After discussion, THE CHAIRMAN stated that Articles 1, 2, 3, and 4 would be presented in the following manner: Article 1 would read, “All men are brothers. Being endowed with reason and conscience they are members of one family. They are free and possess equal dignity and rights”. Continuing, there would be a sub-division; on one side Articles 2, 3, and 4, Article 2 reading, “The object of society is to afford each of its members equal opportunity for the full development of his spirit, mind and body”, followed by Article 3, “As human beings cannot live and develop themselves without the help and support of society, each one owes to society fundamental duties which are: obedience to law, exercise of a useful activity, willing acceptance of obligations and sacrifices demanded for the common good”, and Article 4, “In the exercise of his rights everyone is limited by the rights of others”. On the opposite side would come, as Article 2, “These rights are limited only by the equal rights of others. Man also owes duties to society through which he is enabled to develop his spirit, mind and body in wider freedom”. No objection being indicated, the Chairman stated that this method of presentation had been accepted. Speaking as a Member of the Committee, the Chairman observed that the proposals of the United States submitted at the twelfth meeting probably would not be put in as Articles. However, she reserved the right to add a footnote, a right which should be reserved to [8] everyone.

Article 13

THE CHAIRMAN read Article 13 and asked for comments.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) observed that this was another matter which should be considered by the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities, since the main implication was the prevention of discrimination, on grounds of race, colour, where people might live and how they might move from place to place. He pointed out that this Article was also subject to the rights of private property.

DR. CHANG (China) said he reserved his position, since he, too, realized the difficulties in qualification. He suggested as a drafting change that instead of the words "Subject to", the sentence should begin "There shall be liberty. . .".

THE CHAIRMAN, speaking as a Member of the Committee, said that the United States might also reserve the right to put in a qualifying footnote.

DR. MALIK (Lebanon) remarked that the intent of the Article was to guarantee freedom of movement within a country subject to the conditions mentioned by the Representative of the United Kingdom and also the liberty of emigrating from a country and changing nationality. He wondered, however, if "emigration" covered the case of mere travel, which ought also to be included.

THE CHAIRMAN asked whether the wording "There shall be liberty of movement and free choice of residence within the borders of each State; individuals may also freely travel, emigrate or expatriate themselves", would be acceptable.

PROFESSOR CASSIN (France) said he thought it would be wise to transfer the reservation to the end of the Article. He recognized the justness of the comments of the Representative of the United Kingdom regarding certain indispensable restrictions. Texts which proclaimed unconditional liberties might be dangerous to certain states which might, for instance, find [9] themselves invaded by five hundred thousand persons in one day. He thought there should be a reservation at the end of the Article to the effect that it was subject to any general law which might regulate the freedom of movement. He would even add a footnote saying that this was a subject susceptible of inclusion in a Convention.

THE CHAIRMAN said that, following the Representative of France, the Article would read: "There shall be liberty of movement and free choice of residence within the borders of each State; individuals may also freely travel, emigrate or expatriate themselves subject to any general law adopted in the interest of national welfare and security."

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) suggested that the words "emigrate or expatriate themselves" be changed to "the right to leave the territory".

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom.) suggested the words “be free to leave any country including his own”, the wording of the United Kingdom draft.

DR. MALIK (Lebanon) suggested the words “are also free” instead of “may also be free”. He also suggested in accordance with the United Kingdom comments the inclusion of some such phrase as “subject to private property regulations”.

THE CHAIRMAN said she thought that the general clause “subject to any general law adopted in the interest of national welfare and security” would cover this point.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) said that the inclusion of this qualification would reduce the clause to one of non-discrimination. If more than that was desired, it would be necessary to go into far more detail. He had mentioned private property in order to point out a flaw in the Article. He thought it should be looked at first from the point of view of discrimination.

THE CHAIRMAN suggested that, to comply with the point raised by the Representative of the United Kingdom the Article should be presented to the Commission on Human Rights reading: “There shall be liberty of movement and free choice of residence within the borders of each State, with the [10] observation that the text was not final since it should be referred to the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities, and should include the freedom of the individual to travel to or to leave any country including his own, the right to expatriate himself and other matters. Speaking as a Member, she added that the United States would like to retain the phrase “right of expatriation”.

DR. CHANG (China) said that it would not be wise at the present stage to go any further. He added that his attention had been drawn to a possible form of presenting a Declaration which included a comment for each Article. In this case, there was no necessity to include a comment to every Article, but he thought that the Articles themselves should be short, and if they were not clear, should then be followed by a comment. For this particular Article, he felt an explanatory comment would be useful.

THE CHAIRMAN observed that the suggestion was to delete the first sentence and begin the Article with “There shall be liberty of movement . . .” and let it stand from there on as it was, with comments below.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) said he preferred the phrase “divest themselves of their nationality” to “expatriate themselves”.

PROFESSOR CASSIN (France) observed that in a proclamation of rights which might also involve the drawing up of Conventions, no promises should be made which could not be kept. Members knew that sometimes governments must prevent mass movements of populations for possible economic reasons, such as lack of food in a certain region. If the text were drafted without reservations and without a commentary, there might be deception.

PROFESSOR KORETSKY (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) referred to the fact that the population of the United States was based on expatriation, and said that the present draft did not take into account historical circumstances such as this. He would make a more complete statement regarding the substance of the Article later. [11]

PROFESSOR CASSIN (France) felt that instead of “subject to any general law etc.” the words “this freedom may perhaps be regulated” should be used.

THE CHAIRMAN stated that since there were no objections, the following wording would be considered as accepted: “There shall be liberty of movement and free choice of residence within the borders of each State; individuals may also freely emigrate or expatriate themselves. This freedom may be regulated by any general law adopted in the interest of national welfare and security.”

PROFESSOR KORETSKY (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) pointed out that when the Chairman stated that there had been no objections, that was not quite the same thing as saying that an Article had been accepted. He would prefer her to state simply that Members were proceeding to the next Article. Unless that were done he would have to state each time that he reserved his position.

THE CHAIRMAN said that she had meant that the Committee was allowing that wording to go forward to the Commission, which did not mean that it might not be changed later.

Article 14

THE CHAIRMAN read Article 14 and asked for comments.

PROFESSOR KORETSKY (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that in this general form the Article seemed to neglect the contents of the Moscow Declaration on war criminals,<sup>186</sup> and asked whether there would be some sort of reservation to that effect.

PROFESSOR CASSIN (France) admitted that the word “persecution” might not have been made sufficiently clear; he had intended persecution for political, religious or other ideas. He wished to reserve the question of criminals in general and of the obligations of extradition, incumbent on States which might also apply to war criminals. He suggested it might be indicated that the provision referred to persecution for ideas or opinions or beliefs.

<sup>186</sup> The Declaration of the Four Nations on General Security was signed by representatives of the United States, the United Kingdom and the Soviet Union on 30 October 1943. The reference by Professor Koretsky is to the Statement on Atrocities, signed by Roosevelt, Churchill and Stalin, which referred to “evidence of atrocities, massacres and cold-blooded mass executions which are being perpetrated by Hitlerite forces in many of the countries they have overrun and from which they are now being steadily expelled”. It said the suspects would be sent back to the countries where they had committed their crimes and “judged on the spot by the peoples whom they have outraged”. Those whose criminal offences had no particular geographical localization were to be punished by joint decision of the governments of the Allies. The text is available in: Report of Robert H. Jackson, United States Representative to the International Conference on Military Trials, Washington: Department of State, 1949, pp. 11–12.

THE CHAIRMAN suggested the wording “Everyone has the right to escape persecution for his religious or political beliefs by seeking refuge . . . etc.”

PROFESSOR CASSIN (France) suggested the wording “. . . for political, religious or racial reasons. . .”

MR. HARRY (Australia) said that certain exceptions in most of the extradition clauses might, in reverse, provide suitable wording. He also suggested, instead of “seeking refuge”, “the right to take refuge on the territory of any State willing to grant him asylum”. The Article would then read: “Everyone has the right to escape persecution on grounds of political or other beliefs or on grounds of racial prejudice by taking refuge on the territory of any State willing to grant him asylum.”

THE CHAIRMAN said that she thought the Article should appear with this wording, which was acceptable to members, together with any substantive comments. She herself did not think any other comment was needed.

Article 15

THE CHAIRMAN read Article 15, and speaking as a Member, said she would like to delete the word “eventually”, since a person should have the right to be represented by counsel any time he desired representation.

PROFESSOR CASSIN (France) observed that there are countries where, in civil proceedings, counsel can be secured, but not in criminal trials. He pointed out that the entire Article was the result of a combination of three other articles, because it had been rightly observed that the phrase “legal personality” was rather abstract, and it was better to mention the contracting of marriage and access to impartial tribunals.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) said he agreed with the Chairman concerning the word “eventually”, and thought that the whole of the sentence containing this word was more appropriate to a Convention than to this document. He objected also to the clause concerning the right to contract marriage: if the advice aimed at was the denial of the right of aliens to marriage through the use of all types of technicalities, it should be dealt with on the basis of discrimination. This principle applied equally to many other matters, it was the right to enter into any contract. He did not see the reason for singling [13] out one specific instance, however important.

PROFESSOR KORETSKY (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) agreed with the Representative of the United Kingdom, that this question should be dealt with on the basis of non-discrimination. It was inappropriate to speak about the right to contract marriage as a specific right to be expressed in the Declaration. However, he could not agree that marriage was a contract like any other contract.

THE CHAIRMAN, speaking as a Member of the Committee, said that while the phrase “legal personality” might mean something to lawyers, it would mean little to the layman.

DR. CHANG (China) said he thought that the first sentence of the third paragraph of Article 15 might be combined with some of the concepts implied in Articles 8, 9, and 10, which were being redrafted. He felt that paragraph 1 required classification.

DR. MALIK (Lebanon) pointed out that in many Eastern countries the State has no laws regulating marriage, which is a purely religious matter. He felt that the clause would be highly ambiguous for those countries.

THE CHAIRMAN observed that most Members would be willing to omit the second paragraph and perhaps submit it to the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities.

PROFESSOR CASSIN (France) said that the phrase “of the State” should be deleted from the paragraph dealing with marriage. But he would stress the importance of the fundamental right of a human being to found a family; it would not leave a good impression if after having raised the question before the public, it were then deleted for technical reasons. The Committee could request that the Commission on Human Rights should restudy the problem. Finally he agreed that the term “legal personality” should be clarified, though it was appropriate to state that every human being normally possesses rights and obligations and, therefore, has “legal personality”. Perhaps some words could be added to clarify it. He suggested adding after “legal [14] personality”, “in other words to be able to be a bearer of rights, obligations and responsibilities”.

THE CHAIRMAN observed that perhaps it was better to leave the phrase simply as “legal personality”.

PROFESSOR KORETSKY (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that the question of the right to contract marriage, was a question of discrimination against women, and if this instance were quoted, it would be necessary also to mention all the other fields in which women did not have equal rights, listing all those aspects of social life in which women were still factually and judicially unequal. He thought that the term “legal personality” might be superfluous because it introduced a complicated juridical concept, and also in view of the statement in Article 1 that everyone is free and has equal rights and dignity. It was a general formula which has outlived its utility. He would support the deletion of the first and second sentences of Article 15, though perhaps the Article on non-discrimination was in need of further development. Discrimination was still an historical phenomenon of importance in many countries, and had to be fought.

THE CHAIRMAN said the wording “Everyone has the right to a status in law and the enjoyment of fundamental civil rights” had been suggested to her. She pointed out that the question of marriage had been discussed in the Commission on the Status of Women and she felt that that Commission’s recommendations should be reviewed by the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities, and a note added to that effect in the Article. She felt that sentence 3 might be retained but the word “eventually” in the sentence relating to representation by counsel, should be changed.

PROFESSOR CASSIN (France) said he associated himself with what the Chairman had said, with the reservation that the words “civil rights” be translated as “droits civils” in French. He disagreed, however, with the Representative of China’s suggestion that this be added to Articles 8, 9, and 10, pointing out that these Articles refer to penal law, liberty, and security [15] of man, whereas the present Article refers to family rights, the right to patrimony and a profession, and such matters which might be brought before certain tribunals.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) supported Professor Cassin (France) and said that nearly all legislations provided that tribunals should determine civil and political rights and the civic or legal rights of the person: Other rights arise from the relation between the State and the public administration, that is, “administrative law”; some legislations set up administrative tribunals to determine the rights of individuals in this respect, and in other legislations the state itself determines these rights. Mr. Santa Cruz requested that his observation be recorded so that the question he had raised might be taken up by the Commission on Human Rights.

PROFESSOR KORETSKY (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) felt that if the remarks concerning civil rights were not sufficiently covered by Article 1, the terms of that Article might be developed. He considered the phrase “in accordance with the laws of the State”, inappropriate as it might imply approval of polygamy which still exists in certain States.

THE CHAIRMAN explained the procedure which had been suggested regarding the Article.

DR. CHANG (China) said that the third paragraph was still a little too technical for the common man, who wanted equality, consideration, and wished to know his relationship with the courts. He had already suggested that inasmuch as the first Article might appear too technical, and if a clarification of the relation of the individual to the tribunals was concerned, it might be considered as a part of the consideration of the tribunal relationship with the individual.

THE CHAIRMAN recalled that in the discussion it had been held important to have an Article stressing the right to what was called a “legal personality”, and the Representative of France had accepted her simpler wording. That being accepted, she thought Members would agree that paragraph 3 should go in.

DR. CHANG (China) said that the last sentence might still be a comment rather than a part of the Article. He would like to reserve his position with regard to retaining this Article.

PROFESSOR CASSIN (France) maintained that this was one of the most important texts of the Declaration, on a national as well as an international level. On the national level it meant that every citizen had the right of access to justice. On the international level it meant improving the position of foreigners in this respect.

THE CHAIRMAN stated that the feeling of the majority of Members was that the Article should be included. The first paragraph would read: "Everyone has the right to a status in law and to the enjoyment of fundamental civil rights". Then would come a note that the right to contract marriage had been discussed, but Members felt that the recommendations of the Commission on the Status of Women should be reviewed by the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities; the final paragraph would read "Everyone shall have access to independent and impartial tribunals for the determination of his rights, liabilities and obligations under the law". The United States would add the note that they wished to include "He shall have the right to consult with and be represented by counsel" changing the translation of the word "eventually". There being no comments, the Chairman stated that the Article had been adopted.

Article 16

THE CHAIRMAN read Article 16.

MR. HARRY (Australia) suggested the wording "There shall be equal opportunity to engage in all vocations and professions not having a public character".

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) said he thought it would be possible to combine this Article with the one concerning non-discrimination for public employment.

PROFESSOR CASSIN (France) said it might be wise not to confuse Article 16 [17] with political and public occupations, and that a note might be added here stating that this could be the subject of a Convention.

THE CHAIRMAN suggested that the Article should read "There shall be equal opportunity to engage in all vocations or professions not having a public character", with a footnote stating that the rights of foreigners in relation to this Article should be the subject of a Convention.

DR. MALIK (Lebanon) suggested adding the words "for all" after "opportunity".

THE CHAIRMAN suggested the combination of two ideas and proposed the wording: "There shall be equal opportunity for all to engage in all vocations and professions not constituting public employment." There were no objections and the Article was adopted in this form.

Article 17

THE CHAIRMAN read Article 17 and recalled that there had been a long discussion on this Article. Speaking as a Member of the Committee she said she still felt it was sufficient to say “Everyone has a right to own property”.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) recalled that he had referred to the necessity of clarifying the social functions of property. He considered that the last paragraph should come in the second paragraph and the final paragraph should read “No one shall be deprived of his property except for public welfare and with just compensation”.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) said he was still of the opinion that this Article should not be included, partly for the reasons given by the Representative of Chile regarding the social functions of property and also because the right to property is subject to such a mass of control in every country, that it seems rather unreal to talk about it. He referred to the qualifications which had been enumerated in the United States suggestion for this Article (document E/CN.4/AC.1/8/Rev.1), and said that these were sufficient to show that in fact little remained of the absolute right to [18] property. He suggested that a note should accompany the Article to the effect that the opinion had been expressed that it should be omitted altogether, and, if included, it should be in some very limited form, stating that everyone has a right to own such property as is necessary in order to enable him to live a decent life.

MR. HARRY (Australia) said he would hesitate to subscribe to the present form of the Article, and felt it should be omitted.

PROFESSOR CASSIN (France) said he had no objection to the interchange of paragraphs 2 and 3, but thought the wisest course would be to send the text forward as it stood, with a note that the Committee had not fully agreed on the subject, and wished also to submit the suggestions of the Representatives of the United Kingdom and the United States, adding a note that it was only a provisional text.

THE CHAIRMAN stated that if the Committee was agreeable the text would be sent forward as it was, with the comments made by the Representatives of the United Kingdom and the United States. No objection was indicated.

Article 18

THE CHAIRMAN read Article 18.

PROFESSOR CASSIN (France) stated that there had been a mistake regarding this text, which should read “Everyone has the right to a nationality”. He thought that a footnote should be included to the effect that this was a subject suitable for a Convention.

THE CHAIRMAN suggested that the text should be sent forward in that form, with a note that it should be expanded or taken into further consideration. No objection was indicated by Members.

Article 19

THE CHAIRMAN read Article 19.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) said he feared that as it stood the Article was meaningless, and provided no protection for anybody. The subject of aliens constituted a most complicated and difficult problem, and he suggested that the Article be omitted, as it seemed incapable of revision into an [19] acceptable form.

THE CHAIRMAN suggested the wording “No alien legally admitted to the territory of a State may be expelled therefrom without having had a fair hearing”.

PROFESSOR CASSIN (France) said that naturally there would have to be certain Conventions in order to study the question more profoundly, but he did not think the Article should be deleted.

THE CHAIRMAN suggested that the Committee send forward the wording she had proposed, with a note explaining that this was a difficult problem which some Members of the Committee felt should have careful consideration. No objection was indicated by Members.

Article 20

THE CHAIRMAN read Article 20, and pointed out that a number of communications had been received in connection with this Article. She suggested that these communications might be attached to the Report.

PROFESSOR HUMPHREY (Secretariat) explained that all communications would, in any event be forwarded to the next session of the Commission.

THE CHAIRMAN speaking as a Member of the Committee, said that the phrase “manifestations of opposite convictions” had no particular meaning and she would like to see it deleted. It was clear from the first sentence that persons had complete freedom of conscience and belief.

PROFESSOR CASSIN (France) said that there was an error in the wording, and that the phrase should read “manifestations of different or varying convictions”. He added that the Article was trying to take into account the fact that manifestations of worship were not the only manifestations of opinion; there were for instance, manifestations of philosophical opinions.

THE CHAIRMAN suggested the words “differing convictions”.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) said that the fundamental freedom to change one’s opinions and beliefs must be included here, and suggested the wording “Individual freedom of thought and conscience, to hold or change beliefs, is [20] an absolute and sacred right”.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) thought it would be useful to use a shortened version of the relevant Article from the United Kingdom proposal for the Convention, which covers all the points raised.

DR. MALIK (Lebanon) suggested that the Committee adopt the phraseology of the Representative of France and add the United Kingdom proposal in a footnote as an alternative.

DR. CHANG (China) agreed that it would be useful to include the two forms, but thought that the phrase offered by the Representative of France was not clear.

THE CHAIRMAN agreed that “freedom of conscience and belief” implied that one could change one’s beliefs.

DR. MALIK (Lebanon) explained that he wished, as alternatives, the phrasing of the Representative of France with the changes suggested by the Representative of France and by himself, and the phrasing suggested by the Representative of the United Kingdom.

DR. CHANG (China) suggested adding the original wording of the Representative of France as a third alternative.

PROFESSOR CASSIN (France) said he would accept the amendment proposed by the Representative of Lebanon, but he would not object if the Committee wished to present alternatives.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) stressed the importance of the right of every person to give and receive every form of religious teaching, which was included in the United Kingdom text and not in that proposed by the Representative of France.

THE CHAIRMAN stated that three alternatives would be submitted, the text of the Representative of France in its original form, that text as modified by the Representatives of Australia and the Lebanon, and the text of the Representative of the United Kingdom. The Chairman added that the Committee would meet the following afternoon at Hyde Park<sup>187</sup> and at Lake Success on Monday morning 23 June.

Draft Report of the Drafting Committee to the Commission on Human Rights

Chapter I Introduction

1. The Drafting Committee of the Commission on Human Rights held its First Session during the period of 9 to 24 June 1947, with the following representatives in attendance: Col. William Hodgson (Australia); Mr. H. Santa Cruz (Chile);

<sup>187</sup> Hyde Park was home of Eleanor Roosevelt and her husband Franklin Delano Roosevelt. It is located on the Hudson River, about 150 km north of New York City. The meeting to which she refers was informal, and there is no summary record of the deliberations, although reference is made to it in the summary record of the fourteenth meeting.

Mr. P. C. Chang (China); Prof. René Cassin (France); Dr. Charles Malik (Lebanon); Mr. Geoffrey Wilson (United Kingdom); Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt (United States of America); Prof. V. Koretsky (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics).

2. Mr. Geoffrey Wilson represented Lord Dukeston (United Kingdom); Prof. V. Koretsky represented Mr. V.F. Tepliakov (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics); and Mr. H. Santa Cruz represented Mr. Felix Nieto Del Rio (Chile). Mr. Ralph Harry represented Col. William Hodgson (Australia) at most meetings.

3. The Specialized Agencies were represented at the Drafting Committee as follows: UNESCO, Mr. J. Havet.

4. Consultants in attendance were: American Federation of Labor: Miss Toni Sender; International Cooperative Alliance: Mrs. H. Fuhrman.

5. The Drafting Committee elected the Officers of the Commission on Human Rights as its Officers: Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt as Chairman; Dr. P. C. Chang as Vice-Chairman; and Dr. Charles Malik as Rapporteur.

6. Professor John P. Humphrey was Secretary of the Drafting Committee.

7. The Drafting Committee adopted the Provisional Rules of Procedure of the Commission on Human Rights as its Rules of Procedure.

8. The Drafting Committee authorized the _____<sup>188</sup> to present this report to the Commission on Human Rights.

9. The expression of the views of the Members of the Drafting Committee is embodied in the verbatim and summary records of the meetings.

10. It was agreed that where there was not full agreement on any text, alternative texts were to be submitted to the Commission on Human Rights.

Chapter II

Preliminary Draft of an International Bill of Human Rights

11. The Drafting Committee reviewed its terms of reference as contained in the letter of the Chairman of the Commission on Human Rights of 24 March 1947 (document E/383) to the President of the Economic and Social Council, and approved by decision of the Council of 28 March 1947 (document E/325). It noted in particular that its function in this session was to prepare, on the basis of documentation supplied by the Secretariat, a preliminary draft of an International Bill of Human Rights.

12. In this preparation, the Drafting Committee started with two basic documents, (a) a Draft Outline of an International Bill of Rights prepared by the Secretariat (documents E/CN.4/AC.1/3 and E/CN.4/AC.1/3/Add.1), constituting Annex A of this Report, and (b) a draft Bill of Rights proposed by the United Kingdom (document

E/CN.4/AC.1/4), constituting Annex B of this Report. These two documents were carefully gone over and compared, together with certain United States proposals for the rewording of some items appearing in the Secretariat outline (documents E/CN.4/AC.1/8 and Revs. 1 and 2), constituting Annex C of this Report.

13. Concerning the form which the preliminary draft might take, two views were put forward. In the opinion of some Representatives it was necessary that the Draft, in the first instance, should take the form of a Declaration [3] or Manifesto; in the opinion of others there should also be a Convention in addition to the Manifesto or Declaration. The Drafting Committee therefore decided to attempt to prepare two documents, one a working paper outlining a Declaration or Manifesto setting forth general principles, and the second a working paper containing suggestions as to the contents of one or more Conventions flowing from these principles to which Member Nations might adhere.

14. The Committee established a temporary working group, composed of the Representatives of France, Lebanon, and the United Kingdom, with the Chairman of the Committee as an ex officio member. It requested this working group:

- (a) to suggest a logical rearrangement of the articles of the Draft Outline supplied by the Secretariat;
- (b) to suggest a redraft of the various articles in the light of the discussions of the Drafting Committee; and
- (c) to suggest to the Drafting Committee the division of the substance of the articles between a Declaration and a Convention.

15. The temporary working group had three meetings, and after a general discussion decided to request Professor Cassin to undertake the writing of a draft Declaration based on those Articles in the Secretariat outline which he considered should go into such a Declaration. It was the consensus of opinion that such a document would have greater unity if drawn up by one person. The Representatives of the United Kingdom and Lebanon, together with the Chairman, were asked independently to go over the Secretariat outline and the United Kingdom draft with a view to determining which Articles could readily lend themselves to a Convention.

Professor Cassin produced a draft containing a Preamble and forty-four suggested Articles. The working group revised the Preamble and the first six Articles before submitting them to the Drafting Committee (document E/CN.4/AC.1/W.1). The remaining Articles were submitted to the Drafting Committee in the form proposed by Professor Cassin (document E/CN.4/AC.1/W.2/Rev.1), constituting part of Annex D of this Report.

The Chairman, the Representative of Lebanon and the Representative of the United Kingdom agreed that the Articles contained in the Convention part (Annex I of document E/CN.4/AC.1/4) of the United Kingdom draft could be submitted to the Commission on Human Rights as possibly forming the basis of a draft Convention and that the following three subjects should be added to this draft:

- (a) torture, physical integrity and cruel punishments;
- (b) the right to a legal personality; and
- (c) the right of asylum.

16. The Drafting Committee read the draft Preamble, but recognized that its final wording could not be determined until later.

17. The Drafting Committee considered in detail each of the six draft Articles submitted by the working group, then considered in like detail the remaining draft Articles submitted by Professor Cassin. Members made comments on the form and substance of the various articles. These comments are found in the verbatim and summary records. All Members of the Drafting Committee understood that no action taken by them during the session was to be considered binding upon their Governments. Professor Koretsky's remarks were confined in the main to procedural matters, and for all issues he specifically reserved the right to present the comments, observations, and proposals of his Government at a later time.

18. The Drafting Committee accepted Professor Cassin's offer to prepare, on the basis of the discussion of his draft, a revised Draft Declaration. This revised Draft (document E/CN.4/AC.1/W.2/Rev.2) was gone over carefully by the Drafting Committee and the result of this examination is embodied in Annex E of this Report. The Drafting Committee therefore submits to the Human Rights Commission this Annex as a working paper for a preliminary draft of an International Manifesto or Declaration on Human Rights.

19. The Drafting Committee used the proposal of the United Kingdom (document E/CN.4/AC.1/4) as a basis for its general discussion relating to the possible substantive contents of a Draft Convention. While it did not go over this [4] matter as thoroughly as it did the Drafts of Professor Cassin, it nevertheless suggests that the United Kingdom proposal may form a basis for a draft Convention which the Commission on Human Rights may wish to elaborate.

Chapter III The Question of Implementation of an International Bill of Human Rights

20. The United Kingdom Draft embodied many proposals bearing on implementation. Consequently, in the discussion of that Draft, the question of implementation in general came up.

Annex F of this Report consists of a paper prepared by the Secretariat embodying documentation on the question of implementation. The following is a brief summary of the comments made on this subject in the session of the Drafting Committee:

- (a) It was the consensus of opinion of the Members of the Drafting Committee that the international community must ensure the observance of the rights to be included in an International Bill of Human Rights.
- (b) The view was expressed that implementation might take two forms:
  - (1) some form of punishment of an offending State, the proposals for such punishment ranging from a public request for information concerning the alleged violation to trial before an International Tribunal; (2) action on the part of the United Nations and the Member States to educate the peoples of the world with regard to human rights and to create conditions under which respect for and promotion of human rights would be secured.
- (c) The view was expressed that the only practicable compulsory form of implementation would be an international Convention ratified or adhered to by Member Governments.
- (d) The view was expressed that the possibility might be studied of creating, within the framework of the United Nations, an organization to receive, sift, examine, and deal with communications alleging the violation of human rights.

- (e) The suggestion was made that the terms of reference of the Commission on Human Rights be re-examined by the Economic and Social Council with a view to granting greater responsibility in this field to the Commission.
- (f) The Australian proposal for the creation of an International Court of Human Rights, which was submitted in the first session of the Commission on Human Rights, was again referred to by the Representative of Australia and discussed in general by the Drafting Committee.

[Although the document makes references to annexes, these were not included. They are of course included in the final version of the Report.]

Summary Record of the Fourteenth Meeting [of the Drafting Committee of the Commission on Human Rights]

Held at Lake Success, New York, Monday, 23 June 1947

at 10:30 a.m.

Present: Chairman: Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt (United States); Vice-Chairman: Dr. P. C. Chang (China); Rapporteur: Dr. Charles Malik (Lebanon). Mr. Ralph L. Harry

<sup>189</sup> This is the date of the meeting. The document was issued on 3 July 1947.

(Australia); Mr. H. Santa Cruz (Chile); Prof. René Cassin (France); Mr. Geoffrey Wilson (United Kingdom); Prof. V. Koretsky (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics). Specialized Agencies: Mr. J. Havet (UNESCO). Non-Governmental Organizations: Miss Toni Sender (American Federation of Labor); Mrs. Helen Fuhrman (International Co-Operative Alliance). Secretariat: Prof. J.P. Humphrey (Secretary of the Committee); Mr. Edward Lawson.

Consideration of Revised Suggestions Submitted by the Representative of France for Articles of an International Declaration on Human Rights
(document E/CN.4/AC.1/W.2/Rev.2)

PROF. KORETSKY (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) stated that in the Summary Record of the sixth meeting the proposal to draft a Manifesto and a Convention had been incorrectly reported as a decision of the Committee.

It was his understanding that no definite decision had been taken, though the Committee had considered the possibility that the Commission on Human Rights might prepare two such documents. He requested that the record be corrected.

THE CHAIRMAN stated that, in her understanding, no definite decision had been taken on any matter. In submitting its Report to the Commission on Human Rights, the Drafting Committee would present two documents, thereby endorsing the proposal to draft a Declaration and a Convention, but the Commission on Human Rights need not necessarily adopt this plan. With regard to the Summary Record of the sixth meeting, she requested the Secretariat to modify the wording.

Article 26

THE CHAIRMAN read the text of Article 26. She explained that Articles 21–26 had been discussed at an informal meeting held at Hyde Park on 22 June. Some difficulty had been experienced in phrasing Article 26. The United States wished to suggest the alternative wording “Everyone has the right to take an effective part, directly or through his representatives, in his Government.”

PROF. CASSIN (France) said that the English text as it stood seemed satisfactory to him except for the last sentence relating to public expenses, which he felt imposed an obligation and was not a right. MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) supported this view.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) preferred the United States draft: he felt that if the functions of Government are specified, they must all be stated, and he preferred that they should not be enumerated.

MR. HARRY (Australia) supported the United States text but suggested the alternative arrangement of words: "To take an effective part in his Government directly or through his representatives", which the Chairman accepted.

DR. CHANG (China) was in favour of the United States form, adding that Government included all forms of government, and not only State or territorial government as in the other text.

THE CHAIRMAN said that there was general agreement on the elimination of the last sentence of the text before them. She suggested that both versions of the first sentence should be submitted in the Declaration together with an explanatory note. She added that the United States alternative "in his Government" applied to all persons in non-self-governing territories as well as to all other people.

Note on Article 23

PROF. CASSIN (France) pointed out that "freedom of peaceful assembly" had been omitted from the text of Article 23, and it was agreed that this should be inserted.

MISS SENDER (AF of L) asked for an explanation of the suppression of the words "and other purposes compatible with this Declaration" which had existed in the original text.

MR. HARRY (Australia) explained that some limitation of the right of assembly and of association was involved, but all the limitations which would inevitably have to be included would appear in a Convention: if the Convention did not appear simultaneously with the Declaration this would need further elaboration. The Chairman added that a note to this effect would be inserted.

Article 27

THE CHAIRMAN read the text of Article 27 and proposed the addition of "and by secret ballot" which Prof. Cassin (France) said already existed in the French text.

MR. HARRY (Australia) proposed as a drafting change that the Article should form one complete sentence, omitting the words "these wishes are" from the second sentence.

PROF. CASSIN (France) stated that the division of the sentence was important, as elections were not the only means of manifesting the wishes of the people; the question of a referendum, as in Switzerland, must be borne in mind. The original text was intended to indicate that periodic free and fair elections are indispensable. He proposed the wording "These wishes are manifested particularly by democratic elections". Mr. Harry accepted this.

DR. MALIK (Lebanon) objected to the word “consent” in the first sentence. He said that this implied that the people are passive, whereas it is the intention of the Declaration that the people should take the initiative in determining the Government of the State. He proposed the substitution of the word “will” which was accepted.

The Article was thus amended to read “The State can derive its authority only from the will of the people and has a duty to conform thereto. This will is manifested particularly by democratic elections, which shall be periodic, free and fair, and by secret ballot.”

Article 28

THE CHAIRMAN read the text of Article 28 and drew the attention of the Committee to a previous discussion on the substance of this Article in which they had agreed to substitute “equal opportunity of engaging in all public employment, or offices of the State”, in the place of “occupying all public functions of the State”.

DR. CHANG (China) proposed the addition of the sentence “There shall be free access to public examinations for public employment”. He was in favour of the rest of the Article but suggested that the word “offices” might give rise to misunderstanding as some offices are elective.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) said that to include this sentence would indicate that the Committee was of the opinion that public offices should be filled by competitive examination. He pointed out that in Chile public offices are attained by examination up to a certain point only; the highest appointments are made through the will of the Executive or after consultation with the Legislative power. He felt that this meant too detailed specifications. DR. CHANG (China) felt there would be no objection to his wording if “offices” were omitted. MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) had no objection to Dr. Chang’s proposal but he pointed out that, as the Article aimed at the prevention of discrimination in public office, it should be referred to the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities.

PROF. CASSIN (France) felt that the text should be left as it stood. The purpose was to prevent discrimination in the selection of officials and to guard against the abuse of power by them. He pointed out that in his original text he had indicated that recruitment should be on the basis of merit, by competitive examination or by consideration of the qualifications of the candidate: it had been suggested that reference should be made to Article 101 of the Charter. Prof. Cassin felt that this was becoming too detailed and belonged to a commentary rather than the Article. If reference is made to examinations, a more general wording must be adopted.

THE CHAIRMAN suggested the alternative wording for the second sentence “Access to examination for public employment shall not be a matter of privilege or favour”.

PROF. KORETSKY (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) considered that the Chinese suggestion represented an internal matter for each Government. Examinations do not necessarily ensure democratization of the governmental system, nor are they always carried out in complete objectivity. He felt that if the Government trusted the scientific institutions responsible for the education of prospective officials, examinations would be unnecessary. He was against the inclusion of such a detailed provision in Article 28.

THE CHAIRMAN suggested that the Article should be submitted with the two alternatives, reading: "Everyone shall have equal opportunity of engaging in all public employment of the State of which he is a citizen." A note would then be inserted stating that some members wished the insertion of: "Access to examination for public employment shall not be a matter of privilege or favour." A further note would be inserted indicating the difference of opinion, and the suggestion that the Article be referred to the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities, after which it might be elaborated further.

Article 29

THE CHAIRMAN read the text of the Article and suggested the alternative wording "Everyone has the right to a fair and equal opportunity to perform socially useful work . . ." As this was the beginning of the section on economic and social rights, the Chairman drew the attention of the Committee to the United States proposals on page 43 of document E/CN.4/AC.1/11, which, it was felt, covered the substance of Articles 29, 31 and 34 of the text before the Committee.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) suggested the suppression of the last sentence "Full development of his personality" as this was covered by Article 2.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) supported the United Kingdom proposal. He compared the United States proposal with the text put forward by Prof. Cassin (France) and declared himself in favour of the latter. Here the right to work is established, and in the United States proposal it is the right to equal opportunity of employment. In modern conditions, he felt it was essential to establish the right to employment. MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) referred to a speech made by President Roosevelt in 1943 concerning the need for a new United States Bill of Rights<sup>190</sup> which would establish the right to useful and remunerative work, and added that this right has been unanimously adopted by meetings of the International Labour Organization and the Conferences on Social Security.

<sup>190</sup> In his 11 January 1944 State of the Union speech to Congress, President Roosevelt insisted on the recognition of economic and social rights. He said: "We have come to a clear realization of the fact that true individual freedom cannot exist without economic security and independence. 'Necessitous men are not free men.' People who are hungry and out of a job are the stuff of which dictatorships are made. In our day these economic truths have become accepted as self-evident. We have accepted, so to speak, a second Bill of Rights under which a new basis of security and prosperity can be established for all – regardless of station, race, or creed."

PROF. CASSIN (France) explained the purpose and importance of this Article. In two wars, the State had demanded the maximum from millions of men and in these crises had taken over the control of the entire economy of the country. Unfortunately, it was a fact that after the crises it had not been possible to find employment for all these men. He admitted that unemployment cannot be overcome immediately but he felt that the Declaration should establish fundamental rights, such as the right to work, for the future.

THE CHAIRMAN stated that the United States had no real objection to this Article except to the idea of “duty to work” which implied an obligation. She wished to point out that, as it is not possible to do more than give fair and equal opportunity to work, the United States had felt that their alternative expressed more accurately what they were trying to achieve at this time.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) admitted that realization of the right to work in all countries was for the future but if the Declaration were to be adjusted only to existing conditions it would not achieve a very useful purpose. He felt that the Bill should establish fundamental rights, and that countries should try to find means to adjust their legislation accordingly.

PROF. KORETSKY (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) stated that the right to work should be placed next to the right to live. He referred to Article 118 of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics Constitution, and stated that Governments which had not yet implemented this right would do so eventually. He felt it was essential that it should appear in the Declaration.

The Article was adopted to read: “Everyone has the right to perform socially useful work”.

Article 30

THE CHAIRMAN read the text of Article 30 and referred to previous discussion by the Drafting Committee on slavery, in which it had been suggested that this Article be omitted. It was agreed to eliminate the Article.

[8]

Article 31

THE CHAIRMAN read the text of Article 31. There were no comments.

Article 32

THE CHAIRMAN read the text of Article 32. MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) pointed out that the substance of this Article was included in the establishment of the right of association. It was agreed to omit this Article.

MISS SENDER (AF of L) agreed to its omission but said that if it were retained the right of the individual to be represented through free organization should be stated.

Article 33

THE CHAIRMAN read the text of Article 33 and stated that the United States supported the substance of the Article but preferred the wording which it had submitted on page 40 of document E/CN.4/AC.1/11, as this was an adaptation of the Constitution of the World Health Organization.<sup>191</sup>

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) said that this entire section, which established economic and social rights, should be referred to the appropriate Specialized Agencies for their consideration and comment.

PROF. CASSIN (France) recognized the value of the United States suggestion but he wished to have a separate Article referring to Social Security.

DR. MALIK (Lebanon) proposed the addition in paragraph 2 of the word “community”.

The Article was adopted to read: “Everyone, without distinction of economic and social condition, has the right to the highest attainable standard of health. The responsibility of the State and community for the health and safety of its people can be fulfilled only by provision of adequate health and social measures”.

Article 34

THE CHAIRMAN read the text of Article 34, together with the United States alternative proposal, which was accepted by Prof. Cassin (France).

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) stressed the importance of social security. He drew attention to a Chilean proposal based on a Conference on Social Security [9] held in Chile in 1942,<sup>192</sup> for a provision on these lines to be included in the Preamble.

<sup>192</sup> The First Inter-American Conference on Social Security was held in Santiago, Chile from 10 to 16 September 1942. The Conference, under the auspices of the Inter-American Committee to Promote Social Security established in 1940, was attended by delegates from 21 countries on the American continent.

Prof. Cassin's text provided for Social Security measures, as the only means of protecting an individual against social insecurity and he preferred the wider implication of the United States text. He felt that if the United States text and the Chilean proposal for the Preamble were adopted, the problem would have been adequately covered.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that all suggestions for the Preamble would go forward to the Commission on Human Rights in the form in which they were made.

Article 34 was adopted in the form put forward by the United States.

Article 35

THE CHAIRMAN read the text of the Article, and proposed the addition of the words "without exclusion of private educational facilities or institutions", indicating the importance of these facilities in the United States. She suggested further the omission of the words "access to" in paragraph 2 and the phrase referring to discrimination, as this was already frequently stated.

DR. MALIK (Lebanon) suggested that either "entitled to learning" or "right to education" might be omitted as both seemed to mean the same thing. He objected that this Article made no reference to the content of education and he felt that this should be stressed by stating the principles of the Charter; otherwise, there was possibility of abuse.

He supported the United States proposal to protect private institutions.

PROF. CASSIN (France) appreciated Dr. Malik's proposal but stated that, if the principle of the right of association were not elaborated as had been agreed, then the right to education should not be elaborated either.

Concerning private institutions, he proposed that this should not be mentioned specifically but that a commentary be added to line 1 which would leave Nations free to establish educational institutions in accordance with their respective systems: the present wording of line 1 left the question open.

Prof. Cassin (France) indicated the importance of retaining the provision concerning discrimination on the grounds of social standing or financial means.

PROF. KORETSKY (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) was not in favour of the additional provision relating to private institutions. He felt that education should be free, and referred to the provisions in the Constitution of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. He was strongly in favour of retaining the entire clause relating to discrimination.

THE CHAIRMAN said that she had no objection to retaining the entire clause on discrimination.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) declared himself in agreement in principle with the Representatives from France and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. He proposed the omission of the words “youths and adults” in paragraph 2, and of the word “beneficiaries”. He suggested that the whole of paragraph 2 required rewording to state more accurately what was intended; it should say that technical, professional and higher education shall be available to all without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion, and access to these facilities shall be on the basis of merit alone. This would cover the point about social standing and financial means, which need not then be mentioned.

Concerning the provision relating to private institutions, he felt it might be covered if the wording were changed in paragraph 1 to read: “Primary education is obligatory for all children and adequate facilities free of charge shall be provided by the State”, thus leaving the establishment of private institutions an open question.

THE CHAIRMAN said she would accept this alternative wording, but indicated the reason for the inclusion of the word “adults”: it was generally recognized that educational facilities should be afforded the young but it was only gradually being recognized that older people also might have the right to educational opportunities.

MR. HARRY (Australia) said that the distinction between the rights and duties of States should be maintained: compulsory education was not on the same footing as the right to education. He suggested the alternative wording “Primary education must be available free of charge.” He considered that the question of private educational facilities was a separate question but was perhaps not excluded under this alternative wording.

Mr. Harry felt that no obligation should be laid down for a State to maintain a particular type or particular degree of education; this must vary according to the resources of the country and the type of community. There must be equal opportunity of access to all institutions of higher learning which are maintained by the State or community.

MISS SENDER (AF of L) requested that in the sentence relating to discrimination the word “beliefs”, that is, political beliefs, should be inserted after “religion”.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) was in agreement with the provisions to recognize the right to education and the obligation to provide free primary education and equal access to higher education, which should be limited by the resources of the State and the capacity of the beneficiary. He felt that the suggestions were best covered by the draft of the Inter-American Juridical Committee, reading:

“The State has the right to assist the individual in the exercise of the right to education, higher and professional, in accordance with the resources of the State. The opportunities of education must be open to all on equal terms in accordance with their natural capacities and their desires to take advantage of the facilities available.”

THE CHAIRMAN requested Mr. Harry to examine the Inter-American Juridical Committee's draft and, on the basis of that and the observations of members of the Committee, to redraft Article 35, to be considered further at the next meeting.

Summary Record of the Fifteenth Meeting [of the Drafting Committee of the Commission on Human Rights]

23 June 1947, at 2:30 p.m.

Present: Chairman: Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt (United States); Vice-Chairman: Dr. P. C. Chang (China); Rapporteur: Dr. Charles Malik (Lebanon). Members: Mr. Ralph L. Harry (Australia); Mr. H. Santa Cruz (Chile); Prof. René Cassin (France); Mr. Geoffrey Wilson (United Kingdom); Prof. V. Koretsky (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics). Representatives of Specialized Agencies: Representatives of Non-Governmental Organizations: Miss T. Sender (American Federation of Labor). Secretariat: Prof. John P. Humphrey (Secretary of the Committee); Mr. Edward Lawson.

1. Consideration of Articles 35 to 42 of the Revised Suggestions Submitted by the Representative of France for Articles of the International Declaration of Rights (document E/CN.4/AC.1/W.2/Rev.2)

Article 35

MR. HARRY (Australia) read Article 35 as amended by him, taking as a basis the Chilean Draft and other suggestions which had been made:

“Everyone has the right to education and is entitled to primary education at the expense of the State or community in which he resides. There must, in addition, be equal access for all on the [2] basis of merits and without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion to such facilities for higher education as can be provided by the State or community within the limits of its resources.”

THE CHAIRMAN asked whether or not it was the consensus of opinion that any reference to private educational facilities and institutions should be omitted. Speaking as the Representative of the United States, she declared herself in favour of including a clause to this effect.

<sup>193</sup> This is the date of the meeting. The document was issued on 3 July 1947.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) expressed his satisfaction with the new Draft, but suggested that the idea of considering education as an obligation should be incorporated in this Article.

Articles 36 and 37

While waiting for the written version of the amended text, THE CHAIRMAN read Article 36.

DR. CHANG (China) thought that the right to a fair share of rest and leisure might be separated from the right to the knowledge of the outside world which could be included in the subject of education.

PROF. CASSIN (France) maintained that it differed from education but felt that perhaps a better formula could be found to express this idea. He added that everyone, not only labourers, should have the right to leisure.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) suggested the omission of Article 36 entirely. He said that the substance of this Article might be covered by provisions on education and freedom of information, and that it would involve also the question of freedom of travel. If it was to be retained, it should be spelt out explicitly.

PROF. KORETSKY (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) remarked that the right to rest and leisure should be treated in relation to working conditions and circumstances of social life, and that the right to the knowledge of the outside world was a matter of information. Referring to countries in which workers still do not enjoy the right to a vacation, he thought it would be better to place this Article near the Article dealing with the right to work.

PROF. CASSIN (France) accepted this suggestion.

THE CHAIRMAN stated that it should be moved forward to become Article 32. She asked the Committee to decide whether the phrase “to the knowledge of the outside world” should be retained. She thought that it might be included as a footnote to the Article dealing with freedom of information.

PROF. CASSIN (France) felt that the advancement of culture was intended by this phrase and that it had no direct relation to freedom of information.

THE CHAIRMAN wondered whether it could not be included in Article 37.

PROF. CASSIN (France) suggested this might be done by the insertion of the words “to broaden his knowledge and outlook through the knowledge of his fellow-men”, preceding “to share in the benefits of science” in Article 37.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) pointed out this Article was Article 44 of the Secretariat Draft. The idea that scientific inventions should be made available to every individual should be included in this Article.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) said that while the rights set forth in Article 37 should not be denied to the individual, they were very different from the other Articles, and he felt it would be better to include them in the Preamble. PROF. CASSIN (France) agreed to the deletion of “to the knowledge of the outside world” as a result of the discussion.

THE CHAIRMAN stated that Article 36 would now read: “Everyone has the right to a fair share of rest and leisure.” It was the general consensus of opinion that Article 37 be retained as it stood, with a footnote saying that the substance of the Article might be included in the Preamble instead of being spelt out in the Declaration. DR. CHANG (China) asked for an explanation of the phrase “share in the benefits of science” in Article 37. MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) said that in the Chilean Draft, it was stated that scientific inventions should belong to society and be enjoyed by all.

THE CHAIRMAN said that Article 37, as amended, would read: “Everyone has the right to participate in the cultural life of the community, to enjoy the arts and to share in the benefits that result from scientific inventions and discoveries”. She added that a footnote could be attached to this [4] Article, stating that it might be proper to include the substance of this Article in the Preamble.

Article 35

Returning to Article 35, THE CHAIRMAN, speaking as the Representative of the United States, proposed the addition of the following sentence: “This will not exclude private educational facilities and institutions.”

DR. CHANG (China) proposed that the Article should read:

“Everyone has the right to education. Primary education shall be obligatory and shall be provided by the State or community in which he lives. There shall be equal access to technical, cultural and higher education as can be provided by the State or community on the basis of merit and without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion.”

THE CHAIRMAN proposed the deletion of the words “in which he lives” and Dr. Chang accepted this amendment.

PROF. CASSIN (France) thought that as some States had not adopted the system of compulsory primary education, it would be unsuitable to introduce this idea in the Article.

MR. HARRY (Australia) said that his draft did not imply compulsory education and did not exclude private educational facilities and institutions. He agreed that the words “Everyone has the right to education” might form a separate sentence.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) was not in favour of including the idea of obligatory education here as work had not been regarded as compulsory in this Declaration. He was not in favour of any reference to private educational facilities and institutions.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) thought that if the right to primary education were included it would not be necessary to refer to private educational facilities and institutions.

MR. HARRY (Australia) proposed as the second sentence of his amended [5] text: "Primary education should be free and compulsory", which would incorporate the idea of obligation suggested by the Representative of Chile.

THE CHAIRMAN, speaking as the Representative of the United States, said that obligatory education differed from obligatory work. As the child is too young to defend his rights, his right to education should be protected for him. She felt that private institutions of learning should be recognized.

THE CHAIRMAN read the amended text:

"Everyone has the right to education. Primary education shall be free and compulsory. There shall be equal access for all to technical, cultural and higher education as can be provided by the State or community on the basis of merit and without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion."

PROF. CASSIN (France) said that "social conditions and standing" should be added to the clause on discrimination.

DR. CHANG (China) stated that he had no objection to the inclusion of reference to social standing or political belief.

Article 38

THE CHAIRMAN said that Article 38 referred to special groups and not to individual rights. She felt it was therefore out of place and should be omitted.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) shared this view, but asked Prof. Cassin what was intended by this Article. PROF. CASSIN (France) said it was intended to protect not only the pecuniary rights of the artist but also his spiritual or moral rights to what he has created.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) believed that some of the items mentioned in this Article belonged to the domain of copyrights. PROF. CASSIN (France) said that he would agree to a footnote to this Article, saying that it might be implemented by a Convention. The Chairman stated that a footnote would be added to the Article saying that, while this idea might not be included in the Declaration, it should receive consideration for treatment on an international basis.

THE CHAIRMAN remarked that Articles 40, 41 and 42, which dealt with the question of implementation, should be considered as suggestions for the Commission on Human Rights but should not be included in the Declaration.

PROF. CASSIN (France) considered that Article 39 was one of the most important Articles as the prevention of discrimination should be emphasized in the Declaration. However, the language in this Article should be appropriate for situations existing all over the world, and suggested that the word “conglomeration” might be better than the word “persons”. He proposed that this provision be referred for further study to the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities. THE CHAIRMAN said that this Article, as it stood, might give rise to difficult problems and that it should be referred to the Sub-Commission for careful study before any pronouncement on it could be made.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) remarked that many countries of America had been created by immigration of people from other countries and that the form and substance of this Article called for most careful consideration.

DR. MALIK (Lebanon) said that the substance of this Article seemed to be what divided the New World from the Old. In the Old World, there were wide divisions of ethnic groups. In the New World, there was assimilation. He did not object to referring this Article to the Sub-Commission for further study, but insisted that the idea should be included in the Declaration.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) believed that when the time was ripe, something along the lines of the draft Article should be included in the Declaration. However, he deemed it unwise to refer the text of this Article to the Sub-Commission as it would then carry the endorsement of the Drafting Committee. He felt the Secretariat should bring this Article to the Sub-Commission’s attention.

THE CHAIRMAN thought that a footnote might be attached to the Article saying that this was a draft based on the Secretariat Draft.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) opposed the idea of presenting any draft, either to the [7] Sub-Commission or to the Commission on Human Rights.

THE CHAIRMAN stated that the substance, not the wording, was important. MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) agreed with her, and said that he would like to reserve his right to state his position on this question, which he felt was very important, at a later stage. DR. MALIK (Lebanon) maintained that the question did not necessarily refer to “minority” groups but was concerned rather with rights of ethnical groups in a body politic.

THE CHAIRMAN thought that the Committee might decide to refer the substance of Article 39 of the Commission on Human Rights for its consideration as to whether or not it should be referred to the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities.

DR. MALIK (Lebanon) said that it would be better to state that there had been discussion of Article 39 in the Drafting Committee but the Committee did not take any action and decided to refer the matter to the Commission on Human Rights for possible reference to the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities.

