment was rejected by 20 votes to 20, with 9 abstentions.

MR. CASSIN (France) explaining his negative vote, emphasized that, although his delegation did not minimize the concept of honour, it was, in its opinion, already contained in article 1, which proclaimed the dignity of human beings.

MR. KURAL (Turkey) associated himself with the statement made by the French representative and recalled that the representative of Belgium had already drawn the Committee's attention to the subjective nature of the concept of honour.

THE CHAIRMAN having proposed to take a vote on the following section of the amendment, MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) pointed out that the Russian translation of that text (A/C.3/274/Rev.1) used an expression which meant "personal integrity", which included physical integrity.

If that were not adequately explained, he would abstain from voting on that point.

MR. CASSIN (France) maintained that the idea of physical integrity was contained in that of security of person.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) considered that those observations were concerned with the substance of the amendment and, as one of its co-authors, he stated in reply, that the idea of security had a legal character. Even if it were considered that it implied physical integrity, it was nevertheless preferable to mention the latter idea specifically.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the second section of the joint amendment submitted by Uruguay, Cuba and Lebanon, consisting of introducing into the original text after the word "liberty" the words "physical integrity".

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) requested that the vote be taken by roll-call.

A vote was taken by roll-call.

In favour: Argentina, Belgium, Chile, Costa Rica, Cuba, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, Ethiopia, Haiti, Lebanon, Luxembourg, Mexico, Peru, Saudi Arabia, Uruguay, Venezuela.

[188]

Against: Australia, Canada, China, Denmark, France, Greece, India, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Panama, Philippines, Siam, Sweden, Syria, Turkey, Union of South Africa, United Kingdom, United States of America.

Abstaining: Brazil, Burma, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Czechoslovakia, Guatemala, Honduras, Pakistan, Poland, Ukrainian Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Yemen, Yugoslavia.

The amendment was rejected by 19 votes to 17, with 12 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the third part of the joint amendment, consisting of introducing after the words “security of person” the words “and to the economic, social and other conditions necessary to the full development of the human personality.”

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) and MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) requested that the vote be taken by roll-call.

A vote was taken by roll-call, as follows:

Egypt, having been drawn by lot by the President, was called upon to vote first.

In favour: Haiti, Lebanon, Mexico, Pakistan, Peru, Poland, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Uruguay, Venezuela, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Argentina, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Chile, Costa Rica, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Dominican Republic, Ecuador.

Against: France, Greece, India, Luxembourg, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Panama, Philippines, Siam, Sweden, Syria, Turkey, Union of South Africa, United Kingdom, United States of America, Australia, Belgium, Canada, China, Denmark.

Abstaining: Egypt, Ethiopia, Guatemala, Honduras, Saudi Arabia, Brazil, Burma.

The amendment was rejected by 21 votes to 20, with 7 abstentions.

On a point of order, MR. CHANG (China) questioned the desirability of voting on the Belgian delegation’s amendment (A/C.3/282), since the Committee had just voted against the addition of the words “physical integrity”, which also appeared in that amendment.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) having withdrawn his amendment, MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) took it up on behalf of his delegation.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) said that there was no need to dwell any further on ideas which had already been rejected by the Committee.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) pointed out that the representative of Belgium had already agreed that the Committee should vote on his amendment in the event of the rejection of the joint amendment.

MR. BAGDADI (Egypt) drew attention to the fact that his delegation had abstained from voting on the previous text because it had preferred the wording of the Belgian text. Other delegations might be in the same position.

MR. SAINT-LOT (Haiti) expressed his preference for the words “security of person”, which [189] expressed the idea of the moral as well as the physical integrity of the individual.

For that reason he would vote against the amendment which seemed to him to neglect the aspect of legal security.

MR. GARCÍA BAUER (Guatemala) asked for an authoritative interpretation of the expression “security of person”, without which the reasons for each delegation’s vote would not be sufficiently clear.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the Belgian delegation's amendment (A/C.3/282), taken up by the delegation of Uruguay. It proposed the following wording for article 3:

"Everyone has the right to life, liberty and respect for the physical and moral integrity of his person."

MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) requested that the vote be taken by roll-call.

A vote was taken by roll-call, as follows:

In favour: Argentina, Cuba, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Egypt, Ethiopia, Lebanon, Mexico, Pakistan, Peru, Uruguay, Venezuela.

Against: Australia, Canada, Chile, China, Denmark, France, Greece, India, Luxembourg, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Panama, Philippines, Siam, Sweden, Syria, Turkey, Union of South Africa, United Kingdom, United States of America.

Abstaining: Belgium, Brazil, Burma, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Costa Rica, Czechoslovakia, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, Poland, Saudi Arabia, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Yemen, Yugoslavia.

The amendment was rejected by 21 votes to 12, with 15 abstentions.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) stated that he had voted against the amendment for reasons already explained by the representative of Haiti.

MR. GARCÍA BAUER (Guatemala) said he had abstained because, in spite of his request, its terms had not been defined before the vote.

MR. ROZAKIS (Greece) withdrew the amendment his delegation had submitted previously (102nd meeting) and supported the text of the Commission on Human Rights.

He reminded the Committee that he had on several occasions outlined the intentions underlying his amendment. He preferred to withdraw it, however, because of the unjustified attacks it had aroused against his country.

MR. KURAL (Turkey) asked that the vote on article 3 be taken by roll-call as had been done in the case of the amendments.

MR. GARCÍA BAUER (Guatemala) emphasized the need for an exact definition of the words "security of person". If they included the notion of physical integrity, that should be stated in the summary record of the meeting.

Speaking as Chairman of the Commission on Human Rights, MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) said that the words "security of person" [190] had been chosen after lengthy discussion because they were more comprehensive than any other expression. The French representative had especially noted that they included the idea of physical integrity and that they seemed to cover most comprehensively various views expressed in the Commission.

The Commission on Human Rights had also tried to adopt concise wording so as to express the greatest possible number of ideas in a limited number of words.

MR. IMPERIAL (Philippines) proposed that before taking the vote on article 3, the Committee should vote on the following motion:

“The Third Committee is of the opinion that the words ‘security of person’ include the notion of physical integrity.”

THE CHAIRMAN said he could not agree to that procedure.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) thought that the Committee could not reopen the discussion on the substance of the problem. None of the members present was qualified to give an authoritative interpretation of the decision taken by the Commission on Human Rights.

He recalled the proposal made by the Belgian delegation that all similar cases should be referred to the International Court of Justice. If the Court had to give its opinion on the interpretation of those words, it would do so on the basis of the preparatory work of the Commission on Human Rights, of the summary records of the meetings, and of the votes which had been taken. Its opinion would then be authoritative and final.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) emphasized that the draft declaration of human rights would be finally adopted by the General Assembly and would become one of its documents. Consequently, if the International Court of Justice were to give its opinion on the interpretation of any article of the declaration, it would have to refer to the discussions of the Third Committee and not to those of the Commission on Human Rights.

Any delegation was, therefore, entitled to ask that the terms of article 3 should be clearly defined. The same procedure had been adopted several times during the discussions on the drafting of the Charter at San Francisco. He supported the proposal of the representative of Guatemala that an authoritative interpretation of the terms of article 3 should be included in the summary records of the meeting, either before or after the vote.

MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) said that the fears of the representative of Guatemala were justified. Indeed, certain representatives had stated during the discussion that the ideas expressed in various amendments were already contained in the text drawn up by the Commission on Human Rights. Thus, it had been maintained that the concept of physical integrity was included in the words “security of person”. Once the amendments were rejected, however, those same representatives refused to give an opinion on the exact meaning of the terms in question.

[191]

The delegation of Uruguay would vote for the text of the Commission on Human Rights as all the amendments had been rejected. It was, however, of the opinion that the article was both defective and incomplete.

MR. WATT (Australia) emphasized that the Committee could not be bound by a special interpretation of article 3.

The statements made by various delegations at San Francisco – which the Cuban representative had quoted as precedents – were not aimed at giving an authoritative interpretation of various provisions of the Charter; they only recorded, in the records of the meetings, the way in which some States thought those provisions should be interpreted. Such interpretations could not bind the majority of members. Each delegation could ask that the records of the meeting should include its interpretation of article 3 so that it could refer to it, if need be, before an international court such as the International Court of Justice. The Australian delegation, however, felt that the expression “security of person” was sufficiently wide to allay the anxiety of the representatives of some South American countries.

MR. CHANG (China) endorsed the views expressed by the French and United States representatives regarding the definition of the words “security of person”. As those views would be recorded, he thought it useless to prolong the debate on that point.

MR. DEMCHENKO (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) proposed that, owing to the difficulties to which the words “security of person” had given rise, the vote on article 3 should be taken in two parts.

The Committee could vote on the first part of the article up to the words “to life”, and then on the second part from the word “liberty” to the end, and lastly on the article as a whole.

THE CHAIRMAN said that in accordance with that suggestion the vote would be taken in parts.

A roll-call vote would be taken only on the article as a whole.

He put to the vote the first part of the article: “Everyone has the right to life”.

That part was adopted by 49 votes to none, with 2 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the second part of article 3: “liberty and security of person”.

That part was adopted by 47 votes to none, with 4 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN called for a vote on article 3 as a whole.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) wished to explain his delegation’s vote. His delegation objected neither to the first nor to the second part of article 3 and he had, therefore, voted for both. It felt, however, that those two parts did not form a complete article as they [192] omitted the guarantees of the right to life which the USSR delegation regarded as essential. Those guarantees, namely protection against criminal attempts and against the danger of death by hunger, together with the abolition of the death penalty in time of peace, were included in the Soviet Union amendment.

His delegation would, therefore, abstain from voting on the article as a whole.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) said that his delegation had voted for both parts of article 3, but would abstain from voting on the article as a whole since its terms had not been clearly defined.

The article relating to the right to life in the Bogotá declaration, which had been signed by the American States, included the right to security and integrity of person. Yet the words “physical integrity” had not been inserted in article 3 and the words “security of person” had not been defined.

The resulting text was therefore inadequate.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) said his delegation would vote in favour of article 3. The words “security of person” included physical and moral integrity and legal security. No members of the Committee had disputed that interpretation.

MR. DE ALBA (Mexico) said that his delegation considered article 3 as inadequate because it contained no provision for the raising of standards of life, social justice and the full development of the human personality.

It would, however, vote in favour of the article while reserving its right to raise the matter before the General Assembly.

MR. DE LEÓN (Panama) said his delegation would abstain from voting on article 3 as a whole because it felt it was impossible to include the right to life, the right to liberty and the right to security of person in one article. There should be separate and more detailed articles for each of those rights.

His delegation’s abstention did not mean that it underestimated their value; on the contrary, it wished to see them stated in greater detail.

MR. CASSIN (France) said his delegation would vote for article 3 not only because it approved of the ideas it contained, but also because it would regard its adoption as a victory for a method of work which had proved its effectiveness both at Bogotá and in the Commission on Human Rights. That method would have to be followed.

With regard to the ideas of social justice and of the free development of the human personality, the French delegation would support their insertion in the declaration at the appropriate time.

MR. DEDIJER (Yugoslavia) said he would abstain from voting on article 3 because it was inadequate and did not prohibit lynching.

MR. KAMINSKY (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) said he had supported the USSR amendment and also certain aspects of some other [193] amendments which expressed progressive ideas. He felt that the article was incomplete because of their rejection.

He would therefore abstain when the vote was taken.

MR. DEMCHENKO (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) said he would abstain from voting because article 3 mentioned the right to life but not the guarantees of that right.

MR. CARRERA ANDRADE (Ecuador) said that from a legal point of view the words in question had a definite meaning, and that physical integrity could not be considered as being the same as security of person. Physical integrity was a human right, while the ensuring of security of person was a duty on the part of the State towards the individual.

His delegation would abstain from voting.

MR. GARCÍA BAUER (Guatemala) asked that the various opinions expressed by members of the Committee concerning the interpretation of the words “security of person” should be noted in the summary record of the meeting.

He would vote in favour of article 3 because it had been stated that its wording included the idea of physical integrity.

THE CHAIRMAN put article 3 (E/800) to the vote.

A vote was taken by roll-call.

Egypt, having been drawn by lot by the Chairman, was called upon to vote first.

In favour: Egypt, Ethiopia, France, Greece, Guatemala, Honduras, India, Iran, Luxembourg, Mexico, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Peru, Philippines, Saudi Arabia, Siam, Sweden, Syria, Turkey, Union of South Africa, United Kingdom, United States of America, Uruguay, Venezuela, Yemen, Argentina, Australia, Belgium, Brazil, Canada, Chile, China, Costa Rica, Denmark, Dominican Republic.

Abstaining: Haiti, Lebanon, Pakistan, Panama, Poland, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Yugoslavia, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Ecuador.

Article 3 was adopted by 36 votes to none, with 12 abstentions.

MR. PLAZA (Venezuela) would have preferred a more explicit text, but had voted in favour of article 3 on the understanding that the expression “security of person” included the physical, moral and legal integrity of the individual.

MRS. KALINOWSKA (Poland) said the Polish delegation had voted for both parts of article 3, but had abstained from voting in the whole. She recalled that the Polish delegation had voted in favour of the last part of the joint amendment (A/C.3/274/Rev.1) relating to economic and social conditions which were necessary to the full development of the human personality; although that amendment did not mention the duties of the State, it would partly have filled any serious gap in article 3.

MR. SAINT-LOT (Haiti) explained that his delegation had abstained from voting on article 3 [194] as a whole because it had not included two of the four fundamental freedoms proclaimed by President Roosevelt, namely freedom from want and freedom from fear.

MR. IMPERIAL (Philippines) had voted in favour of article 3 on the understanding that the words “security of person” included the notion of physical integrity.

The meeting rose at 6 p.m.

A/C.3/302

20 October 1948<sup>50</sup>

Recapitulation of Amendments to Article 25
of the Draft Declaration (E/800)

(In the chronological order of their submission to the Committee)

Article 25 – (Text adopted by the Commission on Human Rights)

Everyone has the right to participate in the cultural life of the community, to enjoy the arts and to share in scientific advancement.

Amendments:

Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (E/800)

Add to the text adopted:

“The development of science must serve the interests of progress and democracy, and the cause of international peace and co-operation”.

France (A/C.3/244/Rev.1)

Add a paragraph 2 as follows:

“Everyone likewise has the right to the protection of the moral and material interests that he may acquire through any inventions or literary, scientific or artistic work of which he is the author”.

Cuba (A/C.3/261)

Amend as follows:

“Every person has the right to take part in the cultural life of the community, to enjoy the arts, and to participate in the benefits that result from scientific advancement.”

“He likewise has the right to the protection of his moral and material interests as regards his inventions or any literary, scientific or artistic works of which he is the author”.

Mexico (A/C.3/266)

Add the following as the second paragraph:

<sup>50</sup> This date is probably a mistake. A/C.3/302 was issued on 25 October 1948, as was A/C.3/304. The French version of A/C.3/303 bears the date of 25 October 1948.

“2. He likewise has the right to the protection of his moral and material interests as regards his inventions or any literary, scientific, or artistic works of which he is the author.”

A/C.3/SR.108<sup>51</sup>

20 October 1948

Summary Record of the Hundred and Eighth Meeting
[of the Third Committee]

Held at the Palais de Chaillot, Paris, on Wednesday,
20 October 1948, at 3:15 p.m.

Chairman: MR. CHARLES MALIK (Lebanon).

...
[199]
...

31. Draft international declaration of human rights (E/800) (continued)

Statement by the Belgian Delegation on the Legal Significance of the Declaration

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) recalled that his delegation had, on two occasions, reserved the right to make known its views on the legal significance of the declaration of human rights.

He stressed the difficulty of choosing an appropriate time to make such a general statement. The Belgian delegation had refrained from doing so during the general discussion, as that discussion had been concerned with the moral and philosophical, rather than with the legal, aspects of the matter. On the other hand, it had hesitated to wait for the vote on the draft declaration as a whole since it feared that it might be too late. The desired opportunity had presented itself with the USSR amendment to article 3, an amendment which referred to the State's role in protecting human rights within national frontiers and thereby raised the question of the legal value of the declaration.

There was no doubt that the declaration would be communicated to Member States of the United Nations in the form of a recommendation by the General Assembly. On that account certain delegations agreed that it had a moral value, but denied it any legal value.

The Belgian delegation opposed any such interpretation. The authority of the General Assembly, the highest organ of the United Nations, was based on the San Francisco Charter. Its recommendations could not, therefore, be compared with those of a private organization for example. The General Assembly was a juridical organ and any recommendations made by it had an undeniably legal character.

<sup>51</sup> The text of the document is from Official Records of the General Assembly, Third Session, 1948, pp. 194–204.

That point being settled, there remained the question whether or not the legal document constituted by the declaration of human rights would be binding.

The answer to that question was not so simple as was generally believed. The Belgian delegation had examined the problem on several occasions and, because of certain statements which had been made during the discussion of the question in the Commission on Human Rights, and the views expressed by Mr. Cassin in particular, it had modified its original opinions, which had been to assign a purely optional significance to the declaration.

[200]

It was necessary, in fact, to make a distinction between the principles which would be inserted in the declaration. Some of the principles would only repeat rules already in the customary law of nations and were, in consequence, recognized in unwritten international law. The act of inscribing them in an international declaration could not deprive these rules of the binding character they already possessed.

Other principles which would be included in the declaration did not belong to customary international law and the fact of their inclusion in an international declaration would certainly not make them obligatory. Their inclusion, however, would oblige Member States to give those principles very serious consideration; and that might lead them to consider the question of adapting their constitutions and laws to the declaration they had approved.

Naturally no Member State would be under an obligation to adapt its constitution and laws in that way. No Member State, even if it had voted for the declaration, would be legally bound to write the principles of the declaration into its legislation. But it would be under the obligation to take them into consideration. In other words, the recommendation resulting from the work of the Committee would create the beginning of an obligation for the Member States of the United Nations.

In illustration of this point, Mr. Dehousse recalled a recent recommendation of the Security Council, which was based on Chapter VI of the Charter relating to the pacific settlement of disputes,<sup>1</sup> in virtue of which two States had agreed to submit their dispute to the International Court of Justice. Those States had not been bound to accept the Security Council's recommendation, but they were under the moral obligation to take it into account, and that they had done.

That was the sense in which the Belgian delegation regarded the force and significance of the international declaration of human rights: the document would have incontestable legal force. It would not, in the strict sense of the word, be binding; but it would place an obligation on Member States to consider the action which should be taken on that recommendation of the General Assembly.

Mr. Dehousse stressed the subtle character of the question with which he had just dealt, and expressed a wish that the Legal Department of the Secretariat should study it closely and, if necessary, prepare a note for communication to the Committee in the course of its work on the declaration.

Proposal from the Swedish Delegation for Speeding up the Work of the Committee (A/C.3/281)

MRS. LINDSTRÖM (Sweden) said that before the Committee went on to consider article 4 of the draft declaration of human rights, she wished to make a proposal for speeding up its work. In view of the limited number of meetings that remained for finishing their study of the declaration of rights, she deplored the length of the discussions. Many representatives had urgent work waiting to be done in their respective countries. She feared that they might not be able to stay in Paris until consideration of the draft declaration had been finished. For that reason, she proposed that the length of the speeches made in the Committee should be limited, in order to speed up the debates.

<sup>[1]</sup> See Official Records of the Security Council, Second Year, No. 34, page 727.

[201]

To that end, she submitted the following resolution to the Committee (A/C.3/281):

“I. In accordance with rule 103 of the rules of procedure, the Committee fixes the following time limit on speeches during the further consideration of the international declaration of human rights:

- “1. Original speeches shall not exceed ten minutes;
- “2. Second speeches shall not exceed live minutes.

“II. Acting under authority of rule 104 of the rules of procedure, the Chairman, with the consent of the Committee, shall declare the list of speakers closed at the end of one hour’s debate on each article. This is subject to the Chairman’s authority under this rule to accord the right to reply to any member if a speech delivered after he has declared the list closed makes this desirable.”

MR. CHANG (China) supported the Swedish delegation’s proposal.

MR. MACDONNELL (Canada) said he was strongly in favour of the Swedish proposal which seemed to him to be very desirable. In view of the limited time at the Committee’s disposal, he thought the Committee might consider the possibility of postponing the discussion on the declaration of human rights to another session of the Assembly, or of referring it for study to another organ of the United Nations. If necessary, he would return to that question.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) shared the misgivings of the Swedish delegation regarding the limited amount of time remaining to the Committee. He was not so critical, however, as the Swedish delegation in his appraisal of the work already done. He observed that no member of the Committee could be accused of systematic obstruction and that few speeches had lasted ten minutes. Moreover, he considered that the first three articles were of a very general character and therefore offered certain difficulties. Those difficulties would not arise in connexion with the other articles, and the Committee would thus be able to work more quickly.

Accordingly, while agreeing with the Swedish proposal on the whole, he maintained that any decision the Committee might take on the procedure to be followed could only be effective if it were adopted unanimously.

MR. BEAUFORT (Netherlands), said with reference to the first paragraph of the Swedish proposal, that he thought the words "original speeches" meant speeches made in presenting or [202] opposing an amendment; "second speeches" would refer to all other statements.

MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) disagreed with the interpretation of the Netherlands representative. In his opinion, an "original speech" was the first statement made by any delegation, no matter whether its purpose was to submit an amendment or to oppose an amendment already submitted.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) supported the first paragraph of the Swedish proposal as interpreted by the Netherlands delegation. The second paragraph of the proposal was, however, both unnecessary and dangerous. It was unnecessary because it repeated the terms of the second sentence of rule 104 of the rules of procedure; it was dangerous because it laid upon the Chairman the obligation to grant the right of reply whenever it was requested. Members of the Committee were aware that two opposite tendencies were evident in the Organization and its various committees. Consequently, if the Chairman called upon a representative whose speech reflected one of those tendencies, he should in fairness also call upon a representative of the other side. Meanwhile delegations who were not connected with either of those sides were prevented from taking part in the discussion and forced to remain passive.

He therefore proposed that the second sentence of paragraph II of the Swedish proposal should be amended as follows:

"The Committee further requests the Chairman not to use the powers conferred on him by the second sentence of rule 104 of the rules of procedure. It notes, further, that the Chairman may also call a speaker to order if his remarks are not relevant to the subject under discussion."

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) approved the idea of the first paragraph of the Swedish proposal. He was prepared to accept it on the understanding that it would be interpreted not as a hard and fast rule but as a recommendation. However if the Committee were asked to vote on the paragraph, he would vote against it, for a formal vote would give it an obligatory and therefore unacceptable character.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) noted that every attempt to improve their procedure only resulted in longer discussions. Moreover, the Swedish proposal reflected a general tendency in the United Nations to regard the work of the various committees as something mechanical and the act of voting as being in itself more important than the examination of the Committee's opinions.

He emphatically opposed that tendency and was therefore wholly against the Swedish proposal.

With regard to paragraph II, he pointed out that according to rule 99 of the rules of procedure, it was for the Chairman to decide, if and when the necessity arose, whether the remarks of a [203] speaker were relevant to the subject under discussion. The Chairman's decision was founded on logic; the Swedish proposal would impose a purely mechanical rule for a logical rule.

Again, the proposed change in procedure was tantamount to a revision of the rules of procedure and was consequently beyond the competence of the Committee.

He could not therefore accept the Swedish proposal.

MR. COROMINAS (Argentina) insisted that the discussion should be carried on in the usual way according to the rules of procedure. When a joint formula was desired, a general discussion and an exchange of views were essential. He thought that what they needed was not shorter speeches but the removal of that feeling of distrust which was apt to appear in the Committee.

The Argentine delegation was prepared to accept any suggestion which would further the work of the Committee, but it could in no circumstances agree to a proposal which tended to limit the freedom of speech of representatives.

In reply to MR. BAGDADI (Egypt), THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the Uruguayan representative's interpretation of the first paragraph of the Swedish proposal seemed to be the one which conveyed the intentions of the Swedish delegation.

In reply to the request by the representative of Australia for further information, he said that under rule 104 of the rules of procedure any speaker would be able to make use of his right of reply even after the list of speakers had been closed. Further, when a speaker wished to make a general statement, it would be for the majority of the Committee to decide whether or not his request should be granted.

THE CHAIRMAN agreed with the representative of the USSR that the Swedish proposal, if accepted in the imperative terms in which it was formulated, would in fact be equivalent to a revision of the rules of procedure. Clearly, in that case, the proposal would not be in order. He thought it could, nevertheless, be adopted as a recommendation, the Chairman being given full discretion to conduct subsequent debates in the light of the most interesting and instructive discussion which had just taken place.

Supporting the views expressed by the Chairman, MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) stressed the importance of unanimity with regard to decisions taken by the Committee, and suggested that since it had apparently met with rather strong opposition, the Swedish proposal should be withdrawn.

MRS. LINDSTRÖM (Sweden) emphasized that her proposal had been intended above all as a friendly recommendation.

She was entirely in agreement with the interpretation given to it by the representative of Uruguay and, in a spirit of conciliation, withdrew the second part of her proposal.

[204]

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) withdrew the amendment he had submitted to paragraph II of the Swedish proposal, since it was no longer pertinent.

MR. COROMINAS (Argentina) said he was still opposed to paragraph I of the Swedish proposal and declared that, whatever decision might be taken, he reserved the right to make his statements on the rights of man as long as would be necessary.

He requested a vote by roll-call.

THE CHAIRMAN drew the Argentine representative's attention to the fact that every member of the Committee would have to conform to the Swedish proposal if it were adopted. He put the first paragraph of the Swedish proposal to the vote.

A vote was taken by roll-call.

In favour: Belgium, Bolivia, Brazil, Canada, China, Denmark, Ethiopia, France, Honduras, India, Iran, Lebanon, Luxembourg, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Peru, Philippines, Saudi Arabia, Siam, Sweden, Turkey, United Kingdom, United States of America, Uruguay, Venezuela.

Against: Argentina, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Ecuador, Haiti, Iraq, Mexico, Syria, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Yugoslavia.

Abstaining: Australia, Chile, Dominican Republic, Egypt, Poland, Union of South Africa, Yemen.

The proposal was adopted by 26 votes to 12, with 7 abstentions.

The meeting rose at 6:15 p.m.

A/C.3/SR.109<sup>52</sup>

21 October 1948

Summary Record of the Hundred and Ninth Meeting
[of the Third Committee]

Held at the Palais de Chaillot, Paris, on Thursday,

21 October 1948, at 3 p.m.

Chairman: MR. CHARLES MALIK (Lebanon).

<sup>52</sup> The text of the document is from Official Records of the General Assembly, Third Session, 1948, pp. 204–14.

...
[212]
...

33. Draft international declaration of human rights (E/800) (continued)

Article 4<sup>1</sup>

THE CHAIRMAN drew the attention of the Committee to document A/C.3/271 which contained a recapitulation of the amendments to article 4.

He thought the only amendment that should be considered immediately was the USSR proposal (E/800, page 32), as all the others proposed either deletions or changes in order.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba), speaking on a point of order, asked the Chairman to announce, just when the general debate was beginning and when he intended to close the discussion.

THE CHAIRMAN thought it unnecessary to announce the opening of a discussion but he promised to inform members when he wished to close it.

MR. CAÑAS (Costa Rica), asked for an explanation of the difference between the English and French texts of article 4, pointing out that the English text stated: "No one shall be held in . . . involuntary servitude", while the French text said: Nul ne sera . . . tenu en servitude. The adjective "involuntary", used in English, was not to be found in the French text. Mr. Cañas wondered which text was authentic.

MR. GRUMBACH (France) observed that the word "servitude" alone seemed to be the only way of expressing precisely what article 4 should state.

MRS. CORBET (United Kingdom) explained that the English word "servitude" described the situation of a person who performed services, whether voluntarily or involuntarily. It was therefore necessary to add the adjective "involuntary" in the English text.

<sup>[1]</sup> Articles 5 and 6 of the draft universal declaration of human rights (A/777).

[213]

MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) thought it was difficult to follow the rule that only those amendments should be considered which proposed neither deletions nor changes in order.

The purpose of his amendment (A/C.3/268) was that the second paragraph of article 4 should be changed to read: "No one shall be subjected to torture or to the death penalty or inhuman punishment or to degrading treatment." His amendment was therefore one of substance; but he also proposed transferring the second paragraph of article 4, thus amended, to article 9.

With regard to the USSR draft amendment, the Uruguayan delegation preferred that text to the first paragraph of the original text, because the former was more complete.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) said that although article 4 was a well-integrated whole, the way in which widely differing concepts were juxtaposed made it far from satisfactory. It seemed to repeat ideas already expressed in preceding articles; for example, the statements in article 1 that “All human beings are born free and equal in . . . rights” and in article 3 that “Everyone has the right to . . . liberty” made it superfluous to repeat that “No one shall be held in slavery or in involuntary servitude”. If some members felt that such repetition was in fact necessary, the Cuban delegation would not insist on the first part of its amendment (A/C.3/224), which was the first paragraph of article 4 should be deleted; it wished to know, however, why it had been considered appropriate to repeat in article 4, in a different way, ideas which had already been expressed in preceding articles.

According to the second part of the Cuban amendment, the idea expressed in the second paragraph of article 4 should be included in an article based on juridical considerations, like article 7. The second paragraph of article 4 dealt in fact with questions within the field of criminal law. Moreover, it seemed useless to say “inhuman” immediately after “cruel” in the phrase “cruel . . . treatment or punishment”, as cruel punishment would completely exclude inhuman punishment. On the other hand, mention of “non-customary punishment” seemed appropriate.

He hoped that the second part of his amendment would be supported by the Uruguayan representative who felt that considerations of a juridical nature should be grouped together.

MRS. BEGTRUP (Denmark) recalled that an inquiry made by the United Nations War Crimes Commission had revealed that the Nazis had used prisoners for medical experiments such as vivisection. She felt that article 4 would be applicable in a case such as she had described. It should, however, be made perfectly clear that members of the Committee were unanimous in thinking that the practice of vivisection on persons whose consent had not been obtained constituted a violation of the most elementary human rights.

Her delegation would return to that subject when the covenant on human rights was considered.

[214]

MR. WATT (Australia) observed that it was easier to understand the scope of an amendment if the authors explained their reasons for submitting it.

He would be happy to hear the USSR representative explain the amendment he had submitted.

THE CHAIRMAN agreed that the discussion was more constructive when an amendment was explained first by its authors.

Moreover, the suggestion had been made that before the discussion of a particular article of the draft declaration was begun, it would be useful to have a brief account of the genesis of the article.

MR. GARCÍA BAUER (Guatemala) thought that, as the ideas underlying the various articles of the draft declaration were well known, such a procedure for each of the twenty-eight articles would mean a great loss of time – of four hours perhaps. Furthermore, he wondered whether the explanations to be given might be considered authoritative.

It might be more useful to ask the members of the Commission on Human Rights for information on certain passages or certain words used in the draft declaration, if the need for such information should be felt.

THE CHAIRMAN replying to the representative of Guatemala, stated that the explanations of the text, even though not authoritative, would give the genesis of the article, thus making it possible for members of the Committee to know what ideas had been put forward in the Commission on Human Rights.

Should the occasion arise, he would be happy to furnish any explanations that might be necessary. He would, moreover, ask those members of the Commission on Human Rights who would like to do so to be prepared to explain the articles if questions regarding their drafting were raised.

The meeting rose at 6:15 p.m.

A/C.3/SR.110<sup>53</sup>
22 October 1948

Summary Record of the Hundred and Tenth Meeting
[of the Third Committee]

Held at the Palais de Chaillot, Paris, on Friday,
 22 October 1948, at 10:45 a.m.

Chairman: MR. CHARLES MALIK (Lebanon)

34. Draft international declaration of human rights (E/800) (continued)

Article 4 (continued)

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) drew attention to his amendment to article 4 (E/800, page 32), the purpose of which was to strengthen and clarify the draft text. Certain representatives had already pointed out that slavery was not a thing of the past and according to a letter he had received from an anti-slavery organization, forms of it still existed in Africa, Asia and parts of America. It was necessary, therefore, to state clearly that the practice was prohibited; otherwise, article 4 would have historical rather than practical significance.

<sup>53</sup> The text of the document is from Official Records of the General Assembly, Third Session, 1948, pp. 214–23.

[215]

It was necessary, also, to prohibit the slave trade in order to ensure the just punishment of traffickers. He reminded the Committee that in a speech on the American Constitution, Jefferson had recommended the abolition of the slave trade, as well as slavery. Congress, unfortunately, had refused to accept his point of view. It had been stated that eight million people were living in conditions of slavery. Even if that figure were not correct, the practice existed and it was for the United Nations to guarantee the freedoms set forth in the first articles.

The USSR delegation also wanted to include a provision stating that violations were punishable by law. It was a crime to treat a human being as an inanimate object. It was also a crime to carry on clandestine activities, or to indulge in such crude practices as existed under the peonage system in parts of Latin America.

The Nazis' attempts to reintroduce conditions of slavery showed that it was a problem which merited the United Nations' most careful attention.

He did not object to paragraph 2, of article 4, either as part of that article or as a separate article.

MR. AQUINO (Philippines) expressed his delegation's deep interest in the draft declaration and recalled the important contribution which had been made to it by General Romulo. That contribution reflected the long experience which the Philippine people had had of the methods of constitutional government.

The declaration was a solid and progressive document and perhaps represented a preliminary step in the development of a common political philosophy for all men. It would be unwise, therefore, to alter its provisions for the unimportant reasons that had been put forward during the debate.

The Cuban representative's proposal (A/C.3/224) concerning paragraph 2 of article 4 was not acceptable. Customs varied from country to country and what was not customary was not necessarily degrading. The Nazis could have claimed that their torture chambers were perfectly legal because it was customary to make use of them in Nazi Germany.

Article 4 was in no way a repetition of the provisions of the first three articles; it defined specific rights which were so vital and important that they could not be taken for granted. It had to be remembered that every time men kept silent in face of an injustice, freedom suffered a defeat.

MRS. KALINOWSKA (Poland) pointed out that while the principles contained in article 4, paragraph 1 would seem to be generally accepted at the current stage of civilization, hundreds of thousands of human beings had, from 1939 to 1944, been treated as slaves. The degradation which they had had to suffer was common knowledge. The Polish people, many of whom still remain in displaced persons camps, had been particularly badly treated. She would return to [216] that question when the Third Committee came to discuss the item of its agenda on refugees.

Slavery still existed; an example of it was to be found in the Trusteeship Council's report.<sup>1</sup> The practice of selling little girls was being carried on in one of the Trust Territories.

The USSR proposal was designed to provide the protection of the law where conditions of slavery or the slave trade existed. It was conformity with the provisions of article 6 and would add the necessary strength to article 4.

The Polish delegation warmly supported its adoption.

MR. WATT (Australia) said his remarks would refer to the form and not to the substance of article 4 and as such, could not be interpreted as a defence of or the slave trade.

After consulting the Oxford Dictionary, he had come to the conclusion that it would be wiser to omit the word "involuntary" before "servitude" in the English text.

He formally proposed the substitution of the word "should" for "shall" in paragraphs 1 and 2 as the word "shall" might give the impression that the document was a covenant rather than a declaration and might involve difficulties for national legislatures.

MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) said the USSR proposal was the most concrete that had been put forward, but it did not entirely satisfy his delegation's views. Both involuntary and voluntary servitude had to be abolished and that fact should be made clear in article 4.

He suggested that a small drafting committee should be set up to prepare an acceptable text and asked that it should keep in mind the Uruguayan proposal concerning article 9, for the abolition of the death penalty. It would not be in conformity with the right to security of person, laid down in article 3, for the declaration to permit the death penalty.

MR. HABIB (India) said that all the points raised during the discussion on article 4 were covered in the new Indian Constitution.<sup>54</sup> The achievements of Lord Mansfield,<sup>55</sup> Wilberforce,<sup>56</sup> Zachary Macaulay<sup>57</sup> and others had ensured full recognition of the evils of slavery. If there still existed millions of slaves, it was a disgrace to mankind.

<sup>54</sup> The Indian constitution was enacted on 26 November 1949, more than a year after these remarks were made. The reference must be to the draft that was then being debated. Part III of the Indian Constitution is entitled "Fundamental Rights". Under the sub-head "Right against Exploitation", article 23 states: "23. Prohibition of traffic in human beings and forced labour. (1) Traffic in human beings and begar and other similar forms of forced labour are prohibited and any contravention of this provision shall be an offence punishable in accordance with law. (2) Nothing in this article shall prevent the State from imposing compulsory service for public purposes, and in imposing such service the State shall not make any discrimination on grounds only of religion, race, caste or class or any of them." There is no explicit prohibition of slavery in the Indian Constitution.

<sup>55</sup> Lord Mansfield (William Murray) (1705–93) was an English jurist who, as Lord Chief Justice, ruled that slavery was unlawful in England and Wales (R. v Knowles, ex parte Somersett (1772) 20 State Tr 1).

<sup>56</sup> An English parliamentarian and philanthropist, William Wilberforce (1759–1833) led the movement to abolish the slave trade. His campaign led to adoption of the Slave Trade Act 1807, which suppressed the slave trade, and the Slavery Abolition Act 1833, which brought an end to slavery in most of the British Empire.

<sup>57</sup> Zachary Macaulay (1768–1838) was an associate of Wilberforce. He was one of the founders of the Society for the Mitigation and Gradual Abolition of Slavery, forerunner of the Anti-Slavery Society.

The words “No one shall . . . be held in slavery or involuntary servitude” in the draft text were, however, sufficient to prohibit the slave trade.

He hoped that the word “involuntary” would be retained, as the term “voluntary servitude” was in current use in India to describe a particular type of military or labour contract.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) felt that the insertion of the word “non-customary” would strengthen article 4 and he supported the first part of the USSR amendment. The proposal for a special reference to the slave trade was an excellent one; as early as 1817 and later in 1835, treaties specifically prohibiting the slave trade had been concluded.<sup>58</sup>

[<sup>1</sup>] See Official Records of the Third Session of General Assembly, Supplement No. 4 (A/603).

[217]

He supported the Uruguayan representative’s suggestion for a drafting sub-committee.

MR. RADEVANOVIC (Yugoslavia) supported the USSR proposal as it was more forceful and precise than the basic text. It incorporated all the important aspects of the question, including clandestine practices and the provision for punishment. It had been suggested that the article could be deleted because it merely repeated the substance of articles 1 and 3. That was not the case; to say that men were born free and equal did not necessarily mean that they would remain so.

MR. PLAZA (Venezuela) said that the Spanish text of article 4, paragraph 1 was not quite clear in meaning. The words “involuntary servitude” did not seem to add anything of substance to the articles. The draft declaration should cover all forms of slavery and not only the most obvious ones. In modern times there was a new form of slavery brought about by economic conditions.

He proposed the following amendment to take that point into account and to clarify the existing text:

“Unless already in existence a legal system should be set up, designed to avoid working conditions which might in any way undermine the freedom and dignity of human beings.”

He supported the first part of the USSR amendment in which the slave trade was specifically prohibited.

<sup>58</sup> As early as 1810, a treaty between Britain and Portugal suppressed slavery. Others soon followed, including an 1813 treaty between Britain and Sweden and the Treaty of Paris of 1814, between Britain and France, which declared the slave trade “repugnant to the principles of natural justice”. The representative of Uruguay was referring to the 1817 treaty between Britain and Spain. The latter agreed to suppress the slave trade north of the Equator immediately and elsewhere by 1820. The British navy had the right to search Spanish ships. Because the slave trade continued, a new agreement was reached in 1835 whereby the authority of the British navy was expanded. Mixed commissions were set up in Freetown and Havana. See: Leslie Bethell, “The Mixed Commissions for the Suppression of the Transatlantic Slave Trade in the Nineteenth Century”, (1966) 7 Journal of African History 79.

With regard to the Cuban amendment (A/C.3/224) he thought that the word “inhuman” should be retained as it was wider in meaning than the word “cruel”.

The inclusion of the word “non-customary” was inadvisable as it might be taken to refer to advanced methods of punishment, which might be introduced at a later date, as well as to the degrading punishment dealt with in the article.

He would support the representative of Denmark, if she were to make a concrete proposal to cover the point she had raised at the previous meeting, concerning the way in which the Nazis had used their prisoners for medical experiments.

He agreed with the representative of Uruguay that a sub-committee should be set up to prepare an acceptable text for article 4.

MR. CASSIN (France) said that the basic draft of article 4 had not been confined to a simple prohibition of slavery in all its forms because the Commission on Human Rights had thought it necessary to include some wording which would cover indirect and concealed forms of slavery. The word “servitude” had been used to cover such aspects as the way in which the Nazis had treated their prisoners for war and the traffic in women and children. In French the expression servitude volontaire did not have any meaning.

[218]

He favoured the retention of paragraph 1 in its existing form but he would accept the first part of the USSR amendment, in which specific reference was made to the slave trade.

He was opposed to the second part of that amendment as it mentioned punishment according to law and omitted to mention international conventions. It should not be forgotten that a slavery convention had been drawn up at Geneva in 1926. Another defect of the second part of the USSR amendment was that it provided only for punishment and made no mention of prevention.

He supported the original draft of paragraph and said that its provisions were essential to supplement and clarify those set forth in articles 1 and 3.

He suggested that the Committee should first decide whether it wished to include in article 4 the provisions set forth in the USSR amendment, and should then set up a drafting sub-committee to prepare a final text.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) agreed that the word “involuntary” should not be included before the word “servitude”.

With regard to the amendment just submitted by representative of Venezuela, he suggested that it would be more appropriate in connexion with article 20, where it would form a very useful clarification.

He agreed with the principle underlying the first part of the amendment and would support it as an addition to the basic text but not as a substitution.

He agreed with the remarks made the representative of Australia with regard to the second part of the USSR amendment. If the idea of punishment were included in article 4 it should also be included in the other articles, and the document would then resemble a convention rather than a declaration.

With regard to the Cuban amendment, he agreed with the representative of Venezuela that the word “inhuman” was more comprehensive than “cruel” and should therefore be retained.

The representative of Uruguay had proposed that paragraph 2 should be transferred from article 4 to article 9. Such a transfer would not be appropriate as article 9 dealt solely with individuals who had been accused of a crime whereas article 4 was much wider in scope.

MR. DEMCHENKO (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) pointed out that the first three articles of the draft declaration had been adopted with some abstentions but no contrary votes;<sup>1</sup> he hoped that article 4 would be adopted unanimously.

He raised objections to the second paragraph, whether it was retained as part of article 4 or made into a separate article.

The first paragraph, however, was not at all clear, as was shown by the discussion it had aroused. He felt that the retention of the word “involuntary” in the English text might provide an escape clause, as slave owners would be able to evade the provisions of the declaration by saying that their slaves had entered into servitude voluntarily.

<sup>[1]</sup> See 100th, 102nd and 107th meetings.

[219]

It could not be denied that the slave trade still existed and that slavery had been reintroduced by the Nazi regime and it was, therefore, essential to include a specific prohibition of slavery in the declaration.

It had been argued that the second part of the USSR amendment could not be accepted as it involved obligations on the part of the State. However, that argument was not valid as the amendment only stated that violations of the principle should be punished, without stating how that was to be done.

He urged representatives to adopt the USSR amendment as it would clarify the article and help to bring about unanimity.

THE CHAIRMAN declared the general debate on article 4 closed.

He believed that it might be helpful if the Committee took into account a resolution prepared by the Belgian delegation<sup>1</sup> which would be put before the Committee during the discussion of chapter III of the report of the Economic and Social Council. That resolution would ask the General Assembly to request the Economic and Social Council to appoint, for a period not exceeding three years, a small committee of experts on the problem of slavery to examine it in its various forms in all countries where it still existed.

He reminded the Committee of the decision it had taken at the 99th meeting that amendments dealing with substance should not be admitted after the expiry of the agreed time limit. The Venezuelan amendment introduced new ideas of substance; it could not therefore be admitted.

MR. PLAZA (Venezuela) said that he would not insist on his amendment. He wished to make clear, however, that he had not intended to introduce new matters of substance but merely to sum up ideas already expressed in the course of the debate. The wording proposed by the USSR appeared to cover the same ground as the Venezuelan suggestion.

He would withdraw his amendment on the understanding that the words covered all forms of slavery.

MR. DE LEÓN (Panama) withdrew his amendment (A/C.3/220).

THE CHAIRMAN called for a vote on the Uruguayan proposal.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile), supported by the representative of Mexico, said that the French representative's suggestion that the matter of principle should be voted upon first might form an amendment to the Uruguayan proposal.

THE CHAIRMAN said that the vote had to be taken on the text, not on the principle.

MR. CASSIN (France) said he would not insist on his suggestion.

MR. CHANG (China) asked for clarification of the proposed sub-committee's terms of reference. The matters which it was to examine might not be complex enough to warrant setting up such a sub-committee.

<sup>[1]</sup> Document A/C.3/293.

[220]

MRS. CORBET (United Kingdom) wondered whether the sub-committee's terms of reference could include incorporating the amendments before the Committee since no vote had yet been taken on them.

THE CHAIRMAN explained that the sub-committee would be asked to collate the amendments with the text submitted by the Commission and present the new text to the Committee for approval.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said he saw no need for the sub-committee proposed by Uruguay and suggested that that proposal should be withdrawn. The Committee could make its decisions for itself. All delegations appeared to agree in principle with the USSR amendment. To set up a sub-committee would merely lead to further delay in voting on article 4.

The USSR amendment was furthest removed from the text and should therefore be voted first.

THE CHAIRMAN ruled that the Uruguayan proposal should be voted first, since it was a matter of procedure. He put the Uruguayan proposal to the vote.

The proposal was rejected by 30 votes to 6, with 8 abstentions.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba), supported by the representative of Mexico, pointed out that some Latin-American representatives found it difficult to appreciate drafting changes made in English. He asked the Chairman to discuss the question informally with those representatives. A precedent for such action had been set at San Francisco.

THE CHAIRMAN said that he would take up the question with the Secretariat.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that adoption of the text proposed by the USSR delegation would set at rest the doubts about interpretation expressed by the representative of Cuba.

The text proposed by his delegation should be voted on in two parts: first, the words "slavery and the slave trade are prohibited in all their aspects"; then, the remainder of the text. The first phrase, substituted for the Commission's text, should clarify the question.

MR. CHANG (China) pointed out that in document E/800 (page 32) the USSR amendment was referred to as an addition; the USSR representative was describing it as a substitution. As an addition, it might be regarded rather as a method of implementing the original text than as a statement of principle. If taken in that sense, it was out of place in the declaration.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) replied that the wording of his amendment covered the same ideas as those contained in the basic text. If the phrase in the basic text were retained, the text would be repetitious.

[221]

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) supported by the representatives of Chile and France, proposed that the USSR amendment should be taken as an addition to the original text.

He agreed with the representative of the USSR that the parts of his amendment should be voted on separately, in accordance with rule 118 of the rules of procedure.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) emphasized that he contemplated the first phrase in his amendment as the first phrase in the final text. If the representatives of China and Chile wished then to add the words of the original text, he would not object; but he still thought that those words would be redundant.

MR. CHANG (China) said that if the USSR amendment were taken in substitution for the original text, he would vote against it. Prohibition of the slave trade needed further study. Moreover, the phrase appeared to be merely a measure directing implementation of the original text.

MR. GARCÍA BAUER (Guatemala) said he wished to explain his vote, in accordance with rule 80 of the rules of procedure. While he agreed with the principle of the USSR amendment, he could not vote either for its substance or its form since it should appear in the covenant on human rights rather than in the declaration.

He was equally opposed, however, to the suggestion made by the representatives of Cuba, Chile and France.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) requested that the vote should be taken on the place which the first phrase in the USSR amendment should occupy in the article. He wished it to stand first. He asked for a vote by roll-call.

THE CHAIRMAN said that the vote would be taken only on the question of including the USSR amendment. A sub-committee could later decide on the order of the parts. The USSR delegation could repeat his contention that his first phrase should come first when that sub-committee discussed the order.

He called for a vote by roll-call on the proposal that the first phrase in the USSR amendment should be included in article 4.

A vote was taken by roll-call as follows:

In favour: Argentina, Belgium, Brazil, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Chile, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, France, Greece, Honduras, Lebanon, Mexico, Panama, Peru, Poland, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Uruguay, Venezuela, Yugoslavia.

Against: Australia, Canada, China, Denmark, Guatemala, Iceland, India, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Philippines, Sweden, Syria, Turkey, Union of South Africa, United Kingdom, United States of America.

Abstaining: Afghanistan, Egypt, Ethiopia.

The proposal was adopted by 22 votes to 17, with 3 abstentions.

[222]

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the second phrase of the USSR amendment.

The phrase rejected by 22 votes to 10, with abstentions.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) withdrew his amendment (A/C.3/224).

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the proposal to delete the word “involuntary” in the English text.

The proposal was adopted by 17 votes to 15, with 4 abstentions.

MR. PLAZA (Venezuela) withdrew his proposal to change the word “or” to “nor”.

MR. WATT (Australia) made a formal proposal to substitute the word “should” for the word “shall” throughout the draft declaration.

The proposal was rejected by 17 votes to 6 with 15 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote paragraph 1, with the omission of the word “involuntary” in the English text.

Paragraph 1, as amended in respect of the English text, was adopted by 35 votes to none, with 4 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote paragraph 2.

Paragraph 2 was adopted by 40 votes to none, with 1 abstention.

MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) stated that he had abstained solely because of his desire to reintroduce an amendment to article 9.

MR. CHANG (China) suggested that a small sub-committee should be set up to make final drafting changes and that the vote on the whole article should be postponed until the following meeting.

MRS. CORBET (United Kingdom) said that the form of the article was not satisfactory. She suggested that the representative of the USSR might consent to modifications of the wording provided that his general concept were retained.

She agreed with the proposal of the representative of China.

MR. CONTOUMAS (Greece) said that he had voted for both the first phrase in the USSR amendment and the first paragraph of the text submitted by the Commission on Human Rights. He felt that a text including both might appear redundant.

He therefore supported the proposal of the representative of China.

THE CHAIRMAN called for a vote on article 4 as a whole. He pointed out that adoption of the whole article did not prejudice the order in which the parts of that article would stand in the final draft that would be considered by a sub-committee.

[223]

Article 4, as amended, was adopted by 36 votes to none, with 4 abstentions.

MR. CHANG (China) explained that he had not taken part in the vote because he considered that the text of the article was not satisfactory.

The meeting rose at 1:40 p.m.

A/C.3/SR.111<sup>59</sup>

23 October 1948

Summary Record of the Hundred and Eleventh Meeting
[of the Third Committee]

Held at the Palais de Chaillot, Paris, on Saturday
23 October 1948, at 3:15 p.m.

Chairman: MR. CHARLES MALIK (Lebanon).

35. Draft international declaration of human rights (E/800) (continued)

Article 5<sup>1</sup>

THE CHAIRMAN drew attention to the amendments to article 5 submitted by the delegations of Cuba (A/C.3/224) and Uruguay (A/C.3/268).

<sup>59</sup> The text of the document is from Official Records of the General Assembly, Third Session, 1948, pp. 223–31.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) explained that the purpose of his amendment was not to modify the substance of the original text of article 5 but to express the legal concept more clearly. The Cuban amendment repeated the terms used in a corresponding article by the authors of the Bogotá declaration. Although it was important that a declaration of human rights should be drafted in terms that were clear and comprehensible to all, legal articles demanded a precise vocabulary and should be drafted in a way which would be free from ambiguity.

For those reasons the Cuban delegation supported the amendment submitted by the delegation of Uruguay. The word “person” had an accepted and definite meaning in law and could be interpreted as not applying to the physical person alone. The addition suggested by the Uruguayan delegation was consequently necessary and the Cuban delegation would vote in favour of that amendment.

MRS. CORBET (United Kingdom) stated that her delegation would vote for the basic text of article 5.

She drew attention of the representative of Uruguay to the fact that the English term “person before the law” referred unequivocally to a human being, to a physical person. With reference to a company, for instance, the term in English would be “a legal person before the law”. For the English-speaking delegations, article 5 in its original text was in no way ambiguous.

Furthermore, the United Kingdom delegation could not accept the amendment submitted by the Cuban delegation since the concept of “fundamental civil rights” was not defined in Anglo-Saxon law. Mrs. Corbet was sure that the rights to which Mr. Pérez Cisneros had referred were included in the laws of her country, and she thought that the majority of them were embodied in the articles of the declaration.

<sup>[1]</sup> Article 7 of the draft universal declaration of human rights (A/777).

[224]

Delegations could always point out any omissions that they would like to have rectified: thus the United Kingdom delegation reserved the right to raise the question of the right of petition, of which no mention was made in any article. If the formula suggested by the Cuban delegation were accepted, the United Kingdom delegation would insist on the inclusion in the Covenant on Human Rights of a very clear definition of “fundamental civil rights”.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) recalled that article 5 had been discussed at great length both in the Drafting Committee and in the Commission on Human Rights.<sup>1</sup> Representatives of various countries, and of the Anglo-Saxon countries in particular, had emphasized that the French term did not in their opinion have a precise meaning; they had been unable to find a corresponding English legal term for it. The very concept was lacking in Anglo-Saxon law.

The Commission on Human Rights had finally accepted the explanations of the representative of France who had been supported by the representatives of Latin-American countries, the legal systems of which were modelled on French law. Mr. Cassin had, in particular, argued the necessity of adopting an article safeguarding the individual as a person before the law, side by side with articles 3 and 4, which protected his physical integrity. The Commission on Human Rights had then recognized that the aim of article 5 was to assure to every human being the right to exercise rights, to enter into contractual obligations, and be represented in actions at law.

The Chilean delegation would vote for the basic text, together with the modification suggested by the Uruguayan delegation, since the latter offered a safeguard against any misinterpretation which might arise from the special connotation given to the word “person” in certain legal systems.

MR. PLAZA (Venezuela) stated that his delegation would vote for the amendment submitted by the Uruguayan delegation for the same reasons as those given by Mr. Santa Cruz.

It would vote against the amendment submitted by the Cuban delegation since the last part of it seemed to be redundant.

The Venezuelan delegation would vote for the original text, which was clear and precise.

MR. CONTOUMAS (Greece) agreed with the representative of Venezuela that the last part of the Cuban amendment, taken in conjunction with the first, might lead to misunderstanding.

With regard to the Uruguayan amendment, which he considered to be well founded, he drew the Committee’s attention to the fact that the draft declaration used the terms “human beings” (article 1), “everyone” (article 2), and (in the French text) tout individu (article 3) quite indifferently. The Greek delegation considered that it would be preferable to accept a uniform terminology in a declaration of human rights; it favoured “human being” or individu.

[<sup>1</sup>] See document E/CN.4/SR.58.

[225]

MR. CARTER (Canada) said that his delegation would vote for the basic text of article 5 since it understood the spirit in which the article had been drafted.

Canadian national law had for a long time admitted the right of every individual to recognition of his juridical personality; the Canadian delegation therefore, for its part, could not attach much importance to the statement of so obvious a principle in the declaration. But it was important to keep in mind the international significance which the declaration of human rights would possess, the necessity of taking into account the different legal and cultural traditions of the countries that would sign it, and particularly the possibility that certain persons might be deprived of their juridical personality by an arbitrary act of their Government – Nazi Germany afforded a recent example. Consequently the Canadian delegation would approve the text of article 5 as given in the draft submitted by the Commission on Human Rights.

MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) said that the purpose of the amendment submitted by his delegation was quite clear. The draft declaration made use of three terms applied indiscriminately to man as possessor of rights: person, individu (in the French text) and human being. But the word “person” could, according to certain systems of law, as for instance that of Uruguay, apply to all possessors of rights, even when they were not individual human beings, but, for instance, business concerns. It was in recognition of the fact that certain national legal systems admitted that extensive interpretation of the word “person” that the Uruguayan delegation had considered it necessary to define more clearly the meaning of article 5 indicating more precisely the possessor of the right to whom the article referred.

MR. BAGDADI (Egypt) approved the amendment suggested by the Uruguayan delegation, but asked that it be carried right through the draft declaration in order to achieve uniformity. It was not possible in a declaration of human rights to refer only to the individual, that is, to the physical person, and exclude the juridical person.

He must, moreover, emphasize that the amendment submitted by the Cuban delegation was the only amendment which brought out the importance of the problem. However, it raised legal difficulties. Did the Cuban delegation refer to rights and obligations recognized by a certain legal system or did it intend to lay down a precise quantum of rights and obligations in its statement that everyone had the right to recognition everywhere as possessing rights and obligations? The last part of the Cuban amendment seemed to indicate definite limits.

In his opinion, the basic text of article 5 was so wide in scope that its application would be difficult. For that reason the Egyptian delegation would prefer the amendment submitted by the Cuban delegation. The amendment would, however, be improved by the addition of a detailed enumeration and definition of the rights covered by the expression “fundamental civil rights”.

[226]

MR. CASSIN (France) was pleased to note that, on the whole, no substantive objections had been raised in connexion with article 5. The representative of Canada had stated that, although the legal system of his country made the adoption of such an article seem unnecessary to him, the recent examples of the war had shown a tendency on the part of the Governments to deprive persons of their juridical personality.

The Committee’s task was to prepare the way for a new era in which the fundamental rights of all human beings would be respected. Its duty was to proclaim to the whole world that there was not a single human being who could not possess both rights and obligations.

He emphasized the fact that the expression “person before the law” covered everything contained in the amendment submitted by the Cuban delegation. The basic purpose of article 5 became evident if it was considered in conjunction with the preceding article: article 4 dealt with slavery, which was the abasement of the human being from the physical point of view, while article 5 was intended to combat and to deny the possibility of his abasement from the legal point of view.

During the initial work of the Commission on Human Rights the French delegation had submitted a draft recommending that some mention of fundamental civil rights<sup>1</sup> should be included in the declaration and it had even submitted a proposal to that effect. His delegation had taken up that attitude because it had noticed that, even apart from the countries which pursued a policy of systematic oppression, there were others with more liberal legislations which had tended to deprive aliens living within their territory of the exercise of fundamental rights: for example, the right to enter into marriage, to acquire property or to take legal proceedings.

The French delegation had been very anxious to combat that disastrous tendency. However, the discussions in the Commission on Human Rights had shown that there were very great difficulties in the way of achieving understanding among peoples of different types of civilization. It was practically impossible to translate the French term droits civils fondamentaux into English. In the Anglo-Saxon legal systems the term “civil rights” implied certain general rights, such as the right of election, the right to freedom of association, the right of freedom of expression, etc.

The decisive argument had been, however, that most of the rights referred to in article 5 were, in fact, embodied in other articles: the right to take legal proceedings in article 7, the right to enter into marriage in article 14, the right to own property in article 15. The only fundamental right which had not been embodied in the declaration had been the right to enter into contracts. After some reflection, the French delegation had eventually decided that the mention of the right to recognition as a person before the law was sufficient and that one of the basic rights included in that term, was precisely the right to enter into contracts, which meant the right to make a purchase, to enter into negotiations for employment, in short, to satisfy the material needs of life.<sup>2</sup>

[<sup>1</sup>] See document E/CN.4/82/Add.8 (article 11).

[<sup>2</sup>] See document E/CN.4/SR.58.

[227]

Thus, in spite of its original attitude, the French delegation had supported and would continue to support the basic text of the draft declaration.

MR. SANDIFER (United States of America) thanked Mr. Cassin for the way in which he had clarified the question. He emphasized the fact that it would be better not to include in a text as universal in scope as the declaration of human rights the expression “fundamental civil rights”, which had no precise legal connotation in some countries.

The text prepared by the Commission on Human Rights guaranteed the legal status of all human beings; it therefore set forth quite clearly the principle which article 5 was intended to express, and the United States delegation would support that text.

MR. CARRERA ANDRADE (Ecuador) thought that, although the Cuban amendment seemed to broaden the scope of article 5 it was in fact a limitation of that article, as it proposed that the idea of recognition as a "person before the law" should be replaced by the more limited idea of "fundamental civil rights".

He would vote for the original text of article 5 and would not object to the substitution of the term "every human being" for "everyone", as proposed in the amendment submitted by the delegation of Uruguay.

MR. WATT (Australia) pointed out that the difficulties in connexion with article 5 did not arise out of a difference of opinion on the substance of the article, but out of differences between the various legal systems of the Member States.

He was opposed to the amendment submitted by the Cuban delegation. If that amendment were adopted, it would have to be supplemented by a long enumeration of man's rights and obligations, which would be out of place in the declaration under discussion.

Moreover, the Australian delegation thought that the idea of the "physical person" was implied in the original text, and that the first part of the amendment submitted by Uruguay was therefore unnecessary. His delegation would not, however, object to the substitution of the words "human being" for "everyone".

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) stated that, according to the legal system in force in his country, the idea of the individual as a "possessor of rights" was quite wide enough and included the rights of the individual from both the juridical and the physical points of view. The original text of article 5 was, therefore, quite satisfactory.

With regard to the Cuban amendment, he said that, according to the theory supported by his delegation, each individual was a possessor of rights and could, therefore, insist that his rights should be recognized wherever he might be, whereas, according to some legal systems, the rights were not considered as belonging to the individual but as being applied to him.

In that connexion, he recalled the lengthy discussions which had taken place in the Commission on Human Rights. As a result of those discussions, it had been agreed that fundamental civil rights were determined both by the domestic law of each State and by a series of international agreements. The question of fundamental human rights had always been a delicate one, especially in connexion with the status of aliens. Some countries did not treat aliens living in their territory in the same way as their own nationals. There were differences in treatment, for example, with regard to the right to freedom of movement and the right to own property. In his opinion, it would be difficult and even dangerous to mention fundamental civil rights in the declaration, without enumerating them.

His delegation felt, however, that the idea of man's obligations, introduced by the Cuban amendment, deserved to be included in the text, although it might be considered that those obligations were implicit in the idea of the "person before the law", mentioned in the basic text of article 5.

He did not object to the substance of the amendment submitted by the delegation of Uruguay, but he felt that it was superfluous. Indeed, the idea of "juridical person" was quite distinct from the idea of "person". The individual, considered as a human being, could only claim recognition of his rights as a physical person. The statement in article 5 was, therefore, complete in itself and the addition of the word "physical" was quite unnecessary.

The representative of the Soviet Union recognized that the amendments submitted by the delegations of Cuba and Uruguay had been inspired by the praiseworthy desire to improve the text of the draft declaration of human rights, but these amendments did not really add anything new to the text of article

His delegation would therefore abstain when those amendments were put to the vote.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) expressed his gratification that during the discussion on his amendment, Professor Cassin had, with great ability, presented the problem in its true light.

The purpose of the Cuban delegation, in submitting an amendment to article 5, had been to state the point of view of the Latin American countries which derived their legislation direct from Roman law and French law.

However, in order not to create difficulties for those delegations whose law was derived from other sources, he would withdraw his amendment, as there was no point in maintaining it after the explanations that had been given.

He stressed the desirability of adopting the Uruguayan amendment, which would make the necessary clarifications in the original text.

He drew attention to the translation difficulties which were constantly being encountered in framing the draft declaration, and asked that the Secretariat should not be given the responsibility for preparing the translations of essential texts. He hoped that the Chairman would take the necessary steps to ensure that the Spanish texts were sub-[229]mitted for preliminary approval by the Spanish-speaking representatives.

THE CHAIRMAN said that the question of the Spanish translation was being studied.

MR. KAYALY (Syria) said his delegation would vote for article 5, with the Uruguayan amendment incorporated in it. He shared the view of many delegations who had suggested that the words "individual" or "human being" should be substituted for "person".

THE CHAIRMAN asked the Uruguayan representative whether he maintained his amendment. He said that, from the discussion to which the amendment had given rise, it was clear that the appropriate expressions should be “every human being” in English and tout être humain in French.

MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) agreed to submit his amendment in that form.

THE CHAIRMAN put the Uruguay amendment the vote.

The Uruguayan amendment was adopted by 27 votes to 3, with 11 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put article 5, as amended, to the vote.

Article 5, as amended, was adopted unanimously.

Article 6<sup>1</sup>

THE CHAIRMAN called attention to the amendments submitted by the delegations of Panama (A/C.3/220), Cuba (A/C.3/224), the Union of South Africa (A/C.3/226) and Mexico (A/C.3/266) respectively.

MR. DE LEÓN (Panama) explained that his delegation had submitted an amendment to article 6 before article 2 had been examined. As the text of article 2 that had been adopted contained the substance of his delegation’s amendment, it was no longer necessary; he therefore withdrew it.

MR. TE WATER (Union of South Africa) recalled that the Committee had considered it preferable not to include the concept of God<sup>2</sup> or of honour<sup>3</sup> in the declaration of human rights. For the same reason, he felt that the terms for article 6, as worded, were not as satisfactory as had been thought originally. In his opinion, the phrase “against any discrimination in violation of this Declaration and against any incitement to such discrimination” limited the scope of the article.

The declaration which the Committee was engaged in drafting represented an attempt to codify the rights of man. It could not be claimed, however, that the declaration included all rights. For that reason, the concept of equality before the law should not be limited to the principles laid down in the declaration.

He cited the example of the Union of South Africa, a highly developed country with legislation which combined harmoniously certain elements of

[<sup>1</sup>] Article 8 of the draft universal declaration of human rights (A/777).

[<sup>2</sup>] See 99th meeting.

[<sup>3</sup>] See 107th meeting.

[230]

Roman law and Dutch law in a very modern system. That legislation guaranteed to everyone, without discrimination on the grounds of race, age, sex or religion, the most complete equality before the law. The judges, whose professional competence was no less notable than their high moral qualities, protected all citizens fairly.

The observations he had made were designed to clarify the meaning of article 6 and to facilitate the Committee's work. If the Committee were not inclined to share his point of view, however, he would not press his amendment.

MR. CAMPOS ORTIZ (Mexico) said, in reply to the Chairman's invitation to submit his amendment, that it would perhaps be desirable to examine the South African amendment first. That amendment modified the text of article 6, while the Mexican delegation's amendment was rather in the nature of an additional article.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) supported Mr. Campos Ortiz' point of view. In his opinion, the Mexican amendment, while relating in essence to article 6, involved the statement of a new right. For that reason, it should take the form of a separate article to follow immediately after article 6.

He said his delegation also intended to submit an article which would come immediately after article 6. He accordingly withdrew the amendment which he had previously submitted to that article.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the Committee had decided that the general debate of an article should apply to all the proposed amendments. The Mexican proposal, as submitted, was an amendment and not a proposal for a separate article. For that reason, he could not accept the procedure suggested by Mr. Campos Ortiz.

MR. CAMPOS ORTIZ (Mexico) reserved his right to submit his amendment in the form of a separate article. In the meantime, he wished to draw attention to some of the aspects of his amendment which seemed to him to be particularly important.

The amendment included a statement of a fundamental right recognized by most national legislations; the right to take legal proceedings on the basis of a prompt and simple procedure which assured protection against the acts of public authorities who violated a person's fundamental rights. It was not a new idea. The constitutions of most Latin American countries included it in precise juridical terms. Further, his amendment only repeated the text of the Bogotá declaration which had been adopted unanimously by the twenty-one Latin-American delegations.

During previous discussions, the Commission on Human Rights had taken the same problem into consideration. At that time, it had been emphasized that the inclusion of such a principle in the declaration of human rights would actually [231] mean the introduction of measures of implementation. He did not deny that fact, but pointed out that such measures were national and not international. The object they were seeking to achieve was to give the Declaration of Human Rights international scope. However, it was still not possible to ensure the protection of the individual except within the sphere of national legislation. It was clear, therefore, that the purpose of the Mexican amendment was not to create a legal obligation for States. The text was rather a recommendation to the signatories of the declaration, inviting them to put into practice the principle it set forth.

In conclusion, he pointed out that the text of his amendment was in no way final. It was a draft only and he would accept any modifications tending to make it briefer and clearer.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the ceremony commemorating United Nations Day would take place at 5 p.m. He requested the Committee to decide whether it would sit until 6 p.m. or whether the meeting should rise.

The Committee decided, by 33 votes to 5, with 1 abstention, to adjourn immediately.

The meeting rose at 5 p.m.

A/C.3/294/Rev.1<sup>60</sup>
25 October 1948

Recapitulation of Amendments to Article 17 of the Draft Declaration (E/800)

(In the chronological order of their submission to the Committee)

Article 17

(Text adopted by the Commission on Human Rights)

Everyone has the right to freedom of opinion and expression; this right includes freedom to hold opinions without interference and to seek, receive and impart information and ideas through any media and regardless of frontiers.

Amendments:

Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (E/800)

Replace the text as adopted by the following:

- “1. In accordance with the principles of democracy and in the interests of strengthening international collaboration and world peace, everyone must be legally guaranteed the right freely to express his opinions and, in particular, freedom of speech and the Press and also freedom of artistic expression. Freedom of speech and the Press shall not be used for purposes of propagating fascism, aggression and for provoking hatred as between nations.

<sup>60</sup> A/C.3/294/Rev.1 was issued on 30 October 1948; this is the date of issuance of A/C.3/294. The revised document contains the Cuban proposal.

- “2. For the purpose of enabling the wider masses of the people and their organizations to give free expression to their opinions, the State will assist and co-operate in making available the material resources (premises, printing presses, paper, etc.) necessary for the publication of democratic organs of the Press.”

Second amendment:

The following changes should be introduced in the text as adopted:

“Everyone has the right to freedom of thought and its expression, wherein is included freedom of conviction and freedom of access to [2] sources of information and means of communication for the transmission of information in the territory of his own country and also in other countries, within limits corresponding to the interests of national security.”

Cuba (A/C.3/232)

Amend to read as follows:

“Every person has the right to freedom of investigation, of opinion, and of the expression and dissemination of thought through any media and regardless of frontiers”.

France (A/C.3/244/Rev.1)

Between the words “impart” and “information”, insert the words: “on his own responsibility” so that the article reads as follows:

“Everyone has the right to freedom of opinion and expression; this right includes freedom to hold opinions without interference and to seek, receive and impart on his own responsibility information and ideas through any media and regardless of frontiers”.

Panama (A/C.3/280)

It is proposed that there be substituted for this article two articles defining separately the freedom of opinion and the freedom of expression as follows:

“Article – Everyone has the right to freedom of opinion, which includes the right to hold opinions without interference and to seek and receive information and ideas through any media, regardless of frontiers.”

“Article – Everyone has the right to freedom of expression, which includes the right to freedom of speech, freedom of the press and freedom to use any media of communication to express opinions or impart information.”

A/C.3/295/Rev.1<sup>61</sup>
25 October 1948

Recapitulation of Amendments to Article 18
of the Draft Declaration (E/800)

(In the chronological order of their submission
to the Committee)

Article 18* – Text adopted by the Commission on Human Rights

Everyone has the right to freedom of assembly and association.

Amendments:

Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (E/800)

Replace the text as adopted by the following:

“In the interests of democracy, a legal guarantee must be provided for freedom of assembly and meeting, street processions, demonstrations and the organization of voluntary societies and unions. All societies, unions and other organizations of a fascist or anti-democratic nature, as well as their activity in any form, are forbidden by law under pain of punishment.”

United States of America (A/C.3/223)

Substitute the following text for the present text:

“Everyone has the right to freedom of assembly and association, especially for the promotion and protection of the rights and freedoms set forth in this Declaration.”

Cuba (A/C.3/232)

Break up and amend as follows:

- (a) Right of assembly

Article No.

“Every person has the right to assemble peaceably with others in a formal public meeting or an informal gathering, in connexion with matters of common interest of any nature”.

- (b) Right of association

<sup>61</sup> A/C.3/295/Rev.1 was issued on 30 October 1948; this is the date of issuance of A/C.3/295. The revised document includes the Cuban proposal.

Article No.

“Every person has the right to associate with others to promote, exercise and protect his legitimate interests of a political, economic, religious, [2] social, cultural, professional, trade union or other nature.”

Uruguay (A/C.3/268)

Insert the word “peaceful” before the word “assembly”, and add the following as paragraph 2:

“No one may be compelled to belong to an association.”

Panama (A/C.3/280)

It is proposed to substitute for this article two different articles defining separately the freedom of assembly and the freedom of association, as follows:

“Article – Freedom to assemble peacefully with others for political, economic, religious, social, cultural and other purposes is the right of everyone.”

“Article – Freedom to form with others associations of a political, economic, religious, social, cultural or any other character, for purposes not inconsistent with these articles, is the right of everyone.”

A/C.3/296/Rev.1<sup>62</sup>

25 October 1948

Recapitulation of Amendments to Article 19 of the Draft Declaration (E/800)

(In the chronological order of their submission
to the Committee)

Article 19

(Text adopted by the Commission on Human Rights)

1. Everyone has the right to take part in the government of his country, directly or through his freely chosen representatives.
2. Everyone has the right of access to public employment in his country.
3. Everyone has the right to a government which conforms to the will of the people.

<sup>62</sup> A/C.3/296/Rev.1 was issued on 30 October 1948; this is the date of issuance of A/C.3/296. The revised document contains the Cuban proposal.

Amendments:Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (E/800)

Include the following in paragraph 3:

“The State shall consider the will of the people as expressed in elections, which shall be conducted periodically and must be universal and equal and be held by secret ballot.”

Yugoslavia (A/C.3/233)<sup>63</sup>

After article 19, add the following:

A

“Any person has the right to the recognition and protection of his nationality and to the free development of the nation to which he belongs.

“National communities, which are in a state community with other nations, are equal in national, political and social rights.

B

“Any national minority, as an ethnical community, has the right to the full development of its ethnical culture and to the free use of its language. It is entitled to have these rights protected by the State.

C

“The rights proclaimed in this Declaration also apply to any person [2] belonging to the population of trust non-self-governing territories.”

Cuba (A/C.3/232)

Amend paragraph 1 to read as follows:

“Every person having legal capacity is entitled to participate in the government of his country, directly or through his representatives chosen by free and periodic elections, which shall be by secret ballot.”

France (A/C.3/244)

Reword paragraph 3 as follows:

“The authority of the law and of any government is founded on the will of the people as expressed at free and genuine periodic elections.”

Colombia and Costa Rica (A/C.3/248)

Add a fourth paragraph:

<sup>63</sup> The amendment by Yugoslavia was deleted as a result of A/C.3/296/Rev.1/Corr.1 of 6 November 1948, which states that it is found in A/C.3/307/Rev.1/Add.1.

“4. Every man has the right to make opposition to the government of his country and to promote its replacement by legal means with equality of electoral opportunities and of access to the means of propaganda.”

Sweden (A/C.3/252)

To make more clear how the will of the people shall find its right expression, so that one can be sure that this will is the real basis of the government, the Swedish delegation proposes to add the following words to the sentence in paragraph 3:

“Everyone . . . to the will of the people, manifested in general and free elections or in equivalent, free voting procedures.”

Egypt (A/C.3/264)

Amend paragraph 3 as follows:

“Everyone has the right to government which acts freely and conforms to the will of the people.”

Uruguay (A/C.3/268)

This article is unacceptable in its present form:

1. This right does not belong to everyone and
2. These acts cannot be performed in the territory of a foreign State.

A/C.3/297/Rev.1<sup>64</sup>

25 October 1948

Recapitulation of Amendments to Article 20
of the Draft Declaration (E/800)

(In the chronological order of their submission
to the Committee)

Article 20* – Text adopted by the Commission on Human Rights

Everyone, as a member of society, has the right to social security and is entitled to the realization, through national effort and international co-operation, and in accordance with the organization and resources of each state, of the economic, social and cultural rights set out below.

<sup>64</sup> A/C.3/297/Rev.1 was issued on 30 October 1948; this is the date of issuance of A/C.3/297. The revised document contains the Cuban proposal.

Amendments:

Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (E/800)

Replace the text as adopted by the following:

“It is the duty of the State and society to take all the necessary measures, including legislative measures, to ensure for every individual a real opportunity to enjoy all the rights mentioned in the Declaration. In view of the special importance of the economic, social and cultural rights enumerated in articles 21 to 26 of the Declaration and, in particular, of the right to social security, it is considered desirable that they be implemented by means of both national efforts and international co-operation, due regard being had to the social, economic and political organization and resources of each State.”

Cuba (A/C.3/232)

Delete “set out below” and substitute the words:

“... essential for his dignity and the free development of his personality.”

Argentina (A/C.3/251)

Substitute the following:

[2]

“Every person has the right to social security which will protect him from the consequences of unemployment, old age and any disabilities arising from causes beyond his control that make it physically or mentally impossible for him to earn a living.”

New Zealand (A./C.3/267)

Delete the following words:

“has the right to social security and”

(Compare proposed New Zealand amendment to article 22.)

Panama (A/C/3/280)

Add after the words social security the phrase from the cradle to the grave, so that the article will read as follows:

“Article 20: Everyone, as a member of society, has the right to social security from the cradle to the grave, and is entitled to the realization, through national effort and international co-operation, and in accordance with the organization and resources of each State, of the economic, social and cultural rights set out below.”

A/C.3/298/Rev.1<sup>65</sup>

25 October 1948

Recapitulation of Amendments to Article 21 of the Draft Declaration (E/800)

(In the chronological order of their submission
to the Committee)

Article 21: (Text adopted by the Commission on Human Rights)

1. Everyone has the right to work, to just and favourable conditions of work and pay and to protection against unemployment.
2. Everyone has the right to equal pay for equal work.
3. Everyone is free to form and to join trade unions for the protection of his interests.

Amendments:

Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (E/800)

After the words “right to work . . . and pay” in paragraph 1, add “and the right to protection against unemployment. The State and society shall guarantee this right by measures calculated to provide everyone with the broadest opportunities for useful work, and to prevent unemployment.

Amendment to paragraph 2:

“Everyone, without distinction as to race, nationality or sex, has the right to equal pay for equal work”.

Proposed supplementary clause to article 21.

“Women shall enjoy equal advantages in their work with men and shall receive equal pay for equal work.”

United States of America (A/C.3/223)

Substitute the following text for the present text of paragraph 2:

“2. Men and women have the right to equal pay for equal work.”

Cuba (A/C.3/232)

Break up and amend paragraph 1 to read as follows:

<sup>65</sup> A/C.3/298/Rev.1 was issued on 30 October 1948; this is the date of issuance of A/C.3/298. The revised document contains the Cuban proposal.

“Every person has the right to work under proper conditions and to follow his vocation freely in so far as existing conditions of employment permit.”

[2]

“Every person has the right to protection against unemployment.”

“Every person who works has the right to receive such remuneration as will, in proportion to his capacity and skill, assure him a standard of living suitable for himself and his family.”

Delete paragraph 3 if the Cuban amendment to article 18 is adopted.

Argentina (A/C.3/251)

Amend paragraph 1 as follows:

“Every person has the right to work, to be protected by society, and to be treated with his rightful dignity in society, so that the spiritual and material needs of the individual and the community may be satisfied and that he may follow his vocation freely, in so far as existing conditions of employment permit.”

For paragraph 2 substitute the following:

“Every person has the right to a fair remuneration for the work which he performs on the basis of equal pay for equal work.”

For paragraph 3 substitute the following:

“Every person has the right to associate with others to promote, exercise and protect his legitimate interests of a political, economic, religious, social, cultural, professional, trade union or other nature.”

Sweden (A/C.3/252)

Being of the opinion that freedom of organization is important as a citizenship freedom, only if completed by the natural liberty to abstain from work, when the individual worker feels that he should not go on working on the economic terms existing or offered, the Swedish delegation proposes adding the following sentence to the end of paragraph 1:

“Everyone has the right to cease to work, when finding it impossible to work on the economic terms existing or offered.”

Lebanon (A/C.3/260)

In paragraph 1 add after the words “everyone has the right to work”, the words “and to free choice of work and of his mode of life”.

New Zealand (A/C.3/267)

Substitute the following for the present text of paragraph 3:

“3. Everyone is entitled to the protection of his interests through the membership of trade unions.”

Uruguay (A/C.3/268)

Add the following new paragraph 4:

“No one may be compelled to belong to a trade union.”

A/C.3/299/Rev.1<sup>66</sup>

25 October 1948

Recapitulation of Amendments to Article 22
of the Draft Declaration (E/800)

(In the chronological order of their submission
to the Committee)

Article 22

(Text adopted by the Commission on Human Rights)

1. Everyone has the right to a standard of living, including food, clothing, housing and medical care, and to social services, adequate for the health and wellbeing of himself and his family and to security in the event of unemployment, sickness, disability, old age or other lack of livelihood or circumstances beyond his control.

2. Mother and child have the right to special care and assistance.

Amendments:

Dominican Republic (A/C.3/217/Corr.2)

Delete paragraph 2 and substitute the following:

“Expectant and nursing mothers and all children have the right to special care and assistance.”<sup>67</sup>

<sup>66</sup> A/C.3/299/Rev.1 was issued on 30 October 1948; this is the date of issuance of A/C.3/299. The revised document contains the Cuban proposal.

<sup>67</sup> This version was inserted pursuant to A/C.3/299/Corr.1.

Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (E/800)

Include the right to social insurance by inserting in paragraph 1 (after the words “in circumstances beyond his control”) the words “and also (if he is gainfully employed) to social insurance at the expense of the State or of his employers, in accordance with the legislation of each country”.

In addition, add the following points also to article 22 in the form of two independent sentences:

“2. Everyone has the right to medical care, and assistance in case of illness.

“3. Everyone has the right to decent housing.

“It is the duty of the State and society to take all necessary steps, including legislation, to ensure that everyone has a real opportunity of [2] enjoying all these rights.”.

Cuba (A/C.3/323)

Break up paragraph 1, and amend to read as follows:

(a) Right to health and wellbeing

Article No.

“Every person has a right to the preservation of his health through sanitary and social measures relating to food, clothing, housing and medical care, to the extent permitted by public and community resources.”

(b) Right to social security

Article No.

“Every person has the right to social security which will protect him from the consequences of unemployment, illness, old age and any disabilities arising from causes beyond his control that make it impossible for him to earn a living.”

Amend paragraph 2 as follows, to form a separate article:

Article No.

“All women, during pregnancy and the nursing period, and all children have the right to special protection, care and aid.”

Yugoslavia (A/C.3/233)

Add paragraph 3:

“According to the rights proclaimed in this Declaration, illegitimate children are equal to legitimate children and have the same right to social protection.”

Argentina (A/C.3/251)

Substitute the following:

“Every person has the right to the preservation of his health through sanitary and social measures relating to food, clothing, housing and care, to the highest extent permitted by public and community resources.

Add thereafter the following paragraph:

“All women, during pregnancy and the nursing period, and all children have the right to such careful protection and special aid as will strengthen the spiritual and moral principles which form the basis of communal life in society.”

Lebanon (A/C.3/260)

Transfer paragraph 2 of this article to article 14, where it will become paragraph 4.

Egypt (A/C.3/264)

Replace the words “mother and child” in paragraph 2 by the words “mothers, children and old persons”.

[3]

New Zealand (A/C.3/267)

Substitute the following for the present text of paragraphs 1 and 2:

“Everyone has the right to social security adequate for health and wellbeing, including food, clothing, housing, medical care and social services, and protection in respect of unemployment, sickness, disability, old age, motherhood, childhood and widowhood.”

A/C.3/300

25 October 1948

Recapitulation of Amendments to Article 23 of the Draft Declaration (E/800)

(In the chronological order of their submission
to the Committee)

Article 23

(Text adopted by the Commission on Human Rights)

1. Everyone has the right to education. Elementary and fundamental education shall be free and compulsory and there shall be equal access on the basis of merit to higher education.

2. Education shall be directed to the full development of the human personality, to strengthening respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms and to combating the spirit of intolerance and hatred against other nations and against racial and religious groups everywhere.

Amendments:

Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (E/800)

Add in paragraph 1 after the first sentence:

“Access to education must be open to all without any distinction as to race, sex, language, material status or party allegiance.”

Denmark (A/C.3/250)

Add as paragraph 3:

“All persons belonging to a racial, national, religious or linguistic minority have the right to establish their own schools and receive teaching in the language of their own choice.”

Argentina (A/C.3/251)

Substitute the following:

“Every person has the right to an education, which should be based on the principles of liberty, ethics and human solidarity.

“Furthermore, every person has the right to an education that will prepare him to lead a decent life, to raise his standard of living, and to be a useful member of society.

[2]

“The right to an education includes the right to equality of opportunity in every case, in accordance with natural talents, merit, and the desire to utilize the resources that the State or the community is in a position to provide.

“Every person has the right to receive free primary education.”

Australia (A/C.3/254)

For the second sentence substitute the following:

“Everyone is entitled to free elementary and fundamental education and to equal access on the basis of merit to higher education.”

Lebanon (A/C.3/260)

Add a new paragraph which will become paragraph 2 and would read as follows:

“Parents have a priority right to choose the kind of education that shall be given to their children.”

Paragraph 2 of the text would become paragraph 3.

Cuba (A/C.3/261)

Break up and amend this article as follows:

“1. Every person has the right to education.

“2. Education shall be directed to the full development of the human personality, to strengthening respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms and to combating the spirit of intolerance and hatred against other nations and against racial and religious groups everywhere.

“3. The right to education includes the right to equality of opportunity in every case, in accordance with natural talents, merits, and the desire to utilize the resources that the State or the community is in a position to provide.

“4. Every person has the right to receive, free, at least a primary education.”

Netherlands (A/C.3/263)

Paragraph 2 to read as follows:

“The primary responsibility for the education of the child rests with the family. Parents have the right to determine the kind of education their children should have.”

Paragraph 2 of the present draft would become paragraph 3.

Mexico (A/C.3/266)

Add at the end of paragraph 2, after “religious groups everywhere”, the following phrase:

“; education shall promote, by every possible means, understanding and friendship among all peoples, as well as an effective support of the [3] pacifist activities of the United Nations.”

New Zealand (A/C.3/267)

(a) Substitute the following two paragraphs for the present text of paragraph 1:

“1. Everyone has the right to education.

“2. Education shall be free and universal with equal access, on the basis of merit, to higher education.”

(b) Delete paragraph 2 of the present text.

Turkey (A/C.3/273)

After the words “higher education”, add: “which should as far as possible be free of charge”.

A/C.3/301

25 October 1948

Recapitulation of Amendments to Article 24
of the Draft Declaration (E/800)

(In the chronological order of their submission
to the Committee)

Article 24: (Text adopted by the Commission on Human Rights)

Everyone has the right to rest and leisure.

Amendments:Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (E/800)

Add to the text adopted:

“Everyone shall be guaranteed rest and leisure either by law or by contractual agreements, particular provision being made for the reasonable limitation of working hours and for periodical paid holidays.”

Philippines (A/C.3/239)

“Everyone has the right to good health and is entitled to due rest and leisure.”

Argentina (A/C.3/251)

Substitute the following text:

“Every person has the right to leisure time, to wholesome recreation, and to the opportunity for advantageous use of his free time to his spiritual, cultural, and physical benefit.”

Cuba (A/C.3/261)

Amend as follows:

“Every person has the right to leisure time and the opportunity for advantageous use of his free time to his spiritual, cultural and physical benefit.”

Egypt (A/C.3/264)

Replace this article by the following text:

“Everyone has the right to rest, reasonable leisure and the opportunity of using his leisure for his mental, cultural and physical development.”

Panama (A/C.3/280)

Add after the word “leisure” the following phrase: in such measure [2] as may be required for the maintenance of the physical and mental health and wellbeing of the working man or woman.

The article would then read as follows:

“Everyone has the right to rest and leisure in such measure as may be required for the maintenance of the physical and mental health and wellbeing of the working man and woman.”

A/C.3/303/Rev.1<sup>68</sup>

25 October 1948

Recapitulation of Amendments to Article 26
of the Draft Declaration (E/800)

(In the chronological order of their submission to the Committee)

Article 26

(Text adopted by the Commission on Human Rights)

Everyone is entitled to a good social and international order in which the rights and freedoms set out in this Declaration can be fully realized.

Amendments:

Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (E/800)

At the beginning of the sentence: “Everyone is entitled to a good social and international order in which . . .” delete the word “good”.

Egypt (A/C.3/264)

To be deleted.

A/C.3/304/Rev.1<sup>69</sup>

25 October 1948

Recapitulation of Amendments to Article 27
of the Draft Declaration (E/800)

(In the chronological order of their submission
to the Committee)

Article 27

(Text as adopted by the Commission on Human Rights)

1. Everyone has duties to the community which enables him freely to develop his personality.

2. In the exercise of his rights, everyone shall be subject only to such limitations as are necessary to secure due recognition and respect for the rights of others and the requirements of morality, public order and general welfare in a democratic society.

<sup>68</sup> A/C.3/303/Rev.1 was issued on 30 October 1948; this is the date of A/C.3/303. A Cuban proposal, A/C.3/224 (“Insert in this article the texts replacing articles 4, 5 and 9”), is removed in the revised document.

<sup>69</sup> A/C.3/304/Rev.1 was issued on 30 October 1948; this is the date of issuance of A/C.3/304. The revised document contains the Cuban proposal.

Amendments:Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (E/800)

Add (after the words “democratic society”):

“... and also the corresponding requirements of the democratic State”.

United States of America (A/C.3/223)

Amend the second paragraph of this article to read as follows:

“2. In the exercise of his rights and freedoms, everyone shall be subject only to such limitations as are necessary to secure due recognition and respect for the rights of others and the requirements of morality, public order and general welfare in a democratic society.”

Cuba (A/C.3/224)

Add the following text:

“Respect for the rights of all requires that each shall do his duty. In all human activity, both social and political, rights and duties are indissolubly linked with one another. While rights enhance individual freedom, duties express the dignity of that freedom.

“Duties of a legal nature presuppose other duties of a moral nature which facilitate their understanding and serve as their foundation.

[2]

“It is man’s duty to practise, uphold and promote culture by all means at his disposal, for culture is the highest social and historical expression of the human spirit.

“Morality being the noblest product of culture, it is the duty of all to respect it at all times.”

Egypt (A/C.3/264)

Amend paragraph 2 as follows:

“In the exercise of his rights, everyone shall be subject only to such limitations as are necessary to secure due recognition and respect for the rights of others and the requirements of loyalty, good faith, morality, public order and general welfare in a democratic society.”

Add a new paragraph with the following text:

“These rights can in no case be exercised contrary to the principles and purposes of the United Nations.”

New Zealand (A/C.3/267)

(a) Delete paragraph 1.

(b) Delete the words “morality, public order and the” from the present text of paragraph 2.

Uruguay (A/C.3/268)

In paragraph 2 substitute the words “prescribed by law solely for the purpose of securing” for the words “necessary to secure”.

A/C.3/306*25 October 1948*Amendment to the Article on Measures of Implementation (E/800)*Article

(The Commission on Human Rights considered the following article, since measures of implementation were not discussed in its third session.)

“Everyone has the right, either individually or in association with others, to petition or to communicate with the public authorities of the State of which he is a national or in which he resides, or with the United Nations.”

Amendments:

France (A/C.3/244/Rev.1/Corr.1)

“Everyone has the right, either individually or in association with others, to petition or to communicate with the public authorities of the State of which he is a national or in which he resides. He also has the right to petition or to communicate with the competent organs of the United Nations in matters relating to human rights.”

Cuba (A/C.3/261)

Amend as follows:

“Every person has the right, either individually or in association with others, to petition or to communicate with any competent authority, for reasons of either general or private interest, and the right to obtain prompt action thereon.”

A/C.3/307*25 October 1948*Proposed additional articles to the draft Declaration (E/800)

(In the chronological order of their submission
to the Committee)

Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (E/800)

Add to the text adopted a separate new paragraph in place of the corresponding article 31 of the Geneva text rejected by the Commission:

“All persons, irrespective of whether they belong to the racial, national or religious minority or majority of the population, have the right to their own ethnic or national culture, to establish their own schools and receive teaching in their native tongue, and to use that tongue in the press, at public meetings, in the courts and in other official premises.”

Cuba (A/C.3/216)

Insert the following article:

“Any person shall have the right to offer appropriate resistance to manifest acts of oppression or tyranny.”

Cuba (A/C.3/261)

Insert the following article:

“Every person may resort to the courts to ensure respect for his legal rights. There should likewise be available to him a simple, brief procedure whereby justice will protect him from acts of authority that, to his prejudice, violate any fundamental human rights.”

Lebanon (A/C.3/262)

Add the following as article 29:

“All laws in any state shall be in conformity with the purpose and principles of the United Nations, as embodied in the Charter, in so far as they deal with human rights.”

[2]

Egypt (A/C.3/264)

After article 28, add the following article:

“The nature and the extent of the measures to be taken to give effect to the rights laid down in this Declaration shall if necessary be defined in a subsequent instrument.”

A/C.3/308

25 October 1948

Mexico: Amendment to article 6 of the draft
Declaration (E/800)

Add as a second paragraph to article 6 the following:

“Everyone has the right to an effective judicial remedy for acts violating his fundamental constitutional rights.”

A/C.3/309

25 October 1948

Mexico, Chile, Venezuela: Amendment to article 6
of the draft Declaration (E/800)

Add as a second paragraph to article 6 the following:

“Everyone has the right to an effective judicial remedy by the competent national tribunals for acts violating his fundamental rights granted him by the constitution or by law.”

A/C.3/310

25 October 1948

Original Text: French

Cuba: Addendum to Article 6 of the draft
Declaration (E/800)

Add the following paragraph to Article 6:

“Every person should have available to him a simple, brief procedure for obtaining the protection of the courts against acts of authority that, to his prejudice, affect any of the rights established by the present Declaration”.

A/C.3/SR.112<sup>70</sup>

25 October 1948

Summary Record of the Hundred and Twelfth Meeting
[of the Third Committee]

Held at the Palais de Chaillot, Paris, on Monday,
25 October 1948, at 3 p.m.

Chairman: MR. CHARLES MALIK (Lebanon).

<sup>70</sup> The text of the document is from Official Records of the General Assembly, Third Session, 1948, pp. 231–41.

36. Draft international declaration of human rights (E/800) (continued)

Article 6 (continued)

MR. BAGDADI (Egypt), resumed the discussion on the amendments to article 6 submitted by the delegations of South Africa (A/C.3/226) and Mexico (A/C.3/266) respectively.

He was opposed to the first part of the South African amendment. He suggested the deletion of the words “and against all incitement to such discrimination”. He wondered whether they referred to incitement by States or by individuals. In any case, the phrase pertained to a factual situation, whereas the declaration should be confined to a statement of principles. He consequently asked that the amendment be put to the vote in two parts.

The Egyptian representative considered it desirable, but thought it belonged rather in article 8.

MRS. KALINOWSKA (Poland) asserted that approximately five-sevenths of the population of the Union of South Africa did not enjoy equal rights. The South African representative had contended that there was no discrimination in the courts of the Union; she wondered why, if that [232] were so, he should object to the inclusion of a statement on the prevention of discrimination in the declaration of human rights. Instead of proposing specific and progressive amendments, he had suggested the deletion of the provision against discrimination in article 6. Discrimination certainly existed in other countries and the declaration would have universal scope.

The Polish delegation would vote against the South African amendment, and hoped the majority of the Committee would do likewise.

MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) said his delegation would support the text for article 6 proposed by the Commission on Human Rights.

He could not approve the South African amendment, the adoption of which, at that stage of the proceedings, would invalidate what had previously been adopted by the Committee.

It had been said that the Mexican amendment laid down a means of procedure rather than a principle; in the past such means of procedure had, however, evolved into new rights. He thought that the Mexican amendment constituted a new right, and consequently supported it. It could be added as a second paragraph, or might stand as a separate article.