THE CHAIRMAN, commenting on Articles 40, 41 and 42, said that these Articles might go into a Convention with the exception of the last paragraph of Article 42 which might be included in the Declaration. MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) thought that the idea contained in the last paragraph of Article 42 was already included in Point 5 of the Preamble, and that it was therefore unessential to have it as an Article. THE CHAIRMAN supported him.

PROF. CASSIN (France) maintained that Article 42 dealt more with the internal affairs of the State, and that it might be better to include it in a Convention. He felt that provisions should be made to deal with the violation of human rights by public authorities.

THE CHAIRMAN thought the Committee might suggest that Article 41 should be the subject for a Convention and the second paragraph of Article 42 might be suitable for the Declaration.

Consideration of the Draft Report of the Drafting Committee to the Commission on Human Rights (document E/CN.4/AC.1/14)

THE CHAIRMAN announced that the Drafting Committee would consider the Rapporteur's draft Report (document E/CN.4/AC.1/14) and called upon Dr. Malik (Lebanon), as Rapporteur, to introduce it.

DR. MALIK (Lebanon) explained that the Report consisted of a five and one-half page statement to which would be appended six Annexes, namely:

1. Draft Outline of International Bill of Rights prepared by the Secretariat;
2. Document submitted by the United Kingdom;
3. Suggestions of the United States for redrafts of certain Articles in the Secretariat Draft Outline;
4. Suggestions submitted by the Representative of France for the Preamble and 44 Articles of an International Declaration on Human Rights;
5. Working Paper containing suggestions of the Drafting Committee for an International Declaration on Human Rights; and
6. Memorandum on Implementation Prepared by the Secretariat.

He proposed that the Drafting Committee should study the Report paragraph by paragraph and approve it Chapter by Chapter. He pointed out that the Report contained three chapters:

1. Introduction;
2. Preliminary Draft of an International Bill of Human Rights; and
3. The Question of Implementation of an International Bill of Human Rights.

THE CHAIRMAN agreed to the suggested method of procedure and stated that she would ask for comments or objections on each paragraph.

Paragraph 1

MR. HARRY (Australia) requested that the Representative of Australia be listed as Lt. Col. W.R. Hodgson.

Paragraph 2

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) suggested that the order of names be changed to correspond to the order in paragraph 1.

Paragraph 3

Paragraph 3 was accepted without objection.

Paragraph 4

Paragraph 4 was accepted without objection.

[3]

Paragraph 5

Paragraph 5 was accepted without objection.

Paragraph 6

Paragraph 6 was accepted without objection.

Paragraph 7

Paragraph 7 was accepted without objection.

Paragraph 8

THE CHAIRMAN observed that it was necessary for the Committee to decide who was to present the report.

DR. MALIK (Lebanon) said he believed the Rules of Procedure provided that the report be presented by the Chairman, or in the absence of the Chairman, by the Rapporteur. This view was accepted by the Drafting Committee.

Paragraph 9

DR. MALIK (Lebanon) explained that the purpose of this paragraph was to remind the reader that greater details could be obtained from the verbatim and summary records.

Paragraph 10

THE CHAIRMAN recalled that it had not been possible to reach full agreement on any text inasmuch as one of their colleagues had had to reserve his position on many items. She suggested that paragraph 10 might either be deleted or be modified to read:

“It was agreed that, when necessary, alternative texts were to be submitted to the Commission on Human Rights.”

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) said that since, in several instances, the question had arisen as to whether or not to include an Article, the following might be more suitable:

“It was agreed that where more than one view was taken about any Article, the different views expressed should be submitted to the Commission on Human Rights.”

MR. HARRY (Australia) said he had circulated to Members an amendment to paragraph 10 which read:

“It was agreed that in appropriate cases alternative texts, reflecting the views of a minority or of an individual Representative, might be submitted to the Commission on Human Rights.”

However, because he agreed with the suggested wording of Mr. Wilson, he withdrew his amendment.

PROF. KORETSKY (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) stated that neither paragraph 10, nor the suggested wording of the Australian and United Kingdom Representatives, corresponded to the lines of thought that had been indicated at the meetings of the Committee. He felt that the inclusion of paragraph 10 or either one of the proposed redrafts, might give the impression that there were different drafts for each Article. In the Drafting Committee, only various views had been expressed, broad formulas had been suggested, and a consensus of opinion had been reached as to the desirability of including certain items in the Declaration or Convention.

THE CHAIRMAN explained that the Committee was submitting the views expressed during the course of its session in a working paper which was not binding upon any individual or Government. DR. CHANG (China) suggested that the words “it was agreed” be deleted. He felt that it might even be possible to omit the entire paragraph.

THE CHAIRMAN agreed that the paragraph might be omitted. PROF. KORETSKY (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) thought the suggestion of Dr. Chang was a logical one and favoured complete elimination of the paragraph. He said that perhaps some mention might be made of this point in Chapter II. MR. HARRY (Australia) agreed to elimination of the paragraph. DR. MALIK (Lebanon) explained that the original terms of reference had requested the Drafting Committee to prepare a preliminary draft of an International Bill of Human Rights. Inasmuch as the Drafting Committee had not actually prepared [5] such a Preliminary Draft, he felt that an explanatory reference to the discrepancy was necessary. He would, however, agree, should the Drafting Committee so wish, to the deletion of the paragraph.

THE CHAIRMAN stated paragraph 10 could be deleted and that the Chairman or the Rapporteur, in presenting the Report to the Commission on Human Rights, might explain the manner in which the work was done and the difficulties encountered.

Chapter II

Paragraph 11

Paragraph 11 was accepted without objection.

Paragraph 12

MR. HARRY (Australia) pointed out that in paragraph 11 it was said that on the basis of documentation supplied by the Secretariat a preliminary draft of an International Bill of Human Rights was to be prepared. In paragraph 12, it was stated that two basic documents had formed the basis of the Drafting Committee's work. He believed that the correct emphasis had not been given to the documents, and suggested the following wording:

"In addition to the draft outline of an International Bill of Rights prepared by the Secretariat (document E/CN.4/AC.1/3 and E/CN.4/AC.1/3/Add.1) the Drafting Committee had before it a letter from the United Kingdom Representative transmitting a draft International Bill of Human Rights and a draft Resolution which might be passed by the General Assembly when adopting an International Bill of Rights."

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) was in favour of the Australian amendment. The Chairman accepted the changes suggested by Mr. Harry (Australia), but wished to have the words "gone over" replaced by "considered" or "examined".

Paragraph 12 was approved as modified by the Australian amendment, with the words "gone over" replaced by "considered".

DR. MALIK (Lebanon) suggested that Annexes A, B and C might be accepted at this stage.

Annexes A, B and C were accepted without objection.

Paragraph 13

MR. HARRY (Australia) remarked that the lack of full verbatim records made it difficult to refer to previous discussions. In view of that fact, he believed that there should not be too strict an adherence to the summary records, but that expression be given to general thoughts and feelings. As he recalled, there had been two stages in the development of the Drafting Committee's work. At the first stage, the Committee had considered as its basic task the preparation of a Convention. As a result of its discussions, it was generally recognized that a Declaration also should be drafted. He therefore, suggested the following Amendment to replace that part of the paragraph starting "in the opinion of others there should also be a Convention":

“others felt that it should be in the form of a Convention. It was agreed by those who favoured the Declaration form that the Declaration should be accompanied or followed by a convention or conventions on specific groups of rights. It was agreed by those who favoured the convention form that the General Assembly in recommending a convention to Member Nations might make a Declaration wider in content but more general in expression. The Drafting Committee therefore decided to prepare two documents, one a working paper outlining a Declaration or Manifesto setting forth general principles, and the second a working paper outlining a convention on those matters which the Committee felt could be expressed in the form of binding obligations on States.”

THE CHAIRMAN said that the United States would accept these changes.

DR. MALIK (Lebanon) while in favour of the first part, could not accept the second part of the Australian amendment. The Committee was not actually submitting a draft convention but was suggesting to the Commission on Human Rights that the topics contained in the United Kingdom draft might serve as a basis for discussion of the possible substantive contents of a Convention. MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) felt that the Australian Amendment met the situation adequately. THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the Committee [7] had accepted the first part of the Australian Amendment, and she suggested that Mr. Harry and the Rapporteur might wish to present a joint draft of the second part of the paragraph. MR. HARRY (Australia) agreed with the Rapporteur that the last sentence of his amendment did not completely indicate the status of the documents.

DR. MALIK (Lebanon) said that, in writing the Report, he had tried to summarize the general consensus of opinion where there had been no decisions. He could not consider the two working papers as being on a par and he therefore felt that a slight difference in expression would be necessary.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) was of the opinion that the Australian Amendment recorded quite accurately what had occurred.

PROF. KORETSKY (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) felt that the question as to whether the document should be drafted in one or two forms would have to be considered by the Commission on Human Rights. He also thought that a more suitable word might replace the word “adhere”.

THE CHAIRMAN requested the Rapporteur and the Representative of Australia to take into account the suggestions of Prof. Koretsky in their attempted redraft of the last part of the paragraph. It was agreed that the section to be redrafted began with the words “The Drafting Committee therefore decided . . .”.

Paragraph 14

PROF. KORETSKY (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) felt that sub-paragraph (c) required further qualification to indicate its conditional character. He desired the addition of a phrase such as “if it were considered that this were appropriate”.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) observed that sub-paragraphs (a), (b) and (c) were simply the terms of reference of the working group.

MR. HARRY (Australia) suggested the wording “to suggest to the Drafting Committee how the substance of the Articles might be divided between a Declaration and a Convention,” which was supported by MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile). [8]

DR. MALIK (Lebanon) however, pointed out that this would lead to a discrepancy between the summary record and the Report.

PROF. KORETSKY (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) accepted the Australian proposal. He said that he objected to a categorical statement and stressed the importance of the inclusion of a conditional element.

THE CHAIRMAN was of the opinion that sub-paragraph (c), as it stood, expressed accurately what had actually been done by the working group. She felt that the consensus was to retain the wording of the summary record as it appeared in sub-paragraph (c).

DR. CHANG (China) said that inasmuch as the Summary Record had not been passed by the Committee, there might be opportunity to change the phrasing. He proposed that the terminology used at the intermediate stage of discussions might be appropriate: “to undertake a division of the work indicating which Articles would require International Conventions and which would not”.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) said it was necessary for this paragraph of the Report to correspond to what had happened at the time the working group was set up.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) and PROF. KORETSKY (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) favoured the Australian proposal.

The proposal of Mr. Harry (Australia) was accepted, as sub-paragraph (c).

Paragraph 15

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) suggested that line 2 of page 4 be altered to read: “. . . United Kingdom agreed that the Articles contained in Part II of the Draft Convention of the United Kingdom document . . .” and that the word “should” be replaced by “might”. PROF. KORETSKY (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) wondered what principles lay behind the grouping together of torture, physical integrity and cruel punishments in sub-paragraph (a). DR. MALIK (Lebanon) said they had been grouped as natural rights of the [9] sheer physical body of man. PROF. KORETSKY (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) thought that “physical integrity” might be placed first.

Paragraph 15 was accepted, with the modifications of MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) and Prof. Koretsky (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics).

Paragraph 16

Paragraph 16 was accepted without objection.

Paragraph 17

THE CHAIRMAN stated that she wished to have it noted that “The United States reserved the right to urge before the Commission the inclusion, in the Declaration, of the United States rewording of Articles in the Secretariat draft.”

PROF. KORETSKY (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) remarked that in the final sentence it might perhaps be sufficient to say “observations”, without any additional synonyms. He pointed out that all Representatives had reserved their positions.

In the sixth line of the paragraph, MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) thought it preferable to say “nothing said by any of them” rather than “no action taken by them”. Inasmuch as all Representatives had reserved their right to make comments at a later time, he proposed the following sentence:

“All Members of the Drafting Committee understood that nothing said by any of them during the session was to be considered binding upon their Governments, and reserved the right to make further suggestions at a later stage.”

DR. MALIK (Lebanon) observed, in connection with Prof. Koretsky’s remarks that “proposals” was not synonymous with “observations” and thought that both words should be retained.

PROF. KORETSKY (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said he would agree to the inclusion of both words.

[10]

At this point in the meeting, Dr. Chang (China) Vice-Chairman, took the chair and Mr. Hendrick<sup>195</sup> replaced Mrs. Roosevelt as Representative of the United States.

Paragraph 18

DR. MALIK (Lebanon) suggested that “considered” be substituted for “gone over”.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) felt it was not necessary to include the word “carefully”. He also suggested the following revision of the second sentence:

“This revised Draft was examined by the Drafting Committee, and Annex E of this report embodies the general consensus of opinion which resulted from this examination.”

<sup>195</sup> James P. Hendrick (1902–1990) worked for the State Department as principal advisor to Eleanor Roosevelt from 1946–1948 and later served as Deputy Assistant Secretary of the Treasury Department from 1962–1969.

PROF. KORETSKY (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) wished the word “carefully” excluded from paragraph 12 as well as from the paragraph under discussion. MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) agreed.

MR. HENDRICK (United States) proposed that the suggestion of Mr. Wilson, as regards the second sentence of the paragraph, be expressed in two sentences, thus: “This revised Draft was examined by the Drafting Committee and changes in wording were made. The Draft as revised by the Committee is embodied in Annex E of this report.”

DR. MALIK (Lebanon) pointed out that inasmuch as paragraph 10 had been deleted, no mention was made of alternative texts. He thought it should be stressed that Annex E was not an univocal but a multivocal document.

MR. HARRY (Australia) thought that this might be an appropriate place to make mention of alternative texts. He proposed that the following be inserted:

“The Drafting Committee decided that where a substantial minority view existed as to the text which should be submitted to the Commission, or if a particular delegation wished a text to go forward, this should be included.”

DR. MALIK (Lebanon) said a simpler form would be an adaptation of paragraph 10 and suggested “Where alternative texts were entertained, they are thus reproduced in this Annex”.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) suggested that a redraft of this paragraph might be considered during the noon recess.

The meeting adjourned at 1:00 p.m.

Summary Record of the Seventeenth Meeting [of the Drafting Committee of the Commission on Human Rights]

at 2:30 p.m.

Present: Chairman: Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt (United States of America) (Dr. P. C. Chang presided over the first part of the meeting); Vice-Chairman: Dr. P. C. Chang (China); Rapporteur: Dr. Charles Malik (Lebanon). Members: Mr. Ralph Harry (Australia); Mr. H. Santa Cruz (Chile); Mr. P. Ordonneau (France); Mr. Geoffrey Wilson (United Kingdom);

<sup>196</sup> This is the date of the meeting. The document was issued on 3 July 1947.

Prof. V. Koretsky (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics); Mr. James Hendrick (United States of America) (In the absence of Mrs. Roosevelt).

Continuation of the Discussion of the Draft Report of the Drafting Committee to the Commission on Human Rights (Document E/CN.4/AC.1/14)

In the absence of the Chairman, DR. CHANG, the Vice-Chairman, temporarily presided.

Paragraph 13

THE RAPPORTEUR read the amended text as drafted by Mr. Harry (Australia) and himself. Attention was drawn to the omission from the text as read, of the phrase “while recognizing that the decision as to the form of the Bill was a matter for the Commission” in the first line of the last sentence.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) suggested the omission of the words “possible” and “readily” in lines 4 and 5 of the last sentence, which was accepted.

The last sentence was thus amended to read: “The Drafting Committee, therefore, while recognizing that the decision as to the form of the Bill was a matter for the Commission, decided to attempt to prepare two documents, one a working paper outlining a Draft Convention on those matters which the Committee felt might lend themselves to formulation as binding obligations.” The first part of the paragraph was adopted as read by the Rapporteur.

Paragraph 18

THE RAPPORTEUR read the amended text as drafted by the Representative of the United States and himself. This was accepted without comment.

Paragraph 19

THE RAPPORTEUR read the text of the paragraph.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) stated that in his recollection, agreement had been reached on the substance of matters for inclusion in the Convention with the understanding that all members reserved the right to make further comments after consultation with legal experts. He proposed that Part II of the United Kingdom Draft should be included under Annex E in the form in which it had emerged from the Committee, that is, with the addition of the United States text on compulsory labour and the two additions he had made relating to torture and the right to a legal personality.

PROF. KORETSKY (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) referred to the last part of paragraph 19 concerning the United Kingdom Draft forming the basis for a draft Convention, and objected that this wording did not accurately correspond to the decisions of the Drafting Committee. It was contemplated that the United Kingdom Draft might serve as a working paper for a preliminary Convention if and when it had been decided to draft a Convention, a decision which must be left to the Commission on Human Rights. Prof. Koretsky felt that the wording of this paragraph should be brought in [3] line with paragraph 18.

DR. MALIK (Lebanon) suggested that this difficulty might be met if the phrase were reworded to read: “. . . suggests that the United Kingdom proposal may form a working paper for a preliminary Draft Convention . . .”

MR. HARRY (Australia) referred to a proposed amendment submitted earlier by him and suggested that the status of the United Kingdom Draft would be clarified if the first sentence of this proposal were inserted: “The Drafting Committee decided that owing to the short time available, it could not prepare a complete Draft Convention for submission to the Commission on Human Rights.”

DR. MALIK (Lebanon) agreed that this would explain why the Convention had not been elaborated in as much detail as Prof. Cassin’s Draft Declaration.

MR. HENDRICK (United States of America) stated that the addition would be acceptable to him.

PROF. KORETSKY (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that all additions should be in accordance with the opinions recorded in the Summary Records so that the Commission on Human Rights would take note of the comments.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) proposed that a phrase might be included stating that members reserved their position until they could take legal advice.

MR. HARRY (Australia) agreed to the principle of this suggestion, but felt that it should be a separate sentence or paragraph; it would explain to the Commission on Human Rights without reference to the Summary Records why the Convention had not been considered in as much detail as the Convention [sic].

PROF. KORETSKY (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) felt this point should not be mentioned. He considered that the Australian text indicated that the Drafting Committee had accepted the United Kingdom Draft as appropriate for inclusion in a Convention. [4]

THE CHAIRMAN was also of the opinion that it should be made clear that the decision to draft a Convention rested with the Commission on Human Rights.

DR. MALIK (Lebanon) felt that this was implicit in the words “which the Commission on Human Rights may wish to elaborate”.

THE CHAIRMAN felt that the shortness of time and the need to consult legal experts should be included in this paragraph. He was supported by MR. WILSON (United Kingdom).

MR. HENDRICK (United States of America) suggested that the Australian proposal be adopted and the last sentence amended to read “which the Commission on Human Rights may wish to consider and elaborate”.

PROF. KORETSKY (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) was opposed to the inclusion of the Australian text. He felt that it drew attention to technical reasons for delay in consideration of the Convention, which was inaccurate. At the present time it was premature to consider a Convention in detail: until a decision had been taken on whether or not there was to be a Convention it was impossible to decide on the contents of such a document. The Drafting Committee had considered Part II of the United Kingdom Draft but it had been repeatedly stated that no decisions were taken.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the shortness of time was already implied in the text before the Committee.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) suggested an alternative text for paragraph 19 (which he submitted in written form later in the session) and the Committee passed to the consideration of the next item.

Chapter III, Paragraph 20

THE RAPPORTEUR read the text of this chapter and explained the contents of the first paragraph: the terms of reference of the Drafting Committee contained no mention of implementation, but a discussion on implementation had taken place, occasioned by the discussion of the United Kingdom Draft.

[5]

Paragraph I explained to the Commission on Human Rights the reason why implementation had been discussed in the Drafting Committee.

THE CHAIRMAN proposed the deletion of the word “again” on Page 6, paragraph (f), line 3, which was accepted.

PROF. KORETSKY (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) objected that this section did not make it clear that some of the proposals mentioned had evoked strong objections. He referred particularly to paragraph (b)1 concerning the establishment of an international court of human rights: he pointed out that the Charter provides other means for action against nations which, through their actions, seem to endanger peace and security.

PROF. KORETSKY (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) objected further to the wording “The view was expressed”. He felt that it should also be stated that there were objections from other members. There had been general discussion on the Australian proposal but the report gave no account of the objections.

MR. HARRY (Australia) said that it was extremely important to explain why the question of implementation had been taken up: there were three reasons,

(1) although it had not been mentioned in the resolution of the Economic and Social Council, when the Commission on Human Rights had originally envisaged the possibility of establishing a Drafting Committee, they had instructed it to review methods of implementation. (2) In the general discussion, especially in discussing a Convention, it had been found necessary to consider possible methods of enforcement. (3) The United Kingdom Draft contained new suggestions for enforcement which had to be considered. Mr. Harry suggested a new wording as follows:

(At this point Mrs. Roosevelt arrived and presided over the remainder of the meeting.)

“Although the resolution of the Economic and Social Council of 28 March did not mention the problem of implementation as such [6] the Commission at its First Session had invited the drafting group then envisaged to explore the means of enforcement of the rights to be included in the International Bill of Human Rights and in that connection to study the Australian proposal (E/CN.4/15) and any other documents which had been or might be submitted to it. In practice the Committee throughout its work and particularly when considering the problem of a draft convention, found it necessary to take into account possible methods of enforcement. The Committee also devoted one session specifically to the question of implementation, taking as a basis for discussion a paper by the Secretariat (Annex F), covering previous proposals and the relevant portions of the United Kingdom Draft”.

In answer to a question put by MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile), DR. MALIK (Lebanon) said that he would prefer not to comment on the substance of the problem, but his general reaction was in favour of the shorter, less elaborate form of the Draft Report. In answer to Prof. Koretsky (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics), Dr. Malik pointed out that it was not possible to go into detail in this section and not elsewhere; he felt that Prof. Koretsky’s point was covered in Annex F of the Report, which made reference to the different points of view put forward by members of the Committee.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) said that he found the section satisfactory after the statement by the Rapporteur. He felt that, regarding the Australian proposal to establish an international tribunal, the view expressed by Prof. Koretsky, M. Cassin and himself, that the establishment of such a court was premature, should be noted. This might be included in the Annex.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) referred further to the suggestion of the Representative of China that an organ be created whose purpose would be to [7] promote and further respect for human rights. He pointed out that the Chilean draft provided for such an organ. This, he thought should be included in the Report.

PROF. KORETSKY (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) repeated that in his opinion, it was not sufficient to state certain views without indicating the objections made; these need not be listed, but it should be said that the rest of the Committee was not in accordance with certain views. He objected further that the items listed under paragraph 20 were not in logical sequence. Reference to the creation of material conditions which would ensure respect for human rights had been omitted; Prof. Koretsky referred to the relevant clause in the Constitution of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. He suggested that the section should be reworded, listing the proposals and stating that they had called forth criticism, and the whole section should then be referred to the Commission on Human Rights.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) objected that it was not only the discussion of the United Kingdom Draft which had occasioned the discussion on implementation, and he asserted that the first paragraph was therefore incorrect.

DR. MALIK (Lebanon) replied to Mr. Santa Cruz by saying that the Chinese proposal regarding education and the promotion of human rights was embodied in (b)2. In answer to Prof. Koretsky, he proposed the addition of the words "material or otherwise" in (b)2, to read: "... and to create conditions material or otherwise under which respect for and promotion of human rights would be secured". In answer to Mr. Wilson, Dr. Malik felt that the discussion of the United Kingdom Draft alone had occasioned the discussion on implementation, as there was no mention of implementation in the terms of reference of the Drafting Committee.

MR. HARRY (Australia) felt that the discussion of drafting both a [8] Declaration and a Convention had promoted a discussion on implementation as well as consideration of the United Kingdom Draft. He said that it was most important to convey to the Commission on Human Rights the different suggestions that had been made, set out in logical order. He recognized the need for a statement that no suggestion had received the endorsement of the Committee.

He proposed the following text:

"(a) that a declaration of human rights and fundamental freedoms in a resolution of the General Assembly would have considerable moral weight.

(b) that rights in international law would be uncertain unless embodied in a convention and ratified by member governments.

(c) that signatories of a convention, in addition to recognizing the rights specified therein as rights in international law should be required to ensure that their domestic law was in full conformity and that the rights would be enforceable in domestic courts. (The committee found that in this connection the position of federal states, of states without written constitutions and of states where law has not been completely codified would require special duty.)

(d) That neither a declaration nor a convention would in itself be fully adequate to ensure observance by member nations and that the United Nations should take further measures.

(e) That knowledge that violations or inconsistent domestic laws would be given publicity and might be internationally censured would act as a deterrent and that measures should be taken to promote such publicity including:

- (i) Petitions by individuals and groups to the United Nations
- (ii) Requests for information by the Secretary-General
- (iii) Discussion in the General Assembly.

(f) That the possibility should be studied of creating, within the framework of the United Nations, an organization to receive, sift, examine and deal with communications alleging the violations of human rights.

(g) That the terms of reference of the Commission on Human Rights might be re-examined by the Economic and Social Council with a view to granting greater responsibility in this field to the Commission.

(h) That a Convention should recognize the right of the United Nations to expel a member who had persistently violated human rights and fundamental freedoms.

(i) That an International Court of Human Rights should be established for judicial determination at the international level of cases involving possible violation of human rights and fundamental freedoms.”

MR. HARRY (Australia) proposed that there should then be a statement that none of these views were endorsed by the Committee, but were submitted for the information of the Members of the Commission on Human Rights.

Mr. Harry (Australia) proposed further that paragraph (b)2, of the Rapporteur's report should be the last paragraph and might be reworded as follows:

“There was general agreement among members of the Committee that human rights and fundamental freedoms could not be secured through enforcement alone, whether nationally or internationally, but that the United Nations should seek to educate the peoples of the world with regard to human rights and to create social and other conditions under which respect for and the promotion of human rights could be secured.”

DR. MALIK (Lebanon) felt that such a detailed exposé of the subject would over-emphasize implementation and would seem to indicate that more [10] time had been spent on discussion of the problem than was the case. He was in favour of retaining the shorter form of the Report before the Committee.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) thought the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and Chilean observations might serve a practical purpose. He proposed that paragraph (c) should replace paragraph (d) and (d) be redrafted. It should be stated that the drawing up of an international convention had been supported by various delegates, and it was also suggested that an organ might be established to sponsor the protection of human rights.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) approved the inclusion in the Report of a formulation of views on implementation on the lines suggested by Mr. Harry (Australia) and did not feel that the Report would be thrown off balance when the Annexes were attached.

THE CHAIRMAN (Mrs. Roosevelt) felt it was important to keep the Report in balance, and supported Mr. Harry's proposal, but felt it should be shorter.

PROF. KORETSKY (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) was of the opinion that as implementation was not in the terms of reference of the Committee, the Report should only list the suggestions and say that there had been objections.

DR. CHANG (China) supported Mr. Harry's text, and felt the substance should be retained, but was in favour of a shorter form. He proposed that the Rapporteur and Mr. Harry should redraft this section.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) supported him.

MR. ORDONNEAU (France) supported the Australian proposal and the suggestion that it be redrafted.

It was agreed that the Rapporteur and Mr. Harry (Australia) should redraft Chapter III, paragraph 20.

Paragraph 19

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) read his proposed revision of paragraph 19:

“The Committee found that owing to the short time available [11] and the fact that most Representatives had not had an opportunity of obtaining expert advice, it could not prepare a detailed draft convention for submission to the Commission on Human Rights. However, the Drafting Committee used Annex I, Part 2 of the United Kingdom proposal as the basis for a general examination of the possible substantive contents of a draft Convention. The result of this examination is embodied in Annex G of this Report which is submitted to the Commission on Human Rights as a working paper for a preliminary draft of an International Convention on Human Rights.”

PROF. KORETSKY (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) objected to the reference to lack of time and opportunity of consulting legal experts as being the reason why the Committee had not considered a Convention in detail: the real reason was that the decision to draft a Convention must be left to the Commission on Human Rights.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that it was generally felt that the Commission on Human Rights would need legal advice before the Convention could be drafted in any final form.

DR. MALIK (Lebanon) proposed that the result of the Committee's examination of the United Kingdom Draft might be embodied in the Annex, as a working paper for the Commission on Human Rights: he suggested that these modifications could be presented in the form of footnotes to Annex B, which would contain the original United Kingdom document.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) felt that a new Annex to show the changes in text of the United Kingdom Draft was necessary. He proposed, in order to meet some of the objections, that the phrase concerning expert advice be deleted from his amended text of paragraph 19.

MR. HARRY (Australia) withdrew his original proposal in favour of the United Kingdom amendment.

DR. CHANG (China) accepted the United Kingdom amendment, but wished to retain the phrase “which the Commission may wish to consider and elaborate” at the end. Mr. Wilson agreed.

There was a general consensus of opinion that the modified text of the United Kingdom Draft should be issued in a separate Annex.

Annex E

Preambles

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) pointed out that there had been no discussion of the different proposals for a Preamble, comparable to the discussion of the Declaration and Convention, and suggested that they be included in a separate paper.

THE CHAIRMAN agreed that the suggestions should not be presented as coming from the Committee.

MR. HARRY (Australia) thought the Preamble should be included in a separate Annex for the sake of clarity, and pointed out that a note would have to be added to paragraph 16 of the Report. He suggested that an explanatory note should be added to the United Kingdom Preamble to the effect that it was intended as the Preamble to a Convention rather than a Declaration.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) supported the proposal for a separate Annex. He explained that the Chilean suggestions were not intended as a complete Preamble but as articles to be considered in the Draft of a temporary working group.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) said that parts of the United Kingdom Preamble could be considered as the Preamble to a Declaration.

It was agreed that a note be appended, stating that the United Kingdom Preamble was intended as the Preamble to the United Kingdom Convention, but that it contained suggestions for a portion of the Preamble to the Declaration.

Consideration of Annex F of the Draft Report of the Drafting Committee to the Commission on Human Rights

Article 1

The Rapporteur read the text of the Article. There were no comments.

Article 2 and Articles 3 and 4

THE RAPPORTEUR read the text of the Articles.

It was agreed to retain them, as read, but THE CHAIRMAN requested the addition of a footnote stating that the United States had suggested alternative Articles which appear under Annex C.

Article 5

THE RAPPORTEUR read the text of the Article with the proposed Alternative Text.

It was agreed to retain the Alternative Text as Article 5.

Article 6

THE RAPPORTEUR read the text of the Article with the footnote.

It was agreed to accept the text with the substitution of the words “set forth in this Declaration” for “hereunder declared”.

Article 7

THE RAPPORTEUR read the text of the Article together with the Alternative Texts and footnotes. The Chairman requested the omission of the United States alternative. MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) stated that the Chilean proposal represented an addition and not an alternative. MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) said that the footnote applied to Articles 8, 9, and 10, and represented the consensus of opinion of several members and should be so listed. The text was adopted with the proposed changes.

Article 8

THE RAPPORTEUR read the text of the Article and the footnotes.

DR. CHANG (China) requested the withdrawal of the footnote containing a Chinese amendment as he intended to present his amendment later to the Commission on Human Rights.

[14]

THE RAPPORTEUR read the text of the Article and footnote.

THE CHAIRMAN wished to propose the addition of the words “or punished for any offence or crime” after the word “convicted” in line 1 of paragraph 1.

It was agreed to include this but to add a note for the information of M. CASSIN (France) that this addition had been made.

Article 10

THE RAPPORTEUR read the text of the Article. There were no comments.

Article 11

THE RAPPORTEUR read the text of the Article and footnotes.

THE CHAIRMAN said that M. CASSIN (France) had accepted that “slavery in all its forms” should be stated. It was her opinion also that the second sentence should be included in a footnote with a note stating that the Committee had considered that its substance might be included in a Convention. DR. CHANG (China) and MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) agreed with the Chairman and the suggestion was adopted.

Article 11 then read: “Slavery, which is inconsistent with the dignity of man, is prohibited in all its forms.”

1. Consideration of Chapter III of Draft Report of the Drafting Committee to the Commission on Human Rights (Document E/CN.4/AC.1/14)

THE CHAIRMAN invited the Rapporteur to present the text of Chapter III as revised by him and the Representative of Australia.

“Chapter III

“The Question of Implementation of an International Bill of Human Rights

“20. The Drafting Committee found it necessary from time to time to take into account possible methods of enforcement, particularly when considering the problem of a Draft Convention and the United Kingdom proposals. It devoted one session specifically to the question of implementation taking as a basis for discussion a paper prepared by the Secretariat (Annex F).

“The consensus of opinion of the Committee was that the international community must ensure the observance of the rights to be included in the International Bill of Human Rights. However, a wide range of views was expressed as to the precise manner in which this objective could be achieved.

“The following is a summary of the principal observations made during the discussion:

(a) that a Declaration of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms in a resolution of the General Assembly would in itself have considerable moral weight; but

(b) that a more effective method for establishing human rights would be to embody them in a Convention in which the signatories would recognize them as international law;

(c) that the signatories of such a Convention should also accept the obligation to ensure that these rights be enforceable by domestic laws in domestic courts; (it was clear from the discussion that in this connection the position of federal States, of States without written constitutions and of States where law has not been codified, would require special study);

(d) that among possible deterrents against violation of a Convention are publicity and international censure which [3] might be achieved by

- (i) petitions by individuals and groups to the United Nations,
- (ii) extension of the powers of the Human Rights Commission or creation of new machinery within the framework of the United Nations to receive, sift, examine and deal with communications alleging the violation of human rights,
- (iii) requests by the Secretary-General to Member Nations for reports on their observance of human rights,
- (iv) discussion in the General Assembly;

(e) that an International Court of Human Rights, along the lines of the Australian proposal, be established for the adjudication of cases of alleged violation of human rights;

(f) that any State persistently violating human rights should be expelled from the United Nations.

“None of the above suggestions was approved by the Committee as such; indeed strong objections were voiced against many of them. The Committee merely transmits them to the Commission on Human Rights for its information.

“21. The Committee considered that in addition to enforcement measures the United Nations should promote through education the widest possible respect for human rights. It was suggested that a special international organ might be required for this purpose. The Committee also recognized that observance of human rights could not be completely ensured unless conditions of social progress and better standards of life were established in larger freedom.”

PROFESSOR KORETSKY (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) pointed out that the observations cited in Paragraph 20 were made by individual Members and that they should not be regarded as the opinion of the whole Committee. [4] With regard to Section 21 he suggested either deleting the last two sentences or removing them to Section 20, since the Committee as a whole had not agreed on the contents of any document.

MR. HARRY (Australia) suggested amending the third paragraph of Paragraph 20 to read: “The following is a summary of the principal observations made by one or more Members of the Committee.”

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) suggested the insertion of the idea of using the existing organs of the United Nations in the first sentence of Paragraph 21.

PROFESSOR KORETSKY (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) disagreed with Mr. Wilson’s view and suggested the retention of the first sentence and the insertion of “by individual Members” after “It was suggested” in the second sentence.

MR. HARRY (Australia) proposed the following wording: “It was suggested by individual Members of the Committee that such education should be carried out through the existing organs of the United Nations or a possible international organ.”

DR. CHANG (China) pointed out that the idea of using existing organs had not been clarified during the previous meetings and that therefore he felt it might not be included here.

THE CHAIRMAN thought that it might be well to keep the original text of Section 21 with the insertion of “by individual Members” after “It was suggested”. MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) then suggested substituting “there should be some form of implementation with respect to human rights” for “the international community must ensure the observance of . . .” in the second part of Paragraph 20.

DR. CHANG (China) referring to the same paragraph, pointed out that there was no expression of the consensus of opinion of the Committee regarding these principles. Therefore he suggested the deletion of the first sentence. With regard to the word “session” in the first paragraph of Paragraph 20, he thought that the word “meeting” should be substituted.

MR. HARRY (Australia) proposed the following change: “The Committee acted on the assumption that the international community . . .” in order to meet the objections expressed. This was accepted.

Chapter III was accepted with the following alterations:

- (a) substituting “meeting” for “session” in the first paragraph of Section 20;
- (b) deleting “consensus of opinion of the” and inserting “acted on the assumption” after “The Committee” in the second paragraph;
- (c) substituting “by one or more Members of the Committee” for “during the discussion” in the third paragraph; and
- (d) inserting “by individual Members” after “It was suggested” in Section 21.

2. Consideration of Articles 12 to 40 in Annex F of the Draft Report

Article 12

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) suggested deleting the words “Alternative Text (Australia)”, since the Committee had accepted this text as its own; and deleting entirely the United Kingdom alternative.

MR. ORDONNEAU (France) pointed out that Professor Cassin had insisted on the use of the word “inviolability” in this Article.

THE CHAIRMAN, recalling the joint French and Chilean text, stated that Article 12 then should read as follows:

“The privacy of the home and of correspondence and respect for reputation shall be protected by law.”

Alternative Text (Chile and France)

“The right to inviolability of privacy, of the home and of correspondence, and respect for reputation, shall be protected by law.”

Article 13

PROFESSOR KORETSKY (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) thought that the wording of Article 13 should be more conditional.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) suggested the division of this Article into two paragraphs by making the last part of the first sentence an independent paragraph.

THE RAPPORTEUR said that if this suggestion were accepted the footnote should apply to both paragraphs. He pointed out that the words “should not be a final one, but should . . .,” in the footnote, should be deleted.

THE CHAIRMAN said that Article 13 could be so revised.

Article 14

As there were no comments on Article 14, it was accepted without change.

Article 15

MRS. ROOSEVELT stated that the United States suggested that the phrase “he shall have the right to consult with and to be represented by counsel” should not be a footnote but should be included in the Article.

THE RAPPORTEUR explained that because of the lack of clear agreement between the Chairman and Professor Cassin on this point this phrase had been put into a footnote. DR. CHANG (China) suggested putting it at the end of the Article. THE RAPPORTEUR accepted the change. MR. ORDONNEAU (France) suggested the following text, in French, to replace the Second sentence of the second paragraph of the Article:

“Il aura le droit d’être assisté et, toutes les fois que sa comparution personnelle ne sera pas exigée par la loi, représenté par un conseil.”

THE RAPPORTEUR accepted these suggestions.

Article 16

THE CHAIRMAN said that since there were no comments on Article 16, it should be accepted as it stood.

Article 17

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) suggested deleting the first footnote and inserting “and of the United Kingdom” after “Australia” in the following footnote.

[7]

THE CHAIRMAN stated that the United States objected to the use of the word “personal” as qualifying “property” because of its technical meaning in English and American law.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) wished to have the concept of the right to property, as stated in the Chilean Draft, included in the footnote.

THE RAPPORTEUR accepted these suggestions.

Articles 18 and 19

THE CHAIRMAN, after reading Articles 18 and 19, stated that they were acceptable as they stood.

Article 20

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) thought the whole of Article 13 of the United Kingdom Draft should be included as the United Kingdom alternative text for Article 20.

MR. HARRY (Australia) felt there was little difference between the joint alternative text of Australia and Lebanon, and that of France.

THE RAPPORTEUR pointed out that the only difference between the original draft of Professor Cassin and the alternative text of Lebanon was the inclusion of the idea of change of beliefs; Professor Cassin had accepted this idea.

The alternative text agreed to by the Representatives of France, Lebanon and Australia was accepted as Article 20. The United Kingdom text was inserted as an alternative.

Article 21

MR. HARRY (Australia) suggested the deletion of the footnote of Article 21, and some change of the word “molested” in the Article.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) thought that the first sentence of Article 21 should be kept as the alternative text of France and Chile. He agreed with the suggestion of deleting the footnote.

MR. ORDONNEAU (France) suggested the following French alternative text:

“Personne ne peut être inquiété en raison de ses opinions.

“Chacun est libre de soutenir ou d’exprimer son opinion, de connaître celle des autres, de recevoir ou de rechercher des informations à toutes les sources possibles.”

THE RAPPORTEUR accepted these suggestions.

Article 22

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) suggested deleting the word “free” in Article 22.

THE CHAIRMAN thought that “equal” might be used instead.

MR. HARRY (Australia) suggested changing the words “must be” in the footnote to “would need to be . . .”

These changes were accepted.

Articles 23, 24 and 25

THE CHAIRMAN, after reading Articles 23, 24 and 25 said that since there were no comments they were accepted as they stood.

Article 26

With regard to Article 26, THE CHAIRMAN recalled that Professor Cassin had accepted the Alternative Text. MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) recalled that the United States text had been accepted by the Committee. MR. HARRY (Australia) said that was also his recollection. He suggested using the United States text as Article 26, and using the wording suggested by the Representatives of Chile, France and Lebanon as the alternative text. This suggestion was accepted.

Article 27

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) suggested the deletion of the word “fair” in Article 27.

THE CHAIRMAN agreed to this change and recalled that the Committee had accepted the wording “to conform to wishes of the people”. The second sentence of Article 27 then would begin: “These wishes shall be . . .” MR. HARRY (Australia) remarked that was also his recollection.

THE RAPPORTEUR accepted these changes.

Article 28

THE CHAIRMAN suggested inserting the words “to hold public office” after “public employment”. DR. CHANG (China) suggested adding the following sentence to Article 28: “Access to examinations for public employment shall not be a matter of privilege or favour”.

THE RAPPORTEUR said the acceptance of this suggestion called for the deletion of the first footnote.

Article 29

THE CHAIRMAN suggested the deletion of the words “and the duty” and the words “and to the full development of his personality” in Article 29. This was accepted.

Article 30

There were no comments on Article 30.

Article 31

DR. CHANG (China) thought the word “and” in Article 31 might better be changed to “or”. THE RAPPORTEUR accepted this suggestion and suggested the substitution of “shall” for “should” in this Article.

Article 32

There were no comments on Article 32.

Article 33

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) called the attention of the Committee to the typing error of the word “official” for “social”. With regard to the footnote of this Article he felt that the words “the Representative of the United Kingdom” should be changed to “the Drafting Committee”.

Article 34

Referring to Article 34, THE CHAIRMAN recalled that the Committee had accepted the United States Text. THE RAPPOREUR said that her recollection was correct.

Article 35

After a number of comments, Article 35 was accepted as it stood.
[10]

Article 36

THE CHAIRMAN stated that Article 36 should be deleted and attached to the working paper as a footnote.

THE RAPPOREUR read the original Article 37 as Article 36.

THE CHAIRMAN remarked that the subject matter of this Article was so important that it should have the most careful consideration of the Commission on Human Rights. MR. ORDONNEAU (France), referring to different ethnic groups in Switzerland, emphasized that the Article dealt with more than the question of minorities.

MR. HARRY (Australia) suggested the following footnote:

“In view of the supreme importance of this Article to many countries, the Drafting Committee felt that it could not prepare a draft Article without thorough pre-examination by the Commission on Human Rights and suggested that it might if necessary be referred to the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities for examination of the minority aspects.”

THE CHAIRMAN said this suggestion should cover the opinions expressed regarding this Article.

Articles 38, 39 and 40

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that Articles 38, 39 and 40 should be deleted, as they dealt with implementation, which was to be considered at a later stage. She suggested that these three Articles should be included in the Secretariat document on implementation, that the substance of the last paragraph of Article 40 should be included in the Preamble, and that the consensus of opinion of the Committee was that the Report should be approved.

The meeting adjourned at 1:30 p.m.

Report of the Drafting Committee to the Commission on Human Rights

Chapter 1

Introduction

1. The Drafting Committee of the Commission on Human Rights held its First Session during the period 9 to 25 June 1947, with the following Representatives in attendance: Lt. Col. W.R. Hodgson, Representative of Australia; Mr. H. Santa Cruz, Representative of Chile; Dr. P. C. Chang, Representative of China; Prof. René Cassin, Representative of France; Dr. Charles Malik, Representative of Lebanon; Prof. V. Koretsky, Representative of Union of Soviet Socialist Republics; Mr. Geoffrey Wilson, Representative of United Kingdom; Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, Representative of United States of America

2. Mr. Ralph Harry represented Lt. Col. W.R. Hodgson (Australia) at most meetings. Mr. H. Santa Cruz represented Mr. Felix Nieto Del Rio (Chile). Mr. Pierre Ordonneau represented Prof. René Cassin (France) at the last four meetings. Prof. V. Koretsky represented Mr. V.F. Tepliakov (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics). Mr. Geoffrey Wilson represented Lord Dukeston (United Kingdom). Mr. James P. Hendrick represented Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt (United States of America) at parts of two meetings.

3. The Specialized Agencies were represented at the Drafting Committee as follows: United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization: Mr. J. Havet.

4. Consultants in attendance were: American Federation of Labor: Miss Toni Sender; International Cooperative Alliance: Mrs. H. Fuhrman.

5. The Drafting Committee elected the Officers of the Commission on Human Rights as its Officers: Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt as Chairman; Dr. P. C. Chang as Vice-Chairman; and Dr. Charles Malik as Rapporteur.

6. Professor John P. Humphrey was Secretary of the Drafting Committee.

7. The Drafting Committee adopted the Provisional Rules of Procedure of the Commission on Human Rights as its Rules of Procedure.

8. The Drafting Committee authorized the Chairman, or in the absence of the Chairman, the Rapporteur, to present this Report to the Commission on Human Rights.

9. The expression of the views of the Members of the Drafting Committee is embodied in the verbatim and summary records of the meetings.

Chapter II

Preliminary Draft of an International Bill of Human Rights

10. The Drafting Committee reviewed its terms of reference as contained in the letter of the Chairman of the Commission on Human Rights of 24 March 1947 (document E/383) to the President of the Economic and Social Council, and approved by decision of the Council of 28 March 1947 (document E/325). It noted in particular that its function in this session was to prepare on the basis of documentation supplied by the Secretariat, a preliminary draft of an International Bill of Human Rights.

11. In addition to the Draft Outline of an International Bill of Human Rights prepared by the Secretariat (document E/CN.4/AC.1/3, constituting Annex A of this Report and document E/CN.4/AC.1/3/Add.1, issued as a separate volume), the Drafting Committee had before it the text of a letter from Lord Dukeston, the United Kingdom Representative on the Commission on Human Rights, transmitting (a) a draft International Bill of Human Rights and (b) a draft resolution which might be passed by the General Assembly [3] when adopting an International Bill of Human Rights (document E/CN.4/AC.1/4), constituting Annex B of this Report. These two documents were considered and compared, together with certain United States proposals for the rewording of some items appearing in the Secretariat Draft Outline (documents E/CN.4/AC.1/8 and Revs. 1 and 2), constituting Annex C of this Report.

12. Concerning the form which the Preliminary Draft might take, two views were put forward. In the opinion of some Representatives it was necessary that the Preliminary Draft, in the first instance, should take the form of a Declaration or Manifesto; others felt that it should be in the form of a Convention. It was agreed, however, by those who favoured the Declaration form that the Declaration should be accompanied or followed by a Convention or Conventions on specific groups of rights.

It was also agreed by those who favoured the Convention form that the General Assembly in recommending a Convention to Member Nations might make a Declaration wider in content and more general in expression. The Drafting Committee, therefore, while recognizing that the decision as to the form of the Bill was a matter for the Commission, decided to attempt to prepare two documents, one a working paper in the form of a Preliminary Draft of a Declaration or Manifesto setting forth general principles, and the second a working paper outlining a Draft Convention on those matters which the Committee felt might lend themselves to formulation as binding obligations.

13. The Committee established a temporary working group, composed of the Representatives of France, Lebanon, and the United Kingdom, with the Chairman of the Committee as an ex officio member. It requested this working group:

- (a) to suggest a logical re-arrangement of the articles of the Draft Outline supplied by the Secretariat;
- (b) to suggest a redraft of the various articles in the light of the discussions of the Drafting Committee; and

- (c) to suggest to the Drafting Committee how the substance of the articles might be divided between a Declaration and a Convention.

14. The temporary working group had three meetings, and after a general discussion decided to request Professor Cassin to undertake the writing of a draft Declaration based on those Articles in the Secretariat Outline which he considered should go into such a Declaration. It was the consensus of opinion that such a document would have greater unity if drawn up by one person. The Representatives of the United Kingdom and Lebanon, together with the Chairman, were asked independently to go over the Secretariat Outline and the United Kingdom draft with a view to determining which Articles could readily lend themselves to a Convention.

Professor Cassin produced a draft containing a Preamble and forty-four suggested Articles. The working group revised the Preamble and the first six Articles before submitting them to the Drafting Committee (document E/CN.4/AC.1/W.1). The remaining Articles were submitted to the Drafting Committee in the form proposed by Professor Cassin (document E/CN.4/AC.1/W.2/Rev.1), constituting part of Annex D of this Report.

The Chairman, the Representative of Lebanon and the Representative of the United Kingdom agreed that the Articles contained in Part II of the Draft Convention (Annex I of document E/CN.4/AC.1/4) in the United Kingdom document could be submitted to the Commission on Human Rights as possibly forming the basis of a draft Convention and that the following three subjects might be added to this draft:

- (a) physical integrity, torture and cruel punishments;
- (b) the right to a legal personality; and
- (c) the right of asylum.

15. The Drafting Committee read the draft Preamble, but recognized that its final wording could not be determined until later. The various suggestions for a Preamble of the Manifesto or Declaration are found in Annex E of this Report.

16. The Drafting Committee considered in detail each of the six draft Articles submitted by the working group, then considered in like detail the remaining draft Articles submitted by Professor Cassin. Members made comments on the form and substance of the various articles. These comments are found in the verbatim and summary records. All Members of the Drafting Committee understood that nothing said by any of them during the session was to be considered binding upon their Governments, and reserved the right to make further suggestions at a later stage. Professor Koretsky's remarks were confined in the main to procedural matters, and for all issues he specifically reserved the right to present the observations and proposals of his Government at a later stage. The United States reserved the right to urge before the Commission on Human Rights the inclusion of its rewording of certain Secretariat Articles in the Draft Declaration (Annex C of this Report).

17. The Drafting Committee accepted Professor Cassin's offer to prepare, on the basis of the discussion of his draft, a revised Draft Declaration. This Draft (document E/CN.4/AC.1/W.2/Rev.2) was examined by the Drafting Committee and further revised. It was agreed that where more than one view was expressed, all alternatives would on request be included. The result of this examination is embodied in Annex F of this Report, which is submitted to the Commission on Human Rights as a working paper for a preliminary draft of an International Manifesto or Declaration on Human Rights.

18. The Drafting Committee used Annex I, part 2 of the United Kingdom proposal (document E/CN.4/AC.1/4) as the basis for a general examination of the possible substantive contents of a Draft Convention. The result of this examination is embodied in Annex G of this Report, which is submitted to the Commission on Human Rights as a working paper for a preliminary draft of an International Convention on Human Rights which the Commission may wish to consider and elaborate.

Chapter III

The Question of Implementation of an International Bill of Human Rights

19. The Drafting Committee found it necessary from time to time to take into account possible methods of enforcement, particularly when considering the problem of a Draft Convention and the United Kingdom proposals. It devoted one meeting specifically to the question of implementation, taking as a basis for discussion a paper prepared by the Secretariat (Paragraphs 1–13 of Annex H of this Report).

The Drafting Committee acted on the assumption that the international community must ensure the observance of the rights to be included in the International Bill of Human Rights. However, a wide range of views was expressed as to the precise manner in which this objective could be achieved.

The following is a summary of the principal observations made by one or more individual members of the Drafting Committee during the discussion:

- (a) that a Declaration of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms in a resolution of the General Assembly would in itself have considerable moral weight; but
- (b) that a more effective method for establishing human rights would be to embody them in a Convention in which the signatories would recognize them as international law;
- (c) that the signatories of such a Convention should also accept the obligation to ensure that these rights be enforceable by domestic laws in domestic courts; (it was clear from the discussion that in this connection the position of federal States, of States without written constitutions and of States where law has not been codified would require special study);
- (d) that among possible deterrents against violation of a Convention are publicity and international censure which might be achieved by
  - (i) petitions by individuals and groups to the United Nations,
  - (ii) extension of the powers of the Human Rights Commission [7] or creation of new machinery within the framework of the United Nations to receive, sift, examine and deal with communications alleging the violation of human rights,
  - (iii) requests by the Secretary-General to Member Nations for reports on their observance of human rights,
  - (iv) discussion in the General Assembly;
- (e) that an International Court of Human Rights, along the lines of the Australian proposal, be established for the adjudication of cases of alleged violation of human rights;
- (f) that any State persistently violating human rights should be expelled from the United Nations.

None of the above suggestions was approved by the Drafting Committee as such; indeed strong objections were voiced against many of them. The Drafting Committee merely transmits them to the Commission on Human Rights for its information.

20. The Drafting Committee considered that in addition to enforcement measures the United Nations should promote through education the widest possible respect for human rights. It was suggested by individual Members of the Drafting Committee that a special international organ might be required for this purpose. The Committee also recognized that observance of human rights could not be completely ensured unless conditions of social progress and better standards of life were established in larger freedom.

Report of the Drafting Committee on an International Bill of Human Rights
United States Suggestions for Articles to be Incorporated in an International Bill of Human Rights
(Article Numbers Correspond to those of the Declaration in Annex E)

Article 3

“The state is created by the people for the promotion of their welfare and the protection of their mutual rights. In the exercise of his rights everyone is limited by the rights of others.” (E/CN.4/AC.1/8/Rev.1 referring to Secretariat Article 2.)

Articles 5, 6

“There shall be equal protection before the law in the enjoyment of the rights enumerated in this Bill of Rights, without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion.” (E/CN.4/AC.1/11 referring to Secretariat Article 45.)

Article 8

“The right to life is fundamental and may not be denied to any person except upon conviction of the gravest of crimes under general law providing for the penalty of death.”

“No one shall be deprived of life or personal liberty, or be convicted or punished for crime in any manner, save by judgment of a competent and impartial tribunal, in conformity with law, after a fair public trial at which he has had the opportunity for a full hearing, the right to be confronted with the witnesses against him, the right of compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favour, and the right to consult with and be represented by counsel.” (E/CN.4/AC.1/11 referring to Secretariat Articles 3 and 6.)

Articles 9, 10

“No person shall be subjected to arbitrary or unauthorized arrest or detention. Every person who is arrested or detained shall be immediately [42] informed of the charges on which he is held, and shall have the right to prompt judicial determination of the legality of his detention. Trial of the charges must be afforded within a reasonable time, or he shall be released from detention. Every person shall be entitled to secure his release pending trial upon furnishing reasonable security for his appearance, except where such release would defeat the administering of justice.” (E/CN.4/AC.1/8/Rev.1 referring to Secretariat Article 7.)

“No one shall be subjected to torture, or to any unusual punishment or indignity.” (Secretariat Article 4)

“No one shall be convicted of crime except by judgment of a competent and impartial tribunal for violation of a law in effect at the time of the commission of the act charged as an offence, nor be subjected to a penalty greater than that applicable at the time of the commission of the offence. No one acquitted or convicted of a crime shall thereafter be again put in jeopardy of life or liberty for the offence of which he was acquitted or convicted.” (E/CN.4/AC.1/8 referring to Secretariat Article 26.)

“Every person has the right to have any civil claims or liabilities determined without undue delay by a competent and impartial tribunal before which he has the opportunity for a fair hearing, and has the right to consult with and to be represented by counsel.” (E/CN.4/AC.1/8 referring to Secretariat Article 27.)

Article 11

“No one shall be held in slavery, nor be required to perform compulsory labour in any form other than as part of punishment pronounced by a competent judicial tribunal. No person shall be imprisoned or held in servitude in consequence of the mere breach of contractual obligations.” (E/CN.4/AC.1/8/Rev.1 referring to Secretariat Article 8.)

Article 12

“No one shall be subjected to arbitrary or unauthorized searches and seizures of his person, home, papers and effects, or to unreasonable [43] interference with his person, home, family, relations with others, reputation, privacy, activities or property. The secrecy of correspondence shall be respected.” (E/CN.4/AC.1/11 referring to Secretariat Article 11.)

Article 13

“All persons shall equally enjoy the right to freedom of movement from one part of the territory of the state to another, and to free choice of residence in any part of the territory.

“Every person shall, subject to equitable immigration and deportation laws, be free to enter, travel through or over, and remain temporarily in the territory of another state, provided always that he observes local laws and police regulations.

“The right of emigration and expropriation shall not be denied.” (E/CN.4/AC.1/8/Rev.1 referring to Secretariat Article 9; Secretariat Article 10.)

Article 15

“Everyone has the right to a legal personality. No person shall be restricted in the exercise of his civil rights except under general law based on reasons of age or mental incompetence, or as punishment for a criminal offence, or as otherwise permitted in this bill.” (E/CN.4/AC.1/11 referring to Secretariat Article 12.)

Article 16

“There shall be equal opportunity to engage in any vocation or profession, not constituting public employment, subject to such reasonable qualifications as are inherent in the work to be performed.” (E/CN.4/AC.1/11 referring to Secretariat Article 24.)

Article 17

“Everyone has the right to own and transfer property, subject to reasonable regulation, under general laws, governing the acquisition and use thereof, and determining, in the interest of national welfare and security, those things not susceptible of private ownership. No one shall [44] be deprived of property except in accordance with due process of law, nor suffer his property to be taken other than for public use with just compensation to him.” (E/CN.4/AC.1/8/Rev.1 referring to Secretariat Article 22.)

Article 18

“Every person shall have the right to a nationality”. (E/CN.4/AC.1/11 referring to Secretariat Article 32.)

Article 21

“Everyone has the right to form and hold opinions and to receive them from, and impart them, within or beyond the borders of the State.” (E/CN.4/AC.1/11 referring to Secretariat Article 15.)

Article 22

“Freedom of everyone to receive, read and listen to all matters of information shall not be impaired, and there shall be free and equal access to all sources of information both within and beyond the border of a State.

“There shall be freedom of speech, of the press and of expression by any means whatsoever, and there shall be reasonable access to all channels of communication.” (E/CN.4/AC.1/11 referring to Secretariat Articles 16, 17.)

Article 23

“There shall be freedom of assembly.

“There shall be freedom to form associations.” (E/CN.4/AC.1/11 referring to Secretariat Articles 19, 20.)

Article 24

“No State shall abridge the right of everyone, either individually or in association with others, to petition the government of his State or the United Nations for redress of grievance.” (E/CN.4/AC.1/11 referring to Secretariat Article 28.)

Articles 26, 27

“Government derives its just powers from the consent of the governed. Everyone has the right to take an effective part in the government of the state or territory of which he is a citizen. The citizens of the state or territory are accordingly entitled to exercise self-government through representatives freely and fairly chosen by them in periodic democratic elections by secret ballot.” (E/CN.4/AC.1/8/Rev.1 referring to Secretariat Article 30.)

Article 28

“Everyone shall have equal opportunity to engage in public employment in the State of which he is a citizen.” (E/CN.4/AC.1/11 referring to Secretariat Article 31.)

Articles 29–36

In lieu of these articles the United States suggests the following:

Article 29

“Everyone has the right to a fair and equal opportunity to advance his own physical, economic, spiritual and cultural wellbeing and to share in the benefits of civilization.

“It is the duty of the State, in accordance with the maximum use of its resources and with due regard for the liberties of individuals, to promote this purpose by legislation or by other appropriate means. Among the social rights thus to be achieved progressively by joint effort of the individual and the State are those defined in the following Articles.” (E/CN.4/AC.1/8/Rev.1, page 3 – no corresponding Secretariat article.)

Article 30

“Everyone, without distinction as to economic or social condition, has a right to the highest attainable standard of health.

“The responsibility of the State for the health and safety of its people can be fulfilled only by provision of adequate health and social measures.” (E/CN.4/AC.1/8/Rev.1 referring to Secretariat Article 35; identical with Article 33 of the Committee’s Declaration.)

Article 31

“Everyone has the right to education.

“Each State has the duty to require that each child within territories under its jurisdiction receive a fundamental education. The State shall maintain adequate and free facilities for such education which, however, shall not be exclusive of private educational facilities or institutions. It shall also assure development of facilities for further, including higher education, which are adequate and effectively available to all the people within such territories. (E/CN.4/AC.1/8/Rev.1 referring to Secretariat Article 36.)

Article 32

“Everyone has a right to a decent standard of living, to a fair and equal opportunity to earn a livelihood; to wages and hours and conditions of work calculated to insure a just share of the benefits of progress to all; and to protection against loss of income on account of disability, unemployment or old age.

“It is the duty of the State to undertake measures that will promote full employment and good working conditions; provide protection for wage-earners and dependents against lack of income for reasons beyond their control; and assure adequate food, housing, and community services necessary to the wellbeing of the people.” (E/CN.4/AC.1/11 referring to Secretariat Article 38.)

Articles 33, 34

No articles suggested.

Article 35

“Everyone has the right to participate in the cultural life of the community, to enjoy the arts and to share in the benefits of science.” (Secretariat Article 44).

Article 36

No article suggested.

Articles on Implementation

1. The Articles in this Bill of Rights shall be referred to the appropriate organs or agencies of the United Nations with a view to the formulation of a series of international conventions to be submitted individually to the member states for ratification or other appropriate action in accordance with their respective constitutional processes.

2. The Conventions thus conceded shall be deposited with the Secretary-General of the United Nations for registration and publication in accordance with Article 102 of the Charter.

3. The Conventions shall provide for submission to the Secretary-General of copies of the laws or regulations by which the member state gives effect to the provisions of the Convention together with the name of the competent authority responsible for compliance, and of periodic reports concerning the enforcement and revisions of such laws.

4. The Secretary-General shall inform the General Assembly each year of the Conventions embodying the provisions of this Bill of Rights which have been proposed to the member states, and the number of states which have ratified or have failed to ratify them. (E/CN.4/AC.1/13).

Suggestions Submitted by the Representative of France for Articles of the International Declaration of Human Rights

[49–50]

Annex D

Preamble

Whereas:

1. ignorance and contempt of human rights have been among the principal causes of the sufferings of humanity and particularly of the massacres which have polluted the earth in two world wars;
2. there can be no peace unless human rights and freedoms are respected and, conversely, human freedom and dignity cannot be respected as long as war and the threat of war are not abolished;
3. it was proclaimed as the supreme aim of the recent conflict that human beings should enjoy freedom of speech and worship and be free from fear and want;
4. in the Charter of 26 June 1945 we reaffirmed our faith in fundamental human rights, in the dignity and worth of the human person and in the equal rights of men and women;

<sup>198</sup> René Cassin's original draft was issued on 18 June as E/CN.4/W.2/Rev.1. There are substantial differences between that document and Annex D of the report.

5. it is one of the purposes of the United Nations to achieve international co-operation in promoting and encouraging respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language, or religion;
6. the enjoyment of such rights and freedoms by all persons must be protected by the community of nations and guaranteed by international as well as municipal law,

[51–52]

Now, therefore, we the Peoples of the United Nations have resolved to define in a solemn Declaration the essential rights and fundamental freedoms of man, so that this Bill, being constantly present in the minds of all men, may unceasingly remind them of their rights and duties, and so that the United Nations and its Members may constantly apply the principles hereby formulated.

And we have therefore adopted the following Bill:

Chapter 1. (General Principles)

Article 1

All men, being members of one family are free, possess equal dignity and rights, and shall regard each other as brothers.

Article 2

The object of society is to enable all men to develop, fully and in security, their physical, mental and moral personality, without some being sacrificed for the sake of others.

Article 3

As human beings cannot live and achieve their objects without the help and support of society, each man owes to society fundamental duties which are: obedience to law, exercise of a useful activity, acceptance of the burdens and sacrifices demanded for the common good.

Article 4

The rights of all persons are limited by the rights of others.

Article 5

The law is the same for all. It applies to public authorities and judges in the same way as to private persons. Anything not prohibited by law is permissible.

Article 6

The rights and freedoms hereinafter declared shall apply to all persons. No person shall suffer discrimination by reason of his race, sex, language, religion, or opinions.

[53–54]

Chapter 2. (Right to Life and Physical Inviolability)Article 7

Every human being has the right to life and to the respect of his physical inviolability.

No person, even if found guilty, may be subjected to torture, cruelty, or degrading treatment.

Chapter 3. (Personal Freedoms)Article 8

Everyone has the right to personal liberty and security.

Article 9

Private life, the home, correspondence and reputation are inviolable and protected by law.

Article 10

No person may be arrested or detained save in the cases provided for and in accordance with the procedure prescribed by law. Any person arrested or detained shall have the right to immediate judicial determination of the legality of the proceedings taken against him.

Article 11

Every accused shall be presumed innocent until found guilty.

No person may be punished except in pursuance of a judgment of an independent and impartial court of law, delivered after a fair and public trial, at which he has had a full hearing or has been legally summoned, and has been given all the guarantees necessary for his defence.

Article 12

No person may be convicted of a crime unless he has violated a law in force at the time of the act charged as an offence, nor suffer a penalty greater than that legally applicable at the time of the commission of the offence.

Article 13

Slavery, being inconsistent with human dignity, is prohibited.

No public authority may exact personal service or work except by virtue of the law and for the common interest.

[55–56]

Article 14

Subject to any general legislative measures adopted in the interest of security and the common good, there shall be liberty of movement and free choice of residence within the State; individuals may also freely emigrate or expatriate themselves.

Chapter 4. (Legal Status)Article 15

Every individual has a legal personality everywhere.

Article 16

No person may be deprived of the personal exercise of his civil rights except in virtue of a general law based on considerations of age, or of a mental or other condition requiring protection, or as a punishment for a criminal offence.

Article 17

Every person has the right to contract marriage in accordance with the laws.

Article 18

All private occupations or professions shall be open to all on equal terms.

Article 19

Every person has a right to own property.

No person shall be deprived of his property except in the public interest and in return for just compensation.

The State may determine the property capable of private appropriation and regulate the acquisition and use of such property.

The right to full or part ownership of any industrial, commercial or other profit-making private or collective enterprise, is governed by the law of the country within which such enterprise is situated.

Article 20

Every person shall have access whether as plaintiff or defendant, to independent and impartial tribunals for the determination of his rights, liabilities and obligations under the law. He shall have the right to obtain legal advice and, if necessary, to be represented by counsel.

Chapter 5. (Public Freedoms)*Article 21

The personal freedom of conscience, belief and opinion is an absolute and sacred right. The practice of a private or public creed and the expression of conflicting convictions may not be subjected to any restraints except those necessary to protect public order, morality and the rights and freedoms of others.

Article 22

No person may be molested for his opinions, even if they derive from other than national sources.

Every person is equally free to change, affirm, or impart his opinion, or to hear and discuss the opinions of others.

Article 23

There shall be freedom of expression by word of mouth, in writing, in the press, in books or by visual, audible or other means; provided, however, that the author, and the publishers, printers and others concerned shall be answerable for any abuse of this right by defamation of character or failure to present information and news in a true and impartial manner.

Article 24

The freedom of assembly and of association for political, cultural, scientific, sporting, economic and social purposes compatible with this Bill is recognized and guaranteed, subject only to the protection of public order.

Article 25

No State may deny any individual the right, either for himself or in association with others, to petition the authorities or government of his country or of his residence, or the United Nations, for the redress of grievances.

Article 26

Whenever a government seriously or systematically violates the fundamental human rights and freedoms, individuals and peoples have the right to resist oppression and tyranny, without prejudice to their right of appeal to the United Nations.

Chapter 6. (Political Rights)

Article 27

Every person has an equal right to take part, directly or through his representatives, in the formation of the law, the institution of the taxes necessary for public expenditure and generally the government of the State of which he is a citizen. Each citizen shall bear his share of public expenses according to his means.

Article 28

The government shall conform to the wishes of the people, as expressed in democratic elections. Elections shall be periodic, free and fair.

Article 29

The protection of Human Rights requires a public force. Such force shall be instituted for the service of all and not for the private use of those to whom it is entrusted. Each citizen should regard it as an honour to perform military service in States where such service exists.

Article 30

All public offices shall be open to all citizens equally; such offices may not be considered as privileges or favours, [61–62] but should be granted to the ablest on the basis of competitive examinations or on the grounds of their qualifications.

Article 31

There can be no guarantees of Human Rights where the authors of or accessories to arbitrary acts go unpunished and where there is no provision establishing the liability of public authorities or their agents.

Chapter 7. (Nationality and Protection of Aliens)

Article 32

Every person has the right to a nationality.

It is the duty of the United Nations and Member States to prevent statelessness as being inconsistent with human rights and the interests of the human community.

Article 33

Every State has the right to grant asylum to political refugees.

Article 34

No alien legally admitted to the territory of a State may be expelled therefrom without being given a hearing. If his residence is of at least one year's standing, his expulsion may not take place except in pursuance of a judicial decision or recommendation for reasons recognized by law.

Chapter 8. (Social, Economic and Cultural Rights)

Article 35

All persons have the right and the duty to do work useful to society and to develop their personalities fully.

Article 36

Services may be hired for a term, but no person may alienate his person or place himself in a state of servitude to another.

[63–64]

Article 37

Human labour is not a chattel. It must be performed in suitable conditions. It must be justly remunerated according to its quality, duration and purpose, and must yield a decent standard of living to the worker and his family.

Article 38

Every worker has the right to protect his professional interests. In particular, he may, either in person or through his representatives or his trade union organization, take part in the collective determination of conditions of work, the preparation of general plans of production or distribution, and in the supervision and management of the undertaking in which he works.

Article 39

Every human being has the right to assistance from the community to protect his health. General measures should, in addition, be taken to promote public hygiene and the betterment of housing conditions and nutrition.

Article 40

Every person has the right to social security. The community should take steps to prevent unemployment and to organize with contributions from those concerned, insurance against disability, illness, old age and all other involuntary and undeserved loss of work and of livelihood.

Mothers and children have the right to special attention, care and resources.

Article 41

All persons have an interest in learning and a right to education. Primary education is obligatory for children and the community shall provide appropriate and free facilities for such education.

Access to higher education should be facilitated by the grant of equal opportunities to all young persons and adults without distinction as to [65–66] race, sex, language, religion, social standing or financial means.

Vocational and technical training should be generalized.

Article 42

Every person has the right to a fair share of rest and leisure and to a knowledge of the outside world.

Every person has the right to participate in the cultural life of the community, to enjoy the arts and to share in the benefits of science.

Article 43

The authors of all artistic, literary and scientific works and inventors shall retain, in addition to the just remuneration of their labour, a moral right to their work or discovery which shall not disappear even after such work or discovery has become the common property of mankind.

Article 44

In all countries where there are substantial communities of a race, language or religion other than that of the majority of the inhabitants, persons belonging to such ethnical, linguistic or religious minorities shall have the right, within the limits required by public order, to open and maintain schools and religious or cultural institutions. Subject to the same limitations, they may use their language in the press, at public meetings and when appearing before the courts or other authorities of the State.

Article 45

The provisions of the present International Bill of Human Rights are part of the fundamental principles of International Law and shall become an integral part of the Municipal Law of the States Members of the United Nations; their application is a matter of concern to public international order, and the United Nations is competent to take cognizance of violations of the said provisions.

Each State Member of the United Nations has the duty to take such legal measures and make such legal arrangements as may be necessary within the scope of its jurisdiction to apply and ensure respect for the rights and freedoms proclaimed in the present Bill. If necessary, Members shall co-operate to this end.

The United Nations and its specialized agencies shall recommend all such international conventions, and shall each take such measures as may be necessary to give full effect to the provisions of the Charter and of the present Bill to safeguard these rights and freedoms throughout the world.

Annex E

Suggestions for the Preamble of an International Declaration on Human Rights

Secretariat Draft Outline

The Preamble shall refer to the four freedoms and to the provisions of the Charter relating to human rights and shall enunciate the following principles:

1. that there can be no peace unless human rights and freedoms are respected;
2. that man does not have rights only; he owes duties to the society of which he forms part;
3. that man is a citizen both of his State and of the world;
4. that there can be no human freedom or dignity unless war and the threat of war is abolished.

Temporary Working Group of the Drafting Committee

We, the Peoples of the United Nations,
Considering

1. that ignorance and contempt of human rights have been among the principal causes of the sufferings of humanity and of the massacres and barbarities which outraged the conscience of mankind before and especially during the last world war; and
2. that there can be no true peace unless human rights and freedoms are respected; and only by abolishing war and the threat of war can human freedom and dignity be assured to all mankind; and
3. that it has been proclaimed as the supreme aim of the recent strife that human beings shall be free in speech and in worship and free from fear and want; and
4. that the Charter begins by reaffirming our faith in fundamental human rights, in the dignity and worth of the human person and in the equal rights of men and women; and

[70]

5. that it is one of the purposes of the United Nations to achieve international co-operation in promoting and encouraging respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language, or religion; and

6. (There were two points of view: (1) that the wording as submitted by Professor Cassin, "That the enjoyment of such rights and freedoms by all persons must be protected by the commonwealth of nations and secured by international as well as national laws", be retained and modified; (2) that the previous and following paragraphs covered the substance and that it was more suited to the preamble of a Convention.)

Now, therefore, we the Peoples of the United Nations have resolved to define in a solemn Declaration the essential rights and fundamental freedoms of man, so that this Declaration, being forever present in the minds of all men, may constantly remind them of their rights and duties and that the United Nations and the Member States may constantly be inspired by the principles so formulated to translate them into reality.

Chile

1. Whereas freedom and dignity are essential and inalienable attributes of the human person;

2. Whereas in order to enjoy fully the fundamental freedoms of thought, expression and activity, the human being must be biologically and economically protected against social insecurity;

(Note: These two Articles are drafted by the Representative of Chile for possible inclusion in the suggested Draft Preamble of the Temporary Working Group.)

United Kingdom Proposals for a Preamble of a Convention

1. Whereas the peoples of the United Nations have reaffirmed their faith in fundamental human rights and in the dignity and worth of the human person;

[71]

2. Whereas it is one of the purposes of the United Nations to achieve international co-operation in promoting and encouraging respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language, or religion;

3. Whereas all men are members of communities and as such have the duty to respect the rights of their fellow men equally with their own;

4. Whereas the just claims of the State, which all men are under a duty to accept, must not prejudice the respect of man's right to freedom and equality before the law and the safeguard of human rights, which are primary and abiding conditions of all just government;

5. Whereas the denial of human rights and fundamental freedoms endangers the general welfare and friendly relations among nations and the enjoyment of such rights and freedoms by all persons must be secured by international law and protected by the organized community of States;

6. Whereas it is expedient to define more exactly the aforesaid human rights and fundamental freedoms and to make provision for their universal observance and protection;

Now therefore the States parties to this International Bill of Rights have accepted the following provisions:

United States Suggestions for a Portion of the Preamble

“Whereas one of the purposes of the United Nations as set forth in its Charter is to achieve international co-operation in promoting and encouraging respect for and observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms for all;

“Whereas all Members of the United Nations have pledged themselves to take joint and separate action in co-operation with the Organization for the achievement of universal respect for, and observance of, human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language, or religion;

“Whereas the adoption of a bill of human rights will promote the fulfilment of this purpose;

[72]

“Therefore the General Assembly calls upon the Member States to make effective the rights set forth in this bill by international convention and national legislation.”

Suggestions for a Preamble taken by the Drafting Committee from the Last Article of Professor Cassin's Revised Text

The United Nations and their specialized agencies shall recommend all international conventions and shall take, each within their respective spheres, all measures for the implementation of the provisions of the Charter and of this Declaration, in view of protecting these rights and freedoms all over the world.

Annex F

Suggestions of the Drafting Committee for Articles of an International Declaration on Human Rights****

Article 1

All men are brothers. Being endowed with reason and conscience, they are members of one family. They are free, and possess equal dignity and rights.

Articles 2, 3 and 4
First Alternative (three Articles)
Article 2

The object of society is to afford each of its members equal opportunity for the full development of his spirit, mind and body.

Article 3

As human beings cannot live and develop themselves without the help and support of society, each one owes to society fundamental duties which are: obedience to law, exercise of a useful activity, willing acceptance of obligations and sacrifices demanded for the common good.

Article 4

In the exercise of his rights, everyone is limited by the rights of others.

Second Alternative (one Article only)
Article 2

These rights are limited only by the equal rights of others. Man also owes duties to society through which he is enabled to develop his spirit, mind and body in wider freedom.

Article 5

All are equal before the law and entitled to equal protection of the law. Public authorities and judges, as well as individuals are subject to the rule of law.

[*] The United States suggested alternative Articles which appear in Annex C.

Everyone is entitled to the rights and freedoms set forth in this Declaration, without distinction as to race, sex, language, or religion.

(1. The Drafting Committee suggested that this matter be referred to the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities, for thorough consideration. 2. The view was expressed that the substance of this Article might be included in the Preamble to the Declaration, in which case, it could be omitted here.)

Article 7

Everyone has the right to life, to personal liberty and to personal security.

Additional Text (Chilean proposal)

Unborn children and incurables, mentally defectives and lunatics, shall have the right to life.

All persons shall have the right to the enjoyment of conditions of life enabling them to live in dignity and to develop their personality adequately.

Persons unable to maintain themselves by their own efforts shall be entitled to maintenance and assistance.

Alternative Text (Lebanon)

Everyone has the right to life and bodily integrity from the moment of conception, regardless of physical or mental condition, to liberty and security of person.

Article 8

No one shall be deprived of his personal liberty or kept in custody except in cases prescribed by law and after due process. Everyone placed under arrest or detention shall have the right to immediate judicial determination of the legality of any detention to which he may be subject.

(1. There was a feeling in the Drafting Committee that Articles 8, 9 and 10 would need to be reconsidered in the light of any convention that might be recommended for adoption. 2. The Representative of the United States felt that the following alternative wording for the second sentence might be considered: [75] “Everyone placed under arrest or detention shall have the right to release on bail and if there is a question as to the correctness of the arrest shall have the right to have the legality of any detention to which he may be subject determined in a reasonable time.”)

No one shall be held guilty of any offence until legally convicted.

No one shall be convicted or punished for any offence except by judgment of an independent and impartial court of law, rendered in conformity with law after a fair and public trial at which he has had an opportunity for a full hearing and has been given all guarantees necessary for his defence.

Article 10

No one can be convicted of crime unless he has violated some law in effect at the time of the act charged as an offence nor be subjected to a penalty greater than that applicable at the time of the commission of the offence.

No one, even if convicted for a crime, can be subjected to torture.

Article 11

Slavery, which is inconsistent with the dignity of man, is prohibited in all its forms.

(1. The consensus of opinion of the Drafting Committee was that the substance of the following sentence, which formed a part of this Article, might be included and elaborated in a Convention: “Public authority may impose a personal service or work only by application of a law and for the common interest.”)

Article 12

The privacy of the home and of correspondence and respect for reputation shall be protected by law.

Alternative Text (Chile and France)

The inviolability of privacy, home, correspondence and of reputation shall be protected by law.

Article 13

There shall be liberty of movement and free choice of residence within the borders of each State. This freedom may be regulated by [76] any general law adopted in the interest of national welfare and security.

Individuals may freely emigrate or renounce their nationality.

(The Committee expressed the opinion that this text should be passed on to the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities for further consideration.)

Article 14

Everyone has the right to escape persecution on grounds of political or other beliefs or on grounds of racial prejudice by taking refuge on the territory of any State willing to grant him asylum.

Article 15

Everyone has the right to a status in law and to the enjoyment of fundamental civil rights.

Everyone shall have access to independent and impartial tribunals for the determination of his rights, liabilities and obligations under the law. He shall have the right to consult with and to be represented by counsel.

(1. In considering this Article the Drafting Committee discussed the right to contract marriage, but decided to wait until the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and the Protection of Minorities had reviewed recommendations made on this subject by the Commission on the Status of Women and had reported back to the Commission on Human Rights on its findings. 2. The Representative of France suggested the following text in French to replace the second sentence of the second paragraph of this Article: “Il aura le droit d’être assisté et, toutes les fois que sa comparution personnelle ne sera pas exigée par la loi, représenté par un conseil.”)

Article 16

There shall be equal opportunity for all to engage in all vocations and professions not constituting public employment.

(The Drafting Committee expressed the opinion that the rights of foreigners in relation to this Article should be the subject of a Convention.)

Article 17

Everyone has a right to own personal property.

No one shall be deprived of his property except for public welfare and with just compensation.

The State may determine those things, rights and enterprises, that [77] are susceptible of private appropriation and regulate the acquisition and use of such property.

(1. The Representative of the United States stated the opinion that it was sufficient to say, "Everyone has a right to own property" and objected to the use of the word "personal" as qualifying "property" because of its technical meaning (chattels as distinguished from real property) in English-American law. 2. The Representatives of Australia and of the United Kingdom stated the opinion that the Article should be deleted altogether. 3. The Representative of Chile felt that the concept of the right to property, as stated in the Draft submitted by his Government, should be included.)

Everyone has the right to a nationality.

(The Drafting Committee expressed the opinion that this Article should be considered at greater length as the subject of a Convention.)

Article 19

No alien legally admitted to the territory of a State may be expelled therefrom without having a fair hearing.

(Members of the Drafting Committee appreciated that the subject of the Article constitutes a difficult problem and stated the opinion that it needed further consideration.)

Article 20

Individual freedom of thought and conscience, to hold or change beliefs, is an absolute and sacred right.

The practice of a private or public worship, religious observances, and manifestations of differing convictions, can be subject only to such limitations as are necessary to protect public order, morals and the rights and freedoms of others.

Alternative Text (United Kingdom)

1. Every person shall be free to hold any religious or other belief dictated by his conscience and to change his belief.

2. Every person shall be free to practise, either alone or in community with other persons of like mind, any form of religious worship and observance, subject only to such restrictions, penalties or liabilities as are strictly necessary to prevent the commission of acts which offend laws [78] passed in the interests of humanity and morals, to preserve public order and to ensure the rights and freedoms of other persons.

3. Subject only to the same restrictions, every person of full age and sound mind shall be free to give and receive any form of religious teaching and to endeavour to persuade other persons of full age and sound mind of the truth of his beliefs, and in the case of a minor the parent or guardian shall be free to determine what religious teaching he shall receive.

Article 21

Everyone is free to hold or impart his opinion, or to receive and seek information and the opinion of others from sources wherever situated.

Alternative Text (France)

The Representative of France suggested that this Article read in French as follows:

“Personne ne peut être inquiété en raison de ses opinions.

There shall be freedom of expression either by word, in writing, in the press, in books or by visual, auditive or other means. There shall be equal access to all channels of communication.

(This would need to be considered by the Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information and of the Press for possible inclusion in the Convention or the Declaration and would have to be elaborated further.)

Article 23

There shall be freedom of peaceful assembly and of association for political, religious, cultural, scientific, professional and other purposes.

(This would need to be considered for possible inclusion in the Convention or the Declaration and would have to be elaborated further.)

Article 24

No State shall deny to any individual the right, either individually [79] or in association with others, to petition or to communicate with the Government of his State or of his residence or the United Nations.

Article 25

When a government, group or individual seriously or systematically tramples the fundamental human rights and freedoms, individuals and peoples have the right to resist oppression and tyranny.

(There was a substantial expression of opinion in favour of including this Article in the Preamble instead of as an Article.)

Article 26

Everyone has the right to take an effective part in his Government directly or through his representatives.

Alternative Text (Chile, France, Lebanon)

Everyone has the right to take an effective part directly or through his representatives in the formulation of law, the framing of a tax policy for public expenses and his government whether State or territorial.

Article 27

The State can derive its authority only from the will of the people and has a duty to conform to the wishes of the people. These wishes shall be manifested particularly by democratic elections, which shall be periodic, free, and by secret ballot.

Article 28

Everyone shall have equal opportunity to engage in public employment and to hold public office in the State of which he is a citizen. Access to examinations for public employment shall not be a matter of privilege or favour.

(It was felt that the Article might be referred to the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities, after which it might be elaborated further.)

Article 29

Everyone has the right to perform socially useful work.

Article 30

Human labour is not a merchandise. It shall be performed in good [80] conditions and shall secure a decent standard of living to the worker and his family.

Article 31

Everyone has the right to education. Primary education shall be free and compulsory. There shall be equal access for all to such facilities for technical, cultural and higher education as can be provided by the State or community on the basis of merit and without distinction as to race, sex, language, religion, social standing, political affiliation or financial means.

Article 32

Everyone has the right to a fair share of rest and leisure.

Article 33

Everyone, without distinction as to economic or social conditions, has a right to the highest attainable standard of health.

The responsibility of the State and community for the health and safety of its people can be fulfilled only by provision of adequate health and social measures.

(The Drafting Committee suggested that each Article referring to economic and social rights should be referred to the appropriate Specialized Agencies for their consideration and comment.)

Article 34

Everyone has the right to social security. To the utmost of its possibilities, the State shall undertake measures for the promotion of full employment and for the security of the individual against unemployment, disability, old age and all other loss of livelihood for reasons beyond his control.

Mothers and children have the right to special regard, care and resources.

Article 35

Everyone has the right to participate in the cultural life of the community, to enjoy the arts, and to share in the benefits that result [81] from scientific discoveries.

(It was the opinion of some of the members that the thought back of this Article should be included in the Preamble.)

Article 36

In States inhabited by a substantial number of persons of a race, language or religion other than those of the majority of the population, persons belonging to such ethnic, linguistic or religious minorities shall have the right as far as compatible with public order to establish and maintain their schools and cultural or religious institutions, and to use their own language in the press, in public assembly and before the courts and other authorities of the State.

(In view of the supreme importance of this Article to many countries, the Drafting Committee felt that it could not prepare a draft Article without thorough pre-examination by the Commission on Human Rights and suggested that it might if necessary be referred to the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities for examination of the minority aspects.)

Footnote to this document: The consensus of opinion of the Drafting Committee was that the substance of the following draft article might receive consideration for inclusion in an International Convention:

Annex H

Memorandum of Implementation Prepared by the Division of Human Rights of the Secretariat at the Request of the Drafting Committee

1. The attention of the Drafting Committee is respectfully drawn to the resolution of the Economic and Social Council of 21 June 1946. This resolution reads as follows:

“Considering that the purpose of the United Nations with regard to the promotion and observance of human rights, as defined in the Charter of the United Nations, can only be fulfilled if provisions are made for the implementation of human rights and of an international bill of rights, the Council requests the Commission on Human Rights to submit at an early date suggestions regarding the ways and means for the effective implementation of human rights and fundamental freedoms, with a view to assisting the Economic and Social Council in working out arrangements for such implementation with other appropriate organs of the United Nations.”

2. In a memorandum prepared for the Commission on Human Rights at its first session in January 1947, the Secretariat drew attention to Professor Lauterpacht’s discussion of the problem of implementation in his book, An International Bill of the Rights of Man.

3. In the same memorandum, the Secretariat raised the following questions:

- (a) whether or not the Bill should contain a provision to the effect that it cannot be unilaterally abrogated or modified;

- (b) whether or not the Bill should include an express statement to the effect that the matters dealt with in it are of international concern;
- (c) whether or not the Bill should become part of the fundamental law of States accepting it; and

- (d) whether or not the provisions of the Bill should be declared to be directly applicable in the various countries without further implementation by national legislation or transformation into national law.

It would seem that provisions of the nature mentioned in (c) and (d) are necessary if the Bill is to be enforceable as part of the national law of the various countries accepting it. Insofar as implementation on the international plane is concerned, it is suggested that the Commission might consider the possibility of providing in successive stages for international supervision and enforcement. The following successive stages are suggested:

- (a) the establishment of the right of the General Assembly and other organs of the United Nations, including possibly the Commission on Human Rights, to discuss and make recommendations in regard to violations of the Bill;
- (b) the establishment of the right of individuals to petition the United Nations as a means of initiating procedure for enforcement of human rights;
- (c) the establishment of a special organ of the United Nations with jurisdiction and the duty to supervise and enforce human rights motu proprio;
- (d) the establishment of jurisdiction in this organ to consider cases of suspension of the Bill of Rights, either in whole or in part;
- (e) the establishment of local agencies of the United Nations in the various countries with jurisdiction to supervise and enforce human rights therein. The Commission might find it useful, in this connection, to study the precedents established, for example, by the Convention between Germany and Poland on Upper Silesia of 15 May 1922.

The Commission may want also to discuss the role which the Security Council might play in the implementation of the Bill. According to [89] Article 2, paragraph 7, of the Charter, the exception of domestic jurisdiction cannot be invoked in cases where enforcement measures are being taken by the Security Council under Chapter VII. The Commission may want to consider the question whether the Security Council should not be given a more extended jurisdiction in the matter (E/CN.4/W.4, pages 13 and 14).

4. The first session of the Commission on Human Rights devoted relatively little time to the problem. Nevertheless, Colonel Hodgson, the member for Australia, submitted a draft resolution for the establishment of an International Court of Human Rights. This draft resolution reads as follows: (E/CN.4/15)

“1. There is hereby established an International Court of Human Rights. The Court shall be constituted and shall function in accordance with the Articles contained in this Part and in the Statute of the Court.

2. The Court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine all disputes concerning the rights of citizenship and enjoyment of human rights and fundamental freedoms provided for in the Declaration of Human Rights. Subject to such conditions as shall be contained in the Statute of the Court, the jurisdiction of the Court shall be both original and appellate, and shall extend to questions of interpretation arising in such disputes as are brought before administrative tribunals or administrative authorities.

3. The Appellate jurisdiction shall extend to appeals from all decisions of the courts of the States bound by the obligations contained in the Declaration of Human Rights, in which any question arises as to the rights of citizenship or the enjoyment of human rights, or fundamental freedoms.

4. The Court shall be open to any person or group of persons. It shall also be open to any of the States acceptors of the Declaration.

5. Each of the States accepting the Declaration shall comply with the judgment of the Court in any case to which the State is a party and with any order which the Court may make against it.

6. Any judgment or order made by the Court in favour of any person or group of persons within the jurisdiction of any of such States shall be fully effective according to its terms and shall be enforced in and by the State affected by the judgment or order.

7. Each of such States undertakes that the provisions contained in the declaration shall be recognized as fundamental laws and that no law, regulation or official action shall conflict or interfere with those provisions, nor shall any law, regulations or official action prevail over them.

8. The Court shall also have jurisdiction, both original and appellate, to hear and determine disputes concerning such rights of citizenship and enjoyment of human rights and fundamental freedoms as shall be provided for in the treaties of peace which will be made by any of the Allied and Associated Powers with Romania, Bulgaria, Hungary, Finland, Austria, Germany or Japan.

9. The Court shall be composed of a body of independent judges, selected according to the standards laid down by the Charter of the United Nations for the election of judges of the International Court of Justice.

10. The Court shall consist of not less than three members appointed in the manner set out in the Statute of the Court.

11. The Court shall make an annual report to the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations on the working of the Court in relation to the rights and freedoms within its jurisdiction. The Court may also make other reports to that Council if and when it thinks proper to do so.”

5. At the fifteenth meeting of the Commission on Human Rights, Colonel Hodgson made the following comments: (E/CN.4/SR.15, page 2) [91]

“... The Australian Government considered that the resolution of the General Assembly Committee regarding this Bill should not be a simple recommendation, but a multilateral Convention binding Member States. These States should incorporate the principles laid down in this Bill in their own legislation.”

He recalled that similar principles were incorporated in the Peace Treaties following the 1914–1918 war. In view of the negative results of those different declarations, the Australian Government had proposed, at the Paris Conference, the setting up of definite machinery for the application of these principles; that is to say, an International Court of Human Rights. By this action, the Australian Government was only conforming with the terms of a letter of June 1946 from Mr. Trygve Lie to the various governments. The Members of the Paris Conference, however, rejected this proposal on the grounds that the United Nations had at its disposal a body competent to settle the question; the Security Council. The objection was, in fact, unjustifiable as the Council could only intervene if peace were in danger. In view of the great number of Stateless persons whose future could only be settled on the international plane, the question was now even more acute.

The Australian Government therefore proposed that the Commission on Human Rights should recommend to the Economic and Social Council and to the General Assembly, the creation of an International Court of Human Rights. This Court would be the Central Appeal Court to which States, groups of individuals or even single individuals could appeal when all domestic possibilities of appeal had been exhausted.

6. At the sixteenth meeting, again commenting on the Australian draft resolution, Colonel Hodgson recalled: (E/CN.4/SR.16, pages 2–3)

“...that the objection had been raised that the Commission could not consider implementing an international bill of rights before deciding on its contents. He believed, however, that the Commission [92] had an obligation under Article 56 to implement those rights and freedoms already laid down in the Charter. It was necessary to establish effective machinery to make those human rights and fundamental freedoms a reality.”

Moreover, it was not premature to consider machinery for implementation of the Bill, since the definitive rights to be enforced would be known by the time the bill was submitted to the General Assembly. The various principles enunciated therein would subsequently be incorporated in an international convention for ratification by States members. Therefore, the elaboration and implementation of the Bill constituted parallel processes.

Colonel Hodgson also recalled that it had been suggested that the human rights and fundamental freedoms embodied in the bill should first be implemented by Governments through national legislation. He considered, however, that this function belonged to an international tribunal, to which there could be appeal over and beyond national courts.

In conclusion, the representative of Australia stated that the Commission should not confine itself to abstractions but was bound to consider immediately effective machinery for implementing human rights and fundamental freedoms, in accordance with its solemn obligations. He moved, therefore, that the Australian proposal for the establishment of an International Court of Human Rights should be referred to the drafting group for consideration, with a view to reporting on the implementation of human rights and fundamental freedoms, as contained in the proposed bill of human rights, to the next session of the Commission.

7. The question of implementation is also raised in the draft resolution for the General Assembly which was presented by Mrs. Hansa Mehta, the member of the Commission for India, at the first session of the Commission on Human Rights. This draft resolution reads as follows: (E/CN.4/11)

“The General Assembly,

Recognizing the fact that the United Nations has been established for the specific purpose of enthroning the natural rights of man to freedom and equality before the law, and for upholding the worth and dignity of human personality;

Having taken note of the Preamble and the relevant clauses of the United Nations Charter; the resolutions of the Economic and Social Council; the Human Rights Clauses of the Trusteeship Agreements as approved by the First Assembly of the United Nations; and the Human Rights Clauses of the European Treaties,

Resolves that the following be incorporated into a General Act of the United Nations Assembly:

1. (a) Every human being is entitled to the right of liberty, including the right to personal freedom; freedom of worship; freedom of opinion; freedom of assembly and association; and the right to access to the United Nations, without risk of reprisal, whenever there is an actual or threatened infringement of human rights.

(b) Every human being has the right of equality, without distinction of race, sex, language, religion, nationality or political belief.

(c) Every human being has the right of security, including the right to work, the right to education, the right to health, the right to participate in government, and the right to property, subject only to the over-riding consideration of public weal when the State or its appropriate organs acquire it after paying equitable compensation.

2. (a) This General Act is an obligation undertaken by Member States of the United Nations, and comes into force within twelve calendar months from the date on which it is passed by the United Nations Assembly.

(b) Non-self-governing areas and areas under the trusteeship of the United Nations automatically come under the regime of this Act.

(c) Non-Member States are eligible to adhere to this Act.

3. Nothing mentioned in this Act shall be construed as not obligating the individual to his corresponding duties to his own State and to the international community under the United Nations.

4. No State Member of the United Nations, non-self-governing territory, trusteeship area or non-member of the United Nations which has adhered to this Act, shall have the right to suspend it in whole or in part once it was adhered to in due form.

5. The Security Council of the United Nations shall be seized of all alleged violations of human rights, investigate them and enforce redress within the framework of the United Nations.”

8. In accordance with the instructions of the Economic and Social Council, the Secretariat prepared a draft outline of an International Bill of Rights to serve as the basis of discussions in the Drafting Committee. This outline contains several articles which touch on the question of implementation, to wit: (E/CN.4/AC.1/3)

Article 28: “Everyone has the right, either individually or in association with others, to petition the government of his State or the United Nations for redress of grievances.”

Article 47: “It is the duty of each member State to respect and protect the rights enunciated in this Bill of Rights. The State shall, when necessary, co-operate with other States to that end.”

Article 48: “The provisions of this International Bill of Rights shall be deemed fundamental principles of international law and of the national law of each of the member States of the United Nations. Their observance is therefore a matter of international concern and it shall be within the jurisdiction of the United Nations to discuss any violation thereof.”

9. Immediately before the opening of the present session of the Drafting Committee, Lord Dukeston, the member of the Commission for the United Kingdom, submitted a document (E/CN.4/AC.1/4) which deals with the question of [95] implementation in some detail. This document is now before the Drafting Committee and, since it is long and must be read as a whole, no extracts are reproduced herein.

10. Reference to implementation will also be found in the proposal of the United States for modification of Article 28 of the Secretariat draft. The United States proposal reads as follows: (E/CN.4/AC.1/11, page 32)

“No State shall abridge the right of everyone, either individually or in association with others, to petition the government of his State or the United Nations for redress of grievances.”

11. Article 24 of Professor Cassin’s draft deals with the same point; the Article reads as follows: (E/CN.4/AC.1/W.2/Rev.1, page 4)

“No State shall deny to any individual the right, either individually or in association with others, to petition the government of his State or of his residence or the United Nations for redress of grievances.”

12. Professor Cassin also suggests that the Preamble to the Declaration should include the following words: (E/CN.4/AC.1/W.1, page 2)

“... that the enjoyment of such rights and freedoms by all persons must be protected by the commonwealth of nations and secured by international as well as national laws”.

Some of the members of the Drafting Group were of the opinion, however, that if this provision were to be retained it should be modified and put in the Preamble of a Convention.

13. The question of implementation is raised in the final paragraph of the proposal submitted by the Delegation of France to the Drafting Committee. This paragraph reads as follows: (E/CN.4/AC.1/5, page 2)

“And that the General Assembly of 1947 instruct the Commission on Human Rights to study the constitution of an appropriate international organ with a view to ensuring effective observance of those rights.”

[96]

This memorandum does not discuss the various suggestions for implementation that have been submitted by individuals and organizations.

14. During the session of the Drafting Committee, the United States made the following suggestions concerning implementation:

1. The Articles in this Bill of Rights shall be referred to the appropriate organs or agencies of the United Nations with a view to the formulation of a series of international conventions to be submitted individually to the member States for ratification or other appropriate action in accordance with their respective constitutional processes.

2. The Conventions thus concluded shall be deposited with the Secretary-General of the United Nations for registration and publication in accordance with Article 102 of the Charter.

3. The Conventions shall provide for submission to the Secretary-General of copies of the laws or regulations by which the member State gives effect to the provisions of the Convention together with the name of the competent authority responsible for compliance, and of periodic reports concerning the enforcement and revisions of such laws.

4. The Secretary-General shall inform the General Assembly each year of the Conventions embodying the provisions of this Bill of Rights which have been proposed to the member States, and the number of States which have ratified or have failed to ratify them.

15. The consensus of opinion of the Drafting Committee was that the following three Articles should be referred to the Commission on Human Rights for consideration in connection with the problem of implementation:

Article A

There is no protection of human rights where the authors of tyrannical or arbitrary acts or their accomplices are not punished and where there is no provision for the liability of public authorities or their agents.

Article B

The provisions of this International Bill of Rights shall be deemed fundamental principles of international law and shall become part of the national law of each of the member States of the United Nations. Their observance is therefore a matter of international concern and it shall be within the jurisdiction of the United Nations to discuss any violation thereof.

Article C

It is the duty of each Member State to take, within its jurisdiction, all measures and legal dispositions for the enactment and effective respect of the rights and freedoms proclaimed in this Declaration. The State shall, when necessary, co-operate with other States to that end.

A. Introduction

1. Membership

The Economic and Social Council at its eighty-second plenary meeting, 28 March 1947, approved the appointment by the Chairman of the Commission on Human Rights of a Drafting Committee consisting of the members of the Commission on Human Rights for Australia, Chile, China, France, Lebanon, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the United Kingdom and the United States of America, (Resolution No. 46 (IV) of the Economic and Social Council). The Drafting Committee was charged with the preparation of a preliminary draft of an International Bill of Human Rights.

2. Officers

The officers of the Drafting Committee during the first session were: Chairman, Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt (USA); Vice-Chairman, Dr. P. C. Chang (China); Rapporteur, Dr. Charles Malik (Lebanon). All were elected at the first meeting, 9 June 1947.

3. Secretary

Prof. J. Humphrey was Secretary of the Drafting Committee.

4. Temporary Working Group

A Temporary Working Group was appointed at the sixth meeting, 13 June 1947. It was composed of representatives of France, Lebanon, and the United Kingdom, with the Chairman of the Committee as an ex officio member. Its functions were: (1) to suggest a logical rearrangement of the articles of the draft outline [2] supplied by the Secretariat, (2) to suggest a redraft of the various articles in the light of the discussions of the Drafting Committee, and (3) to suggest to the Drafting Committee the division of the substance of the articles between a Declaration and a Convention. The Temporary Working Group held three meetings. The draft texts prepared by the Working Group (E/CN.4/AC.1/W.1 and E/CN.4/AC.1/W.2/Rev.1) were submitted to the Drafting Committee at its seventh meeting, 17 June 1947.

5. Report

The report of the Drafting Committee is E/CN.4/21.

Draft Resolution Proposed by the Delegations of the United Kingdom, The Netherlands, and the United States

The Economic and Social Council

Having received the Report transmitted by the International Labour Organization in pursuance of the Council's request at its Fourth Session that the memoranda on the subject of Trade Union Rights submitted to the Council by the World Federation of Trade Unions and the American Federation of Labor might be placed on the agenda of the International Labour Organization at its next Session and that a Report might be sent for the consideration of the Economic and Social Council at its next meeting,

Takes note of the Report and observes with satisfaction the action taken and proposed by the International Labour Organization within its recognized competence,

Resolves to transmit the Report to the General Assembly,

Awaits further Reports on the subject to be transmitted by the International Labour Organization and awaits also the Report which it will receive in due course from the Commission on Human Rights on those aspects of the subject which might appropriately form part of the Bill or Declaration on Human Rights,

Notes that proposals for the establishment of international machinery for safeguarding Freedom of Association are to be examined by the Governing Body of the International Labour Organization,

Considers that the question of enforcement of rights, whether of individuals or of associations, raises common problems which should be considered jointly by the United Nations and the International Labour Organizations, and

Requests the Secretary-General to arrange for cooperation between the International Labour Organization and the Committee [sic] on Human Rights in the study of these problems.

Summary Record of the Hundred and Eighth Meeting [of the Economic and Social Council]

Held at Lake Success, New York, on Friday, 8 August 1947
at 11.15 a.m.

Acting President: MR. JAN PAPANEK (Czechoslovakia)

46. Discussion of trade union rights (documents E/372, E/C.2/32, E/C.2/50 and E/485)

THE PRESIDENT, in welcoming the representative of the International Labour Organization, explained the history of the question. The World Federation of Trade Unions had asked the Council to place on the agenda an item regarding trade union rights. This had been discussed at the previous session of the Council and then referred to the International Labour Organization which had arrived at certain conclusions.

...

MISS SENDER (American Federation of Labor) . . . pointed out that the American Federation of Labor had taken an active part in the work of the Commission of Human Rights which was also considering the two resolutions submitted by her organization and the World [169] Federation of Trade Unions and that the basic rights of labour had already been incorporated in the draft international bill of human rights. She expressed the hope that the final draft of that bill would not be modified in any respect likely to weaken the decisions already taken with respect to the rights of labour.

MR. PHILLIPS (United Kingdom) expressed his approval of the report of the International Labour Organization and pointed out to the Council that it reflected the agreed opinions of the workers, the employers and Governments of almost fifty countries.

He noted that apart from studying the questions submitted to it by the Council, the ILO had also mapped out a further programme of action relating to the implementation of international conventions. He felt that such a study was closely related to what was being considered by the Commission on Human Rights concerning the implementation of human rights. He hoped, therefore, that there would be close cooperation on the study of that question between the ILO and the Commission on Human Rights.

47. Continuation of the discussion of trade union rights (documents E/533, E/534 and E/C.2/32)

...

[MR. THORP (United States of America)] The basic problem was whether the Council should maintain its decision that the question should be studied by the ILO and the Commission on Human Rights, or whether it should adopt the Czechoslovak proposal (document E/534), which mentioned the Social Commission and not the Commission on Human Rights. Mr. Thorp said that he would not like to see the Commission on Human Rights drop out of the picture, since the problem in question was one which would certainly have to be covered in the bill of rights.

...

[MR. MARTIN (Canada)] The Council must now decide upon the best course of action and to what bodies it intended to entrust the problem for further study. Overlapping must be avoided. The Commission on Human Rights could not be excluded because of its obvious concern with the bill of human rights.

...

...

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) expressed satisfaction that it was now clear that neither the Czechoslovak nor the French proposals, which his delegation had supported were intended to diminish the role of the ILO.