MRS. MENON (India) stated that her delegation would support article 6 as it stood in the basic text. The South African vote in favour of article 2 had been taken as a happy omen for the future, but then the representative of South Africa had moved an amendment to delete reference to protection against discrimination. Mrs. Menon protested against the discriminatory treatment accorded to Indians and other peoples in the Union of South Africa. She opposed and condemned the amendment.

To delete the latter part of article 6 would defeat the purpose for which the declaration was being drawn up. India itself had practised discrimination in the past, but was trying to eradicate it and the declaration would be of great assistance in those efforts. No representative could claim that his country fully exercised the ideals of equality and freedom. Instances of discrimination could be found both in the United States and in South Africa. It was the duty of the Assembly to see that such violations were abolished and not condoned.

The Indian representative appealed to her South African colleague not to press his amendment, which would arouse animosity and misunderstanding. If he maintained it, the Indian representative would not only oppose it but would appeal to the other members of the Committee to reject it unanimously.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) urged the South African representative to withdraw his amendment, which would only give rise to sterile debate; it was, in any case, doomed to failure, and was [233] contrary to the spirit which the Committee wished to embody in the declaration.

The Mexican amendment (A/C.3/266) introduced a new idea. The Cuban delegation had had a similar idea which it thought might form a new article (A/C.3/310). He mentioned some slight difference between the Mexican and Cuban texts, and requested that the two amendments should be considered at the same time. It was for the drafting sub-committee to decide whether they should form a new article or a second paragraph to article 6.

It was unthinkable that the declaration of human rights should lack an article providing that a simple, brief procedure should be open to all for protection of their rights. The Mexican amendment, which was in accordance with the Bogotá declaration, has been proposed in order to provide a guarantee of the civil and juridical rights granted in the declaration of human rights. He appealed to the Committee to adopt that idea, which was needed in the declaration.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) stated that article 6 embodied two definite concepts: first, equality of all men before the law in their respective countries; secondly, protection by law against discrimination in violation of the principles of the declaration. Regarding the first, there was no difference of opinion, but the South African representative had submitted an amendment to delete the phrase covering the second. Although that suggestion had already been submitted to the Drafting Committee and the Human Rights Commission itself, the provision had been maintained by a majority vote. His delegation had been in favour of the provision in the Drafting Committee and the Commission would continue to support it.

It joined the Indian and Cuban delegations in requesting the South African representative to withdraw the amendment.

Turning to the Mexican amendment, he stated that consideration of the draft declaration would show that no article contained mention of protection of individual rights against the abuses of authority. The original text of the draft declaration as it existed prior to the third session of the Human Rights Commission had contained a provision concerning habeas corpus.<sup>1</sup> At that third session the provision had been deleted, and all that remained was the right to public trial in article 9. The Chilean representative found that the idea embodied in the Mexican amendment filled a lacuna which was very evident in the draft declaration. He was not sure whether the amendment should be added to article 6; it might more appropriately be included as a separate article, or might be used to complete article 8.

MR. AQUINO (Philippines) stated that his delegation associated itself with the favourable reaction to the principle advanced by the Mexican delegation. He agreed with the Chilean representative regarding the imperative necessity for a safeguard such as was contained in the amendment. He thought, however, that it would be better for the amendment to be introduced later. Considering the favourable response it had elicited during the discussion, it might be considered as an addition to article 8. The words "equal protection of the law" had given rise to some confusion: it was not clear whether they meant that there should be laws which should be applied equally or that all were equally entitled to the protection of whatever laws existed. Woodrow Wilson had once said that "equal protection of the law" meant that the law should be administered with even hands. The text before the Committee went further than that and widened the scope of that phrase.

<sup>[1]</sup> See Official Records of the Economic and Social Council, Third Year, Sixth Session, Supplement No. 1, annex A.

[234]

The Committee could speak of equal protection without regard to class or race, but if it failed to take account of what was going on in some countries, such a sanctimonious declaration would be a mockery.

If the South African amendment were accepted, article 6 would be incomplete and meaningless. His delegation strongly objected to the South African amendment.

MR. CAMPOS ORTIZ (Mexico) referred to the remarks made by the Uruguayan and Cuban representatives concerning the importance of the new element which his delegation wished to include in the Declaration of Human Rights: the right to an effective, simple and brief procedure as protection against the abuses of authority. That new fundamental right warranted a new article.

As it stood, the declaration was incomplete. That fact had been clearly stated in Geneva. He quoted the French representative as saying on 25 August 1948 that the French Government reserved the right to suggest to the General Assembly that it should urge all States to take immediate legislative action to ensure respect for the human rights mentioned in the declaration.<sup>1</sup> The USSR representative had also said that the declaration should not only establish rights, but should ensure their protection.

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) supported the text of the article as it stood. She sympathized with the purpose of the Mexican delegation, namely to give assurance of effective judicial remedy for acts violating fundamental constitutional rights. She would have thought the inclusion of a specific provision on that point unnecessary, as she considered articles 6 and 8 broad enough to provide such protection. She would, however, be willing to support the revised Mexican amendment (A/C.3/208) proposing an addition to article 6, if it met with the approval of the majority.

MR. PLAZA (Venezuela) warmly supported the revised Mexican amendment. The addition of the amendment - which should appear as a separate article – would greatly increase the practical value of the declaration. He suggested that the beginning of it might be altered to read: “Everyone has the right to an effective remedy by the competent national tribunals. . .”

[<sup>1</sup>] See Official Records of the Economic and Social Council, Third Year, Seventh Session, 215th meeting.

[235]

He agreed with the South African representative that the existing text of article 6 was unsatisfactory in that the latter part of it appeared to be a limitation upon the words “equal protection of the law”. He did not think that part should be deleted; rather, some form of words should be found to make it clear that all were entitled both to equal protection of the law in general, and to equal protection against discrimination or incitement to discrimination.

MR. RADEVANOVIC (Yugoslavia) said his delegation had already stated its position with respect to discrimination during the discussion of articles 2 and 3<sup>1</sup>; there was no need to re-state it.

He opposed the South African amendment. It was to be hoped, not only that the amendment would be withdrawn, but that the policy which had inspired it would be modified.

The Yugoslav representative agreed with the idea contained in the Mexican amendment and thought its adoption would broaden the scope of the declaration; yet he found the amendment difficult to accept. The amendment sought, in effect, to permit the judicial branch of a Government to correct abuses committed by the executive branch; it could therefore be applied only in those States where a definite separation between the two existed. The idea had been borrowed from the Bogotá declaration; it was no doubt suited to the system of government prevailing on the American continent, but it was quite incapable of universal application.

MR. GRUMBACH (France) said that, unlike many of the speakers who had preceded him, he wished to ask the representative of the Union of South Africa to maintain his amendment. There could be no doubt that the latter had given that amendment thorough consideration before proposing it; and he had certainly advanced serious arguments in its defence. Once the basic problem of discrimination had been raised, it was necessary to settle the question by a vote, in order to eliminate all uncertainty with respect to the Committee's position.

He fully agreed that the text of the declaration should be as simple as possible. He felt, however, that the South African amendment would not merely simplify article 6, it would rob it of most of its substance.

Nazism, with its millions of victims, had rested on the basis of discriminatory laws. Discrimination as practised by the Germans, had resulted in unheard of barbarism. The question of protection against discrimination was, consequently, a most vital matter. Mr. Grumbach recalled that laws considered discriminatory by most of the representatives on the Committee existed in the Union of South Africa. The portion of the Trusteeship Council's report dealing with the mandated territory of South West Africa supported that opinion. The Natives had no share in the administration of the territory; although they represented 90 per cent of the population, only 10 per cent of the budget was allocated to their needs. The fact that the policy of the Union of South Africa was one of segregation and racial discrimination was responsible for the mistrust with which the South African amendment had been greeted.

[<sup>1</sup>] See 101st and 103rd meetings.

[236]

He felt it would be most dangerous to accept that amendment. Rejection of the amendment might, on the other hand, further the protection of human rights in the Union of South African.

Having carefully considered the Mexican amendment, the French delegation felt that the proper place for it was not in the declaration but in the proposed covenant. While supporting the idea contained in that amendment, he objected to the expression "constitutional rights", which appeared to raise matters of domestic jurisdiction.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) observed that the South African representative had proposed the deletion from article 6 of the very words which might inconvenience the Government of the Union of South Africa in view of its policy of discrimination against the non-European population of the country.

Numerous facts could be cited to prove that such discrimination existed. Thus, over 250,000 Asians in Natal and Transvaal were deprived of the right to vote. In South West Africa the category of persons deprived of that right was broader: it included Asians, women and murderers. Asians in the Union of South Africa were limited in their right to own land. They could not engage in the liberal professions. Their children received only three years of free schooling, which was not even compulsory, in contrast to the white children, who received free compulsory schooling until the age of 15. Indians were forced to live in restricted areas, where there was a shocking mortality rate. The colour line was strictly drawn in theatres, parks, restaurants, cafés and railway trains. Millions of people paid in blood and tears for the policy of discrimination pursued by the Government of the Union of South Africa.

It was unthinkable that the Third Committee should for one moment consider the adoption of the South African amendment and the deletion of the very words which provided protection against discrimination. The USSR representative suggested that, if the South African amendment was not withdrawn, the vote on it should be taken by roll-call, in order to show who agreed with the representative of the Union of South Africa.

Recalling the reservation which the South African representative had made in connexion with the vote on article 2 (101st meeting), Mr. Pavlov interpreted that reservation to mean that the South African Government felt it had a right to decide which of the rights in the declaration were fundamental and which were not.

[237]

With respect to the revised Mexican amendment, Mr. Pavlov said that his first reaction was favourable, but that he could not vote on it without having first seen it in written form.

MRS. CORBET (United Kingdom) suggested the deletion from article 6 of the words “without any discrimination”. A general statement with respect to discrimination was contained in article 2; presumably it applied to all the succeeding articles. If the words “without any discrimination” appeared in article 6 alone, the impression might be given that other articles, which did not contain that express phrase, tacitly permitted discrimination. She asked that those words should be put to the vote separately.

While she preferred the revised version of the Mexican amendment, she was somewhat troubled by the words “fundamental constitutional rights”. Her country had no written constitution; therefore the word “constitutional” had a special meaning when applied to the United Kingdom. In general, the Mexican amendment contained a new idea, which called for careful consideration.

Mrs. Corbet recalled that the draft submitted by the United Kingdom for the covenant<sup>1</sup> contained an article rather similar to the one proposed by the Mexican representative; it was in connexion with that document that the Mexican amendment should be discussed.

MR. CONTOUMAS (Greece) agreed with the United Kingdom representative that the words “without any discrimination” should be deleted from the text of article 6.

With that exception he supported the text before the Committee.

He pointed out that equality with regard to the protection of the law was not necessarily limited to the human rights defined in the declaration; it could extend to other fields also. If he had rightly understood the statement made by the representative of the Union of South Africa, the aim of his amendment was to do away with that limitation. That aim was most praiseworthy and he hoped the South African representative would explain more fully the reasons underlying his amendment.

Mr. Contoumas thought the Mexican amendment might be included in article 8, preferably by the inclusion of a phrase to the effect that the judicial procedure provided should be simple and brief.

MR. WATT (Australia) recalled that during the session of the Commission on Human Rights his delegation had expressed doubts with regard to the clarity of article 6.<sup>2</sup>

He thought that the point raised by the Venezuelan representative might be met by the insertion, after the words “protection of the law”, of the words “and equal protection”.

He agreed with the United Kingdom representative that the words “without any discrimination” should be deleted. Concerning the reference, at the end of the article, to incitement to discrimination, Mr. Watt felt that the word “incitement” was rather vague; it was to be hoped that the reference would not be interpreted as encouraging infringement of other rights, such as the right of freedom of opinion and expression outlined in article 17. The Australian delegation was, however, prepared to approve any text acceptable to the Committee.

<sup>[1]</sup> See document E/CN.4/82/Add. 9.

<sup>[2]</sup> See document E/CN.4/SR.53.

[238]

He thought that the Mexican amendment might be placed either in article 8 or, preferably, in the covenant.

He agreed with the United Kingdom representative that the word “constitutional” in that amendment presented some difficulty.

MR. RAMÍREZ MORENO (Colombia) stated that he would vote against the South African amendment and in favour of the Mexican amendment.

MR. BAGDADI (Egypt) said that the Indian representative’s remarks had convinced him that he must clarify his position. He had never intended to propose the deletion of the provision against discrimination, but he had been dubious about incitement. Despite the arguments of the representative of Australia, he now felt that the prohibition of incitement to discrimination should be retained. The term incitement had a precise meaning in Roman law.

The sense of the Mexican amendment could be incorporated in article 8 since the English version of the text did not make the same distinction as the French did between civil and criminal law. The amendment should therefore be studied more fully during the discussion of article 8. If that procedure were undesirable, the idea contained in the Mexican amendment might be incorporated in the declaration as a separate article.

MRS. NEWLANDS (New Zealand) feared that prohibition of incitement might prevent full exercise of human rights such as the freedom of opinion and expression guaranteed in article 17. It was very hard to draw the line between incitement and the legitimate exercise of free speech. Freedom of expression was the best weapon against discrimination. As it stood, article 6 might even be used to justify violation of article 17.

A separate vote should be taken on the final phrase of the article. There was a precedent for that; the article had been put to the vote in parts in the Commission on Human Rights, where it had passed in its present form by a very small majority.<sup>1</sup>

MR. DEMCHENKO (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) declared that no attempt should be made to persuade the representative of the Union of South Africa to withdraw his amendment. Once it had been introduced, it should be fully debated. The representatives of Cuba and India had been too hasty in requesting withdrawal; the support given by the representative of Greece had not improved the South African representative's position.

<sup>[1]</sup> See document E/CN.4/SR.52.

[239]

There was a clear answer to the Greek representative's request for a clarification of the motives underlying the South African amendment; it lay in the declared policies of that country itself. South African political leaders had repeatedly stressed their intention of introducing stricter racial discrimination in their country. Statements had appeared in the South African Press to the effect that Indians residing there must be prepared to acquiesce in discrimination against them. Segregation of the coloured people had already been put into effect on the railway trains and in matters of residence and of political rights. Those facts refuted arguments that the South African amendment was designed to widen the scope of article 6; the reverse was true. Discrimination was a term of very wide meaning; the words "any discrimination" in the text of the article could have the widest possible interpretation.

The representative of Australia had argued that the reference to incitement in the existing text might be considered as infringing other basic human rights. The South African amendment wished to go much further than that, proposing as it did to eliminate all mention of discrimination as well as incitement thereto. There was no doubt that the substance of article 17 would be kept in the declaration in some form; thus guarantees of the right of free expression would certainly be retained.

He would therefore vote against the South African amendment and in favour of the basic text.

MR. DE ATHAYDE (Brazil) believed that the South African amendment tended to weaken the article. The basic text was clear and concise. The principle of opposition to all forms of discrimination could not be stated too often.

The Mexican amendment reaffirmed the constitutional rights of the citizen; it was a valuable addition. He would therefore vote for the basic text with the addition of the Mexican amendment.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) disagreed with the contention of the French representative that the Mexican amendment should be placed in the covenant rather than in the declaration. If it were included in the declaration, the best position for it might be in article 8, in which provision was made for protection of the individual against abuses by other individuals or by the authorities in cases where he was accused of crime. The Mexican amendment completed those safeguards by including guarantees against authorities who might attempt to infringe the individual's constitutional rights.

The United Kingdom representative's argument had been well founded. He suggested that the objection that some countries had no written constitution might be met if the last phrase of the [240] revised Mexican amendment were altered to read: "the fundamental rights granted him by the constitution or the law".

MR. TE WATER (Union of South Africa), replying to a request by THE CHAIRMAN to clarify his position, said that he had regarded his amendment purely as an effort better to interpret the sense of article 6. He had been surprised and pained by the debate to which that sincere effort had given rise. He had always believed that the United Nations existed primarily for the furtherance of peace and goodwill; he had encountered a mode of expression such as was rarely heard in his own country; it was very different from that to which the League of Nations had happily been accustomed. There had been little attempt to understand the viewpoint of the Union of South Africa. The difficulty which European civilization was facing in its struggle for survival in that country had not been properly appreciated. Only experience on the spot could bring such understanding; he wished it were possible for many representatives to obtain that experience. Such lack of real appreciation had, he must repeat, faced the Union of South Africa ever since it had become a Member of the United Nations: it had been an obstacle to the collaboration which his country had been willing to give. He had made every effort to avert the danger of dividing the Committee on that issue.

In view of the fact that the debate had become so acrimonious, he felt that his delegation's attitude should be made perfectly clear. The declaration should be a directive and inspiration to all peoples and to their Governments; it should be simple, intelligible and of universal bearing. The basic text before the Committee did not fulfil those conditions. The debate, however, had been even more harmful, for it had revealed a tendency to go far beyond the discussion of fundamental human rights and the provisions of the Charter. The peoples would not understand that; the Governments would honour a declaration based upon such a tendency in the breach rather than the observance.

In view of what had been said in the debate, he withdrew his amendment. He suggested, however that it would be advisable to vote on the article in two parts.

THE CHAIRMAN agreed with the representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics that in accordance with rule 109 of the rules of procedure the substance of the revised Mexican amendment (A/C.3/308) should be put to the vote at the following meetings. The decision as to its position would be left to the proposed drafting sub-committee.

He put article 6 to the vote in parts.

He put to the vote first the words: “All are equal before the law and are entitled”.

Those words were adopted unanimously.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the words: “without any discrimination”.

Those words were adopted by 33 votes to 8, with 2 abstentions.

[241]

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the words, “to equal protection of the law”.

Those words were adopted unanimously.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the Australian proposal to insert at that point the words: “and equal protection”.

That proposal was adopted by 34 votes to 1, with 8 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the words “against any discrimination in violation of this Declaration”.

Those words were adopted by 46 votes to none, with 1 abstention.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the words: “and against any incitement to such discrimination”.

Those words were adopted by 41 votes to 3, with 2 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put the whole of article 6, as amended to the vote.

Article 6, as amended, was adopted by 45 votes to none, with 1 abstention.

The meeting rose at 6:15 p.m.

A/C.3/SR.113<sup>71</sup>

26 October 1948

Summary Record of the Hundred and Thirteenth Meeting
[of the Third Committee]

Held at the Palais de Chaillot, Paris, on Tuesday,

26 October 1948, at 3 p.m.

Chairman: MR. CHARLES MALIK (Lebanon).

<sup>71</sup> The text of the document is from Official Records of the General Assembly, Third Session, 1948, pp. 241–51.

37. Draft international declaration of human rights (E/800) (continued)

Article 6 (continued)

THE CHAIRMAN stated that the word “judicial” in the Mexican amendment to article 6 as revised by Mexico, Chile and Venezuela (A/C.3/309) appeared there by mistake and should be deleted.

MR. CASSIN (France) pointed out that the French text of the Mexican amendment was imperfect. He proposed the following version (A/C.3/309/Rev.1), which incorporated a drafting change suggested by the Belgian representative:

“Toute personne a droit à un recours effectif devant les juridictions nationales compétentes contre les actes violant les droits fondamentaux qui lui sont reconnus par la constitution ou par la loi.”

MR. CAMPOS ORTIZ (Mexico) accepted that French text as a highly satisfactory rendition of his amendment.

MR. BAGDADI (Egypt), speaking on a point of order, asked that the Mexican amendment be considered together with the Cuban (A/C.3/310) and Egyptian proposals (112th meeting) as all three proposals dealt with the same matter.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) supported the suggestion of the Egyptian representative.

[242]

In view of the facts that there was a new French text before the Committee; that it had been suggested that the Mexican amendment might form a separate article; and that the idea which it contained was both new and important and deserved careful drafting, he asked that consideration of the Mexican amendment might be postponed so as to allow the interested delegations to consult together and present a joint text.

THE CHAIRMAN ruled that, as a full debate on the Mexican amendment had already taken place, that amendment would be put to the vote immediately.

MR. CHANG (China), speaking on a point of order, suggested that the Mexican amendment might be put to the vote in parts and that the vote might be taken alternatively on the phrase “an effective judicial remedy” (A/C.3/308) or the phrase “an effective remedy by the competent national tribunals” (A/C.3/309).

He expressed a preference for the former; the word “national” might not be universally applicable, as a number of countries had state and provincial courts, which could not be considered national.

MR. PLAZA (Venezuela) preferred the phrase “competent national tribunals”. He pointed out that the word “judicial” might be interpreted as applying to both national and international courts of justice.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) objected to the Chinese proposal on the grounds that it was a substantive change and as such could not be introduced into the Mexican amendment at the last moment. As the word “judicial” permitted recourse to international as well as national tribunals, the Chinese proposal would require further consideration and debate.

He hoped that the joint revised version of the Mexican amendment (A/C.3/309), with the word “judicial” deleted, would be put to the vote.

MR. CHANG (China) stated that his suggestion had been made solely with a view to saving time and producing a more perfect text.

As it did not appear to have achieved its purpose, he withdrew it.

THE CHAIRMAN put the joint revised text of the Mexican amendment (A/C.3/309) to the vote. It read as follows:

“Everyone has the right to an effective remedy by the competent national tribunals for acts violating the fundamental rights granted him by the constitution or by law.”<sup>1</sup>

The amendment was adopted by 46 votes to none, with 3 abstentions.

MR. CASSIN (France) explained that he had voted favour of the revised amendment on the understanding that the phrase “competent national tribunals” referred to the competent judicial machinery of a State, but not necessarily of the State of which the plaintiff was a national. Thus, if a foreigner were to have his rights violated, he would have the right to have recourse to the competent tribunals of the country in which the violation had occurred, rather than to those of his own.

<sup>[1]</sup> Article 9 of the draft universal declaration of human rights (A/777).

[243]

MR. CAMPOS ORTIZ (Mexico) thanked the members of the Committee for voting in favour of his amendment, based, as he had stated in the general debate, on the Mexican legal resource of amparo which had been included in Mexican legislation for more than one hundred years. The amendment – which he hoped would constitute a separate article – constituted a new and important element in the declaration.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) withdrew his amendment to article 6 (A/C.3/310).

He congratulated the Committee on its adoption of the Mexican amendment. The General Assembly owed a debt of gratitude to the Mexican delegation for a most constructive suggestion.

THE CHAIRMAN associated himself with the sentiments expressed by the Cuban representative and congratulated the Committee on the fact that not a single vote had been cast against the Mexican amendment.

He reminded the Committee that the place of the amendment had not been decided.

Article 7<sup>1</sup>

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) remarked that the Committee had before it the basic text of article 7 as drafted by the Commission on Human Rights (E/800) and a number of amendments to that article which were recapitulated in document A/C.3/276.

He proposed the following procedure for dealing with the various texts. The basic text of article 7 could be examined in conjunction with the Cuban (A/C.3/224) and Uruguayan (A/C.3/268) amendments, which altered that text. All the remaining amendments were additions to it. Inasmuch as all the ideas put forward in those additional articles were contained in the USSR amendment (E/800, page 32), which also contained ideas not expressed elsewhere, that amendment could next be taken as a basis for discussion, and put to the vote in parts. The work of the Committee would be greatly facilitated thereby.

MR. DE LEÓN (Panama) called attention to the fact that his amendment (A/C.3/220) should read as follows (A/C.3/312): “No one shall be subjected to arbitrary arrest or detention. Every person who has been detained has the right to immediate judicial determination of the legality of his detention.”

<sup>[1]</sup> Article 10 of the draft universal declaration of human rights (A/777).

[244]

MR. CARRERA ANDRADE (Ecuador) stated that his delegation regarded article 7 as a direct complement to article 3, which guaranteed the right to life, liberty and security of person. Article 7, which provided much-needed protection against arbitrary arrest and detention, had to be included in the declaration.

He thought, however, that the article should also contain mention of another form of arbitrary action by public authorities, namely, exile. The expulsion from a country of whole racial, religious or political groups was a matter for the Sixth Committee, which was considering the draft convention on genocide. The declaration should, however, protect the individual from forcible expulsion from his own country.

He therefore suggested that the words “or exile” should be added at the end of article 7.

MR. CASSIN (France) felt that the Committee should seek a compromise between the eloquent brevity of the text of article 7 submitted by the Commission and the many amendments proposed thereto.

The basic text, he thought, should remain unaltered. The legal guarantees proposed in some amendments would find their proper place in the covenant, not in the declaration. To that first eloquent sentence, however, certain additions could be made.

One of them was the idea that any person arrested or detained was entitled to have the legality of the action taken against him affirmed by a judge without delay. Such a provision would correspond to the institution of habeas corpus and to provisions contained in many modern constitutions.

Another addition, proposed in several amendments, which Mr. Cassin would support, was that a person should be brought to trial within a reasonable period or set free.

He would not vote against the USSR amendment to the effect that anyone deprived of his liberty had the right to be informed of the grounds for his detention.

On the other hand, the French representative did not approve of the inclusion in the declaration of provisions with respect to contractual obligations and compensation for illegal arrest. With regard to the first, it was a measure of implementation; as for the second, many countries would not have appropriate laws to fit the case. Both provisions were better suited to the covenant than to the declaration.

MR. ANZE MATIENZO (Bolivia) agreed with the representative of France that brevity would strengthen the article.

Nevertheless, he warmly supported the Ecuadorean proposal. Exile was one of the most arbitrary political punishments that existed. Arbitrary arrest was, in many cases, followed by arbitrary deportation since it was usually applied during periods of political disturbance. Moreover, [245] in view of the provision made in article 12, paragraph 1 for the right of asylum, it would be logical to include in the declaration a clause providing for prohibition of exile. By including the right of asylum, that article implicitly recognized that arbitrary deportation had taken place.

MR. AQUINO (Philippines) pointed out that the debate had emphasized once more the need to draw a distinction between matter which should properly be included in the declaration and matter which would be more appropriate in the covenant or in the measures of implementation. The declaration should be restricted to the statement of a political philosophy which was valid for all. That was the virtue of the text before the Committee.

The amendments, however, infringed the line of demarcation between the covenant and the declaration. The word "arbitrary" was crucial. The prohibition against arbitrary arrest had a very wide and progressive historical meaning, particularly in Anglo-Saxon law. The Governments must decide for themselves its exact implications.

The French amendment (A/C.3/244) belonged more properly in the covenant. It was an attempt to guarantee certain legal procedures. It was a measure for implementation rather than a declaration of principle.

That could also be said of the USSR amendment (E/800, page 32).

He would vote for the basic text because it was concise and reflected historical usage. He would be willing, however, to give due consideration to the Ecuadorean proposal because recent history had provided examples of cases in which it might have been applied.

MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) said that his delegation's amendment (A/C.3/268) had certain advantages over the Cuban (A/C.3/224). The Cuban text extended the scope of the word "arbitrary" by substituting the concept of deprivation of freedom. The Uruguayan text, however, spoke more concretely of arrest or detention. The individual must be safeguarded against imprisonment by local, as well as by State authorities. Moreover, the Uruguayan text added the idea that there could be no deprivation of freedom without prior legislation.

He was glad to note that the Mexican amendment (A/C.3/266) to article 6 had included the old Spanish right of amparo (injunction) beside that of habeas corpus. The Cuban, French (A/C.3/244) and USSR amendments were to be preferred to the Panamanian (A/C.3/220) because they went further by introducing the principle that the prisoner must be heard without delay, besides being informed of the grounds for his detention.

The Mexican amendment, introducing as it did the idea that persons should not be imprisoned for breach of a work contract, went further than the USSR amendment forbidding imprisonment [246] on the grounds of failure to carry out contractual obligations.

He would strongly support the Mexican amendment because failure to record such a prohibition might lead to violations of article 4. He would also vote for the paragraph in the USSR amendment guaranteeing compensation for illegal arrest. In addition, he would maintain the amendment submitted by his own delegation.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) said that the amendments submitted appeared to be reproducing the substance of early drafts which had been discussed by the Commission on Human Rights. The Commission had discussed a fuller text,<sup>1</sup> which had then been further discussed by the Drafting Committee<sup>2</sup> and had finally emerged, mainly through the efforts of the United Kingdom delegation, in the concise text under consideration. Throughout those stages the Chilean delegation had stressed the need for an explicit statement of the right of amparo and had urged that it should be expressly laid down that a person might be arrested only in accordance with existing laws, should be tried speedily and should be liberated at once if wrongfully detained. Since that idea was contained in the legal system of most countries, it should be included in the declaration, even though it was desired to make that document brief.

He believed that the text before the Committee covered the prohibition against exile. A man had to be arrested before he could be exiled. The right of amparo against expulsion orders existed in Chile; if, however, there were countries which had no such legislation, he would favour the Ecuadorean proposal to add the words "or exile" at the end of article 7.

The USSR amendment reproduced the text submitted to the Commission by the Drafting Committee. The Chilean delegation would support it. The prohibition of imprisonment for failure to carry out contractual obligations was most advisable. He agreed with the representative of Uruguay that the term “civil obligations” might be more intelligible than the term “contractual obligations”, but he had found that the former had an entirely different meaning in Anglo-Saxon and in Roman law. He therefore preferred the latter term.

He would also support the paragraph in the USSR amendment providing a guarantee of compensation for illegal arrest.

The representatives of Uruguay and Panama having pointed out defects in the text of document A/C.3/312, THE CHAIRMAN directed that it should be withdrawn from circulation.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) maintained that the declaration should not include any measures for implementation. The Commission on Human Rights had shared that view. The amendments before the Committee ought, more properly, to be placed in the covenant. Previous articles in the declaration were statements of absolute rights, so that it would be inconsistent to expand article 7 in the way that had been proposed. That would merely open the door to demands for similar expansion of further articles.

[<sup>1</sup>] See document E/CN.4/21.

[<sup>2</sup>] See document E/CN.4/95.

[247]

He agreed with the representative of the Philippines that the Governments concerned should decide the legal implications of the article. He would therefore vote for the basic text.

The representative of Ecuador had, however, presented a new and valuable idea. He would support its inclusion.

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) agreed with the representatives of Lebanon and the Philippines that it was vital to retain the word “arbitrary”. It summed up the meaning of the whole article.

She suggested that the difficulties facing the Third Committee might be caused by the fact that, unlike the Commission and the Drafting Committee, it had not considered articles for the covenant. The Drafting Committee had been able to bear more clearly in mind the distinction between what was appropriate for the declaration and what was appropriate for the covenant. That accounted for any appearance of inadequacy in the drafting of the declaration.

The Commission had believed that the declaration should be as broad, clear and concise as possible. The text before the Committee had been based upon a distillation of many ideas similar to those which had been repeated in the amendments before the Committee.

Having regard to the Commission's conception of the declaration, she would vote for the basic text.

She had been interested by the Ecuadorean proposal, but felt that it would be more appropriate in some other article.

MR. DE ATHAYDE (Brazil) said that he was in favour of the Commission's text, which was clear and comprehensive.

Referring to the Uruguayan amendment (A/C.3/268), he was dubious about the implications of the words "prior legislation"; there might be cases in which anti-democratic Governments had promulgated undesirable laws. Other amendments submitted would be more appropriate in the covenant. In the declaration they would disturb the balance of the text of article 7.

He favoured the Ecuadorian proposal for the addition of the words "or exile".

MR. DAVIES (United Kingdom), replying to the representative of Chile, said it was the majority in the Commission on Human Rights, and not the United Kingdom delegation, that had been responsible for the text of article 7. The original text had included many of the points embodied in the amendments which were before the Third Committee. Although he agreed with many of [248] them, he believed that they were irrelevant to the declaration. There had been valid reasons for rejecting the fuller version submitted by the Drafting Committee.

He agreed with the representatives of the Philippines, Lebanon and the United States that the ideas in the amendments presented would be more appropriate in the covenant. It was not a question of a longer or shorter article, but whether the declaration should contain solely a statement of principle or should also include measures for implementation. That issue had presented itself most acutely in the current debate. The representative of the USSR had expressed doubts whether the covenant would ever come into being. The United Kingdom delegation believed that the covenant was essential in the international protection of human rights; but it should be remembered that it formed only one part of the international bill of human rights. His delegation had always contended that the declaration should be a simple, inspiring statement of principles, excluding measures for implementation. Certain representatives appeared to dissent; they felt that the declaration should also guarantee the application of those principles. The United Kingdom, however, could not disagree with the Commission's recommendations.

He would therefore vote for the present text.

With regard to the amendment submitted by the representative of Panama (A/C.3/220), he agreed that the greatest safeguard of human freedom was protection against illegal detention, such as the United Kingdom had enjoyed since Magna Carta. He agreed, however, with the representative of the United States that “arbitrary” was the key word in the text before the Committee; the article would lose greatly if that word were deleted. There might be certain countries where arbitrary arrest was permitted. The object of the article was to show that the United Nations disapproved of such practices. National legislation should be brought into line with the standards of the United Nations. Rights should not derive from law, but law from rights. For that reason he would oppose the Panamanian and similar amendments.

With regard to the Ecuadorean proposal, he would be willing to add the words “or exile”, but doubted whether article 7 was the correct place for them. The prohibition against exile already existed in his country; no United Kingdom national could be deported from or refused admittance to the United Kingdom.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) pointed out that the amendments covered a number of ideas some of which were common to several of them. The idea of detention and arrest was common to the Panamanian, Cuban and Uruguayan amendments. He would support the Uruguayan text, since it [249] was shorter and drew a distinction between arrest and detention.

The idea of habeas corpus was common to the Panamanian, Cuban, French, Uruguayan and USSR amendments. He preferred the Panamanian formulation.

The idea that action taken against any person should be confirmed by a judge was common to the amendments of Cuba, France and Uruguay. He believed that the Cuban phrase “without unjustifiable delay” best fulfilled the object in view – the avoidance of delay. The French phrase “within a reasonable period” seemed to him too vague.

The concept that no person should be imprisoned on account of failure to carry out obligations of a civil character was found in the USSR, Cuban and Mexican amendments. He agreed with the representative of Uruguay that, while the Mexican text covered much of the same ground as the USSR text, the addition of the idea that a person should not be imprisoned for breach of a work contract was extremely valuable. He would vote for the Mexican amendment.

The provision contained in the Cuban amendment, that the arrested person was entitled to humane treatment while under detention, was no longer needed since article 4 had been adopted (110th meeting).

Compensation for illegal arrest, as proposed in the USSR amendment, was equally valuable; he would support it.

He would also support the proposal of the representative of Ecuador prohibiting exile but he thought that it might perhaps form a separate article instead of a phrase in article 7.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that the debate had demonstrated that two groups existed, one including Panama, Cuba, Mexico, France and the USSR, and the other the United States and the United Kingdom, the Philippines and Lebanon. They were divided as to the form of the article to cover the protection of human freedom.

The group including the United Kingdom and the United States supported the text of article 7 as drafted by the Commission. The arguments in favour of that very brief article should be carefully examined. The whole question had been stated to be very simple; it was a matter of brevity versus length. The United States and United Kingdom delegations wished for brevity, keeping more complete wording for the covenant; the United Kingdom delegation had also said it was sufficient to establish a principle, but it had already been agreed that the declaration was not confined to an enunciation of rights; it might, in certain cases, also guarantee the exercise of rights. It seemed to him that the choice before the Committee lay between an article without content and an article containing a concrete guarantee of certain rights.

[250]

The Cuban amendment, which contained the words “deprived of his freedom”, was very concrete and therefore particularly valuable. The next step was to consider what, if anything, should be added after the first sentence. The authorities should inform a man why he had been arrested and when he was to appear before the court; otherwise he should certainly be liberated. But if a man, through false arrest had sustained financial loss or other injury, he should receive compensation. The article could only gain by the inclusion of guarantees to cover such eventualities. It had been argued that such guarantees should appear in the covenant. The prospect of a covenant should not be regarded as a substitute for a satisfactory declaration; a bird in the hand was worth two in the bush.

MR. WATT (Australia) stated that the views of his delegation had already been largely covered by the statements of the Lebanese and United Kingdom representatives.

He agreed with the USSR delegation that it was a question whether the declaration should contain principles alone or some measures for implementation. Perhaps some rights were so important that their guarantee should be included. In that connexion the Committee’s attitude might not have been entirely consistent. The Australian delegation had abstained from voting on the revised Mexican amendment to article 6 not because it disagreed, but because it had considered that the subject was one for the covenant.

His delegation thought that article 7 was one of the Commission’s clearest and best articles.

The phrase in the Cuban amendment “obligations of a purely civil character” appeared ambiguous and might leave a loop-hole for fraudulent practices.

MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) desired first to raise objection to the word “arbitrary” in the Commission’s draft, and secondly to add further ideas to article 7. The word “arbitrary” was inadequate. The Uruguayan amendment was an attempt to see that any man who was detained should be detained only in accordance with a clearly stated law.

A number of drafts had been submitted and much time had been taken in drawing up the text. While grateful for the work done by the members of the Commission, he pointed out that in spite of the relatively short space of time that some of the delegations had had, they had given as much attention to the matter as the members of the Commission. The Committee was obviously aware that the draft declaration was not complete and that they should take the opportunity to improve it by adding any new ideas which had arisen in the course of the debate. Brevity was desirable, but the declaration was not a rigid document.

[251]

MR. BAGDADI (Egypt) said his delegation agreed with those who felt that only principles should be mentioned in the declaration. The preamble itself spoke of the declaration as a common standard. An enunciation of principles was infinitely preferable to a detailed statement.

The Egyptian delegation would vote in favour of the original text.

MR. CHANG (China) declared that the draft in question was far from perfect. It should be rendered more definite, clearer and more clear cut. It should be realized that the text was intended to achieve improvement in the status of mankind. The adoption of certain substitutes proposed for the word “arbitrary” would disturb the balance of the article. He submitted that additions could doubtless be inserted in other articles.

The suggestion regarding exile might be included in article 13, and a sentence might be added to the effect that no person should be arbitrarily barred from entering his own country.

The meeting rose at 6:15 p.m.

A/C.3/311

26 October 1948

Original Text: English, French

Amendment to article 6 of the draft Declaration (E/800) adopted by the Third Committee

Add as a second paragraph to article 6 the following:

“Everyone has the right to an effective remedy by the competent national tribunals for acts violating the fundamental rights granted him by the constitution or by law”.

A/C.3/312

26 October 1948

Panama: Revised amendment to article 7
of the draft Declaration (E/800)

No one shall be subjected to arbitrary arrest or detention. Every person who has been detained has a right to immediate judicial determination of the legality of his detention.

A/C.3/313

26 October 1948

Original Text: English, French

Synthesized text for article 7 elaborated jointly by the delegations of Cuba, Ecuador, France, Mexico, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and Uruguay

No one may be deprived of his freedom (Cuba, Ecuador, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Uruguay), nor exiled (Cuba, Ecuador, Uruguay), except in the cases and according to the procedure prescribed by prior legislation (Cuba, Ecuador, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Uruguay).

Anyone deprived of his freedom has the right to be informed without delay of the grounds for his detention, to have the legality of the action taken against him confirmed without delay by a judge and also to have his case brought before the court without undue delay by a judge or to be liberated (Cuba, Ecuador, France, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Uruguay).

Everyone is entitled to compensation for illegal (Cuba, Ecuador, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) deprivation of liberty (Cuba, Ecuador, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Uruguay).

No one may be deprived of his freedom on account merely of failure to carry out obligations of a purely civil character (Cuba, Ecuador, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Uruguay) or violation of a work contract (Cuba, Ecuador, Mexico, Uruguay).

Note: The following amendments to article 7 are consequently withdrawn: Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (E/800), Cuba (A/C.3/224), France (A/C.3/244), Mexico (A/C.3/266), Uruguay (A/C.3/268). The delegation of Panama has not yet had the opportunity to pronounce itself on this text.

A/C.3/SR.114<sup>72</sup>

27 October 1948

Summary Record of the Hundred and Fourteenth Meeting
[of the Third Committee]

Held at the Palais de Chaillot, Paris, on Wednesday,
27 October 1948, at 3 p.m.

Chairman: MR. CHARLES MALIK (Lebanon).

38. Draft international declaration of human rights (E/800) (continued)

Article 7 (continued)

MISS KLOMPÉ (Netherlands) agreed with the representative of the United States of America that the declaration should be as concise as possible. The synthesized text (A/C.3/313) was too detailed, but might appear in the covenant.

She had originally been inclined to accept the Ecuadorean amendment suggesting the addition of the phrase “or exile” (113th meeting) but thought that it was not broad enough. She would like to see it extended to cover forcible change of residence within the borders of the victim’s own country. That idea, however, should be incorporated in article 11 or 13.

She agreed with the representative of the USSR that imprisonment merely on account of failure to carry out contractual obligations was undesirable. She would not, however, vote for the corresponding provision, since in certain legal systems such imprisonment might not be arbitrary.

She would, therefore, vote for the basic text and would also support any other article which might later provide for the prohibition of arbitrary removal of human beings from their habitual place of residence.

[252]

MR. DE LEÓN (Panama) withdrew his amendment (A/C.3/220) in favour of the synthesized text which he supported in principle, although he thought the wording might be improved. He welcomed particularly the inclusion of the idea of habeas corpus in that text.

He suggested that the word “confirmed” in the second paragraph of that text might be changed to “determined”.

MRS. NEWLANDS (New Zealand) said that her delegation had consistently held the view that the declaration should be a brief and simple statement of general principles; precise legal provisions should rather be included in the covenant. The synthesized text, which was extremely long and unwieldy, demonstrated the difficulties that arose once a departure was made from the idea originally accepted by the Committee.

<sup>72</sup> The text of the document is from Official Records of the General Assembly, Third Session, 1948, pp. 251–8.

She would therefore vote for article 7 as drafted by the Commission on Human Rights.

THE CHAIRMAN called the Committee's attention to the fact that the synthesized text for article 7 (A/C.3/313) represented a substitution for that article as drafted by the Commission (E/800) and that all previous amendments had been withdrawn in favour of it.

The synthesized text would be put to the vote first. Should it fail, any delegation which wished to introduce the idea of exile into the original text would be permitted to do so.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) asked that the synthesized text should be put to the vote in nine parts, and indicated the points at which the division was to be made.

The representatives of the United Kingdom, Egypt, Cuba, Costa Rica and the Philippines protested against the division proposed by the USSR representative. A text could be voted on in parts only if it were divided according to ideas.

THE CHAIRMAN stated that voting in parts was a common procedure in United Nations organs, and that the division proposed was not unreasonable. The procedure suggested by the USSR representative would, consequently, be followed. The Committee should consider each portion of the text in the context of what was still to come.

He put to the vote the first phrase of the synthesized text: "No one may be deprived of his freedom."

That part was rejected by 20 votes to 14, with 8 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN stated that the following part, which would have to be a complete sentence, would be put to the vote in the following form: "No one may be exiled."

That part was adopted by 21 votes to 16 with abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN then put to the vote the third part, which read as follows: "Except in the cases and according to the procedure prescribed by prior legislation."

[253]

That part was rejected by 21 votes to 15, with 4 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN next put to the vote the fourth part, which read: "Anyone deprived of his freedom has the right to be informed without delay of the grounds for his detention."

That part was rejected by 20 votes to 18, with 5 abstentions.

MR. CASSIN (France) called attention to the fact that the correct French equivalent of the words in the fifth part, “the legality of the action taken against him”, was la légalité des mesures prises contre lui.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) requested that the vote on the remaining parts of the amendment should be taken by roll-call.

THE CHAIRMAN, overruling objections by the representatives of Australia and the United States of America, put the fifth part to the vote in the following form:

“Anyone deprived of his freedom has the right to have the legality of the action taken against him determined without delay by a judge and also to have his case brought before the court without undue delay or to be liberated.”

A vote was taken by roll-call, as follows:

Iceland, having been drawn by lot by the Chairman, was called upon to vote first.

In favour: India, Mexico, Panama, Poland, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Uruguay, Yugoslavia, Afghanistan, Argentina, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Ecuador, France.

Against: Lebanon, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Peru, Philippines, Siam, Sweden, Syria, Turkey, Union of South Africa, United Kingdom, United States of America, Australia, Bolivia, Brazil, Canada, China, Denmark, Honduras.

Abstaining: Saudi Arabia, Venezuela, Belgium, Burma, Dominican Republic, Ethiopia, Greece.

That part was rejected by 20 votes to 18, with 7 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the sixth part of the synthesized text, which read as follows: “Everyone is entitled to compensation for illegal arrest”.

A vote was taken by roll-call, as follows:

Pakistan, having been drawn by lot by the Chairman, was called upon to vote first.

In favour: Panama, Poland, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Uruguay, Yugoslavia, Burma, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Ecuador, Mexico.

Against: Peru, Philippines, Siam, Sweden, Syria, Turkey, Union of South Africa, United Kingdom, United States of America, Australia, Bolivia, Brazil, Canada, China, Denmark, France, Honduras, India, Lebanon, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway.

[254]

Abstaining: Saudi Arabia, Venezuela, Afghanistan, Argentina, Belgium, Dominican Republic, Egypt, Ethiopia, Greece.

That part was rejected by 22 votes to 15, with 9 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the seventh part of the synthesized text, which read as follows: “Everyone is entitled to compensation for illegal deprivation of liberty.”

A vote was taken by roll-call, as follows:

Honduras, having been drawn by lot by the Chairman, was called upon to vote first.

In favour: Mexico, Panama, Poland, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Uruguay, Yugoslavia, Afghanistan, Argentina, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Dominican Republic, Ecuador.

Against: Honduras, India, Lebanon, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Peru, Philippines, Siam, Sweden, Syria, Turkey, Union of South Africa, United Kingdom, United States of America, Australia, Bolivia, Brazil, Canada, China, Denmark, France.

Abstaining: Saudi Arabia, Venezuela, Belgium, Burma, Egypt, Ethiopia, Greece.

That part was rejected by 22 votes to 17, with 7 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the eighth part of the synthesized text, which read: "No one may be deprived of his freedom on account merely of failure to carry out obligations of a purely civil character."

A vote was taken by roll-call, as follows:

Egypt, having been drawn by lot by the Chairman, was called upon to vote first:

In favour: Mexico, Panama, Poland, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Uruguay, Yugoslavia, Afghanistan, Argentina, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Dominican Republic, Ecuador.

Against: France, Honduras, India, Lebanon, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Peru, Philippines, Siam, Sweden, Syria, Turkey, Union of South Africa, United Kingdom, United States of America, Australia, Bolivia, Brazil, Canada, China, Denmark.

Abstaining: Egypt, Ethiopia, Greece, Saudi Arabia, Venezuela, Belgium, Burma.

That part was rejected by 22 votes to 17, with 7 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the ninth part of the synthesized text, which read: "No one may be deprived of his freedom on account merely of violation of a work contract."

A vote was taken by roll-call, as follows:

Panama, having been drawn by lot by the Chairman, was called upon to vote first.

In favour: Panama, Poland, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Uruguay, Yugoslavia, Argentina, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Mexico.

[255]

Against: Peru, Philippines, Siam, Sweden, Syria, Turkey, Union of South Africa, United Kingdom, United States of America, Australia, Bolivia, Brazil, Canada, China, France, Honduras, India, Lebanon, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway.

Abstaining: Saudi Arabia, Venezuela, Afghanistan, Belgium, Burma, Egypt, Ethiopia, Greece.

That part was rejected by 22 votes to 16 with 8 abstentions.

MR. CARRERA ANDRADE (Ecuador) reminded the Committee that when he had submitted his amendment (113th meeting) he had only asked that the words “or exile” should be added to the text of the article. Accordingly it was not a new amendment, as the Chinese representative had said. It also appeared that the Ecuadorean amendment was in place in article 7, which dealt with arbitrary punishments. Moreover, it would be contrary to the rules of procedure to vote again on a proposal which had already been adopted.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that of the whole synthesized text the Committee had adopted only the following sentence: “No one may be exiled”. Accordingly that sentence was before the Committee as a substitution for the basic draft of article 7.

He agreed with the representative of Ecuador that the Committee had shown itself to be in favour of including the idea of exile, which could be moved as an addition to article 7. Before that could be done, however, it was necessary for the Committee to vote on what it had adopted of the synthesized text as a whole and to reject it.

He consequently put to the vote the proposal to substitute the words “No one may be exiled” for the basic text of article 7.

That proposal was rejected by 36 votes to none, with 7 abstentions.

COUNT CARTON DE WIART (Belgium) felt that the idea of exile should not be qualified by the word “arbitrary”. He asked that a separate vote be taken on that point.

MR. CHANG (China) said that he was certainly not opposed to including a prohibition of exile in the declaration.

He suggested the appointment of a sub-committee of three to draft an appropriate text after the Committee itself had decided the matter in principle.

He wondered, also, whether the idea might not be included in article 13.

MR. CARRERA ANDRADE (Ecuador) pointed out that no delegation had voiced opposition in principle to the prohibition of exile.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) said that the prohibition of exile should be qualified by the word “arbitrary” as were the words “arrest” and “detention”. There were cases in which exile might be imposed in accordance with prior legislation.

MR. CARRERA ANDRADE (Ecuador) accepted the Chairman’s suggestion and proposed that the words “or exile” should be added at the end [256] of the basic text, and that article 7, in its new form, should be put to the vote in parts.

MR. ANZE MATIENZO (Bolivia) said that he was opposed to exile in all forms. The prohibition of exile should not be qualified.

He therefore proposed, as an amendment, that a sentence reading: “No one shall be exiled” should be added at the end of the basic text of article 7.

MRS. CORBET (United Kingdom) said that exile should be qualified by the word “arbitrary”. Unless this were done, her delegation, favourable though it was to the idea of prohibiting exile, would not support the amendment. It was essential that the vote should show clearly that arbitrary exile was meant.

MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) favoured the addition of the words “or exile”. That would bring the sense of the article closer to what had been intended by the synthesized text. He was in favour of a phrase which would prevent all measures which obliged a person to quit his country against his will and without his case having been brought before a court.

It should be clearly specified that arbitrary exile was meant.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that if the text were amended as the representative of Uruguay wished, the word “arbitrary” would necessarily qualify the concept of exile. He would prefer to specify the conditions in which exile should be prohibited. He therefore proposed to qualify the word “exile” by the words “except in the cases and according to the procedure prescribed by prior legislation”.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) and MR. CASSIN (France) submitted that the change proposed by the representative of Bolivia constituted an amendment to the Ecuadorean amendment. The USSR amendment was closer to it than the Bolivian. A vote should be taken on the Bolivian amendment first and then on the USSR amendment. By that method the Committee could decide whether, and to what extent, the word “exile” should be qualified.

THE CHAIRMAN put the Bolivian amendment [sic] the Ecuadorean amendment to the vote.

That amendment was rejected by 18 votes to 16, with 7 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put the USSR amendment to the Ecuadorean amendment to the vote.

That amendment was rejected by 20 votes to 6, with 15 abstentions.

MR. CARRERA ANDRADE (Ecuador) requested that his amendment be put to the vote by roll-call.

THE CHAIRMAN put the Ecuadorean amendment to the vote.

A vote was taken by roll-call, as follows:

The Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, having been drawn by lot by the Chairman, was called upon to vote first.

[257]

In favour: Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Chile, Costa Rica, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Ethiopia, Honduras, India, Lebanon, Mexico, New Zealand, Panama, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Siam, Sweden, Syria, Turkey, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of South Africa, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Kingdom, United States, Uruguay, Venezuela, Yugoslavia, Afghanistan, Argentina, Australia, Belgium, Bolivia, Brazil, Burma.

Against: Canada.

Abstaining: China, France, Greece, Netherlands, Norway, Saudi Arabia.

The amendment was adopted by 37 votes to 1, with 6 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put article 7 as a whole, as amended, to the vote.

Article 7, as amended, was adopted by 43 votes to none, with 1 abstention.

MR. CONTOUMAS (Greece) said in explanation of his vote, that there had been several ideas in the synthesized text with which he agreed; many of them, indeed, already existed in his country's legal code. He did not feel, however, that so detailed a list of provisions would have been in place in the text of the declaration.

MR. ANZE MATIENZO (Bolivia) said that the implications of the word "arbitrary" were much broader than such merely legal concepts as had been proposed in the synthesized text. The word "arbitrary" referred, in part, to matters of conscience. A legal concept might change with changing circumstances; it was not inconceivable that arbitrary laws might be adopted in certain countries.

MR. PLAZA (Venezuela) said that he had voted for the original text with the addition of the Ecuadorean amendment. The original text thus amended was concise and stated the precise meaning desired by the Committee.

MISS BERNARDINO (Dominican Republic) said that the Constitution and the laws of her country guaranteed all the principles of the amendments adopted but she had abstained on some votes because she found the procedure confusing.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) said that he had voted for the word "arbitrary" as adopted on the understanding that it was referred to cases not prescribed by prior legislation.

MRS. KALINOWSKA (Poland) thought that the article in its existing form was inadequate.

MR. CARRERA ANDRADE (Ecuador) thanked the representatives who had given him their support during the discussions and also expressed his regret that the Committee had not adopted the amendments of Cuba, the USSR, Uruguay, France and Mexico, which had emphasized the social aspect of the declaration of human rights.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) pointed out that the Committee by only a small majority had rejected a series of concrete and progressive measures intended to guarantee the freedom of mankind. Article 7 in its existing [258] form was not as complete as it should have been.

The word "arbitrary" left the way open to subjective interpretation, whereas the Cuban and Uruguayan proposals had been far more concrete.

The article was still weak, though it had been improved.

MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) regretted that the Committee had been unable to agree that the right to appeal to the competent tribunals was a fundamental right and not a technical legal matter.

The meeting rose at 6:10 p.m.

A/C.3/283/Add.1

28 October 1948

Addendum to Recapitulation of amendments to Article 10

Saudi Arabia: (submitted on 11 October)

Replace the word “unreasonable” by the word “illegitimate”.

A/C.3/SR.115<sup>73</sup>

28 October 1948

Summary Record of the Hundred and Fifteenth Meeting [of the Third Committee]

Held at the Palais de Chaillot, Paris, on Thursday,
28 October 1948, at 3 p.m.

Chairman: MR. CHARLES MALIK (Lebanon).

39. Draft international declaration of human rights (E/800) (continued)

Article 8<sup>1</sup>

THE CHAIRMAN called attention to the amendments to article 8, which were recapitulated in document A/C.3/277.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) wished his delegation's amendments (E/800, page 32) to precede the basic text of article 8. It was appropriate to mention in that article certain basic principles of justice.

The first sentence regarding equality before the law was intended to prevent unfair action by the courts. Unfortunately such action occurred, particularly in certain Non-Self-Governing Territories. The second sentence enunciated the principle that judges should not be influenced by local authorities. The third sentence contained a broader statement of principle than did the basic draft of article 8; there could therefore be no objection to it on the grounds that it was too detailed.

<sup>73</sup> The text of the document is from Official Records of the General Assembly, Third Session, 1948, pp. 258–67.

The second paragraph of the USSR amendment dealt with the very important question of public hearings in law courts; that all hearings should be public, except in cases where public morality and national security were involved. The right of an accused person to defence should also be explicitly stated in the declaration.

He dwelt at some length on the third paragraph regarding the right of an accused person to use his native language. To insist upon the use of the language of the country in which proceedings were taking place, regardless of whether or not the accused was familiar with that language, might result in injustice for millions of persons.

In answer to a remark by the representative of Poland, THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the substance of the USSR amendments had already been proposed in connexion with article 13 of the draft covenant (document E/800, annex B).

<sup>[1]</sup> Article 11 of the draft universal declaration of human rights (A/777).

[259]

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) wished to alter his delegation's amendment (A/C.3/224). He desired to postpone consideration of the part of his amendment referring to article 9.

The amendments he wished to make to article 8 were first, to change the latter part to read: "by a previously established, independent and impartial tribunal"; and secondly, to insert the words "and public" before the word "hearing". To be tried by a tribunal already in existence was as basic a right as to be tried under a law already in force. He considered his second amendment of equal importance.

MR. CONTOUMAS (Greece) suggested that the amendments were really a series of regulations to govern public administration. They contained many valuable ideas but did not fit into the declaration.

COUNT CARTON DE WIART (Belgium) supported the Greek representative's view. The amendments would be an undue burden on the declaration. He could not support the Cuban amendment concerning previously established tribunals because it appeared dangerous. The Nürnberg Trials had been conducted by a tribunal which had not existed at the time when the crimes were committed. A similar delicate legal problem was raised by article 9, paragraph 2. At the Nürnberg Trials, the principle that a man could not be condemned for crimes under laws not existing when the crimes were committed had been rejected in favour of the idea that unwritten laws of humanity were more important than the written laws of States.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) stated that he would have preferred articles 8 and 9 to be drafted differently, but the procedure adopted made that impossible. He approved of some of the ideas submitted by the USSR delegation (E/800, page 32). The fact that article 7 was so short, following the rejection of the proposed amendment made it impossible at that juncture to make articles 8 and 9 very detailed, as the balance between article 7 and articles 8 and 9 would be upset.

He approved of the Cuban delegate's amendment (A/C.3/224) regarding previously established tribunals, and did not share the Belgian representative's view. He understood the phrase to mean "tribunals established prior to the commission of the crime". Article 9, paragraph 2, provided that laws should not be retroactive. The proposed Cuban amendment supplemented that idea.

He would ask the Cuban delegation to withdraw the amendment concerning public trial as that point was already covered in article 9 of the original text.

The Egyptian amendment suggested deletion of the words en matière civile from the French text. The English version "determination of his rights and obligations" and the French détermination de ses droits et obligations en matière civile were [260] equivalent; the rights in question were not only civil. The words en matière civile covered public, administrative and political rights and obligations.

He was ready to accept the article as it stood, with the addition of the Cuban amendment referring to previously established tribunals.

MR. BAGDADI (Egypt) said that the words en matière civile constituted a restriction. He wished the sentence to cover guarantees against any sort of charge which might be brought against a person. He therefore proposed the deletion of those words from the French text. Specific mention could, however, be made of the need for guarantees against penal action, if the Committee so desired.

MR. GRUMBACH (France) said that the French delegation, after fully discussing the matter, had concluded that the words en matière civile were correct and were not restrictive.

With regard to the Cuban amendment (A/C.3/224), he agreed with the representatives of Egypt and Greece, that, however valuable its substance might be, its insertion would make the article less concise.

He agreed with the suggestion of the Panamanian representative (A/C.3/220) that the idea of equality had been fully covered in preceding articles.

Some of the motives of the USSR amendment (E/800, page 32) were covered by the basic text of article 9, paragraph 1. The last paragraph of that amendment, however, introduced an extremely important idea of principle, not of implementation. It should certainly be inserted into the declaration, but would go more logically in article 9, paragraph 1.

He would therefore vote for the basic text.

MR. DE LA OSSA (Panama) explained that his amendment (A/C.3/220) was intended merely to make the text more concise and clearer.

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) fully supported the representative of Panama. The idea of equality had already been expressed in articles 1 and 6.

The substance of the other amendments should be placed in the covenant rather than in the declaration. A very detailed statement would impair the force of the declaration.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) said that he must insist on emphasizing the need for a proviso that everyone charged with a penal offence had the right to a hearing by previously established tribunals. It was essential that the tribunals should have been set up before the crime was committed. His Government had already stated its position with regard to the Nürnberg Trials. The representative of Chile had been correct in saying that public hearings were essential, but the Cuban representative could not consent to withdraw his amendment since article 8 dealt with both criminal and civil law, whereas article 9 was confined to criminal law. There were circumstances in which a secret trial might be acceptable. He requested that a vote should be taken by roll-call on the second paragraph of the Cuban amendment.

[261]

He thanked the representative of France for his efforts to establish a correct French text and hoped that those efforts might be extended, if necessary, to deal with portions of the Cuban amendment.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) agreed with the Cuban representative that there was no need to specify that hearings should be public.

With regard to the Cuban representative's insistence on the need for trial by previously established tribunals, that was implicit in article 9, paragraph 2, which should logically be put forward into article 8. The Nürnberg Trials could be regarded in the light of an exception as they had been during the debates at Geneva. The declaration, however, should firmly establish the principle of previously established tribunals.

MRS. CORBET (United Kingdom) pointed out that article 8 dealt with both criminal and civil matters, whereas article 9 was restricted to criminal matters. Once that was clear, it was obvious that certain of the suggestions contained in the USSR amendment (E/800, page 32) would be more appropriate in article 9. The right to a hearing by an independent and impartial tribunal was extremely important, but hard to guarantee. In the United Kingdom judges held office as long as their official conduct was good. It would be unwise to adopt any statement such as the one in the USSR amendment to the effect that legal procedure must be based on democratic principles: it would open the way to a very wide interpretation and would not be generally intelligible. The idea of a fair hearing was extremely comprehensive; the guarantees enumerated in the USSR amendment were not nearly comprehensive enough. In the United Kingdom the jury system reflected the free expression of public opinion, without which a fair hearing was impossible; but she could not demand that the jury system should be adopted in the legal code of all countries.

She agreed with the representative of the USSR on the importance of ascertaining equality before the court and with the representative of Panama (A/C.3/220) on the logic of his proposed deletion. Those two representatives might compromise on their terms and some adaptation of the phrase might be retained in the present text.

The idea in the second paragraph of the Cuban amendment (A/C.3/224) was new and needed discussion; but in any case it would be included more appropriately in the covenant than in the declaration. The Nürnberg Trials and the special tribunals which had been contemplated by the United Kingdom in 1940 in case of invasion made it difficult to insert such an idea in the declaration.

She agreed with the representative of the United States that the covenant was the place for the enumeration of even broader guarantees than had been suggested.

She would vote for the basic text.

[262]

MR. PLAZA (Venezuela) opposed the USSR amendment because it was tantamount to a measure for implementation and was a repetition of the idea of equality before the law laid down in article 6. He had some hesitation concerning the establishment of a right to public hearing since provisions for secret trial in certain circumstances existed in most countries.

He agreed with the representative of Chile that the Cuban amendment (A/C.3/224) regarding previously established tribunals was valuable; he would support it. He hoped that the Committee would take into consideration what the representative of the United Kingdom had said about the difficulty of specifying the idea of a fair hearing. He was not opposed to the Panamanian amendment (A/C.3/220), but he could not vote for any of the others because their substance was implicit in the basic text.

MR. BAGDADI (Egypt) believed that the words "in full equality" covered almost all the points contained in the USSR amendment (E/800, page 32), except that of public hearings.

He was in favour of the Cuban amendment (A/C.3/224), although he believed that the USSR amendment formulated the exceptions more satisfactorily. He was not quite sure that it would be possible to lay down the principle of previously established tribunals at both the national and international levels, but he was in favour of the idea.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) pointed out that no substantial objection had been voiced against the USSR amendment. It was intended, not as a substitution for the basic text – which was not exceptionable but merely inadequate – but as an addition, to precede the basic draft. He opposed the argument that his amendment was too detailed; the basic text spoke of certain defined circumstances, whereas his text was far more general. It was not confined merely to penal charges but specifically referred to legal procedure – to all kinds of courts. He refused to accept the plea that such matters should be excluded from the declaration because they would appear in the covenant. The declaration would have a universal meaning, whereas the covenant would be binding only upon its signatories.

He asked that the last paragraph of the USSR amendment should be voted on separately without prejudice to its position in the declaration. That paragraph was extremely important for the protection of national minorities and the people of Non-Self-Governing Territories. The remainder of his amendment should be voted in parts, paragraph by paragraph. He requested that the first paragraph should be voted on by roll-call.

MR. BAGDADI (Egypt) requested that the second sentence of the second paragraph of the USSR amendment should be voted on separately.

THE CHAIRMAN put the first paragraph of the USSR amendment to the vote.

A vote was taken by roll-call as follows:

Paraguay, having been drawn by lot by the Chairman, was called upon to vote first.

[263]

In favour: Poland, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Yugoslavia, Argentina, Burma, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Colombia, Costa Rica, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Haiti, Mexico.

Against: Peru, Philippines, Syria, Turkey, Union of South Africa, United Kingdom, United States of America, Uruguay, Australia, Belgium, Brazil, Canada, China, Denmark, France, Honduras, Iceland, India, Lebanon, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Panama.

Abstaining: Venezuela, Afghanistan, Chile, Dominican Republic, Egypt.

That part was rejected by 23 votes to 13, with 5 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put the second sentence of the second paragraph of the USSR amendment to the vote.

That part was rejected by 21 votes to 10, with 8 abstentions.

MR. GRUMBACH (France), in explanation of his vote, emphasized his belief that no representative had voted against the substance of the USSR amendment. He, like other representatives, had only intended to indicate that those ideas were out of place in the declaration.

MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) supported the representative of France. He had voted for the last part of the USSR amendment because such a provision did not exist in all national legislations. The other ideas were already implied in the last part of the text submitted by the Commission.

MR. WATT (Australia) thought it was a mistake to include too many details in the declaration. Several of the ideas in the USSR amendment were already covered by the words “fair hearing” in the Commission’s text.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the Cuban amendment to insert the words “and public” between the words “fair” and “hearing.”

That amendment was adopted by 22 votes to none, with 9 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the Cuban amendment to replace the word “an” by the words “a previously established”.

A vote was taken by roll-call, as follows:

The United States of America, having been drawn by lot by the Chairman, was called upon to vote first.

In favour: Uruguay, Venezuela, Argentina, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, Cuba, Dominican Republic, Egypt, Haiti, Honduras, Lebanon, Mexico, Panama, Saudi Arabia.

Against: United States of America, Australia, Belgium, Brazil, Canada, China, Denmark, France, Iceland, India, Netherlands, New Zea-[264]land Norway, Philippines, Syria, Turkey, Union of South Africa, United Kingdom.

Abstaining: Yugoslavia, Afghanistan, Burma, Belorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Czechoslovakia, Peru, Poland, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

That amendment was rejected by 18 votes to 15, with 9 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the first paragraph of the Panamanian amendment, pointing out that the remainder could be transmitted to the proposed sub-committee.

That amendment was rejected by 18 votes to 11, with 7 abstentions.

MR. GRUMBACH (France) wished to retain the words en matière civile in the French text of article 8.

COUNT CARTON DE WIART (Belgium) agreed with him and remarked that they were balanced by the words occurring in the latter part of the article, en matière pénale. Moreover, they did not exclude commercial and public law.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) agreed with the Egyptian representative that the words en matière civile represented a restrictive formula. He would consequently vote for their deletion. While he would not dispute the linguistic authority of representatives whose mother tongue was French, he felt that he was called upon to vote on a matter of substance rather than of wording.

MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) called attention to the fact that the words in question would undoubtedly be translated into Spanish as en materia civil; that term certainly had a restrictive sense, and the Spanish official text would suffer therefrom.

He consequently supported the Egyptian amendment.

THE CHAIRMAN put the Egyptian amendment (A/C.3/264) to the vote.

That amendment was adopted by 11 votes to 7, with 17 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put article 8, as amended, to the vote.

Article 8, as amended, was adopted unanimously.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the third paragraph of the USSR amendment, recalling that it was to be voted upon independently of article 8 and without prejudice to its position in the declaration.

That paragraph was rejected by 20 votes to 12, with 7 abstentions.

Article 9<sup>1</sup>

THE CHAIRMAN drew attention to the fact that the amendments to article 9 were recapitulated in document A/C.3/278.

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) said that the purpose of the amendment proposed by her delegation (A/C.3/223) – the insertion of the word “penal” before the word “offence” each time it was used in paragraph 2 of article 9 – was to make clear that the paragraph related to criminal matters only. Unless that were done, the fact that the word “penal” was used in paragraph 1 might give the impression that paragraph 2 had a wider scope. The Commission on Human Rights had intended paragraph 2 to cover the same type of offence as paragraph 1.

<sup>[1]</sup> Article 12 of the draft universal declaration of human rights (A/777).

[265]

MR. DE ROSE (France) explained that the amendment proposed by his delegation (A/C.3/244), which applied to the French text only, was a correction of the French translation of the basic text as it appeared in document E/800.

In view of the discussion and vote on article 3, MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) withdrew the portion of his amendment (A/C.3/268) proposed as paragraph 4.

He agreed with the United States amendment to paragraph 2. He thought also that the word “punishable” should be inserted in that paragraph before the word “under”. It was necessary to guarantee that not only the offence, but the penalty for that offence would be determined by law prior to its commission.

Paragraph 2 of article 9 established the principle that laws could not be retroactive. Mr. Jiménez de Aréchaga suggested completing that idea by the addition of a third paragraph prohibiting retroactive changes of penalties for crimes already recognized by existing laws.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) stated that he wished to reduce his amendment to article 9 (A/C.3/224) to the following text:

“Every accused person has the right to be judged by tribunals established prior to the offence with which he is charged.”

MR. DE LA OSSA (Panama) said he was quite satisfied with the text of paragraph 1 of article 9. His amendment (A/C.3/220) proposed an additional sentence to paragraph 2, containing the universally recognized principle that the penalty for any crime could not be changed ex post facto.

MRS. CORBET (United Kingdom) recalled that the Committee had rejected a USSR amendment to article 8 very similar to the USSR amendment to article 9. The idea of a fair and public hearing had been accepted in article 8 without any limitation save that contained in article 27; that idea should not be qualified in article 9 any more than in the preceding article.

She called attention to the fact that in certain circumstances the idea expressed in the Cuban (A/C.3/224) and Uruguayan (A/C.3/268) amendments concerning alteration of penalties might be of doubtful value. Thus, during an inflation, it might be quite justifiable to increase the amount of fines previously set for certain offences. The idea should therefore not be adopted.

[266]

COUNT CARTON DE WIART (Belgium) remarked that article 9 contained no less than four basic principles: presumption of innocence until proved guilty; right to defence; right to a public hearing; and non-retroactivity of laws.

He called attention to the fact that the word délit in the French text of paragraph 1 should be replaced by the more general term infraction, which was in fact used in paragraph 2.

His delegation attached great importance to the sacred right of defence. He therefore could not understand the USSR amendment (E/800, page 32), which appeared to restrict that right.

With respect to paragraph 2 of article 9, he feared that its adoption might be used as a basis for the argument that such trials as the Nürnberg Trials had been illegal. He agreed with those who had held that those trials had been based on the laws of the human conscience which were higher than any national laws.

He hoped that view would be upheld by the Committee and recorded by the Rapporteur in the report to be submitted to the General Assembly, in order to refute any future misinterpretation of the paragraph.

MR. AQUINO (Philippines) was strongly in favour of the principle of presumption of innocence stated in paragraph 1. In view of recent events, and of ideas still held by certain Governments, it was necessary to re-assert that principle.

Paragraph 2 was equally important. The prohibition against ex post facto laws, which was part of the constitutional history of many countries, had to be recorded in the declaration. He thought the Panamanian amendment would reinforce that paragraph. The fears of the Belgian representative with respect to any questioning of the legality of the Nürnberg Trials or the Tokyo Trials appeared unwarranted. It was obvious that considerations of international peace and welfare must supersede national considerations.

He would consequently vote in favour of the basic text of article 9 with the addition of the Panamanian amendment (A/C.3/220).

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) explained to the Belgian representative that the amendment which he proposed did not in any way qualify the right to defence. What it did qualify was the idea of public hearings: hearings should be public in all cases save when public morality or national security had to be protected.

He expressed surprise at the objection to that idea raised by the United Kingdom representative. Article 9 dealt with trials on criminal charges; it was customary in many countries to exclude the public from trials on such charges as that of rape. Surely the United Kingdom representative did not wish to alter that practice. Similarly, trials on charges of conspiracy involving [267] diplomatic representatives of other countries, for example, should surely not be open to the public.

With respect to amendments proposed by other delegations, Mr. Pavlov remarked that at first glance he could see no objection to them. The Committee might have to choose between the United States amendment (A/C.3/223) proposing the insertion of the word “penal” before the word “offence” and the Uruguayan proposal (A/C.3/268) to insert the word “punishable” in paragraph 2; the two amendments expressed different shades of the same idea.

He saw no ground for the fears expressed by the Belgian representative. The crimes of those brought before the Nürnberg Tribunal had constituted a glaring violation of all the laws of war; they had, in effect, been crimes under international law. There was no cause to fear that the adoption of paragraph 2 of article 9 in Paris – a city which but a few years ago had itself been under Hitlerite occupation – would be considered by anyone an amnesty for those crimes.

MR. WATT (Australia) agreed that it had been argued, as the USSR representative had just done, that the Nürnberg Trials did not constitute a contravention of the principle of non-retroactivity of laws. He thought, however, that the point raised by the Belgian representative deserved careful consideration.

The meeting rose at 6:10 p.m.

A/C.3/283/Rev.2<sup>74</sup>

29 October 1948

Recapitulation of amendments to Article 10
of the draft declaration (E/800)
(in chronological order of their submission to the Committee)

Article 10

(Text adopted by the Commission on Human Rights)

No one shall be subjected to unreasonable interference with his privacy, family, home, correspondence or reputation.

<sup>74</sup> Document A/C.3/283/Rev.1, issued 29 October 1948, does not contain the proposal of the Soviet Union.

Amendments:Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (E/800)

(Supplement to the text as adopted)

“and everyone is entitled to legal defence against interference”.

Cuba (A/C.3/232)

Break up this article, which is too complex to be clear and amend to read as follows:

(a) Protection of honour

Article No. –

“Every person has a right to the protection of the law against abusive attacks upon his honour and reputation and against unreasonable interference with his private and family life”.

(b) Inviolability of the home

Article No. –

“Every person has a right to the inviolability of his home”.

(c) Right of correspondence

Article No. –

“Every person has a right to the inviolability and unhampered transmission of his correspondence”.

Saudi Arabia (A/C.3/255)

Replace the word “unreasonable” by the word “illegitimate”.

Lebanon (A/C.3/260)

Delete the word “unreasonable”.

[2]

New Zealand (A/C.3/267)

Substitute the word “arbitrary” for the word “unreasonable”.

Uruguay (A/C.3/268)

(does not apply to the English text)

Panama (A/C.3/280)

Add to this article the words: person, activities and property, so that the article reads as follows:

“No one shall be subjected to unreasonable interference with his person, his home, his family, his privacy, his activities, his property, his correspondence or his reputation”.

A/C.3/SR.116<sup>75</sup>

29 October 1948

Summary Record of the Hundred and Sixteenth Meeting
[of the Third Committee]

Held at the Palais de Chaillot, Paris, on Friday,
29 October 1948, at 10:50 a.m.

Chairman: MR. CHARLES MALIK (Lebanon).

40. Draft international declaration of human rights (E/800) (continued)

Article 9 (continued)

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba), referring to the statements made at the preceding meeting by the representatives of Belgium and Australia with regard to the judgments pronounced by the Nürnberg Tribunal, briefly reviewed the history of the question.

He recalled that the problem of the Nürnberg Tribunal had first been raised in the General Assembly in 1946, as a result of a proposal made by the United States<sup>1</sup> for the affirmation of the principles of international law contained in the Charter and in the judgments of the Tribunal.<sup>76</sup> As he had not wished to give rise to a discussion on the judgments of the Nürnberg Tribunal nor to appear to be approving them by voting for the United States draft resolution, the representative of Cuba on the Sixth Committee had voted against the draft.<sup>2</sup> In order not to enter upon the question of substance, he had justified his position by giving a technical reason, namely, that a proclamation referring to the principles as a whole would be in the nature of legislation by reference, which his delegation could not accept.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>[1]</sup> See Official Records of the Second Part of the First Session of the General Assembly, Sixth Committee, annex 13b.

<sup>[2]</sup> Ibid., 32nd meeting.

[268]

<sup>75</sup> The text of the document is from Official Records of the General Assembly, Third Session, 1948, pp. 267–77.

<sup>76</sup> At the initiative of the United States, General Assembly Resolution 95(I) of 11 December 1946 affirmed the principles of international law recognized in the Charter of the International Military Tribunal and the judgment issued on 30 September–1 October 1946. The Resolution directed the Committee on the Progressive Development of International Law and its Codification to “treat as a matter of primary importance plans for the formulation, in the context of a general codification of offences against the peace and security of mankind, or of an International Criminal Code, of the principles recognized in the Charter of the Nürnberg Tribunal and in the judgment of the Tribunal”. The mandate was renewed in 1947, by Resolution 177(II) directed at the International Law Commission. The Commission formulated the principles in 1950 but did not complete its draft Code of Crimes until 1996.

The same problem had arisen the preceding year, and at that time the Cuban delegation had merely maintained the position it had taken up in 1946<sup>2</sup>; it was confirming it for the third time. In view of legal and moral principles which it could not surrender, the Cuban delegation was, in the case under discussion, equally averse to voting in a way which might be taken as a direct or indirect approval of the Nürnberg judgments.

The proposal to include in article 9 a reference to the Nürnberg Trials would weaken rather than strengthen the article and might be considered as an indirect criticism of the trial as it would stress the contradiction between the precept Nullum crimen sine praevia lege penale and the method adopted at Nürnberg.

The representative of Cuba felt that in those circumstances it would be wiser not to emphasize that contrast, and to abandon the idea of mentioning the Nürnberg Trials.

MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) recalled his delegation's proposal (A/C.3/268) to add a third paragraph to article 9 which would extend the principle of non-retroactivity to increased penalties.

The delegation of Uruguay was aware of the difficulty of trying to include, in the draft declaration, provisions which would give to the individual, on an international plane, the same guarantees as those which had been established in most of the national legislations.

The Uruguayan delegation attached the greatest importance to the statement made on the preceding day by the representative of Belgium with regard to the Nürnberg Trials. It wished to stress, however, that the declaration of human rights to be drafted by the Committee was destined to govern, in times of peace, an international community based on the principles of the United Nations; consequently the Committee should proceed as far as possible along the road of progress.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) stressed the appropriateness of the last part of the proposal of Panama (A/C.3/220). The non-retroactivity of penalties should, in fact, have as its corollary the non-retroactivity of increased penalties.

As regards the amendment submitted by the representative of the USSR (E/800, page 32), the representative of Lebanon thought that the latter's agreements were valid in themselves. However, limitations of rights were to be included as the Committee was aware, in article 27. He would therefore oppose that amendment.

As regards the expression "penal offence" proposed by the United States (A/C.3/223), the delegation of Lebanon would prefer to have it rendered in French by the word délit and not infraction because, at the current stage of the legal and psychological evolution of nations, it seemed difficult to include in article 9 an offence which might not be of an exclusively criminal nature.

[<sup>1</sup>] See Official Records of the Second Part of the First Session of the General Assembly, Sixth Committee, 31st meeting.

[<sup>2</sup>] See Official Records of the Second Session of the General Assembly, Sixth Committee, 59th meeting.

Mr. Azkoul recognized the justice of the amendment to the French text presented by France (A/C.3/244), but would prefer the wording: “d’après les principes du droit national ou international”.

In conclusion, he stated that he preferred the amendment of Panama to that of Uruguay, the idea of the latter amendment being included in the Panamanian proposal.

MR. MACDONNELL (Canada) formally stated that he could not accept the limitations contained in the USSR amendment, which were already covered by article 27. One should not sacrifice clarity and simplicity on the plea of defining the problem. Moreover, there should be nothing which might seem to favour closed trial.

MR. DE LA OSSA (Panama) noted that the English version of his amendment was not satisfactory and proposed the following text:

“nor shall a heavier penalty be imposed than the one that was applicable at the time the penal offence was committed.”

THE CHAIRMAN stated that, as it was a modification of form only, the proposal would be accepted.

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) agreed to the new drafting of the Panamanian amendment, which clarified the text without changing its substance.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) observed that he had little to add to the statements made by his delegation at the beginning of the general debate on article 9 (115th meeting).

He recalled, however, that the substance of the article was based on amendments proposed by the delegations of the Philippines and Belgium during the Geneva session of the Commission on Human Rights.<sup>1</sup>

The legality of the Nürnberg judgments could not be challenged; it was securely founded on General Assembly resolution 95(I), which was adopted on 11 December 1946. By that resolution, the General Assembly not only affirmed the “principles of international law recognized by the Charter of the Nürnberg Tribunal”, and the judgment of the Tribunal, but also directed the “Committee on the codification of international law . . . to treat as a matter of primary importance plans for the formulation, in the context of a general codification of offences against the peace and security of mankind, or of an International Criminal Code, of the principles recognized in the Charter of the Nürnberg Tribunal and in the judgment of the Tribunal”.

There was consequently no cause for apprehension regarding the retroactive application of those principles. It seemed advisable, however, that notwithstanding the guarantees given by the General Assembly resolution, the text of the declaration of human rights should include an article on that matter. It was for that reason that the Belgian delegation had lent its support to the text worked out at Lake Success during the third session of the Commission on Human Rights.<sup>1</sup>

<sup>[1]</sup> See E/CN.4/SR.35.

The Belgian delegation supported the French delegation's request that the words d'après les principes should be substituted for the words aux termes du in the French text of article 9. International law included an extremely important customary section which it was essential to take into account.

Contrary to the views of the representative of Lebanon, Mr. Dehousse preferred the word infraction to the word délit; the word délit had a very precise technical meaning for French-speaking jurists and the Belgian delegation feared that it might give rise to misunderstanding.

MR. WATT (Australia) stated that his delegation was deeply convinced of the importance of paragraph 2 of article 9; it had therefore asked the Committee at the previous meeting to consider the matter carefully before making a decision. Having considered the matter, his delegation was ready to state that the adoption of the text seemed to it in no way incompatible with the position of the delegations which approved the procedure followed at Nürnberg and, in particular, with the position of Australia as one of the judges at the Tokyo Trials.

MR. CONTOUMAS (Greece) said that the idea of non-retroactivity in criminal law was included in the general legal principles of his country. The Greek delegation was therefore ready to accept that idea as expressed in paragraph 2 of article 9.

It recognized, however, that promulgation of the principle in the declaration of human rights might, by implication, cast doubts upon the validity of the trials of war criminals in general, and of the trials of Nürnberg and Tokyo in particular. In order to preclude such a possibility, Mr. Contoumas thought that it would be enough to have the Rapporteur mention specifically in his report the doubts in that regard expressed during the general debate on article 9.

As far as the USSR amendment was concerned, the delegation of Greece supported the remarks made by the Canadian representative and appealed to Mr. Pavlov to agree, along with the majority of the delegations, that the provisions of article 27 sufficiently covered the exceptions he had in mind.

Regarding the French translation of the United States amendment, the delegation of Greece would be inclined not to use either the word infraction, which might cover offences that were not solely criminal offences, or the word délit, which had a clearly defined meaning in legal language. It suggested using the generic term acte délictueux, which covered all offences under criminal law.

In conclusion, the Greek delegation opposed the inclusion of the idea of the non-retroactivity of increased penalties in article 9 which would burden the declaration with too many detailed provisions it felt that the non-retroactivity established in paragraph 2 implicitly applied to increased penalties.

<sup>[1]</sup> See E/CN.4/SR.54.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) drew the Committee's attention to the fact that the USSR delegation wished to provide for closed trial only in two specific cases: namely cases where defence of morality or national security were involved.

The limitations in article 27 were so general in nature that they might give undue latitude and permit too many unjustifiable instances of closed trials.

Mr. Pavlov wished to stress in that regard that the principle of open trial was constantly applied in his country; in particular, the world had not forgotten the great trials which had taken place on the eve of the last war. Whenever the Soviet Union made an exception to that principle, one could be sure that its action was determined by some imperative reason such as the desire to preserve good international understanding.

Examining paragraph 2 of article 9, Mr. Pavlov said that there was no doubt but that aggression and intention of aggression constituted crimes under international law. The Nürnberg Trials had shown the extent to which that principle was recognized and the manner in which it might be applied in international life. Paragraph 2, therefore, could only be unacceptable to those who harboured aggressive designs.

MR. CASSIN (France) was glad to note general agreement with regard to the drafting change suggested by his delegation for paragraph 2 of article 9.

The representative of France agreed with the representatives of Belgium and Australia regarding the consequences of international prevention and punishment on the basis of the judgments pronounced by the Nürnberg Tribunal: it was not a question of securing approval for those judgments, but of making sure that there was no repudiation of the very principles which had presided over the creation of a community of nations born of the victory of freedom over war-crimes. Mr. Cassin declared in the name of the millions of human beings who had perished during the last war that the Committee had not the right to state or imply that the sacrifice made by these people had been in vain.

He then pointed out to the representative of the USSR that article 27 specifically provided that individual freedom was subject only to such limitations as were necessary to ensure the rights of others and to satisfy the "requirements of morality, public order and general welfare in a democratic society". Those provisions thus fully covered the intention of the USSR amendment. The delegation of France would vote against that amendment, as it had been understood that all reservations and limitations in respect of human rights would be contained in article 27. It wished to state, on that occasion, that it would vote against any amendment which would weaken article 27.

Mr. Cassin supported the suggestion put forward by the Greek delegation to render the English expression "penal offence" in French by the words acte délictueux.

[272]

In conclusion, commenting on the amendments submitted by the delegations of Panama and Uruguay, Mr. Cassin said that the principles they were aimed at defending were applied in French legislation and had, therefore, his entire sympathy. He was forced, however, to oppose their adoption in view of the fact that the Committee's essential task was to establish the principles of international common law, and it would succeed in that only by concentrating upon the definition of concepts common to all, that is concepts which would win the support of all countries.

MRS. CORBET (United Kingdom) approved the new drafting of the English text of the Panamanian amendment.

She stressed, with reference to the Cuban amendment, that the question of establishing tribunals after the crimes which they were to try had been committed should be considered in connexion with the covenant, and not in connexion with the declaration of human rights. The important thing was to make sure that the tribunal, no matter when it was established, should judge the crimes in accordance with laws in force at the time when the crimes had been committed.

The representative of the United Kingdom questioned the alleged incompatibility of article 9 with the Nürnberg judgments, in regard to which her country had played an important part.

She went on to note that the amendments presented by the United States and Uruguay were, in fact, equivalent, the word "penal" having the same meaning as the word "punishable".

She feared that, if either of those amendments were adopted, some new crime might eventually not be covered by the provisions of article 9.

She therefore supported the wording adopted by the Commission on Human Rights.

MR. RADEVANOVIC (Yugoslavia) felt that the amendment to article 9 submitted by the USSR representative made the article more precise without changing its general meaning. Most of the trials would be conducted in public, but it must be recognized that there were cases where the discussion would be closed or given limited publicity. Although that principle was recognized, its application should be restricted to cases where it was necessary to protect the supreme interests of the community in general or of the State itself.

The Yugoslav delegation would therefore vote for the USSR amendment.

With regard to paragraph 2 of the article, he observed that, from the penal point of view, international law had not been codified; it was based on custom. Hence it might be asked what practical value there was in introducing in article 9, which was penal in nature, the idea of the non-retroactivity of laws. At the Nürnberg Trials, the German war criminals had tried to invoke that principle. The Nürnberg Military Tribunal had rightly rejected that concept. The nulla poena sine lege principle was almost universal in its application in national law; in international law, on the other hand, the principle of responsibility was different. It was inadvisable to propose identical solutions for the same problems in those two fields of law. The General Assembly had adopted a resolution for codifying the legal findings of the [273] Nürnberg Tribunal and had appointed a special committee to deal with them. That committee had to settle all questions relating to those legal findings, and article 9 of the draft declaration of human rights should not infringe its mandate.

He would, however, vote for article 9 if it emerged, during the discussion, that the provisions of that article did not tend to cast doubt subsequently on the validity of the judgments pronounced by the Nürnberg Tribunal.

MR. BAGDADI (Egypt) stated that his delegation attached very great importance to the amendments submitted by the delegations of Panama and Uruguay, which sanctioned the principle that penalties were not retroactive.

The Egyptian delegation thought that the question should be put clearly, namely, whether the individual should be protected against the possibility of incurring a penalty which had been established after the offence. As the basic text admitted the principle that any contravention must have preceded the penalty, that principle should also apply to increased penalties. Most national legislations stipulated that penalties were not retroactive. He did not see why the principle could not be transferred to international law. The Nürnberg precedent was established. Hence no anxiety should be felt in that connexion.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote, the amendment submitted by the USSR delegation (E/800, page 32) paragraph 1 of article 9, to the effect that the words "and which must be public except in cases involving considerations of the protection of public morality or national security" should be inserted after the words "defence", the word "public" being deleted before the word "trial".

The amendment was rejected by 25 votes to 7, with 12 abstentions.

COUNT CARTON DE WIART (Belgium) associated himself with the Greek delegation's proposal, which had already been supported by the French delegation, to the effect that the words "penal offence" should be translated as acte délictueux.

The Committee unanimously agreed to that proposal.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the new wording proposed by the delegation of Panama for paragraph 2 of article 9 (A/C.3/220). He pointed out, with regard to the English text, that the new wording submitted by Mr. de la Ossa should be taken into account.

The amendment was adopted by 19 votes to 6, with 19 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the United States delegation's proposal that the word "penal" should be inserted before the word "offence" in the English text in both instances where it appeared in paragraph 2 of article 9, as amended by the representative of Panama.

The proposal was adopted by 16 votes to 8, with 14 abstentions.

MR. SAINT-LOT (Haiti) Rapporteur, pointed out that the Committee's decision to translate [274] "penal offence" by acte délictueux should also apply to paragraph 2 of article 9.

It was so agreed.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) asked it to be recorded that he had not taken part in the vote on the United States delegation's amendment, as the exact scope of that amendment had not been adequately defined.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the Uruguayan delegation's amendment (A/C.3/268) to paragraph 2, which proposed the insertion of the word "punishable" before the word "under".

MR. JIMÉNEZ ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) stressed that the word "punishable" in the English text of his amendment should be understood in the sense of punie par, because the Uruguayan delegation wished to emphasize that there should be no legal provision defining the crime without defining the penalty.

The amendment was rejected by 13 votes to 10, with 20 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN recalled that the representative of France had requested that in the French text of paragraph 2 the words aux termes du droit national ou international should be replaced by the expression d'après le droit national ou international.

That amendment was approved unanimously.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the amendment submitted by the Uruguayan delegation to the effect that a new paragraph should be added to paragraph 9, whereby the principle of non-retroactivity would be applied to augmentations of penalties (A/C.3/268).

The amendment was rejected by 22 votes to 15, with 7 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the amendment submitted by the Cuban delegation, to the effect that a new paragraph should be added to article 9 as follows:

"Every accused person has the right to be judged by tribunals established prior to the offence with which he is charged."

The amendment was rejected by 18 votes to 8 with 17 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put the whole of article 9, as amended, to the vote.

Article 9, as amended, was adopted by 42 votes to none, with 2 abstentions.

MR. CAMPOS ORTIZ (Mexico), MR. PLAZA (Venezuela), and MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) explained that they had favoured the adoption of article 9 in its amended form on the understanding that the term “international law”, appearing in paragraph 2 of that article, should be interpreted as meaning positive international law.

MR. PLAZA (Venezuela) added that he had voted for the second Uruguayan amendment which, in his opinion, had given article 9 wider scope. He was against the USSR amendment because of the existence of article 27, and he had voted for the Cuban amendment.

Finally, he asked for the words “penal offence”, which had been proposed by the United States [275] delegation, to be rendered into Spanish as actos delictuosos.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) pointed out that, by “international law”, his delegation understood the spirit as well as the letter of international law, which naturally included the principles established by the Nürnberg Tribunal.

It should be well understood that, if new methods of war and new ways of destroying civilian populations resulted from a new conflict, they could be considered criminal according to article 9 of the declaration of human rights.

He regretted that the Committee had not seen fit to adopt the USSR amendment, which aimed at making article 9 more precise. His delegation noted that the Committee members had been unanimous in stating that that amendment was completely covered by the provisions of article 27.

MR. WATT (Australia) explained that his delegation had preferred to abstain in the last vote, because it feared that article 9 might be interpreted as implying some criticism of the Nürnberg Trials.

MR. CASSIN (France) stated that he had voted for article 9 precisely because the Committee had rejected some amendments which might have been interpreted as questioning the Nürnberg judgments.

He confirmed that his delegation understood by “international law”, positive law, both customary and written.

Article 10<sup>1</sup>

THE CHAIRMAN drew attention to document A/C.3/283/Rev.1, which contained a recapitulation of the amendments proposed to article 10. To that list should be added the USSR amendment (E/800, page 33), to the effect that the phrase “and everyone is entitled to legal defence against any such interference” should be added to the text by the Commission on Human Rights.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) thought that the wording of article 10 tended to put on the same level various physical, moral and legal factors.

He recommended that the article should be divided into three separate articles. The first article would ensure man’s moral inviolability, which was based on two factors: a subjective factor, honour, and an objective factor, reputation. The second article would be expressly concerned with the principle of the inviolability of the home. The third article would guarantee not only inviolability of correspondence but would supplement that concept by the concept of the free circulation of correspondence.

He was submitting his amendment (A/C.3/232) with a view to making the statement of those principles, which he considered as essential, more clear and precise.

He added that he sympathized with the amendments submitted by the representatives of Uruguay (A/C.3/268), Saudi Arabia (A/C.3/255) and Lebanon (A/C.3/260).

[<sup>1</sup>] Article 13 of the draft universal declaration of human rights (A/777).

[276]

MRS. NEWLANDS (New Zealand) proposed (A/C.3/267) that the word “unreasonable” should be replaced by the word “arbitrary” for two reasons. First, the latter word was already used in articles 7 and 13 and it was advisable to ensure uniformity of wording in the declaration. Besides, it was extremely difficult to define the exact limits of what might be considered “unreasonable”, whereas the word “arbitrary” signified everything that was not in accordance with well-established legal principles.

MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) proposed (A/C.3/268) that the word abusives should be replaced by the word injustes in the French text. He felt that the declaration as a whole should take into account the concept of justice and not of current practices, which might sometimes lead to admitting injustice.

MR. DE LA OSSA (Panama) explained that his amendment (A/C.3/280) reintroduced the original wording of the proposal submitted by the delegation of Panama at the San Francisco conference.<sup>1</sup>

He criticized the wording adopted by the Commission on Human Rights for not taking into account the conception of the human person in relation to his work, his property, his actions and deeds and all his other activities. His delegation wished to have none of those aspects omitted from article 10.

MR. BAROODY (Saudi Arabia), in explanation of the purpose of his amendment (A/C.3/255), drew the Committee’s attention to the legal aspect of the article. The question was whether the State was entitled, in certain circumstances, to interfere in the private life of individuals or whether it should be refused that right in every instance.

The right of every individual to be free from State interference in his private life must be regarded as sacred as long as that right was not used as a cloak for activities which were essentially detrimental to the general good, or which endangered its general welfare and security. In the latter case, the interference of the State was unavoidable and should be considered as reasonable. The difficulty lay in drawing the dividing line.

The word “unreasonable” was not sufficiently precise and was open to too many different interpretations. What was considered as reasonable in one country might not be so considered in another. Hence, in every country, the national law remained the best safeguard against unreasonable interference. But since, in certain national emergencies, administrative orders promulgated in the interests of order and security might seem, to an uninitiated public, to be a statement of the law, he had been unwilling to recommend the word “illegal”, because he did not think that that term was suitable.

He thought that the word “unlawful”, while it took into account the legal aspect, was a more precise and specific adjective than the word “unreasonable”. Thus, in his opinion, human beings would be safeguarded against unreasonable interference and society would also be protected against the abuse of the laws listed in the article.

<sup>[1]</sup> See Documents of the United Nations Conference on International Organization, San Francisco, 1945, vol. II, page 266.

[277]

COUNT CARTON DE WIART (Belgium) thought that article 10 of the draft declaration of human rights aimed at protecting the human person in his moral aspect.