With reference to enlisting the participation of the Commission on Human Rights, he pointed out that both the joint United Kingdom, United States and Netherlands draft resolution and the previous Council resolution merely requested the Commission to take the matter into consideration in connexion with the elaboration of an international bill of rights. Since the bill of rights was envisaged as only enunciating general principles, the Commission would not be called [179] upon to make a report to the Council on the question of trade union rights, unless the Council specifically requested such a report in its resolution.

The proposal of the representative of the USSR that the original proposal of the WFTU (document E/C.2/28) should be used as the basis for a decision was put to a vote.

Decision: The proposal was rejected by ten votes to two, with six abstentions.

The Czechoslovak draft resolution was then put to a vote.

Decision: The draft resolution was rejected by nine votes to one, with eight abstentions.

The amendment of the Norwegian representative to the joint draft resolution of the United Kingdom, the United States and the Netherlands, formulated as below, was put to a vote:

“The Economic and Social Council,

Resolves to transmit the report to the Social Commission, requesting the Commission to present its comments to the next session of the Economic and Social Council, in order that the Council may present the comments it desires for the consideration of the International Labour Conference in drafting one or more conventions in this matter.”

Decision: The amendment was rejected by seven votes to five, with six abstentions.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) proposed an amendment to the joint draft resolution of the United Kingdom, the United States and the Netherlands to the effect that paragraph (b) of the Czechoslovak draft resolution should be incorporated therein.

Decision: The amendment was adopted by five votes to four, with nine abstentions.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) likewise proposed an amendment to the joint draft resolution to the [181] effect that paragraph (a) of the Czechoslovak draft resolution should be incorporated therein.

Decision: The amendment was adopted by thirteen votes, with five abstentions.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) suggested that his amendment should be included in the second paragraph immediately before the words “to transmit the report. . .”, and MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) suggested that his amendment should be inserted immediately after Mr. Malik’s amendment.

The joint draft resolution was then put to a vote.

Decision: The resolution was adopted by fifteen votes to two, with one abstention.

Trade Union Rights (Freedom of Association) Resolution of 8 August 1947

The Economic and Social Council,

Having received the report transmitted by the International Labour Organization in pursuance of the Council’s request at its fourth session that the memoranda on the subject of trade union rights submitted to the Council by the World Federation of Trade Unions and the American Federation of Labor might be placed on the agenda of the International Labour Organization at its next session and that a report might be sent for the consideration of the Economic and Social Council at its next session,

Takes note of the report and observes with satisfaction the action taken and proposed by the International Labour Organization within its recognized competence,
Decides

- (a) To recognize the principles proclaimed by the International Labour Conference;
- (b) To request the International Labour Organization to continue its efforts in order that one or several international conventions may be quickly adopted;
- (c) To transmit the report to the General Assembly;

Awaits further reports on the subject to be transmitted by the International Labour Organization and awaits also the report which it will receive in due course from the Commission on Human Rights on those aspects of the subject which might appropriately form part of the bill or declaration on human rights,

Notes that proposals for the establishment of international machinery for safeguarding freedom of association are to be examined by the Governing Body of the International Labour Organization;

Considers that the question of enforcement of rights, whether of individuals or of associations, raises common problems which should be considered jointly by the United Nations and the International Labour Organization; and

Draft Resolution Submitted by the Delegation of the Dominican Republic

The General Assembly:

Considering:

- (a) That the resolution adopted on 8 August 1947 by the Economic and Social Council aims at the establishment, as soon as possible, of international machinery for safeguarding the freedom of association of trade unions, citing this need as one of the essential features of the proposed Bill of Human Rights;
- (b) That improvement of the living conditions of workers depends not only on respect for freedom of association but also on such other social safeguards as will assure to all men a minimum of economic well-being, and;
- (c) That the first step towards effective establishment of human rights should be an effort on the part of all countries that are Members of the United Nations for the international protection of the worker as regards his material means of existence;

Requests:

The Secretary-General to take the necessary measures in order that both the International Labour Organization and the Commission on Human Rights may study the possibility of establishing, as rights inherent in the human person, the principle of free association and any other safeguards, such as minimum wages and compulsory social insurance, as may provide the basis for a minimum of well-being within the reach of all the workers of the world.

Prevention of Discrimination and the Protection of Minorities

Drafting Committee on an International Bill of Human Rights

9. At the fifth meeting of the Drafting Committee of the Commission on Human Rights, its Chairman, Mrs. Roosevelt, stated that the Drafting Committee was not called upon to define the principle of equality or non-discrimination; this, she said, would be undertaken by the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities (E/CN.4/AC.1/SR.5, page 7). However, some members of the Committee expressed views on the subject. It will be noted that none of the views expressed in the Drafting Committee were considered to be binding upon any government.

10. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics stated that in his opinion the question of discrimination was the most important one to be raised in connection with the formulation of an International Bill of Rights (E/CN.4/AC.1/SR.5, pages 7–8). He felt that the Question should be considered in the light of present historical, concrete, material conditions. Whatever discrimination still exists in the world should be destroyed, he felt; and this must be done in such a manner that the Organization of the United Nations never again would have to consider items dealing with discrimination. Discrimination, he continued, could be considered an international political act, a phenomenon which has to be fought, which has to be treated, and which will threaten peace and security unless it is ended. The representative of the United Kingdom agreed that it was important to establish the principle of non-discrimination.

11. At the sixth meeting of the Drafting Committee, the representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics stated (E/CN.4/AC.1/SR.6, pages 3–4) that it was not sufficient simply to proclaim the principle of equality or of non-discrimination; that idea must be implemented. He felt that women were not yet treated with equality. He felt, also, that it was insufficient to say that equality without regard to race, sex, language or religion should be proclaimed; certain conditions, such as terrorism and certain forms of taxation, which had the effect of transforming equality into factual inequality, would have to be eliminated.

12. In the course of its discussion of Article 6 of the revised suggestions submitted by the representative of France for Articles to be included in an International Declaration of Human Rights (Document E/CN.4/21, page 51), it was suggested that the general principles of non-discrimination might be included in the Preamble rather than as a separate Article. At the Chairman's suggestion, a footnote to this Article was inserted in the draft, [8] suggesting that if the thought were embodied in the Preamble, it might be deleted in the Declaration (Document E/CN.4/AC.1/SR.12, page 5). The representative of France, however, was of the opinion that the substance of Article 6 should have a place in the body of the Declaration, or should be stated very strongly in the Preamble.

13. In the rough-draft English translation of Professor Cassin's suggested articles, the phrase "No one shall suffer discrimination by reason of his race, sex, language, religion, or political opinions" appeared. Professor Cassin pointed out that his French text had mentioned only "opinions", not "political opinions". The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics felt that elimination of the word "political" would broaden the Article, since there were many other types of beliefs. The representative of Lebanon pointed out, however, that politics was one of the fundamental activities of man in which discrimination existed; there was no harm, he maintained, in stating that a man is free to hold political convictions without danger of discrimination and persecution. The Chairman felt that it would be wiser to stick to the wording of the Charter until the recommendation of the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities had been received.

14. Similarly, the Committee felt that several other proposed Articles dealing with equality and non-discrimination should be referred by the Commission on Human Rights to its Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities. It so recommended in the case of Article 13, 15 and 28, of the proposed Declaration, in addition to Article 6. In the case of Article 36, dealing specifically with the protection of minorities, the Committee felt that it could not prepare a draft Article without thorough pre-examination by the Commission on Human Rights, and suggested that it might if necessary be referred to the Sub-Commission for examination of its minority aspects (Document E/CN.4/21, page 81). However, the representative of France expressed the view, in connection with the wording of this Article proposed by the Secretariat, that the language of this Article should be appropriate for situations existing all over the world, and suggested that the word “conglomeration” might be better than the phrase “a considerable number of persons”. The representative of Chile said that in his opinion the form and substance of this Article called for careful study, in view of the fact that many countries of America had been created by immigration of people from other countries. The representative of Lebanon agreed that in the New World there was assimilation, but pointed out that in the Old World there were wide divisions of ethnic groups. He maintained that [9] the question did not necessarily refer to “minority” groups but was concerned rather with the rights of ethnical groups in a body politic (Document E/CN.4/AC.1/SR.15, pages 6–7).

15. At the time the Drafting Committee met, it was understood that the Commission on Human Rights would convene for its second session prior to the date set for the first session of the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities. Subsequently the sequence of meetings was altered. The Commission therefore has not yet had an opportunity to refer any specific questions to the Sub-Commission.

16. When the Drafting Committee came to consider the substance of Articles to be included in a Draft Convention on Human Rights, it decided that the Articles suggested by the United Kingdom would be completed by provisions prohibiting distinctions based on race, sex, language and religion; but it made no attempt to draft these provisions in advance of the reports of the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities, and the Commission on the Status of Women (E/CN.4/21, page 86).

Trade Union Rights
Report to the Third Committee

1. At its 66th meeting, on 17 October 1947, the Third Committee instructed a Sub-Committee of fifteen members to study the proposal submitted to date concerning Trade Union rights (Freedom of Association) and to draft an unanimous compromise proposal or to submit a minimum number of alternative proposals. The drafting sub-committee elected the representative of Lebanon, Dr. Malik, as its chairman.

2. The Sub-Committee held four meetings during which it considered documents A/C.3/166, 167, 169, 170, 172, 175, 176, 177, 179, 181.

3. At its first meeting a draft resolution submitted by France was adopted as basis of discussion (A/C.3/175). At the second meeting, the three first paragraphs of this document were unanimously adopted. Divergences of opinion on the following paragraphs became apparent.

4. At the beginning of its third meeting, a new compromise proposal prepared by France was unanimously adopted as a basis of further discussion (A/C.3/181). During the third and fourth meetings, this new text was discussed, paragraph by paragraph, and the following draft resolution was adopted by a vote of 11 for, and 4 against.

- (1) The General Assembly:
- (2) Taking note of Resolution No. 52 adopted by the Economic and Social Council at its fourth session, to transmit the views of the World Federation of Trade Unions and the American Federation of Labor on “Guarantees for the Exercise and Development of Trade Union Rights” to the Commission on Human Rights, “in order that it may consider those aspects [2] of the subject which might appropriately form part of the bill or declaration on human rights”;
- (3) Taking note also of Resolution No. 84 adopted by the said Council at its fifth session, to transmit to the General Assembly of the United Nations the report of the International Labour Organization entitled “Decisions concerning Freedom of Association adopted unanimously by the Thirtieth Session of the International Labour Conference on 11 July 1947”; to recognize the principles proclaimed by the International Labour Conference; to request the International Labour Organization to continue its efforts in order that one or several international conventions may be adopted;
- (4) Approves these two resolutions, and

- (5) Considers that the inalienable right of trade union freedom of organization is as well as other social safeguards essential to the improvement of the standard of living of workers and to their economic well-being,
- (6) Declares that it endorses the principles proclaimed by the International Labour Conference in respect of Trade Union Rights as well as the principles the importance of which to labour has already been recognized and which are mentioned in the Constitution of the International Labour Organization and in the Declaration of Philadelphia,
- (7) Decides to transmit the said report of the International Labour Organization to the Commission on Human Rights with the same objects as those stated in Resolution No. 52 of the Economic and Social Council,
- (8) Recommends to the ILO on its tripartite basis to pursue urgently in collaboration with the United Nations and in conformity with the Resolution of the International Labour Conference concerning international machinery for safeguarding Trade Union Rights and Freedom of Association, the study of the control of their practical application,

Remarks

- (a) Paragraphs 1, 2 and 3 were adopted unanimously.
- (b) Paragraph 4 was adopted by a vote of 11 against 3 (Czechoslovakia, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Yugoslavia) and 1 abstention (China).
- (c) Paragraph 5 was adopted, after a draft amendment to this paragraph had been lost, by 11 against 3 (Czechoslovakia, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Yugoslavia) and 1 abstention (Argentina).
- (d) Paragraph 6 was adopted after an Argentine amendment had been lost by 10 against 4 (Argentina, Czechoslovakia, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Yugoslavia) and 1 absent (Chile).
- (e) Paragraph 7 was adopted by 13 votes against 0, 1 abstention (Argentina) and 1 absent (Chile).
- (f) The Czechoslovakian representative moved a paragraph to be inserted between paragraphs 7 and 8. This amendment was lost by 3 votes against 8 (3 abstentions, 1 absent).
- (g) Paragraph 8 was adopted, after one Soviet amendment and 1 Czechoslovakian amendment had been lost, by 10 votes against 3 (Czechoslovakia, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Yugoslavia), 1 abstention (Argentina) and 1 absent (Chile).
- (h) Paragraph 9 of the original proposal (A/C.3/181) was withdrawn.

6. The representative of the Soviet Union felt that in spite of his desire to see the Sub-Committee present a unanimous resolution, he was forced to note that in the final draft none of the amendments presented or supported by his delegation had been taken into consideration and that he had therefore to reserve his right to present or support in the Committee amendments to the text submitted by the Sub-Committee.

7. With a view to facilitating the work of the Sub-Committee, the representatives who voted against the above resolution accepted not to urge alternative proposals but to confine themselves to amendments of the above resolution which they reserved their right to present and defend in the Committee.

Section A

I. The Task of the Commission on Human Rights in the Sphere of Trade Union Rights (Freedom of Association)

At its Fourth Session on 24 March 1947, the Economic and Social Council adopted a Resolution (No. 52 IV) in which it resolved to transmit certain documents on the Guarantees for the Exercise and Development of Trade Union rights presented to the Council by the World Federation of Trade Unions and the American Federation of Labor to the Commission on Human Rights “in order that it may consider those aspects of the subject which might appropriately form part of the Bill or Declaration of Human Rights”. At the same time, the Council decided to transmit the documents to the International Labour Organization with the request that the item “guarantees for the exercise and development of Trade Union Rights” may be placed upon its agenda and considered at the forthcoming (1947) Session and that a report be sent by the ILO to the Economic and Social Council for its consideration at the next meeting of the Council.

At its Fifth Session on 8 August 1947, when it had before it the report by the International Labour Organization, the Economic and Social Council passed a Resolution (Resolution 84(V)) where it said, inter alia, that it “awaits further reports on the subject to be transmitted by the ILO and awaits also the report which it will receive in due course from the Commission on Human Rights on those aspects of the subject which might appropriately form part of the Bill or Declaration of Human Rights”. The Economic and Social Council also stated that it “considers that the question of enforcement of rights, whether of individuals or of associations, raises common problems which should be considered jointly by the United Nations and the ILO.” It requested the Secretary-General to arrange for co-operation between the ILO and the Commission on Human Rights in the study of these problems.

The subject of Trade Union Rights (freedom of association) was also on the agenda of the Second Regular Session of the General Assembly (1947). On 30 October 1947, the Third Committee of the General Assembly adopted a resolution (document A/C.3/183) which at the time of writing had not yet come before the plenary session of the General Assembly, to the effect that the General Assembly approves the Economic and Social Council Resolutions No. 52 and 84 and decides to transmit the report of the International Labour Organization to the Commission on Human Rights with the same objects as those stated in the Resolution No. 52 of the Economic and Social Council. The full text of Resolutions 52 and 84 of the Economic and Social Council and of the Resolution adopted by the Third Committee of the General Assembly are attached to this paper as Annexes A, B and C. From these, it will be seen, therefore, that the Commission on Human Rights has a dual task:

1. To examine the substantive proposals submitted by the World Federation of Trade Unions and the American Federation of Labor and, according to the Resolution of the General Assembly, also the ILO Report in connection with the drafting of the International Bill of Human Rights;
2. To study – in co-operation with the International Labour Organization – the problem of enforcement (implementation).

Questions arising from this dual task which the Commission on Human Rights may wish to consider will be found in Section E of this paper.

Section B

II. Suggestions made by the World Federation of Trade Unions and the American Federation of Labor

1. The WFTU requested the Secretary-General of the United Nations by a letter dated 14 January 1947 to place on the agenda of the Economic and Social Council, inter alia, the item “Guarantees for the Exercise and Development of Trade Union Rights”. On 26 February 1947, the WFTU submitted to the Economic and Social Council the following draft resolution on the guarantees for the exercise and development of trade union rights (document E/C.2/28; see also document A/374, Annex 1).

Draft Resolution Suggested by the World Federation of Trade Unions

- I. Trade Union Rights are recognized as an inviolable prerogative enjoyed by salaried workers for the protection of their professional and social interests.
- II. Trade union organizations should be able to administer their own affairs, to deliberate and freely decide on all questions falling within their competence, in conformity with the law and with their constitution, without interference in their duties from governmental or administrative bodies.
- III. There should be no obstacle to the federation of trade union organizations on the occupational or inter-occupational level, whether locally, regionally, nationally or internationally.
- IV. All legislation which places restrictions on the above-mentioned principles is contrary to the economic and social collaboration laid down by the Charter of the United Nations.

- V. The Economic and Social Council decides to set up a Committee for Trade Union Rights which will safeguard, in a permanent fashion, respect for trade union rights. On every occasion on which the aforementioned principles are violated, the Committee will make the necessary enquiries and will submit recommendations to the Economic and Social Council as to the measures to be adopted.”

2. The American Federation of Labor, by a letter dated 12 March 1947, requested the Secretary-General to submit to the Economic and Social Council its memorandum and draft resolution on the guarantees for the exercise and development of trade union rights (document E/C.2/32; see also document A/374, Annex II). This memorandum referred to the draft proposals of the International Bill of Rights submitted by the American Federation of Labor and circulated to the members of the Council on 20 August 1946 as document E/CT.2/2. The American Federation of Labor, after examining in detail the proposals submitted by the WFTU suggested that these proposals be amended as follows:

[These materials concern recommendations to the International Labour Organization and do not mention the Universal Declaration of Human Rights.]

IV. Proceedings and Decision of the Fifth Session of the Economic and Social Council

The Economic and Social Council had before it the Report of the ILO. The International Federation of Christian Trade Unions also presented a statement on the Freedom of Association and Trade Union Rights (document E/C.2/50). The Council heard the representatives from the ILO, the WFTU, and the American Federation of Labor, and the International Federation of Christian Trade Unions. The World Federation of Trade Unions expressed its feeling, without in any way disparaging the work of the International Labour Organization, that the problem with which it was concerned had not been dealt with satisfactorily and insisted that the Economic and Social Council itself should act on the matter immediately. It asked the Council to adopt a declaration of principles to serve as a basis for the recognition that the question of Trade Union Rights was associated with all the activities of the Council and to create a special commission which, in a flexible and practical manner, would be able to effectuate those principles. The American Federation of Labor felt that, though the report of the ILO had not fulfilled all the requests expressed in the document submitted by the American Federation of Labor, a new committee set up by the United Nations would never have been capable of acting as rapidly or of developing within a short period of time an adequate machinery for implementation. The American Federation of Labor also hoped that the final draft of the Bill of Human Rights would not weaken the decisions of the Drafting Committee of the Commission on Human Rights and that the draft may be adopted not later than 1948. The IFCTU pointed out that it would be necessary to create special machinery for safeguarding freedom of association and that the Council, the Commission on Human Rights and the General Assembly should give their full backing to the ILO.

The discussion between the various delegations in the Council centred on three points: First, whether the Council should take up the original proposal of the WFTU as a basis for a decision; this proposal of the Delegation of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics was based on the contention that the report of the ILO should be regarded as an information document, complementary to the main proposals made by the WFTU. The proposal was rejected. The second point which was put forward early in the course of the discussion by the French Delegation was, that the Economic and Social Council, through its subsidiary organs, ought to carry on its own studies in order to co-ordinate the results, and that the Social Commission should be asked to give advice to the Council on the social aspects of the rights of Trade Unions just as the Commission on Human Rights had been asked to give its advice on human rights. The Delegation of Czechoslovakia desired to transmit the report of the ILO to the Social Commission, requesting that Commission to make proposals in order to complete and consolidate the text transmitted to the Council by the ILO, in a practical form, by an analysis of the legal situation and of the actual facts, taking into account the observations of the interested parties; and to bring its recommendations to the Council concerning the implementation of the proposed principles. A Norwegian amendment to this proposal, providing for the transmission of the Report of the ILO to the Social Commission for its comments upon the ILO report to the next session of the Council in order that the Council may present the comments it desired for the co-ordination of the ILO in drafting one or more conventions in this matter was rejected. The United Kingdom delegation, which submitted a resolution, together with the Delegations of the Netherlands and the United States, felt that any proposal for submitting the question to another organ besides the ILO would mean duplication of work, a loss of special competence available in the ILO, and that in the working out of practical measures to deal with this subject, the actual and practical groundwork should be undertaken by an organization in which the workers have the right of full participation and the right to vote.

The Resolution as adopted by the Economic and Social Council was substantially the same as the one put forward by the Delegations of the United Kingdom, Netherlands, and the United States of America, with the addition of two paragraphs forming (a) and (b) of paragraph three which originally formed items (a) and (b) of the Czechoslovak Draft Resolution. The text of Resolution No. 84 (V) is reproduced in Annex B of this document.

It will be noted that in this Resolution, the Economic and Social Council has expressed its wish to receive a report from the Commission on Human Rights. The Commission has also been asked to study the problem of enforcement in addition to the work concerning the substance of the International Bill of Human Rights.

V. Proceedings and Decision of the Second Session of the General Assembly (1947)

The Economic and Social Council transmitted its Resolution No. 84 (V) and the Report of the ILO to the General Assembly at its Second Session (documents A/374 and A/374/Add.1). The item on Trade Union Rights (Freedom of Association) was placed on the agenda of the Third Committee of the General Assembly.

[7]

The Third Committee discussed the subject at its sixty-third, sixty-fourth, sixty-fifth and sixty-sixth meetings. The Committee failed to agree upon a resolution and decided to establish a Sub-Committee of fifteen members at its sixty-sixth meeting to study the proposals submitted to date by the various delegations and to draft a unanimous compromise proposal or to submit a minimum number of alternative proposals. The discussion in the Third Committee elicited that there were three points of view. The delegations of France, the United Kingdom and the United States of America, among others, felt that the ILO was specially well-fitted to give effective assistance to the Economic and Social Council in the matter of Trade Union Rights and that the Commission on Human Rights should collaborate with the ILO in connection with those aspects of Trade Union Rights (Freedom of Association) which would form part of the Bill of Human Rights. The General Assembly should give an immediate support to the matter and the work of the ILO, as hitherto the supervision of the undertakings given by the various governments had been ineffective.

The delegations of the Dominican Republic and Argentina, among others, proposed to broaden the scope of the resolution of the Economic and Social Council so as to include the consideration of other safeguards such as minimum wages, compulsory social insurance, right to work, as might provide for the minimum wellbeing within the reach of all the workers of the world.

The delegations of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Czechoslovakia and Yugoslavia, among others felt that the Economic and Social Council, without discussing the substance of the ILO Report, had accepted its principles and referred it to the General Assembly. Further, this Council had failed to recognize and give adequate consideration to the principles embodied in the request made by the WFTU to the Council. The ILO included other groups as well as workers and it placed employers' organizations on the same footing as the workers. The ILO had not dealt specifically with Trade Union Rights, but with Freedom of Association. The subject under consideration was the safeguarding of the workers' rights. There had been no discussion of the principles embodied in the Report of the ILO, which, especially as regards Articles 7 and 8 of the decisions of the International Labour Conference placed Trade Union Rights in the hands of the employers. Moreover, it was not enough to consider the problem simply as a question of the workers' rights to form Trade Unions; those Trade Unions had to have freedom of action. The ILO had approached the problem purely from a legal standpoint without giving sufficient consideration to the social and economic aspects, and on the supposition that employers and employees were wholly free to make their decisions independently. It was obvious that there was no lack of general declarations of "paper" rights; it was their application which had to be watched. The resolutions put forward by the other delegations were not effective since no concrete measures for verifying the extent to which Trade Union Rights were being implemented in various countries had been included. The Secretary-General of the United Nations, together with the ILO, the WFTU and the Commission on Human Rights, ought to be asked to study the minimum guarantees required to ensure the rights of Trade Unions (Freedom of Association).

The Sub-Committee failed to reach a unanimous agreement as regards any one resolution and it submitted to the Third Committee a compromise proposal agreed upon by a majority of the members. Some concession was made in this resolution to meet the desires of certain delegations by the inclusion of paragraphs five and six. The delegations of Argentina, Czechoslovakia, and Yugoslavia submitted their own amendments. The Third Committee, at its seventy-third meeting, approved the Resolution of the Sub-Committee by a majority vote and rejected all the amendments. (See Report of Third Committee to the General Assembly, document A/444.) The text of the Resolution is reproduced in Annex C of this document.

This Resolution not only approves the two Resolutions Nos. 52 and 84 of the Economic and Social Council but transmits to the Commission on Human Rights the report of the ILO (last but one paragraph) and recommends collaboration between the ILO and the U.N. in the matter of enforcement (last paragraph).

Section D

The Report of the International Labour Organization and the Proposals of the WFTU

VI. General Observations

[9]

...

VII. Analysis of the ILO Resolution on Freedom of Association and of Items I to IV of the WFTU Proposals on Matters of Substance

1. The Resolution of the ILO concerning Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize and to Bargain Collectively is divided into two parts dealing respectively with (I) Freedom of Association (Articles 1–7) and (II) Protection of the Right to Organize and to Bargain Collectively (Articles 8–10).

Roughly speaking, “freedom of association” as used by the International Labour Conference refers to the relations between individuals and organizations consisting of individuals on the one part, and the State on the other, while “right to organize” is used to describe the relations between individuals amongst themselves. “Freedom of association” would seem, therefore, to mean protection against interference by the State and the “right to organize”, protection against interference, mainly by the employer.

2. The Commission will note that the ILO Resolution used the general term “freedom of association”. This term is, of course, not restricted to the right to form organizations for professional purposes of workers or of workers and employers. The Commission will note, on the other hand, that the principles formulated by the International Labour Organization, though using the wider term “freedom of association”, deal only with the freedom of association of employers and workers qua employers and workers. In examining the principles proclaimed by the ILO, the Commission on Human Rights may therefore wish to consider in each individual case whether the respective principle is appropriate to the right to form trade unions only, or whether it could or should be made to apply to the right of association for whatever purpose.

3. Article 427 of the Peace Treaty of Versailles (usually quoted as Article 41 of the Constitution of the ILO) enumerates among the methods and principles for regulating labour conditions which all industrial communities should endeavour to apply as one of special and urgent importance, the right of association for all lawful purposes.

Article 20 of the Secretariat outline (document E/CN.4/21, page 15) of an International Bill of Rights provides that “there shall be freedom to form associations for purposes not inconsistent with this Bill of Rights”. The Secretariat outline provides for restrictions on the freedom to form associations in order to prevent associations being formed for purposes which are contrary to the Bill of Rights or to prevent associations from engaging in activities violating the Bill of Rights.

Article 16 of the United Kingdom Draft (document E/CN.4/21, page 37) which has been adopted by the Drafting Committee as one of the Articles to be considered for inclusion in a Convention (document E/CN.4/21, page 85, Art. II) provides that all persons shall be free to constitute associations in whatever form may be appropriate under the law of the state for the promotion and protection of their legitimate interests and of any other lawful object. The United Kingdom draft reserves to the State the right to lay down by its municipal law the appropriate forms for constituting associations. It guarantees the establishment of associations only for the promotion and protection of legitimate interests and lawful objects. The implication clearly is that it is for municipal law to ordain what are legitimate interests of persons forming associations and what can and what cannot be a lawful object of an association.

Article 23 of the United States suggestion (document E/CN.4/21, page 44) states only that “there shall be freedom to form associations”.

Article 24 of the suggestion submitted by the representative of France (document E/CN.4/21, page 58) “recognizes and guarantees” the freedom of association for political, cultural, scientific, sporting, economic and social purposes compatible with this Bill, subject only to the protection of public order”. The French Draft embodies therefore both the reservation of the Secretariat Draft (purposes compatible with this Bill) and, in a different form, the restriction reserved in the British Draft, because it is again envisaged that municipal law will decide what is public order and what are the steps necessary for its protection. The French Draft differs from the Secretariat outline and from the United Kingdom Draft in that it enumerates six types of “purposes” for which the freedom of association is guaranteed. It is to be assumed that Trade Union Rights are covered mainly by the “economic” purposes of the French Draft.

The Draft Declaration suggested by the Drafting Committee states in its Article 23 (document 3/CN.4/21, page 78) that there shall be freedom of association for political, religious, cultural, scientific, professional and other purposes. The “purposes” of the Draft Declaration are not therefore identical with those of the French proposal; Trade Union Rights here probably come under the heading of “professional” purposes and are certainly covered by the clausula generalis of “other purposes”. The Declaration is, of course, purposely drafted in general terms and is not intended to prevent the municipal legislator from enacting provisions protecting public order and similar interests. This becomes clear from a comparison between Article 23 of the Draft Declaration and Article 11 of the Draft Articles for inclusion in a Convention (document E/CN.4/21, page 85) the text of which is identical with the above quoted Article 16 of the United Kingdom Draft.

It may be useful to mention in this connection that also other draft international declarations or proposals on human rights which were submitted by member governments are based on the same principles. Reference is made to the declarations or proposals suggested by the Governments of Chile, Cuba, Ecuador, India and Panama. (Documents E/CN.4/AC.1/3/Add.1, page 147; E/CN.4/W.8, pages 12–131; E/CN.4/32.)

By way of illustration and to show the common approach to this basic problem, reference is also made to Professor Lauterpacht’s book An International Bill of the Rights of Man where the author suggests a provision to the effect that “there shall be full freedom of association...” (Article 5 of Lauterpacht’s draft, page 110) and where he says that “The Bill of Rights is necessarily a document of great generality. Its details must be filled in by the mass of legislation and judicial precedent within various States. Any Bill of Rights must be subject to two fundamental exceptions – the welfare of the State and the legally recognized rights of the members of the community. The way in which these exceptions operate in various States is the result of a variety of factors which must necessarily differ from State to State . . . What is regarded as a sufficient measure of protection in one State may be utterly inadequate in another. The fact is that within the orbit of fundamental rights there is room for a wide divergence of law and practice, and with regard to most of the rights guaranteed in the International Bill of the Rights of Man. . . the law and the judicial practices of States have evolved their own solutions and their own procedures. It is possible – though highly improbable – that at some distant date the laws of States will merge into one world law in this and in other matters. The International Bill of the Rights of Man cannot attempt to introduce such a world law. On the contrary, it must be enforced through the law of States, suitably adapted, if need be, to the fundamental requirements of the Bill of Rights” (page 175).

As to constitutional provisions concerning the right of association, the compilation submitted by the Secretariat (document E/CN.4/AC.1/3/Add.1, pages 147–158) may be consulted.

The Commission on Human Rights will find that the International Labour Conference, though using the term “inviolable right” did not advocate an absolute and unrestricted right, which would not be subject to reasonable provisions of municipal legislation. This is clear from its Article 3, according to which, employers’ and workers’ organizations should not be liable to be dissolved or have their activities suspended by administrative authority. This provision impliedly recognizes the dissolution or suspension of organizations by court decisions or by acts of the legislature. In Article 6, it is recognized that the municipal legislator has a right to subject the acquisition of legal personality by employers’ and workers’ organizations to conditions, if these are not of such a character as to restrict the freedom of association as defined in the document. That the freedom of association is not unfettered appears also from Article 7 which emphasizes the full share of responsibilities and obligations of workers’ and employers’ organizations. M. Jouhaux, the Rapporteur of the Committee on [12] the Freedom of Association of the International Labour Conference, in his speech, delivered before the Conference, also made allowance for restrictions on the right of association in saying that “provided that that liberty does not interfere with the general interests of the collectivity in which it exists, then freedom of association must, if I may use a pleonasm be free”. The Deputy Rapporteur of the Committee, M. Cornil, employers’ delegate of Belgium, also stressed this point. He said, “Our task would be simple if it were merely to draw up texts which would guarantee complete freedom of association irrespective of any restraints. It would be simple, but it would be pointless, since the exercise of complete freedom of association can be justified only if there is respect for other equally essential freedoms. . . it is therefore for us to define the framework in which freedom of association can be exercised without prejudicing the other essential liberties.”

4. In the Third Committee of the 1947 General Assembly, some delegates took exception (a) to the fact that the ILO Resolution in their opinion dealt not with the rights of trade unions, but with the right of association in general; (b) to the fact that the International Labour Organization Report places employers’ organizations on an equal footing with workers’ organizations.

In the following paragraphs of this paper, the text of the ten articles of the ILO Resolution on Freedom of Association will be reproduced, with annotations by the Division of Human Rights.

Part I. Freedom of Association

1. Article 1. Employers and workers, without distinction whatsoever, should have the inviolable right to establish or join organizations of their own choosing without previous authorization.

Annotation

- (a) The right to establish or join organizations is guaranteed to employers and workers “without distinction whatsoever”. These words intend to afford protection against two kinds of discrimination:
- (i) discrimination as to race, sex, language or religion;
  - (ii) distinction as to occupation.

From the Provisional Record of the International Labour Conference No. 30 (XXX-1947), Appendices, it appears that the ILO purposely abstained from providing for exceptions which would have limited the right of association of civil servants, of members of the police and members of the armed forces. The Indian Government member was of the opinion that the armed forces and the police should not be included in the field of application of freedom of association because they were not authorized to take part in collective negotiations and had not the right to strike. [13] Several Government members drew the attention of the Committee to the fact that in certain countries the members of the police force and other public services were organized in the same way as workers in private undertakings; in other countries, their organizations were either forbidden or merely tolerated. It was also pointed out that in some countries, the armed forces have the right to organize. The French Workers’ member warned the Committee against the adoption of a text which did not recognize the liberty of trade union organization in force in the most advanced countries. A restrictive convention could not serve as a model for the less advanced countries. Public employees should enjoy full freedom of association, including members of the police force under municipal authorities not directly under the State. The Amendment to exempt the armed forces and the police from the guarantee of the right of association was rejected by 1 vote to 57 with 3 Governments’ members and the Employers’ members abstaining. It is not entirely clear, however, whether there was any consensus of opinion on the question whether special restrictions on the right of association of the police personnel should be allowed or not. The statement by the French Workers’ representative, quoted above, shows that he intended to guarantee the right of association to members of the police force under municipal authorities not directly under the State, from which it could be argued a contrario that a special regime concerning the state police would not be repugnant to the opinion prevailing among the members of the ILO Conference.

- (b) When the ILO principles were discussed in Committee, the Employers’ members proposed that the right of association should be guaranteed only “for purposes of regulating relations between employers and employees and all other purposes not contrary to the general laws". Several Workers' members of the Committee observed that this amendment was unnecessary and dangerous. It was unnecessary, they said, because trade unions, in common with other organizations and with ordinary citizens, had to be conducted according to general laws which were imposed on the whole population. The amendment, they said, was dangerous because it could enable a government to declare illegal a trade union object which in itself was perfectly legitimate.

After an exchange of views between the different groups in the Committee, the Employers' members withdrew their amendment, it being understood that freedom of association – like every other freedom – is bound by national laws, as is envisaged in the Constitution of the International Labour Organization which, in Article 41, Clause 2 cites, among the main principles of special urgent importance, "the right of association for all lawful purposes by the employed as well as by the employers".

- (c) An amendment submitted by the Employers' members that the "right not to join" an organization also should be guaranteed, was rejected by the Committee by 41 votes to 50. The rejected amendment had, of course, intended to deal with the questions commonly known as "closed shop" and "union shop". This question will be discussed later in connection with Article 9(2) of the ILO Resolution.
- (d) It will be seen that Article 1 of the ILO Resolution deals with the subject matter of paragraph I of the Resolution submitted by the WFTU which is quoted above under II (1). The differences between the two proposals are as follows:
  - (1) The proposal of the World Federation of Trade Unions speaks of trade union rights, whereas the ILO Report speaks of the right to establish or join organizations by employers and workers.
  - (2) The proposal by the WFTU grants rights to "salaried workers" only – the ILO Report to employers and workers.
  - (3) The WFTU speaks of an inviolable prerogative. The ILO of an inviolable right.
  - (4) The proposal by the WFTU is restricted to the protection of professional and social interests. The ILO Report contains no such restriction.
  - (5) The ILO Resolution, as distinguished from the WFTU proposal, guarantees the right to join organizations "of their own choosing" and "without previous authorization".

2. Article 2. Employers' and workers' organizations should have the right to draw up their constitutions and rules, to organize their administration and activities and to formulate their programmes; there should be no interference on the part of the public authorities which would restrict this right or impede the organizations in the lawful exercise of this right.

Annotation

- (a) This Article purports to safeguard the autonomy of employers' and workers' organizations.
- (b) From the discussions in the Committee on Freedom of Association of the International Labour Conference, it appears that an amendment proposed by the Employers members to replace the words "public authorities" by "administrative authorities" was rejected. The amendment had intended to restrict the guarantee of Trade Union autonomy to the effect that it should be protected only against interference by administrative authorities and not against intervention by the legislature or by judicial authorities.

The Workers' members were opposed to this amendment mainly for the three following reasons:

- (1) It was necessary to protect trade unions against interference by political authority. Under the totalitarian regimes, political authority entirely dominated all other types of authority.
- (2) The value of a guarantee would be lessened if legislation could authorize a Government to interfere with the activities of trade unions.
- (3) The intervention of tribunals, especially by means of injunctions – as was the practice in the United States – would be not less dangerous for trade unions than intervention on the part of administrative authorities.
- (c) Several Governments' members observed that the State could not abstain from all intervention if only because it had to ensure that the trade unions carried on their activities within the limits of the law. It was subsequently proposed by the Employers' members that interference with the autonomy of organizations by "due process of law" should be allowed. This proposal was also rejected. Nor was a further amendment accepted to provide that the effective exercise of such rights shall be subject to compliance with the formalities decreed by law. Several Governments' members stated that in practice organizations had to observe certain rules laid down by legislation such as, for example, provisions concerning the registration or depositing of rules. The Workers' members, however, considered that the text, if so modified, would be susceptible of a wide interpretation by certain Governments which would permit them to control the organizations.

- (d) The Commission will note that the principle of autonomy of the organization is stressed emphatically in the resolution. Interference by public authority is not, however, excluded altogether. It is implied in the adopted text that the public authorities have the right to interfere if the organization embarks upon activities which are not the “lawful exercise of the right” of association. From the quoted discussions, it appears that the words “public authorities” are used in a wider sense, not restricted to administrative authorities, but also comprising the legislature and the courts. This means that legislative and judicial authorities also are prevented from interference in the internal affairs of the organization with the proviso, however, that the constitutions, rules, administration, activities and programmes do not constitute an “unlawful exercise” of the organization’s right. The Resolution might for this reason be interpreted in the sense that, in principle, municipal law remains the yardstick for answering the question whether an organization’s constitution, a rule, activity or programme is or is not lawful. A law or a court decision, however, which interferes in the internal affairs of an organization to such an extent [16] that the organization no longer retains its freedom to draw up its constitution and rules, to organize its administration and activities and to formulate its programmes would, of course, be contrary to the international obligation undertaken in accepting a convention based on Article 2.
- (e) The Commission will further note, however, that while Article 2 protects the autonomous life of the organization against interference not only by administrative authorities, but also by the legislature and the judiciary, Article 3 does not exclude the dissolution or suspension of organizations by legislative measures and court decrees.
- (f) Article 2 of the ILO Report covers, together with the subsequent Article 3, the ground which is dealt with in point II of the WFTU Resolution. A comparison between the two proposals will be found below in the Annotations to Article 3 of the ILO Resolution.

3. Article 3. Employers’ and workers’ organizations should not be liable to be dissolved or have their activities suspended by administrative authority.

Annotation

- (a) This provision protects the existence and the activities of the organization against action by administrative authority as distinguished from measures taken by the legislature itself, or by the courts.
- (b) In some legal orders, organizations are liable to be dissolved for certain reasons by administrative decision, e.g., because they engage in criminal activities. Such administrative measures are, under the general laws of some countries, subject to review by either the ordinary Courts of the land or by special administrative courts. It appears that this system is incompatible with the provisions of Article 3 of the ILO Resolution.

- (c) The Commission will find that there is no substantive difference between the proposals contained in Articles 2 and 3 of the ILO Resolution and Article II of the WFTU proposal. The safeguards provided for by the ILO are more elaborate and its Article 2 protects the organizations against interference by public authorities of all kinds, including legislative and judicial authorities, while the WFTU had demanded only the exclusion of the interference by governmental or administrative bodies.

4. Article 4. Employers' and workers' organizations should have the right to establish federations and confederations as well as the right of affiliation with international organizations of employers and workers.

Annotation

- (a) Insofar as the right to establish federations and confederations of organizations within the State is [17] concerned, the Article is nothing but an explanatory statement on the general right of association from which the right of the associations to associate logically flows. The international guarantee of the right of affiliation with international associations, though no novelty in fact (there have existed international organizations of trade unions for many decades) appears as a matter of law to contain a development beyond the present legal position. In the law of some countries, it may be doubted whether the right of association, guaranteed by the Constitution or constitutional doctrine, includes the right to associate with foreign associations.

The Commission on Human Rights will find that Article 4 is a provision of an international character under two aspects: (1) The subject matter itself transcends national boundaries in that the right is given and guaranteed to citizens of one State to associate with citizens of other States. (2) This right is, moreover, declared to be a matter of international concern. This appears, to a certain extent, to be a new departure in international law.

- (b) The Commission may wish to consider whether, and in what respect, there is a difference between “federation” and “confederation”.
- (c) In connection with Article 4, also, the Employers' members proposed to insert the words “for lawful purposes”. The amendment was withdrawn under the same conditions as the similar amendment presented under Article 1.
- (d) An amendment submitted by the Turkish Government member, indicating the terms under which the affiliation of a trade union to an international organization should be subject to previous governmental authorization where national legislation provided that this was necessary, was also withdrawn.

- (e) The Commission will find that there is no substantive difference between the provisions of Article 4 of the ILO Resolution on the one hand and item III of the WFTU proposal on the other, though the two are drafted differently. The WFTU proposal does not speak of confederations; it goes however into more detail in enumerating that there should be no obstacle to federation on the occupational or inter-occupational level and adding to it “whether locally, regionally, nationally or internationally”.

5. Article 5. The guarantees defined in paragraphs 1, 2 and 3 herein with regard to the establishment, functioning, dissolution and suspension of employers’ and workers’ organizations should apply to federations and confederations of such organizations.

Annotation

This provision has no counterpart in the WFTU proposals.

[18]

6. Article 6. The acquisition of legal personality by employers’ and workers’ organizations should not be made subject to conditions of such a character as to restrict freedom of association as hereinbefore defined.

Annotation

- (a) The Commission on Human Rights will note that the proposals of the ILO proceed on the assumption that, in general, trade unions are not and will not be exempted from municipal legislation and regulation. Article 6 embodies, however, restrictions on the scope of municipal legislation, because it purports to prevent the municipal legislature from enacting laws which restrict freedom of association as defined in the preceding Articles.
- (b) Article 6 of the ILO Resolution corresponds to item IV of the WFTU proposals and here, again, the Commission will note that there is no fundamental difference between the two proposals. The WFTU proposal refers to the Charter of the United Nations and thus implies that legislation placing restrictions on the principles formulated by the WFTU would be contrary to the Charter of the United Nations. The ILO proposal, though not based on this interpretation of the Charter of the United Nations, purports to have the same effect by stipulating that such restrictive legislation would be contrary to the principles proclaimed by the ILO, and, therefore, to a convention based upon them.

7. Article 7. The acquisition and exercise of the rights as outlined in this part should not exempt the employers’ and workers’ organizations from their full share of responsibilities and obligations.

Annotation

- (a) This Article was not contained in the text prepared by the International Labour Office. It was proposed by the Employers' members. The Workers' members considered that such a provision was too general and lacking in precision. However, the Committee on Freedom of Association adopted the Article by 54 votes to 51 and it has become part of the principles unanimously adopted by the ILO Conference.
- (b) The Article has no counterpart in the WFTU proposals.
- (c) In examining this Article, the Commission may consider it relevant to form an opinion on its scope and may consider whether a convention embodying Article 7 would place upon the signatories the obligations to repeal municipal legislation which grants to trade unions certain immunities as far as their liability in private law is concerned. This is the case, e.g., in the British Trade Disputes Act of 1906.

Part II. Protection of the Right to Organize and to Bargain Collectively

8. Article 8. There should be agreement between organized employers and workers mutually to respect the exercise of the right of association.

Annotation

- (a) Part II deals with the protection of the right to organize and to bargain collectively and has as its purpose the protection of the right of association against interference not by the State, but mainly by employers and their organizations and agents. Consequently, the legal character of this Article differs fundamentally from that of the preceding Articles. Article 8 does not formulate a legal right to which a legal obligation corresponds and which, as a consequence, can be enforced in a court, but it formulates a postulate addressed to organized workers and employers, i.e., to persons and organizations different from States. The State, party to a convention based on Article 8, would only promise to induce by recommendation and persuasion organizations of employers and workers under its jurisdiction to comply with the voeu which is contained in the Article. The national legislature may, of course, support its general policy aimed at this objective by enacting provisions which might go as far as placing a legal duty on the employers' and workers' organizations to come to an agreement in accordance with Article 8. This duty imposed by municipal legislation might be supported by provisions of criminal law, making non-recognition of the right of association by the other party a criminal offence.

- (b) The view has been expressed in the debate in the Third Committee of the General Assembly by some delegates that this Article makes the protection of the right to organize and to bargain collectively dependent on the consent of the organized employers.

9. Article 9

1. Where full and effective protection is not already afforded, appropriate measures should be taken to enable guarantees to be provided for:

- (a) the exercise of the right of freedom of association without fear of intimidation, coercion or restraint from any source with the object of:
- (i) making the employment of the worker conditional on his not joining a trade union or on his withdrawing from a trade union of which he is a member;
  - (ii) prejudicing a worker because he is a member or agent or official of a trade union;
  - (iii) dismissing a worker because he is a member or agent or official of a trade union;

- (b) the exercise of the right of association by workers' organizations in such a way as to prevent any acts on the part of the employer or employers' organizations or their agents with the object of:
- (i) furthering the establishment of trade unions under the domination of employers;
  - (ii) interfering with the formation or administration of a trade union or contributing financial or other support to it;
  - (iii) refusing to give practical effect to the principles of trade union recognition and collective bargaining.

2. It should be understood, however, that, a provision in a freely concluded collective agreement making membership of a certain trade union a condition precedent to employment or a condition of continued employment does not fall within the terms of this Resolution.

Annotation

- (a) Article 9 (1) contains two sets of provisions. The first, under (a) purports to give protection against intimidation, coercion or restraint, directed against the individual worker. The second set, under (b), aims at preventing the employer, employers' organizations and agents from interfering with or influencing trade unions.
- (b) It may be appropriate to point out that the text of what is now Article 9 (1) (a) had undergone two amendments during the examination in Committee. While the original text proposed by the International Labour Office had suggested to prohibit “any acts on the part of the employer or his agents” the text as adopted prohibits only “intimidation, coercion or restraint” which are capable of causing fear in the mind of the employee. The other change effected during the proceedings in Committee consists in the fact that in the original draft the prohibition was addressed to the employer and his agents only; the final text guarantees the exercise of the right of freedom of association against intimidation, coercion and restraint “from any source”. An important exception from this rule is, however, embodied in Article 9 (2).

- (c) It may further be mentioned that the Committee on the Freedom of Association rejected by 53 votes to 57, amendments which proposed that the guarantee of the right to join, and the guarantee of the right to refrain from joining, an organization be put on an equal footing.
- (d) The provisions of Article 9 (b) (i) and (ii) are directed against so-called company unions. The ways and means to be adopted are left to municipal legislation.

- (e) As far as paragraph 2 of Article 9 is concerned, its deletion was suggested by the Turkish government member who put forward the argument that no worker should be obliged to belong to any given trade union in order to obtain or continue in employment. The majority of the Workers’ members were opposed to this amendment. They emphasized the necessity of securing to trade unions the right of maintaining and entering into collective agreements which include such a provision. The view was also expressed that it would be unfair to protect the worker who wished to enjoy all the advantages obtained by the trade unions but who refused to join the union. Some countries possessed legislation providing for compulsory trade union membership and the position would be highly prejudiced if the amendment were carried. The Employers’ members, in supporting the amendment, urged that this was not a fit subject for discussion at this juncture, nor was it opportune to prejudge what a future convention might contain. They further stressed that the principle involved was one of freedom and that the liberty of the individual was directly involved. The amendment was rejected by 51 votes to 64.

10. Article 10. Appropriate agencies should be established, if necessary, for the purpose of ensuring the protection of the right of association as defined in paragraph 9 herein.

Annotation

- (a) This Article deals with the problem of implementation. It is not expressly said that the appropriate agencies mentioned should be international agencies or agencies ensuring the protection of the right of association on an international level. The reference to paragraph 9 of the Resolution indicates that the appropriate agencies which were in the mind of the Conference when adopting Article 9 were municipal agencies, judicial or otherwise, whilst the problem of international implementation is dealt with in the special Resolution concerning international machinery for safeguarding freedom of association which will be the subject of the following paragraph of this document.

- (b) The problem of implementation is dealt with in item V of the WFTU proposals. It will be discussed in this paper in connection with the ILO Resolution mentioned under (a).

VIII. The Resolution of the International Labour Conference Concerning International Machinery for Safeguarding Freedom of Association

The Resolution recalls in its paragraph (1) the reference to freedom of association in the Declaration of Philadelphia and the Constitution of the ILO and it reaffirms belief in, and attachment to the principle of freedom of association in all countries as an essential element in those wider personal freedoms which are the foundation of peace, prosperity and happiness.

In its paragraph (2), the Resolution expresses concern “at the widespread reports that conditions may exist prejudicial to freedom of association in many countries”.

In paragraph (3), it is said that the Conference “feels that steps should be taken to encourage, expand and universally establish freedom of association”. The Conference lists as such “steps” the reminding of Governments of all States, whether Members of the International Labour Organization or not, of their obligations in this respect under the Constitution of the ILO and/or the Charter of the United Nations. It also mentions “other practical means”.

In its fourth paragraph, the Resolution deals with the proposals made by the World Federation of Trade Unions and the American Federation of Labor. It notes the proposals of these organizations for the establishment of international machinery for safeguarding freedom of association and “feels that these proposals deserve close and careful examination”.

In paragraph (5) the Resolution lists some of the issues of great complexity and difficulty which are raised by these proposals under the following headings:

1. Questions involving the sovereignty of States. This is an issue which is common to all aspects of the protection of the individual rights against the action of sovereign States within their territorial jurisdiction. It is one of the fundamental questions with which any plan of the international protection of human rights is faced, namely of determining where the line should be drawn between matters which are “essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of the State” (Article 2, paragraph 7 of the Charter of the United Nations) and subjects which are, or become matters of international concern.

2. The resolution further lists as an issue of great complexity and difficulty the relationship of any such machinery as proposed by the World Federation of Trade Unions and the American Federation of Labor to the proposals under examination by the United Nations for giving effect to an International Bill of Human Rights and establishing machinery for supervising the exercise of other fundamental freedoms, including freedom of speech, of information and of lawful assembly.

Here the question is raised whether Trade Union Rights or the right of association of workers, or of employers and workers, shall be the subject of special machinery or whether the general machinery which will eventually be envisaged for the implementation of the International Bill of Human Rights shall be used also as an instrument of implementation of Trade Union Rights or the rights of association of workers and employers.

3. The third issue stressed by the Resolution is that concerning the composition, scope, powers (including powers of enquiry and investigation) and procedure of the proposed machinery.

This again is a problem which in one form or another will arise in any system of implementation of human rights.

It may be appropriate to recall in this connection that Articles 24 to 34 of the Constitution of the International Labour Organization already provide for a nuclear machinery for the handling of complaints concerning the failure to secure the observance of international labour conventions.

4. The fourth issue to which the Resolution draws attention is the question of the authority under which the proposed machinery would act. The word “authority” here may mean either the legal instrument from which the jurisdiction of the proposed organ would be derived, or the international organization or organizations to which this machinery would be subject or of which this machinery would form a part.

Paragraph (6) of the Resolution again stresses the necessity of giving to such questions, which may involve changes in the inter-relationship of States, the detailed examination and careful preparation which they merit and without which any international action would be bound to fail and likely to leave the situation worse than it is at present.