He greatly appreciated the Cuban representative’s intention to make the general nature of the article more precise and to word it in a positive form. It was advisable to qualify, as the Cuban representative had done, the interference against which article 10 was to protect the individual.

Following the advice of the saying “Grasp all, lose all”, he felt that it would be better to leave the protection of property, of correspondence and of the home to separate articles, and to retain the real significance of article 10, which was to ensure protection against every unreasonable interference with the honour or reputation of the human person.

The meeting rose at 1:5 p.m.

A/C.3/SR.117<sup>77</sup>

29 October 1948

Summary Record of the Hundred and Seventeenth Meeting
[of the Third Committee]

Held at the Palais de Chaillot, Paris, on Friday
 29 October 1948, at 3 p.m.

Chairman: MR. CHARLES MALIK (Lebanon).

...

<sup>77</sup> The text of the document is from Official Records of the General Assembly, Third Session, 1948, pp. 277–89.

[288]

...

THE CHAIRMAN informed the members that the Committee would hold two meetings on the following day (Saturday), one of which would be devoted to the examination of the declaration of human rights and the other to a discussion of the question of the Palestine refugees.

MR. DAVIES (United Kingdom) reminded the Committee that it had been decided that the question of the Palestine refugees would be discussed until a full solution was reached. He thought therefore that both meetings held on the following day should be devoted to that question.

THE CHAIRMAN proposed that the problem of the Palestine refugees should be discussed at the morning meeting and continued in the afternoon if necessary.

[289]

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) recalled that it had been unanimously decided a week earlier that discussion of the declaration of human rights would take place continuously and without interruption. Moreover, the text of the draft resolution had been transmitted to delegations only that afternoon.

Mr. Pavlov asked therefore that the Saturday meetings should be devoted to the question of human rights, and that examination of the problem of refugees should be continued in the course of the following week. Such a procedure would enable representatives to consult their respective Governments on that important question.

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) supported the statement by the United Kingdom representative and said she had asked that the examination of that question be put off for one week in order to enable all representatives to consult their Governments.

THE CHAIRMAN decided that, in accordance with the usual practice, the Committee would continue discussion of the problem of the Palestine refugees on the following morning.

MR. GRUMBACH (France) wondered whether the sub-committee, the formation of which he had proposed during the preceding week (109th meeting) and which had been mentioned by the representative of Poland, might not be set up at the meeting on the following morning.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) proposed, on the contrary, that the Committee should deal with the question of human rights in the morning and with the question of the Palestine refugees in the afternoon.

THE CHAIRMAN put the USSR proposal to the vote.

The proposal was rejected by 18 votes to 14, with 7 abstentions.

The meeting rose at 6:35 p.m.

A/C.3/307/Rev.1*30 October 1948*Additional Articles proposed for the Draft Declaration (E/800)

(In the chronological order of their submission to the Committee)

Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (E/800)

Add to the text adopted a separate new paragraph in place of the corresponding article 31 of the Geneva text rejected by the Commission:

“All persons, irrespective of whether they belong to the racial, national or religious minority or majority of the population, have the right to their own ethnic or national culture, to establish their own schools and receive teaching in their native tongue, and to use that tongue in the press, at public meetings, in the courts and in other official premises.”

Cuba (A/C.3/261)

Insert the following article:

“Every person may resort to the courts to ensure respect for his legal rights. There should likewise be available to him a simple, brief procedure whereby justice will protect him from acts of authority that, to his prejudice, violate any fundamental rights.”

Insert the following article:

“Every person has the right to resist acts of oppression or tyranny.”

Lebanon (A/C.3/262)

Add the following as article 29:

“All laws in any State shall be in conformity with the purposes and principles of the United Nations, as embodied in the Charter, in so far as they deal with human rights.”

Egypt (A/C.3/264)

After article 28, add the following article:

“The nature and the extent of the measures to be taken to give effect to the rights laid down in this Declaration shall if necessary be defined in a subsequent instrument.”

A/C.3/319

30 October 1948

Original Text: English, French

United Kingdom: Proposed compromise for text of article 10 of the draft declaration (E/800)

“No one shall be subjected to arbitrary interference with his privacy, family, home or correspondence.

Everyone has the right to the protection of the law against attacks upon his honour and reputation.”

A/C.3/320

30 October 1948

Text of Articles 1 to 9 of the draft Declaration (E/800) as adopted by the Third Committee

Article 1

All human beings are born free and equal in dignity and rights. They are endowed with reason and conscience, and should act towards one another in a spirit of brotherhood.

Article 2

Everyone is entitled to all the rights and freedoms set forth in this Declaration, without distinction of any kind, such as race, colour, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, property or other status, birth, or national or social origin.

Article 3

Everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of person.

Article 4

Slavery and the slave trade are prohibited in all their aspects.
No one shall be held in slavery or servitude.

No one shall be subjected to torture or to cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment.

(Note: The order of the sentences is not final; it is to be determined by the arrangement committee.)

Article 5

Every human being has the right to recognition everywhere as a person before the law.

Article 6

All are equal before the law and are entitled without any discrimination to equal protection of the law and equal protection against any discrimination in violation of this Declaration and against any incitement to such discrimination.

Everyone has the right to an effective remedy by the competent national tribunals for acts violating the fundamental rights granted him by the constitution or by law.

Article 7

No one shall be subjected to arbitrary arrest, detention or exile.

Article 8

In the determination of his rights and obligations and of any criminal charge against him, everyone is entitled in full equality to a fair and public hearing by an independent and impartial tribunal.

Article 9

1. Everyone charged with a penal offence has the right to be presumed innocent until proven guilty in a public trial at which he has had all the guarantees necessary for his defence.

2. No one shall be held guilty of any penal offence on account of any act or omission which did not constitute a penal offence, under national or international law, at the time when it was committed. Nor shall a heavier penalty be imposed than the one that was applicable at the time the penal offence was committed.

A/C.3/SR.119<sup>78</sup>
30 October 1948

Summary Record of the Hundred and Nineteenth Meeting
 [of the Third Committee]

Held at the Palais de Chaillot, Paris, on Saturday,
 30 October 1948, at 3 p.m.

Chairman: MR. CHARLES MALIK (Lebanon).

43. Draft international declaration of human rights (E/800) (continued)

Article 10 (continued)

MISS KLOMPÉ (Netherlands) considered that the Cuban amendment (A/C.3/232) covered the same principle as the original draft, but was better expressed. Its acceptance might entail a sacrifice [305] of certain ideas for some delegations, but that would be worthwhile if the principle were maintained. She would, however, request the Cuban delegation to abandon the idea of dividing the article into three articles and to leave it as one in three paragraphs. She considered it advisable to substitute the word “arbitrary” for the word “unreasonable” in the first paragraph of the amendment, and did not think the word “abusive” should be used in that paragraph.

Her delegation could not vote for the Panamanian amendment (A/C.3/280) as its contents already appeared in the basic draft and in other articles; that remark also applied to the USSR amendment (E/800, page 33), which was covered by article 6.

MR. PLAZA (Venezuela) stated that a careful comparison of the English and French texts of article 10 revealed discrepancies which accounted for some of the amendments submitted. In the English text there was only mention of “unreasonable interference”, whereas the French text contained two phrases to cover that concept. The Spanish translation resembled the English, but was not entirely satisfactory.

He favoured the Cuban suggestion to divide the text into several articles; that was more than a matter of form; by their very nature certain rights fell into different juridical categories and were covered by different laws in various countries. A single qualification would not cover all the subjects contained in the article. The division suggested by the Cuban delegation would solve both those problems.

He could not agree with the deletion of the word “unreasonable” as suggested by the Lebanese delegation (A/C.3/260). That word was essential for the protection of the rights stated in the article.

<sup>78</sup> The text of the document is from Official Records of the General Assembly, Third Session, 1948, pp. 304–15.

Most of the other amendments were covered by the Cuban proposal, the form of which he thought preferable.

MR. CONTOUMAS (Greece) considered that the USSR amendment embodied a measure of implementation to be added to article 10, and said that similar clauses might be added to any of the articles. The Committee should confine itself to a general proclamation of rights, leaving elaboration of measures for the protection and of penalties for the violation of such rights to the legislatures of the various countries.

He considered the Cuban amendment a good one, and clearer than the Commission's draft; he would be inclined to support and adopt it, but for the fear of unduly burdening the text. He wondered if the three articles proposed by the Cuban delegation could not be merged into one.

He did not approve of the Saudi Arabian amendment (A/C.3/255), which proposed to delete the word "illegitimate" and substitute the word "unreasonable".

Referring to the Panamanian amendment (A/C.3/280), he asked for an explanation of the difference between the term "activities" in English and faits et gestes in French. He objected to [306] a reference to property in article 10; it would be better to discuss that idea in relation to article 15, which dealt with property.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) stated that his delegation's amendment (E/800, page 33) had been submitted with a view to strengthening article 10. Not only should individuals not be subject to unreasonable interference, but they should be entitled to legal protection against such interference. The USSR amendment might be objected to on the grounds that it might create a precedent for similar additions to other articles, as in the case of article 6. His delegation would willingly support any other reasonable proposal to strengthen the article. Unfortunately, a number of delegations, when they had no substantive reasons, based their objections to an amendment – particularly those suggested by the USSR – on reasons of pure form.

The USSR amendment consisted of a single line. It would not make the article unwieldy, and would merely contribute to its effectiveness.

He approved of the deletion of the word "unreasonable" as suggested by the Lebanese delegation (A/C.3/260); the word "interference" needed a qualifying adjective. Interference might be admissible at times, for instance, under martial law, but every person had the right to legal protection against illegitimate interference. Of the various adjectives suggested, he preferred the word "illegitimate", as proposed by Saudi Arabia (A/C.3/255); it was more precise and less open to subjective interpretation.

He did not approve the Panamanian amendment (A/C.3/280). The term "activities" was too broad and could include, for instance, criminal activities, which should certainly be interfered with. The question of property was dealt with in article 15. The USSR representative reserved the right to speak on the Cuban amendment (A/C.3/232) later.

MRS. CORBET (United Kingdom) suggested selecting the best parts of the Cuban amendment for inclusion in the Commission's text.

Her delegation would support the New Zealand amendment (A/C.3/267), realizing that the word "unreasonable" had not the same significance for everyone. She defined the word "arbitrary" as any action taken at the will and pleasure of some person who could not be called upon to show just cause for it. That was probably what the Saudi Arabian delegate wished to convey by the word "illegitimate" (A/C.3/255).

With regard to the Panamanian delegation's proposal, she agreed with the USSR representative that the term "activities" was too broad and that provisions regarding property were covered in article 15.

Her delegation could not support the Panamanian amendment (A/C.3/280).

Regarding the Lebanese amendment (A/C.3/260), she would prefer the word "arbitrary" to no qualification, as otherwise it would be necessary to rely on article 27 for any limitation of [307] rights. That article might be invoked to excuse many actions.

Her delegation approved the part of the Cuban amendment dealing with "reputation". The word "abusive", however, had a restricted meaning in English, which was not adequate in the case under consideration. Although her delegation did not consider the word "honour" strictly necessary, it would not oppose its inclusion.

She considered that the USSR amendment was covered by article 6, which had already been adopted (112th meeting).

As a compromise, she suggested the following text for article 10 (A/C.3/319/Rev.1) in French only:

"No one shall be subjected to arbitrary interference with his privacy, family, home or correspondence.

"Everyone has the right to the protection of the law against attacks upon his honour and reputation."

MR. AQUINO (Philippines) stated that while a case could be made for the proposed Cuban amendment, it would have to be reconciled with the Commission's draft, in order to avoid unduly burdening the declaration. It was particularly important that the right to protection against interference with reputation should be included in article 10. There were parts of the world where the former practices of Nazi Germany, Italy and Japan were being carried out. Reputations were ruined beyond repair by systematic defamation in the Press and by other methods. Some safeguard against such attacks should be included in article 10.

While he appreciated the intention of the USSR amendment and considered it progressive, he thought the ground had already been covered in previously adopted articles.

He agreed with the United Kingdom and USSR representatives that the Lebanese amendment (A/C.3/260) should not be accepted. As the USSR representative had pointed out, there are instances when interference might be dictated by the interests of national security, public health and public morality.

He agreed with the USSR and United Kingdom delegations that in the Panamanian amendment the term “activities” was too broad, and that it might serve to condone nefarious activities.

He had no objection to the compromise text suggested by the United Kingdom (A/C.3/319), but thought it would be inconsistent to reject the USSR proposal if the second part of the United Kingdom proposal were accepted, as both referred to legal protection.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) proposed deletion of the word “unreasonable” in the English text, and of the two adjectives injustifiées and abusives in the French text, as both were used as equivalents of the English word. That did not mean that his delegation did not consider that interference was justified at times, for instance in wartime.

The original draft of article 10 was in English, and he thought the basic text was the English [308] version, but even so the qualifying adjective “unreasonable” was open to various interpretations and therefore dangerous. The French translation also contained inaccuracies. Doubts existed in many minds as to the validity of the text. That was the reason why the words “illegitimate” and “arbitrary” had been suggested as substitutes for “unreasonable”. The Lebanese amendment was not prompted by the difficulty of finding an appropriate adjective, but by the guiding principle adopted by the Commission on Human Rights. The Commission had decided to put all limitations in article 27, making it unnecessary to insert qualifications in other articles.

Human rights fell into several groups: some were inalienable; others were subject to limitations.

THE CHAIRMAN ruled, at that point, that the representatives of the Lebanon had exceeded the agreed time limit.

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) approved the New Zealand amendment (A/C.3/267) substituting the word “arbitrary” for the word “unreasonable”. She would accept the words “honour and reputation”, which many members wished to include.

Her delegation might approve the phrase “protection of the law” in the Cuban amendment (A/C.3/232); that phrase, however, rendered the USSR amendment (E/800, page 33) superfluous.

She was consequently prepared to support the amendment proposed by the United Kingdom representative (A/C.3/319).

MR. CHANG (China) supported the United Kingdom amendment. He agreed with the United States representative that the qualification “arbitrary” was far more comprehensive than “unreasonable” or the concept of “inviolability”.

The Cuban amendment (A/C.3/232) was interesting in that it extended the protection accorded to privacy, home, family and correspondence to honour and reputation, thus covering the subjective and social aspects of the human individual. Greater weight would attach to the Cuban provision to protect reputation and honour if it were placed in a separate paragraph.

Although the provision for legal protection might appear out of place in the declaration it might be inserted in the case under consideration since its omission might leave a loop-hole for such extra-legal methods of protecting honour as duelling. He thought, however, that the United Kingdom amendment would be most satisfactory in the case in point.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) said that he was prepared to accept the suggestion of the Greek delegation that the three articles of his amendment should be fused into a single article; but there was a risk that such a fusion might omit some of the concepts contained in the Cuban amendment.

[309]

The United Kingdom amendment (A/C.3/319) covered most of the ground.

The Uruguayan amendment (A/C.3/268) made an improvement to the French text because some reputations might be justifiably attacked and it was important that the impression should not be given that the freedom of the Press might be restricted.

He was prepared to support the United Kingdom amendment, but wished to recall the word “inviolable” was standard in the constitutions of many countries.

MR. CONTOUMAS (Greece) said that he was sure that the representative of the USSR had not alluded to the Greek delegation when he had complained that certain delegations had raised objections of pure form to amendments of intrinsic value. He regretted that some representatives tended to inject politics into the debates. Article 6 could not be invoked as a precedent for the argument that it was not superfluous to add a clause to article 10. That was an altogether different case. In article 6 the idea of legal defence had been pertinent since it referred to equal protection of the law; but such was not the case with article 10.

He was prepared, therefore, to support the United Kingdom amendment.

MR. CASSIN (France) pointed out that, in the English text, the word interference applied also to reputation, which was absurd. The correct word should be, in French, atteintes (attacks). The prohibition against attacks upon reputation and honour should form a separate sentence. It would be possible to delete all qualifications because they were covered by the limitations set out in article 27 – the pivotal article of the entire declaration. One reason for the confusion which existed was that the Commission on Human Rights had not yet adopted article 27 when it had voted on article 10, so that certain qualifications had been included in the latter article.

His delegation, however, would not oppose inclusion of the word “arbitrary”. That word was, in any case, an improvement upon the word “unreasonable”.

He asked the representative of Cuba to take into consideration that the original intention of the Commission had lain in the direction of the United Kingdom amendment (A/C.3/319), which his delegation was prepared to accept in principle. That amendment could be reconciled with the original text so as to cover the USSR amendment (E/800, page 33).

MR. MACDONNELL (Canada) doubted whether article 10 was necessary at all; its substance had already been covered by article 3. If the liberty and security of the person had already been guaranteed there was no need for detailed qualifications. All the amendments to article 10 were acceptable in principle, but the declaration should be kept concise and simple, a statement of general principle. If it were intended to forbid interference in specific fields, the list could be extended ad infinitum.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that the Cuban amendment did not [310] change the substance of the basic text of article 10 but merely divided it into three parts; it was, in fact, hardly more than a drafting change. That could perhaps be dealt with later; no question of principle was involved.

He did not object to the word “arbitrary”; but of all the variants suggested, he preferred “legitimate”, as proposed by the Saudi Arabian delegation (A/C.3/255).

The United Kingdom amendment (A/C.3/319) however did not really combine the USSR proposal with the Commission’s text. Legal protection was guaranteed only for some rights, it should logically cover all. The law should not merely protect honour and reputation, nor should that provision be relegated to the second paragraph. That objection might well be countered by redrafting or further amending the United Kingdom amendment.

The representative of Canada had been incorrect in stating that article 3 fully covered the ground of article 10. Article 3 had been couched in general terms; article 10 followed from article 3, extended its scope and made its underlying ideas more concrete.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) opposed the suggestion of the representative of the USSR that the Cuban amendment should be redrafted at a later stage. He cited the example of the text of article 4 after it had been amended; it had been obviously unsatisfactory. The Committee should vote on a completed text, and should have that text before it at the time of the vote.

MRS. NEWLANDS (New Zealand) said that the Cuban amendment would make the article too long. She approved, however, in principle of the right to the protection of the law against attacks upon reputation. She was doubtful whether a prohibition of attacks upon honour should be included, but appreciated the views expressed by the Cuban representative. She urged the substitution of the word “arbitrary” for the word “unreasonable”.

She would, therefore, support the United Kingdom amendment.

MR. BARODY (Saudi Arabia) agreed that the word “arbitrary” was an improvement over the word “unreasonable”. It might, however, be interpreted as equivalent to “unreasonable”. The word “illegitimate” suggested in his amendment (A/C.3/255) implied that no legal basis had been taken into consideration when the act had been committed. The word was more precise. He pointed out that only the USSR delegation had supported the word “illegitimate”. If the word “arbitrary” met with the approval of the majority of the Committee, he would agree to it.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba), in reply to the Chairman, said that he would accept the United Kingdom amendment. He would have liked, however, to see the right to unhampered transmission of correspondence explicitly included. In the view of his delegation, that was implied in the text.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) repeated his objection to the drafting of the [311] United Kingdom amendment because it made some distinctions in the prohibition of interference with certain rights and gave legal protection to certain others.

It would be possible to reconcile the text of the Cuban, United Kingdom and USSR amendments in such a way that all those rights would be protected by law and arbitrary interference with all of them would be prohibited.

He therefore proposed that the words “honour” and “reputation” should be transferred to the first paragraph of the United Kingdom text so that it would read as follows:

“No one shall be subjected to arbitrary interference with his privacy, family, home, correspondence, honour or reputation.”

The second paragraph would include the guarantee of legal protection. He proposed the following wording:

“Everyone has the right to the protection of the law against such interference.”

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the United Kingdom amendment was a substitute for the basic text of article 10. The USSR amendment was an amendment to the United Kingdom amendment and would be put to the vote first.

MR. BARODY (Saudi Arabia) withdrew his amendment (A/C.3/255).

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) said that in view of the fact that he had been unable to explain his amendment (A/C.3/260) fully, he would withdraw it.

MR. RODRÍGUEZ FABREGAT (Uruguay) said that he would like to maintain his amendment (A/C.3/268), which concerned only the French text, in view of the wording of the French text of the United Kingdom amendment contained in document A/C.3/319/Rev.1. However, he would withdraw it and would accept the word “arbitrary” since it appeared closer to the word injustes proposed in his amendment, provided that that interpretation were held correct.

THE CHAIRMAN, acceding to the request of the representative of Greece, stated that the USSR amendment (E/800, page 33) would be put to the vote in two parts.

He put to the vote the first paragraph of that amendment, reading in English: “No one shall be subjected to arbitrary interference with his privacy, family, home, correspondence, honour or reputation.”

That text was adopted by 23 votes to 12, with 6 abstentions.

COUNT CARTON DE WIART (Belgium) remarked that the word abusives which appeared in the Commission’s text of article 10 should have been retained; it had qualified the attacks referred to in the latter part of the French text as the word “arbitrary” qualified interference. It was quite conceivable that some attacks might be justifiable.

[312]

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the second paragraph of the USSR amendment, reading as follows: “Everyone has the right to the protection of the law against such interference.”

That text was adopted by 22 votes to 12, with 11 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN stated that, as the Panamanian representative was not present to reintroduce his amendment (A/C.3/280) and as no other representative had expressed a desire to do so, that amendment was dropped.

The two paragraphs of the USSR amendment would be voted upon as a whole.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) called attention to the fact that there was a difference of substance between the French and English texts of the first paragraph of that amendment. In the English text, honour and reputation, like the subjects which preceded them, were to be protected against arbitrary interference. In the French text, they were to be protected against attacks, which were not qualified by the word “arbitrary”.

He asked on which of the two texts the final vote of the Committee was to be taken.

THE CHAIRMAN agreed that a discrepancy existed and stated that the vote would be taken on the English text, to which no objection had been raised, and to which the French text could later be made to correspond.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) asserted that, as there were two working languages, the French text was as authentic as the English. He had voted in favour of the French text. The vote had been taken on both texts; there was no reason to take the English text as a basis.

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) declared that she had voted against the first sentence of the USSR amendment because she agreed with the French representative that it was absurd to speak, in the English text, of interference with honour and reputation, as that sentence did.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the same objection might be raised against article 10 as drafted by the Commission on Human Rights.

MRS. CORBET (United Kingdom) asked whether it would be possible to have her amendment (A/C.3/319) voted upon as an amendment to the USSR amendment. The English text of the latter was imperfect, as the separation between the idea of protection against arbitrary interference with privacy, family, home and correspondence and the idea of protection against attacks upon honour and reputation, which had been the contribution of the Cuban representative (A/C.3/232), had been lost. Unless the United Kingdom amendment were put to the vote, the imperfection in the text of article 10 would be retained. Moreover, it might be argued that the United Kingdom amendment was further removed from the original text than the USSR amendment, and should consequently have been voted first.

[313]

THE CHAIRMAN replied that the question of which was further removed did not arise, as the USSR amendment had been moved as an amendment to the United Kingdom amendment of the original text. Should the USSR amendment as a whole be rejected, the United Kingdom representative could reintroduce her own.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) pointed out that in voting in favour of the first paragraph of the USSR amendment, he had done so on the basis of the French text, in which the distinction introduced by the Cuban representative was made; he would not have been able to vote in favour of the English text.

MR. CASSIN (France) agreed with the United States and Chilean representatives that the English text was imperfect. Those who were opposed to that text could vote against the USSR amendment as a whole; the preferable course would be, however, to amend that text in accordance with the French, and to make the final words of the first paragraph read "nor to attacks upon his honour and reputation". The idea supported by the Cuban and United Kingdom representatives would then be clearly expressed in both languages.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) requested that, in accordance with rule 82 of the rules of procedure, his amendment as a whole should be put to the vote immediately.

He appealed to the Committee to vote in favour of what was, in effect, a perfectly good article expressing a clear and entirely acceptable idea.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) stated that he had voted against the first paragraph of the USSR amendment, and in favour of the second. He would be unable to vote in favour of the whole amendment, but would vote for the United Kingdom version, which read properly in both working languages.

MR. KAMINSKY (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) requested that, as the French text was wholly in accordance with the Russian original, that text might be put to the vote immediately. When a discrepancy arose, it was for the Chairman to harmonize the two texts.

MR. SAINT-LOT (Haiti), Rapporteur, agreed that the English text should be altered to correspond to the French. He pointed out that the two paragraphs of the USSR amendment had been adopted by the majority, and that there could consequently be no question of reversing the vote.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) remarked that some representatives who worked in the English language had voted against the first paragraph of the USSR amendment because of the imperfection in the English text. The majority had, however, voted in favour of it because they had considered the French text, which had contained the phrase "attacks upon his honour and reputation". There was general agreement that the French text was preferable: the vote should therefore be taken on it, as the Byelorussian representative had suggested. The text could then be translated into English.

COUNT CARTON DE WIART (Belgium) said that he would vote against the USSR amendment because he felt that there was no more need to mention protection of the law in article 10 than in any of the other articles.

MR. RODRÍGUEZ FABREGAT (Uruguay) supported the French representative's suggestion that the first paragraph of the USSR amendment in English should end with the words "nor to attacks upon his honour and reputation". The confusion would then be cleared up.

Had he known that such confusion would arise, he would not have consented to withdraw his own amendment, as it would have helped to clarify the text.

THE CHAIRMAN read the French and English texts of the USSR amendment, the end of the latter text being altered to read: "nor to attacks upon his honour and reputation".

MR. CHANG (China), speaking on a point of order, stated that the Committee had before it an English text different from that which it had accepted. He and possibly other representatives had voted against the first version because it had not appeared to make sense. The Committee could not be asked to vote on the whole of an amendment the wording of which was different from the text on which the vote had been taken, in parts. Rather, it should take a second vote on the first paragraph, and be given an opportunity to reject it.

MRS. CORBET (United Kingdom) supported the Chinese representative.

THE CHAIRMAN could not agree with the Chinese representative. The discrepancy which existed between the two texts had to be removed. Several representatives, including the representative of the United States, had said that honour and reputation should be mentioned in a separate clause, which had in fact been done in the French text. Moreover, a number of other representatives had requested that the vote might be taken on the French text, which appeared to be satisfactory to the majority. Since there were two working languages, either text could be taken as a basis. The French text before the Committee had not been altered in any way; but the English text had been made to correspond to it.

MR. BAGDADI (Egypt) stated that, if the texts before the Committee were accepted, he would understand the vote to mean that the first vote had not been properly taken.

MRS. CORBET (United Kingdom) thought that the English translation suggested by the Chairman eliminated the difficulty encountered in connexion with the first paragraph of the USSR amendment. She questioned, however, whether it was wise to adopt the second paragraph, which contained a mention of the protection of the law.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) observed that the arguments invoked by [315] some delegations against texts already adopted by the Committee were unworthy of those delegations, and that the wrangle in which the Committee had been engaged was unworthy of the Committee.

He asked that his amendment as a whole might be put to the vote immediately.

THE CHAIRMAN recalled that the USSR amendment was an amendment to a substitution for article 10.

He put the USSR amendment as a whole to the vote.

“No one shall be subjected to arbitrary interference with his privacy, family, home or correspondence, nor to attacks upon his honour and reputation.

“Everyone has the right to the protection of the law against such interference or attacks.”

The amendment was adopted by 29 votes to 7, with 4 abstentions.

The meeting rose at 6:20 p.m.

A/C.3/SR.120<sup>79</sup>

2 November 1948

Summary Record of the Hundred and Twentieth Meeting
[of the Third Committee]

Held at the Palais de Chaillot, Paris, on Tuesday,
2 November 1948, at 3 p.m.

Chairman: MR. CHARLES MALIK (Lebanon).

<sup>79</sup> The text of the document is from Official Records of the General Assembly, Third Session, 1948, pp. 315–27.

44. Draft international declaration of human rights (E/800) (continued)Article 11<sup>1</sup>*

THE CHAIRMAN read out the amendments to article 11 submitted by the representatives of the USSR (E/800, page 33), Lebanon (A/C.3/260), Panama (A/C.3/280), Egypt (A/C.3/264) and Cuba (A/C.3/232). Those amendments were recapitulated in document A/C.3/284/Rev.1.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) declared that his amendment gave to everyone freedom of residence within the territory of the country of which he was a national. Although he agreed in principle with the wider text adopted by the Commission on Human Rights, he considered that the immigration laws in force in most countries would almost automatically limit the meaning and scope of that text. For that reason he considered the text he had proposed to be more sensible and more prudent.

He was pleased to learn that the Egyptian delegation was proposing an amendment similar to his own.

Finally, he stated, that his delegation accepted the draft amendment submitted by the Lebanese representative.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics), in submitting his amendment, quoted an article from the civil code of the Soviet Union, according to which any person residing in the USSR was entitled to move about freely, to establish his residence there, to take up an occupation and to buy and sell property in accordance with the laws of the land. Calling attention to the fact that the principle of freedom of movement was admitted in his country, he maintained, however, that all movement within a given country or across its frontiers had to take place in accordance with the laws of that country.

<sup>[1]</sup> Article 14 of the draft universal declaration of human rights (A/777).

[316]

His delegation considered that its proposal to add to paragraphs 1 and 2 of article 11 a direct reference to national legislation should be generally acceptable, since that proposal corresponded to a reality and did not run counter to any principles which were universally established and applied.

The USSR representative expressed the opinion that the other amendments submitted would be of no value if the USSR amendments to article 11 were not accepted. He was not opposed to the amendment suggested by the Lebanese representative, which would add a patriotic note to article 11.

On the grounds that his amendment was furthest removed from the original text, Mr. Pavlov proposed that it should be put to the vote first.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) recalled that article 11 was intended to cover all movements inside and outside a given State. According to that article, any person had the right to leave any country, including his own. The ideal would be that any person should be able to enter any country he might choose, but account had to be taken of actual facts. The minimum requirement was that any person should be able to return to his own country.

If that right were recognized, the right to leave a country, already sanctioned in article 11, would be strengthened by the assurance of the right to return. Such was the object of the Lebanese amendment.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile), commenting on the Egyptian and Cuban amendments, indicated that in the text adopted by the Commission on Human Rights there was no question of free immigration but only of freedom of movement within a State.

He pointed out that the argument put forward by the USSR representative in connexion with article 11 had already been expounded, discussed at length and finally rejected by the Drafting Committee,<sup>1</sup> the Commission on Human Rights<sup>2</sup> and even by the Economic and Social Council during the discussion on the rights of women.<sup>3</sup>

The Chilean delegation considered the question to be of vital importance. Freedom of movement was the sacred right of every human being. That principle should be defended and maintained as an element necessary to progress and to civilization.

Admittedly, a State was entitled to decide how the principle was to be applied; but to include such interpretations in a declaration of human rights would imply the renunciation of the inherent rights of mankind. A document drawn up in that sense would be a declaration of the absolute rights of the State and not a declaration of human rights.

<sup>[1]</sup> See document E/CN.4/AC.1/SR.36.

<sup>[2]</sup> See document E/CN.4/SR.55.

<sup>[3]</sup> See Official Records of the Economic and Social Council, Third Year, Seventh Session, 210th meeting.

[316]

The task before the Committee was to proclaim principles of such a solemn character that States would be morally obliged to subscribe to them and to amend their respective constitutional laws in accordance with them.

In order to stress the danger of the amendments suggested by the USSR delegation, he reminded the Committee of the situation in Russia during the reign of Peter the Great, who, simultaneously with the proclamation of freedom of movement within his territory, had issued a decree that such freedom should be subject to one condition, namely, the purchase of a special passport at the cost of 200 silver roubles, which was impossible for the majority of his subjects. That example showed how far national legislation could nullify a right established and recognized in all other respects.

He quoted further examples from the history of Latin America during the Spanish colonization period, and declared categorically that no physical or moral authority could justify the treatment of individuals as factors in the national economy.

The Chilean delegation could not, therefore, accept any amendment which might permit a return to obsolete feudal rule. It agreed that the State could legitimately claim, in exceptional cases, the right to regulate the movements or place of residence of persons, for instance in cases of political disturbances, quarantine and compulsory military service, but those exceptions were all covered by article 27 of the draft declaration.

MR. APPADORAI (India) felt that the provisions of article 11 were essential for thousands of people, and especially for the indigenous inhabitants and the Asians living in Africa. He understood that in some cases, a few restrictions, which would be included in article 27, might be made on the liberty of movement of the subject, with the object of safeguarding the rights of others, that is, for the sake of security.

Commenting on the first USSR amendment, he expressed the fear that the addition of such a reservation to only one article of the declaration might become of great importance and might serve as a precedent to justify the restrictions applied to the freedom of movement and residence, not only of the Asian population of Africa, but also of the inhabitants of many other countries. Although he understood perfectly the intentions of the representative of the Soviet Union, he feared that the amendment might be interpreted erroneously and regretted having to oppose its adoption.

For the same reasons, he could not accept the second USSR amendment, and would abstain from voting on it.

MR. CHAUVET (Haiti) admitted that there might be provisional restrictions of an economic and political nature upon freedom of movement. The declaration of human rights was not, however, a political document. The Economic and Social Council had, moreover, drawn a very clear distinction between the declaration and the covenant. Whereas the covenant was to take into account the practices and political considerations peculiar to each country, the declaration was a statement of universally applicable moral principles.

[318]

He reminded the Committee that in 1789 the French Republic had not awaited the agreement of other countries to promulgate its great Declaration of the Rights of Man and of the Citizen, the principles of which echoed the aspirations of the people of that time.

The principle of the individual's right to move freely about the world had been recognized before national States had reached their present stage of development. The various barriers erected by those States failed to take account of the importance of the human element, the ties of family and friendship, which were often stronger than the ties which attached the individual to the sometimes unstable Government of his country.

The world belonged to all mankind. Government restrictions ran counter to the aspirations of the universal conscience; they might be tolerated as a temporary necessity, but there could be no question of including them in the declaration, which was intended primarily to educate the masses. Its principles should not be political, but educational, social and humane, and should remain faithful to the great Declaration of Human Rights of 1789.

MR. AQUINO (Philippines) did not follow the representative of Haiti in his comments on article 11. The Philippine delegation considered that the object of article 11, as drawn up by the Commission on Human Rights, was precisely to do away with the barriers which, in some parts of the world, were raised against the exercise of free movement, not only within a country but also from one country to another. His delegation considered that article to be one of the most effective means by which to try to break down the walls of silence which cut off whole countries from the rest of the world.

Unlike the representative of Haiti, he believed that the declaration should have a certain political character, because it was destined to proclaim a political philosophy common to the large majority of the peoples of the world. Furthermore, he could not agree that freedom of movement, which he desired whole-heartedly, could possibly be fettered by restrictions of an economic or social nature, the temporary necessity for which was admitted by Mr. Chauvet.

The amendments proposed by the USSR delegation, if adopted, would nullify the meaning of article 11, because instead of establishing common standards to govern the movements of people in general, the Committee would be sanctioning the deplorable state of affairs which existed in the world.

The Philippine delegation agreed with the Lebanese delegation's amendment. If the Committee succeeded in including in the declaration the right of every person to leave and to return freely to his country of origin, and the right to circulate and establish himself within the territory in which he was resident, it would have taken a great step in the right direction.

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) pointed out that, during the discussion on other articles, it had been recognized that, in certain circumstances, individuals had to be guaranteed protection even against their own Government. Article 11 seemed to impose such an obligation.

[319]

She regretted she was unable to accept the amendments submitted by Cuba and Egypt, because they restricted the scope of the first part of article 11. The adoption of those amendments would mean that a foreigner admitted into a country would not enjoy the same rights as the citizens of that country.

She thought, furthermore, that the amendments submitted by the USSR delegation would render article 11 valueless. To state that freedom of movement should be granted only in accordance with the laws of each country would be equivalent to limiting the fundamental rights of the individual and increasing the powers of the State.

The Lebanese delegation's amendment contained a new idea, and the United States delegation was inclined to favour it, provided that the general character of the basic text of article 11 remained unchanged.

The amendment proposed by the delegation of Panama had no place in article 11.

Mrs. Roosevelt expressed sympathy with the ideal upheld by the representative of Haiti, especially when he explained that every man should have the right to settle in the country of his choice. Economic considerations had, however, forced certain countries to take legal measures restricting immigration. Those measures were well known and generally accepted. A declaration of human rights should not contain principles the application of which was rendered impossible by existing circumstances.

In conclusion, she considered that article 11, modified by the Lebanese amendment, was sufficiently realistic, and stated that the United States delegation would vote for its adoption.

MR. CONTOUMAS (Greece) approved, on the whole, the statement made by the representative of the United States.

He thought that the amendments submitted by the delegations of Cuba and Egypt betrayed the fear of those two countries lest article 11 should give foreigners access to a country of which they were not nationals. In fact, article 11 presupposed that the individual in question had already obtained permission to enter the country, the right of entry being governed by the legislation of the country concerned. Once a foreigner had been admitted into a country, however, he should enjoy the same rights as the citizens of that State.

As regards the USSR amendments, he pointed out that it was natural for Governments to take legal measures to regulate the principles of freedom enunciated in article 11, since the application of any principle of freedom necessarily entailed the appropriate legislation, but that legislation should not permit violation of the very spirit of freedom it was intended to safeguard. If the USSR amendments aimed at restricting freedom of movement and residence, the Greek delegation could not subscribe to them.

The amendment submitted by the Lebanese delegation was logical: every man had the right to return to his own country.

As regards the observations made by the Chilean representative, the Greek delegation considered [320] them to be an affirmation of the right, which every State obviously possessed, to forbid its subjects to leave the country if their presence was required by reason of military or contractual obligations, or to forbid access to certain parts of the country when considerations of public health or military security made that expedient.

All these exceptions were, incidentally, covered by article 27, if the phrase "public order" were also taken to mean national security. The Greek delegation reserved the right to return to that point during the discussion of article 27.

MRS. KALINOWSKA (Poland) remarked that all the countries in the world had certain laws restricting freedom of movement and the right to leave the country. It was simply a matter of avoiding arbitrary restrictions. The USSR amendments were absolutely indispensable since they took the existing state of affairs into account.

Poland also had regulations governing entry and exit, but there had been more missions, journalists and tourists in Poland since the end of the last war than at any period during the twenty-one years between the two world wars. Moreover, she did not remember a single case of a foreign correspondent being refused a visa to Poland during the three years she had spent in the Polish Embassy in Washington. She regretted to have to state that Poland had not met with reciprocity in that respect from those who championed the cause of freedom of movement, and quoted the example of the head of the Polish Press Agency who, after returning to Poland on holiday, had to wait several months for permission to re-enter the United States. Furthermore, it was not only entry into the country that the United States Government restricted: exit was also subject to restrictions. She quoted the case of Mr. Isaacson, United States representative of New York, who was prevented from going to Paris to attend a meeting at which the Greek question was to be discussed.

THE CHAIRMAN asked Mrs. Kalinowska not to digress from the subject under discussion. Article 11 dealt with freedom of movement inside a country, and the right of the individual to leave that country, and not with immigration formalities.

MRS. KALINOWSKA (Poland) replied that her remarks applied to the restrictions imposed by the United States on freedom of movement in general. She quoted the cases of Gerhart Eisler and Oscar Niemeyer, the Taft-Hartley and Mundt-Nixon bills, and the deportation of certain trade union leaders as attacks on the liberty of the individual.<sup>80</sup>

That state of affairs was, moreover, not confined to the United States. Even in France, the recent attacks on the right to strike – leading sometimes to incidents with bloodshed – and the deportation of foreign strikers some of whom had been resident in France for more than twenty years and had taken part in the defence and reconstruction of that country, constituted equally grave violations of the most sacred rights of man. The Polish representative was anxious not only [321] about the fate of Poles expelled as a result of those measures, for their country would always receive them with open arms, but also about the fate of all the other workers who were in the same plight. The Polish delegation would, therefore, support the Lebanese delegation's amendment.

<sup>80</sup> Gerhart Eisler was a German-born communist who was active in the United States for many years. He was prosecuted in the United States for politically related offences and sentenced to prison. Released on bail, he fled the United States and eventually reached the German Democratic Republic, where he became head of the national radio. Oscar Niemeyer was a Brazilian architect and supporter of communism. He was involved in the design of the United Nations headquarters, but was twice refused visas to travel to the United States so as to take up prestigious academic appointments at Yale and Harvard Universities. The "Nixon-Mundt Bill" required members of the Communist Party to register with the Attorney-General and prohibited them from obtaining passports.

Finally, she had felt it her duty to treat the problem so widely because she thought the ultimate aim of the declaration of human rights was to guarantee the protection of the fundamental rights of man.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics), in reply to the objections raised to his delegation's amendment, emphasized the fact that people attributed to his country motives it had never had. The USSR amendment in no way modified the basic text of article 11; it did not suggest eliminating anything: it simply proposed to add a reference to the laws of the countries concerned. He did not understand why some countries mentioned the Soviet ideology in that connexion, since every country had its own laws. The two amendments proposed by his delegation merely indicated the elementary necessity for taking account of the laws of the different States.

Mr. Pavlov reminded the Committee that he had read out extracts from the USSR civil code, and he was astonished that his country was compared with the Russia of Peter the Great. The time of Peter the Great was Russia's Middle Ages. The Soviet Union had no longer either big landowners or capitalists.

In view of the conditions which were imposed in certain parts of the United States on the freedom of movement and residence of coloured people, the USSR representative was surprised to see the United States among those who had voted against all restrictions on freedom of movement.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) remarked that the USSR representative had misunderstood the purpose of his statement. He had quoted the age of Peter the Great purely as an historical example, and had refrained from any allusion to the current situation in any State.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) said he had listened very attentively to the statement of the Polish representative on the subject of the amendments proposed by the Soviet Union. He had been impressed by the arguments adduced, but the conclusions drawn by the Polish representative differed from his own. The examples cited by Mrs. Kalinowska had convinced him that the words "in accordance with the laws of that State" should not be added. The principles enunciated in article 11 should not be weakened by any reservations. On the contrary, States should be prevented from passing laws arbitrarily restricting freedom of movement and residence.

In order to allay the anxiety of the Cuban and Egyptian delegations, he proposed to make paragraph 1 of article 11 more precise by wording it as follows:

"Everyone has the right, within the borders of each State, to freedom of movement and residence."

Finally, he considered the Panamanian amendment unnecessary in that it proposed restrictions [322] which were obviously applicable by virtue of article 27.

COUNT CARTON DE WIART (Belgium) pointed out that several delegations had stressed the solemn character of the declaration of human rights. That declaration comprised a set of principles; there was no question of a convention, or of a code of special laws, but a declaration, which had to be concise and definite.

In his opinion, article 11 was of vital importance: the principles of freedom of movement and freedom of residence had to be stressed at that moment when the war and the resulting upheavals had demonstrated to what point that principle could be trodden underfoot. The ideal would be a return to the time when man could travel around the world armed with nothing but a visiting card. The principle of freedom of movement did not prevent States from promulgating laws to cope with questions of public order and public health, but all such reservations were provided for in article 27. The Belgian delegation could in no case subscribe to the reservations implied in the USSR amendments.

The Belgian representative said he was much impressed by the remarks of the representative of Haiti. He agreed that freedom of movement and freedom of residence should be guaranteed throughout the world; and he considered, therefore, that any attempt to restrict in any way the basic freedoms enunciated in article 11 should be condemned. The main purpose of the declaration of human rights was to make a public declaration of what the conscience of the world was thinking.

The Belgian delegation would, therefore, vote for the text of article 11 in the form in which it was drafted by the Commission on Human Rights, and for the amendment submitted by the representative of Haiti, which further broadened the scope of that article.

MR. DEMCHENKO (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) was surprised that the Chairman had regarded the speech of the Polish representative as a digression from the subject under discussion; he had not objected to historical examples and allusions from other representatives, though they had no bearing on the subject.

For its part, the delegation of the Ukrainian SSR would vote in favour of the amendments submitted by the USSR delegation. They were based on reality, and only reflected conditions which existed in the majority of countries.

Certain delegations had expressed the fear that those amendments might restrict the significance of article 11. It was worthy of note that those same delegations had refrained from expressing similar fears in connexion with some of the preceding articles, when it was a question, for instance, of drawing up provisions for the prevention of racial discrimination.

All that the USSR was proposing, in connexion with a freedom the principle of which was generally accepted, was to safeguard the sovereignty of States and prevent interference in affairs which were essentially an internal matter. A provision of that kind was in conformity with the Charter.

[323]

THE CHAIRMAN assured the Ukrainian representative that he was sincerely trying to exercise the utmost impartiality in the conduct of the debate.

MR. CONTOUMAS (Greece), in reply to the Polish representative, referred to article 104 of the rules of procedure. He declared that it was because the country was in a state of war that Greek subjects had to submit to formalities, sometimes lengthy formalities, before being allowed to leave Greece. That state of war, which gave rise to inevitable difficulties, was forced on Greece for reasons that the First Committee, to which the question had been referred, would very shortly be able to judge.

THE CHAIRMAN reminded the Greek representative that every speaker enjoying the right to reply accorded to him by the terms of article 104, had to keep within the limits of the discussion: the debate at that moment referred strictly to article 11 and the amendments proposed to it.

MRS. KALINOWSKA (Poland) declared that Mr. Contoumas' remarks were certainly inspired by a misunderstanding, as Greece had not been mentioned in her speech.

MRS. CORBET (United Kingdom) declared that her delegation would oppose any amendment tending to restrict the scope of article 11 in the same way as it was opposed, in general, to any measure likely to weaken the force of the declaration of human rights.

The Committee should not be content with the laws promulgated by the various States, but should endeavour to get the States to agree to make their laws conform to the spirit of the declaration. That declaration should express an ideal, and should not, therefore, be limited in any way.

She shared the view of the United States representative regarding the amendment submitted by the delegations of Cuba and Egypt. She thought it right, in the interests of international peace, to make every possible contribution to mutual understanding between the peoples, to encourage the exchange of visitors, students, etc. Moreover, it was normal that any foreigner admitted into a country should enjoy the same freedom in that country as the nationals.

She thought that the amendment submitted by the delegation of Panama raised a question of detail applicable rather to the proposed covenant.

Finally, the United Kingdom delegation felt that the amendment submitted by the Lebanese delegation had been covered by the provisions of article 7, as already adopted. But if, as the Lebanese representative maintained, the adoption of the amendment led to permitting an individual to leave his country, if he so desired, with greater peace of mind, the United Kingdom delegation would certainly not oppose that amendment.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) referred to article 104 of the rules of procedure in reply to criticism made by the representatives of the United Kingdom and Chile in connexion with the amendments submitted by the USSR delegation.

[324]

He protested against the fact that a restrictive character was being attributed to those amendments and that in spite of previous explanations. The USSR amendments took due account of existing realities; it was impossible for the time being to ask Member States to abolish measures regulating entries and exits from their respective territories and to cancel their immigration and emigration laws. The adoption of the text of article 11 would, however, have just that result and would therefore be in flagrant contradiction with the provisions of Article 2, paragraph 7 of the Charter.

In the Soviet Union there were exceedingly few restrictions on freedom of movement within the country itself. Moreover, no law prevented persons from leaving the country, but anyone desiring to do so had of course to go through the legally prescribed formalities.

The aim of the USSR delegation in submitting the amendments could not, therefore, be regarded with any suspicion; its intention was not to put any restriction on the freedom proclaimed in article 11 but to ensure that due account was taken of the fact that freedom of movement in any given country and entry into it were regulated by the provisions of the civil code of the country concerned. Laws and regulations existed and they had to be respected.

MR. KAMINSKY (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) protested against the partiality displayed by the Chairman in the conduct of the debates.

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) called attention to the necessity for the Committee to follow the rules it had drawn up with a view to expediting its work. Representatives should not be allowed to take advantage of the right of reply granted to them by the Chairman in order to make a third speech of a substantive nature.

MR. BARODY (Saudi Arabia) said he would vote in favour of the USSR amendments, which in no way undermined the principles set out in article 11. Those amendments allowed for the fact that in times of national crisis due to various political or economic causes, every Government made use of its right to regulate freedom of movement within its territory. The world was going through a period when national crises were more and more frequent.

THE CHAIRMAN informed the representative of Saudi Arabia that he was obliged to call him to order, for he could no longer permit a speech on the substance of the matter under discussion. Indeed, the general debate was closed and the name of the Saudi Arabian representative did not appear on the list of speakers he had read out.

He then put to the vote the first USSR amendment (E/800, page 33), to add the words "in accordance with the laws of that State" to paragraph 1 of article 11.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) asked that the vote should be taken by roll-call.

The vote was taken by roll-call, as follows:

In favour: Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Czechoslovakia, Poland, Saudi Arabia, [325] Syria, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Yemen, Yugoslavia.

Against: Australia, Belgium, Brazil, Canada, Chile, China, Colombia, France, Greece, Haiti, Honduras, Iceland, India, Lebanon, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Pakistan, Philippines, Sweden, Turkey, United Kingdom, United States of America, Uruguay.

Abstaining: Afghanistan, Argentina, Cuba, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Iran, Mexico, Paraguay, Peru, Venezuela.

The amendment was rejected by 24 votes to 9, with 11 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the second USSR amendment, to add the words “in accordance with the procedure laid down in the laws of that country” to paragraph 2 of article 11.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) asked that the vote should be taken by roll-call.

The vote was taken by roll-call, as follows:

In favour: Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Czechoslovakia, Poland, Saudi Arabia, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Yugoslavia.

Against: Australia, Belgium, Brazil, Canada, Chile, China, Colombia, France, Greece, Haiti, Honduras, Iceland, Lebanon, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Pakistan, Philippines, Sweden, Syria, Turkey, United Kingdom, United States of America, Uruguay.

Abstaining: Afghanistan, Argentina, Cuba, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, India, Iran, Mexico, Paraguay, Peru, Venezuela, Yemen.

The USSR amendment was rejected by 24 votes to 7, with 13 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the amendment submitted by the delegation of Panama (A/C.3/280).

The amendment was rejected by 28 votes to none, with 13 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the amendments submitted by the delegations of Cuba (A/C.3/232) and of Egypt (A/C.3/264), the French texts of which were identical.

Those amendments were rejected by 25 votes to 3, with 12 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the proposal of the delegation of Haiti to delete the words “within the borders of each State” from paragraph 1 of article 11.

The proposal was rejected by 15 votes to 8, with 19 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the amendment submitted by the delegation of Lebanon, to add the words “and to return to his country” to paragraph 2 of article 11 (A/C.3/260).

The amendment was adopted by 33 votes to none, with 8 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN then asked the Committee to take a decision on the proposal of the Lebanese delegation to change the place of the phrase “within the borders of each State” in the body of paragraph 1 of article 11.

[326]

MR. CASSIN (France) felt that such a change would result in changing the sense of the article by seeming to attach the restrictive nature of the phrase “within the borders of each State” to freedom of movement, whereas such freedom of movement could not be sufficiently encouraged, not only within a given country but from one country to another.

MRS. CORBET (United Kingdom) pointed out also that the change would be unfortunate for the English text from the point of view of style, whereupon MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) said he would not maintain his proposal.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote article 11 as a whole, as amended by the Lebanese delegation.

Article 11, as amended, was adopted by 37 votes to none, with 3 abstentions.

MR. CASSIN (France) pointed out that France always voted in favour of the most broadminded proposals and that it did so with full realization of the implications, as over 4,000,000 foreigners were resident in its territory.

France was proud that scarcely two years previously it had enacted a law which gave certain guarantees to foreigners liable to expulsion.

At the same time, it could not surrender certain essential prerogatives and it was forced to keep its own laws when, for example, a foreigner forgot to observe the requisite political neutrality.

France thought, however, that the exercise of that right was guaranteed under the provisions of article 27, which embodied all the necessary reservations.

MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) stated that his delegation had voted against the proposal of Egypt and Cuba because if it were to replace the basic text it would limit the exercise of the right granted in article 11 to the nationals of the States in question.

His delegation had voted against the proposal of Panama, which was more suitable for inclusion in the covenant than in the declaration.

Finally his delegation had also voted against the USSR amendments because of the existence of article 27. If the limitations desired by the USSR delegation came within the framework of article 27, they were superfluous; if they did not they were not desirable.

MR. BARODY (Saudi Arabia) said he had voted in favour of the USSR amendment because government action was becoming increasingly necessary in times of crises. His Government however reserved the right to continue to act according to the current laws and practices of his country.

MR. CARRERA ANDRADE (Ecuador) was astonished that the USSR delegation, which claimed it was defending the cause of liberty, had tried to restrict the freedom of movement of the individual, submitting it to the restrictions of the legislation in force in the territory in which he resided. The right to freedom of movement should in no case be limited and any measures in that direction would transform a liberal system into a dictatorial system.

[327]

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out to the representative of Ecuador that an explanation of his vote should not include considerations of a general order.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that on account of an interpretation mistake he had not understood that the last vote was on article 11 as a whole.

His delegation would certainly have voted against the adoption of an article which violated the provisions of paragraph 7 of Article 2 of the United Nations Charter and which deliberately ignored the right of each State to regulate as it desired freedom of movement in and departures from its territory at its own frontiers.

The USSR formally protested against the decision of the Third Committee to adopt article 11.

MR. DEMCHENKO (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) supported Mr. Pavlov's remarks on the adoption of article 11.

MR. KAMINSKY (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) also asked that his opposition to the adoption of article 11 should be put on record.

The meeting rose at 6 p.m.

A/C.3/321

2 November 1948

Original Text: English, French

Text of articles 10 and 11 of the Draft Declaration (E/800) as adopted by the Third Committee

Article 10

No one shall be subjected to arbitrary interference with his privacy, family, home or correspondence, nor to attacks upon his honour and reputation.

Everyone has the right to the protection of the law against such interference or attacks.

Article 11

1. Everyone has the right to freedom of movement and residence within the borders of each State.

2. Everyone has the right to leave any country, including his own, and to return to his country.

A/C.3/322

3 November 1948

Original Text: French

France and Brazil: Compromise wording for the French Amendment to Article 12 (A/C.3/244)

Add the following words to Paragraph 1:

“if necessary with the support of the United Nations, in concert with the countries concerned.”

A/C.3/SR.121<sup>81</sup>

3 November 1948

Summary Record of the Hundred and Twenty-First Meeting [of the Third Committee]

Held at the Palais de Chaillot, Paris, on Wednesday,
3 November 1948, at 3 p.m.

Chairman: MR. CHARLES MALIK (Lebanon)

45. Draft international declaration of human rights (E/800) (continued)

Article 12<sup>1</sup>

THE CHAIRMAN announced that the basic text of article 12 and the amendments to it were recapitulated in document A/C.3/285/Rev.1. The delegation of New Zealand had withdrawn its amendment (A/C.3/267); therefore the Committee had before it the amendments to that article submitted by the delegations of the USSR (E/800, page 33), Bolivia (A/C.3/227), Cuba (A/C.3/232), Saudi Arabia (A/C.3/241), France (A/C.3/244), the United Kingdom (A/C.3/253), Egypt (A/C.3/264) and Uruguay (A/C.3/268).

<sup>81</sup> The text of the document is from Official Records of the General Assembly, Third Session, 1948, pp. 327–40.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) pointed out that, in the basic text of article 12, the question of the right of asylum was put in a strictly legal form. He thought that the declaration should explain what was understood by the right of asylum, so that war criminals, fascists, and Nazis hiding abroad and particularly in occupied Germany, could not claim to be persecuted persons. Those people, responsible as they were for the massacre of millions of innocent victims, those traitors to their countries whose misdeeds during the war years were known to all, must not be granted the right of asylum.

[1] Article 15 of the draft universal declaration of human rights (A/777).

[328]

For that reason, Mr. Pavlov thought that the word “everyone” in paragraph 1 of article 12 was too comprehensive. He proposed that the first paragraph should be replaced by a text indicating the three main categories of persons entitled to be granted asylum: those persecuted in connexion with their activity in defence of the interests of democracy or for their scientific activity or for their participation in the struggle for national liberation. Accordingly, the thousands of Spaniards who had left their country to escape from the Franco regime were entitled to asylum, as were those who had fought to free their country from foreign oppression and all those who, in colonial or semi-colonial territories, were carried on the wave of growing national feeling to revolt against a humiliating regime.

Article 12 should be drafted in explicit rather than in theoretical terms. The USSR amendment attained that end with clarity and simplicity. There could be no grounds for its rejection.

MR. CASSIN (France) was prepared to accept the text of article 12 as adopted by the Commission on Human Rights.

He believed that the principle of the right of asylum should be given recognition in the declaration; paragraph 2 contained all the necessary limitations and reservations. The USSR amendment did not, therefore, seem essential.

Mr. Cassin did not think that the word authentiquement in the French text of paragraph 2 was a good translation of the word “genuinely”. He would prefer the words effectivement or réellement.

Explaining his amendment (A/C.3/244), the representative of France criticized article 12 for failing to indicate whose duty it would be to give effect to the right of asylum affirmed in the declaration. In the case of the articles studied so far, the national society in which the individual was living was required to ensure the rights in question. The right of asylum, however, was a conception of an essentially international character: it was therefore necessary to specify who was to ensure the enjoyment of that right.

France, under whose Constitution asylum was granted to persons persecuted for the defence of liberty, believed that the supreme responsibility should rest with the human community as a whole, represented by the United Nations acting in concert with countries concerned. Any other solution would be illusory and unsatisfactory. The French proposal was submitted in the interests of the victims of persecution as well as of the States called upon to offer refuge.

The question of refugees had been discussed several times by the United Nations; the Third Committee itself had studied the question of the Palestine refugees (117th and 118th meetings). The assumption of such a responsibility by the community of nations would not, therefore, be a theoretical abstraction without factual precedent. The French delegation wished to give juridical and official form to an action already initiated by the United Nations. It firmly believed that its amendment reflected the real wishes of mankind.

[329]

MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) was in favour of the present text of article 12. The aim of his amendment (A/C.3/268), which was very similar to that submitted by the representative of Bolivia, was simply that the right of asylum should extend to asylum in embassies and legations. He would, however, accept paragraph 1 of the basic text if the words "in other countries" were replaced by "within territory of other countries", the word "territory" being given its legal sense and the right of asylum thus being extended to the embassies and legations of the countries concerned.

Mr Jiménez de Aréchaga added that he understood that the right of asylum was subject to limitation by measures of a legal character taken by individual States, provided that those measures remained within the framework of article 27 of the declaration.

MR. ANZE MATIENZO (Bolivia) was prepared to vote for the text adopted by the Commission on Human Rights.

He supported the French amendment and approved the principle of entrusting a world organization, such as the United Nations, with the responsibility of giving effect to the right of asylum.

Turning to his own amendment (A/C.3/227), he recalled that the conception of the right of asylum went back to the earliest periods of history. Temples, holy places and even certain cities, such as Teos, had served as places of refuge. Immunity granted to diplomats was an established principle in diplomatic usage; it extended to the buildings of embassies and legations and even to the residences of ambassadors; it was so valuable that it had been included in the convention adopted by the Sixth International Conference of American States held at Havana in 1928.<sup>82</sup>

However, according to that convention, the right of asylum was restricted to political refugees, who only enjoyed the right in cases of extreme urgency, when their lives were threatened, and then only for a limited period.

The Bolivian delegation thought it proper that a country which gave asylum to a refugee should also open to him the doors of its embassy, as the latter also represented the country of refuge.

MRS. CORBET (United Kingdom) thought that article 12 revealed a certain defeatism. The declaration of human rights envisaged an ideal life for all members of society; yet article 12 admitted the existence of persecution within that society. For that reason, Mrs. Corbet believed that article 12 was out of place in the declaration.

Attempting to define the duties of a State which was asked by a persecuted person to grant asylum, Mrs. Corbet thought it desirable to establish whether a person was entitled to enter a foreign country by virtue of being persecuted.

The right of asylum in the constitutions of certain States was more limited than in article 12. Under the Constitutions of Mexico and Uruguay, for example, foreigners were assured free entry into those countries only if they conformed to the immigration laws.

The word "persecution" had a very wide meaning. People could be persecuted for reasons [330] of race or religion, and not only on account of their political activities. The only prosecutions not considered by article 12 to constitute persecution were those arising from non-political crimes or from acts contrary to the purposes and principles of the United Nations.

The Government of the United Kingdom was ready to guarantee that any persecuted person asking it for refuge would be treated with sympathy. But no State could accept the responsibilities imposed by article 12. The United Kingdom had often had occasion to offer asylum to political refugees, notably to Garibaldi,<sup>83</sup> Mazzini,<sup>84</sup> Kossuth,<sup>85</sup> Marx and Lenin, but it had not done so under obligation. It had always made use of its right to admit any particular person, and intended to continue to do so in the future.

<sup>82</sup> The Convention regarding Diplomatic Officers, (1928) 155 LNTS 261, was adopted on 20 February 1928 at the Sixth International Conference of American States held at Havana.

<sup>83</sup> Giuseppe Garibaldi (1807–82) was an Italian patriot and military leader who made an important contribution to Italy's unification and independence.

<sup>84</sup> Giuseppe Mazzini (1805–72) campaigned for Italian unification and independence, and was an early advocate of the United States of Europe.

<sup>85</sup> Lajos Kossuth (1802–94) is described as the father of Hungarian democracy.

Mrs. Corbet thought that the basic text of article 12 was closely linked to immigration laws, inasmuch as it gave any person or group of persons persecuted for political or other reasons the right to demand admission into the country of their choice. Such was not the intention of article 12; nevertheless, the United Kingdom delegation thought its adoption impossible, as no foreigner could claim the right of entry into any State unless that right were granted by treaty.

Mrs. Corbet defined the right of asylum as the right of every State to offer refuge and to resist all demands for extradition, and explained that that was the meaning of the expression "to enjoy asylum" contained in her amendment (A/C.3/253).

Turning to the French amendment, she drew a distinction between the words "asylum" and "re-establishment", adding that if the United Nations was unable to secure immediate asylum, it should concern itself with the re-establishment of refugees and co-ordinate the efforts of all States wishing to act towards that end. In the last instance, it was for States to admit or not to admit a given person. The French amendment seemed to give the United Nations the right to invite Member States to grant asylum. The United Kingdom delegation could not accept such a principle.

The Egyptian amendment invoked the rules of international law. The only relevant rule was that of the free will of the State and of its right to refuse extradition; consequently, the position of the Egyptian delegation coincided with that of the United Kingdom delegation.

The United Kingdom delegation supported the amendment submitted by Saudi Arabia. It thought, however, that paragraph 1 should be worded as follows: (A/C.3/253):

"Everyone had the right to seek, and to enjoy in other countries, asylum from persecution."

Thus amended, the text, while limiting the obligation of the State, would indicate that there was a right of asylum to which persecuted persons could have recourse, that the exercise of that right could not be penalized, and that States which [331] offered asylum to refugees would not be compelled to extradite them.

Article 12, as it stood, was contrary to almost all existing immigration laws; Mrs. Corbet feared that its application might actually lead to persecution by encouraging States to take action against an undesirable minority and then to invite it to make use of the right of asylum.

MR. BARODY (Saudi Arabia) agreed that every persecuted person should be able to enjoy the right of asylum. That right was indisputable, both from the humanitarian point of view and because to deny it would mean the abandonment of the essential principles of the declaration. That did not mean, however, that everyone had the right to obtain asylum in the country of his choice, although that country might not be prepared to receive him. Such a principle would be a flagrant violation of the sovereignty of the State concerned.

Mr. Baroody remarked that a persecutor was often himself a victim of persecution actuated by feelings of revenge. Moreover, victims of persecutions were often obsessed by morbid fears and were not always psychologically sound; a State could not therefore be placed under obligation to receive any victim of persecution without previous investigation.

For that reason, it would not be advisable to recommend the adoption of an article granting to persecuted persons the right to demand asylum in the country of their choice without first establishing whether that country was in a position to receive them.

Article 12 made no provision for consultation with the States called upon to offer refuge; it did not indicate whose responsibility it should be to direct a persecuted person to any particular country.

For those reasons, the representative of Saudi Arabia thought that the article promised more than it should. He therefore proposed (A/C.3/241) the deletion of the words "and be granted" from paragraph 1.

MR. BEAUFORT (Netherlands) thought that the right of asylum was a symbol of international solidarity. He recalled that the Netherlands had in the past given refuge to many refugees. In normal times, it would be possible to implement article 12 as it then was worded. Unfortunately, existing conditions were far from normal. Thus, in 1938 the Netherlands had admitted thousands of German Jews driven out of their own country; however, it had not found it possible to receive all of them.

Therefore, Mr. Beaufort thought it preferable to add the words "to the extent that this is possible" after the words "to seek and be granted" in paragraph 1.

Again, he thought that the French amendment concerned a measure of implementation of article 12 and was out of place in the declaration. If, however, the Committee should decide to accept the French amendment, then he made the suggestion that the words "where necessary" should be added after the words "is required". Such a change would mean that the United Nations would undertake to ensure the application of the right of asylum only in the event of States being unwilling or unable to do so. [332]

MR. PLAZA (Venezuela) entirely approved of the text proposed by the Commission on Human Rights. The Venezuelan Constitution granted the right of asylum to political refugees subject to existing laws and treaties. However, the principle concerned was not a right but a humanitarian practice which the State concerned was free to accept or to reject.

The Venezuelan delegation therefore supported the United Kingdom amendment, on condition that the words "and to enjoy" did not imply an obligation on the part of the State; the Committee was discussing human rights and not the obligations of governments.

Mr. Plaza accepted the amendments of Bolivia and Uruguay; those amendments corresponded to current practice, which should be explicitly established rather than tacitly accepted.

While recognizing the value of the USSR amendment, he thought that article 12 should have a wider scope and should not contain categories so sharply defined.

Finally, he drew attention to the full meaning of the word “persecution” and felt that the declaration should not only attempt to palliate the effects of existing persecution but provide everyone with the opportunity to defend himself against imminent persecution.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) recalled that the Commission on Human Rights had been instructed in 1946 to formulate the draft declaration.<sup>1</sup> It had studied a great number of problems and was fully acquainted with the question of the displaced persons and victims of persecution who were homeless. The Commission on Human Rights had borne that situation in mind in elaborating the text of article 12.

The objection had rightly been raised that States could not be obliged to receive victims of persecution because there might be serious domestic reasons against their reception. The delegation of France proposed an amendment under the terms of which the United Nations would be designated as being required to secure the right of asylum. The United Nations, with the material resources at its disposal and with the moral authority it possessed, was in a position to fulfil that obligation.

The representative of Chile said that he would therefore support the amendment proposed by France and that he considered its adoption indispensable.

The Chilean delegation would also support the amendments proposed by Bolivia and Cuba.

With regard to the amendment submitted by the USSR, he pointed out that that text had the dual purpose of giving greater precision to the wording of article 12 and of preventing fascists and Nazis from seeking refuge abroad under the pretext of availing themselves of the right of asylum.

According to the USSR proposal, the right of asylum would be granted to persons persecuted for having defended the interests of democracy or for their scientific activity or for their participation in the struggle for national liberation. Mr. Santa Cruz thought that the scope of article 12 was thereby singularly restricted because, to cite only one instance, the victims of religious or racial persecution were not mentioned in that amendment. The basic text covered all cases including that of warmongers. The Chilean delegation would therefore vote against the USSR amendment.

<sup>[2]</sup> See Official Records of the Economic and Social Council, First Year, First Session, annex 8, resolution 1/5.

[333]

After the Chairman had stated that the list of speakers taking part in the general discussion of article 12 was closed, MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) submitted a motion that the list should be kept open.

THE CHAIRMAN put that motion to the vote.

The motion was rejected by 14 votes to 12, with 11 abstentions.

MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) wished to make his position clear: the representative of the United Kingdom had mentioned Uruguay among the countries whose constitution was less liberal in regard to the right of asylum. The attitude of the Uruguayan delegation would therefore seem to be a peculiar one, since it proposed amendment (A/C.3/268) designed, on the contrary, to extend the benefit of the right of asylum.

In fact, the judgment of the United Kingdom delegation was based on a confusion: immigration and the right of asylum were two quite different things and article 36 of the Constitution of Uruguay restricted immigration and not the right of asylum.

MR. CAMPOS ORTIZ (Mexico) said that he had been forestalled by the representative of Uruguay when the latter had replied to the delegation of the United Kingdom on the subject of less liberal regimes in regard to the right of asylum. Mexico, on the contrary, had a very broad conception of the right of asylum, and it was immigration that was restricted in that country.

In general, he agreed with the text proposed by the Commission on Human Rights. For the first paragraph he preferred, however, the draft proposed by the United Kingdom.

He pointed out the excessively restrictive nature of the USSR amendment, which did not take into account all the forms which persecution could assume.

He declared his agreement with the amendment proposed by Bolivia: the right of asylum in embassies and legations was in fact the ratification of a practice recognized moreover by two international conventions. Therefore Mexico would vote in favour of the Bolivian amendment, if it took into account the suggestion of the representative of Uruguay that it should be made clear that the right of asylum should extend to the "territory" comprised in the precincts of embassies and legations.

Mr. Campos Ortiz considered the French amendment quite opposite and said he would support it.

COUNT CARTON DE WIART (Belgium) pointed out that the general nature of paragraph 1 had been recognized by all the delegations.

On the other hand, he wished to emphasize, since the fact had not been thrown into relief, [334] that the restrictive nature of paragraph 2 constituted a retrogression in regard to the liberal tradition and jurisprudence of many countries, including Belgium – which had refused the requests of several States for the extradition of persons who were nevertheless undesirable – or of the Netherlands which had granted asylum to Kaiser Wilhelm II after the First World War.

Hence it was necessary to have recourse to certain guarantees in the application of the provisions of article 12. France realized that when it maintained that national sovereignties should yield to the interests of the community. The French amendment entrusted the United Nations, in concert with countries concerned, with the charge of ensuring to victims of persecution enjoyment of the right of asylum.

The Belgian delegation approved the principle of that amendment and would vote for it, with the reservation suggested by the representative of the Netherlands. That solution was all the more acceptable because it would enable recourse to be had to the supreme jurisdiction of the International Court of Justice to decide contentious cases.

With regard to the amendments proposed by Bolivia and Uruguay, he considered that the proper place for the right of extra-territoriality was in a convention regarding application, and not in a declaration of human rights.

MR. SANDIFER (United States of America) supported the text adopted by the Commission on Human Rights subject to the inclusion of the amendment proposed by the United Kingdom. That amendment was, in his opinion, most pertinent. It improved the drafting of the text and appeared to reflect the views of the majority of the Third Committee.

He could not support the amendments presented by Bolivia and Uruguay, which were not relevant there, and should be embodied in separate conventions on diplomatic privileges and immunities.

He thought, too, that the French amendment was not called for as it amounted to a measure of implementation, the importance of which had been clearly shown by the discussion on the matter. It was impossible to agree to the United Nations becoming the trustee for securing the right of asylum without going very thoroughly into the matter. Moreover, the Third Committee was presumably not qualified to deal with that question, which would come within the competence of the Sixth Committee. He would therefore vote against that amendment.

He was also strongly opposed to the amendment proposed by the USSR. Article 12, as it stood in the basic text, set forth very reasonable limitations which there was no cause to change. The United States representative expressed his surprise that the USSR, which fought against discrimination in all its forms, should seek to restrict the benefits of article 12 to certain groups of persons.

MR. HABIB (India) supported the United Kingdom amendment. The basic text of article 12 seemed to indicate that a request made by a foreigner to enter a country was a categorical moral right, whether the country in which asylum was being sought was willing to grant it or not. The United Kingdom amendment made a useful correction to that idea. No one had the right to enter foreign territory without permission from the State governing that territory. If, however, the permission of the State concerned were given, the right to enjoy fully the asylum granted him by that State could not be disputed.

If the United Kingdom amendment were adopted, the amendment proposed by Saudi Arabia would become unnecessary.

The USSR amendment, in contrast to the text of the Commission on Human Rights, did not cover all cases which might arise and limited the right of asylum to three categories. Victims of religious persecution, for instance, would not be protected under the amendment.

The Indian delegation, furthermore, could not accept the principle of extending the right of asylum to embassies and legations of foreign Powers as that would give rise to serious disorders in non-American countries.

He acknowledged finally the value of the principle underlying the French amendment. He considered it preferable, however, to maintain the wording of the basic text of article 12 and to put the French delegation's proposal in the form of a resolution of the General Assembly.

MR. AQUINO (Philippines), defining the concept of the right of asylum, stated that it was a right which could be claimed by all those, who fleeing from persecution in their own country, sought elsewhere the possibility of enjoying their basic right to existence. That concept did not include the right to residence or the right to work.

The Philippine delegation supported the United Kingdom amendment which further clarified the intention of article 12 and did away with objections based on considerations of national sovereignty.

With regard to French amendment, he considered that measures of implementation should not be included in the declaration.

He recognized the value of the arguments brought forward by the French delegation but thought the right of asylum should be a permanent one which could be exercised in urgent cases; such would not be the case if, instead of applying direct to the authorities of the countries in which they sought asylum, refugees were obliged to apply first to the United Nations.

He appreciated the praiseworthy intentions of the USSR amendment. He agreed of course that war criminals and fascists should be prevented from benefiting from the right of asylum, but he thought it would be a serious mistake to adopt the amendment in question, which would prevent a great many persons from being protected against racial discrimination.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) thought that in the discussion which had just taken place, the conception of the right of the individual had been replaced to a certain extent by that of the obligation of the State. The statement of a right should not, however, depend on the possibility of States to comply with that right. If it were part of the birthright of man, it should be established even if, for accidental reasons, it did not seem possible to ensure immediate implementation. The particular difficulties of each State should be dealt with in the covenant which was to be drawn up. The [336] declaration therefore should limit itself to setting forth the rights inherent in the human person.

For those reasons, the Lebanese delegation would be inclined to support the text proposed by the Commission on Human Rights which ensured the individual not only the right of seeking asylum, but also the right of being granted asylum. In order to take into account, however, the serious considerations brought forward by several other delegations, it would be ready to accept the wording proposed by the United Kingdom, which was more subjective than the basic text, since it established the right of asylum without specifying who was to give effect to that right, as that could not yet be indicated. Nevertheless, his delegation wished to make it quite clear that by the expression “and to enjoy. . . asylum”, it understood that the individual should be guaranteed the right of being granted asylum, and not merely the right of enjoying asylum in the country which had received him, once that right had been acquired.

As regards the amendment submitted by the French delegation, he did not consider that it brought up the question of implementation, as it merely stated who should be responsible for upholding that right but did not deal with the actual problem of measures of implementation. Whatever conclusions could be reached in that connexion however, the text proposed by the French delegation was, nevertheless, in the Lebanese delegation’s view, rather dangerous, as it placed on the United Nations all the responsibility of granting protection to victims of persecution. Respect for the declaration of human rights and the implementation of its principles should not depend on the existence of the United Nations. Even if the United Nations were to disappear, the principles set forth in the declaration would retain all their moral force.

If the text submitted by the French delegation were changed in the sense suggested by the Netherlands representative, that objection would no longer exist, and the Lebanese delegation would support the amendment.

Finally, he endorsed the arguments already used by previous speakers against the amendment suggested by the USSR representative. If that amendment were applied literally, it would result in practice in the right of asylum being granted only to heroes or scientists. Even the least distinguished person, merely by reason of the fact that he was a human being, had however a right to escape from persecution, and it was the duty of the international community to help him do so.

MR. SHAHI (Pakistan) stated that his delegation extended its support to the text proposed by the Commission on Human Rights. Recognition of the right of everyone to seek and be granted asylum was a welcome step forward; in the past, international law had regarded the right of asylum as accruing to a State by virtue of its sovereign independent status rather than as one of the fundamental rights of man. The inclusion of that right in an international declaration would establish as a principle what was then current international practice.

[337]

It was clear from articles 16 and 17 of the draft declaration that it was necessary to include that right among the fundamental rights of man. If everyone had the right of freedom of thought and expression, a person could obviously preserve his intellectual and moral integrity only by seeking refuge abroad, should his own country deny him the enjoyment of those essential liberties.

After condemning the Nazi and fascist ideologies and the conception of the absolute State, Mr. Shahi emphasized the necessity of guaranteeing to everyone not only the right to seek asylum but also the possibility of enjoying that asylum. The delegation of Pakistan understood the reluctance of certain delegations to impose upon States obligations which would prevent them from exercising their freedom of choice, and might conflict with their immigration laws. There was an unquestionable connexion between the granting of the right of asylum and immigration laws; nevertheless, the Pakistan delegation did not think that, by granting the right of asylum to the persons covered by article 12, a country would seriously endanger its immigration policy, since the number of refugees fleeing from political persecution was seldom so great as to destroy the ethnical balance in that country. Furthermore, there was no reason why a State should not enforce such restrictions upon the entry of refugees as might be considered necessary for national security and public welfare.

The Pakistan delegation had also considered with care the amendment submitted by the Egyptian delegation. It feared that that amendment might change the very meaning of article 12, reducing it to a static formula. Since the right to claim asylum was not admitted by the rules of international law, then to make the exercise of that right subject to such rules, as proposed by the Egyptian delegation, would be tantamount to preventing it from coming into existence until international law had developed sufficiently to include that principle. Another objection to the amendment was that it did not take into consideration cases without any historical precedents, such as that of Kaiser Wilhelm II, for which the rules of international law could not serve as a guide.

As regards the amendments submitted by the representatives of Bolivia and Uruguay to extend the right of asylum to embassies and legations, the Pakistan delegation noted that such an amendment introduced into article 12 the concept of extra-territoriality, a concept which might have dangerous implications. The nations of the East knew better than any others its mischievous application: the history of capitulations in the Ottoman Empire, of the concessions in China, and of similar jurisdictions or rights granted in the Near and Far East, furnished unfortunate examples. For that reason the Pakistan delegation would prefer that the right of asylum should not be extended to embassies and legations.

Mr. Shahi pointed out that if those amendments were adopted, the words "in other countries" in the first paragraph of article 12 should be deleted. The delegation of Pakistan considered that the amendment submitted by the USSR limited the scope of article 12: the desired reservations were [338] ensured by the provisions of paragraph 2, because, by denying the right of asylum to all those guilty of acts contrary to the purposes and principles of the United Nations they ipso facto denied asylum to the Nazis and fascists whom Mr. Pavlov wished to exclude from the benefits of article 12.

Finally, the Pakistan delegation would support the amendment submitted by the French delegation because, while in agreement with those representatives who considered that the measures for implementation should be included in the covenant, it shared the opinion of Mr. Cassin that when a right was proclaimed the party whose duty it was to give effect to that right should also be stated.

MR. WATT (Australia) said that the discussion which had just taken place revealed the importance of article 12 and the necessity of examining it with care.

The Australian delegation supported the proposal of the delegation of Saudi Arabia to delete the words "and be granted" in paragraph 1 of the article. The Australian delegation had more than once pointed out that formulas implying obligation must be avoided in the text of the declaration of human rights. It should be a straightforward, clear and precise statement of the fundamental rights of man and must make no reference to the corresponding obligations of the State. As for the right of asylum, each State must be free to decide the form in which that right, having been proclaimed in the declaration, should be applied. The manner of application might vary according to circumstances, the possibilities which a State had to grant asylum, and the size of the groups making application. The formula proposed by the United Kingdom delegation to ensure that the individual enjoyed asylum once that right had been granted, was excellent and had the complete approval of the Australian delegation. To go further would be to run the risk of serious complications.

The Australian delegation had the same objections to the amendments submitted by the delegations of the USSR and France. The French amendment moreover imposed upon the United Nations an obligation which was not clearly defined and which might lead to unforeseen difficulties. What exactly was asked of the United Nations? To which of its organs would the question of persecuted persons be referred? All those matters deserved the most careful study, possibly elsewhere than in the Third Committee.

As for the extension of the right of asylum to embassies and legations, he shared the opinion of the representatives of Belgium and the United States. Diplomatic immunity was in principle granted to representatives of States. To what other persons did the amendments of Bolivia and Uruguay wish to extend such immunity? To the citizens of the country to which the embassy belonged, or to those of the country where the embassy was situated, or to those of yet a third country? Would the embassy be able to grant the right of asylum as it thought fit, or would it be expected to accede to the request whenever it was made? All those were questions to which no answer had been given.

[339]

The Australian delegation considered that there existed a general right of asylum and that to go beyond the recognition of that right, would be to go further than one could or should go, at that time, in a declaration of human rights.

MR. RADEVANOVIC (Yugoslavia) said that his delegation was fully aware of the importance of the question dealt with in article 12 of the declaration of human rights. That right, which must be recognized and established, supplemented the list of fundamental human rights. It was at the same time necessary to define it and to limit its application, for it could not be an absolute right, either from the point of view of justice or of morality.

Since the end of the war the General Assembly had, on several occasions, dealt with the general question of the right of asylum, in connexion with the problem of refugees or the extradition of war criminals, traitors and quislings.

There was a serious gap in the text drafted by the Commission on Human Rights since it did not take into account either those special cases or the international provisions relating to them. The limitations contained in paragraph 2 were insufficient: they ignored the new provisions established in post-war international documents, the declarations of the Allied leaders at Moscow, Potsdam and Yalta, the resolutions of the General Assembly of the United Nations, the London Agreement<sup>1</sup> and Law No. 10 of the Allied Control Council in Germany,<sup>86</sup> all of which related to the prosecution and punishment of war criminals and laid precise obligations upon States to surrender war criminals and traitors who had sought shelter in their territories.

The Yugoslav delegation held that the international declaration of human rights could neither expressly nor tacitly by virtue of a general clause, extend the right of asylum to persons who had been morally condemned by the conscience of the world. There were still many war criminals, former German and Italian officers and nationals of occupied countries guilty of dealing with the enemy, who had found asylum in certain countries, particularly in the Western occupation zones of Germany and Austria. Whenever the Yugoslav Government had tried to secure their extradition it had met with numerous difficulties. It was therefore unable to agree that the benefit of the right of asylum – admittedly a legitimate right – should be extended to war criminals and traitors in virtue of a provision drafted in too general terms.

<sup>86</sup> Control Council Law No. 10, Punishment of Persons Guilty of War Crimes, Crimes Against Peace and Against Humanity, 20 December 1945, Official Gazette of the Control Council for Germany, No. 3, Berlin, 31 January 1946, pp. 50–55. Control Council Law No. 10 provided the legislative basis for post-war trials held by American Military Tribunals at Nürnberg as well as for national prosecutions before Germany's domestic courts.

The imperfections of article 12 were clearly seen in the light of the abuses that were still occurring daily in violation of international obligations and contrary to the interests of democracy and of international solidarity. Those who had drafted the article had undoubtedly not considered all the aspects of the problem.

The Yugoslav delegation would therefore vote for the amendment submitted by the USSR delegation since that amendment had the merit of defining the scope of the article and of bringing it more closely into agreement with the requirements of justice and the interests of peace.

<sup>[1]</sup> Agreement for the establishment of an International Military Tribunal for the prosecution and punishment of the major war criminals of the European Axis, signed on 8 August 1945.

[340]

MR. DE ATHAYDE (Brazil) emphasized that the conception of asylum contained in article 12 was one of the oldest in the history of the relations between peoples. That right of asylum was recognized and accepted by the chief civilizations of the world. A declaration of fundamental human rights would be incomplete if it did not explicitly affirm that right.

The Brazilian delegation would therefore lend its support to the general conception as stated in the text drafted by the Commission on Human Rights. It also entirely agreed with the proposal of the delegations of Bolivia and Uruguay to extend the right of asylum to embassies and legations. That proposal was in accordance with current practice in Latin America. It would, however, be more appropriate for it to be inserted in the draft covenant.

As for the French amendment, which the Brazilian delegation accepted in principle, Mr. Cassin would perhaps agree to modify the text a little in order to meet the objections raised during the discussion. He proposed the following new text for paragraph 1 of article 12:

“Everyone has the right to seek and be granted in other countries, asylum from persecution, with the support, if necessary, of the United Nations acting in concert with the other States.”

MRS. CORBET (United Kingdom), answering the representatives of Uruguay and Mexico, said that the explanations given by Mr. Jiménez de Aréchaga and Mr. Campos Ortiz had provided her with all the necessary information concerning the right of asylum in their respective countries. With regard to the interpretation of the amendment submitted by her delegation she desired to make it clear that its intention was not to grant to a person fleeing persecution the right to enter any and every country but to ensure for him the enjoyment of the right of asylum once that right had been granted him. The United Kingdom amendment limited the obligation of the State, but gave the individual an assurance that he would continue to enjoy the right of asylum after his entry into the country of refuge.

Her delegation agreed with the comments made by the Australian representative on the proposal of the delegations of Uruguay and Bolivia to extend the right of asylum to embassies and legations; that proposal would be acceptable if the original text of article 12 were amended on the lines she suggested. If that were done the United Kingdom delegation would vote for the proposal, it being understood however that the right of asylum within embassies and legations would be granted temporarily and that the ambassador or minister would have full freedom to grant or refuse it.

Finally, she expressed the hope, that the French representative could not insist on maintaining his amendment, which had essentially the same objects as the United Kingdom amendment, namely to limit the obligation of States.

The meeting rose at 6:15 p.m.

A/C.3/SR.122<sup>87</sup>

4 November 1948

Summary Record of the Hundred and Twenty-Second Meeting
[of the Third Committee]

Held at the Palais de Chaillot, Paris, on Thursday,
4 November 1948, at 10:30 a.m.

Chairman: MR. CHARLES MALIK (Lebanon).

46. Draft international declaration of human rights (E/800) (continued)

Article 12 (continued)

THE CHAIRMAN reminded the Committee that the amendments to article 12 were recapitulated in document A/C.3/285/Rev.1.

MRS. KALINOWSKA (Poland) said that the amendments proposed by the United Kingdom (A/C.3/253) and Saudi Arabia (A/C.3/241) would weaken the article. The Spanish Republicans, for example, who might be said to have been fighting for the ideals of the United Nations, had the right to be protected.

Asylum had in some cases been refused to Spanish Republicans, but had been granted to fascists. The representative of the United Kingdom had stated that no one could dictate to a Government about the right of asylum. The Moscow Agreement of 1943 had stipulated that the right of asylum should not protect war criminals from extradition. That agreement was unfortunately not being observed in all cases by Members of the United Nations. Poland, which had perhaps suffered more than most countries from the activities of the war criminals, felt it incumbent upon itself to protest. Nazis were still at large in certain Latin American countries and elsewhere, while asylum had been refused to democrats such as the Spanish Republicans.

<sup>87</sup> The text of the document is from Official Records of the General Assembly, Third Session, 1948, pp. 341–8.

She would support the amendment proposed by the USSR delegation (E/800, page 33).

MR. LITOVCHENKO (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) said that it was impossible to accept the amendments proposed by Bolivia (A/C.3/227) and Uruguay (A/C.3/268). Neither of them had any direct relevance to the declaration; such matters should rather be included in treaties between States. Those amendments might look like an attempt to intervene in matters within the domestic jurisdiction of States and, if adopted, might provide a pretext of misuse of the principle of extra-territoriality.

The USSR amendment (E/800, page 33), which had been criticized on the ground that it was restrictive, stated explicitly what categories of persons should be guaranteed asylum. Article 129 of the USSR Constitution laid down that asylum should be granted to the same categories of persons as those mentioned in the USSR amendment.

The basic text of article 12 was ambiguous to such an extent that it might be used by Governments such as the Franco regime in Spain as a pretext for granting asylum to war criminals.

[342]

He would support the USSR amendment and would oppose the Uruguayan and Bolivian amendments.

MR. CASSIN (France) said that it would be impossible for a right of asylum to exist without confirmation by the United Nations. The United Nations should recognize that right directly. That recognition, however, should not be dogmatic. He therefore urged the adoption of the new draft amendment proposed jointly by France and Brazil (A/C.3/322).

He did not agree with the restrictive conception embodied in the words "to enjoy" in the United Kingdom amendment (A/C.3/253). Moreover, the persecuted would need to receive asylum, not merely the right of asylum.

With regard to the Polish representative's remarks about the Spanish Republicans, France, in accordance with its high traditions, had given asylum to several hundred thousand.

He agreed with the representative of Belgium that it would be more correct in paragraph 2 to replace the word authentiquement by the word réellement. There had been cases in which extradition of persons seeking asylum for political reasons had been requested on the grounds that they were common law criminals.

The text of the article should be defended against over-expansion and over-restriction. The Cuban amendment (A/C.3/232) was so broad that it might leave a loop-hole for criminals. The USSR amendment (E/800, page 33), on the other hand, was too restrictive and was fully covered by the substance of paragraph 2; its adoption would weaken the text.

The Uruguayan (A/C.3/268) and Bolivian (A/C.3/227) amendments went far beyond the scope of the declaration. He would urge that no attempt should be made to render universal what was a specifically Latin American tradition. That tradition had on certain occasions not received a purely humanitarian interpretation.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) could not accept the joint French and Brazilian amendment. It was tantamount to asking the United Nations to intervene in matters within the domestic jurisdiction of States, in violation of the Charter.

He agreed with the representative of the Ukrainian USSR that the Bolivian and Uruguayan amendments would tend to interfere with national sovereignty and with the relations between Governments and their citizens. The sole purpose of embassies and legations was to permit Governments to transact business with one another.

He disagreed with the representatives of Chile and the United States that the USSR amendment was already covered by paragraph 2 of the [343] basic text. That paragraph was ambiguous and might provide a loop-hole for war criminals.

It might be possible to plead that a crime had taken place before the United Nations had been established, and that, therefore, it was not punishable as being contrary to the purposes and principles of the United Nations. The United States argument would leave that loophole wide open. The representative of the United Kingdom had argued that the USSR amendment (E/800, page 33), which had been based upon article 129 of the USSR Constitution, did not provide sufficient guarantees for asylum; he did not agree. If the USSR amendment were not broad enough, other representatives should add further categories of persons to be protected; he would be glad to support them.

The United Kingdom amendment (A/C.3/253) affirmed the right to seek asylum, but that was of little value unless there were provisions for implementing it. The United Kingdom and Saudi Arabian (A/C.3/241) amendments tended to reduce to nothing the possibilities of receiving asylum. The United Kingdom amendment, however, would be acceptable if any guarantee of asylum were added to it.

He requested a roll-call vote on the USSR amendment, in view of its importance for all persons suffering persecution because of their defence of democracy.

THE CHAIRMAN announced that the Cuban delegation had withdrawn its amendment (A/C.3/232).

He pointed out that the USSR amendment (E/800, page 33) was proposed as a total substitution for paragraph 1 of the basic text. If it were rejected, a vote would be taken on all other amendments before the Committee. He put the USSR amendment to the vote.

A vote was taken by roll-call, as follows:

The Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, having been drawn by lot by the Chairman, was called upon to vote first:

In favour: Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Czechoslovakia, Poland, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Yugoslavia.
Against: Canada, Chile, China, Colombia, Denmark, Dominican Republic, France, Greece, Haiti, Honduras, India, Luxembourg, Mexico, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Pakistan, Peru, Philippines, Sweden, Syria, Turkey, Union of South Africa, United Kingdom, United States of America, Uruguay, Venezuela, Australia, Belgium, Bolivia.

Abstaining: Ecuador, Ethiopia, Iran, Iraq, Saudi Arabia, Afghanistan.

That amendment was rejected by 30 votes to 6, with 6 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the Saudi Arabian amendment (A/C.3/241), proposing the deletion of the words “and be granted” from paragraph 1 of the basic text.

[344]

That amendment was adopted by 18 votes to 14, with 8 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN called for a vote on the United Kingdom amendment (A/C.3/253) proposing that paragraph 1 of article 12 be amended to read as follows: “Everyone has the right to seek, and to enjoy, in other countries, asylum from persecution.”

He pointed out that the French translation of that text should read: “et de jouir de l’asile en un autre pays”.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) proposed that the words “to receive” should be inserted as an essential link between the words “to seek” and “and to enjoy” in the United Kingdom amendment. There was no point in a guarantee of enjoying asylum unless there was also established the right to obtain it.

THE CHAIRMAN ruled that the proposed insertion had already been rejected by the Committee when it had voted on the Saudi Arabian amendment. It could not, therefore, be put to the vote.

MR. KAMINSKY (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) pointed out that the proposal of the USSR representative constituted an amendment to the United Kingdom amendment. It applied to a new text which was still before the Committee.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics), formally invoking rule 102 of the rules of procedure, appealed from the Chairman’s ruling.

He requested a roll-call vote on the United Kingdom amendment.

THE CHAIRMAN put the appeal to the vote in accordance with rule 102.

The Chairman's ruling was upheld by 19 votes to 9, with 12 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put the United Kingdom amendment to the vote.

The vote was taken by roll-call, as follows:

Pakistan, having been drawn by lot by the Chairman, was called upon to vote first:

In favour: Pakistan, Peru, Philippines, Saudi Arabia, Sweden, Syria, Turkey, United Kingdom, United States of America, Uruguay, Venezuela, Australia, Belgium, Canada, Chile, China, Costa Rica, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Ethiopia, Greece, Haiti, Honduras, India, Iraq, Luxembourg, Mexico, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway.

Against: Bolivia.

Abstaining: Poland, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of South Africa, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Yugoslavia, Afghanistan, Argentina, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Czechoslovakia, Ecuador, France, Iran.

The amendment was adopted by 30 votes to 1, with 12 abstentions.

MR. SAINT-LOT (Haiti) said that he had voted in favour of the United Kingdom amendment because, while designed to ensure the right of [345] asylum, that amendment did not impose upon States the obligation to grant it. It was because such an obligation was contrary to international law that he had voted for the Saudi Arabian proposal to delete from the original text the words "and be granted".

MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay), MR. BEAUFORT (Netherlands) and MR. SHAHI (Pakistan) explained that, as the Saudi Arabian amendment which they had opposed had been adopted by the Committee, they had voted in favour of the United Kingdom amendment because, in the circumstances, it made article 12 somewhat more liberal than it would otherwise have been.

MISS ZULOAGA (Venezuela) stated that she had voted in favour of the United Kingdom amendment because she believed that the obligation to grant asylum should be moral rather than legal.

MR. CASSIN (France) said that he had been unable to vote in favour of the United Kingdom amendment as it unduly weakened the article, but he had not wished to vote against it inasmuch as it represented a certain improvement over the original text as amended by Saudi Arabia.

If the joint French and Brazilian amendment to paragraph 1 of article 12 were accepted, he would be able to vote in favour of that paragraph.

MR. ANZE MATIENZO (Bolivia) had voted against the United Kingdom amendment because he preferred the stronger and more comprehensive text of the basic draft.

THE CHAIRMAN announced that the Netherlands amendment (121st meeting) to article 12 had been withdrawn.

He put to the vote the joint French and Brazilian amendment (A/C.3/322).

MR. CASSIN (France) requested that the vote be taken by roll-call.

A vote was taken by roll-call, as follows:

Saudi Arabia, having been drawn by lot by the Chairman, was called upon to vote first.

In favour: Uruguay, Belgium, Bolivia, Brazil, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, Ecuador, France, Haiti, Mexico, Pakistan.

Against: Sweden, Syria, Turkey, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of South Africa, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Kingdom, United States of America, Yugoslavia, Australia, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Canada, China, Czechoslovakia, Greece, Honduras, India, Iran, Iraq, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Philippines, Poland.

Abstaining: Saudi Arabia, Venezuela, Afghanistan, Argentina, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Ethiopia, Luxembourg, Peru.

The amendment was rejected by 24 votes to 12, with 9 abstentions.