Paragraph (7) of the Resolution contains, however, the expression of some definite views of the International Labour Conference. These opinions of the International Labour Conference amount to the following:

- (a) The Conference says that the establishment of permanent international machinery may be an indispensable condition for the full observance of freedom of association throughout the world.
- (b) The Conference is quite positive about the question that if such machinery should be established, it should be established in consultation with the United Nations. This would seem to indicate that the machinery should not be established by the United Nations.
- (c) It is further said that the machinery should, if established, operate under the guarantees provided by the tripartite Constitution of the International Labour Organization.
- (d) From these propositions, it follows that in the opinion of the International Labour Conference there should be special international machinery for the observance of freedom of association of workers and employers, different from the international machinery eventually to be adopted for the implementation of the International Bill of Human Rights. The relationship of this machinery with the general machinery to be established for implementing the International Bill of Human Rights, is, however, under paragraph 5 (ii) of the Resolution one of the “issues of great complexity and difficulty” which merits, according to paragraph (6) “detailed examination and careful preparation”.

- (e) The reference to the guarantees provided by the tripartite Constitution of the ILO indicates that the special machinery suggested shall not have jurisdiction in all cases of alleged violation of freedom of association, in general, but be restricted to the question of the freedom of association of employers and workers as such. The tripartite organization of the suggested machinery would, it is submitted, be inappropriate for the safeguarding of other human rights than the right of association of employers and workers quo employers and workers.

Section E

IX. Questions for the Consideration of the Commission on Human Rights

In view of the two Resolutions of the Economic and Social Council and of the Resolution of the General Assembly, which have referred the matter to the Commission on Human Rights, the Commission may wish to consider, inter alia, the following questions:

A. Concerning Substance

1. Whether the International Bill of Human Rights should contain special provisions concerning trade union rights, additional to and different from, the general provisions safeguarding freedom of association which will form part of it.

In examining this question, the Commission may wish to take into account the probability that international agreement might be easier of achievement concerning the guarantee of the rights of workers' unions than on the safeguarding of the right of other forms of associations. States may, for instance, be less prepared to undertake obligations on an international level concerning the right of association for political purposes, than in the matter of trade union rights. The Commission on Human Rights may, on the other hand, wish to examine the possible consequences of granting a privileged position to a certain kind of association, it may, e.g., form an opinion on whether this could react unfavourably on the development of, and international protection for, the right of association for other than trade union purposes, and of human rights in general.

2. In case the Commission on Human Rights should arrive at the opinion that special provisions concerning associations of workers, or of workers and of employers should be included in the International Bill of Human Rights, the Commission may wish to examine the proposals of the WFTU and the American Federation of Labor and of the ILO, which were analysed above, with a view to deciding which of these provisions should be embodied in the International Bill of Human Rights and which should be left to special International Conventions dedicated exclusively to the right of association of workers, or of workers and employers.

In considering this question, the Commission may wish to have regard on the one hand, to the necessary generality of a document like the International Bill of Human Rights, and on the other hand, to the desire to give to those rights of workers, or of workers and employers, which the Commission considers of great relevance and of general importance, as wide a field of application as possible.

B. Concerning Machinery

3. The Commission may further wish to express an opinion on the question whether special machinery should be established, on the international plane, for the enforcement of trade union rights (the right of association of workers, or of workers and employers) or whether there should be established one centralized machinery for the implementation of the Bill of Human Rights which would also cover those aspects of Human Rights which are of special importance for the rights of Trade Unions.

In giving attention to this question, the Commission may wish to have regard to the following considerations:

- (a) that there already exists international machinery for dealing with complaints for the violation of International Labour Conventions in the Constitution of the ILO;
- (b) that this existing constitutional machinery might be an appropriate basis for establishing, in connection with it, the envisaged machinery for the protection of trade union rights;
- (c) that, on the other hand, the establishment of two separate and independent machineries, one for the right of association of workers and employers, the other for other cases of the right of association and of all other human rights embodied in the International Bill of Human Rights, might lead to duplication of procedure and to unwarranted diversities of practice;
- (d) that a machinery established under the auspices of a specialized agency on which important members of the United Nations are not represented might be lacking in the authority to safeguard Trade Union Rights in all countries, particularly in those which are not members of the parent Specialized Agency;
- (e) The Commission may also wish to envisage the establishment, by the United Nations, of one centralized international machinery for the implementation of the International Bill of Human Rights, in the framework of which a special body, organized perhaps on the tripartite basis of governments, workers and employers could be entrusted with those of its activities which pertain to Trade Union Rights.

Annex A

Guarantees for the Exercise and Development of Trade Union Rights

The following is the text of the Resolution adopted by the Council at its Plenary Session on 24 March 1947:

The Economic and Social Council

Having taken note of the item regarding Trade Union rights placed on its agenda at the request of the World Federation of Trade Unions, and the memoranda submitted by the World Federation of Trade Unions and the American Federation of Labor,

Resolves to transmit these documents to the International Labour Organization with a request that it may be placed upon its agenda and considered at the forthcoming Session of the International Labour Organization, and that a report be sent to the Economic and Social Council for its consideration at the next meeting of the Council.

The Economic and Social Council

Further resolves to transmit the documents to the Commission on Human Rights in order that it may consider those aspects of the subject which might appropriately form part of the Bill or Declaration on Human Rights.

Annex C

Trade Union Rights (Freedom of Association) Report of the Third Committee

Rapporteur: Mr. Charles Malik (Lebanon)

1. At its fourth session, the Economic and Social Council agreed to place on its agenda the following item proposed by the World Federation of Trade Unions:

“Guarantees for the exercise and development of Trade Union Rights”.*

The Council had also before it a memorandum submitted by the American Federation of Labor.**

The Council adopted, on 24 March 1947, the following resolution:

“The Economic and Social Council,

“Having taken note of the item regarding trade union rights placed on its agenda at the request of the World Federation of Trade Unions, and the memoranda submitted by the World Federation of Trade Unions and the American Federation of Labor,

“Resolves to transmit these documents to the International Labour Organization with a request that it (the item) may be placed upon its agenda and considered at the forthcoming session of the International Labour Organization, and that a report be sent to the Economic and Social Council for its consideration at the next meeting of the Council;

“The Economic and Social Council,

“Further resolves to transmit the documents to the Commission on Human Rights, in order that it may consider those aspects of the subject which might appropriately form part of the bill or declaration on human rights.”

2. At its fifth session, the Council had before it a report from the International Labour Organization entitled “Decisions concerning freedom of association adopted unanimously by the thirtieth session of the International Labour Conference on 11 July 1947”, prepared in accordance with the terms of the above resolution.

[*] See Annex I to document A/374.

The Council, on 8 August 1947, adopted the following resolution:

[See Resolution 84(V).]

3. The report prepared by the International Labour Organization was submitted to the General Assembly in accordance with the direction of the Economic and Social Council (document A/374/Add.1).

4. In the course of its sixty-third to sixty-sixth meetings inclusive, the Third Committee to which this report was referred [30] by the Assembly, considered a draft resolution presented by the delegation of the Dominican Republic (A/C.3/166) and a draft resolution submitted by the delegation of France (A/C.3/167). Amendments were proposed to the Dominican Republic’s draft resolution by the delegation of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (A/C.3/169) and by the delegation of Argentina (A/C.3/170). The Third Committee had also before it an amendment to the French draft resolution proposed by the delegation of India (A/C.3/172) and an amendment to both the Dominican and French draft resolutions proposed by the delegations of Chile and Colombia (A/C.3/171).

5. At its sixty-sixth meeting on 17 October 1947, the Third Committee instructed a Sub-Committee of fifteen members to study the proposals submitted and to achieve, if possible, a unanimous text of a resolution, otherwise to present as few alternative versions of a resolution as possible. This Drafting Sub-Committee, on 28 October 1947 (A/C.3/183), submitted a draft resolution based upon a compromise text proposed by the delegation of France which had been adopted by the Sub-Committee by eleven votes to four. Details of the voting on the draft resolution by the Drafting Sub-Committee are noted on page 3 of document A/C.3/183.

The following is the text of the resolution submitted by the Drafting Sub-Committee:

“(1) The General Assembly,

“(2) Taking note of resolution 52 (IV) adopted by the Economic and Social Council at its fourth session, whereby it was decided to transmit the views of the World Federation of Trade Unions and the American Federation of Labor, on “Guarantees for the Exercise and Development of Trade Union Rights” to the Commission on Human Rights, “in order that it may consider those aspects of the subject which might appropriately form part of the bill or declaration on human rights”,

“(3) Taking note also of resolution 84 (V) adopted by the Council at its fifth session, whereby it was decided to transmit to the General Assembly of the United Nations the report of the International Labour Organization entitled “Decisions concerning freedom of association adopted unanimously by the thirtieth session of the International Labour Conference on 11 July 1947,” to recognize the principles proclaimed by the International Labour Conference, and to request the International Labour Organization to continue its efforts in order that one or several international conventions may be adopted,

“(4) Approves these two resolutions;

“(5) Considers that the inalienable right of trade union freedom of association is, as well as other social safeguards, essential to the improvement of the standard of living of workers and to their economic wellbeing;

“(6) Declares that it endorses the principles proclaimed by the International Labour Conference in respect to trade union rights as well as the principles the importance of which to labour has already been recognized and which are mentioned in the Constitution of the International Labour Organization and in the Declaration of Philadelphia;

“(7) Decides to transmit the report of the International Labour Organization to the Commission on Human Rights with the same objects as those stated in resolution 52 (IV) of the Economic and Social Council; and

“(8) Recommends to the International Labour Organization on its tripartite basis to pursue urgently, in collaboration with the United Nations and in conformity with the resolution of the International Labour Conference concerning international machinery for safeguarding trade union rights and freedom of association, the study of the control of their practical application.”

6. At its seventy-third meeting on 30 October 1947, the Third Committee considered the Drafting Sub-Committee’s report. Amendments to the draft resolution were presented by the delegations of Argentina (A/C.3/184/Rev.1), Czechoslovakia (A/C.3/186) and Yugoslavia (A/C.3/187).

(a) The Yugoslav amendment suggested the deletion of paragraph 4 of the draft resolution. This proposal was rejected by twenty-nine votes to eight, with five abstentions.

(b) The Yugoslav amendment further suggested that paragraph 5 of the draft resolution be replaced by the following text:

“Considering furthermore that improvement of the living conditions of workers depends not only on respect for freedom of association but also on such other social safeguards as will assure to all men a minimum of economic wellbeing.”

This amendment was rejected by twenty-seven votes to six, with ten abstentions.

- (c) The delegation of Czechoslovakia proposed the insertion between paragraphs 5 and 6 of the draft resolution of the following paragraph:

“Recommends to the Economic and Social Council that it adopt, after having received the new study of the International Labour Organization mentioned in resolution 84 (V) of the Council, a resolution on trade union rights on the basis of the draft resolution of the World Federation of Trade Unions, points I-V, Annex I, to its letter of 26 February 1947.”

This amendment was rejected by twenty-three votes to eight, with fourteen abstentions.

- (d) The delegation of Yugoslavia proposed that paragraph 6 of the draft resolution should be replaced by the following text:

“Requests the Secretary-General to take urgent measures in order that the World Federation of Trade Unions, the International Labour Organization and the Commission on Human Rights may study the practice of establishing, as rights inherent in the human person, the principle of freedom, of trade union association, and any other safeguards – such as minimum wages, equal pay for equal work for man and woman, abolition of racial discrimination in economic and social activities, full employment, effective struggle against unemployment especially in a period of crisis and compulsory social insurance – as may provide the basis for a minimum of wellbeing within the reach of all the workers of the world.”

This amendment was rejected by twenty votes to seven, with thirteen abstentions.

- (e) The delegation of Argentina suggested that the proposed paragraph 6 be replaced by the following text:

“Declares that it endorses the principles proclaimed by the International Labour Conference in respect of trade union rights as well as the principles mentioned in the Constitution of the International Labour Organization and in the Declaration of Philadelphia and recognizes the following as being of fundamental importance for the workers:

- (a) Full employment and the raising of standards of living;
- (b) The employment of workers in the occupations in which they can have the satisfaction of giving the fullest measure of their skill and attainments and make their greatest contribution to the common wellbeing;
- (c) The provision, as a means to the attainment of this end and under adequate guarantees for all concerned, of facilities for training and the transfer of labour, including migration for employment and settlement;
- (d) Policies in regard to wages and earnings, hours and other conditions of work calculated to ensure a just share of the fruits of progress to all, and a minimum living wage to all employed and in need of such protection;

- (e) The effective recognition of the right of collective bargaining, the co-operation of management and labour in the continuous improvement of productive efficiency, and the collaboration of workers and employers in the preparation and application of social and economic measures;
- (f) The extension of social security measures to provide a basic income to all in need of such protection and comprehensive medical care;
- (g) Adequate protection for the life and health of workers in all occupations;
- (h) Provision for child welfare and maternity protection;
- (i) The provision of adequate nutrition, housing and facilities for recreation and culture;
- (j) The assurance of equality of educational and vocational opportunities.”

The delegation of India submitted a sub-amendment to the Argentine amendment to the effect that after “Item j” of the Argentine amendment the following should be added:

“(k) Abolition of racial discrimination in any form in the organization and functioning of trade unions.”

The Indian sub-amendment was adopted by twenty-one votes to one, with nineteen abstentions. The Argentine amendment, however, was rejected in a vote by roll-call, by nineteen votes to sixteen, with eight abstentions.

The delegation of Czechoslovakia suggested the deletion of paragraph 8 of the draft resolution and the substitution of the following text:

“Requests the Secretary-General to study, in co-operation with the World Federation of Trade Unions, the International Labour Organization and the Commission on Human Rights the practice of establishing trade union freedom of association and trade union rights.”

This amendment was rejected by twenty-one votes to seven, with eleven abstentions.

7. All the amendments having been rejected, the Third Committee voted upon the resolution paragraph by paragraph.

The resolution, as a whole, was adopted by thirty-one votes to five, with six abstentions.

8. The Third Committee therefore submits for the approval of the General Assembly the following draft resolution:

Trade Union Rights (Freedom of Association)

The General Assembly,

Taking note of resolution 52 (IV) adopted by the Economic and Social Council at its fourth session, whereby it was [34] decided to transmit the views of the World Federation of Trade Unions and the American Federation of Labor on “Guarantees for the Exercise and Development of Trade Union Rights” to the Commission on Human Rights, “in order that it may consider those aspects of the subject which might appropriately form part of the bill or declaration on human rights”,

Taking note also of resolution 84 (V) adopted by the Council at its fifth session, whereby it was decided to transmit to the General Assembly of the United Nations the report of the International Labour Organization entitled “Decisions concerning freedom of association adopted unanimously by the thirtieth session of the International Labour Conference on 11 July 1947”, to recognize the principles proclaimed by the International Labour Conference and to request the International Labour Organization to continue its efforts in order that one or several international conventions may be adopted,

Approves these two resolutions;

Considers that the inalienable right of trade union freedom of association is, as well as other social safeguards, essential to the improvement of the standard of living of workers and to their economic wellbeing,

Declares that it endorses the principles proclaimed by the International Labour Conference in respect of trade union rights as well as the principles the importance of which to labour has already been recognized and which are mentioned in the Constitution of the International Labour Organization and in the Declaration of Philadelphia;

Decides to transmit the report of the International Labour Organization to the Commission on Human Rights with the same objects as those stated in resolution 52 (IV) of the Economic and Social Council; and

Recommends to the International Labour Organization on its tripartite basis to pursue urgently, in collaboration with the United Nations and in conformity with the resolution of the International Labour Conference concerning international machinery for safeguarding trade union rights and freedom of association, the study of the control of their practical application.

Draft Charter of International Human Rights and Duties

Note by the Secretary-General

The Secretary-General has the honour to transmit to the members of the Commission on Human Rights the text of a draft Charter of International Human Rights and Duties submitted by the Delegation of Ecuador. This item was included in the supplementary list of items for the Agenda of the second regular Session of the General Assembly and circulated as document A/341. By a note received on 18 September 1947 and issued as document A/391, the Chairman of the delegation of Ecuador to the General Assembly of the United Nations requested the Secretary-General that the draft Charter of International Human Rights submitted by the Government of Ecuador be referred to the Commission on Human Rights. The Secretary-General notified the General Committee that it had received this communication from the delegation of Ecuador and the General Committee therefore in its report (document A/392) recommended that this item should not be included in the Agenda of the Second Session of the General Assembly.

Draft Charter of International Human Rights and Duties Proposed by the Delegation of Ecuador

Article I

Everyone has the following rights:

1. Right to Life: There shall be no death penalty. Mutilation, flogging, and other tortures and degrading procedures are categorically forbidden, whether as penalties, corrective measures, or means of investigating offences.

Everyone, including incurables, imbeciles, and the insane, has the right to life from the moment of conception.

Persons unable to support themselves by their own efforts have the right to sustenance and support, and the State has the corresponding duty of seeing to it that such support is made available.

2. Right to Personal Liberty: The right to personal liberty includes the right to freedom of movement from one part of the national territory to another, and the right to leave that territory upon presentation of a pass issued by the member States.

It also includes freedom to reside in any part of the territory, subject only to the restrictions that may be imposed by general laws for the maintenance of public order and national security.

The right to personal liberty includes the inviolability of the home and of private correspondence.

The State may restrict this right only to the extent necessary to protect public health, safety, morals and general welfare, in accordance with subsequent provisions of this Declaration.

[3]

The right of the State to call upon the services of the individual in time of emergency or to meet the necessities of national defence shall not be regarded as a limitation of the fundamental right to personal liberty, but merely as a temporary restriction operating during the existence of the national need.

No person shall be arrested or kept in prison in consequence of a mere breach of contractual obligations.

3. Right to Freedom of Speech and of Expression through the press or other means of utterance or diffusion provided that such statements imply no abuse, calumny, personal insult, or immoral sentiments and are not opposed to the national interest, offences which would be liable to the penalties or proceedings prescribed by national law.

Accordingly everyone shall have the right of access to sources of information both domestic and foreign.

4. Right to Freedom of Conscience in all its forms and aspects, in so far as it is compatible with morality and public order.

National laws shall make no discrimination on religious, ideological, or racial grounds.

5. Right to Freedom of Assembly and of Association for Peaceful and Other purposes not Prohibited by Law.
6. Right to Petition the Government either individually or in association with others, for the redress of grievances, or in respect to any other matter of public or private interest.

The publication of such petitions shall not be made a ground for penalizing in any way, directly or indirectly, the person or persons making the petition.

7. The Right of Private Property is guaranteed by the State in so far as this is compatible with the needs of society.

8. Right to Nationality. No State may refuse to grant its nationality to persons born upon its soil.

No person may be deprived of the nationality of his birth, unless by his own free choice he acquires another nationality.

Every person is obliged to renounce the nationality of his birth or adoption upon acquiring a new nationality.

9. Right to Establish a Home and to be free from interference in his family relations. It is, accordingly, the duty of States to regulate and protect marriage, the family and family property. No one shall be compelled to make any statement on a birth certificate as to the nature of filiation and only in pursuance of the provisions laid down in national legislation shall the investigation of paternity be permitted.

Illegitimate children have the same right as legitimate children to be brought up and educated by their parents and to be their heirs. National legislation shall declare family property to be inalienable and exempt from sequestration.

10. The Right to Habeas Corpus: Save in cases of flagrante delicto, offences against police regulations or military law, no one may be detained, arrested, or imprisoned without a warrant signed by the competent authority, stating the motive, which must be one specified by law.
11. Right not to be Outlawed, or refused access to the ordinary courts, or tried by special commissions, or deprived of the right of defence. No person shall be punished without due course of law or under a law enacted subsequent to the offence with which he is charged.
12. Right to freely elect and be elected to public office in conformity with the law.
- [5]
13. Right to belong to Parties and other political associations which are not anti-constitutional, for the purpose of taking part in national politics.
14. Right to work in all its forms as a social duty especially protected by law, which shall provide the worker with the minimum conditions compatible with a dignified existence.
15. Right to enjoy the fruits of his discoveries, inventions, and other scientific, literary and artistic activities under conditions prescribed by law, and to share in the benefits accruing from scientific discoveries and inventions.
16. Right to Social Security: The State has the duty to ensure that all persons enjoy the benefits of social security. To this end the State shall promote measures of public health and safety and establish systems of social insurance and cooperative agencies which will ensure all persons an adequate standard of living and protection against the contingencies of unemployment accident, disability and ill health, and the eventuality of old age.

Every person has a duty to co-operate with the State according to his powers in the maintenance and administration of measures taken to promote his own social security.

17. Right to Education: The right of children to education is paramount. The State has the duty to assist the individual in the exercise of the right to education in accordance with the resources of the State. Opportunities of education must be open to all on equal terms in accordance with their natural capacity and their desire to take advantage of the facilities available. The State has the right to fix general standards to which educational institutions must conform, provided that [6] these standards are in accord with generally accepted fundamental principles and are the same for public and for private schools.

The right to education includes the right to teach, subject to the restrictions laid down by law. The State shall respect the right of parents or those representing them to provide the type of education they prefer for their children.

18. The Right to protection against arbitrary discrimination in the provisions and the application of the law because of race, religion or any other reason.

Article II

The rights and duties agreed upon in this Declaration shall be incorporated in the constitutional law of each Member State and shall not be abrogated.

Article III

Aliens in each State shall enjoy, within the limits laid down in national legislation, the same rights as nationals, with the exception of the political rights and guarantees established solely in favour of such nationals.

E/CN.4/Sub.2/16
24 November 1947

(The Secretariat has received the following statement from the American Federation of Labor)

Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities

I. Introduction

The American Federation of Labor has consistently advocated the extension of individual freedom to all the peoples of the earth. In August of 1946 the American Federation of Labor submitted a proposal for an International Bill of Human Rights (Document E/CT.2/2) which set forth in concise terms, the rights that were to be granted to all persons. Included in this paper was the following: "All human beings

... are free from discrimination on account of race, colour, creed or difference of political belief from the government in control or the party in power.” Since that time the American Federation of Labor has taken an active part in the deliberations of the Commission on Human Rights, its Drafting Committee, and the Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information and of the Press. The work of the Sub-Commission on Discrimination and the Protection of Minorities is no less important. Freedom for one individual or for one group cannot long exist when other individuals or groups are persecuted or discriminated against. The United Nations have ample evidence of this in the results of the actions of the Fascist aggressors in the last decade. Such a situation cannot again be permitted to arise.

The American Federation of Labor therefore believes that in the interests of international peace, security, and good will, the Sub-Commission on Discrimination and the Protection of Minorities should recommend to the Commission on Human Rights the following Principles for the Protection of Minorities:

II. Definition

1) As hereinafter used, a minority consists of any considerable number of persons who differ from the greater proportion of persons of a state or an area in race, sex, language, nationality, religion, tribal association or political belief.

A minority shall be eligible for international protection whether it lives as a geographical entity or is dispersed throughout a country or an area.

III. Principles of Protection

A. General

2) Minorities are entitled to the rights and freedoms as expressed in the International Bill of Rights without distinction as to race, sex, language, nationality, religion, tribal association, political or other beliefs. (Adapted from Article 6 of the Draft Bill)

3) There shall be liberty of movement and free choice of residence within the borders of each state. This freedom may be regulated by any general law adopted in the interests of national welfare and security. (US Article 13 for the International Bill of Rights)

B. Education

4) There shall be equality of opportunity for all, and equal access to such facilities for technical, cultural, and higher education as can be provided by the state or community on the basis of merit and without distinction as to race, sex, language, religion, social standing, political affiliation or financial means. (Article 31 of the Draft Bill)

5) In accordance with the general laws of the State, the Minorities have the right to set up and maintain private schools.

6) The State may determine the curriculum which may include the majority language, but the minorities have the right to teach such additional subjects as they may deem appropriate, subject only to limitations in the interests of public decency, safety, and welfare. Such state direction shall not be interpreted to permit the erasure of a minority culture.

7) The State must provide free and compulsory elementary education, for minorities.

8) The facilities for public education must be the equal of those provided for the majority or for any other group within the State.

9) Minorities may not be denied admission to institutions of secondary or higher education on the grounds of race, religion, nationality, tribal association, or political affiliation or belief.

C. Economic

10) There shall be no special considerations for the engagement, in public or private employment, of workers on the grounds of race, sex, language, nationality, religion or tribal association. Language examinations shall not be required of manual workers for admission to or maintenance of employment.

11) Persons of any race, sex, language, religion, nationality or political belief shall not be denied an equal opportunity for vocational education.

12) Regardless of race, sex, language, religion, nationality or political belief, all workers shall be equally protected and provided for by the state in respect to hours and conditions of work.

13) Workers of whatever race, sex, language, religion, nationality or political belief have the right to equal pay for equal work.

14) Every worker within a state without respect to race, sex, language, religion, or political belief shall be protected in the same manner as regards workers compensation, unemployment, health, old-age, permanent disability, and survivor's insurance.

Workers cannot be denied the right to organize and belong to unions or associations of their own choosing, and to bargain collectively for a constantly more equitable distribution of the national wealth and income, and for the enhancement of their moral and material well-being.<sup>202</sup>

16) Minorities, subject only to generally applicable laws, have the right to establish, maintain or dispose of agencies set up for any legal industrial purpose; obtain, use or dispose of any property, publish and distribute and form of literature, practice their profession, or otherwise earn a livelihood.

17) Minorities shall be granted an equitable share of the public credit for the legally decreed purposes. This shall be determined by factors other than racial, linguistic or national ones.

18) Minorities or Minority Institutions shall not be required to pay any extraordinary taxes.

19) Members of a minority shall not be denied licenses for the sale of monopoly products on the grounds of race, sex, language, nationality, religion or political belief.

D. Political Rights

20) Everyone has the right to a Nationality (Article 18 of the Draft bill). The State may not deprive any persons of nationality or civil rights because of race, sex, language, nationality, religion, or political belief.

Summary Record of First Meeting [of the First Session of the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities]

held at the Palais des Nations, Geneva, on Monday
24 November 1947 at 4 p.m.

1. Opening of the Session

THE TEMPORARY CHAIRMAN, on behalf of the Secretary-General, opened the first session of the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities, and called for the election of officers.

The task that the Sub-Commission had to perform, he felt, was a very important one. It had been asked to participate in one of the most extraordinary and promising experiments in the history of international cooperation. The Commission on Human Rights and the various agencies related to it are engaged in an effort to write a universal Bill of Human Rights which will define the fundamental rights of man everywhere without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion and which will set up international machinery for the protection of these rights. The Commission on Human Rights had already met twice; once as a nuclear body in the early summer of 1946, and again in January 1947, in its first regular session. The second regular session of the Commission will assemble at Geneva on December 1st for the purpose of receiving a report from its Drafting Committee, which met at Lake Success in June. The report to which he had just referred was already a public document and could be consulted by anyone who was interested in the work of the Commission.

It was hoped that, at its December meeting, the Human Rights Commission would complete its preliminary draft of the Bill of Rights. If the Commission followed the suggestion made by the Drafting Committee, it would probably recommend the adoption of not one but two international bills; a Declaration or Manifesto which would eventually be adopted in the form of a Resolution of the General Assembly and which would constitute a catalogue of human rights without express [3] provisions for implementation; and an International Convention on Human Rights. The essential difference between the two would be, of course, that whereas the resolution of the Assembly would have the force of a recommendation only, a convention would be part of international law and legally binding on those States which signed and ratified it.

The draft, or drafts, as finally prepared by the Commission would be referred to the governments for their comments. The comments would be considered and changes made, if necessary, in the draft or drafts by another session of the Drafting Committee in May, and eventually by the third regular session of the Commission on Human Rights in the same month. This session in turn would report to the 7th session of the Economic and Social Council, which would meet in Geneva in July. After discussion by the Council, the whole matter would be referred to the 1948 session of the General Assembly, which it was hoped would adopt a Bill of Rights.

Adoption of the Provisional Agenda

THE CHAIRMAN said the next duty was to adopt the Provisional Agenda.

MISS MONROE (United Kingdom) remarked that the Articles referred to the Sub-Commission by the parent Commission for discussion were very urgent, and she suggested that these Articles should now be inserted under a special item in the Agenda.

PROFESSOR HUMPHREY (Secretariat) pointed out that the revised Agenda (document E/CN.4/Sub.2/1/Rev.1) had been issued that morning, which excluded the old item No. 6 concerning the adoption of the Regulations of Procedure. He further proposed that the Articles referred to by MISS MONROE (United Kingdom) could be discussed either under Items 7 or 8 or could be made a special item.

MISS MONROE (United Kingdom) said that she had proposed a special item for discussion of these Articles as they seemed to be borderline cases, and that it would be quicker if they were made the subject of a separate item.

After some discussion by MR. ROY (Haiti), MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) and MISS MONROE (United Kingdom) as to whether Items 7 and 8 should be amalgamated, MISS MONROE (United Kingdom) and MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) agreed that Items 7 and 8 should be discussed together as they were inextricable.

THE CHAIRMAN again suggested that Item 6 be adopted by the Sub-Commission, and that Items 7 and 8 should be amalgamated.

The Sub-Commission adopted Item 6. The discussion as to the amalgamation of Items 7 and 8 continued.

MR. MASANI (India) proposed that they should not be amalgamated and referred to document E/CN.4/Sub.2/8, which pointed out that the prevention of discrimination and the protection of minorities were not necessarily co-terminous [9] subjects. He also pointed out that discrimination between the sexes did not involve a minority question, and that an intellectual or political minority would not be within the definitions of discrimination according to race, sex, language or religion.

MISS MONROE (United Kingdom) said that she appreciated the point raised by Mr. Masani (India), but again pointed out that some of the Articles were hard to allot in one particular item, and that there would be a large overlap. She proposed that discussion of the specific Articles be under a separate heading.

MR. SPANIEN (France) said that there should first be a discussion of the Terms of Reference, but that the Commission on Human Rights had referred to the Sub-Commission certain questions on which it would require an answer at its meeting on the 1st December, 1947. On the question of amalgamation, the items should be kept separate, as there would not necessarily be an overlap.

PROFESSOR HUMPHREY (Secretariat) said that originally the items had not been amalgamated because the Report of the Drafting Committee was not yet before the Commission on Human Rights. Document E/CN.4/Sub.2/9 had been prepared by the Secretariat to assist the Sub-Commission in making a recommendation on these items. He reminded the Sub-Commission that from a strictly constitutional point of view the Report was not before the Commission [sic].

DR. WU (China) suggested that the present Agenda be adopted, but that the separation of Items 7 and 8 need not be too strict. There should be an understanding that the Commission could trespass in its discussion of the two items.

MR. McNAMARA (Australia) agreed with Dr. Wu.

THE CHAIRMAN stated that the proposal of MISS MONROE (United Kingdom) was to gain time in the discussion of these Articles. He suggested adding after Item 6 a further item on "Discussion of Items Referred to the Sub-Commission".

MR. ROY (Haiti) stated that these Articles had not in fact been referred and suggested some other formula, as he agreed that it was desirable for the Sub-Commission to discuss these articles.

PROFESSOR HUMPHREY (Secretariat) said that the Articles had never been legally referred to the Sub-Commission for discussion, but that he was confident that the Commission would be disappointed if the Sub-Commission did not discuss them. He proposed adding an Item 7 – "Consideration of Articles of International Bill of Rights Relative to the Questions of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities".

MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that the Sub-Commission could only make observations on the Articles specifically referred by the Drafting Committee, i.e. nos. 6, 13, 15, 18 and 36, and that the actual drafting of these Articles must be done by the Drafting Committee itself. As to the other Articles which had not been referred, including nos. 5, 14, 16, 20 and 31, he suggested that the Sub-Commission should not discuss these at all because they had no instructions to do so.

MR. DANIELS (United States of America) agreed with this proposal.

THE CHAIRMAN again said that the intention was to accelerate discussion so as to produce an opinion of the Sub-Commission by the 1st December. He again proposed that after Item 6 there should be included an item on "Examination [11] of Articles 6, 13, 15, 28 and 36" and asked for the opinion of the Sub-Commission on that point.

MR. ROY (Haiti), after some discussion by MR. McNAMARA (Australia), MR. SPANIEN (France) and MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) as to exactly where on the Agenda this new item should come – whether after Item 6 or Item 8, suggested that the subject of the new item be discussed with the present Items 7 and 8 as they were fundamentally the same.

THE CHAIRMAN stated to the Sub-Commission the proposal of Mr. Roy (Haiti), which was supported by Mr. Nisot (Belgium), to adopt the Agenda as it was and under Items 7 and 8 to discuss the Articles which the Drafting Committee had suggested might be referred to the Sub-Commission.

MISS MONROE (United Kingdom) accepted this proposal as long as discussion of Items 7 and 8 was on the basis of the five Articles recommended for referral to the Sub-Commission.

MR. DANIELS (United States of America) suggested that the Sub-Commission should not give its final approval or disapproval on any issue until the end of the discussion of Items 7 and 8.

MR. MCNAMARA (Australia) asked whether points of order could be raised at a later time which might exclude discussion of any Article.

THE CHAIRMAN said that points of order must always be admitted and could not be excluded at the beginning of the meeting. It was difficult to separate the items, and he proposed that the Sub-Commission now vote on the adoption of the Agenda as it stood.

DR. WU (China) supported the suggestion of the Chairman.

MISS MONROE (United Kingdom) agreed, subject to the reservation that the five Articles be discussed under Items 7 and 8.

The Agenda was adopted, subject to the reservation made by MISS MONROE (United Kingdom).

(The Secretariat has Received the Following Memorandum from the Inter-Parliamentary Union)

Memorandum

In the course of its work in the period between the two world wars, the Inter-Parliamentary Union, as the mouthpiece of democratic forces within elected Parliaments, had occasion to adopt a number of resolutions relating to the protection and rights of the individual, in connection with the question of national minorities, colonial problems, and the development of the representative system.

We have the honour to submit to the attention of the members of the Committee on Human Rights some extracts from those resolutions which may be of interest to them. Although adopted before the last war, these texts have lost none of their value, since the problems which the Committee has been asked to study are not connected with any particular period.

The Inter-Parliamentary Union, which has been granted consultative status (Category A) by the Economic and Social Council, will follow the work of the Committee on Human Rights with the most sympathetic attention. If necessary, it will examine the possibility of recommending the convention or conventions which may be drawn up by the Committee to the Parliaments affiliated to the Union.

August 1947.

Léopold Boissier, Secretary General.

Right of Existence and Right to Physical Safety

Declaration of the Rights and Duties of Minorities (Adopted by the XXIXth Inter-Parliamentary Conference, Copenhagen, 1923). (Excerpts.)

Article I. The States agree to grant to all their inhabitants full and complete protection of life and liberty, without distinction of birth, nationality, language, race, or religion.

Every inhabitant of a State shall be entitled to the free exercise, whether public or private, of any creed, religion or belief, whose practices are not inconsistent with public order or public morals.

Article III. The fact of belonging to a majority of race, religion, or language, does not in any way liberate a national of a State from the duties imposed by the Constitution and Laws of that State.

Article IV. On the other hand, the States agree to grant to all their nationals equality before the law and the enjoyment of the same political and civil rights, without distinction of race, language, or religion, in particular with respect to electoral rights and admission to public educational institutions, to government employ, functions, or honours, in the exercise of professions and industries, and in the application of the agrarian laws. The States shall, in their political administration, take into account the state of feeling of nationals belonging to a minority, a state which is created by the very fact of belonging to a minority, and shall seek to establish a system of government which shall give satisfaction to all their nationals.

Individual Liberties

Resolution adopted by the XXIXth Inter-Parliamentary Conference, Madrid, 1933

The XXIXth Inter-Parliamentary Conference, notes with regret that slavery and the slave-traffic still exist at the present time, and asks that every form of slavery, whether direct, indirect or disguised, shall be abolished.

The XXIXth Inter-Parliamentary Conference recalls the resolution adopted by the XXIInd Inter-Parliamentary Conference in 1924 and, considering that the time has come for the immediate prohibition in the colonies of forced labour to the profit of private persons or enterprises, considering, moreover, that forced labour, still exceptionally countenanced in the case of public utility works, should be abolished as early as possible, invites the National Groups of the Union to take action in favour of the immediate ratification of the Convention relating to forced or compulsory labour adopted in 1930 by the International Labour Conference at its XIVth Session.

[3]

The XXIXth Inter-Parliamentary Conference is of opinion that in future no penal clauses should be introduced or renewed in the labour contracts concluded with natives. It asks the Groups to use their influence for that purpose within their respective Parliaments.

Public Liberties. Political Rights

Declaration of the Rights and Duties of Minorities (Adopted by the XXIst Inter-Parliamentary Conference, Copenhagen, 1923). (Excerpts.)

Article V. No restriction shall be decreed against the free use by all nationals of a State of any language whatsoever, either in private or commercial intercourse, in religion, in the press, or any sort of publications, or at public meetings.

Article VI. Nationals of a State who belong to minorities of race, religion or language, shall enjoy the same treatment and the same guarantees in law and in fact as the other nationals of that State. In particular, they shall have the same right to found, manage and control, at their own expense and without being subject to special conditions, charitable, religious, social, and economic institutions, as well as schools and other educational establishments, with the right to use their own language and to exercise their religion freely therein. The possession and the free use of endowments or properties intended for the upkeep of their religious and educational institutions must be secured and, if necessary, restored.

Resolution adopted by the XXIXth Inter-Parliamentary Conference, Madrid, 1933. (Excerpts.)

The XXIXth Inter-Parliamentary Conference recalls the resolution passed by the London Conference in 1930 in which the Union declared that the parliamentary system contributes to the education of the peoples by calling upon every citizen to take part in public life through universal suffrage and the exercise of the essential democratic liberties (freedom of political, social and religious opinion, freedom of assemblies, freedom of association, freedom of the press, freedom and secrecy of voting). . .

Juridical Status

Resolution adopted by the XXVIIth Inter-Parliamentary Conference, Bucharest, 1931

The XXVIIth Inter-Parliamentary Conference recommends that the legal status of persons without nationality, and more particularly of children without nationality, should be regularized as soon as possible by an international convention.

Nationality and Protection of Foreigners

Resolution adopted by the XXVth Inter-Parliamentary Conference, Berlin, 1928, on Migration Problems

The XXVth Inter-Parliamentary Conference, [4] considering the world-wide importance of migration problems, considering that it is the right of each State, in conformity with the principle of national sovereignty, to regulate immigration into its own territory, but considering nevertheless that the measures enacted might, by their reaction on the standard of life and prosperity of other countries, disturb good relations between the nations and, consequently, international peace,

Expresses the wish that States shall endeavour to conclude amongst themselves bi-lateral treaties making it possible to conciliate their points of view and to safeguard the economic and social interests of emigrants.

Such treaties should in particular bear on the following points:

- 1) The organization of national and international information services.
- 2) Rules relating to the conditions under which emigrants may leave the country and be admitted into foreign territory.
- 3) The protection of the emigrant, with special reference to the simplification of the passport system, to health and to moral conditions, particularly in the case of women, children and young people; measures to combat the white slave traffic and prostitution.
- 4) Sanitary conditions: housing, preventive measures against contagious diseases, addiction to drugs, etc.
- 5) The application to immigrants of the social legislation in force in the country receiving them, and particularly of insurance measures.
- 6) Practical measures relating to the application of laws on nationality.
- 7) Military obligations.

Cultural Rights

Resolution adopted by the XXth Inter-Parliamentary Conference, Vienna, 1922

The XXth Inter-Parliamentary Conference expresses the wish that in the interest of science and intellectual co-operation all scientific congresses shall be open to scientists and men of letters of all countries without distinction of nationality.

Resolution adopted by the XXIXth Inter-Parliamentary Conference, Madrid, 1933

Contact between the coloured races and western civilisation sometimes results in so rapid and radical a transformation of the customs and habits of those races that it constitutes a threat to [5] their very existence. This being so, it is the duty of the colonial power to watch over the gradual evolution of those races in order to render them capable of adapting themselves little by little to the conditions of modern life.

The Conference regrets the errors committed in the effort for the intellectual and moral education of native races and believes that such education, while taking fully into account the customs and traditions of the civilisation under which it is given, should aim at leading these races gradually to a point at which they will be fit for final emancipation.

Statement Regarding the Possible Ways in Which the Recommendations of the Human Rights Commission Might be Presented to the General Assembly, Submitted by the Representative of the United Kingdom on the Commission on Human Rights

1. There appear to be three possible forms in which the Human Rights Commission can present its first recommendations to the General Assembly.

- (a) They can take the form of a Human Rights declaration to be adopted by an Assembly resolution, and nothing more.
- (b) They can take the form of a convention or International Bill of Rights to be recommended for adoption by members of the United Nations, and no declaration.
- (c) They can take the form of a declaration plus a convention or International Bill of Rights, both introduced by an Assembly resolution which explains the relationship between the two.

2. For the reasons given below either (b) or (c) would be a proper course for the Commission to adopt whereas course (a) might easily do more harm than good and is highly undesirable.

3. Any declaration which ex hypothesi is not a convention will be framed in terms of short principles and will consist of a statement of ideals and aims which the United Nations will endeavour to promote and secure. It can thus provide a valuable basis for the progressive extension and refinement of human rights, through education, teaching and its moral influence on mankind. But its phraseology will of necessity be general and lacking in detail, and it is therefore probable that no country will be able to observe many of its provisions literally and absolutely.

4. It is therefore clear that such a declaration, by itself, cannot create international obligations on the members of the United Nations. Consequently, if there is a declaration and nothing else, there can be no procedure for enforcement nor can there be any provisions with regard to petitions or anything else of a like nature. The Government of the United Kingdom, and most other governments will be quite unwilling to contemplate any attempt to enforce a declaration which is only in broad general terms, and which creates no actual legal obligations of any kind. [2] They would not agree to any procedure for the consideration of petitions based on an instrument which constitutes ideals and aims, and does not purport to constitute any obligation. It is only possible to consider methods of enforcement, including appeals to the General Assembly, and the procedure for dealing with petitions etc. in relation to an instrument which creates obligations precisely defined and which can, in case of dispute, be interpreted by the International Court of Justice. Course (a) cannot, however, be considered to be an adequate fulfilment of the aims expressed in the Charter. While it is to be hoped that such a declaration of aims and ideals may ultimately, by its persuasive force, have a considerable influence in ameliorating the lot of mankind there is a real danger that if it stands by itself, it may lead men to believe that more progress had been achieved than would in fact be the case.

5. Course (b) was the one which was proposed by the United Kingdom delegate at the meeting of the Drafting Group. The drafts then submitted by the United Kingdom contain a Bill of Rights in the form of a convention and also the elements of a declaration, since there is inserted into the draft Assembly resolution a number of principles which should be accepted as aims but which cannot yet take the form of precise legal obligations. The Government of the United Kingdom still consider that this is a possible and proper course.

6. Course (c) is one which might well form a compromise between those who most favour a declaration and those who most desire a convention. Under this course, everything that can immediately be made the subject of precise obligations would be set forth in the Bill of Rights and be made subject to a suitable enforcement procedure. The declaration would then contain (1) certain broad principles which were formulated in terms of precise obligations in the Convention and (2) a statement of further ideals and aims which were not susceptible of immediate formulation as legal obligations.

7. It is impossible to exaggerate the importance of adequately safeguarding human rights and fundamental freedoms. The maintenance of these rights and freedoms, as we know from our own history, forms an essential curb on the ambitions of those who are in power in the individual states. They provide the means through which the individuals in each state, enjoying the rights of full information and of free speech and criticism, can check the reckless courses in which those in power are sometimes prone to plunge their populations. Therefore the establishment of human rights and fundamental freedoms as part of international law, with obligations on each state to observe and maintain them, is an essential safeguard against the danger of war resulting from the ambitions and desires for power by individual states.

8. In this connection attention should be paid to a small paper presented by the eminent Belgian, Professor Charles de Visscher, to the Institute of International Law for discussion this year at Lausanne entitled "The Fundamental Rights of Man as the basis for the restoration of International Law".<sup>206</sup> He rightly points out that:

"respect for human personality . . . becomes . . . the great restraining influence on the Executive; . . . it brings about that just balance which prevents the Executive [3] from degenerating at home into an instrument of tyranny, and abroad into an engine of aggression and conquest. . . The key of the problem therefore lies above all in the relations between man and the State, in an adjustment of the behaviour of the individual towards the body politic, and in the intellectual and institutional counter-weights which in truly democratic countries preserve the Executive from those deviations which arise from the pursuit of power for its own sake. . .

"This indissoluble connexion between human liberties and the creation of an international order founded upon law have been thrown into tragic relief during the last 25 years. The totalitarian ideologies, built on a perverted morality, made every effort to sanctify the enslavement of human personality to the Nations State's ideal, of power. In absolute contradiction to that 'rule of law', which in countries of liberal tradition safeguards individual rights against the whim of the Executive, national-socialist law was marked by the removal from the constitutional statutes of all mention of these fundamental rights of man which are beyond the reach of political decisions by governments."

Professor de Visscher is one of the Judges of the International Court of the Hague, and the whole of the paper from which these quotations are taken deserves careful study by the Commission.

9. Further, another point made by Professor de Visscher is in full accord with the United Kingdom draft, namely, that human rights and fundamental freedoms are really based on the law of nature which was the foundation of the law of nations, which was again the foundation of international law. This idea is expressed today in Article 38 of the Statute of the International Court by “the general principles of law recognized by civilised nations.” To a large extent, therefore, the provisions of the United Kingdom draft of an International Bill of Rights or convention are part of international law already. Moreover, most of its provisions are declaratory of what may be described as the general principles of the law of members of the United Nations in the field of the rights of man. A survey of the constitutions of most countries shows that, in the matter of the recognition of the fundamental rights of the individual, there is already a wide uniformity. This applies in particular to provisions safeguarding personal liberty, freedom of religion, of speech, of opinion, and of association, and of equality before the law. The United Kingdom draft is of course based on British practice, and will therefore have to be amended to take account of the practice in other countries, but many of the principles embodied in it are already part of international law. But by reason of lack of precise definition, and of any procedure for dealing with cases where they are violated, they form a part of international law today in a most imperfect manner. In the opinion of His Majesty’s Government these facts were recognized by the Charter itself, and the time has now come to ensure these rights and freedoms by defining them precisely in a convention which will have binding force on all nations which ratify it. To fail to do so would cause bitter disillusionment to the hopes which millions of our fellow-men have placed in the Human Rights Commission, and would thus be a step backwards rather than progress.

10. If the Commission decides to adopt course (c) it is desirable that the nature and purpose of each document should be clearly stated. This will be of value not only in the actual task of drafting the two documents, but also in making clear the relationship between them when they have been approved by the General Assembly. A draft statement on these lines is accordingly annexed hereto. It is suggested that in the event of course (c) being adopted, this draft statement should be discussed and adopted, with any necessary amendments, by the Commission. Thereafter it might be submitted for adoption, in a suitably modified form, by the General Assembly when the Draft Convention and the Draft Declaration are submitted to it.

Draft Statement for Consideration by the Commission on Human Rights

1. The task of promoting human rights and fundamental freedoms has two aspects, first, the consolidation of the progress which has already been achieved, so that the barbarities of Nazi Germany may be outlawed for all time; and, secondly, the progressive extension and refinement of human rights and freedoms for all men everywhere.

2. It is not possible for a single document to serve both these purposes. The Human Rights Commission has therefore prepared two documents, one a Declaration of Human Rights, and the other an International Bill of Human Rights.

3. The Declaration is designed to promote the progressive extension and refinement of human rights and freedoms. It must therefore, of necessity, be expressed in terms of general principles which answer to the aspirations of all men everywhere. These principles represent the goal towards which mankind is striving, and it may be hoped that their definition by the United Nations will hasten the day when they will be generally accepted and universally applied. But at the present time, and probably for many years to come, most of them must in practice be subject to many exceptions whose enumeration in the Declaration itself would destroy its whole purpose. The Declaration therefore creates no legal obligations, and none of its provisions can be enforced. It must rely for its efficacy, on teaching and education and on the progressive realization of man's social and economic wellbeing.

4. Certain of these general principles however can and should at once be expressed in terms of binding legal obligations if the progress already achieved is to be consolidated. These are the rights which are immediately capable of precise definition and which are already included in the constitutions of most of the members of the United Nations. The example of Nazi Germany shows what results can flow, internationally as well as internally, from the refusal by a Government to recognize elementary human rights and fundamental freedoms. The International Bill of Human Rights is therefore designed to consolidate and codify the general principles of law of the members of the United Nations in the matter of the rights of man by creating legally binding and internationally enforceable obligations on those United Nations which adhere to it. For this reason, its scope is less far-reaching than that of the Declaration of Human Rights, but other parts of the Declaration may from time to time be embodied in the form of Conventions.

5. Thus, while the Declaration cannot, by its very nature, create any legal obligations, the International Bill of Human Rights will, from the moment of its coming into force, form a part of international law.

Opinion of Mr. Borisov (USSR) on Article 6

Mr. Borisov wishes Article 6 to contain the following provisions:

All people are equal before the law and shall enjoy equal rights in the economic, cultural, social and political life, irrespective of the race, sex, language, religion, property status, national or social origin.

Any advocacy of national, racial and religious hostility or of national exclusiveness or hatred and contempt, as well as any action establishing a privilege or a discrimination based on distinctions of race, nationality or religion, constitute a crime and shall be punishable under the law of the State.

Proposal for a Declaration of Human Rights Submitted by the Representative of the United States on the Commission on Human Rights

Whereas, by the Charter of the United Nations all Members affirm their faith in the dignity and worth of the human person and pledge themselves to cooperate in promoting respect for and observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms for all.

Now, therefore the General Assembly of the United Nations resolves to set forth in a solemn Declaration these essential rights and fundamental freedoms of man, and calls upon the peoples of the world to promote the rights and freedoms hereby proclaimed.

Article 1

Everyone is entitled to life, liberty, and equal protection under law.

Article 2

Everyone has the right to freedom of information, speech, and expression; to freedom of religion, conscience, and belief; to freedom of assembly and of association; and to freedom to petition his Government and the United Nations.

Article 3

No one shall be subjected to unreasonable interference with his privacy, family, home, correspondence or reputation. No one shall be arbitrarily deprived of his property.

[2]

Article 4

There shall be liberty to move freely from place to place within the State, to emigrate, and to seek asylum from persecution.

Article 5

No one shall be held in slavery or involuntary servitude. No one shall be subjected to torture, or to cruel or inhuman punishment or indignity.

Article 6

No one shall be subjected to arbitrary arrest or detention. Anyone who is arrested has the right to be promptly informed of the charges against him, and to trial within a reasonable time or to be released.

Article 7

Everyone, in the determination of his rights and obligations, is entitled to a fair hearing before an independent and impartial tribunal and to the aid of counsel. No one shall be convicted or punished for crime except after public trial pursuant to law in effect at the time of the commission of the act charged. Everyone, regardless of office or status, is subject to the rule of law.

Article 8

Everyone has the right to a nationality. Everyone has a right to take an effective part in his Government directly or through his representatives; and to participate in elections, which shall be periodic, free and by secret ballot.

Article 9

Everyone has the right to a decent living; to work and advance his wellbeing; to health, education and social [3] security. There shall be equal opportunity for all to participate in the economic and cultural life of the community.

Article 10

Everyone, everywhere in the world, is entitled to the human rights and fundamental freedoms set forth in this Declaration without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion. The full exercise of these rights requires recognition of the rights of others and protection by law of the freedom, general welfare and security of all.

Proposed Amendments to the Draft Articles on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms Contained in Annex G of the Report of the Drafting Committee (Doc. E/CN.4/21)

Submitted by the Representative of the United Kingdom on the Commission on Human Rights.

1. Amend Article 2 to read: "It shall be illegal for any person to be subjected to:-
  - (a) Torture in any form;
  - (b) Any form of physical mutilation or medical or scientific treatment or experimentation against his will.
2. Add a new Article 4 (a) to read as follows:-

"(1) no person shall be convicted of, or punished for, crime save by judgment of a competent tribunal and in conformity with the law.