MR. ANZE MATIENZO (Bolivia) and MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) withdrew their amendments extending the right of asylum to refuge in embassies and legations. Latin American countries considered that right sacred; it was preferable not to submit it to the vote as [346] an adverse vote taken by the Third Committee might create an unfortunate precedent and weaken the principle involved.

In reply to a question by MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America), MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) and MR. CAMPOS ORTIZ (Mexico) explained the meaning of their proposal (121st meeting) that the words “in other countries” in paragraph 1 should be replaced by “within the territory of other countries”. If that amendment were adopted, countries which believed that the legal concept of territory extended to their legations and embassies abroad would be free to interpret article 12 in that sense, whereas other countries could interpret it as applying only to their geographical territory.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) thought that, in view of the fact that the Bolivian and Uruguayan representatives had withdrawn their amendments which explicitly mentioned legations and embassies, it would be only consistent if the amendment of Uruguay and Mexico, which dealt with the same subject in veiled terms, were also withdrawn.

MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) explained that there was a substantive difference between the two amendments in that the amendment still before the Committee permitted each country to decide for itself whether or not its embassies and legations should grant asylum. The amendment would consequently be maintained.

THE CHAIRMAN put the Uruguayan-Mexican amendment to the vote.

That amendment was rejected by 19 votes to 12, with 12 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the Egyptian amendment (A/C.3/264) to add at the end of paragraph 1 the words “in accordance with the rules of international law”.

That amendment was rejected by 26 votes to 2, with 11 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN ruled that the word “authentiquement” in the French text of paragraph 2 would be replaced by “réellement”.

At the request of the representative of Poland, the Chairman put the amended text of article 12 to the vote in two parts.

Paragraph 1, as amended, was adopted by 39 votes to none, with 3 abstentions.

Paragraph 2 was adopted by 41 votes to none, with 1 abstention.

The article 12 as a whole, as amended, was adopted by 40 votes to none, with 1 abstention.

MR. CONTOUMAS (Greece) had voted in favour of the Saudi Arabian amendment because, although his country had always been generous in according asylum to the persecuted, he had shared the opinion of many delegations that States should not be obliged to grant asylum, but should be able to do so at their discretion.

[347]

He had voted in favour of the United Kingdom amendment because he felt that, once a State had granted the right of asylum to any person, that right should be freely enjoyed. That appeared to be the most liberal provision that could be made under existing conditions.

He had voted against the USSR amendment because, if States were not obliged to grant asylum, there was no need to define the categories of compulsory asylum and against the Egyptian amendment because international law contained no regulations concerning the right to asylum.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) had voted in favour of article 12 even though it had been unduly weakened by the Saudi Arabian amendment.

He had voted against the USSR amendment because it would have restricted the right of asylum to certain specific groups.

He deplored the rejection of the joint French and Brazilian amendment, which placed some measure of moral responsibility upon the United Nations, and of the amendments extending the right of asylum to embassies and legations. That practice was current not only in Latin America, but also in Latin American embassies in Europe; thousands of Spanish Republicans had been saved by those embassies during the Spanish Civil War. He hoped that that great Latin American tradition would soon be adopted by the rest of the civilized world.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) stated that he had found it possible to vote for paragraph 1 as amended by the United Kingdom delegation, in spite of the fact that the paragraph thus amended was much weaker than either the basic text or the text proposed by the USSR delegation.

He had voted in favour of paragraph 2 on the understanding that no country could give shelter to war criminals on the grounds that their crimes had been committed before the United Nations had come into being, since the purposes and principles of the United Nations had at that time already been recognized by all democratic peoples. No objection had been raised to that interpretation by any member of the Committee.

MR. CASSIN (France) had voted in favour of the amended text of article 12, imperfect as it was, because it was essential for the declaration to contain an article dealing with the right of asylum. It had been a mistake, however, to recognize the individual's right to seek asylum while neither imposing upon States the obligation to grant it nor invoking the support of the United Nations.

MR. SHAHI (Pakistan) said that he had abstained from voting on the Uruguayan-Mexican amendment because, while his delegation had certain misgivings with respect to the concept of extra-territoriality, it recognized that the right of asylum in embassies and legations was a custom of long standing amongst South American States and believing as he did in the relativity of laws and institutions, he was prepared to concede that what might have harmful effects in one part of the world might have beneficial results in another. Hence he had abstained from voting in order not to prejudice the recognition of what the South American peoples might consider a fundamental right.

Article 13<sup>1</sup>

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the amendments to article 13 were recapitulated in document A/C.3/286/Rev.1.

MR. CASSIN (France) said that the text of article 13 as drafted by the Commission on Human Rights did not cover sufficient ground. It was for that reason that the French delegation proposed certain additions to it (A/C.3/244).

The text should be prefaced by the statement: "Every human being has the right to a nationality."

As the United Nations was itself based on the principle of nationality, it could not accept the existence of hundreds of thousands of stateless persons. While the United Nations itself did not have the right to take the place of a State in that matter, it was its duty to approach States for the purpose of preventing statelessness and to concern itself with the fate of stateless persons. His delegation had therefore also proposed the addition of a paragraph to that effect. The Economic and Social Council was already considering the question of statelessness; it would be greatly encouraged in its work if the declaration stated that it was the duty of the United Nations to concern itself with that question.

MR. BARODY (Saudi Arabia) observed that he would support the USSR amendment (E/800, page 33) to article 13 because that amendment took into account the fact that it was the prerogative of every State to deal, by law, with the subject of nationality.

In reply to a question by the representative of Turkey, the Chairman said that, in the understanding of the Commission on Human Rights, the word “arbitrarily” was not synonymous with “illegally”; it had a wider scope. The Commission had wished to use a general term suggesting a criterion above and beyond the laws of States, to which those laws should conform.

The meeting rose at 1 p.m.

...

[1] Article 16 of the draft universal declaration of human rights (A/777).

A/C.3/324

5 November 1948

Brazil: Amendment to the 3rd paragraph of the French amendment (A/C.3/286/Rev.1)

“The fate of persons temporarily deprived of nationality should become the care of the United Nations”.

A/C.3/SR.123<sup>88</sup>

5 November 1948

Summary Record of the Hundred and Twenty-Third Meeting
[of the Third Committee]

Held at the Palais de Chaillot, Paris, on Friday,
5 November 1948 at 10.30 a.m.

Chairman: MR. CHARLES MALIK (Lebanon).

47. Draft international declaration of human rights (E/800) (continued)

Article 13 (continued)

THE CHAIRMAN announced that the Cuban delegation had withdrawn its amendment (A/C.3/232).

<sup>88</sup> The text of the document is from Official Records of the General Assembly, Third Session, 1948, pp. 348–59.

[349]

MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) said that his first amendment (A/C.3/268), proposing the addition of a preliminary paragraph, was practically identical with the French (A/C.3/244) and Lebanese (A/C.3/260) amendments to that effect. He preferred, however, the word “everyone”; it was more concise than the French suggestion “every human being”.

Regarding his second amendment, he said that the Commission on Human Rights had understood the word “arbitrarily” to mean some measure which could be carried out in accordance with an unjust law. The more exact meaning of arbitrary was anything done in contravention of a known standard of principles. An arbitrary act was usually an act committed against law, but it could be a just act if it contravened an unjust law. There should be a higher standard of justice to which the laws on deprivation of nationality should conform. If article 29 had not been deleted from an earlier draft by the Commission, his amendment would have been unnecessary, since that article would have interpreted the declaration in accordance with the principles of the Charter.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) agreed with the representatives of France and Uruguay that a statement of general principle was needed. The basic text protected the rights of persons who already possessed a nationality; but there were people who did not possess it. States did not necessarily have an obligation to grant nationality to all who asked for it; but it might be possible to urge the United Nations to consider some method of persuading them to do so. It was desirable that the United Nations should find some way of extending the rights embodied in the declaration to all people.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that the USSR amendment (E/800, page 33) merely clarified the basic text by making reference to the domestic competence of every State.

The French amendment proposed to make it the duty of the United Nations to assume functions which were essentially in contradiction with the provisions of the Charter, and which could not in fact be fulfilled. The majority of the Commission had decided that it would be wrong to involve the United Nations in the relations between States and their citizens because that would infringe their sovereignty. If the United Nations became responsible for stateless persons, it would have to assume the financial obligations implied in such responsibility, a special organization and special funds would be needed. The Third Committee was not competent to decide that. It would, therefore, be most unwise to take any hasty decision. If a State received and maintained stateless persons, it did so on its own responsibility and should not be allowed to pass that responsibility on to the United Nations, which was in no way responsible for the circumstances which had given rise to their stateless condition. The wording of the French amendment was meaningless in law.

It was impossible to speak of “a nationality”. A person could only be a national of a given State. If it was impossible to say who would grant that [350] nationality or who would implement that right, it might be taken to mean that the United Nations itself should grant citizenship.

The article assumed the prior existence of nationality. That was correct, since the majority of people did in fact possess nationality. The only statement which would not conflict with the Charter was that no one should be deprived of his nationality. The Lebanese and Uruguayan amendments were, therefore, superfluous. The recognition of the right to nationality in the basic text was indirect, but acceptable. The declaration of human rights was not the proper place to define the right to citizenship.

Replying to the representative of Egypt, Mr. Pavlov regretted that he could not accept the inclusion of the right to change nationality. That was not appropriate in the declaration. The United Nations should not, in any case, encourage changes of nationality but should respect the relations between States and individuals.

COUNT CARTON DE WIART (Belgium) said that he would support the basic text because it seemed the best possible formulation. The French, Uruguayan and Egyptian amendments wished to introduce a right to nationality, so that, eventually, the United Nations might have to assume the implied responsibility and grant that right.

He agreed with the representative of the USSR that that idea should not be included in the declaration, which should also exclude reference to any system by which an international citizenship might be possible, such as the Tangier regime.

He was in favour of retaining the word “arbitrarily”; it did not preclude the possibility of depriving persons of nationality as a sanction in exceptional cases.

The USSR amendment added nothing to the basic text. He would oppose it.

MR. CONTOUMAS (Greece) agreed with the representative of Belgium that the basic text was satisfactory.

If the USSR amendment were adopted, the right to change nationality would not be recognized. The USSR representative had not said explicitly that the provision should be deleted. He suggested, therefore, that recognition of the right to change nationality should be appended to the USSR amendment.

The word “arbitrarily” was satisfactory because it covered all action not in conformity with law. The Uruguayan proposal to substitute “unjustly” went too far.

The Egyptian amendment (A/C.3/264) really stated the obvious because everyone normally had the status to which it referred. The basic text was, therefore, preferable.

Although the difficulties of stateless persons following the two world wars, were well known the Committee was not competent to take action [351] to guarantee the right to nationality, as proposed by the French amendment. He agreed with the representative of France that some effort should be made in that direction; but he also agreed with other representatives that that effort could not be mentioned in the declaration.

He proposed that the Committee should pass a resolution demanding that the United Nations should seek an adequate solution.

THE CHAIRMAN suggested that, while it was open to the representative of Greece to submit a draft resolution, his suggestion about a recommendation on stateless persons would be more appropriate if taken as a general item with chapter III of the report of the Economic and Social Council (item 8 of the agenda).

MR. KURAL (Turkey) said that the word “arbitrarily” was too vague and too broad; it could lend itself to varying and subjective interpretations. As long as common international rules were not clearly established, the word “arbitrary” could be interpreted from very different points of view and the interpretations might run the risk of being subjective and arbitrary, for instance in the case in which a State refused to grant its nationality to a person who had made a request for it. A solution must be found in accordance with generally recognized ideas of justice. It was almost impossible to define exactly what was meant by “arbitrary”. The point to be borne in mind was that the problems of the individual should not be subject to decisions taken outside the scope of the law. For that reason, he proposed to substitute the word “illegally” for the word “arbitrarily”. Turkish law did in fact recognize the principles embodied in article 13.

The USSR amendment could be accepted if there were added to it a provision recognizing the right to change nationality, as the representative of Greece had suggested.

As it stood, the Egyptian amendment opened the door to double nationality. It mentioned the right to acquire nationality but omitted to provide for renunciation of the former nationality.

The French amendment raised very broad questions. It should either be embodied in a separate convention or should be much more fully studied.

If the Turkish proposal were not adopted, he would support the second Uruguayan amendment, although the word “unjustly” was less precise than “illegally”, but, in any case, it was preferable to the word “arbitrarily”.

MR. ANZE MATIENZO (Bolivia) proposed that the position of the word “arbitrarily” should be transferred so that it qualified only the denial of the right to change nationality. He insisted that deprivation of nationality should not be contemplated in any circumstances whatever. Nationality was an inalienable human right. It was independent of the legal status of the place of birth. In law, nationality might be regarded as transitory; but as a right it was inherent.

[352]

He had taken the same position on article 7 (114th meeting), when he had pointed out that no qualification could be applied to the prohibition of exile. Deportation in fact created a category of stateless persons. He would oppose the USSR amendment because it failed to provide for the right to change nationality and because it based the guarantee of nationality upon law, not upon right.

The qualification “arbitrarily” should, however, apply to the prohibition of denial of the right to change nationality. Such denial might be legal but it would constitute discrimination – and that had already been outlawed by the declaration.

He would oppose the USSR amendment because it failed to provide for the right to change nationality and because it based the guarantee of nationality upon law, not upon right.

He would accept the French, Uruguayan and Lebanese amendments.

He agreed with the representative of Turkey that the Egyptian amendment was unacceptable because it opened the way to double nationality.

THE CHAIRMAN stated that the Bolivian proposal would be put to the vote at the appropriate time.

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) said that her delegation would support the basic text of article 13, which was designed to make clear first, that individuals should not be subjected to action such as was taken during the Nazi regime in Germany when thousands had been stripped of their nationality by arbitrary government action; and, secondly, that no one should be forced to keep a nationality which he did not want and that he should not therefore be denied the right to change his nationality. In view of the many difficulties and complications which arose in connexion with the problem of nationality, the basic text seemed best from a practical point of view.

The suggestion that a statement should be included to the effect that everyone had the right to a nationality had been considered earlier by the Commission.<sup>1</sup> The question arose, however, how it would be possible to realize that right. Mrs. Roosevelt would like to be able to feel, as the Bolivian representative did, that such a right was inalienable, but that attitude hardly seemed realistic. If a majority of the Committee wished, however, to include a provision to the effect that everyone had the right to a nationality, the United States would not oppose it.

Mrs. Roosevelt could not support the last part of the French amendment, which would impose a duty on the United Nations in connexion with the question of statelessness. The declaration should be a statement of the rights of the individual and should not include mention of the duties of Governments or of the United Nations. She recalled, moreover, that the Economic and Social Council had already passed a resolution asking the Secretary-General to study the problem of statelessness and to make recommendations concerning possible measures that the United Nations might take.<sup>2</sup> It would therefore be both premature and inappropriate for the declaration to attempt to deal with the problem.

<sup>[1]</sup> See document E/CN.4/SR.59.

<sup>[2]</sup> See Resolutions adopted by the Economic and Social Council during its sixth session, No. 116 D (VI).

Mrs. Roosevelt objected to the Egyptian and USSR amendments, on the grounds that they seemed to reduce the right to nationality to a mere right accorded the individual by the laws of his own country.

She supported the retention of the word “arbitrarily”, which implied unexpected, irresponsible action without regard for either law or right and was thus stronger than the word “illegally” or the word “unjustly”.

MR. LUNDE (Norway) fully supported the French proposal. It was indispensable that a solemn document like the proposed declaration should proclaim the principle that every human being had a right to a nationality and should condemn the hateful practice by which thousands of people had been deprived of that right.

Certain drafting changes in part (a) of the French proposal might be made, however; the wording used in the Lebanese, Uruguayan or Egyptian proposals might be preferable.

The Norwegian delegation also supported part (c) of the French proposal. It was clearly the duty of the United Nations to act in defence of stateless persons, and that idea should therefore be expressed in the declaration.

MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) agreed with the USSR representative that the State in which a stateless person happened to reside should not necessarily have to grant that person nationality. He did not agree, however, that his delegation’s proposal therefore had no meaning. If his proposal were adopted, Members of the United Nations would be expected to adjust their national legislation to cover the rights proclaimed in the declaration and to seek means of collective action for ensuring that no person would be deprived of nationality.

The Uruguayan amendment differed from the Egyptian amendment, as the latter would make the right to nationality dependent upon national laws, whereas the former would establish the right in a solemn international declaration.

Referring to the USSR amendment, Mr. Jiménez de Aréchaga observed that it would merely mean that the individual would be granted the rights given him by the State. Such a statement was certainly not necessary in an international document. The declaration had a far wider purpose. Its scope should not be limited by existing legislation but it should bring about changes in legislation that would prevent the existence of statelessness. In seeking to attain that end, justice should be the standard, not mere legality, and justice was a concept which could be defined on an international level.

Mr. Jiménez de Aréchaga recalled that under the Constitution and laws of his own country no citizen could in any circumstances be deprived of his nationality. He realized that that principle was not generally accepted and that the declaration could not therefore state the issue so clearly.

[354]

MRS. CORBET (United Kingdom) found the basic text of article 13 entirely satisfactory. There seemed, however, to be some confusion with regard to the meaning of the word "arbitrarily". That word was used to describe action for which the agent was not required to show just cause either before a court of law or before public opinion. The word was therefore stronger than either "illegally" or "unjustly".

She was surprised that the Turkish representative had seemed prepared to accept the USSR amendment. That amendment was very restrictive and she hoped that the Turkish representative would reconsider his position.

Referring to the Bolivian amendment, she said that the Commission had wisely decided not to state the right to nationality as an inalienable right. There were some occasions when it would be impossible to guarantee such a right. It might be said that a natural-born citizen should in no circumstances be deprived of his nationality, but it could scarcely be maintained that a citizen who had attained his citizenship by fraudulent means could not have his nationality revoked.

If, however, the Committee should decide to state, in accordance with the French, Uruguayan and Lebanese amendments, that every person had the right to a nationality, the United Kingdom would not oppose such a decision; but she drew the Committee's attention to the difficulties that arise in that connexion. She read resolution 116D(VI) of the Economic and Social Council on the subject of stateless persons passed by the Economic and Social Council, which indicated how complicated the problem was and she pointed out that in view of the action already taken by the Council, it hardly seemed necessary for the Committee to pass a resolution such as had been suggested by the Greek representative.

Referring to part (c) of the French amendment, she reminded the French representative that the statement contained therein would lay upon the United Nations duties of a kind which the Committee had, at the 121st meeting, decided should not be stated in the declaration. Furthermore, as the USSR representative had pointed out, no account had been taken of the financial implications of the statement.

She agreed with the Greek representative that the Committee should ascertain whether the USSR proposal was for a substitute text or merely for an addition to the present text. If it was to be a substitute text, valuable provisions in connexion with the right to change nationality would be omitted. Moreover, the USSR text would be restrictive, for the right to nationality would be restricted by the laws of the country concerned.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) said that objections had been raised to the French, Lebanese and Uruguayan amendments on the ground that there was no guarantee for the right they proclaimed. The declaration, however, was not concerned with implementation; it was concerned with stating principles.

The conscience of mankind could not accept that human beings who had not been convicted of crime should be deprived of their nationality and so deprived also of the economic, political and [355] social rights deriving therefrom. The principle included in the Lebanese proposal was therefore essential to a declaration on human rights; it would express the attitude of the human conscience on the subject and it would, moreover point out to both stateless persons and to States themselves that the problem of statelessness was one which the United Nations and individual States must make every effort to solve.

If that right were asserted, the adoption of part (c) of the French proposal would be unnecessary, for the assertion itself would provide sufficient incentive for the United Nations to encourage action by Member States. The declaration should not hesitate to proclaim even those rights which had thus far not been guaranteed.

MR. AQUINO (Philippines) considered that article 13 was designed, like many other articles of the declaration, to protect the individual against encroachment on his rights by the State. The USSR draft amendment, however, would completely defeat that purpose, for instead of providing for full enjoyment of the right of nationality, it would restrict exercise of that right to what was guaranteed by the laws of the country. The Philippine delegation could not therefore support it.

Mr. Aquino appreciated the high purpose of the French delegation in seeking to include in the declaration commitments which would bind the United Nations to take action on behalf of stateless persons. He recalled, however, that the declaration should proclaim principles and leave matters of implementation to the proposed covenant. The mere fact of membership in the United Nations should make it incumbent upon States to abide by the principles set forth in the declaration.

The declaration should include neither mention of the duty of the United Nations in connexion with the problem of statelessness nor a statement that every human being had a right to nationality. Both ideas touched upon a delicate and complex subject, the study of which had already been recommended by the Economic and Social Council. Until the results of that study were known, no commitment of any sort should be made.

The Philippine delegation would therefore vote for the basic text of article 13.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that the purpose of the amendment presented by his delegation was clearly and unequivocally to define the word "arbitrarily", as used in the basic text of article 13.

He wished to stress the fact that the question of nationality – by which was meant a specific relationship between the State and the individual – fell entirely within the internal competence of each State. To grant nationality or to take it away was a prerogative of sovereign States with which no third party should interfere. It was contrary to Article 2, paragraph 7 of the Charter for the declaration to concern itself directly with such matters.

[356]

The thesis supported by the Bolivian representative, that no one could be deprived of his nationality in any circumstances, was unfortunately entirely impracticable. It was impossible in the world as it existed to force States to accept or tolerate nationals against their will.

It had been said that the word “arbitrarily” had a wider meaning than the word “illegally” and consequently afforded better protection. The USSR delegation did not share that view. That word was entirely open to subjective interpretation, whereas the phrase suggested by the USSR delegation was objective and afforded effective protection, for the legality of any action was easy to determine. Moreover, the vague wording of the original text might give the impression that it was for an authority other than the State to decide whether or not the latter had taken proper action. The USSR delegation could not accept such an interpretation. The United Nations was not a world Government set above the Governments of various States; it could not dictate to those States in matters in respect of which no obligations were imposed by the Charter.

He regretted that he was unable to reply to the United Kingdom representative because of the limited time allowed to each speaker.

MR. GARCÍA BAUER (Guatemala) stated that, while he sympathized with the idea expressed in part (c) of the French amendment, the declaration did not appear to be the proper place for it. He was consequently unable to support that part.

He was equally unable to accept the Bolivian and Uruguayan amendments with respect to the word “arbitrarily”. He agreed with the USSR representative that the word was vague and open to subjective interpretation, as was proved by the different meanings read into it by various delegations. The word “unjustly” gave rise to the same objection.

The delegation of Guatemala proposed that the word “arbitrarily” should be deleted without being replaced by any other word. The declaration would then establish a basic general principle; provision for such categories as naturalized citizens, which were the exception rather than the rule, could be made in the covenant.

He was opposed to the USSR amendment because it countenanced deprivation of nationality in certain cases and because it did not grant the right to change nationality.

He warmly supported the suggestion made by several delegations that article 13 should begin with the sentence: “Everyone has the right to a nationality.”

MR. WATT (Australia) remarked that two opposite views had manifested themselves in the debate: some representatives held that men could be deprived of their nationality in accordance with the laws of their countries while others thought that that should not be done in any circumstances.

He agreed with the United Kingdom representative that naturalized citizens represented a special problem which must be taken into account [357] in the declaration. A Government was entitled, for example, to deprive of their nationality naturalized citizens who had obtained that nationality either by fraud or with the intent of overthrowing the Government in question.

He would support the basic text of article 13, which appeared to be a happy compromise between the two extreme views expressed in the Committee.

The Australian delegation would also support the insertion of the sentence: "Everyone has the right to a nationality." As the Lebanese representative had said, the declaration should contain a statement of the basic rights of the individual; the implementation of those rights could be dealt with elsewhere.

The USSR amendment was not acceptable. The Committee would do well to note that, if the word "arbitrarily" were defined in article 13, that definition would apply to it in all the other articles in which it was used.

While the suggestion contained in part (c) of the French amendment was both pertinent and humane, the declaration should not mention duties of the United Nations; they were adequately described in the Charter. Moreover, the Economic and Social Council was already dealing with the question of statelessness. Part (a) of the French amendment might perhaps be modified by the addition of the words: "or to an equivalent status under the protection of the United Nations"; even that, however, was not the best way to achieve the purpose desired by the French representative.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) declared that he would vote in favour of the basic text of article 13 with the addition of the introductory sentence suggested by France, Lebanon and Uruguay for the reasons given by the Lebanese and Uruguayan representatives.

The interpretation put on the word "arbitrarily" by the USSR delegation was not acceptable. As had been made clear in the course of the debate, that word was intended to have a broader meaning than "illegally"; laws, too, could be arbitrary. Furthermore, it should be remembered that the word had been used throughout the declaration, and that a definition once given would apply wherever it appeared.

The USSR representative had apparently misunderstood the purpose of the declaration; that purpose was not to impose laws on any sovereign State, but to enable the people of a State to judge for themselves whether the laws under which they lived were in conformity with the principles of the declaration. If the Hitler regime were still in existence, the result of adopting the USSR amendment would be to justify the acts of that regime rather than to protect individuals against them. The Chilean delegation would not be able at any time to accept amendments of so restrictive a nature as those proposed by the USSR representative. Furthermore, it was strongly in favour of the right to change nationality, traditionally recognized on the American continent, and suppressed by the USSR amendment.

[358]

MR. CASSIN (France) felt that the basic text of article 13 should be maintained. The word “arbitrarily” which appeared in that text had a two-fold meaning: no one could be deprived of nationality contrary to existing laws, and those laws themselves must not be arbitrary. The use of that word was an admonition to Governments; it did not represent any encroachment upon their rights.

He emphasized the fact that, while the basic draft of article 13 was good, it did not go far enough. Although the members of the Committee remained government representatives, in the drafting of a declaration of universal import they met as an Assembly seeking the universal good. They could not close their eyes to the fact that, in an international order based on the principle of national sovereignty, the existence of persons rejected by their countries was a source of friction. The declaration should proclaim that every human being had the right to a nationality, just as it proclaimed that everyone had the right to marry; it was not called upon to implement either right.

With regard to the last part of his amendment, Mr. Cassin said that the fact that the Economic and Social Council was already seized of the matter was an argument in favour of rather than against, stating in the declaration, as a general principle, that the United Nations should concern itself with the fate of stateless persons. He would not, however, object to some other form of words which might be more acceptable to the Committee.

He would be glad to harmonize the first part of his amendment with the similar amendments prepared by the Lebanese and Uruguayan representatives. It might be preferable to retain the words “every human being”, in order to stress the human rather than the legal aspect of the right in question.

MR. DEMCHENKO (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) pointed out that all amendments to article 13 except the one presented by the USSR delegation were concerned to some extent with those who had no nationality. The USSR amendment, on the other hand, dealt with those who already had a nationality and who represented the vast majority, and sought to protect them legally against illegal deprivation of nationality.

The USSR amendment respected the principle of national sovereignty, which would be violated by the adoption of the idea that everyone had the right to a nationality. To oblige States to grant nationality to stateless persons was tantamount to interference in their internal affairs and was therefore contrary to the Charter.

Mr. Demchenko understood the USSR amendment to be a total substitution for the basic text of article 13, which meant that no mention would be made of the right to change nationality. As such a right applied to single cases, which were the exception and not the rule, it should not be included in the declaration, or it might be interpreted as an appeal and encouragement to those who wished to leave their country. Under the [359] Charter, it was the duty of the United Nations to promote respect for national Governments.

Certain representatives had opposed the USSR amendment because it stated that persons could be deprived of their nationality only in accordance with national laws. Mr. Demchenko was not aware of the existence of any other kind of law governing that subject.

In reply to the Philippine representative, he pointed out that the USSR amendment provided, by its reference to national law, the very guarantee of protection which the Philippine representative sought to secure.

As there were no more speakers on his list, the Chairman stated that the general debate on article 13 was closed.

The meeting rose at 1:20 p.m.

A/C.3/307/Rev.1/Add.1

6 November 1948

Additional articles proposed for the draft Declaration (E/800)

Addendum to document A/C.3/307/Rev.1

Yugoslavia: (A/C.3/233)

Insert the following three articles:

A

“Any person has the right to the recognition and protection of his nationality and to the free development of the nation to which he belongs.

“National communities which are in a state community with other nations are equal in national, political and social rights.”

B

“Any national minority, as an ethnical community, has the right to the full development of its ethnical culture and to the free use of its language. It is entitled to have these rights protected by the State.”

C

“The rights proclaimed in this Declaration also apply to any person belonging to the population of Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories.”

A/C.3/296/Rev.1/Corr.1

6 November 1948

Recapitulation of Amendments to Article 19 of the Draft Declaration (E/800)

Corrigendum to Document A/C.3/296/Rev.1

Delete the amendment presented by Yugoslavia which will be found in document A/C.3/307/Rev.1/Add.1.

A/C.3/SR.124<sup>89</sup>

6 November 1948

Summary Record of the Hundred and Twenty-Fourth Meeting [of the Third Committee]

Held at the Palais de Chaillot, Paris, on Saturday, 6 November
1948, at 10:30 a.m.

Chairman: MR. CHARLES MALIK (Lebanon).

48. Draft international declaration of human rights (E/800) (continued)

Article 13 (continued)

THE CHAIRMAN recalled that the general debate on article 13 and on the amendments to it, which were recapitulated in document A/C.3/286/Rev.1, was closed, and that the Cuban amendment (A/C.3/232) had been withdrawn (123rd meeting).

He stated that the various amendments would be put to the vote.

He put to the vote the Egyptian amendment (A/C.3/264).

That amendment was rejected by 26 votes to 1, with 8 abstentions.

Pointing out that the representatives of France (A/C.3/244), Lebanon (A/C.3/260) and Uruguay (A/C.3/268) had submitted almost identical amendments, the Chairman put their proposal for the insertion of a preliminary paragraph to the vote in the following form: "Everyone has the right to a nationality."

That amendment was adopted by 21 votes to 9, with 6 abstentions.

<sup>89</sup> The text of the document is from Official Records of the General Assembly, Third Session, 1948, pp. 359–67.

THE CHAIRMAN put the USSR amendment (E/800, page 33) to the vote.

That amendment was rejected by 26 votes to 7, with 3 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the Guatemalan amendment (123rd meeting) calling for the deletion of the word “arbitrarily”.

That amendment was rejected by 24 votes to 1, with 10 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the Bolivian amendment (123rd meeting) which proposed to transpose the word “arbitrarily” so that it would qualify only the denial of the right to change nationality.

[360]

That amendment was rejected by 24 votes to 5, with 13 abstentions.

MR. ANZE MATIENZO (Bolivia) stated, in explanation of his vote, that his delegation considered that any deprivation of nationality was arbitrary and that there could be no just laws prescribing that measure.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the Uruguayan amendment (A/C.3/268) to substitute the word “unjustly” for the word “arbitrarily”.

That amendment was rejected by 20 votes to 3, with 16 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the Turkish amendment (123rd meeting) to substitute the word “illegally” for the word “arbitrarily”.

That amendment was rejected by 24 votes to 9, with 7 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN stated that the Brazilian representative had submitted the following text (A/C.3/324), which was acceptable to the French representative, as a substitution for the third paragraph of the French amendment: “The fate of persons temporarily deprived of nationality should become the care of the United Nations.”

That sentence was to be added to the basic text of article 13. It was inspired by the ideas contained in the French amendment and represented a mere drafting change.

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America), MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics), MR. CONTOUMAS (Greece) and MR. AQUINO (Philippines), thought that the Brazilian amendment was of a substantive rather than drafting nature and could not therefore be put to the vote without a debate.

The word “care” implied that financial responsibilities would have to be assumed by the United Nations, whereas the word “concern”, which had been used in the French amendment, had implied moral responsibility. The Committee could not vote on any text which had financial implications without having before it an estimate prepared by the Secretary-General.

MR. DE ATHAYDE (Brazil) was prepared to replace the word “care” by the word “concern” which was, in fact, a better translation for the word préoccupations used in the French original. The word “concern” did not necessarily refer to concrete material care.

MR. KAMINSKY (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) remarked that, under rule 142 of the rules of procedure, the Committee could not vote on the Brazilian amendment until a financial estimate of the costs involved had been prepared.

Moreover, the amendment dealt with a matter which was not intimately connected with the substance of article 13, and might well be considered separately. He consequently asked that the vote should be postponed.

[361]

THE CHAIRMAN said that moral rather than material responsibility was involved, as the Brazilian representative had explained. Furthermore, estimates of any financial implications of any of the separate articles in the declaration need not be before the Committee until a vote was taken on the declaration as a whole.

He consequently ruled that the Brazilian amendment could be put to the vote immediately.

MR. KAMINSKY (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) appealed from the Chairman’s ruling.

The appeal was rejected by 24 votes to 8, with 10 abstentions.

MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) stated that he would vote against the Brazilian amendment because he could see no reason to distinguish between those temporarily deprived of nationality and those permanently deprived of it.

THE CHAIRMAN put the Brazilian amendment (A/C.3/324) to the vote.

That amendment was rejected by 31 votes to 6, with 3 abstentions.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) regretted that the Committee had seen fit to reject the USSR amendment, the intention of which had been to emphasize the fact that the question of nationality was essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of every State and that, under Article 2, paragraph 7 of the Charter, the United Nations could not set itself up as a judge of whether the actions of a State were arbitrary or well founded. That amendment would, moreover, have provided a far better legal basis for any person wishing to dispute the justice of an action taken against him than was supplied by the basic draft of article 13.

While USSR law, like that of most countries, provided for a change of nationality, it was wrong to mention such a right in the declaration. The United Nations should not set the seal of its approval on what was, in many cases, an unpatriotic action. The USSR delegation was utterly unable to accept such an attitude.

If the part of article 13 dealing with the right to change nationality were maintained, he would have to abstain from voting on the article. He requested that the article be put to the vote in three parts.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the first part of article 13, reading as follows:

“Everyone has the right to a nationality.”

That part was adopted by 31 votes to 1, with 11 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the second part of article 13, reading as follows:

“No one shall be arbitrarily deprived of his nationality.”

That part was adopted unanimously.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the third part of article 13, reading as follows: “or denied the right to change his nationality”.

[362]

That part was adopted by 36 votes to 6, with 1 abstention.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the whole of article 13, as amended.

Article 13, as amended, was adopted by 38 votes to none, with 7 abstentions.

MR. BARODY (Saudi Arabia) remarked that he had voted in favour of the USSR amendment because he was prepared to vote in favour of any text which made it clear that the United Nations should not interfere with the domestic legislation of States.

He had supported the Turkish amendment for the same reason and because he preferred precise words to vague ones.

MRS. NEWLANDS (New Zealand) had voted in favour of the first sentence, in spite of the pertinent objections to it raised by the United Kingdom representative at the previous meeting, because she felt that it proclaimed a right that should be included in a declaration which was intended as a statement of general principles and was not supposed to contain provisions for implementation.

MR. DEMCHENKO (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) had voted in favour of the second part on the understanding that the word “arbitrarily” meant in a manner other than as provided for in the laws of the country concerned.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) had voted against the Brazilian amendment because he considered that the idea it contained was implicit in the first sentence of article 13 and was therefore unnecessary.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) had voted in favour of article 13 and all its parts because, in his opinion, none of them constituted an illegal interference with the internal affairs of States. While he agreed with the USSR representative that nationality was one of the subjects covered in Article 2, paragraph 7 of the Charter, – a text to which his delegation attached the greatest importance – he pointed out that, by accepting any international agreement, a State surrendered some measure of its national sovereignty. It could not be said, therefore, that the Charter forbade the United Nations to deal with the question of nationality.

MR. APPADORAI (India) accepted the principle that everyone had the right to a nationality, but had abstained from voting because the implications of that principle would become sufficiently clear only after the Economic and Social Council had completed its study of the subject.

MR. KAMINSKY (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) had voted in favour of the first part of the second sentence on the understanding that the word “arbitrarily” meant “in any other manner or in any other case than as provided for in the laws of the country concerned”.

He had voted against the remainder of that sentence because he considered that a mention, in the declaration, of the right to change nationality was an infringement of the sovereign rights of States.

[363]

Article 14<sup>1</sup>

THE CHAIRMAN announced that the basic text of article 14 and the amendments thereto were recapitulated in document A/C.3/287.

MISS BERNARDINO (Dominion Republic) hoped that a member of the Commission on Human Rights would explain the previous history of article 14 to the Committee, particularly the grounds for not mentioning divorce in paragraph 1.

MR. BARODY (Saudi Arabia) said that the word “full” in paragraph 1 of the basic text was ambiguous, because it did not necessarily mean “of full age according to the law”. In any case, the law was not the same in all countries or even within all parts of the same country, as, for example, in the United States of America. “Full age” might also cover aged and decrepit couples whose marriage might not be desirable.

To cover both those objections, he had proposed (A/C.3/240) to substitute for the word “full” the words “legal matrimonial” and qualify it by inserting the phrase “within every country”.

MR. CASSIN (France) said that he had proposed (A/C.3/244) that the word “both” should be deleted from paragraph 2 because it was obviously superfluous.

Concerning the article as a whole, he said that the basic rights in relation to marriage were often disregarded. It was the specific act which led to the foundation of a family.

The representative of Saudi Arabia had rightly brought up the question of the meaning of “full age”. The Commission had intended it to mean the age at which persons were capable of procreating. States were competent to decide that age according to local conditions.

The reason for specifying that marriage might be contracted only with the full consent of the intending spouses was that the custom still existed whereby parents, guardians or others arranged marriages without the consent of the spouses. Marriage was a basic right; it should not be negotiated like a treaty or a business deal.

The Commission had devoted particular attention to the question of equality of rights as between man and woman. It had agreed that such equality should apply at the moment of contract, during the marriage and at the time of dissolution. The USSR amendment (E/800, page 33) specified only one form of dissolution – divorce – whereas there might be several forms. The Commission had not specifically mentioned divorce, contenting itself with a broad general formula “as to marriage”, because divorce did not exist in some countries and because it had wished to respect the varying legislation on marriage in all countries. The whole question of divorce was a matter of slow evolution. The United Nations should be extremely careful about the way in which it dealt with the matter. The United Nations could express an ideal standard; but it should leave it to the countries themselves to progress at their own rates of evolution. The Economic and Social Council had already set up a commission on the status of women, which was still dealing with equality between men and women. The statements in the declaration should not be too detailed.

<sup>[1]</sup> Article 17 of the draft universal declaration of human rights (A/777).

[364]

The Commission had adopted paragraph 3 unanimously. He would vote for the Commission’s text of article 14, with the minor change proposed in the French amendment; and he hoped that the Committee, by adopting the article unanimously, would show its approval of the Commission’s work.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) explained that he had a practical end in view in proposing the addition of the words “free and” before the words “full consent” (A/C.3/260). Parents could force a girl to give her full consent to a marriage she did not wish, but, logically, they could not force her to give her free consent.

He would not insist upon the first part of his amendment calling for a transposition of the paragraphs. He had thought that it might be more logical to state a general principle about the family before covering the details.

MR. CAMPOS ORTIZ (Mexico) said he realized that the prohibition against discrimination which he proposed to add (A/C.3/266) was a repetition of article 2. Admittedly, that technical objection existed; but he was convinced that certain ideas should be repeated again and again if the need arose. The prohibition against discrimination, which had always been observed in Mexican history and law, would strengthen the article immeasurably in the eyes of the common man. The declaration was addressed to the common man, not to diplomats and technicians. He urged that the value of such an appeal should override the technical objection. There had been notorious cases of discrimination in marriage, particularly by the Nazis. To repeat the prohibition would strengthen the immediate appeal of the article.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) pointed out that the Preamble to the Charter expressly declared the equality of the rights of men and women. To achieve that equality was one of the main aims of the United Nations. The USSR delegation had always advocated the fullest and most consistent equality between men and women. It was essential to declare that equality with reference to entering into marriage because even then it did not exist in certain countries. In Japan, for example, girls who had not even reached puberty were still virtually sold into marriage. Equality should also be guaranteed during marriage and when the family was founded. It should apply to both property rights and to the bringing up of the children.

[365]

In USSR law, all property acquired before marriage was held separately, but everything acquired subsequently was held in common. The principle was fully in accordance with the Charter. Divorce was often a tragedy for women. The husband might take the entire property with him; that was legal in some countries. The law should defend the economically weaker partner – the woman. Equality of rights should, therefore, be upheld at the time of divorce even more than on entering into marriage and during marriage. Even in certain parts of some advanced countries a woman was still a chattel. That was unjust.

He would support the Mexican amendment. It was most opportune: in certain parts of the United States, for example, mixed marriages were heavily penalized.

MRS. CORBET (United Kingdom) said she would vote for the Commission's text.

The USSR amendment to paragraph 2 and the Mexican amendment were superfluous because their substance had already been covered by article 2. To insert them in article 14 might weaken the effect of article 2 in qualifying all the other articles in the declaration.

The USSR amendment to paragraph 3 was equally superfluous. There was a danger, too, that it might be interpreted as giving the State overriding authority over the family.

There was no great objection to the Lebanese amendment to transpose the paragraphs; but the present order gave a logical development.

She opposed the Egyptian and Saudi Arabian amendments because the words "full age" clearly implied full physical development. The Saudi Arabian amendment also omitted the idea of equal rights as between men and women. With regard to the English text of the French amendment she preferred to use the Commission's translation of the word contracté – "entered into". The deletion of the word "both" was logical.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) said that he would support the USSR amendment, subject to a drafting change in the French text. The words doivent jouir should be substituted for the word jouissent. The present tense of the verb might give the impression that it was a fact that rights were already enjoyed, whereas, in reality, they were simply desired by progressive persons. The enjoyment of the rights mentioned had not yet been achieved in some countries. In his own country there had been considerable progress in recent years; political equality was a fact, and the last remnants of inequality in civil matters were fast vanishing.

The Saudi Arabian amendment could not be accepted; it was both a truism and a tautology. The Committee should not limit itself to restricting an international declaration of principles to what already existed in the various legal systems.

[366]

MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) supported the Mexican amendment. It was most important to make the strongest possible appeal to the common man. He disagreed with the representative of the United Kingdom that that addition to article 14 would weaken the effect of article 2. He suggested, however, that some form of words such as “or any other limitation” should be added to the Mexican text. There might be cases of limitation due to political causes or to class distinctions.

MR. DE ATHAYDE (Brazil) said he would vote for the basic text. Paragraph 3 was, however, too vague. He proposed that the words “of the law” should be added to qualify protection.

MR. KAYALY (Syria) said he would vote for the basic text. He felt, however, that the words “full age” were ambiguous and unsatisfactory from the medical-legal point of view, since they did not state what that age was. He would accept the word “full”, however, if it were understood to be equivalent to “maturity”, but he shared the doubt raised by the representative of Saudi Arabia.

He preferred the words “free consent” to the words “full consent” in the basic text.

He regretted that paragraph 1 omitted any mention of the physical fitness of the intending spouses. He would have liked to see some expression included which would have required some form of premarital medical examination.

He agreed that the family should be guaranteed protection and hoped that some provision for that would be written into the measures for implementation.

MR. CONTOUMAS (Greece) said that he would vote for the basic text. He agreed with the representative of France that marriage viewed in the widest sense included divorce.

He asked whether it was the intention of the USSR amendment that the first paragraph of the basic text should remain intact. If so, there would be a repetition.

MISS ZULOAGA (Venezuela) supported the Mexican amendment. The repetition of the prohibition against discrimination – which was in accordance with her country’s Constitution – would strengthen the article.

She agreed with the Uruguayan suggestion that the phrase should be expanded and completed.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) could not agree with the United Kingdom representative that the USSR amendment to paragraph 3, suggesting the addition of the words “by society and the State”, was unnecessary because the idea was already implicit in that paragraph. On the contrary, unless it was explicitly stated that it was for the State and society to protect the family, which was a natural unit of society and the fate of which might determine the fate of a nation, a family in need of protection would not know where to turn. There was no reason to oppose the clear and simple idea contained [367] in the USSR amendment, which imposed an obligation on the State to ensure the right granted in paragraph 3.

It had been remarked that the words in paragraph 1, “rights as to marriage”, referred also to the dissolution of marriage. The Committee should not be afraid, however, to make an explicit mention of divorce. That mention was far from superfluous, as the inequality of men and women was more pronounced in the case of divorce than in the other phases of marriage. In countries in which divorce was practised, women should have the same rights in that respect as men.

He accepted the drafting change proposed by the Belgian representative.

The meeting rose at 1:15 p.m.

A/C.3/325

8 November 1948

Original Text: English, French

Belgium: Compromise amendment to Article 15 of the draft
Declaration (E/800)

Replace the two paragraphs of article 15 by the following text:

“Within the limits of public interest, everyone is entitled to own property alone as well as in association with others.”

A/C.3/SR.125<sup>90</sup>

8 November 1948

Summary Record of the Hundred and Twenty-Fifth Meeting [of the Third Committee]

Held at the Palais de Chaillot, Paris, on Monday

8 November 1948, at 10:45 a.m.

Chairman: MR. CHARLES MALIK (Lebanon).

<sup>90</sup> The text of the document is from Official Records of the General Assembly, Third Session, 1948, pp. 367–79.

49. Draft international declaration of human rights (E/800) (continued)

Article 14 (continued)

MRS. BEGTRUP (Denmark) thought article 14 one of the most important in the declaration, particularly to women, for whom marriage was not only a family tie but also a decisive factor in their social life.

For that reason particular care should be given to the study of the position of women in connexion with marriage and to the drawing up of regulations defining the legal aspect of marriage and its possible dissolution.

Her delegation thought it necessary, moreover, in order to lay stress on the dignity of the wife and mother, to indicate that husband and wife were on a footing of absolute equality, both legally and morally. It was also important to emphasize in article 14 the fact that the dignity of the human person could only be safeguarded if every possibility of discrimination was eliminated.

Referring to the proposed amendments, she asked the Chairman of the Commission on Human Rights to define the exact meaning of "equal rights as to marriage". For if the term "marriage" covered the case of a dissolution of the contract, article 14 should not contain the word "divorce". If, however, that idea were not contained in the text, her delegation would prefer the amendment submitted by the USSR (E/800, page 33), which specified divorce.

Finally, she supported the Lebanese (A/C.3/260) and Mexican (A/C.3/266) amendments, which made the text of the article clearer and more easily understandable to everyone.

MR. CARRERA ANDRADE (Ecuador) recalled that the authors of the various amendments to article 14 had explained the significance of equal [368] rights in marriage and he stressed the fact that those rights should be upheld at every stage of marriage, in other words, during marriage and after the dissolution of the contract. It was necessary therefore to make that article complete by introducing the question of divorce.

Generally speaking, his delegation wished to keep the text of paragraph 1 after substituting the expression "legal age" for the expression "full age".

He also supported the Mexican amendment (A/C.3/266) and the Uruguayan amendment to it (124th meeting) which emphasized the need for abolishing all discrimination in marriage, as well as the USSR amendments.

He proposed that in paragraph 2, amended as suggested by the Lebanese delegation, the expression "of both. . . spouses" should be replaced by the expression "of both contracting parties", which he considered more legal.

As it considered the protection of the family by the State to be recognized by the constitution of every country, his delegation approved the addition to paragraph 3 of the expression "by the State" (E/800, page 33). It was not essential, however, to mention in that article the protection of society, recommended in addition by the USSR amendment, for society had no definite means at its disposal to ensure such protection.

Pointing out the importance of the principles set forth in article 14, MR. BEAUFORT (Netherlands) could not accept the addition to paragraph 2 proposed by the USSR delegation. The first paragraph dealt adequately with the equal rights of both spouses as to marriage. There was therefore no need to repeat that same idea in paragraph 2.

Without wishing to enter into any discussion on the subject of divorce, he disapproved of discriminatory measures in that event. The case of men and women should be dealt with on an equal basis.