(2) any person accused of having committed a crime shall be entitled:-

  - (a) to a full hearing of his defence to the charge and of any plea which he may make in mitigation;
  - (b) to hear the testimony of all witnesses;
  - (c) to compulsory process for securing
    - (i) the attendance of witnesses whom he wishes to call and
    - (ii) the production of relevant documents.
  - (d) to consult with and to be represented by counsel."
  3. Amend Article 7 to read "No person shall be prevented from having access to the Courts or entering into lawful contracts save in the case of:
    - (a) Minors;
    - (b) Persons of unsound mind;
    - (c) Persons undergoing imprisonment or subject to disabilities resulting from a conviction."

III. Items 6, 7 and 8 of the Agenda

THE CHAIRMAN said the first Article for consideration was Article 6 (document E/CN.4/21, page 74).

MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) reminded the Sub-Commission that it had been decided that discussion of the Articles would be confined to preliminary remarks from the Members, and that the Sub-Commission would not be concerned with drafting. No objection had been raised to this procedure, and he understood that Mr. Spanien had also agreed to it.

THE CHAIRMAN considered that their expressions of opinion must be presented in some way to the Drafting Committee and would to that extent need to be drafted or at least written out in some form.

MR. DANIELS (United States of America) suggested that Members might indicate points of agreement or disagreement with an Article and leave the drafting of the Report to the Rapporteur.

THE CHAIRMAN supported this suggestion.

MR. NISOT (Belgium) agreed to this on the understanding that only points on which a vote had been taken would be incorporated in the Report and that individual viewpoints expressed in the meetings need not be included.

THE CHAIRMAN, on the other hand, felt that reservations made on any particular point would have to be included in the Report.

MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) contended that Mr. Nisot's point ran counter to a previous decision. The Sub-Commission had not been entrusted with the task of drafting, either by the Drafting Committee or by the Commission on Human Rights; and it therefore had no legal power to do so. He contended that each Member should be free to express opinions on the Articles, and the Report to the Drafting Committee should reflect these opinions. It remained for the Drafting Committee to prepare the draft Articles.

MR. MASANI (India) considered that an expression of the opinion of the Sub-Commission as a whole was required. He agreed with Mr. Nisot that only matters voted upon should be embodied in the Report, but, as already stated by the Chairman, any minority point of view would also be recorded.

MR. NISOT (Belgium) stated that the usual procedure, in cases where a reservation had been expressed, was for the Member concerned to draft a text to be included in the Report.

MR. SPANIEN (France) pointed out that in his opinion there were two aspects to their task: first, to submit a report to the Human Rights Commission; secondly, to submit to the Drafting Sub-Commission of the Commission on Human Rights the results of their study and discussion of specific Articles. He considered it best that the Report should embody the conclusions of the majority of the Members; should reservations be made, the Member concerned should draft a text for inclusion in the Report.

MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) pointed out that, because of legal considerations, the Secretariat had not originally included examination of specific Articles in the Agenda. He felt that opinions expressed might be sent both to the Drafting Sub-Commission and to the Commission on Human Rights. He maintained that the Commission had not asked the Sub-Commission [11] to do any drafting and he therefore felt that all remarks made by Members of the Sub-Commission with regard to these Articles should be embodied in the Report.

MR. NISOT (Belgium) felt that there was some misunderstanding. He had not expressed the opinion that the Sub-Commission was a drafting committee. He had said that the Report should embody the opinions of the majority, and in addition any reservations that might be made. The opinions expressed in the course of the meetings would, of course, be embodied in the summary records of the meetings. In due course, the Rapporteur's Report would be presented to the Members for approval or amendment. He felt this point was clear, and that they could now begin to study Article 6.

MR. DANIELS (United States of America) supported the views expressed by Mr. Nisot.

MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that, had it not been for the legal aspect of the question, he could have shared the point of view of Mr. Nisot. However, the terms of reference did not charge the Sub-Commission with the task of voting upon and approving the Articles in question. All that was required was, in his opinion, an expression of the opinions of the Members, not of the Sub-Commission as such. By adopting the procedure proposed by Mr. Nisot, they would be exceeding their terms of reference. The study of these Articles was not their essential task. He therefore proposed that the opinions of each Member with regard to the Articles should be recorded.

THE CHAIRMAN asked Mr. Borisov whether he would agree to the Report being drafted in such a way as to indicate points of agreement or dissent, without stating that a vote had been taken.

MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said he would prefer that this section of the Report should be [illegible] [12] as he had proposed and added in the form of an Annex.

MISS MONROE (United Kingdom) could not agree to the proposal of Mr. Borisov. The opinion of the Sub-Commission had been asked for, both by the Commission on Human Rights and by the Drafting Committee. She cited paragraphs 13 and 14 of document E/CN.4/Sub.2/5 to support this contention. It was part of their task to make recommendations, she felt whether these were arrived at after a vote or otherwise was immaterial. However little they might wish to become a Drafting Committee, it was necessary that they find words in which to express their opinions.

MR. SHAFIQ (Iran) said that he was in favour of voting on specific points and recording the consensus of opinion in the Report. He felt that sufficient time had been wasted in discussing procedure.

MR. DANIELS (USA) moved that the Rapporteur should record the action of the Sub-Commission on each of the provisions. Where reservations were made he should, if requested, incorporate a statement drafted by the Member concerned. DR. WU (China) seconded the motion. THE CHAIRMAN put the motion to the vote and it was carried by ten votes, with one abstention.

MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said he wished to record a reservation on the point. In his opinion, the Members had adopted a procedure contrary to the decisions of the Commission on Human Rights.

Continuation of Discussion on Article 6

1. Proposal by Mr. Masani (India)

MR. MASANI (India) wished to make two proposals regarding Article 6. In the first place he did not think it was clear from the text that the idea of colour was included in that of race. The American Federation of Labor had thought fit, in document Sub.2/16,<sup>207</sup> to refer explicitly to colour as well as race in connection with discrimination. He proposed therefore that the Sub-Commission while approving this article should make it more explicit by adding the word “colour” after the word “race”. Secondly, the lack of any mention of discrimination based on political opinions seemed to him an omission to be rectified. In his previous statements he had emphasized the importance of political minorities. He therefore proposed that the words “or political opinion” should be added at the end of the article. Article 6 would then read:

“Every one is entitled to the rights and freedoms set forth in this Declaration, without distinction as to race, colour, sex, language, religion, or political opinion.”

THE CHAIRMAN proposed if the Sub-Commission agreed, to discuss each member’s proposal in turn, starting at once with Mr. Masani’s first proposal.

2. Discussion of the amendment proposed by Mr. Masani (India) concerning the addition of the word “colour” after the word “race”

MR. DANIELS (United States of America) pointed out the similarity of the wording proposed by Mr. Masani with that adopted in the American Constitution after the War of Secession. It would however in his opinion be preferable to keep to the terminology of the Charter of the United Nations, which referred to “fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language, or religion” (Article 1, paragraph 3). The words “for all” clearly showed that the words that followed were not to be taken in any other sense.

MR. McNAMARA (Australia) urged that if there was the slightest doubt it was better to add the word “colour” than risk leaving out certain groups.

<sup>207</sup> E/CN.4/Sub.2/16.

MISS MONROE (United Kingdom) supported this.

MR. NISOT (Belgium) considered the addition superfluous but saw no objection to it.

MR. ROY (Haiti) remarked that if the word “race” was not taken in the general sense as including the idea of colour the whole Charter would have to be revised.

MR. SHAFaq (Iran) said that the word “race” ought to be understood in a general rather than in a scientific sense, and that being so he did not see that the addition proposed by Mr. Masani served any purpose.

DR. WU (China) pointed out that in current usage race meant colour. Mr. Masani’s proposed addition therefore seemed to him unnecessary.

MR. SPANIEN (France) said that the Sub-Commission could not embark on ethnological research. There was no scientific definition of the word “race”. He therefore thought it desirable for the word “colour” to be added.

MR. MASANI (India) stressed the fact that race and colour were two conceptions that did not necessarily cover one another.

MR. ROY (Haiti), while understanding Mr. Masani’s intention, wished to point out to him a certain danger. If the word “colour” were added to an article on non-discrimination, would that not imply that the Charter in dealing with race had failed to envisage discrimination based on colour? He wished it to be possible to refer to the Charter and “race” to be understood as implying colour.

MR. SHAFaq (Iran) pointed out that since there was no precise scientific definition of “race” the word had to be used in [4] a general sense, which included the idea of colour. Moreover the word “colour” in current parlance applied to clearly defined groups and not to all coloured peoples.

MISS MONROE (United Kingdom) pointed out that Mr. Masani’s proposal strayed from the purpose of Article 6, i.e. discrimination. In point of fact discrimination only occurred when colour meant race.

MR. MASANI (India) remarked that this was not the case as far as emigration to the United States was concerned. A distinction was made between Caucasian immigrants of the fair type and those of a darker one. The same thing occurred in South Africa.

DR. WU (China) announced his readiness to withdraw his first statement, in view of the ambiguity of the word “race”. It seemed to him preferable for the Sub-Commission to define the term more precisely by adding the word “colour”; and the authors of the Charter could not blame it for that.

MR. DANIELS was in favour of keeping to the Charter terminology. It was impossible to add the word “colour” without completing the list and adding political opinions etc.

MR. ROY (Haiti) stressed the fact that at none of the conferences of ILO, WHO and UNESCO, at the Pan-American Conference or in the Charter of the United Nations had any words other than race, sex, language, or religion ever been used. To add the term “colour” now would be to assume that colour was not implied in any of the international documents that mention race. The effect of the addition would be to prevent reference to any international documents being made in future in connection with discrimination based on colour.

THE CHAIRMAN proposed that since opinions in the Sub-Commission were divided regarding the insertion of this term, a note reading as follows should imply be added to Article 6:

“It being understood that the term ‘race’ includes the idea of colour.”

The Sub-Commission

Decided

To accept the Chairman’s proposal.

3. Discussion of the amendment proposed by Mr. Masani (India) concerning the addition of the words “or political opinion” after the word “religion”

MISS MONROE (United Kingdom) drew the Sub-Commission’s attention to paragraph 13 of document Sub.2/5, in which it was stated that this point had been discussed by the Commission on Human Rights and referred to the Sub-Commission for study. For her part she would be willing to support the amendment proposed by Mr. Masani in view of the importance of matters of political opinion in the case of minorities.

DR. WU (China) felt that it would not be correct to make this addition, since political opinion was one of the fundamental freedoms and rights, not a qualification of those entitled to them.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that Article 6 was a preamble to all the articles in the Declaration. However, since Articles 21 and 22 of the Declaration referred to freedom of political opinion, he questioned the necessity for this addition.

MR. MCNAMARA (Australia) urged that freedoms not expressly guaranteed were always in danger of being denied. He regarded Mr. Masani’s amendment as essential. In some countries discrimination was based on political opinion. It was important that freedom of political opinion should not be denied.

MR. SPANIEN (France) also supported Mr. Masani’s proposal but would prefer the word “political” to be omitted. He referred to the text submitted to the Drafting Committee by the Representative of France (CN.4/21, Annex D, Art. 6), and to the opinion of [6] the Representative of the USSR expressed in paragraph 13 of document Sub.2/5.

MR. MASANI (India) emphasized that his intention in adding the words “political opinion” had been to extend to political opinions the protection granted by the article to religious beliefs. The minorities that would need protection in the future would be more in the nature of political minorities than the traditional religious minorities, which were tending to disappear.

MISS MONROE (United Kingdom) was in favour of including the word “political opinion” in order to avoid any confusion with the articles dealing with the freedom of the press and of information.

MR. DANIELS (United States of America) asked whether the same procedure might not be adopted here as had been proposed by the Chairman for the addition of the word “colour”.

MR. SPANIEN (France) believed that while the idea of colour could be included in that of race, the idea of political opinion could not be covered by any of the terms race, sex, language or religion. In this connection there was a gap in the Charter which ought to be filled. He therefore proposed that Mr. Masani’s proposal be adopted, with the amendment he had already suggested – viz. by omitting the word “political”. This amendment would give a wider meaning to the proposed addition.

MR. ROY (Haiti) felt that the only serious objection to Mr. Masani’s proposal lay in the mention of freedom of political opinion in Article 21 of the Declaration. He pointed out, however, that Article 20 provided for religious freedom, which was also mentioned in Article 6. The fact that political opinion was mentioned in Article 21 was therefore no obstacle to the addition of the words “political opinion” in Article 6.

MR. BORISOV (USSR) found this Article decidedly inadequate. In the first place it was not sufficient to state that men were [7] equal. It was necessary to give this Declaration a concrete and juridical character by affirming that they were equal before the law and had the same rights in economic, political, cultural and social life, irrespective of their race, sex, religion, financial or social status. Secondly it was necessary to state that any advocacy of hatred, racial conflicts and any action establishing privileges of any kind, was a crime punishable by law. Therefore he proposed firstly that the various fields in which the rights to equality applied should be mentioned and secondly, that it should be affirmed that any propaganda against such equality would be punishable by law.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that Mr. Borisov’s proposal applied to Article 5 rather than to Article 6.

MR. NISOT (Belgium) stated that it was only possible to protect what was expressed by acts. For this reason he would confine himself to Articles 21 and 22 which dealt with freedom of expression and opinion.

MR. MCNAMARA (Australia) proposed the following amendment to reconcile the views of the representative of India and the representative of France: “or political or other opinion”. While emphasizing the importance of political opinion, this text could apply to any other opinion.

DR. WU (China) stated that if by political opinion Mr. Masani meant membership of a party, that was in his view a permanent element which could be inserted among the qualifications of Article 6. In the Constitution of the Chinese Republic, it was stated that all men without distinction as to race, class and party would be equal before the law. He was therefore in favour of this addition.

MR. DANIELS (United States) said that the Sub-Commission was faced with the following alternatives: either it had to accept [8] the terminology of the Charter, it being understood that the terms employed were not restrictive or else, if other rights were mentioned, it had to add political opinion. But in his view, it was then necessary to use the same form of drafting both for colour and political opinion.

MR. MASAMI (India) pointed out that the term "colour" had not been mentioned for the practical reason, to which Mr. Roy had referred, but that it was not possible to deal with political opinion in the same way. With regard to the amendment proposed by the Australian member, he declared his readiness to accept it if the Sub-Commission so recommended unanimously and if the Delegate of France saw no objection. Otherwise he preferred to maintain his original position.

MR. SHAFaq (Iran) thought it would be preferable to mention political opinion in Article 21 in order to keep to the terminology of the Charter.

MISS MONROE (United Kingdom) pointed out that the Sub-Commission had not met to clarify the terminology of the Charter and to make it more effective in its own particular field. Furthermore she supported Mr. Masani's original proposal.

MR. BORISOV (USSR) asked for an explanation concerning Mr. Masani's and Mr. McNamara's proposals. If the Sub-Commission accepted these proposals unreservedly, would the terms "political or other opinion" also cover the political opinions of the Nazis or Fascists concerning, for instance, the superiority of the white race over the black?

MR. SPANIEN (France) asked whether, in order to meet Mr. Daniels' point without weakening the principles of the Charter, though its wording need not be slavishly followed, it would not be advisable to re-instate the Preamble of the Declaration rejected by the Drafting Committee. This Preamble, by reaffirming the [9] inviolable principles of the Charter, would shorten the discussion of the subsequent Articles of the Declaration. Article 21 could thus be left as it stood. This proposal would also alleviate the necessity, pointed out by Mr. Borisov, for defining and enumerating certain rights. He declared his readiness however, to accept the Australian amendment and accepted the formula "political or other opinion".

MR. McNAMARA (Australia) wished for his part to emphasize the gravity of the question raised by Mr. Borisov, and proposed therefore that, if the term "political" were retained, there should be added a reservation similar to that included in Article 13: "This freedom may be regulated by any general law adopted in the interest of national welfare and security."

MISS MONROE (United Kingdom) supported Mr. Borisov's observation and proposed the following reservation: "provided always that it is not an opinion involving the overthrow of the State by violence, or involving the denial of rights and freedoms to others.”

MR. MASANI (India) thought there was no need to include a reservation in Article 6 and that some confusion had arisen in this connection. Article 6 was only a preamble defining the categories of persons enjoying the rights and freedoms enumerated in Article 7 and thereafter. The rights and limitations should not therefore be inserted in Article 6, but would have their place in subsequent Articles.

MR. DANIELS (United States of America) agreed with Mr. Masani. It was not, he thought, the Sub-Commission's task to seek limitations to the application of rights and freedoms. He agreed with Mr. Borisov, that the expression “or political opinion” involved a certain danger. But experience had shown that any restriction imposed in this sphere was a blow to human freedom.

MR. SHAFaq (Iran) pointed out that:

1. the right to free expression of opinion should be protected, except where it was used to restrict the rights of other groups or to injure those groups;
2. freedom must be restricted as soon as it infringed the freedom of others, otherwise it would cease to exist.

MR. BORISOV (USSR) thought that Miss Monroe and Mr. Daniels had not understood his previous question. This question was very clear and required a clear answer; he had asked whether the rights and freedoms set forth in Article 6 should be extended to opinions such as those held by Nazis or Fascists, and to theories such as that of the superiority of the white race over other races. He felt that an implicitly affirmative answer to this question, would amount to a defence of these opinions.

MISS MONROE (United Kingdom) replied that her amendment could not be interpreted as a defence of political opinions and rights such as those proclaimed by the “Herrenvolk”. Her reply was unequivocally “No” and was implicit in her amendment, which read “provided always that it is not an opinion involving the overthrow of the State by violence, or involving the denial of rights and freedoms to others”.

MR. SHAFaq (Iran) pointed out that the Nazi and Fascist movements were not purely racial in character, since they brought one section of the white race into conflict with another, that is, the Aryan and the Semitic. He added that the Nazi movement had been finally condemned, and it seemed futile to reopen the question.

MR. DANIELS (United States) agreed with Mr. Shafaq and, while condemning Nazism, found it necessary to include in the Article guarantees of this kind that already existed in other documents.

MR. MCNAMARA (Australia) thought that no clear answer had yet been given to Mr. Borisov's question. He wished to make his meaning clear.

He would allow freedom of opinion even to Nazis, provided their opinions did not lead them to acts of violence or the overthrow of governments. In his opinion freedom should be accorded to all beliefs, but he thought it expedient for the Article to include a guarantee to prevent acts of violence, even if that guarantee were a repetition.

MR. SPANIEN (France) wished to point out that any protection of freedom of opinion in itself implied condemnation of any philosophy based on physical extermination of opponents.

DR. WU (China) thought it was inconsistent not to condemn wrong and foolish opinions calculated to disturb order and peace. He considered Miss Monroe's proposed amendment incomplete. Would the Sub-Commission hold that steps should not be taken against, say, a religion of an obscene character?

MISS MONROE (United Kingdom) replied that Dr. Wu would find the answer to his question in Paragraph 2 of the alternative text proposed by the United Kingdom to Article 20.

MR. MASANI (India) remarked that an amendment and a sub-amendment to Article 6 had been proposed. Mr. McNamara's sub-amendment consisted of the addition of the words "or others". He accepted it subject to the other members agreeing. His own amendment was to the words "or political opinion" after the word "religion".

He thought that Miss Monroe's amendment should be inserted in Article 21 rather than in Article 6.

Mr. Roy (Haiti), on a point of order, asked that if no other members were down to speak on these amendments the vote should be taken.

MR. NISOT (Belgium) stated that he would vote against any [12] amendment to Article 6. Since that article tallied completely with the Charter its wording should be respected.

MR. SHAFaq (Iran) thought that if the words "political opinions" were to be inserted they should appear in Article 21, not Article 6.

THE CHAIRMAN replied that the Sub-Commission had spent the whole afternoon discussing the amendments proposed to Article 6. He reminded the meeting that Mr. Roy had moved the closure.

DR. WU (China) supported this motion.

MR. BORISOV (USSR) asked for an explanation. Did the motion of closure mean that on the discussion being closed the vote would be taken on Article 6? He gave notice that he wished to submit other amendments himself and desired that they should be discussed the following day.

THE CHAIRMAN replied that the motion of closure applied solely to Mr. Masani's and Mr. McNamara's amendments to Article 6 and the Mr. Borisov's proposals could be discussed the following day.

He put to the vote Mr. McNamara's sub-amendment: that the words "or other" be added to the end of the Article.

The Sub-Commission

Decided

To adopt the sub-amendment proposed by Mr. McNamara.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote Mr. Masani's amendment: that the words "or political opinion" be added after the word "religion".

The Sub-Commission

Decided

To adopt the amendment proposed by Mr. Masani.

MISS MONROE (United Kingdom) stated that, if her Soviet colleague agreed, she would consent to the insertion of her amendment in Article 21.

[13]

THE CHAIRMAN asked if in that case he might regard Miss Monroe's amendment as withdrawn, subject to its re-introduction in connection with Article 21.

MISS MONROE (United Kingdom) replied in the affirmative.

MR. MCNAMARA (Australia) asked, before the meeting adjourned and in spite of the fact that it had adopted Mr. Masani's amendment, sub-amended by himself, that his desire to see the following clause inserted should be put on record: "provided that political opinions should be subject to the right of the State to regulate the active repression of such opinion by any general law adopted in the interest of national welfare and security".

MR. BORISOV (USSR) asked what was the final result of the vote on Mr. McNamara's and Mr. Masani's amendments.

THE CHAIRMAN replied that the Sub-Commission had adopted those amendments.

Explanatory Note on Derivation of Declaration on Human Rights Proposed by Representative of the United States on the Commission on Human Rights

Article 1. This is derived from HRDC Article<sup>x</sup> 5, first sentence, "all are equal before the law and entitled to equal protection before the law", HRDC Article 7, first clause, “everyone has the right to life to liberty and to personal security”, and from HRDC Article 15, first clause, “everyone has the right to a status in law”.

Article 2. This combines HRDC Articles 20, on freedom of religion; 21, on freedom of opinion and information; 22, on freedom of expression; 23, on freedom of assembly and association; and 24, on right of petition.

Article 3. This is derived from HRDC Article 12 on privacy of home, correspondence, and respect for reputation, and from HRDC Article 17 on the right to own property.

Article 4. This is derived from HRDC Article 13, on liberty of movement, free choice of residence, and right of emigration, and Article 14 on right of asylum.

Article 5. This is derived from HRDC Article 11, which prohibits slavery, and the latter half of HRDC Article 10, in regard to torture.

Article 6. This Article is derived from HRDC Article 8, on freedom from arbitrary arrest.

Article 7. This is derived from HRDC Article 9, on the right to a fair trial; HRDC Article 10, on freedom from ex-post-facto laws; and the second half of HRDC Article 5, on the universal rule of law. It includes HRDC 19, the right of an alien to fair hearing before expulsion, as it assures everyone a fair hearing to determine all rights and obligations. It also covers the latter half of HRDC Article 15, on the right to independent and impartial tribunals and the assistance of counsel.

[x] References to HRDC Articles relate to the Human Rights Drafting Committee (HRDC) Declaration; Annex F, Report of Human Rights Drafting Committee, E/CN.4/21.

Article 8. This begins with HRDC Article 18, on right to nationality. It goes on with HRDC Articles 26 and 27, on the right to effective participation in Government. HRDC Article 13, on the right to renounce nationality is not specifically mentioned; the freedom to emigrate in Article 4 of the U.S. proposed declaration, taken with this Article, would imply such freedom, and a Convention on nationality might carry this detail further. The United States proposed declaration also omits specific reference to HRDC Article 25, on the right to resist oppression. Effective participation in Government, together with freedom of speech, are regarded as appropriate safeguard against oppression.

Article 9. This is an inclusive statement on social rights, and includes items in the HRDC Articles 29, 30, 31, 33, 34, 35 and 36. HRDC Article 32, on the right to a fair share of rest and leisure, is not specifically included, but is suggested by the addition of the phrase “advance his wellbeing”, and in the adjective “decent” describing “living”. Both of these phrases accentuate the right to good conditions of work and life. HRDC Article 28, on the right of citizens to public employment and public office, and HRDC Article 16, on the right to engage in all vocations and professions, are not specifically included, but are implied in the right of everyone to work.

Article 10. This Article is derived from HRDC Article 1, that men are brothers, free, possess equal dignity and rights; HRDC Article 2, on the recognition of the rights of others; and HRDC Article 6, on freedom from discrimination.

Items of the Agenda

6. Examination of Terms of Reference
7. Prevention of Discrimination
8. Protection of Minorities

THE CHAIRMAN referred to the suggestions (E/CN.4/Sub.2/21) submitted by Mr. Borisov (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics), whom he asked for any further comments.

MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that he would prefer first to hear the remarks of his colleagues.

MR. SHAFQAQ (Iran) asked Mr. Borisov (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) whether his suggestion was meant to be included in an Article or in the Preamble. If it was meant to be included in an Article, he felt that most of the points had already been expressed in other Articles, for example Articles 13, 16 and 34.

MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that if this was the only question he had no objection to his text being included in the Preamble.

MISS MONROE (United Kingdom) said that she agreed with Mr. Shafaq (Iran) that most points were already covered, for example, the first phrase was already included in Article 5. Paragraph 2 was not quite suitable either for a Preamble or for a Declaration, in her opinion.

MR. NISOT (Belgium) said he felt that the substance of Mr. Borisov's suggestion did not belong to Article 6 but to other Articles, and that it therefore should be studied later.

MR. MASANI (India) pointed out that the first phrase of Mr. Borisov's suggestion already appeared in Article 5 of the Drafting Committee's suggestions. He felt that it should not be considered in connection with Article 6.

He agreed with the substance of the second paragraph but felt that it could not be considered in connection with Article 6.

MR. McNAMARA (Australia) agreed with Mr. Masani (India) that paragraph 2 was substantially different from paragraph 1. As to paragraph 1, he suggested that the proposal of Mr. Daniels (United States of America) should be made a motion, i.e. that three new categories be added to Article 6.

MR. DANIELS (United States of America) said that he would make no motion on this.

MR. McNAMARA (Australia) said he would make a formal motion himself.

MR. SPANIEN (France) said that the two paragraphs were quite different. Paragraph 1 dealt with principles; paragraph 2 with the method of their application. As to paragraph 1, he was ready to agree to the expansion of Article 6 as suggested, subject to re-wording. As to paragraph 2, he did not agree with the opinion of Miss Monroe (United Kingdom) as implementation was a duty of the Sub-Commission. Such a clause, however, should not be included either in the Preamble or the Articles of the proposed Declaration but among the safeguards in the Convention.

THE CHAIRMAN said that in his opinion the suggestion of Mr. Borisov (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) certainly had elements referring to Article 6. He therefore suggested that it be considered at once.

MR. WU (China) supported the Motion by Mr. McNamara (Australia), and suggested that paragraph 1 be altered to read as follows:

“Everyone is entitled to the rights and freedoms set forth in this Declaration, without distinction of any kind as to race, sex, language, religion, property status, national or social origin, political or other opinion.”

He was in sympathy with paragraph 2 and suggested that it be discussed subject to the reservation made by MISS MONROE (United Kingdom).

MISS MONROE (United Kingdom) supported the Motion by Mr. McNamara (Australia), which had been seconded by Dr. Wu (China). As to paragraph 2, she said that Mr. Spanien (France) may have misunderstood her. She had said that in her opinion this text should not appear in either the Preamble or Articles of the proposed Declaration but in the proposed Convention.

MR. SHAFaq (Iran) supported the joint motion stated by Dr. Wu (China) and Mr. McNamara (Australia).

MR. DANIELS (United States of America) also supported their Motion.

THE CHAIRMAN suggested that the order of the wording might be changed to read “. . . political or other opinion, property status, national or social origin”.

MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) asked if it was considered that the second part of paragraph 1 should go into Article 6. As to the first part he thought that the phrase “. . . equal rights in the economic, cultural, social and political life” should all be included in the body of the proposed Declaration as well as in the Preamble.

MR. DANIELS (United States of America) said that in his opinion Article 6 was not the place to establish specific rights, but merely to lay down the entitlement of all persons to general rights.

DR. WU (China) asked the Chairman to put the motion of Mr. McNamara (Australia) to the vote, and said that Mr. Borisov (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) had made a good point but it was covered by Article 2.

THE CHAIRMAN said he would put the additions proposed earlier to the vote and then return to proposals made by Mr. Borisov (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics).

MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) agreed that the other Articles dealt broadly with the issues but said that there should be a complete and substantial list of human rights in Article 6, as suggested by the Drafting committee.

MR. ROY (Haiti) made the new proposal of adding the word “any” before “opinion”.

MR. DANIELS (United States of America) suggested adding the word “all” before “rights and freedoms”.

MISS MONROE (United Kingdom) thought that Mr. Roy (Haiti) meant “without distinction of any kind”. She agreed with the amendment of Mr. Daniels (United States of America).

THE CHAIRMAN said that he appreciated that Mr. Borisov (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) wished the suggestions of the Sub-Commission to be as complete as possible. However, he pointed out that the first words of Mr. Borisov’s text already appeared in Article 5, and that it would be extraordinary if both Articles started in the same way. He suggested that the members vote on the motion made by Mr. McNamara (Australia) as seconded by Dr. Wu (China) and amended by Mr. Roy (Haiti).

MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) did not agree with the Chairman. Rights had not meaning, he said, unless they were linked with law. He agreed that the first [6] part of his text already appeared in Article 5, but said that in his opinion his revised text was more progressive and went further in describing the fields of full Rights. He added that what the common man needed was equal rights, and that this should be covered by a full formula.

MR. NISOT (Belgium) said that the proposal by Mr. McNamara (Australia) was independent of the first part of the suggestion of Mr. Borisov, which clearly belonged to Article 5 and not Article 6.

THE CHAIRMAN suggested that members vote on the whole of the amendment of Mr. Borisov (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics).

MR. ROY (Haiti) asked for a division of the amendment and for a vote to be taken on the first and second halves. Part I, he felt, belonged to Article 5, and part II was covered by the motion of Mr. McNamara.

MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) proposed that paragraph 1 be divided into three parts:

1. "All people are equal before the law."
2. "Shall enjoy equal rights in the economic, cultural, social and political life."
3. "Irrespective of their race, sex, language, religion, property status, national or social origin."

There was no objection to such a division.,

THE CHAIRMAN said that he did not agree with Mr. Nisot (Belgium) that the motion of Mr. McNamara (Australia) was independent as he considered it an amendment of Mr. Borisov's motion. He called for a vote on the motion.

MR. SPANIEN (France) raised a question of translation of the French text. He suggested omitting the words "national or social" if Mr. Borisov (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) agreed. This would leave "origin" to cover everything.

MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that in his opinion "origin" did not necessarily include "national origin". The USSR for example had various nationalities of the same origin. As to part II, with the inclusion of "all" as suggested by Mr. Daniels (United States of America) there appeared substantial agreement by the members. As to part III, he felt that the vote should not be delayed. He felt that the majority of members agreed that it concerned Article 6. He again suggested voting on his text in three parts.

MR. NISOT (Belgium) asked the exact meaning of "national origin".

MR. McNAMARA (Australia) replied that in his view it was synonymous with nationality, but that it might also have a wider meaning.

MISS MONROE (United Kingdom) said that she considered the words not synonymous. She felt that the word "origin" must remain.

MR. DANIELS (United States of America) asked if members would not have an opportunity to vote for the joint proposal of MR. MCNAMARA (Australia) and DR. WU (China).

THE CHAIRMAN said that the joint amendment related to part 3 of Mr. Borisov's proposal and that the Sub-Commission would deal with parts 1 and 2 first, and then vote on the Australian proposal as amended by Mr. Daniels (United States of America).

MR. MCNAMARA (Australia) said that he and Dr. Wu (China) accepted the addition of the word "all".

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the proposal that the words "All people are equal before the law" be inserted in Article 6, [8] with the understanding that the rejection of this proposal would in no way preclude the insertion of those words in any other Article.

The proposal was rejected by 10 votes to 1.

MR. MCNAMARA (Australia) said that although he had voted against the proposal, he would like it to be noted that if those words should be omitted from Article 5, they should be considered for inclusion in some other Article. Such a procedure, he felt, would allay Mr. Borisov's fear that the words might be omitted altogether.

THE CHAIRMAN noted Mr. McNamara's remark. He called for a vote on the second part of the first paragraph of Mr. Borisov's proposal, as amended by Mr. McNamara, Dr. Wu and Mr. Daniels:

"Everyone is entitled to all the rights and freedoms set forth in this Declaration."

The proposal was adopted by 10 votes with one abstention.

MR. NISOT (Belgium) said that he had abstained from voting because he objected to any alteration which did not faithfully conform with the terms of the Charter. He requested that the reason for his abstention be recorded.

THE CHAIRMAN read the amendment, drafted jointly by Mr. Spanien and Miss Monroe, to the third part of Mr. Borisov's proposal, proposing that the second part of Article 6 read:

"without distinction of any kind, whether of race, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, property status, origin or class."

MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) objected to the new text. He thought that the Sub-Commission should vote on his original suggestion and that the opinion of Mr. Spanien and Miss Monroe as to the interpretation of that text should be noted in the report. He did not consider that the words “or [9] class” could be used to replace the words “national or social origin”.

MISS MONROE (United Kingdom) explained that in the draft she had proposed with Mr. Spanien the words “or class” had been proposed as a clearer version of, “or social origin”. The word “national” had been omitted because “national origin” was liable to be confused with “nationality”.

MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) agreed that the words “or class” could be used to express “social origin”, but he objected to the omission of the word “national”. It was important, in his opinion, in the interests of countries where people of different national origins lived together under the same government, that the words “national origin” should be specifically mentioned.

MR. DANIELS (United States of America) objected to the use of the word “class” because it had some undesirable meanings which in his view made it unsuitable for inclusion in a Declaration of Rights.

Mr. McNamara agreed with Mr. Borisov that the original wording should be retained. He considered that the omission of the word “national” made the phrase meaningless. He felt that the idea of nationality, which had been the cause of a great deal of discrimination in the past, should be included.

MR. NISOT (Belgium) pointed out that there might be a political connotation in the words “property status”, since in some countries income was one of the factors considered in determining the right to vote.

DR. WU (China) agreed with Mr. Daniels that the word “class” was undesirable, and supported the original wording. In some countries there existed national groups which needed to be protected against discrimination. If the words “national origin” [10] referred to such national groups, he thought that they should be retained.

MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) agreed with Dr. Wu’s definition of the words “national origin”. He had no wish for aliens to be given the right to vote in a foreign country, but he thought that the rights of national groups, living as citizens in a country, should be protected.

THE CHAIRMAN called for a vote on the proposal that the words “property status, origin or class” should be added to the text which had been adopted on the previous day. He explained that since, in his opinion, this was the text with the widest meaning, it would have to be voted on first.

The proposal was rejected by 7 votes to 3 with 1 abstention.

THE CHAIRMAN called for a vote on the proposal that the words “property status, national or social origin” should be added to the text which had been adopted on the previous day.

DR. WU (China) suggested that the proposal under consideration should be amended to read “property or social status or national groups”.

MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) agreed with that text and suggested that the phrase might further be extended to read “national groups or minorities”. He did not consider that the words “social origin” were synonymous with “social status”.

MR. DANIELS (United States of America) suggested that the Sub-Commission should adjourn so that delegates could have time to consider all the proposals.

Discussion of Article 6 (Continued)

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that a document containing suggestions for amendments to Article 6, set out under six headings, had been distributed by the Secretariat. He stated that Point 1: “Everyone is entitled to all the rights and freedoms set forth in this Declaration, without distinction of any kind, such as race, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion”, had been adopted by the Sub-Commission. He asked Mr. Borisov, who had drawn up Point 2: “Property status, national or social origin” and Point 6: “Property and social status, national groups and minorities”, whether Point 6 was to replace Point 2 which he had previously proposed.

MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) considered that in Point 6 his idea had been distorted. He withdrew Point 6 and would maintain Point 2: "Property status, national or social origin".

MR. McNAMARA (Australia) and DR. WU (China), in reply to the Chairman, agreed to cancel Point 3 which they had proposed: "Property status, national or social origin" (to be inserted after "political or other opinion").

MISS MONROE (United Kingdom) and MR. SPANIEN (France) withdrew Point 4: "Property status, origin or class".

MR. ROY (Haiti) declared himself in agreement with the wording suggested by Mr. Borisov and was willing to withdraw his proposal (Point 5): "Property and social status, national groups", subject to the consent of Mr. McNamara and Dr. Wu. [3]

THE CHAIRMAN put to the Sub-Commission Mr. Borisov's proposal: "Property status, national or social origin" and the amendment submitted by Mr. McNamara and Dr. Wu: "property status, national and social origin" (to be inserted after "political or other opinion").

MR. SHAFAQ (Iran) considered the term "national groups" inadequate because the meaning of that term was limited by the concept of the State. The term "ethnic" seemed to him preferable but he would accept "national or social origin" provided Mr. Borisov explained exactly what he meant by the term.

MR. MASANI (India) shared Mr. Shafaq's misgiving. He felt that the word "national" was improperly used here because it stood for a concept of a different kind from that implied in the terms "race, sex, etc." He preferred Mr. Borisov's text, as amended by Mr. McNamara and Dr. Wu.

MR. McNAMARA (Australia) said that if the word "groups" were adopted, it would have to be used in the singular.

DR. WU (China) objected to the term "national origin" which might lead to confusion. For example: a Chinaman living in Haiti who was a naturalized Haitian would not be liable to any discriminatory measures on the part of the Government. This would not be the case if that Chinaman took up residence in Haiti without becoming naturalized. The term "national" should be reserved, he felt, for the ethnic group forming a nation.

MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) stated that if the members of the Sub-Commission so desired, he was prepared to revise his first proposal. In any case, he asked for a vote on his proposal<sup>208</sup> as a whole and not only on the last few words.

<sup>208</sup> The words "if the members of the Sub-Commission so desired, he was prepared to revise his first proposal. In any case, he asked for a vote on his proposal" are deleted by E/CN.4/Sub.2/SR.6/Corr.1 of 22 December 1947.

THE CHAIRMAN replied that the vote would be taken on the text as a whole, since amendments to the text formed the subject of the present discussion.

MR. ROY (Haiti) felt that the expression "national origin" might be just as dangerous as the term "national groups". He observed that the Constitutions of most of the States Members of the United Nations discriminated between native-born and naturalized citizens. All Haitians for example, were equal before the law, except for privileges granted to Haitians by birth. Naturalized Haitians could not fill certain posts (such as that of President of the Republic), until a certain number of years after naturalization (Document E/CN.4/Sub.2/4).

THE CHAIRMAN sated that in his opinion the same objection held good with regard to the term "national groups".

MR. MCNAMARA (Australia) drew the attention of the members of the Sub-Commission to the grave consequences which might ensue from the use of a general formula in Article 6. This article might conflict with other articles of the draft, such as Article 26, for instance. The Drafting Committee should not overlook this difficulty.

THE CHAIRMAN explained that Article 6 defined principles the application of which was provided for in subsequent articles. He could see no objection to putting the amendments to the vote.

PROFESSOR HUMPHREY (Secretariat) explained that Article 28 defined the application of a principle laid down in Article 6. Article 28 read as follows: "Everyone shall have equal opportunity to engage in public employment and to hold public office in the State of which he is a citizen. Access to examinations for public employment shall not be a matter of privilege or favour." The difficulty pointed out by Mr. Roy could therefore be considered when that article was discussed.

MR. NISOT (Belgium) was dubious about this. He felt that Article 6 might affect subsequent articles because of the word "all" on the first line of the Article.

MR. ROY (Haiti) observed that many Constitutions discriminated between native-born and naturalized citizens, not only in regard to the holding of public office, but in other spheres also, such as (in Haiti) that of commerce. If Article 6 did not discriminate as to national origin, it would be in flagrant contradiction with other articles which recognized certain limitations. One might say: "...all rights and freedoms, subject to the provisions of the following Articles. . ."

THE CHAIRMAN replied that examples should not be taken from the various Constitutions now in existence; the Sub-Commission should endeavour to secure the maximum protection and freedom for all. It would be the duty of the various States to see that these principles were applied.

MR. ROY (Haiti) accepted this viewpoint. Personally, he was anxious to abolish all inequalities, but he had wished to draw attention to a possible contradiction between a general formula and the provisions embodied in the Constitutions of several Members of the United Nations. He was not opposed to the insertion of this absolute formula in the Bill of Human Rights, or even in the Convention. But in that case it should be clearly stated that absolute equality was the goal the Commission had in view.

MR. SHAFaq (Iran) proposed a new amendment to Mr. Borisov's text in which only the terms "property status" and "social origin" would be retained, on the understanding that this latter term would cover ethnic and national differences.

He reserved the right to revert to his proposal for the inclusion of the term "national groups" when Article 28 came up for discussion.

MR. SPANIEN (France) considered that the Sub-Commission should not be slavishly bound by texts. Its task was, not to draw up the texts of the articles submitted to it, but rather to study the principles underlying those articles. It should further be entitled to make special reservations, which would be taken into account when the text was drawn up.

He proposed that the Sub-Commission should revert to Mr. Borisov's first proposal, since the latter's explanation had cleared up the point.

MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) wished to clarify the meaning he attached to the word "national". He did not agree with Mr. Shafaq, for he considered that within the same nationality there could be different origins.<sup>209</sup> Article 6 defined equal rights for all. This meant that any citizen of the Soviet Union, were he Jew, Negro, Georgian, Caucasian, etc. could become a member or the President of the Supreme Council.<sup>210</sup> The social ranks to be found within every country should not stand in the way of equality of rights. He asked whether in the United States a Negro, a Jew or a naturalized Mexican could become President. If there were any discrimination in that field, there could be no equality of rights.

MR. MASANI (India) supported Mr. Shafaq's amendment. The example quoted by Mr. Borisov did not seem to him relevant, for the different categories to which he had referred were ethnic or racial groups, whose rights were guaranteed by the term "race". He suggested that the discussion of the term "or national origin" in Article 6 be resumed.

MR. DANIELS (United States of America) thought the Sub-Commission was overlooking an important part of the phrase in Article 6, namely the word "all". He recalled that Article I, Paragraph 3 of the Charter mentioned "respect for human rights and for fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language, or religion". The list of rights and freedoms must therefore not be expanded. In reply to Mr. Borisov he explained that in the United States there was nothing to prevent a citizen from becoming President, on the sole condition that he was born on United States territory.

<sup>210</sup> Pursuant to E/CN.4/Sub.2/Sr.6/Corr.1, "Read as follows: Article 6 should define equal rights for all. In particular, any citizen of the Soviet Union were he Russian, Georgian, Ukrainian etc. could become a member of the President of the Supreme Council."

THE CHAIRMAN proposed that a vote should be taken on the third part of the first paragraph of Mr. Borisov's proposal: "property status, national or social origin", Now, Mr. McNamara and Dr. Wu had proposed that text again, in the form of an amendment to Article 6. Those words were to be added after "or other opinion". As this amendment was the most far-reaching, it was the one on which the vote should be taken first.

MR. ROY (Haiti) on a point of order, recalled Mr. Shafaq's sub-amendment to the effect that the word "national" be defeated. That sub-amendment should have priority.

THE CHAIRMAN replied by referring to Rule 54 of the Commission's Rules of Procedure which stated that:

"If two or more proposals are moved relating to the same question, or if one or more amendments are moved to a proposal, the Commission shall first vote on the most far-reaching proposal or amendment, and then on the next most far-reaching proposal or amendment, and so on, until . . . all the proposals and amendments have been put to the vote. . ."

[8]

MR. ROY (Haiti) said those Rules of Procedure would be applied as far as possible. Otherwise, the Rules of Procedure of the General Assembly must be applied. Now, the latter in Article 76, provided that: "when an amendment revises, adds to or deletes from a proposal, the amendment shall be voted on first, and if it is adopted, the amended proposal shall then be voted on".

This, moreover, was in conformity with the usual parliamentary procedure.

MR. MASANI (India) asked how, if the more far-reaching amendment were adopted, a decision could be taken with regard to Mr. Shafaq's sub-amendment.

MR. ROY (Haiti) added that the Rule mentioned by the Chairman applied to cases where there were two amendments relating to the same question. In the case in point there was only one amendment, that of Mr. Shafaq, to Mr. Borisov's proposal.

MR. NISOT (Belgium) asked for the straightforward application of the Commission's Rules of Procedure.

THE CHAIRMAN wished to consult Members as to whether the Commission's Rules of Procedure should be applied.

MR. ROY (Haiti) said that if a vote were taken on the question, he would of course vote for application of the Rules of Procedure. The question, however, was badly put, as it was here simply a case of interpretation of the Rules.

MISS MONROE (United Kingdom) preferred a vote to be taken first on Mr. Shafaq's amendment.

MR. MASANI (India) repeated his question: if the amendment of Mr. McNamara and Dr. Wu were adopted, could Mr. Shafaq's amendment be voted on or not?
[9]

MR. MCNAMARA (Australia) thought that a vote could first be taken on the most far-reaching amendment. If it were adopted, the Sub-Commission might then decide that that was sufficient; or they could go on, and vote on each amendment in turn.

THE CHAIRMAN asked whether members regarded Mr. Borisov's text as an amendment or a proposal.

MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) repeated that his proposal constituted a new text, far-reaching and complete as to substance. It was intended to replace Article 6 and could therefore not be regarded as an amendment. Members could decide whether certain terms should be added to Article 6 or to other Articles.<sup>211</sup>

THE CHAIRMAN said that all proposals for changes discussed both that day and on the previous day had been regarded as amendments. It would be strange if the Sub-Commission were not to regard Mr. Borisov's additional text as anything else than an amendment.

MR. SHAFaq (Iran) took the view that Mr. Borisov's text was a proposal and not an amendment.

MISS MONROE (United Kingdom) understood that Mr. Borisov was asking for a vote on the third part of the first paragraph of his proposal, with no change. She pointed out that the Sub-Commission had, however, already adopted an amendment to Article 6 to the effect that the words "political or other opinion" be added to the original text, and those words did not appear in Mr. Borisov's text.

MR. NISOT (Belgium) said that the Chairman was right because, while Mr. Borisov might originally have made a separate proposal, this had in point of fact become an amendment. He formally requested the Chairman to apply his previous ruling.

THE CHAIRMAN said that members were to vote on the third part of Mr. Borisov's original amendment, which consisted of adding to Article 6 the words "property status, national or social origin".

MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) explained that he had proposed a complete text to replace Article 6. The third part of the first paragraph was part of the whole. The first and second parts had been rejected, and he requested that the Sub-Commission should now vote on the whole of the third part and not only on two or three words of it.

MR. NISOT (Belgium) feared that would be incompatible with what the Sub-Commission had decided that morning. In his opinion, the only thing to do was to vote on the last part of the proposal. If Mr. Borisov thought that the Sub-Commission should not vote on the last part, there was no need to take any vote whatsoever.

MR. ROY (Haiti) thought there was some confusion between changing and amending the text. The Sub-Commission was studying Article 6, and if it decided to change that Article this would not, in that particular case, constitute an amendment, but a proposed change. To that proposal, however, there were amendments. Mr. Shafaq should thus be regarded as having moved an amendment to Mr. Borisov's proposal.

MISS MONROE (United Kingdom) understood that Mr. Borisov wished for a vote on the third part of his proposal, beginning with the words "irrespective of" down to the words "national or social origin". She asked Mr. Borisov, in order to avoid any misunderstanding, to be good enough to read out the exact text on which he wished a vote to be taken. She drew the Sub-Commission's attention to the fact that the first and second parts had already been rejected, and that the third part did not contain the words "political or other opinion", which [11] had already been adopted.

MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) again wished to facilitate the Sub-Commission's task. He said that the text he proposed constituted a new proposal, and not an amendment to Article 6. He had never said that he would accept an amended<sup>212</sup> version of Article 6,<sup>213</sup> and that was why he had proposed a new text of which certain parts had not been adopted, while it seemed that agreement might be possible with regard to others. He reminded members that he had asked for a vote on the three parts which formed a whole.<sup>214</sup> It seemed that the Sub-Commission agreed on the third part except for certain words. He saw no objection to the Sub-Commission taking a majority vote on the whole of that third part.<sup>215</sup>

THE CHAIRMAN requested Mr. Borisov to read out the text on which he wished a vote to be taken.

MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) began by pointing out that the Sub-Commission had not yet voted on the second part of his text, although it had voted on a text which had been modified following a proposal by Mr. Daniels. Amendments had been submitted in regard to the third part, which read "irrespective

<sup>215</sup> Pursuant to E/CN.4/Sub.2/SR.6/Corr.1, delete the final sentence of the speech by Mr. Borisov.

of their race, sex, language, religion, property status, national or social origin". Some members believed that the terms "race, sex, language, religion" should not be mentioned since they were already incorporated in Article 6; the phrase "property status, national or social origin", then remained.<sup>216</sup>

MISS MONROE (United Kingdom) pressed Mr. Borisov to read out the whole of Article 6, in the form in which he wished it to be drafted.

MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) stated that the first part of his proposal, reading "all people are equal before the law" had been rejected because this provision was embodied in Article 5. The second part of this proposal had not been accepted because it had been replaced by the word "all", added by the Sub-Commission<sup>217</sup> in the first line of Article 6. In regard to the third part, reading "irrespective of their race, sex, language, religion, property status, national or social origin", an amendment had been proposed whereby the words "irrespective of their race, sex, language, religion" would be deleted in order to avoid repetition. It appeared, then, that the Sub-Commission wished to retain only the terms "property status, national or social origin" of his proposed text, but he was not sure that no other amendment had been proposed, in respect even of the last mentioned terms.<sup>218</sup>

MR. McNAMARA (Australia) remarked that Mr. Borisov's explanations had clarified the debate and asked whether Mr. Borisov accepted the amendment the purpose of which was to avoid a repetition of the terms "race, sex, language, religion". He was of the opinion that the best procedure would be to vote, as proposed by the Chairman, on the most far-reaching amendment.

THE CHAIRMAN wished to know whether Mr. Borisov was asking for a vote on the phrase "irrespective of their race, sex, language, religion" in view of the fact that these terms were already included in the text adopted by the Sub-Commission.

MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) replied in the affirmative, since his text was a proposed new draft of Article 6 and was not an amendment to it.<sup>219</sup> The third part of his proposal followed logically from the first two. He was therefore asking for a vote on the whole text.

MR. ROY (Haiti) was unwilling to accept the procedure proposed by Mr. McNamara. If the Sub-Commission began by voting on the last part of the first paragraph proposed by Mr. Borisov he did not see how it could thereafter vote on

<sup>218</sup> Pursuant to E/CN.4/Sub.2/SR.6/Corr.1, delete the remainder of the sentence starting with "but he was not".

<sup>219</sup> Pursuant to E/CN.4/Sub.2/SR.6/Corr.1, delete from "replied in" to "amendment to it" and insert "said that".

Mr. Shafaq's amendment, the effect of which would be to omit a term which would by then have been adopted. Such a voting procedure would be illogical.

MISS MONROE (United Kingdom) stated that she would vote on the text proposed by Mr. Borisov provided he agreed to delete the terms "race, sex, language, religion", where they were repetitive.

MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) could not agree to omit these terms from his proposal, which, he repeated, formed a complete text. He stressed the fact that other members having the right to submit amendments, could propose their deletion.<sup>220</sup>

THE CHAIRMAN concluded from this exchange of views that the Sub-Commission should proceed to vote on the whole of the third part.

MR. ROY (Haiti) formally moved an amendment, that the words "irrespective of their race, sex, language, religion" be deleted.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote Mr. Borisov's text, reading "irrespective of their race, sex, language, religion, property status, national or social origin".

Decision: This text was rejected by seven votes to one, with three abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the amendment proposed by Mr. McNamara and Dr. Wu, to add the words "property status, national [4] or social origin" to Article 6. Article 6 would then read "Everyone is entitled to all the rights and freedoms set forth in this Declaration, without distinction of race, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, property status, or national or social origin".

MR. ROY (Haiti) said that he had abstained from the preceding vote because he did not agree with the voting procedure. He wished to know when the Sub-Commission would be called upon to vote on Mr. Shafaq's amendment, supported by himself, which was to delete the word "national". The Sub-Commission could not first vote to incorporate this word in Article 6, and vote a second time to delete it.

MR. MCNAMARA (Australia) thought the Sub-Commission could vote on both amendments. Delegates who did not accept the first, would vote for the second, and vice versa.

THE CHAIRMAN stated that the Sub-Commission was therefore required to vote, in turn, on the two following texts:

- (1) "Property status, or national or social origin"
- (2) "Property status, or social origin".