Pointing out that it would be deplorable to mention divorce in article 14, he regretted that certain people founded a family without realizing the importance of that act. Divorce was a disrupting factor in society and to mention unnecessarily and explicitly in the declaration of human rights the principle of the equal rights of both spouses as to divorce would imply, at least to ordinary men all over the world, that the United Nations approved divorce on the same footing as marriage.

Referring to the second USSR amendment, he agreed that society and the State were responsible for protecting the family. He was afraid, however, that to adopt that amendment might give Governments a pretext to interfere with the natural rights of the family which were, in his opinion, beyond the reach of State laws. He could not therefore vote in favour of the USSR amendment.

His delegation approved the Lebanese amendment, but thought the one submitted by Saudi Arabia (A/C.3/240) could result in the State making the right to marry and found a family conditional upon unacceptable restrictions.

[369]

The Egyptian amendment (A/C.3/264), in his view, ignored the principle of the equal rights of both spouses as to marriage and consequently could not be adopted.

Finally, he wondered whether the Mexican amendment did not detract from the importance of the solemn declaration on the general principle of non-discrimination made in article 2. The Committee should reject that amendment so as not to give the impression that the provisions of article 2 did not apply to other articles of the declaration, article 14, for instance.

MISS BERNARDINO (Dominican Republic) considered that, from the discussion which had just taken place, it was evident that article 14 was not worded sufficiently clearly and might give rise to an interpretation which would not correspond to the principles set forth in the first few articles of the declaration.

Her delegation wanted the idea of absolute equality between men and women as to marriage, which had been accepted by all delegations, to be specifically expressed, for the nations and individuals should be able to rely not only on the spirit but also on the letter of the declaration. There were countries which had not yet granted women absolute equality from the legal point of view. The ultimate goal of article 14 should therefore be to influence governments to revise their legislation, if necessary, in order to abolish any disability affecting women in connexion with marriage.

The delegation of the Dominican Republic would vote in favour of the Mexican amendment, which was based on the most elementary human justice. It would also vote in favour of the Lebanese amendment which gave a more liberal interpretation to the article. It agreed with the French delegation (A/C.3/244) that it was unnecessary to say "both spouses".

Finally, it would support the amendment submitted by the USSR delegation, but thought the concept of equality as regards divorce should be mentioned in the first paragraph, together with equality as regards marriage.

MR. BARODY (Saudi Arabia) recalled that, at the previous meeting, he had reserved the right to explain the second part of the amendment submitted by his delegation.

Before doing so, however, he wished to point out, in reply to the objections raised to the first part of that amendment, that, in English, the expression "full age" did not necessarily include the idea of marriageable age, which the authors of the text had certainly had in mind. The expression "legal matrimonial age", proposed by his delegation, took into account the physiological aspect of the question, for in practically no country was the union of persons of non-marriageable age allowed. Moreover, exceptions to that rule could only be rectified, where they did exist, by national legislation and not by a declaration such as the one which the Committee was called upon to draw up.

If, however, certain delegations had doubts on the subject, his delegation would not object to introducing into the English text of its amendment the word "mature" suggested by the Syrian representative.

[370]

Neither would it insist on the retention of the words "within every country", which had been included with the sole purpose of taking more fully into account the differences existing between the national legislations of various countries. His delegation would agree to the substitution of "legal age" for "legal matrimonial age", as had been suggested.

The object of the second part of the amendment submitted by his delegation was to substitute in the first paragraph the expression "are entitled to the full rights as defined in the marriage laws of their country" for "are entitled to equal rights as to marriage". His delegation did not necessarily reject the idea of equality contained in the basic text when it proposed to substitute the words "the full rights" for “equal rights”, for it considered that the rights of men and women as to marriage should be assessed in qualitative rather than quantitative terms. It was for that reason that the respective rights of each sex were so clearly defined in all civil codes. Certain rights were identical for both men and women whereas others were different, either for reasons of a biological nature or because they referred to activities and responsibilities which were necessarily not the same for men and women. Thus an expectant mother should enjoy certain rights and privileges which could not be granted a man, whereas a man, generally speaking, enjoyed the right, not recognized for a woman, of passing on his name to his descendants. Many other instances could be quoted.

In Saudi Arabia, marriage constituted a sort of social contract defined by law and that system had successfully survived some fourteen centuries. A Moslem woman could own, inherit and dispose of property, and that without her husband's consent. In the event of a divorce, she automatically received a sum of money which the husband had agreed to pay before their marriage was celebrated. Her material fate did not depend therefore on the decision of a tribunal, a decision often long delayed in some countries. Those two instances were sufficient illustration of the extent to which Islamic law was explicit on the smallest details of marriage.

He wished, in that connexion, to emphasize the fact that apparently the authors of the draft declaration had, for the most part, taken into consideration only the standards recognized by western civilization and had ignored more ancient civilizations which were past the experimental stage, and the institutions of which, for example, marriage, had proved their wisdom down through the centuries. It was not for the Committee to proclaim the superiority of one civilization over all others or to establish uniform standards for all the countries in the world.

His delegation would therefore abide by the second part of its amendment, as it considered that the matrimonial traditions of every country should be respected to the same degree.

MRS. KALINOWSKA (Poland) stated that her delegation would vote in favour of the Mexican [371] amendment, in the modified form proposed by the Uruguayan delegation (124th meeting), because it introduced a fundamental idea inherent in a true concept of democracy. Since discrimination of one type led to another, the Polish delegation thought it logical to condemn, together with discrimination on grounds of sex, all other forms of discrimination that might affect freedom in marriage.

The weakness of the arguments adduced to prove the inequality of the sexes had been revealed in practice. In Poland, from the end of the seventeenth century onwards and especially during the Second World War, women had shown that they were able to play the same part as men in all spheres. For that reason the Polish delegation would like to see included together with the concept of the equality of rights, that of the equality of responsibility, which was recognized in her country in the laws on the family and marriage.

Poland, though it opposed easy divorce, would vote in favour of the first USSR amendment, since it was important to be explicit on that point. The man in the street would not, of course, ponder all the shades of meaning in the text, and if it was desired to give him the assurance that equality would obtain in cases of divorce, that assurance must be given unequivocally.

The Polish delegation would also vote for the second USSR amendment. There were countless cases in which the family needed the protection of society and the State: it had to be assisted through special provisions relating to expectant mothers, nurseries for infants, food priorities in emergencies or in under-developed countries, and the like. The question might also have other aspects: by expressly laying upon the State the obligation of assuring the protection of the family, it might perhaps be possible to prevent expectant mothers and babies from being put into concentration camps, as unfortunately still happened in Franco Spain or Greece, for instance.

The Polish delegation would vote against the amendments submitted by Saudi Arabia and Egypt since their adoption would imply a denial of the principle which it was proposed to establish.

It would vote for the Lebanese proposal, which it considered satisfactory.

Finally, the Polish delegation would prefer the retention of the formula "with the full consent of both intending spouses" since it conveyed more fully the idea of absolute equality between the sexes upon which article 14 was based.

She regretted that the United Kingdom representative should have opposed the USSR amendment since she had hoped all women would wish to vote for proposals affirming the equality of rights between men and women.

By adopting some excellent amendments, the Committee had the opportunity of improving a text which was already fairly satisfactory, and she would appeal to all delegations to contribute [372] by their votes to the adoption of a principle essential to the progress of humanity.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) was in favour of article 14 as adopted by the Commission on Human Rights.

The latter had discussed at length the term "as to marriage" and had decided that it covered all phases of marriage.<sup>1</sup> The USSR amendment consequently added nothing to article 14.

Moreover, if the average person read the declaration, he would have the impression that the General Assembly of the United Nations had put marriage and divorce on the same footing. But marriage was an institution, whereas divorce was merely an exceptional and regrettable aspect of that institution.

He did not oppose the second USSR amendment, since he thought it was the duty of the State to protect the family.

He was in favour of the amendment submitted by Saudi Arabia, since it added precision to the basic text. He also favoured the French amendment.

The Egyptian amendment did not seem to him acceptable, since it omitted certain essential factors.

Finally, the Lebanese delegation thought it would be useful to include in article 14 a reference to the principle of non-discrimination. Since, however, it did not know how far the Mexican amendment on that point would impair the efficacy of article 2, it would abstain from voting upon it.

MISS ZULOAGA (Venezuela) emphasized that in national law the motives justifying divorce were not the same for men and women. The USSR amendment consequently gave article 14 greater legal precision.

The Venezuelan delegation had always preferred conciseness, considering that too many details would weaken the declaration of human rights. In the case in point, however, the USSR amendment, far from weakening the text of the article, enlarged its scope.

It was the same with the Mexican amendment on non-discrimination. The Venezuelan delegation had no hesitation in approving it, the more so as the Constitution of Venezuela provided, in its article 47, for State protection of the family “whatever its origin”.

MR. APPADORAI (India) expressed his full approval of the basic text of article 14 with the amendment proposed by the French delegation. He would request the Chairman to take a separate vote on the proposed deletion of the word “both” in paragraph 2.

He was unable to vote for the amendment submitted by Saudi Arabia, as it was contrary to the spirit of the first paragraph and as he preferred the term “of full age” to “of legal matrimonial age”.

While approving, its underlying principles, the Indian delegation did not believe that the Mexican amendment would be sufficient to abolish all discrimination.

<sup>[1]</sup> See documents E/CN.4/SR.58 and E/CN.4/SR.62.

[373]

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America), replying to the question asked by the representative of Denmark, pointed out that the Commission on Human Rights had interpreted the term “marriage” in its widest sense. Article 14, in its original draft, dealt with all stages of marriage from the contract to the divorce.

It was in her opinion unnecessary to mention within that article the principle of non-discrimination, which had been adequately covered in article 2 of the declaration.

The second part of the USSR amendment did not seem necessary since the word “protection” used in the original text also implied the means of ensuring that protection.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that the Committee must take all the necessary steps to ensure absolute equality between men and women. Article 14 of the declaration of human rights should therefore not be confined to half-measures.

The objections raised by the representatives of the United States and Lebanon were not convincing. The purpose of his amendments was not to encourage divorce but to ensure the equality of husband and wife during marriage and in the case of divorce, as well as the effective protection of the family by society and by the State.

As regards the equality of husband and wife, in divorce, the USSR amendments took the human factor into account, for the refusal to grant a divorce in the case of a family crisis was tantamount to a flagrant denial of freedom.

In answer to the United States representative, he would point out that it was not enough to state, in the declaration, that the family had the right to protection without specifying by what means that protection would be ensured.

MRS. BEGRUP (Denmark) thanked the United States representative for the explanations she had given of the term “as to marriage”. She considered it necessary, however, to point out that the French term was better than the English, and suggested the latter might be made clearer if the words “equal rights as to marriage” were replaced by the words “equal matrimonial rights”.

Her delegation would vote in favour of the Lebanese and Mexican amendments.

MR. CASSIN (France) believed that the Committee should work for social progress and at the same time so draft the declaration of human rights as to make it acceptable to all. Bearing those considerations in mind, he thought the basic text of article 14 was satisfactory.

He agreed with the representative of India that the term “of full age” was preferable to “of legal matrimonial age” proposed by the representative of Saudi Arabia. If that expression were used, child marriages, recognized as legal in certain countries, would be justifiable.

The expression “as to marriage” was the widest that could be used; it covered the whole of [374] married life, that is, the dissolution of marriage as well as marriage. Countries which had divorce laws could not after all impose the use of the word “divorce” in the declaration when certain national constitutions did not admit it. That was why he preferred the term “as to marriage”, which was very satisfactory.

He would be prepared to accept the Lebanese amendment on condition that its purport was to substitute the word “free” for the word “full” and not to use both words in juxtaposition.

In answer to the representative of Ecuador, he pointed out that he was prepared to replace the words des deux époux (of both spouses) by the words des futurs époux (of the intending spouses); indeed the latter term corresponded exactly to the term used in the English text.

As to paragraph 3 of article 14, he felt that the text was adequate if it specified the need for protection. Such protection should not be provided solely by the State; it must be provided at all stages from the social group to the world community not only by public bodies but also by private or religious institutions, wherever they existed.

The French delegation would vote in favour of the basic text together with the Lebanese amendment which constituted a minor drafting change. The other amendments, though extremely interesting, were in his opinion unnecessary.

MRS. IKRAMULLAH (Pakistan) said all civilized countries could accept article 14, which she thought was designed to prevent child marriage and marriages contracted without the consent of both parties, and also to ensure protection of women after divorce and the safeguarding of their property.

Since the laws of Pakistan recognized all the rights referred to in article 14, her delegation was prepared to accept it. She would wish to make it clear, however, that "equal rights" must not mean "identical rights". Identical rights for women as to marriage could in some cases be a liability to them rather than an asset. That point had been ably put by the representative of Saudi Arabia, and the Pakistan delegation would have been the more ready to support his amendment as the Mohammedan laws of marriage in all countries where they are applied gave adequate safeguards to women. Unfortunately however, she could not support the amendment, as she feared it would enable countries with laws discriminating against women to continue to apply them.

The Pakistan delegation opposed the Mexican amendment because it completely disregarded the religious factor as a hindrance to marriage.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the Egyptian amendment which substituted the following text for that of article 14 (A/C.3/264):

[375]

"Everyone has the right to found a family, which is a fundamental element of society, and is entitled to the protection of that family."

The amendment was rejected by 36 votes to none, with 3 abstentions.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said he had voted against the amendment because it did not take into account the essential concept of the equality of men and women in all questions relating to marriage.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the proposal submitted by the delegation of Uruguay at the 124th meeting to add the words "or any other limitation" at the end of the Mexican amendment.

MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) explained that the aim of his proposal was to condemn not only limitations due to race, nationality or religion, but also such limitations as might be due to class distinction or political beliefs.

MR. GARCÍA BAUER (Guatemala) stated he would be unable to vote in favour of the proposal submitted by the delegation of Uruguay, as acceptance of the principle it involved would remove every possibility of marriages being prevented for legitimate and justifiable reasons, for example reasons based on medical objections.

The proposal was rejected by 22 votes to 7, with 11 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the amendment submitted by the delegation of Mexico (A/C.3/266), proposing to insert at the beginning of article 14, before the words “men and women”, the following words: “Without any limitation due to race, nationality or religion”.

MRS. KALINOWSKA (Poland) requested that the vote on that amendment should be taken by roll-call.

A vote was taken by roll-call, as follows:

In favour: Argentina, Burma, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Chile, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Ethiopia, Guatemala, Haiti, India, Mexico, Norway, Peru, Poland, Sweden, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Uruguay, Venezuela, Yugoslavia.

Against: Australia, Belgium, Canada, China, France, Greece, Honduras, Iraq, Luxembourg, Netherlands, New Zealand, Pakistan, Syria, United Kingdom, United States of America.

Abstentions: Afghanistan, Bolivia, Brazil, Iran, Lebanon, Saudi Arabia.

The amendment was adopted by 22 votes to 15, with 6 abstentions.

MR. ANZE MATIENZO (Bolivia) stated that, while he was in agreement with the substance of the Mexican agreement, he had abstained from voting because he thought that the principle of non-discrimination was already established in article 2 of the declaration; it was therefore unnecessary to restate that principle each time a risk of discrimination was involved.

[376]

MR. CONTOUMAS (Greece) also agreed with the substance of the Mexican amendment, but had voted against it for the reason given by the representative of Bolivia.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the new text of paragraph 1 of article 14 proposed by the representative of Saudi Arabia (A/C.3/240). The text would be voted upon in two parts.

He put to the vote the first part of the amendment: "Men and women of legal matrimonial age within every country have the right to marry and to found a family."

That part of the amendment was rejected by 24 votes to 4, with 7 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the second part of the amendment: "and are entitled to the full rights as defined in the marriage laws of their country".

That part of the amendment was rejected by 38 votes to 1, with 6 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the Syrian proposal to replace the word "full" in the English text of paragraph 1 of article 14 by the word "mature".

The proposal was rejected by 22 votes to 6, with 12 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the Danish proposal to replace the words "equal rights as to marriage" in paragraph 1 by "equal matrimonial rights", in the English text.

The proposal was rejected by 19 votes to 7, with 13 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the amendment submitted by the USSR delegation (E/800, page 33) proposing the addition, at the end of paragraph 2, of the sentence: "Men and women shall enjoy equal rights both during marriage and when divorced."

The amendment was adopted by 17 votes to 16, with 9 abstentions.

MR. CONTOUMAS (Greece) agreed with the substance of the amendment, but had voted against it because he thought that it constituted an unnecessary repetition, divorce being already covered by the formula "as to marriage" in paragraph 1.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the Lebanese amendment (A/C.3/260) proposing the insertion of the words "free and" before the words "full consent" in paragraph 2.

The amendment was adopted by 36 votes to none, with 5 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the proposal submitted by the representative of Ecuador for the substitution, in paragraph 2, of the words "contracting parties" for the word "spouses".

The proposal was rejected by 27 votes to 13, with 3 abstentions.

There being no objections, it was agreed that the French text should read des futurs époux and the English text "of the intending spouses".

[377]

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the second part of the amendment submitted by the USSR, proposing the addition of the words “by society and the State” at the end of paragraph 3 of article 14.

MRS. KALINOWSKA (Poland) requested that the vote on that amendment be taken in parts.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the USSR proposal to add the words “by society” at the end of paragraph 3.

That proposal was adopted by 22 votes to 13.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the USSR proposal to add the words “and the State”.

That proposal was adopted by 25 votes to 12, with 5 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN then put to the vote the full text of article 14 as amended.

Article 14, as amended, was adopted by 37 votes to 3, with 3 abstentions.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) explained that his delegation had voted against the adoption of article 11, partly because it repeated the concept of equality between men and women twice for no reason at all, and partly because while affirming the principle of equality during the actual period of marriage and at its dissolution, it did not provide for the need to ensure such equality also at the time of the conclusion of the marriage contract.

The Lebanese delegation reserved its right to put the question before the General Assembly.

MR. CASSIN (France) stated that his delegation had been compelled to vote against article 14, not on account of its substance, but because it was unable to accept the text as it stood.

Referring to the French text, he pointed out in particular that, according to paragraph 1 of article 14, men and women were entitled to droits égaux (English text: “equal rights”), while under paragraph 2 they were to enjoy the mêmes droits (English text: “equal rights”). Those two terms were close in meaning but not identical, and it was uncertain which of them would prevail in cases of legal dispute. The declaration of human rights had to be clear and explicit, and no inconsistencies could be tolerated in the text.

MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) said his delegation had voted in favour of the USSR amendment because it considered that in questions of marriage, equality was the minimum condition to be assured to women. In Uruguay, divorce was granted to women on request, without grounds having to be produced, so that women’s rights in that respect were superior to those of men. That was a mark of social progress, of which Uruguay was rightly proud.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) supported the French representative's remarks concerning the addition to paragraph 1 of article 14 of the clause on non-discrimination in respect of race, nationality or religion proposed by the Mexican delegation. Like Mr. Cassin, he thought that the clause might be taken to imply that all grounds for discrimination as to marriage not cited in article 14 could be maintained, which could not fail to [378] weaken the general principle of non-discrimination affirmed in article 2 of the declaration.

Nevertheless, the Belgian delegation, which had voted against the Mexican amendment, had supported the adoption of article 14 as a whole, in a spirit of conciliation.

MR. WATT (Australia) stated that his delegation had voted in favour of the adoption of article 14 despite some doubts arising from the somewhat unfortunate wording of that article.

As regards the various amendments, the Australian delegation had voted against the first USSR amendment which merely reiterated an idea already mentioned in the text; it had voted against the second USSR amendment because it thought that protection of the family should not be limited to that offered by society and the State, and against the Mexican amendment because it considered it inadvisable to reaffirm, in a rather restricted form, a principle already established in article 2 of the declaration.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) pointed out that his delegation had not taken part in the general discussion on article 14, as its point of view had been adequately expressed by many other delegations.

The delegation of Chile had voted in favour of the adoption of that article despite the gaps mentioned by the representative of France, because it approved of it in principle. Nevertheless, it hoped that amendments to rectify drafting errors would be proposed before the plenary meeting at which the draft declaration would be submitted to the General Assembly.

The Chilean delegation had voted in favour of the Mexican amendment because it thought that in drafting a declaration of human rights account should be taken of the fact that reality did not always correspond to the principles it was intended to establish.

It had also voted in favour of the USSR amendment, which proclaimed equality as to the dissolution of marriage, without, however, upholding the right of divorce.

MR. MACDONNELL (Canada) had voted against the Mexican amendment, because he considered that the subject had already been dealt with in article 2.

MR. BARODY (Saudi Arabia) stated that his delegation had voted in favour of the Syrian delegation's proposal to substitute the words "mature age" for "full age" in the English text, as the former specified the physical pre-condition of marriage while the latter did not necessarily refer either to the legal or the marriageable age.

On the other hand, the delegation of Saudi Arabia had not cast its vote in favour of article 14 as a whole because it could not agree, for reasons already stated, to any provisions of that article which might possibly conflict with Islamic law.

MR. CHANG (China) stated that his delegation had abstained from taking part in the final vote on [379] article 14 because the gaps in that article were too serious to be overlooked.

That fact demonstrated once again the importance of avoiding undue haste in drafting; a document such as the one the Committee had to prepare must be the outcome of long reflection and thorough study.

The Chinese delegation thought that the General Assembly's attention should be drawn to the matter.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) stated that at all stages of the work on the draft declaration of human rights, the USSR delegation had striven to ensure absolute equality between men and women. Article 14, which established equality as to marriage, was a progressive article and in adopting it, the United Nations would indeed be up to date in its work.

The USSR delegation wished to congratulate all the women of the world whose long struggle for liberation had finally been crowned by a real success.

MRS. BEGRUP (Denmark) recognized that the text of article 14 in the form in which it had been adopted contained a regrettable repetition. However, her delegation believed that, even if it did contain a repetition, a text which clearly established equality between men and women in all the stages of marriage was preferable to a better draft which left any room for doubt in that respect.

The Danish delegation would nevertheless welcome any amendment likely to improve it without restricting its scope.

MR. CONTOUMAS (Greece) having expressed the wish to take up the allusion made to his country in the Polish representative's speech, THE CHAIRMAN stated that, according to the rules of procedure, the general discussion being closed, he could only allow members to explain their vote.

MR. CONTOUMAS (Greece) replied that if he wished to avoid abusing his powers, the Chairman must either prevent the representative of one State Member of the United Nations from levelling charges at another Member State, if necessary calling such a representative to order, or give the floor to the representative against whose country the charges have been made, so as to allow him to answer them.

MRS. NEWLANDS (New Zealand) explained that her delegation had abstained from taking part in the final vote because it was unable to accept the text of article 14 as amended by the Mexican delegation, that is, limiting non-discrimination – a principle established in article 2 – to grounds of race, nationality and religion.

The delegation of New Zealand also fully endorsed the observations made by the representatives of France and China.

The meeting rose at 1:15 p.m.

A/C.3/SR.126<sup>91</sup>

8 November 1948

Summary Record of the Hundred and Twenty-Sixth meeting
[of the Third Committee]

Held at the Palais de Chaillot, Paris, on Monday,
8 November 1948, at 3 p.m.

Chairman: MR. CHARLES MALIK (Lebanon).

50. Draft international declaration of human rights (E/800) (continued)

Article 15<sup>1</sup>

THE CHAIRMAN noted that the basic text of article 15 and the amendments to it were recapitulated in document A/C.3/288/Rev.1.

He called on the members who had submitted amendments to explain their proposals.

MR. DE LA OSSA (Panama) said that his delegation had proposed (A/C.3/280) the addition of the words “in accordance with general law” at the end of the first paragraph of article 15, because such an addition was needed in the case of a right in the protection of which the State would necessarily have to take a particularly active part.

Furthermore, his amendment would make the text more generally acceptable since many countries, with their varying national laws regarding the ownership of property, would hesitate to agree to the basic draft.

MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) pointed out that the Uruguayan amendment (A/C.3/268) applied only to the French text of article 15. The French words posséder des biens might be misleading, and would certainly give the wrong impression if translated literally into Spanish. Many countries made a legal distinction between possession and ownership; the word propriété should be used to convey the idea of ownership.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) observed that the USSR proposal (E/800, page 33) to include a reference to the laws of the country where the property was situated was entirely consistent with his Government’s general position that the laws of the country concerned should always be taken into consideration.

<sup>91</sup> The text of the document is from Official Records of the General Assembly, Third Session, 1948, pp. 380–90.

The addition of the word “illegally” in the second paragraph of article 15, as suggested by his delegation, would further strengthen the reference to law.

Various countries had widely differing views in regard to the ownership of property. In the USSR for examples certain categories of property were allowed the individual, but all large units of property such as mines, means of communication banks, large industrial and commercial enterprises etc. were owned either by the State—which meant the people as a whole – or by smaller groups such as co-operatives. Article 15 should therefore be drafted in general terms so as to include all the concepts of ownership. In order to ensure equality in international law for the different social structures in the world, the article should contain specific reference to the laws of the country concerned. The right of each country to follow its own laws regarding the ownership of property would thus be respected.

<sup>[1]</sup> Article 18 of the draft universal declaration of human rights (A/777).

[381]

Referring to the Cuban amendment (A/C.3/232), he could not agree with the first paragraph in which mention was made of the right to own such property as met “the essential needs of decent living” and helped “to maintain the dignity of the individual and the home”. If such details were included, then the article should also state that the right to own property should not interfere with the general welfare and that the property owner should not be allowed to infringe the rights of the non-property-owner. However, any such detailed analysis was unnecessary.

The USSR found the second paragraph of the Cuban amendment acceptable.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) said that the amendment proposed by his delegation (A/C.3/249) was based on a text to be found in the Bogotá declaration. That amendment had been first presented in the Drafting Committee which had examined the text of the draft declaration adopted at the second session of the Commission on Human Rights – a text in which reference had been made to the laws of the country concerned. The Chilean delegation had found such a reference meaningless. To say that rights should be granted in accordance with the law might mean, under some laws, that there was an unlimited right to property, and under other laws it might mean no right to property at all. The USSR delegation and the Drafting Committee had recognized the validity of the Chilean delegation’s argument and had adopted the proposed amendment.<sup>1</sup>

At its third session, however, the Commission had adopted the text before the Committee.<sup>2</sup> That text did not make clear the essential point, which was the extent to which the right to ownership of property was a fundamental human right. To say that “everyone has the right to own such property as meets the essential needs of decent living, that helps to maintain the dignity of the individual and of the home...”, would be to define how much property should be considered an inherent right of the individual. Ownership of anything more than that might be legal and just, but could not be considered a basic right. Moreover, the word “property” as used in the Chilean amendment could be interpreted to mean property owned either privately or collectively.

He supported the Uruguayan amendment to the French text.

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) supported the basic text of article 15, which she found definitely superior to all others.

The USSR proposal that the right to own property should be limited by the laws of the country concerned would make the right meaningless and the proclamation of it in an international document quite useless.

<sup>[1]</sup> See document E/CN.4/AC.1/SR.8.

<sup>[2]</sup> See document E/CN.4/SR.61.

[382]

The USSR suggestion that “arbitrarily” should be interpreted as “illegally” was also unwise. The declaration should use the word “arbitrarily” which was far wider in its import than “illegally”.

Referring to the Cuban and Chilean amendments, she said those proposals would imply a limitation on the right to own property which her country would find undesirable. Furthermore, it would be difficult to define the exact meaning of the “decent living” referred to in both the amendments. She recalled that the Commission had adopted the compromise text before the Committee only after having discussed thoroughly the ideas contained in the various amendments before the Committee.

Mrs. Begtrup (Denmark) took the Chair.

MRS. CORBET (United Kingdom) also supported the Commission’s text of article 15, as it expressed simply and clearly the basic ideas about property which should be set forth.

It was generally agreed that the ownership of property was subject to the laws of the country concerned, but there seemed no need to include such a provision in the declaration. For that reason she was opposed to both the USSR and Panamanian amendments.

As regards the word “arbitrarily”, she explained that the word was not synonymous with “illegally”, since an act that was arbitrary might at the same time be legal; “arbitrarily” should therefore be retained.

She could not support the Cuban and Chilean amendments as there was almost always danger that the underlying meaning would be distorted if the fundamental human rights were described in too great detail.

MRS. LINDSTRÖM (Sweden) said she had taken little part in the debate on the draft declaration as she had found the basic text generally acceptable; it included, in fact, principles which were already being applied in Sweden.

She had, however, considered proposing that article 15 should be amended to include the words “in his own country”. It was not always wise that the right to own private property should be unlimited, especially when the property consisted of large interests in a foreign country. She had refrained from presenting such an amendment in the hope that draft article 27 as well as the laws of the various countries would cover her point.

She would, however, support paragraph 1 of the USSR amendment, which laid down very reasonable limitations on the right of ownership.

She would also vote for paragraph 2 of the USSR amendment. The word “illegally” was clearer and more restrictive than “arbitrarily”; the latter might, for example, be interpreted to conflict with Swedish law which allowed the expropriation of private property for public use.

[383]

MR. SAINT-LOT (Haiti) pointed out that as many countries no longer admitted the absolute right to property, the draft declaration would be going counter to the trend of historical evolution if it laid down such a right.

On the other hand, to limit the right to what was provided by rational laws, as suggested by the USSR delegation, was not appropriate, for specific reference to such laws would be a concession to nationalism that was contrary to the purpose of the universal document under discussion.

He could not support the Cuban and Chilean amendments; the concept of “decent living” was too subjective and would be open to many varied interpretations.

In order to correct the unduly individualistic nature of the basic draft of article 15, yet not to go to the other extreme of setting up national laws as a criterion for determining the limits of the right to own property, he proposed the addition, to paragraph 1, of the sentence:

“This right shall be exercised in conformity with the public interest.”

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium), referring to the USSR proposal, stressed the fact that there was no reason for the declaration, which was only a recommendation and imposed no obligations on countries, to contain reference to national laws. If, at international conferences, constant references were made to national laws, there would be a tendency to stabilize the status quo in each country and no progress would be made. He therefore opposed the USSR amendment.

He also opposed the Cuban and Chilean amendments because the concepts of “essential needs” and “decent living” were vague. A similar lack of precision made the Panamanian amendment unacceptable.

The Uruguayan amendment to the French text was important, for there was a legal distinction between possession and ownership. The amendment should therefore be adopted.

He proposed that the following text (A/C.3/325) should be substituted for the basic draft of article 15:

“Within the limits of public interest, everyone is entitled to own property alone as well as in association with others.”

That was a compromise text which might meet several of the points of view that had been presented. It would moreover reflect the present stage in the development of democratic thought.

Mr. Malik (Lebanon) resumed the Chair.

MR. AQUINO (Philippines) preferred the basic draft of article 15; it would affirm the right to own property and ensure the full exercise of that right by protecting the individual against possible encroachment by the State.

The intention behind the first part of the USSR amendment was commendable, but the adoption of the amendment would fix the stamp of approval on existing property laws, whether they were good or bad. A deplorable situation such as existed in [384] the Union of South Africa, for example, where arbitrary laws preventing any but members of the white race from owning certain types of property, would thus receive United Nations sanction.

He also opposed the second part of the USSR amendment. “Illegal” and “arbitrary” were not necessarily the same, and if “arbitrary” were interpreted in article 15 to mean “illegal”, its meaning in the other articles would thereby be affected.

He could not support the Cuba, Chilean and Panamanian amendments, for they all contained ideas that were not clear and that could easily be misinterpreted.

The Haitian amendment was noble in purpose but was not sufficiently realistic at the current time when it was still necessary to take national laws into account.

MR. WATT (Australia) pointed out that if the second part of the USSR amendment meant “No one shall be illegally deprived of his property”, the meaning was clear; but if the word “illegally” was used to define the word “arbitrarily”, the meaning of the latter word would be modified in all other articles.

He agreed that article 15 might, like many other articles, be termed individualistic. In setting forth the rights of individuals, however, it would be difficult to avoid an individualistic approach. Amendments such as those of Haiti and Belgium did not seem necessary, as the second paragraph of article 27 would adequately cover any restrictions on individual rights to property which might be advisable.

The Australian delegation would vote for the basic text.

MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) stated that his delegation could not vote for the USSR amendment; it served no purpose and did not add to the value of the document. A similar amendment to that article had been rejected by the Commission on Human Rights.<sup>1</sup>

The Cuban and Chilean amendments were much closer to the ideas of his delegation; nevertheless, those amendments would tend to protect only minimum property rights. His delegation felt that the protection of property should be broader, and that in no case should there be confiscation of property without compensation.

The Belgian amendment was unnecessary, since article 27 was sufficient to cover the requirements of the “public interest”.

The Haitian amendment did, however, introduce a new idea in stating that the right to own property must be exercised in conformity with the public interest, and it would constitute a concrete criterion to be used in the implementation of rights set forth in the declaration.

He would therefore support the basic draft of article 15, with the addition of the Haitian amendment.

<sup>[1]</sup> See document E/CN.4/SR.61.

[385]

He urged again his delegation’s amendment in regard to the French text.

MR. CASSIN (France) stressed the difficulty of arriving at a perfect text for article 15. The basic draft was admittedly weak.

The Chilean amendment had endeavoured to deal with the essence of the problem in defining to what extent the right to own property could be called a fundamental human right. All countries recognized the right to a minimum amount of property, without which a man lost his dignity and self-respect. The concept of individual property, however, varied in the different countries and an adequate definition of property would require a more explicit draft than those of the Cuban and Chilean delegations.

The basic text was not satisfactory. He preferred the wording of the first part of the Belgian amendment to the French text of the article.

However, the words “within the limits of public interest” in the Belgian amendment were less satisfactory than the expression used in the Haitian amendment, for the latter stressed that the right to property should be exercised in conformity with the public interest, whereas the former merely stated an idea which was already sufficiently covered by article 27.

Paragraph 2 of article 15 must be retained, for it was imperative to ensure the protection of individual property against arbitrary acts, whether legal or illegal.

He further supported the Uruguayan amendment as a drafting change in the French text.

MR. CONTOUMAS (Greece) agreed with the representative of France concerning the Belgian amendment, but did not consider the Haitian amendment necessary.

Referring to the French text, the Greek representative proposed that the first part of article 15 should be worded in accordance with the first part of the Belgian amendment, but the idea contained in the words “within the limits of public interest” should not be included.

Paragraph 2 of the original draft should be retained.

MRS. NEWLANDS (New Zealand) supported the basic text of article 15.

As an additional objection to the USSR amendment, she pointed out that in some cases, particularly where movable property owned by non-nationals was concerned, the laws of more than one country might apply.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) observed that both the USSR and Panamanian amendments tended to bring the right to property into line with the laws of each country. He supported the objections already raised to those amendments, and pointed out that the laws of the country should not violate the rights proclaimed in the declaration.

The Cuban and Chilean amendments raised a second point, namely, the minimum property rights of each individual. The Lebanese delegation would [386] be glad to support a text which clearly defined minimum property rights. The amendments proposed were not clear and did not seem to apply the right to own property above that minimum.

A third idea was introduced by the delegations of Haiti and Belgium, which wished to insert a clause to guarantee that the ownership of property would be in conformity with public interest. The Haitian amendment might be acceptable to the Lebanese delegation if it were worded differently. An individual could be asked not to act against the general interest, but he could not be obliged to use his property in the general interest. If the Haitian proposal were therefore worded in the negative, the Lebanese delegation would be able to support it.

The Belgian proposal, stating that everyone was entitled to property “within the limits of public interest” might be interpreted to mean that a State could, by invoking general welfare, prohibit the right to property entirely. For that reason, the Belgian proposal was unacceptable.

The Lebanese delegation would support the basic draft with the Uruguayan amendment to the French text.

MR. MEYADEH (Iran) stated that, in view of the various explanations given, he wholeheartedly supported the basic draft of article 15, but suggested that the words “of his property” in paragraph 2 should be replaced by “of his possessions and the benefits deriving therefrom”.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) said that the Cuban and Chilean amendments reflected the text adopted at Bogotá. It had been argued that those amendments set forth a minimum right to property, but did not provide for ownership beyond that minimum. That was, however, a misinterpretation, for the amendments merely laid down what should be considered the fundamental human right in regard to property.

It had also been objected that the terms of the amendments were too vague. The declaration, however, was a statement of general principles which would be interpreted by the peoples of the world according to their varying concepts.

MR. CHANG (China), while expressing appreciation of the amendments proposed, stated that his delegation preferred the original draft.

MR. DE ATHAYDE (Brazil) wished to support the basic text of article 15, to which no substantial improvement would be made by the amendments. The draft was clear and in keeping with the spirit of the declaration.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) had noted that certain delegations objected to the inclusion of references to national laws. In his opinion, it was important to determine what provisions came within the purview of national legislation and what were subject to international law.

It had been suggested that the word "illegally" was not sufficiently clear, but he felt that the word arbitrarily could only be interpreted subjectively.

[387]

The French representative's observations on the question of property in the USSR were not entirely accurate. It was true that the individual could own his own house and personal belongings, but it was considered personal or individual, rather than private property. It enabled him to participate, as an individual, in the life of the community. The expression "private property" was not liked in the Soviet Union, owing to the fact that it could be acquired in other parts of the world through the exploitation of the masses. It was wrong that some individuals should own a great deal, while others starved, and therefore, the mines, transportation services, banks and so on, could not be privately owned in the Soviet Union.

The USSR delegation was prepared to respect the points of view of other delegations, but in its turn, expected the same consideration on the part of those delegations.

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) expressed the view that both the Belgian and Haitian amendments introduced substantial changes and therefore could not be considered by the Committee at that stage of the discussion. In her opinion, the point raised by the Swedish representative, as well as that contained in those two amendments, were covered by the provisions of article 27.

She reminded the Committee that it was important to avoid hasty decisions to alter a text that had been as carefully thought out as the draft declaration.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the Belgian and Haitian amendments were attempts at compromise between the original text and certain of the amendments to it. It was questionable, therefore, whether they introduced substantial changes, or not.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) drew attention to the fact that the compromise amendment (A/C.3/325) attributed to Belgium and Haiti had been submitted by the Belgian delegation only. The amendment was based on a Uruguayan proposal, the original text and the provisions of article 27, and had been put forward in a spirit of conciliation.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) requested the Chairman to use his discretionary powers in respect of amendments that could be regarded as compromise proposals.

THE CHAIRMAN announced that he would put the amendments to the vote in the following order: Cuba, Chile, Belgium, Haiti as amended by France, Greece, USSR, Panama and Iran.

As no objections had been expressed to the Uruguayan drafting suggestion (A/C.3/268), he considered it adopted.

At the request of the representative of Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the Chairman put the Cuban amendment (A/C.3/232) to the vote in parts.

The first paragraph was rejected by 23 votes to 3, with 13 abstentions.

The second paragraph was rejected by 19 votes to 10, with 8 abstentions.

[388]

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) withdrew his amendment (A/C.3/249), as the Cuban proposal had been rejected. He explained that he had abstained on the second paragraph of the latter, as the idea was already contained in the basic text.

THE CHAIRMAN called the Committee's attention to the Haitian amendment, which was to be inserted at the end of paragraph 1 of article 15.

MRS. CORBET (United Kingdom) expressed the view that the Haitian amendment introduced an entirely new principle. It went much further than the provisions of article 27 and therefore, could not be considered by the Committee without further discussion.

After a short discussion, THE CHAIRMAN reopened the debate on the Belgian and Haitian amendments.

MR. CASSIN (France) warmly supported the Haitian amendment because it retained paragraph 2 of article 15 and stressed the social aspect of the right to own property.

MR. AQUINO (Philippines) felt that the most convincing arguments against the adoption of the Belgian and Haitian amendments were those put forward by the Belgian, Haitian and French representatives themselves, when they had maintained that the Cuban and Chilean amendments introduced elements which were not relevant to the content of article 15. As had been pointed out by the Australian representative, the necessary limitations to the various rights were laid down in article 27.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) asked the Belgian representative whether, in his amendment, he would be prepared to insert the words "in accordance with the laws of the country where such property is situated" after the phrase "within the limits of public interest". Private property was too frequently in conflict with the public interest, but the insertion of the USSR amendment in that particular place would even introduce a moral element into the article.

Should the Belgian amendment be rejected, he reserved the right to submit his amendment again with respect to the basic text.

THE CHAIRMAN announced that the same amendment could only be voted on once by the Committee and that it was for the USSR representative to choose the text in relation to which he wished to submit it.

MR. CHANG (China) realized that the right to private property was abused, but expressed the view that article 27 was the appropriate place for strengthening the limitations to the various rights. He recognized the good intentions of the authors of the two amendments, but still felt that the carefully prepared basic text was preferable.

MRS. CORBET (United Kingdom) emphasized again that the Haitian amendment went much further than the provisions of article 27, which stated that the rights of the individual would be subject “only to such limitations as are necessary. . .”.

[389]

The Belgian amendment was acceptable, except that it would delete paragraph 2 and in any case, she preferred the basic text. Her Government was not opposed to the limitation of the right to private property, but article 27 seemed the appropriate place in which to insert that principle.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) said he had already expressed his opposition to the USSR amendment. In his opinion, it was not right to make constant references to national laws in documents emanating from international conferences. The concept of the public interest, to his mind, was more flexible and progressive than the concept of national laws.

In reply to the United Kingdom representative, he said he had considered accepting the retention of paragraph 2, but had decided it would weaken the purpose of his amendment.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) then moved, as an amendment to the Belgian amendment, the addition of the words “in accordance with the laws of the country where such property is situated”. That sub-amendment would then only refer to the exercising of the right to own property.

THE CHAIRMAN put the USSR amendment to the Belgian amendment to the vote.

That amendment was rejected by 25 votes to 11, with 6 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN then called for a vote on the Belgian substitute text for article 15 (A/C.3/325).

That text was rejected by 19 votes to 8, with 10 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN then put to the vote the sentence which the Haitian representative proposed for insertion at the end of paragraph 1 of the basic text.

That proposal was rejected by 18 votes to 11, with 12 abstentions.

On the suggestion of the Greek representative, it was agreed that the French text of article 15, paragraph 1 should read as follows: Le droit à la propriété est reconnu à toute personne, aussi bien seule qu'en collectivité.

The English text would remain as originally drafted.

In reply to the request of the representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the Chairman refused to put to the vote the text of paragraph 1 of the USSR amendment, on the grounds that it already had been rejected by the Committee.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) appealed against the Chairman's ruling. THE CHAIRMAN put that appeal to the vote.

The Chairman's ruling was upheld by 19 votes to 8, with 10 abstentions.

MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) explained that he had voted against the Chairman's ruling, because there was a difference in meaning between the USSR amendment, as a sub-amend-[390]ment to the Belgian amendment, and as an independent amendment.

THE CHAIRMAN put the Panamanian amendment (A/C.3/280) to the vote.

That amendment was rejected by 20 votes to 8, with 9 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the USSR amendment to paragraph 2 of article 15 (E/800, page 33).

That amendment was rejected by 23 votes to 8, with 7 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the Iranian amendment to paragraph 2 of article 15.

That amendment was rejected by 20 votes to 2, with 17 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put article 15 as a whole to the vote.

Article 15 as amended with regard to the French text, was adopted by 29 votes to none, with 1 abstention.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said he had voted in favour of article 15, as a whole, on the understanding that illegal actions were included within the meaning of the word "arbitrarily".

In the opinion of the USSR delegation, the Chairman did not have the right to reject an amendment on the strength of his own interpretation of it. Each delegation represents a Government and it was for the Committee and not the Chairman, to decide on the various amendments put forward. The USSR delegation considered the Chairman's ruling on the USSR amendment to article 15, paragraph 1, illegal and unjustified.

The meeting rose at 6:30 p.m.

A/C.3/326

8 November 1948

Original Text: English, French

Text as adopted by the Committee for articles 12 to 14 of the draft Declaration (E/800)

Article 12

1. Everyone has the right to seek and to enjoy in other countries asylum from persecution.

2. Prosecutions genuinely arising from non-political crimes or from acts contrary to the purposes and principles of the United Nations do not constitute persecution.

Article 13

Everyone has the right to a nationality.

No one shall be arbitrarily deprived of his nationality or denied the right to change his nationality.

Article 14

1. Without any limitation due to race, nationality or religion, men and women of full age have the right to marry and to found a family and are entitled to equal rights as to marriage.

2. Marriage shall be entered into only with the free and full consent of the intending spouses. Men and women shall enjoy equal rights both during marriage and at its dissolution.

3. The family is the natural and fundamental group unit of society and is entitled to protection by society and the state.

A/C.3/247/Rev.1

9 November 1948

Original Text: English, French

Saudi Arabia: Amendment to article 16 of the draft Declaration (E/800)

Delete, in the second part of this article, the following words: “to change his religion or belief, and freedom”.

The article would then read as follows:

“Everyone has the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion; this right includes freedom, either alone or in community with others and in public or private, to manifest his religion or belief in teaching, practice, worship and observance.”

A/C.3/SR.127<sup>92</sup>

9 November 1948

Summary Record of the Hundred and Twenty-Seventh Meeting [of the Third Committee]

*Held at the Palais de Chaillot, Paris, on Tuesday,
9 November 1948, at 10:50 a.m.*

Chairman: MR. CHARLES MALIK (Lebanon).

51. Draft international declaration of human rights (E/800) (continued)

Article 16<sup>1</sup>

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the amendments to article 16 submitted by the delegations of the USSR (E/800, page 33), Peru (A/C.3/225), Cuba (A/C.3/232), Saudi Arabia (A/C.3/247) and Sweden (A/C.3/252) were recapitulated in document A/C.3/289/Rev.1.

MRS. LINDSTRÖM (Sweden) stated that freedom of religion had existed in her country for a long time. Consequently, her delegation accepted the basic text of article 16, with one reservation.

Pointing out the danger inherent in manifestations of political fanaticism, she recommended a policy of tolerance towards individuals who professed religious beliefs, as well as those who had none.

<sup>[1]</sup> Article 19 of the draft universal declaration of human rights (A/777).

[391]

She thought it necessary therefore to propose an amendment (A/C.3/252) to article 16 with a view to ensuring the protection of individuals against any kind of religious intolerance.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) drew the Committee's attention to the fact that his amendment (E/800, page 33) stressed the need to ensure "freedom of thought and freedom to perform religious services". The text of article 16, as adopted by the Commission on Human Rights, merely announced the right of freedom of thought, conscience and religion, whereas the USSR amendment expressly guaranteed the enjoyment of that right.

<sup>92</sup> The text of the document is from Official Records of the General Assembly, Third Session, 1948, pp. 390–404.

The USSR delegation placed particular emphasis on freedom of thought which it was necessary to sanction in order to promote the development of modern sciences and which took account of the existence of free-thinkers whose reasoning had led them to discard all old-fashioned beliefs and religious fanaticism. The times when scientists were condemned to be burnt at the stake were past, and science occupied a most important place in human life.

Furthermore, Mr. Pavlov pointed out that certain religious practices represented a real danger for society. Thus, in South Africa, strange beliefs had, even recently, found expression in human sacrifice. For that reason the delegation of the USSR felt that national legislation had to put an end to such inhuman and barbaric practices.

In conclusion, Mr. Pavlov drew attention to the fact that in the Far East, for example, there existed sects whose religious fanaticism led them to flagellation and savage mortification. The purpose of the USSR amendment was to condemn such public ceremonies, which were contrary to the requirements of morality and could have deplorable effects on society, particularly on children who witnessed practices of that kind.

MR. BAROODY (Saudi Arabia) proposed that only the first sentence of article 16 should be retained, as it sufficiently safeguarded freedom of thought, conscience and religion. He was surprised to find that the Commission on Human Rights had sponsored an article wherein, after stating those three freedoms, it had concentrated exclusively on freedom of religion and the right to change religious beliefs, without any mention of the right of the individual to change his general conception of things and the dictates of his conscience. He wondered whether the members of the Commission on Human Rights had not been afraid, in discussing the delicate matter of freedom of thought and conscience, to take a stand openly on the basis of their different political ideologies.