The first text was put to the vote.

Decision: This text was adopted by six votes, with five abstentions.

MR. ROY (Haiti), on a point of order asked, what the position would be if the second text were also adopted.

MR. NISOT (Belgium) considered that, since the Chairman had taken a clear-cut decision on the question of voting procedure, the debate was closed.

MR. MASANI (India) did not share the fears expressed by Mr. Roy. In the unlikely event of both texts being adopted, the Sub-Commission could decide to vote for one text, as against the other.

THE CHAIRMAN accepted this proposal and pointed out that he had had this in mind when deciding to call for successive votes on the two texts. He put the second text to the vote.

Decision: This text was rejected by five votes to three, with three abstentions.

MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) stated that he had abstained from the second vote, since he had voted for the first text.<sup>221</sup> He considered that the insertion in the text of the concept conveyed by the term “national” was most important, and that having done this, the Sub-Commission should bring this question to the attention of the Drafting Committee, which would have to produce a final text.

THE CHAIRMAN requested the Sub-Commission to vote on the text as a whole.

MR. DANIELS (United States of America) considered that there was a drafting error in the English text. He thought that the words “as to” had a restrictive meaning by no means in accordance with the Sub-Commission’s intention.

MR. MASANI (India) proposed that the words in question be replaced by “such as”.

The Sub-Commission

Decided

To adopt the formal change proposed by Mr. Masani, while leaving the French text as it stood.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the full text of Article 6, which read:

“Every one is entitled to all the rights and freedoms set forth in this Declaration, without distinction such as race, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, property status, or national or social origin”.

Decision: This text was adopted by 9 votes to 1 with one abstention.

[6]

MR. DANIELS (United States of America) desired to make some observations on the Sub-Commission’s working methods. He noted that the Sub-Commission had spent more than 4 of the 5 1/2 hours of that day's meetings in discussing matters of procedure. He felt that it ought not to waste time by deciding on a final text for the drafting of the Articles. Its business was to express its views on the prevention of discrimination and protection of minorities. He asked the Sub-Commission to grant the Chairman more latitude in taking decisions. Time for discussion ought to be limited, and the Chairman ought to have the necessary authority to plan out the work.

MISS MONROE (United Kingdom) supported Mr. Daniels. Drafting of any changes which the Sub-Commission wished to be made in the draft should be left to the Drafting Committee.

MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) remarked that prompted by his own experience, he had proposed at the first meeting, that the Sub-Commission should confine itself to a general discussion on principles and the expression of members' views, and should not undertake the drafting of the Articles in question. The Sub-Commission had not even been asked to undertake that task. It was to record the views brought to light by the discussion in a report to be submitted to the Commission on Human Rights.

MR. NISOT (Belgium) failed to see any difference between these two methods of procedure. The difficulties would remain whatever method of working was adopted. One could not indeed make one's meaning clear except by drawing up articles or formulating principles.

MR. ROY (Haiti) was of the same opinion as Mr. Nisot. To Mr. Borisov he replied that the report to be submitted to the Commission on Human Rights ought to reflect the opinion of the Sub-Commission not the opinions of members.

MR. SPANIEN (France) stated that preparing texts for the Drafting Committee, drafting articles or altering them by means of amendments was not a quick way of working. He proposed that the Sub-Commission should adopt a method that would enable it to produce not texts of articles for submission to the Drafting Committee, but a report embodying the Sub-Commission's opinion as to the recommendations to be submitted to the Drafting Committee. This method of work would make it possible to avoid long discussions about the drafting of articles and even simple matters of syntax.

MR. NISOT (Belgium) said that he had just learned that the Drafting Committee would not be giving immediate attention to the Sub-Commission's work. The Committee would only undertake the drafting of the Declaration and Convention when it had received the replies from the various governments. He felt that in those circumstances it was not superfluous for the Sub-Commission to do a little drafting.

THE CHAIRMAN reminded members that the Commission on Human Rights expected the Sub-Commission to produce texts that reflected its views. The Drafting Committee moreover would not be meeting before the session of the Human Rights Commission. The Commission desired to know the Sub-Commission's views, whether in the form of suggestions, proposals, alterations, amendments, additions or deletions. However, experience had shown that it was better not to try to produce a final draft of the Articles. He felt that the Sub-Commission would do well to devote more attention to the expression of concrete views. He proposed therefore that members should adopt the latter method in future. Lastly he gave notice that the Sub-Commission would examine the second paragraph of Mr. Borisov's proposal the following day.

II. Items 6, 7 and 8 of the Agenda (Continued)

THE CHAIRMAN stated that paragraph 2 of Mr. Borisov's proposal should now be examined.

MR. NISOT (Belgium) proposed that study of the paragraph in question should be deferred until Monday and be taken under the heading "Consideration of Additional Items".

MR. SHAFaq (Iran) opposed Mr. Nisot's proposal and suggested that the procedure suggested by the Chairman ought to be followed.

MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) also objected to Mr. Nisot's proposal and said he must insist on the Sub-Committee taking up consideration of the rest of his proposal at that meeting.

MISS MONROE (United Kingdom) supported Mr. Nisot's remarks. In her opinion, the proposal was a statement of something which Mr. Borisov wished to see embodied in domestic law. As such, [4] she did not consider it should be incorporated in Article 6, which was part of a Declaration. She formally moved that the second part of Mr. Borisov's proposal did not belong to Article 6 and should be considered later.

MR. NISOT (Belgium) seconded Miss Monroe's motion.

MR. MCNAMARA (Australia) said he could not agree with Miss Monroe's views. The Chairman had given an undertaking at the end of the previous meeting and again that morning that Mr. Borisov's proposal would be discussed. He felt that such undertakings should be honoured.

MR. DANIELS (United States of America) supported the right of Mr. Borisov to have his proposal considered at that meeting. He went on to say, however, that he was directly opposed to the proposal. He mentioned that an International Law Committee had been appointed with the task of coordinating international penal law.<sup>222</sup> In his opinion, a Declaration was not the place for a penal provision. He was personally opposed to any proposal aimed at restricting hostile propaganda, and felt that the virtue in permitting such propaganda was that it served to maintain the liberty of the individual.

<sup>222</sup> At its second session in 1947, the United Nations General Assembly, in Resolution 174(II), decided to establish the International Law Commission, an expert body charged with the codification and progressive development of international law. The new Commission was immediately directed to formulate the principles of international law recognized in the Charter of the International Military Tribunal and in the judgment of the Tribunal (GA Res. 177(II)). Over the years, the Commission has fulfilled a number of important functions with respect to international criminal law, including the preparation of the draft statute of the International Criminal Court.

DR. WU (China) supported Mr. McNamara's views and pointed out that, when the procedure to be followed had been declared by the Chairman no one had opposed it.

MR. NISOT (Belgium) felt there was no violation of any undertaking to Mr. Borisov. In discussing whether the proposal pertained to Article 6, the Members were discussing a matter of substance.

THE CHAIRMAN put Miss Monroe's motion to the vote; it was rejected by 8 votes to 3. [5]

MR. DANIELS (United States of America) moved that a vote be taken on Mr. Borisov's proposal. In his opinion the members were sufficiently clear on the subject to warrant a vote being taken, without further discussion.

MR. NISOT (Belgium) seconded the motion.

DR. WU (China) considered that further discussion was necessary. He was in general sympathy and agreement with the spirit of the proposal, but felt that the words "shall be punishable under the law" were too concrete. In their place he suggested "should be made illegal". Regarding freedom of speech, he pointed out that no freedom is absolutely unlimited, and cited the example of laws against slander. In his opinion it could not be considered an unwarrantable limitation of freedom of speech to wish to protect races and religions from hostility, in the interests of international order and peace.

MR. MASANI (India) said he was opposed to Mr. Borisov's proposal on the grounds that it was out of place in Article 6. Article 6 was intended to form part of a Declaration, and as such was not the place for the incorporation of a penal clause.

MR. NISOT (Belgium) felt that Mr. Borisov's proposal was not only incompatible with Article 6, but that it directly contradicted Articles 21 and 22, on Freedom of Speech and Expression.

MR. MCNAMARA (Australia) felt that the Members must approve of the spirit of the material in this paragraph, with the exception of the words "of national exclusiveness" contained in the second line. In his opinion no one should be penalized for wishing to be exclusive. He considered that the substance of [6] this paragraph might be suitable for inclusion in a convention and proposed that it be forwarded to the Human Rights Commission for consideration. He pointed out that Article 9, Clause 3, of the suggested Convention contained the points mentioned in Mr. Borisov's proposal. He added that a similar proposal had already been adopted by the General Assembly of the United Nations in general terms.<sup>223</sup> The Sub-Commission was therefore not entitled to reject it.

<sup>223</sup> Mr. McNamara may have been referring to GA Res. 110(II), "Measures to be taken against propaganda and the inciters of a new war", and to GA Res. 127(II), "False or Distorted Reports".

MR. SPANIEN (France) agreed with the substance of Mr. Borisov's proposal, but felt it should not be discussed in connection with Article 6. He was of the opinion, however, that the text should be considered at another time.

MR. SHAFaq (Iran) said that, while sharing the views expressed by Mr. Masani and Mr. Spanien that this paragraph did not appear to belong in Article 6, he did not agree with Mr. Nisot regarding its incompatibility with Articles 21 and 22. In his opinion there was nothing in Mr. Borisov's proposal to contradict Articles 21 and 22.

MR. ROY (Haiti) said that it should be possible to decide whether the proposal was relevant to Article 6. If it was relevant, he wished to speak in its support.

MR. NISOT (Belgium) said that he would be against the proposal made by Mr. Borisov (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics), wherever it was placed, as he considered that it impeded freedom of speech.

MISS MONROE (United Kingdom) stated that if Mr. Borisov (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) desired his proposal to be voted on as a whole, she would be against it because of the words "constitute a crime". Some points of the proposal would [7] be right in their right place, for example, "Religious Hostility" should in her opinion be in Article 8, and "National and Racial Hostility", should be in Article 22. "National Exclusiveness" was part of the so-called "War Mongering Resolution" of the Assembly.

MR. SHAFaq (Iran) suggested that a vote be taken as to whether the proposal of MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) should be considered under Article 6 or not.

MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that the Sub-Commission's action on Part 2 of his proposal might indicate whether or not the Union Nations Organization was to be effective in its protection of minorities and whether or not the Sub-Commission could effectively carry out its Terms of Reference. The position was difficult for certain delegates in whose countries he considered that discrimination existed.

MR. NISOT (Belgium) objected to the proposal on legal grounds as it seemed to be against the freedom of the Press.

MR. DANIELS (United States of America) objected on substantial grounds as he said that Part 2 should not be included in any part of the Bill or Convention. Mr. Borisov<sup>224</sup> considered that it was not a question as to whether the proposal was relevant to Article 6 or Article 21. It seemed clear to him that the thought behind the proposal was not accepted.

He was not surprised by the objection of Mr. Daniels (United States of America) as discrimination against the negroes apparently existed in the United States of <sup>224</sup> Unusually, the summary record appears to shift the identity of the speaker in mid-paragraph. It seems from the context that it is Mr. Borisov who is speaking, and this continues into the next paragraph.

America. Fifteen million Negroes had addressed themselves to the American Government against this discrimination. He cited statistics indicating that [8] up to 1927 there had been 4,000 cases of lynching, and that since the end of the war, there had been 40 cases of lynching. He gave several examples of lynching. Such cases, he maintained, could only be considered as crimes.

If Part 2 of his proposal was not to be accepted, he felt it might indicate that the Sub-Commission was not to be trusted to carry out its Terms of Reference.

MR. DANIELS (United States of America) said that it was strange that any member of the Sub-Commission should advocate measures to suppress freedom of expression.

He pointed out that in the United Kingdom and the United States of America freedom was not “absolute” but was limited, for example, by measures against incitement of violence. He hoped that the Sub-Commission would do something against the discrimination as had been described both in his own and other countries.

He opposed the proposal because he considered that it would result in a suppression of freedom.

He proposed an amendment to include in Part 2 of the Russian proposal all those terms now accepted by the Sub-Commission, i.e. “race, sex, religion, language, political or other opinion, property status, national [sic] social origin”.

THE CHAIRMAN summed up the proposals before the Sub-Commission.

I. Examination of paragraph 2 of the opinion of Mr. Borisov on Article 6 (Document E/CN.4/Sub.2/21)

(1) Discussion of the amendment submitted by Mr. Daniels (United States of America)

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out to the Sub-Commission that a list of the various amendments proposed had been distributed to members. He suggested that they should begin by discussing Mr. Daniels' amendment proposing the rejection of paragraph 2 of Mr. Borisov's text. If this amendment were accepted, there would clearly be no need for the Sub-Commission to proceed further with their examination of the later amendments.

MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) observed that these amendments did not refer especially to Article 6.<sup>225</sup> Thus, even if Mr. Daniels' motion to exclude his proposal from Article 6 were accepted, it would still be possible to include it elsewhere. Moreover, in his first amendment, Mr. Daniels had proposed the omission from Article 6<sup>226</sup> of paragraph 2 of his (Mr. Borisov's) proposal, and in the second, he had accepted the text of this proposal, with certain additions. Mr. Daniels could not expect to reject the motion of the Soviet member and at the same time to share his opinion, if it happened to be the view of the majority.<sup>227</sup> Such a procedure was not acceptable. He proposed therefore that no vote should be taken on the first amendment of Mr. Daniels.<sup>228</sup>

MR. DANIELS (United States of America) stated that his second proposal was not coming up for adoption. It was a proposal for the addition to Mr. Borisov's text, if it were adopted, of the categories of discrimination mentioned in the new Article 6.

MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) declared his readiness, in view of the reservations made by certain members, to have his proposal inserted in Article 6, and, in order to reach a compromise with Mr. Daniels, to withdraw his suggestion for its insertion in Article 6. But he maintained his proposal in the form of an independent point, to be included among the Sub-Commission's recommendations and, as such, to be discussed and examined by the Sub-Commission. In

these circumstances he considered that there was no longer any need to take a vote on Mr. Daniels' first proposal.<sup>229</sup>

MR. NISOT (Belgium) proposed that, since Mr. Borisov no longer intended to link his proposal with Article 6, they should pass on to the examination of Article 13.

MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) pointed out that he had not withdrawn his original proposal, but had proposed a compromise between his original proposal and the opinion of Mr. Daniels, which was also shared by certain other members. Not inserting his proposal in Article 6 did not mean that it was withdrawn and he pressed for its immediate discussion.<sup>230</sup> If the Sub-Commission did not take his second proposal in that sense, he would prefer to withdraw it.<sup>231</sup>

MR. DANIELS (United States of America) stated that he would withdraw his amendment if Mr. Borisov withdrew his proposal in connection with Article 6. He reserved the right to re-submit it when Mr. Borisov's proposal was submitted to the Sub-Commission in connection with other Articles. He suggested that the Sub-Commission should pass on to the examination of Article 13.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that Mr. Borisov had asked that his proposal, divorced from Article 6, be examined immediately and that the question of its position should be considered at a later stage.

MR. DANIELS (United States of America) said that in these circumstances he maintained his amendment.

THE CHAIRMAN then asked the Sub-Commission to vote on Mr. Daniels' amendment understood as a rejection of Mr. Borisov's proposal, wherever it appeared.

MR. NISOT (Belgium) supported the Chairman's proposal.

MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) also expressed his approval of the procedure suggested by the Chairman.

MR. NISOT (Belgium) on a point of order, moved that a vote be taken on the question whether the Sub-Commission should discuss Mr. Borisov's proposal and the amendments made to that proposal immediately.

THE CHAIRMAN put Mr. Nisot's motion to the vote.

MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) declared that he could not accept this procedure. The Sub-Commission had in fact decided on two occasions that his proposal should be examined immediately.

MR. NISOT (Belgium) asked that a vote be taken on the question whether this proposal should be dealt with in relation to Article 6 or not.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that, as the Sub-Commission was [5] still discussing Article 6 and as the Soviet proposal had been made in connection with this Article, the only motion on which a vote should be taken was that of Mr. Daniels proposing the rejection of this proposal in connection with Article 6.

MR. SHAFaq (Iran) pointed out that by a vote taken that same morning, the Sub-Commission had decided to deal with the Soviet proposal independently of Article 6. He therefore saw no need for a fresh vote on this subject.

MR. McNAMARA (Australia) observed that he would never have submitted his amendment had it not been decided that only the first paragraph of Mr. Borisov's proposal would be inserted in Article 6. His proposal and that of Dr. Wu only made sense if considered independently of Article 6.

THE CHAIRMAN stated that Mr. Borisov's proposal would be dealt with independently of Article 6, in accordance with the decision taken that morning. Mr. Daniels had entitled his amendment "Rejection of the opinion of Mr. Borisov on Article 6" purely for descriptive purposes. He therefore put to the vote the amendment proposing the rejection of this proposal as such, independently of Article 6.

Decision: The amendment of Mr. Daniels was rejected by 5 votes to 4 with two abstentions.

(2) Joint proposal of Mr. McNamara and Dr. Wu

THE CHAIRMAN drew attention to a slight change in the text of this amendment affecting the title which now read: "Joint amendment to paragraph 2 of the opinion of Mr. Borisov on Article 6 to be added to Article 9, paragraph 3, of the Draft Convention".

MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) asked whether the rejection of Mr. Daniels' proposal did not imply that his own proposal and the amendments made to it should be added to Article 6.<sup>232</sup>

THE CHAIRMAN stated that the Sub-Commission had before it an amendment submitted by Mr. McNamara and Dr. Wu, and that he wished first of all to put the text of this amendment to the vote. If this text were accepted, he would then call for a vote on the question of where it was to be inserted.

DR. WU (China) wished to make some observations on the amendment in question. The terms "or of national exclusiveness, or hatred and contempt" had been omitted because they were superfluous, being already included in the term "hostility". The words "constitute a crime and shall be punishable under the law of the State", at the end of the paragraph, had been altered to "shall be prohibited by the law of the State". The Sub-Commission's task was, in fact, to suggest principles, not to draft an article. Moreover, this proposal had an international bearing. The term “prohibition” was wider than the term “punishment”, and covered penal as well as any administrative measures that might be required.

MR. NISOT (Belgium) stated that this text was contrary not only to freedom of the press, but also to freedom of religious belief.

THE CHAIRMAN put the text of the amendment proposed by Mr. McNamara and Dr. Wu to the vote. There were five votes for, and five against the amendment, with one abstention.

THE CHAIRMAN read out Rule 39 of the Rules of Procedure, according to which “if a vote is equally divided in matters other than elections, the proposal shall be [7] regarded as rejected”.

Decision: The amendment proposed by Mr. McNamara and Dr. Wu was rejected.

(3) Consideration of the second amendment proposed by Mr. Daniels

MR. DANIELS (United States of America) pointed out that his proposal was simply to add the words “based on national or social origin, race, religion, sex, language, political or other opinions, or property status” to Mr. Borisov’s text, that was all.

MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) observed that this was therefore a new proposal.

THE CHAIRMAN emphasized that Mr. Daniels had simply clarified his amendment.

MR. DANIELS (United States of America) explained that the purpose of his amendment was to add the categories of discrimination, defined and adopted by the Sub-Commission on the previous day, to the text which might be adopted. Therefore a vote could hardly be taken on his amendment before a text had been adopted.

MR. ROY (Haiti) stated that this was an impossible procedure, since a vote ought to be taken on the amendments before the text of the proposal was voted on.

MR. DANIELS (United States of America) withdrew his amendment, but reserved the right to revert to it when the text of the proposal was adopted.

(4) Amendment proposed by Miss Monroe

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that this amendment had been slightly altered and, in its present form, read: “The Sub-Commission recommends to the Human Rights Commission:

[8]

- (1) The inclusion in Article 8 of the Convention of a clause condemning incitement to violence against religious groups;
- (2) The inclusion in Article 9 of the Convention of a clause condemning incitement to racial or national violence.”

MR. ROY (Haiti), raising a point of order, held that Miss Monroe's proposal should not be considered, since the Sub-Commission had decided to deal separately with the text of amendments, and the place they were to be inserted.

MISS MONROE (United Kingdom) also felt that it would be preferable to discuss this amendment in connection with Article 8 and 9 and with the consideration of omission to the Declaration. She therefore withdrew her amendment and proposed that the Sub-Commission should vote on the proposal submitted by Mr. Borisov.

MR. McNAMARA (Australia) regretted the Sub-Commission's decision not to examine Miss Monroe's amendment, and feared that the Sub-Commission would never get down to studying the omissions to the Declaration.

He therefore wished to take up Miss Monroe's proposal on his own initiative.

DR. WU (China) supported the suggestion made by the representative of Australia and proposed that the words "in Article 8 of the Convention" in Miss Monroe's amendment be amended to "in the Convention", and that "in Article 9 of the Convention" be similarly amended to "in the Convention".

[9]

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the Sub-Commission had two proposals before it: first the proposal made by Mr. Borisov, and secondly, the new proposal of Dr. Wu and Mr. McNamara in regard to the place where such a clause should be inserted. He proposed first to call for a vote on Mr. Borisov's proposal. He stressed the fact that any texts adopted by the Sub-Commission would be subject to possible changes by the Drafting Committee.

(5) Consideration of the second paragraph of Mr. Borisov's opinion on Article 6

MR. ROY (Haiti) wished the vote to be taken by sections, and suggested that Mr. Borisov's proposal be divided into a first part, reading "Any advocacy of national, racial or religious hostility, or of national exclusiveness of hatred and contempt", and a second part comprising the remainder of the proposal. He reserved the right to vote against the first part, which restricted freedom of the press and of religious belief, but supported the second part.

MR. NISOT (Belgium) did not believe that such a division was possible.

MR. MASANI (India) pointed out that the second part of this paragraph would be superfluous, since it was a paraphrase of Paragraph 6, which had already been adopted.

MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) observed that in his opinion the second part of this paragraph was, in fact, the vital portion, since it stated that these discriminations constituted a crime.

MR. MASANI (India) felt that in relating the establishment of discrimination, which was a form of State action, to the [10] concept of crime, which was only applicable to the individual, the proposal was inconsistent.

MR. McNAMARA (Australia) thought there would be no difficulty in dividing the sentence, making the words “shall be punishable” apply to both parts.

MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) proposed that, to simplify the Sub-Commission’s work, his text should be divided into five parts:

- 1) Any advocacy of national, racial and religious hostility;
- 2) or of national exclusiveness or hatred and contempt;
- 3) as well as any action establishing privileges or discrimination based on distinctions of race, nationality or religion;
- 4) constitute a crime;
- 5) and shall be punishable under the law of the State.

MR. ROY (Haiti) proposed a division into three parts, the words “constitute a crime and shall be punishable under the law of the State’ being added to each of the first three phrases.

MISS MONROE (United Kingdom) stated that she would have to vote against these proposals, as long as they contained the term “constitute a crime”, which could not properly be inserted in a convention.

MR. NISOT (Belgium) would vote against the first two parts, since they restricted freedom of the press and of religious belief, and would also vote against the third part, because it precluded the establishment of privileges on behalf of a minority requiring special protection.

MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) observed that it was the business of the Sub-Commission, not to express individual opinions on the subject, but to reach an agreement on certain terms, if not on the whole of his proposal. It was with this in view that he had agreed to a divided vote.<sup>233</sup> He asked the Sub-Commission to proceed at once to a vote.

THE CHAIRMAN stated that the text proposed by Mr. Borisov embodied two ideas: 1. Certain actions constituted a crime; 2. Certain actions constituting a crime were punishable by law. He considered that the vote should be taken on six sections, that is to say, the first three phrases, accompanied in turn by the words “constituted a crime” and afterwards by the words “shall be punishable under the law”.

MR. SPANIEN (France) wished to record an express reservation. In view of the vagueness of the French text, he would abstain from voting, whether the text were sub-divided or not, and would express his opinion in an observation annexed to the Summary Record.

THE CHAIRMAN called for a vote on the first part of Mr. Borisov's proposal: "Any advocacy of national, racial and religious hostility constitutes a crime".

Decision: This proposal was rejected by 5 votes to 3, with 3 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN emphasized that he had abstained from voting on this part and would probably abstain when the other parts were voted on, not because he disagreed with the ideas expressed by Mr. Borisov, but owing to the wording of the text.

MR. SPANIEN (France) explained that he had abstained on similar grounds.

MR. SHAFaq (Iran) remarked that he had abstained for the same reason.

[12]

THE CHAIRMAN called for a vote on the second part of Mr. Borisov's proposal: "Any advocacy of national exclusiveness, or hatred and contempt, constitutes a crime".

Decision: This proposal was rejected by 6 votes to 1, with 4 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN called for a vote on the third part of Mr. Borisov's text: "Any action establishing a privilege or a discrimination based on distinctions of race, nationality or religion constitutes a crime."

MRS. LEFAUCHEUX (Representative of the Commission on the Status of Women) felt that the omission of the word "sex" was due to an oversight on Mr. Borisov's part.

THE CHAIRMAN thanked Mrs. Lefauchaux for her remark and took the opportunity to express his satisfaction at the presence among the members of a representative of the Commission on the Status of Women.

MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) remarked that it was merely a question of drafting and that he had no objection to inserting the word "sex", since by virtue of the first paragraph, the provisions of the second paragraph should be understood as applying equally to women.

MR. ROY (Haiti) raised a point of order, in view of the demurs voiced by some members.

The Sub-Commission was at the moment engaged in voting, by sections, on the proposal submitted by Mr. Borisov and had already reached a decision with regard to the first and second parts. The third part of this proposal should therefore be left as it stood, without any addition, deletion or revision.

Decision: The third part of Mr. Borisov's proposal was rejected by 4 votes to 4, with 3 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN called for a vote on the fourth part: “any advocacy of national, racial and religious hostility constitutes a crime and shall be punishable under the law of the State”.

Decision: This proposal was rejected by 4 votes to 3, with 3 abstentions.

A vote was then taken on the fifth part: “any advocacy of national exclusiveness or hatred and contempt constitutes a crime and shall be punishable under the law of the State”.

Decision: This proposal was rejected by 5 votes to 1, with 5 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN called for a vote on the sixth part: “any action establishing a privilege or a discrimination based on distinctions of race, nationality or religion constitutes a crime and shall be punishable under the law of the State”.

Decision: This proposal was rejected by 4 votes to 4, with 3 abstentions.

MR. MCNAMARA (Australia) asked whether the result of this vote would be communicated to the Commission on Human Rights. Should the votes be equally divided the Commission might feel inclined to go more fully into the matter.

MR. NISOT (Belgium) suggested that all the Minutes without distinction be put before the Human Rights Commission.

MR. ROY (Haiti) urged that the Rapporteur should mention explicitly in his report to the Commission cases in which the votes were equally divided. The Commission might be able to give a casting vote.

MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) also asked that the voting results be communicated to the Human Rights Commission in the Rapporteur’s report, so that the Commission might [14] realize that even if the Sub-Commission had not been unanimously in favour of adopting these essential points they had only been rejected by an almost equally divided vote.

MR. ROY (Haiti) moved that the question be put to the vote.

MR. NISOT (Belgium) understood this to mean that the results of all votes would be mentioned in the report, if the Secretariat consented.

PROFESSOR HUMPHREY accepted this proposal.

MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) stated that the points just dealt with were essential to the prevention of discrimination and protection of minorities. The results of the voting consequently showed the Sub-Commission not to be unanimous even as regards the principles of its Terms of Reference, and it might be inferred that the Sub-Commission was in favour of discrimination. If such were not the case it was important that the attention of the Human Rights Commission be drawn to the fact that the Soviet proposal had been rejected on an almost equal vote.

THE CHAIRMAN took it as agreed that the Sub-Commission was in favour of including the results of all voting in the report.

MR. MASANI (India) said that Mr. Borisov appeared to be drawing conclusions from the vote which he (Mr. Masani) would like to correct. Though members were agreed upon the principle of non-discrimination, there were nevertheless several methods of applying that principle. The negative result of the vote did not imply that some members showed less interest than others in the task laid down for the Sub-Commission.

MR. DANIELS (United States of America) and MISS MONROE (United Kingdom) announced their agreement with Mr. Masani.

MR. SPANIEN (France) explained that he had voted against the proposal because he thought it important to free the question of prevention of discrimination from texts he regarded as inadequate and confused.

MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) stated that he had merely tried to make clear the different tendencies shown by the Sub-Commission's vote, without implying that the Sub-Commission was in favour of discrimination.<sup>234</sup>

II. Examination of Article 13 (Document E/CN.4/21)

MISS MONROE (United Kingdom) proposed that, for the sake of clarity, they should begin by discussing the first part of the Article concerning liberty of movement within the borders of each State and go on afterwards to the second part concerning freedom to emigrate.

MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) did not think that Miss Monroe's proposal could be applied to the French text. The latter seemed to him to form a single whole in which the second part was subordinated to the first.<sup>235</sup>

MR. SPANIEN (France) considered that it was possible to divide up the French text provided the division was made after the words "interieur de l'État". In that case, it would perhaps be necessary to reintroduce the reservation before the second sentence.

MISS MONROE (United Kingdom) asked the Secretariat if it would be possible to have a new French translation made of this Article, as in the English text the reservation applied to the first sentence only, whereas in the French text, it appeared to apply to the second sentence as well.

<sup>234</sup> E/CN.4/Sub.2/SR.8/Corr.1: "Delete from 'stated that' to 'in favour of discrimination'. Insert 'said he did not consider all the members of the Sub-Commission were in favour of discrimination but some members voting against effective measures against discrimination showed that they are to a certain extent in favour of discrimination'."

PROFESSOR HUMPHREY pointed out that, at the Drafting Committee's meeting on this Article, at which he was present, so far as he remembered and subject to correction by the record contained in the minutes of that meeting, it had not been the intention of the Drafting Committee, he thought, to make the reservations expressed in the second sentence applicable to the third sentence.

However he could not state definitely that such was the precise intention of the Drafting Committee and in his view both interpretations were possible.

MISS MONROE (United Kingdom) proposed that, in order to save time, the Rapporteur, Mr. Spanien and the Secretariat should be asked to clear up the point by referring to the minutes of the Drafting Committee's meeting. Meanwhile they should pass on to the examination of the following Article.

PROFESSOR HUMPHREY was of the opinion that the Drafting Committee had referred Article 13 to the Sub-Commission for further consideration on account of some uncertainty in regard to the drafting of that Article. In any such further consideration it was not necessary to take account of the Drafting Committee's intentions, which were moreover somewhat vague.

MISS MONROE (United Kingdom) withdrew her suggestion and proposed that they should begin examination of the first two sentences of Article 13: "There shall be liberty of movement and free choice of residence within the borders of each State. This freedom may be regulated by any general law adopted in the interest of national welfare and security."

MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) stated that the foregoing discussion had convinced him that the French version differed from the English.

For his part he was unable to accept the Secretariat's observation and would like to know the Drafting Committee's intentions. If there had been differences of opinion on this Article, they should have been mentioned in the present text of Article 13, but this was not the case.<sup>236</sup>

MR. MCNAMARA (Australia) thought there was nothing to prevent the Sub-Commission from examining the text of the first two sentences without, for the time being, considering the question whether the reservation contained in the second sentence applied to the third sentence.

[19]

MR. NISOT (Belgium) considered that the perfection of the text proposed was not important since all the proposed amendments were admissible.

PROFESSOR HUMPHREY read the minutes of the Drafting Committee's meeting (E/CN.4/AC.1/SR.18, page 5).

From those minutes it was impossible to draw any conclusion regarding the precise intentions of the Drafting Committee.

DR. WU (China) thought that complete freedom to emigrate or renounce one's nationality was impossible. Liberty of movement within the borders of countries and in the matter of emigration should both be subject to the same reservations.

MISS MONROE (United Kingdom), following the statement by Dr. Wu, proposed the insertion of the words "Subject to the same reservations" before the third sentence of the English text. The latter would then concord with the French text.

MR. NISOT (Belgium) proposed the following text:

"Subject to any law enacted in the general interest and with a view to security, individuals may freely: circulate and choose their own residence within the State; emigrate and renounce their nationality."

MISS MONROE (United Kingdom) thought that the term "general interest" would be more suitably translated in English by the words "general welfare of the people".

MR. DANIELS (United States of America) said that in his view the discussion was getting away from the questions of primary concern to the Sub-Commission.

MISS MONROE (United Kingdom) stated that, on the contrary, it was essential for this reservation to be drafted in such a way that Governments would not be able to make use of it to justify certain forms of persecution, conducted in the name of the general welfare of the people, as had been done by the Nazis.

MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) pointed out that he could not see that this text had any bearing on the Sub-Commission's task.

MR. SPANIEN (France) supported Miss Monroe's contention. In his view any restriction of the freedom to emigrate might be a flagrant form of persecution.

All reservations made under the head of national sovereignty should be subject to a general principle to the effect that they could not be applied in a spirit contrary to that of the Charter.

The principle of liberty of movement could only be promulgated by an international declaration. Care should therefore be taken not to provide a loophole for States to evade this rule, on the pretext of ill-defined general or mutual interest.

Under the Statute defining the position of refugees, the right of emigrants to leave a country where they were not treated in conformity with the principles of the Charter had been reserved.

He considered therefore that the Charter ought to be mentioned specifically in the text.

MR. NISOT (Belgium) thought that the point Mr. Spanien was anxious about was covered by Article 5.

MR. MCNAMARA (Australia) proposed that the text of the reservation should be changed to the following: "Subject to any law adopted in good faith in the spirit of Article 6. . ."

In his view this addition was not essential, in view of the stipulations of Article 6. His aim in making this proposal was to take account of the objectives of the Sub-Commission.

MR. SHAFaq (Iran) thought that the essential idea underlying the first two sentences was contained in the phrase: "There shall be liberty of movement and free choice of residence within the borders of each State", while the reference to State intervention [21] was only a secondary idea, which should be expressed in the form of an exception in the following manner: "unless in the judgment of the State concerned such freedom constitutes a danger to security and the national interest".

MISS MONROE (United Kingdom) stated that she was fully in agreement with Mr. Spanien and preferred the original English text which did not apply the reservation to the third sentence.

THE CHAIRMAN stated that there were two proposals before the Sub-Commission, the proposal of Mr. Nisot and that of Mr. Shafaq. At the request of Mr. Masani and Mr. Borisov, it was agreed that the proposals concerning Articles 13 and 15 should be transmitted in writing to the Secretariat the next morning, and those concerning other Articles on Monday morning.

Items 6, 7 and 8 of the Agenda

1. Discussion of Article 13

THE CHAIRMAN said the amendments dealing with the whole Article would be discussed first. Mr. Nisot had joined with Mr. McNamara and Dr. Wu and their proposal now read: "Subject to any general law not contrary to the principles of the United Nations Charter and adopted for specific and explicit reasons of security or in the general interest there shall be liberty of movement and free choice of residence within the territory of each State. Subject to the same reservation each individual shall be free to emigrate and renounce nationality."

MISS MONROE (United Kingdom) agreed with the first part of the proposal up to the words "each State". She felt, however, that the reservation should not apply to the right to emigrate. If an individual wished to change his nationality and another country was willing to accept him it would be wrong, in her opinion to limit his freedom.

MR. ROY (Haiti) suggested voting on the proposal in two parts.

MR. SHAFaq (Iran) thought that a Declaration of Human Rights should not encourage individuals to renounce their nationality, particularly as other Articles emphasized the necessity for loyalty to one's country.

MR. McNAMARA (Australia) wished to add the words "purpose and" before the word "principles". He thought that both the purpose and principles of the United Nations Charter should be mentioned.

MR. NISOT (Belgium) said that he and Dr. Wu were [3] willing to accept Mr. McNamara's proposal. They also wished to delete the words "and explicit" which seemed to be redundant.

MR. MASANI (India) agreed with Mr. Shafaq that disloyalty should not be encouraged, but he felt that the desire to emigrate was not necessarily evidence of disloyalty. He thought that criminals or traitors would be subject to some law preventing their emigration, and it was only the rights of honest citizens which were under discussion. He felt that there should be no reservation to the second part of the proposal.

MISS MONROE (United Kingdom) said that she had proposed the wording: “to change their nationality to that of any country willing to accept then” because she felt that the original wording might encourage people to lose one nationality without taking on another and thus to owe no allegiance to any State.

MR. SPANIEN (France) proposed a new amendment for the second part of the Article: “Each individual shall have liberty of movement outside the territory of each State and shall be free to emigrate and renounce his nationality.” He considered it important to add liberty of movement in the international field as a specific right. He did not think that any reservation should be applied to the last part of the Article.

MR. MCNAMARA (Australia) said that it would be unrealistic to try to do away with the reservation. In his opinion there were certain types of emigration which [4] would have to be regulated. He mentioned as an example the emigration of technical experts whose contribution was necessary to the welfare of their country he thought that if there were no restrictions, criminals might be able to emigrate and thus escape punishment.

DR. WU (China) agreed with Mr. Spanien’s proposal, but he thought that this addition would increase the necessity for the reservation. He wondered whether Mr. Spanien wished to abolish passports.

MR. NISOT (Belgium) agreed with Mr. Spanien’s proposal but he considered the reservation to be necessary. He pointed out that countries were being asked to make their laws in conformity with the purposes and principles of the United Nations Charter, and he thought that that was sufficient safeguard to freedom.

MISS MONROE (United Kingdom) pointed out that the case of criminals was covered by Article 5 of the Draft Convention. She was in sympathy with the principles of Mr. Spanien’s proposal but she felt that it raised the question of passports and she therefore preferred her own wording.

MR. SPANIEN (France) said that it was the Sub-Commission’s duty to draft general principles and not to make regulations concerning passports. His proposal would naturally be subject to the provisions of the Charter, safeguarding the sovereignty of States. He did not consider that the wording of Miss Monroe’s proposal expressed the idea of liberty of movement clearly enough.

MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that he preferred the Drafting Committee’s wording for the first part of Article 13. He thought that the reservation should apply to both parts of the Article. He alleged that emigrants had often been exploited as cheap labour in the past and that they had not been given full rights. He felt that the right to emigrate without any restrictions would encourage people to renounce their nationality.

MR. SPANIEN (France) replied that aliens would be subject to the general laws of the country they entered, including any restrictions as to their liberty of movement within that country which might be applied in accordance with the reservation to the first part of Article 13.

THE CHAIRMAN declared the discussion closed. He put to the vote the first part of the proposal by Mr. Nisot, Mr. McNamara and Dr. Wu:

“Subject to any general law not contrary to the purposes and principles of the United Nations Charter and adopted for specific reasons of security or in the general interest, there shall be liberty of movement and free choice of residence within the territory of each State.”

The proposal was adopted by 10 votes with 1 abstention.

MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) explained that he had abstained from voting because he preferred the Drafting Committee’s wording.

THE CHAIRMAN called for a vote on Mr. Spanien’s amendment to the second Part of Article 13:

“Each individual shall have liberty of movement outside the territory of each State and shall be free to emigrate and renounce his nationality.”

The proposal was rejected by 5 votes to 2, with 4 abstentions.

MISS MONROE (United Kingdom) and MR. DANIELS (United States of America) explained that they were in favour of the idea but had abstained from voting because they were not sure of its legal effect.

MR. ROY (Haiti) said that he had abstained because the proposal did not take existing laws and regulations into account.

THE CHAIRMAN called for a vote on Miss Monroe’s amendment to the second part of Article 13:

“Individuals shall be free to leave their own country and to change their nationality to that of any country willing to accept them.”

The proposal was adopted by 6 votes to 5.

THE CHAIRMAN put the new version of Article 13 as a whole to the vote:

“Subject to any general law not contrary to the purposes and principles of the United Nations Charter and adopted for specific reasons of security or in the general interest, there shall be liberty of movement and free choice of residence within the territory of each State.

Individuals shall be free to leave their own country and to change their nationality to that of any country willing to accept them.”

The proposal was adopted by 8 votes to 2 with 1 abstention.

MR. McNAMARA (Australia) asked that the following note be added to the Sub-Commission's report: “Further, any general law referred to herein, shall not be inconsistent with Article 6 of the proposed International Declaration on Human Rights as amended by this Sub-Commission.”

MR. SHAFaq (Iran) withdrew his amendment as his point was covered by Article 5 of the Draft Convention.

[7]

Article 15

THE CHAIRMAN said that the Sub-Commission would now discuss Article 15.

MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that in his opinion the Drafting Committee wished the Sub-Commission to examine Article 15 only in reference to the status of women and the right to contract marriage. He asked for information as to the contents of the Report of the Commission on the status of women.

MME. LEFAUCHEUX (Delegate of the Commission on the Status of Women) pointed out that the Commission on the Status of Women would not meet before January, at Lake Success.

MR. MASANI (India) asked whether the discussion should only be confined to the status of women. He thought that all of Article 15 should be discussed, and if this view were to be accepted, he wished to add after the word “counsel” the words “of his choice”.

DR. WU (China) indicated that the Sub-Commission should at that time decide whether Article 15 should be discussed wholly, partly, or not at all.

MISS MONROE (United Kingdom) said that she was against discussing Article 15 immediately for two reasons; first, she had been informed that the United Kingdom Representative on the Human Rights Commission would propose that the subject of this Article be introduced into the Convention in another form; secondly, she was not prepared to discuss the question of marriage.

MR. SHAFaq (Iran) said that he supported the proposal of Mr. Masani (India) that Article 15 should now be discussed as a whole.

MR. DANIELS (USA) said that he supported Dr. Wu (China), and thought that the Sub-Commission should not discuss questions which did not relate directly either to discrimination or to minorities.

MR. MCNAMARA (Australia) felt that the phrase of “status in law” required some explanation. He suggested adding the words “on the basis of Article 6” before the word “status”.

MR. SPANIEN (France) said that, in his opinion, the Sub-Commission should now discuss all of Article 15, because he considered that the question of access to courts involved the issue of discrimination.

MR. MASANI (India) said that evidently the consensus of opinion of Members was against the discussion of Article 15, and that he would hand in a written statement on this question to be included in the Report.

MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that he was surprised to hear from Mme. Lefauchaux (Delegate of the Commission on the Status of Women) that the Commission on the Status of Women had made no recommendation on this subject.

MISS MONROE (United Kingdom) moved that Article 15 should not be discussed at that time. She suggested that Members might individually submit their views to the Commission on Human Rights.

[9]

THE CHAIRMAN put Miss Monroe’s motion to the vote. There were 7 votes in favour, 2 against and 2 abstentions.

MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that he had abstained from voting because he considered that a vote should have been taken only as to a discussion on the right to contract marriage.

MR. MASANI (India) and MISS MONROE (United Kingdom) indicated that they would each submit written statements for inclusion in the Report.

Article 28

THE CHAIRMAN said that the Sub-Commission should now discuss Article 28.

DR. WU (China) and MISS MONROE (United Kingdom) said that they agreed with Article 28 as already drafted.

MR. DANIELS (United States of America) moved that the Article be accepted as drafted.

MR. NISOT (Belgium) seconded the motion.

MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that the first part of the Article was clear, but that the second part was not clear to him. He considered that examinations might conceal methods of discrimination, and that some constitutions did not provide for examinations for public employment.

DR. WU (China) said that the reason for this part of the Article was to ensure that such examinations should be conducted in secrecy and with maximum objectivity.

MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) repeated that examinations might be a subtle discrimination against individuals. He said that, for example, in the United States of America there was an indirect discrimination against Negroes desiring to stay in first-class hotels.

[10]

MISS MONROE (United Kingdom) moved that the Sub-Commission vote on Article 28 as a whole.

MR. DANIELS (United States of America) seconded this motion.

MR. SHAFaq (Iran) said that the objection raised by Mr. Borisov (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) was not relevant to the subject matter. He asked Mr. Borisov how access to examinations might be discriminatory.

MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that examinations could be discriminatory, in his opinion, as a particular set of examiners could favour certain types of candidates. He pointed out that although there had been a secret vote for the election of Members of the Sub-Commission, an influential country might have influenced other countries, both openly and behind the scenes. He thought that the same method of discrimination could apply even to secret examinations. He moved that the Sub-Commission vote on Article 28, divided into the two sentences.

THE CHAIRMAN took the vote on the first sentence. It was adopted unanimously.

THE CHAIRMAN then took the vote on the second sentence. There were 9 votes in favour, 1 against and 1 abstention.

The whole of Article 28 was then put to the vote. There were 9 votes in favour and 2 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN asked Members to submit any proposals, in writing, to the Secretary of the Sub-Commission before 10 a.m. on 1 December. He also asked Members to submit their proposals on Article 36 by the afternoon of 29 November if possible.

Proposal by Miss Elizabeth Monroe (UK), regarding additional material for inclusion in the International Declaration on Human Rights

The Declaration contains two Articles which are fundamental to the work of the Sub-Commission. Article 6 enjoins the principle of non-discrimination; and Article 36 is designed for the Protection of Minorities.

It is desirable to resolve at some stage in the Declaration the inconsistency between the principles arising from these two Articles. This inconsistency arises since on the one hand Article 6 aims at securing uniformity of treatment, whilst on the other Article 36 recognizes that certain communities can rightfully claim differential treatment.

In view of the text adopted for Article 36 the UK Member proposes the adoption of the following clarifying motion:

“The Sub-Commission on the Prevention of Discrimination and the Protection of Minorities recommends to the Human Rights Commission the inclusion of a clarifying clause to Article 36. This clause should read:

‘Differential treatment of a Minority or of an individual belonging to a Minority is not discrimination when it is in the interests of contentment and the welfare of the community as a whole.’”

1 December 1947

The Preparatory Commission for the International Refugee Organization is following with great interest the deliberations of the Commission on Human Rights, and earnestly hopes that its endeavours may be crowned with success.

No group of human individuals can be more interested in an International Bill of Human Rights than the large number of persons who are the concern of the International Refugee Organization – the refugees and displaced persons. The position of these persons is due, to a considerable extent, to the flagrant violation of human rights by National-Socialist Germany, Japan and their Fascist Allies.

The Preparatory Commission considers the achievement of the aims of the Commission on Human Rights – a universal guarantee of human rights and fundamental freedoms – as a most important feature<sup>3</sup> for the regularization of the situation of these persons.

It is for this reason that the Preparatory Commission for the International Refugee Organization feels justified in submitting to the Commission on Human Rights certain points for consideration. The Preparatory Commission has confined its observations to those points which, in its opinion, are of particular importance to the persons within its Mandate.

1. Equality before the Law; Prevention of Discrimination;
Protection of Minorities

The Preparatory Commission does not wish to anticipate the conclusions of the Subcommittee on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities. It merely wishes to submit the following points for consideration:

(a) Discrimination is frequently based, not only on the grounds of sex, religion, race, or political opinion, but also on the grounds of nationality, or lack of nationality.

Such discrimination may be made either between nationals and aliens, or between different classes of aliens.

It would, therefore, in the opinion of the Preparatory Commission for the International [2] Refugee Organization, be desirable that the following principles be embodied in the Declaration or in the Convention on Human Rights:

There shall, in principle, be no discrimination between persons on the basis of nationality, or lack of nationality.

Nationals and aliens shall enjoy equal rights with the exception of political rights and rights which, under national law and within the limits prescribed by the International Bill on Human Rights, are confined to nationals.

The principle of reciprocity shall be no bar to the equal granting and enjoyment of human rights and fundamental freedoms.

(b) Without prejudice to the decisions of the appropriate organs of the United Nations, on the question of implementation of the International Bill on Human Rights, it is submitted that equality before the law should, in national law, be safeguarded not only by the embodiment of positive rights to this effect, but also by the incorporation in civil and criminal law of adequate safeguards against discrimination, incitement to, and advocacy of, discrimination. Incitement to discrimination is frequently directed against national, religious and racial groups. Civil proceedings and criminal prosecutions against instigators of discrimination, or even violence, against such groups have sometimes failed in the past because the law provided only for the protection of individuals, but not of groups.

It would, therefore, in the opinion of the Preparatory Commission for the International Refugee Organization, be desirable that municipal laws should contain adequate safeguards against discrimination, incitement to, and advocacy of, discrimination against individuals or groups of individuals.

2. Nationality

The Preparatory Commission for the International Refugee Organization welcomes the provision that “everyone has a right to a nationality” (Articles 18, Doc. E/CN.4/21, Annex F).

The Preparatory Commission feels, however, that this provision requires implementation. Reference is made in this connection to Article 32, para. 2 of the Draft prepared by the Division of Human Rights of the United Nations Secretariat (Doc. E/CN.4/AC.1/11), which provides for an effective implementation of the right to nationality.

The embodiment of this principle in the national laws of all States would lead to the gradual elimination of statelessness only if at the same time loss of nationality by unilateral act of the State, or of the individual, without simultaneous acquisition of a new nationality, were to be prohibited.

It is submitted that the incorporation of these rules, desirable as they may be, must depend on the conclusion of an International Convention on Human Rights and its effective enforcement.

In the interim period, there will still exist a class of persons who are stateless in law or in fact, and who, in consequence, do not enjoy the protection of any Government. The protection by the Government of nationality, both within national territory, and abroad through diplomatic and consular representatives, is, however, the most effective safeguard of human rights and fundamental freedoms.

The Preparatory Commission for the International Refugee Organization therefore considers it essential that any International Bill of Human Rights (Declaration or Convention) be supplemented by a clause which would establish the right of unprotected persons to the benefits of protection by an International Authority. Such protection should be similar to that exercised by national governments.

In consequence, the Preparatory Commission for the International Refugee Organization wishes to submit, for the consideration of the Commission on Human Rights, the following principles concerning nationality:

Every person has a right to a nationality.

Every person shall be entitled to the nationality of the State where he is born, unless and until, on attaining majority, he declares for the nationality open to him under the law of another State.

All persons who do not enjoy the protection of any State shall be placed under the protection of an International Organization established by the United Nations.

3. Migration: Expulsion: Right of Asylum

Persons coming within the mandate of the Preparatory Commission for the International Refugee Organization have suffered most severely from migration restrictions. Their position is furthermore frequently endangered by the exercise against them of the right of expulsion, and by the threat of expulsion.

For persons who had to flee from their country of origin or residence, owing to persecution or discrimination, or to fear of such persecution or discrimination, the right of asylum is of paramount importance.

The Preparatory Commission for the International Refugee Organization notes with satisfaction that the right of free movement within the State, the right of migration, problems relating to expulsion and to the right of asylum have been dealt with in the Draft Declaration on Human Rights (Articles [4] 13, 14, 19, Annex F, Doc. E/CN.4/21), and the Draft Convention on Human Rights (Article 5, Doc. E/CN.4/21, Annex G).

Provision for a fair hearing in cases of expulsion (Article 19, Annex F) would, however, in the opinion of the Preparatory Commission for the International Refugee Organization, not be an adequate safeguard against arbitrary expulsion. The Preparatory Commission for the International Refugee Organization is, on the other hand, aware that too stringent restriction of the right of expulsion might make States more reluctant to admit aliens to their territories.

While Article 14 Annex F lays down the right to escape persecution, the corresponding right of asylum is provided for only as a right of the State and not as a right of the individual. The Preparatory Commission for the International Refugee Organization is aware of the considerations of national policy and of security which may render difficult the granting to the individual of an unconditional right of asylum. It is hoped, however, that the Commission on Human Rights will deem it possible to consider the embodiment of the principle of the right of asylum of certain classes of individuals.

The Preparatory Commission for the International Refugee Organization wishes to submit the following suggestions with regard to emigration, expulsion and asylum for the consideration of the Commission on Human Rights:

Every person who is not subject to any lawful deprivation of liberty, or to any outstanding obligations with regard to national service, shall be free to leave any country, including his own.

Aliens shall be expelled only under conditions laid down by law, and provided that another State is willing to receive them in its territory.

No alien who has been born or educated in the State where he resides, or has been admitted to his territory for an indefinite period, may be expelled therefrom, except in pursuance of a judicial decision, or recommendation, as a punishment for offences laid down by law as warranting expulsion.

Religious, racial or political refugees shall be granted asylum, provided, however, that the right of asylum shall not be granted to political refugees whose opinions are inconsistent with the aims and objects of the United Nations.

Summary Record of the Tenth Meeting [of the First Session of the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination
and Protection of Minorities]

Held at the Palais des Nations, Geneva, on Monday,
1 December 1947 at 10 a.m.

Present: Chairman: Mr. E. E. Ekstrand (Sweden). Vice-Chairman: Mr. Hérard Roy (Haiti).
Rapporteur: Mr. Nisot (Belgium). Members: Mr. W. M. J. McNamara (Australia);

Dr. C. H. Wu (China); Mr. Arthur Meneses P. (Ecuador); Mr. Samuel Spanien (France); Mr. M. R. Masani (India); Mr. Rezazada Shafaq (Iran); Mr. A. P. Borisov (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics); Miss Elizabeth Monroe (United Kingdom); Mr. J. Daniels (United States of America). Representative of the Commission on the Status of Women: Mme. Lefauchaux. Specialized Agencies: Mr. Rodolphe Lopes (ILO). International Non-Governmental Organizations: Mr. Bienenfeld, Mr. G.M. Riegner (World Jewish Congress); Mr. A.G. Brotman (Co-ordinating Board of Jewish Organizations). Secretariat: Mr. Edward Lawson; Mr. Emile Giraud; Mr. A. H. Hekimi.

THE CHAIRMAN said that in future Professor J. P. Humphrey would be attending the meetings of the Commission on Human Rights and he thanked him for his assistance on behalf of the members of the Sub-Commission.

Article 36

He suggested that the Sub-Commission should finish the discussion of Article 36 at that session.

MR. MASANI (India) proposed that the words “and script” be added after the word “language” in line 6.

THE CHAIRMAN put Mr. Masani’s motion to the vote. The motion was adopted unanimously.

MR. SHAFaq (Iran) said that, in his opinion, the Commission on Human Rights did not desire to encourage a spirit of linguistic or racial isolation among the nations. He had suggested, for this reason, that the words “well defined” be added before the word “ethnic”, as contained in his written proposal (document CHR/INF.9).

MR. DANIELS (United States of America) supported Mr. Shafaq’s proposal in principle. He pointed out, however, that the right of language seemed to him to be the only right enumerated in Mr. Shafaq’s proposal which was not guaranteed elsewhere in the Bill.

THE CHAIRMAN welcomed Mr. Meneses (the Representative of Ecuador) to the Commission.

MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that, as a point of order, Article 36 was concerned only with rights. In his opinion, Mr. Shafaq’s proposal contained definitions of minorities which in his view could not be adopted prior to the discussion on the problem of minorities. He proposed that the Sub-Commission should adopt the text of Article 36 as drafted.<sup>4</sup>

MR. MASANI (India) suggested that the word “minorities” might be replaced by the word “groups”.

MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that, in his opinion, this amendment was not a motion of order, and did not affect his proposal.<sup>5</sup>

MR. SPANIEN (France) said that if the Sub-Commission later agreed upon a different definition of minorities, it would then be possible to alter the text of Article 36.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote Mr. Borisov's motion that Article 36 should be voted on immediately and independently of Mr. Shafaq's proposal. There were five votes in favour, six against, and one abstention.

DR. WU (China) reserved the right later to propose an amendment.

MISS MONROE (United Kingdom) said that she agreed with the proposal to replace the word "minorities" by the word "groups". She said that she supported Mr. Shafaq's proposal to add the words "if they chose to do so" at the end of the Article. She supported a suggestion that the word "persons" should be replaced by the word "nationals". She considered that the words "established historical evidence" were too vague and added nothing to the words "ethnic, linguistic or religious minorities".

MR. NISOT (Belgium) said that he supported Mr. Shafaq's proposal to introduce the word "groups". He had suggested that the word "persons" should be replaced by the word "nationals", as all relevant treaties had only been concerned with nationals.

MR. MASANI (India) said that he supported Mr. Shafaq's proposal to introduce the word "groups" and that he had no objection to Mr. Nisot's proposal to use the word "nationals".

MR. MCNAMARA (Australia) suggested four alterations. First, to delete the words "a substantial number". He considered that the rights contained in the Article should be granted even to a [4] small numerical group. Secondly, to delete the words "as far as compatible with public order". He considered that this condition could be abused by a dictator government. Thirdly, to add the words "on the basis of loyalty to the State, of which they are resident members" after the words "shall have the right". Fourthly, to add the words "where they have not a practicable facility in the official language" before the words "before the courts".

MR. DANIELS (United States of America) said that he considered Mr. Shafaq's proposal denied those rights to groups which were not "well defined".

MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that he would not comment on Mr. Shafaq's proposal, but made the following comments on the present text.<sup>6</sup> First, to add in line 1 the words "and nationality" after the word "race" as contained in Article 6. Secondly, to add the word "national" after the word "ethnic". Thirdly, to delete the words "as far as compatible with public order". He also considered that a government could abuse this condition.<sup>7</sup> Fourthly, to add at the end of the Article words to the effect that “the government has the duty to establish conditions permitting a minority to practice effectively their rights, both by the use of State funds and by the creation of an autonomy”. He considered that this provided a guarantee that a State would effectively secure the rights granted to a minority. Referring to Mr. Shafaq’s proposal, he reserved the right later to make comments.

MR. MENESES (Ecuador) said that he did not support the replacement of the word “minorities” by the word “groups”. He wished to retain the word “persons”, as he considered that the rights of the individual were the most important. He supported [5] the two proposals; first, to delete the words “as far as compatible with public order”; secondly, to add the words “if they chose to do so”.

MR. MASANI (India) said that, in his opinion, both the proposals referring to “public order” and “basis of loyalty” could provide a government with opportunities for abuse.

DR. WU (China) suggested that the proposers of the various amendments might be able to draft a single text.

MR. SPANIEN (France) proposed adding after the word “minorities”, in line 2 of Mr. Shafaq’s proposal, the words “having the wish to benefit from a special status”. He thought that it was important to consider the conditions of a group of persons who wished to be included in community.

MISS MONROE (United Kingdom) said that, in her opinion, the Sub-Commission had not yet agreed upon the object of Article 36. This object could be either that rights be granted to groups in the same manner as to individuals, or that no rights should be granted to groups as the rights already granted to individuals were adequate.

MR. MCNAMARA (Australia) felt that Mr. Shafaq’s proposal added restrictions and were fundamentally different from his.

MISS MONROE (United Kingdom) said, in answer to Mr. Meneses (Ecuador) that she considered that other Articles had already granted rights to individuals, and that the object of Article 36 was to grant rights to groups. She proposed a motion that an Article establishing minority rights, in addition to individual rights, should be discussed.

MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) again said that the question of the definition of minorities should [6] not be raised at that time. He suggested that Article 36, as drafted by the Drafting Committee, should be voted upon<sup>8</sup> by the Sub-Commission. He suggested that Article 36 would have no object, if it was considered that only individuals, and not groups, existed.<sup>9</sup>

MR. DANIELS (United States of America) considered that Article 36 might later prove to be unnecessary.

MISS MONROE (United Kingdom) proposed that no single text be discussed until the Sub-Commission had agreed on the basic definition of "protection of minorities".

MR. MENESES (Ecuador) said that, in his opinion, it was not possible to distinguish between the rights of individuals and the rights of groups composed of individuals.

THE CHAIRMAN proposed the immediate establishment of a Sub-Committee to draft a single text. There was no opposition to his further proposal that the members should be Mr. Shafaq (Iran), Miss Monroe (United Kingdom), Mr. McNamara (Australia) and Mr. Spanien (France).

MR. MASANI (India) proposed that the Sub-Committee should attempt to agree upon the amendments, if they were not able to agree upon a text.

Summary Record of Eleventh Meeting [of the First Session of the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination
and Protection of Minorities]

Held at the Palais des Nations, Geneva, on Monday
1 December 1947 at 3.05 p.m.

Present: Chairman: Mr. E. E. Ekstrand (Sweden). Vice-Chairman: Mr. Hérard Roy (Haiti). Rapporteur: Mr. Joseph Nisot (Belgium). Members: Mr. W. M. J. McNamara (Australia); Dr. C. H. Wu (China); Mr. Meneses (Ecuador); Mr. J. Daniels (United States of America); Mr. Samuel Spanien (France); Mr. M. R. Masani (India); Mr. Rezazada Shafaq (Iran); Miss Elizabeth Monroe (United Kingdom); Mr. A. P. Borisov (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics). Representative of the Commission on the Status of Women: Mme. Lefauchaux. Specialized Agencies: Mr. Rodolphe Lopes (ILO). International Non-Governmental Organizations: Mr. F. R. Bienenfeld (World Jewish Congress); Mr. A. G. Brotman (Co-ordinating Board of Jewish Organizations). Secretariat: Prof. J. P. Humphrey; Mr. Edward Lawson; Mr. Emile Giraud; Mr. A. H. Hekimi.

THE CHAIRMAN congratulated the members of the Committee of Four on the expeditious manner in which they had performed their task and invited Mr. Shafaq to report on the Committee's work.

MR. SHAFaq (Iran) stated that the three members of the Committee; Miss Monroe, Mr. Spanien, and himself had agreed on the following text: "In States inhabited by well defined ethnic, linguistic or religious groups which are clearly distinguished from the rest of the population and which want to be accorded differential treatment, citizens belonging to such groups shall have the right as far as is compatible with public order and security to establish and maintain their schools and cultural or religious institutions, and to use their own language and script in the press, in public assembly and before the courts and authorities of the State, if they so choose." He added that Mr. McNamara, being unable to give his support to this text, had submitted a number of amendments.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that Mr. Borisov had also submitted amendments to the text of Article 36 as it appeared in document E/CN.4/21. These amendments did not refer therefore to the text proposed by the Committee of Four and would be discussed later. He considered that, as Mr. McNamara's text was furthest removed from the original, it should be discussed first.

MR. McNAMARA (Australia) stated that the amendments he had proposed to the Committee's text were as follows:

1. Delete the words "well defined".
2. Delete the words "which are clearly distinguished from the rest of the population and which want to be accorded differential treatment".

[3]

3. Replace the word "citizens" by "persons".
4. Delete the words "as far as is compatible with public order and security."

He thought it would be illogical for the Sub-Commission to restrict the rights and that was the justification for his amendments. The least dangerous of those parts of the Committee's text to which he objected was the expression "well defined" but any restriction would be contrary to the spirit which should actuate the Sub-Commission and also to the spirit of the Declaration. He recalled that during the discussion of the right to emigrate and change nationality Miss Monroe had been opposed to any restriction in that field, whereas he himself had recognized certain restrictions on the grounds of security. He noted that Miss Monroe now accepted the ideas he wished to delete by his amendments 1 and 4, because he feared that Governments might find it too easy to take advantage of this text for the purpose of restricting the rights in question. The Sub-Commission's desire, on the other hand, seemed to be actually to extend these rights, particularly insofar as freedom of religious opinions was concerned.

MR. MASANI (India) approved the text of the majority of the Committee, except as regards the phrase "which want to be accorded differential treatment". This expression implied the desire of a minority to obtain privileges, whereas in point of fact, the Sub-Commission only wished to assume equality of rights for all the groups of the community. He proposed an amendment to replace “to be accorded differential treatment” by “to be treated as such”.

MR. SPANIEN (France) took it that Mr. Masani did not wish to accord privileged treatment to minorities. In his view the words “to be treated as such”, if their object was to accord equal rights to all sections of the community, did not represent an improvement of the kind desired by the author of the amendment. Replying to the observation made by Mr. McNamara, he pointed out that he had been in agreement with Miss Monroe on the principles of liberty of movement and expatriation, as at that time the Sub-Commission had been engaged in defining a principle, whereas now it was dealing with discriminations. In his view the protection of minorities could only be a temporary thing, the aim being complete non-discrimination. If in the matter of non-discrimination there could be no reservations, when it came to minorities, prudence was advisable.

THE CHAIRMAN noted that there was no agreement on the proposed text. He suggested that they should first discuss Mr. McNamara’s amendment, then the amendment of Mr. Masani followed by the others in their logical order. He declared discussion open on Mr. McNamara’s first amendment proposing the deletion of the words “well defined”.

MR. MENESES (Ecuador) shared Mr. McNamara’s wish not to extend restrictions. As regards the words “well defined” which undoubtedly represented a restriction, it would be wise to delete them. He pointed out that in so doing they would be conforming to the Sub-Commission’s intention not to restrict liberties and equality of rights.

THE CHAIRMAN put Mr. McNamara’s amendment to the vote.

Decision: The amendment was rejected by 7 votes to 5. The words “well defined” were thus retained.

MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) wished to know who would define the ethnic, linguistic or religious groups, and who would define whether they were well defined.

THE CHAIRMAN said that in his personal view it was a question of national legislation. He declared the discussion open on Mr. McNamara’s second amendment proposing the deletion of the words “which are clearly distinguished from the rest of the population and which want to be accorded differential treatment”.

MR. DANIELS (United States of America) thought that in the text submitted by the Committee an attempt had been made to give a clearer definition of certain rights and not to restrict them. With regard to Mr. McNamara's second amendment, however, he did not see why certain minorities, which might not desire to be assimilated to the majority of the population, could not enjoy complete equality of all rights.

DR. WU (China) considered that after the rejection of the first amendment, Mr. McNamara's second amendment was superfluous.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the second amendment also contained the phrase "which want to be accorded differential treatment" with regard to which Mr. Masani had submitted an amendment.

DR. WU (China) thought that this phrase was unnecessary, since the text concluded with the words "if they so choose".

MISS MONROE (United Kingdom) pointed out that 35 articles of the proposed text defined a large number of rights and she therefore thought it inadvisable for Article 36 to contain a large number of restrictions.

[6]

THE CHAIRMAN observed that Mr. McNamara's second amendment contained two phrases:

1. "which are clearly distinguished from the rest of the population";
2. "which want to be accorded differential treatment".

He proposed that they should discuss these two phrases one after the other.

MR. MENESES (Ecuador) found it somewhat difficult to decide what attitude he should take in connection with the first phrase. He was in favour of deleting it, because it represented a restriction. But on the other hand, he gave due weight to the fact that what precisely characterized a minority was the wish to remain a minority.

MR. McNAMARA (Australia) stated that the retention of the first phrase would be either repetitive or dangerous, for the two reasons given by Mr. Meneses. These words constituted a restriction of the rights of minorities, for instance, that of having their own schools, and led, moreover, to confusion.

The Sub-Commission

Decided: To reject the first part of the amendment, by 6 votes to 5 with one abstention.

The words "which are clearly distinguished from the rest of the population" were retained.

THE CHAIRMAN announced that besides the second part of Mr. McNamara's second amendment there was an amendment by Mr. Masani.

[7]

The Sub-Commission

Decided: To reject the second part of Mr. McNamara's amendment, by 6 votes to 3 with 3 abstentions. The words "which want to be accorded differential treatment" were thus retained.

THE CHAIRMAN called attention to Mr. Masani's amendment to replace the words "to be accorded differential treatment" by "to be treated as such".

MR. ROY (Haiti) pointed out that the difference between the text proposed by the Committee and that of Mr. Masani was purely formal. In the mere matter of a restriction it was difficult to adopt one amendment rather than another. He personally preferred the Committee's text.

MR. MASANI (India) remarked that the French translation of his text might give rise to difficulties. It would be better therefore in the French text to replace the words "régime particulier" by "traitement différentiel"; but in English the word "différentiel" had a restrictive sense. He asked if it would be possible to keep the word "différentiel" in the French text, and to retain the initial wording in the English.

THE CHAIRMAN stated that it was impossible to comply with this request since the Sub-Commission had to adopt a single text, the other being a translation.

MR. ROY (Haiti) remarked that the words "traités comme tels" were meaningless in French.

[8]

THE CHAIRMAN asked whether to facilitate a solution, Mr. Masani could not see his way to accepting the text proposed by the Committee.

MR. MASANI (India) upheld his amendment because he thought it clearer.

MR. MENESES (Ecuador), without wishing to add to the confusion of the discussion, thought that the text lacked clarity. The Sub-Commission ought not to stress the fact that ethnic groups should enjoy equal rights, but that these rights should be accorded them. He therefore proposed that the "bénéficiaire d'un régime particulier", be replaced by "se voient accorder un traitement différentiel".

THE CHAIRMAN proposed that a simultaneous vote be taken on the texts proposed by Mr. Masani and by the Committee. Members could declare themselves in favour of one or the other.

The Sub-Commission

Decided: To retain the Committee's text, Mr. Masani's amendment obtaining 4 votes and that of the Committee 7, there being 1 abstention.

THE CHAIRMAN asked members to express their views on the amendment to this text submitted by Mr. Meneses.

MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) thought the text was not clear. He did not see how<sup>10</sup> it was possible for man, whatever the race, religion, language or ethnic group to which he belonged, not to wish to be treated on an equal footing with other groups in the community. He did not understand the [9] phrase proposed by Mr. Meneses.

MISS MONROE (United Kingdom) supported Mr. Meneses's amendment.

MR. SHAFaq (Iran) saw no objection to the amendment since it was an improvement on the restriction.

THE CHAIRMAN, since there appeared to be no opposition to the proposed text, thought it unnecessary to take a vote.

MR. McNAMARA (Australia) and MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) asked for their abstention to be put on record.<sup>11</sup>

MISS MONROE (United Kingdom), in reply to Mr. Borisov, stated that she could very well imagine a man wishing to obtain differential treatment.

THE CHAIRMAN put Mr. McNamara's third amendment to the vote.

The Sub-Commission

Decided: To adopt the amendment, by 6 votes to 5 with one abstention. The word "persons" was substituted for "citizens".

THE CHAIRMAN declared discussion open on Mr. McNamara's fourth amendment.

DR. WU (China) was unable to accept the proposed deletion, but submitted an amendment to replace the words "as far as is compatible with public order and security" by "in accordance with the purposes and principles of the United Nations Charter".

MR. McNAMARA (Australia) accepted this proposal and withdrew his amendment.

MISS MONROE (United Kingdom) noted that the Sub-Commission desired to impose limits on certain groups to which it wished to grant the rights provided in Article 36. Dr. Wu's amendment made the limits as wide as possible, since the Sub-Commission was unable to do anything contrary to the purposes and principles of the Charter. She could not therefore accept Dr. Wu's amendment.

[10]

MR. McNAMARA (Australia) announced that on reflection and following Miss Monroe's statement he felt compelled to re-introduce his amendment.

MR. SPANIEN (France) pointed out that the matter at issue was one coming under the sovereignty of the State. It was for that reason that the Committee of Four had felt obliged to make a reservation covering anything likely to reduce that sovereignty.

THE CHAIRMAN put Dr. Wu's amendment to the vote.

The Sub-Commission

Decided: To reject the amendment, by 7 votes to 2 with 3 abstentions.

MR. ROY (Haiti) stated that he had abstained because he could not vote against the purposes and principles of the Charter.

THE CHAIRMAN put Mr. McNamara's fourth amendment to the vote.

The Sub-Commission

Decided: To reject the amendment, by 6 votes to 5 with 1 abstention. The words "as far as is compatible with public order and security" were retained.

THE CHAIRMAN declared discussion open on the part of the text proposed by the Committee which read: "to establish and maintain their schools and cultural or religious institutions, and to use their own language and script in the press, in public assembly and before the courts and other authorities of the State, if they so choose".

MR. ROY (Haiti) regarded the last words "if they so choose" as redundant, since the matter in question was a right, which might or might not be used, and not a duty. He proposed an amendment to the effect that those words be deleted.

MR. SPANIEN (France) pointed out that it would be well to retain the words in order to facilitate the administration of justice. To allow a plaintiff to plead in a language other than the official one might be a source of obstruction.

THE CHAIRMAN put Mr. Roy's amendment to the vote.

The Sub-Commission

Decided: To reject the amendment, by 5 votes to 5 with 2 abstentions. The original text was retained.

THE CHAIRMAN asked the Director of the Human Rights Division to read the text in the form in which it had emerged from the discussion, and on which members would be asked to vote.

PROF. HUMPHREY (Secretariat) read out the following text: "In States inhabited by well defined ethnic, linguistic or religious groups which are clearly distinguished from the rest of the population and which want to be accorded differential treatment, persons belonging to such groups shall have the right as far as is compatible with public order and security to establish and maintain their schools and cultural or religious institutions, and to use their own language and script in the press, in public assembly and before the courts and other authorities of the State, if they so choose."

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that three members of the Committee of Four had submitted the text “provided that ‘established historical evidence’ be one of the criteria for distinguishing ethnic or linguistic groups”.

At the request of Mr. Roy, he explained that this reservation reflected the opinion of three members of the Committee, not that of the Sub-Commission.

MR. ROY (Haiti) thought that in that case the matter should be discussed.

MR. DANIELS (United States of America) emphasized that the text to be voted on was an important article in the Declaration. He declared his desire to protect genuine minorities and pointed out that he had made formal proposals to that end. The Sub-Commission had defined minorities and their rights up to a point but the text of Article 36 as just read out contained only a cursory definition of the concept of minorities. He believed that this concept differed in Europe and the United States. To define a minority moreover was a task of the very greatest difficulty. Article 36 placed a very considerable limitation on the rights of a linguistic or religious group and on application of these rights even within a minority. The Sub-Commission did not appear to have realized that the wording of the Article was too narrow to protect genuine minorities and too wide to prevent extension of the rights to fictitious minorities. He therefore found it impossible to accept the text.

MISS MONROE (United Kingdom) was impressed by the serious warning given by Mr. Daniels. She admitted the subject was one of great difficulty; but she was sorry Mr. Daniels’ attitude was purely negative. She would like to know what points Mr. Daniels could give his consent to.

MR. SHAFaq (Iran) did not think the article in question raised the problem of a definition of minorities. In any case, that problem would be dealt with at another time. He did not think Mr. Daniels’ apprehensions were justified.

MR. McNAMARA (Australia) shared Mr. Daniels’ views with regard to the Sub-Commission’s task. The Commission would have to continue the study of the documents, and it would then realize that the Sub-Commission had merely outlined a definition of the concept of a minority. It would be a pity if the text proposed for Article 36 were rejected. Members who did not approve of the text might abstain from voting. That would enable the Sub-Commission to submit a text to the Human Rights Commission, which would consider the necessity of taking into account the opinions of an important minority of members of the Sub-Commission.

MR. NISOT (Belgium) said he would vote against the text because the application of the article was not reserved for “citizens” alone.

MR. DANIELS (United States of America), replying to Miss Monroe, explained that he was against the text because it was drafted in a negative form, which resulted in an appreciable limitation of rights, particularly of those granted in other articles of the Declaration. The text was an attempt to establish a definition of the concept of a minority before the Sub-Commission had even started to discuss the subject.

MR. MENESES (Ecuador) agreed with the views expressed by Mr. Daniels and Mr. McNamara. It was too soon to attempt to define a minority, although the text spoke only of groups. In his opinion, the text was not complete.

MISS MONROE (United Kingdom) said she would abstain from voting for the same reasons as Mr. Nisot had given for his decision to vote against the text. To grant the same rights to foreigners as to nationals might result in persons who already enjoyed rights granted by one Government attempting to enjoy rights granted by other Governments also.

DR. WU (China) also thought that the Sub-Commission should not attempt to define the concept of a minority, That question would be discussed when other articles were examined.

MR. MASANI (India) said he agreed with the text but for the word “persons”, which had been substituted for “citizens”.

MR. NISOT (Belgium) added that the drafting was such that the text was equally applicable to the majority and to the numerical minority of a population.

MR. SPANIEN (France) did not think those objections need interfere with the Sub-Commission’s work. As a member of the Committee of Four, he would, however, abstain for the same reasons as Miss Monroe. The Sub-Commission had decided at its morning meeting that the definition of minorities would be discussed later in connection with some other article, and had reserved the right to revert to the text of Article 36 if subsequent discussion of a definition made it necessary.

THE CHAIRMAN confirmed that point. He proposed the meeting should start discussing the reservation made by three members of the Committee of Four.

MR. DANIELS (United States of America) regarded that reservation as a fresh attempt to define minorities.

MR. NISOT (Belgium) wished to know what was meant by the words “established historical evidence”. Did they refer to a group which had been established in a country for a long time, or to a group which had for a long time enjoyed a privileged position?

MR. MASANI (India) thought that the fact that the three members in question wished to make a reservation did not necessarily mean that the other members of the Sub-Commission had to share it.

MR. ROY (Haiti) pointed out that the reservation in question had not been retained in the text of Article 36.

THE CHAIRMAN said that the reservation would be maintained in the report as being the opinion of the three members of the Committee.

DR. WU (China) wished to associate himself with these three members.

THE CHAIRMAN declared the discussion open on Article 36 as given in document E/CN.4/21, and the amendments to it proposed by Mr. Borisov.

MR. MASANI (India) pointed out that Mr. Borisov's second amendment, to the effect that the words "in so far as compatible with the public order" be excluded, had been retained when the previous text had been discussed. Further, the Sub-Commission had decided to retain that text. Therefore, only Mr. Borisov's first and third amendments remained to be considered.

THE CHAIRMAN replied that the texts were different and should therefore be discussed. He proposed that they should start by examining Mr. Borisov's first amendment to the effect that the word "nationality" be inserted after the word "race", and the word "national" after the word "ethnic". These amendments could, of course, only stand if Article 36 in document 4/21 were itself adopted.

MR. MCNAMARA (Australia) thought that some members had a different idea of the concept of "nationality". Mr. Borisov appeared to interpret it as meaning the citizenship of a State. He would suggest that instead of "nationality" the words "of national origin" be adopted. That would prevent any confusion, as those words had already been adopted in some earlier articles.

MR. MASANI (India) thought the question raised by Mr. Borisov was covered by the words "race" and "ethnic". The difficulty arose from the fact that Mr. Borisov was only considering the case of a multi-national State. By adopting the words "national origin", it could be made clear that this concept was included in that covered by the terms "race" and "ethnic".

MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) explained that his idea of the concept "national" was the same as that given to this term in Article 6 by the majority of members.<sup>12</sup>

MR. MCNAMARA (Australia) could not accept Mr. Masani's proposal, which made no distinction between "race" and "national origin".

[17]

The French emigrants in Canada, for instance, were of the same race as the Canadians, but were not of the same national origin. To give equal rights to Canadians and French Canadians, the words "national origin" must necessarily be included.

MR. DANIELS (United States of America) said he would accept the word "national" proposed by Mr. Borisov, provided it was given the sense of "national origin".

MR. MASANI (India) pointed out that by accepting the words “national origin”, the Sub-Commission would not avoid difficulties over the use of the word “nationality”.

MR. MENESES (Ecuador) remarked that if the Commission accepted the word “nationality” in the sense of “national origin” he did not see why it was necessary to retain the term “nationality”.

MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) stated that he agreed to the replacement of the term “nationality” by “national origin”, but that, for reasons of Russian grammar, it would be better to retain the adjective “national” in the enumeration of minorities. Nevertheless he was prepared to assign the sense of “national origin” to this term also.<sup>13</sup>

MISS MONROE (United Kingdom) opposed the use both of the term “national origin” and of the term “nationality”.

MR. MCNAMARA (Australia) proposed that the terms “ethnic, linguistic or religious” should be deleted, since those three qualifications were covered by the term “national”, used in the sense of “national origin”.

MR. SPANIEN (France) pointed out that just as Article 6 was of general application and admitted no exceptions, so Article 36 called for the protection of specific groups and advocated certain restrictions in the exercise of these rights. If in the case of French legislation, the words “national origin” meant that naturalized citizens would regard themselves as a minority on the grounds that they were of different national origin, he would vote against the words “national origin”.

MR. DANIELS (United States of America) requested that a vote be taken.

THE CHAIRMAN recalled that Mr. Borisov had agreed to the replacement of the word “nationality” by “national origin”, which would be inserted in the text after “race”.

Decision: Mr. Borisov’s amendment was adopted by six votes to five, with one abstention.

THE CHAIRMAN recalled that Mr. Borisov had also proposed that the word “national” used as an adjective, should be inserted after “ethnic”.

MR. MCNAMARA (Australia) believed that Mr. Borisov’s objection would be overcome by omitting all the qualifying adjectives: “ethnic”, “linguistic” and “religious”.

MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) asked members not to try to interpret his opinion in a different way from himself. He could not agree to the deletion of these adjectives, which were intended to define the minority groups to which rights should be extended. The adjective “national” was employed here, in his opinion, in the same sense as in Article 6 and in Article 36, line 1. The omission of these adjectives would detract from the clearness of the text.<sup>14</sup>

[19]

THE CHAIRMAN called for a vote on the second part of Mr. Borisov’s first amendment.

Decision: Mr. Borisov’s amendment was adopted by six votes to five, with one abstention.

THE CHAIRMAN stated that the purpose of Mr. Borisov’s second amendment was to exclude the words: “as far as is compatible with public order”. As the principle involved had already been discussed, he thought the Sub-Commission could proceed to a vote.

MR. MCNAMARA (Australia), on a point of order, observed that the phrase differed from that employed in Mr. Shafaq’s amendment. The amendment did not contain the term “public security”.

MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) pointed out that experience had shown that measures taken nominally to ensure public order often concealed large-scale restrictions and discriminations. He considered it necessary to delete these words.

THE CHAIRMAN put Mr. Borisov’s amendment to the vote.

Decision: The amendment was adopted by seven votes to five.

THE CHAIRMAN declared the meeting open for discussion on Mr. Borisov’s third amendment, the purpose of which was to append to Article 36 the sentence “the Government has the duty to establish conditions permitting the minorities to practice effectively their rights (both by the use of State funds and by the creation of an autonomy, etc.)”.

MR. MCNAMARA (Australia) stated that many States had already gone a long way in the direction of allowing minorities to organize schools such as those in which teaching was carried on in the language of certain minorities; he could not, however, accept [20] this amendment, since it would compel States to initiate action in the matter.

MR. MENESES (Ecuador) opposed the amendment because in his view the object should be to encourage assimilation and not to promote the creation of minority groups.

THE CHAIRMAN was in favour of the amendment because it would serve to protect minorities.

MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) explained that he had made this proposal with the object of compelling the governments to intensify their efforts<sup>15</sup> to create conditions in which minorities could develop, and to make the rights of such minorities effective, in particular by measures backed<sup>16</sup> by financial aid from the State.<sup>17</sup>

MR. SPANIEN (France) stated that he would vote against the amendment in view of Article 2, paragraph 7 of the Charter, which stated that “Nothing contained in the present Charter shall authorize the United Nations to intervene in matters which are essentially within the jurisdiction of any state”. France did not set aside public funds for private education. Whilst favouring the widest possible protection of minorities he could not agree to a modification of France’s national and democratic standpoint, in consequence of which the law would be an expression of the opinion of a minority of the population.

MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) wished, before a vote was taken, to reply to Mr. Spanien’s argument. He did not see how it would interfere with the sovereignty of the French State if the latter earmarked part of its public funds for the protection of minorities, or for ensuring equality of treatment<sup>18</sup> for them as regards education.

MR. SPANIEN (France) replied that public education was organized in conformity with a law. There were State schools of all types maintained by the public finances. If a religious group, for instance, wished to organize special instruction it was perfectly free to do so at its own expense.

MR. SHAFaq (Iran), raising a point of order, reminded members that the Chairman had declared the discussion closed.

DR. WU (China) stated that he would vote against the proposal. He was not opposed to the principle of the State’s subsidizing special education for any minority as was done in China for instance. But he could not accept the principle that the State was under an obligation to do so.

THE CHAIRMAN put Mr. Borisov’s third amendment to the vote.

Decision: The amendment was rejected by ten votes to two.

THE CHAIRMAN reminded members that they had to choose between two texts: first, that proposed by Mr. Shafaq on behalf of the Committee of Four, as amended

by the Sub-Commission, which was designed to replace Article 36, and, secondly, the amended text of the original Article.

Decision: The text prepared by the Committee of Four was adopted by six votes to four, with two abstentions.

MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) stated that he had abstained, and reserved the right to express his opinion on the text adopted, at a later stage.

THE CHAIRMAN stated that Article 36 in document E/CN.4/21 had been rejected and replaced by the text proposed by the Committee of Four, as amended by the Sub-Commission. This text was [22] as follows: "In States inhabited by well defined ethnic, linguistic or religious groups which are clearly distinguished from the rest of the population and which want to be accorded differential treatment, persons belonging to such groups shall have the right as far as is compatible with public order and security to establish and maintain their schools and cultural or religious institutions, and to use their own language or script in the press, in public assembly and before the courts and other authorities of the State, if they so choose."

MR. SPANIEN (France) stated that he had voted for the text because he had assisted in its drafting in the Committee of Four and because he felt that it was preferable to the original text of Article 36. He pointed out, however, that the Sub-Commission could review this text if later discussion in regard to the definition of the concept "minority" made it necessary. In any case he reserved his decision entirely, in company with Miss Monroe and Mr. Shafaq, as to the replacement of the term "citizens" by "persons".

Brotman (Co-ordinating Board of Jewish Organizations); Mr. F. R. Bienenfeld (World Jewish Congress); Mr. C. Pilloud (International Red Cross Committee); Miss Louise C. A. van Eeghen (International Council of Women). Secretariat: Professor J. P. Humphrey; Mr. Edward Lawson.

1. Opening of the Session

THE CHAIRMAN opened the twenty-third meeting of the Commission on Human Rights, and apologized for the delay which had been occasioned by her unavoidable absence the day before. She then suggested that the Commission should hold its meetings from 10 a.m. to 1 p.m. and from 3 p.m. to 6 p.m., which was unanimously accepted.

2. Adoption of the Agenda (Document E/CN.4/22/Rev.2.)

THE CHAIRMAN presented the provisional Agenda to the Commission and asked for observations upon it.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) opposed the inclusion in the revised Agenda of the documents appearing in brackets after Item 5, with the exception of Document E/CN.4/21, which was, in his opinion, an integral part of the [3] Item. In view of the heavy Agenda and the limited time at the disposal of the Commission he felt that the necessary consideration could not be given to these documents, which included a memorandum on Trade Union Rights, not previously submitted to the representatives. In his opinion, the question of Trade Union Rights was a very important one, having a direct bearing on the lives of tens of millions of people. He felt that the Commission's efforts should be devoted to the items in the original Agenda and that a decision as to whether or not to include consideration of new documents should be deferred meantime.

PROFESSOR HUMPHREY (Director of the Human Rights Division), at the request of the Chairman, explained that the documents in brackets after the items of the Agenda did not constitute part of the Agenda. They were merely references to the documentation available, and had been placed there for the convenience of the Representatives. A document would become part of the Agenda only if adopted as a basis for discussion of a particular item.

MR. RIBNIKAR (Yugoslavia) said that it appeared to him that the documents mentioned in Item 5 fell into three categories:

- 1) those referring to a Bill of Rights,
- 2) those referring to an International Convention, and
- 3) those referring to Trade Union Rights.

He suggested that the third category should form a separate item in the Agenda.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) felt that Professor Humphrey's explanation would be perfectly satisfactory if Document E/CN.4/21 did not appear in brackets after Item 5. He thought that the Commission should confine itself under Item 5 to discussion of the Drafting Committee's Report, [4] the other documents being for information only. In his opinion Trade Union Rights should not form part of Item 5. He felt the Commission should be free to decide at a later date whether or not to insert a separate item in the Agenda on this question.

THE CHAIRMAN asked if Representatives would like to add a new item to the Agenda entitled "Trade Union Rights", as suggested by the Representative of Yugoslavia.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) said he believed it was the intention of the Commission to constitute, as soon as practicable, Committees to deal with special subjects. He therefore felt it might be a means of expediting their work to establish a Committee to study, within the framework of the Terms of Reference of the Commission, the question of Trade Union Rights.

MRS. MEHTA (India) was of opinion that the Commission could consider the question of Trade Union Rights only as part of its consideration of the International Bill of Rights, and was therefore opposed to its inclusion as a separate item in the Agenda. MR. CAMPBELL (United Kingdom) supported the views of Mrs. Mehta.

THE CHAIRMAN drew the attention of the Representatives to the Resolution adopted by the Economic and Social Council at its Plenary Session on 24 March 1947 (Document E/CN.4/31, page 26). She felt that the insertion of a separate item to consider Trade Union Rights, as part of the consideration of the International Bill of Rights, would not be incompatible with that Resolution. She also pointed out that the matter had been referred to the Commission by the General Assembly of the United Nations.

MR. CASSIN (France), while of the opinion that the question of Trade Union Rights could not be considered separately from that of the Bill of Rights, felt that the Representatives of India and of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics might both be satisfied if the question were referred to a Committee. [5] The Committee's work should be confined to consideration of material to be inserted in a draft Convention, such as the one received from the Drafting Committee.

MR. KLEKOVKIN (Ukrainian SSR), in view of the importance of the question and of the fact that the Representatives had had a comparatively short time in which to study the relevant documents, proposed that the question of Trade Union Rights should be deleted from Item 5 and inserted as a separate item in the Agenda. It had been argued that the question of Trade Union Rights was closely linked with that of the Bill of Rights. He pointed out that other subjects, such as Freedom of the Press and Protection of Minorities, were equally closely linked and yet appeared as separate items in the Agenda.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) stated that he had no objection to the list of documents appearing after Item 5, as, following the discussion, it was clear that only the Report of the Drafting Committee would be studied in detail. He suggested that a decision as to whether or not a separate item on Trade Union Rights should be inserted in the Agenda should be deferred for a few days, until the Commission had had an opportunity to see whether time permitted them to give adequate consideration to such an important question.

THE CHAIRMAN suggested that the Commission accept the Agenda provisionally, and reconsider later the insertion of a separate item on Trade Union Rights.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) pointed out, however, that Rule 8 of the Rules of Procedure did not allow the Commission to accept the Agenda provisionally.

MR. STEPANENKO (Byelorussian SSR) said that he had not yet received the documents pertaining to Trade Union Rights and [6] was not in a position to express his views on the matter. He therefore opposed the insertion of a separate item regarding Trade Union Rights. He supported Mr. Bogomolov's proposal to defer a decision on the matter for a few days.

THE CHAIRMAN proposed that the Agenda be adopted and pointed out that, according to Rule 9 of the Rules of Procedure, the Commission was free to revise the Agenda later, should it consider this desirable.

MRS. MEHTA (India) supported the Chairman's proposal.

COLONEL HODGSON (Australia) felt it was quite clear from the Resolution of the Economic and Social Council that the Commission should consider Trade Union Rights only insofar as they were related to the Bill of Rights, and, in his opinion, that could be done under Item 5. He agreed with Mr. Bogomolov that Document E/CN.4/21 should be included as an integral part of Item 5, the subsidiary documents remaining in brackets. He supported the Chairman's proposal to adopt the Agenda and felt that, were it considered necessary later, a committee might be established to deal with the subject.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that the Soviet Union Delegation accepted the Chairman's proposal, but reserved its right to return, in accordance with Rule 9 of the Rules of Procedure, to the question of the insertion of a separate item in the Agenda relating to Trade Union Rights.

THE CHAIRMAN declared the Agenda adopted. She then called on Mr. Moderow, Director of the European Office of the United Nations, to address the Commission.

MR. MODEROW (Director of the European Office of the United Nations) welcomed the Representatives to the European Headquarters of the United Nations and assured them that the Administration would do everything possible to supply complete and comprehensive [7] services in order to facilitate the work of the Commission. Unfortunately, budgetary restrictions might limit the services the Administration could provide. He mentioned that strictly limited credits were placed at the disposal of the European Office to provide conference services and it had been suggested at the General Assembly of the United Nations that the danger of overspending these credits should be pointed out to Representatives. He drew attention in particular to the fact that the staff assigned to the Conference from Headquarters had been reduced to a minimum and that, during the period of overlapping of the Conferences, of the Commission on Human Rights and that of the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities, difficulties might arise. He finished by expressing his sincere desire for the success of the Commission in its important task.

THE CHAIRMAN, on behalf of the Representatives, thanked Mr. Moderow. In connection with Item 5 of the Agenda she gave a summary of the stages through which the draft Bill of Human Rights had already passed and through which it had still to go. After the first session of the Commission on Human Rights, a Drafting Committee had been constituted with the task of preparing a preliminary draft of an International Bill of Human Rights. Its draft would be considered by the Commission under Item 5 of the Agenda. The Commission had three main questions to decide:

- (1) Whether there should be a Declaration;
- (2) Whether there should be a Convention; and
- (3) What measures were necessary for implementation of the Convention.<sup>23</sup>

[8]

She pointed out that the Commission's task was to define principles and to give them form but not to prepare a final draft. After the Commission's Report had been sent to Member Governments for their comments, it would be considered at a meeting of the Drafting Committee to be held in the early part of May 1948, and thereafter by the third Session of the Commission on Human Rights in the latter part of May 1948. The Report would then be submitted to the Economic and Social Council at its meeting in July 1948 and, finally, if approved, to the General Assembly of the United Nations in September 1948. It would thus be seen that many stages lay ahead of the Report, and, while it was important that the Commission should lay down the principles, it need not feel that the actual wording was final.

In connection with the Preamble to the Declaration of Rights, she asked the Representatives to take into account both political and literary considerations, in order to have clear cut ideas for discussion. She suggested that it be considered that a subject could best be handled by a Sub-Committee, she hoped that such Sub-Committees would be established.

3. Invitation to the Officers of the Commission on the Status of Women

PROFESSOR HUMPHREY, at the Chairman's request, directed the attention of the Representatives to a Resolution of the Economic and Social Council adopted at its Fourth Session (Document E/437, Resolution 46, Item (f)), which requested the Commission to invite the Officers of the Commission on the Status of Women to be present and participate without voting in its deliberations when sections of the draft of the International Bill of Human Rights concerning the particular rights of women were being considered.

[9]

THE CHAIRMAN, with the concurrence of the Representatives, requested the Secretariat to extend formal invitations to the Officers of the Commission on the Status of Women, in accordance with the Resolution.

4. Communications

PROFESSOR HUMPHREY directed the attention of the Representatives to a Resolution of the Economic and Social Council taken at its Fifth Session (Document E/573; page 20, Resolution 75). In his opinion, that Resolution might involve three distinct steps: (1) consideration of the Resolution of the Council; (2) reception by the Commission of the list of communications prepared by the Secretariat in accordance with the terms of the Resolution; and (3) the appointment of an ad hoc Committee to consider, before the next Session of the Commission, the list of communications. He pointed out that the list could only be distributed to Representatives in a private meeting. He therefore suggested that a meeting be held in private for the time necessary to distribute the list.

THE CHAIRMAN asked if the Representatives were agreeable to having a private meeting the next morning for reception of the list of communications, the meeting being thereafter opened to the public.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said he wished to remind Representatives that, at the Fifth Session of the Economic and Social Council, the Soviet Union Delegation had expressed its views regarding the substance of the communications in question and also regarding the establishment of an ad hoc Committee to study them. The Soviet Union Delegation had felt and still felt, that priority [10] should be given to the consideration of communications from non-self-governing territories and from the largest democratic organizations and that individual communications should not be taken into account. He was therefore opposed to the establishment of an ad hoc Committee for the purpose of studying these communications.

MR. CAMPBELL (United Kingdom) did not agree with the Soviet Union Representative's views. In his opinion there was nothing in the political status of a non-self-governing territory which made petitions from such an area different from petitions received from a self-governing territory, and he felt that no distinction should be made in dealing with them. He directed the attention of the Representatives to the procedure laid down in the Draft Report of the Joint Committee of the Trusteeship Council and the Economic and Social Council for dealing with petitions from Trust territories. The Report had been approved and adopted by the Economic and Social Council and, in his opinion, the Commission should follow the procedure established in that Report.

THE CHAIRMAN thought that the discussion regarding the establishment of an ad hoc Committee should be deferred until the list of communications had been received by Representatives.

The Chairman pointed out that the Economic and Social Council had not directed the Commission to appoint an ad hoc Committee, but only suggested that it might do so. She asked Representatives to study Document E/CN.4/27 which set out in full the Economic and Social Council's resolutions and suggestions on the subject, and suggested that further discussion be deferred until the following morning.

[11]

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) agreed with the Chairman's views regarding postponement of the discussion. He could not agree with the United Kingdom Representative that there was no difference in status between non-self-governing territories and self-governing territories. He maintained that in autonomous territories there existed means of communication, such as the Press, to give information regarding conditions of life, while no such means existed in non-self-governing territories.

MRS. MEHTA (India) did not feel that a general discussion of the subject was necessary. The Commission was asked by the Economic and Social Council to appoint an ad hoc Committee with definite functions. The Commission had not been requested to classify the communications in question.

MR. CAMPBELL (United Kingdom) did not agree with the Soviet Union Representative that no media existed in non-self-governing territories to allow expression of opinion. In such territories administered by the United Kingdom there existed the Press, broadcasting and the right of public assembly in exactly the same way as in self-governing territories.

COL. HODGSON (Australia) fully agreed with the views of the Representative of India. He considered that all that was necessary was that a decision be taken as to whether to appoint an ad hoc Committee, and if so, elect its Members.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) could not agree with the views of the Representatives of India and of Australia. He thought the Resolution of the Economic and Social Council established a procedure of a permanent character, to govern all future meetings [12] of the Commission, and that procedure must be implemented. In his opinion, consideration of communications was a vital part of their task, which was not only to make a Declaration on Human Rights, but to make those Rights a living reality. He proposed that the Commission should establish immediately an ad hoc Committee to meet during the Session. He felt the provision of the Economic and Social Council for private discussion of the subject was a very wise one.

MR. CASSIN (France) said he attached very great importance to the part which the Commission would have to play in connection with petitions. Nevertheless, he supported the postponement of the discussion until the following morning.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) asked if it would be possible for the list of communications to be presented to the Representatives at the afternoon meeting, in order to give time for study before the general discussion.

THE CHAIRMAN said that it would be possible to do as Mr. Bogomolov asked, and it was agreed to hold a closed meeting at 3 p.m. to receive the list of communications, thereafter opening the meeting to the public. She requested the Representatives to give consideration to two points remaining to be decided the following morning:

1. whether to appoint an ad hoc Committee to function before the next Session of the Commission; and

2. whether to appoint an ad hoc Committee to function during the present Session.

5. Report of the Drafting Committee

THE CHAIRMAN reminded Representatives that, at the first session of the Drafting Committee of the Commission, two documents had been produced, a Declaration and a [13] Convention, which were respectively Annexes F and G of the Report. She thought the first question to be decided was whether the Commission should draft a Declaration only, a Convention only, or both, and invited observations on the subject.

MR. RIBNIKAR (Yugoslavia) recalled that, at the first Session of the Commission, most of the Representatives had shared his view that the Declaration of Rights should take the shape of a Resolution by the General Assembly of the United Nations. The Members of the Drafting Committee appeared to have been divided in opinion on the point and had prepared suggestions for a Convention as well as for a Declaration. He felt it would be impossible for the Commission to elaborate all the Articles necessary for a Convention of Human Rights. In his opinion, a Convention was an expression of the will of sovereign States and he therefore proposed that the Draft Conventions contained in Document E/CN.4/21 should be sent to Member Governments for their comments.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) said that, in his opinion, the Yugoslav Representative's argument was not a valid one. The Commission was only preparing a rough draft of a Convention. That draft would have to pass through all the stages enumerated by the Chairman, including that of being sent to Member Governments for their comments.

MR. CAMPBELL (United Kingdom) reserved the right of the United Kingdom Representative to amplify the statement made in Document E/CN.4/38.

COLONEL HODGSON (Australia) asked Professor Humphrey, through the Chairman, whether Document E/CN.4/21 had been circulated to Member Governments or only to the Representatives. [14] Even if it had been circulated only to the Representatives, he felt sure that Member Governments would be aware that discussion of a Draft Declaration and of a Draft Convention had been envisaged, in which case precise instructions on the points must have been issued by them to their Representatives.

PROFESSOR HUMPHREY (Director of the Human Rights Division) stated that the Document in question was an unrestricted one and had been distributed through the routine channels to Member Governments.

The meeting rose at 1 p.m.

Examination of the Report of the Drafting Committee

THE CHAIRMAN raised the preliminary question of whether the Commission should concern itself with the drafting of a Declaration or of a Convention or of both, and of how it proposed to act on the decision taken in this connection.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) thought it too soon to take a decision on this subject. Item 5 of the Agenda mentioned the examination by the Commission of the Drafting Committee's Report. This Report consisted mainly of a draft Declaration of 36 articles. There should be a general discussion of these articles, and the question of what form a final draft should take would only arise after this had been discussed and adopted. It was therefore in the Commission's interests to concentrate its attention first of all on the examination of the preliminary draft Declaration on Human Rights. He pointed out the difficulties the Sub-Commission on the Prevention of Discrimination and the Protection of Minorities had encountered in its consideration of the six articles referred to it. While hoping that the Commission would obtain quicker results, he did not think that it could take any immediate decision about the document in which its work would be embodied. He therefore proposed that this question be deferred until a later date.

MR. CASSIN (France) considered that this question was within the competence of the Plenary Commission. Although it was not essential for the Commission to reach a decision that same day, it was essential that the general lines of the discussion [3] should be fixed straight away. If they confined themselves to drafting a Declaration, the immediate result would be a considerable increase in the length of that document; if they only prepared a Convention, the scope of the discussion would be restricted.

The French Delegation believed that the Commission should draw up both a short general Declaration and a number of successive Conventions, which could be drafted when time allowed. It was essential that a Declaration on Human Rights should be drawn up, as it had been openly stated that the omission of such a Declaration from the Charter was due solely to lack of time, and that it remained the duty of the United Nations to draft such a Declaration. The text of this Declaration, if not the preamble, which could be set aside, should be the first subject for discussion by the Commission. However, conventions were also essential. How could Trade Union rights be specified in a Declaration? How could a Declaration embody the specific obligations which would have to be undertaken in this connection? The same applied to the question of nationality. In this connection the Drafting Committee had proposed a very short paragraph, affirming that everyone had the right to a nationality; but that was nothing more than a principle which would have to be taken up in one or more Conventions. Before they could accept the admission of stateless persons and the abolition of the loss of nationality, States would need time and the advice of experts. The same was true in regard to non-discrimination and the protection of minorities. The Declaration could only lay down principles which should be taken up and developed later in conventions. Even during [4] the present session, the Commission might draft an initial Convention on the classic freedoms and the right to life, which were now recognized by practically all the constitutions or written laws of the whole world. Thus, on the day a draft Convention was submitted to Governments, the General Assembly of the United Nations could vote on the Declaration on Human Rights.

A third point remained to be decided by the Commission, i.e. the implementation of those rights. Since June 1946, the Commission had been required under its terms of reference to inform the Economic and Social Council of the measures required to protect Human Rights. Owing to the shortness of the present Session there was no possibility of a thorough examination of this question. Nevertheless, it was the Commission's duty, when drawing up the Declaration on Rights, to envisage the means of practical implementation, choosing those which were simplest and conformed most closely to the terms of the Charter, thus showing its desire to carry out its terms of reference, and as regards the initial Convention, to include various enforcement measures going further in this field than the Charter.

General measures would thus be provided to give effect to the Declaration and more elaborate machinery for the enforcement of the Conventions. These would advance the Commission's projects very considerably.

MR. AMADO (Panama) pointed out that the Charter recognized Human Rights in seven different places. In his view the first thing was to draw up a draft Declaration on Human Rights. Only when this had been done should a series of rights to be embodied in one or more Conventions submitted to the Governments for their approval, be drawn up. Even if all such Conventions were not approved by all Governments, there would still remain the obligation for all Members of the United Nations to respect human rights, under the terms of Article 2, paragraph 2 of the Charter.

MR. LOUTFI (Egypt) supported the view expressed by the Representative of France, and hoped the Commission would be able to submit, at the close of the present session, a draft Declaration and a preliminary draft Convention relating to the rights on which agreement could readily be reached by the members of the Commission.

LORD DUKESTON (United Kingdom) thought it a pity to view a declaration and a convention as two opposite ways of dealing with the same thing. A declaration could hardly deal with anything but very general principles, already embodied in the Charter. If the Commission confined itself to producing such a declaration without any means of enforcement it would produce a text too vague to be of real value. The present discussion might moreover go on and on without arriving at any result within the time limit fixed for the completion of the Commission's work. The Commission business was to arrive at concrete results. If its function was to protect human rights it ought to define precisely what those rights were. It should surely not devote more than one meeting [6] to general discussion, and should proceed immediately to drafting a Convention binding the signatory Governments so that it would be possible to set up machinery for appeal in the event of their not respecting their undertakings. He thought that the most profitable working method would be to examine the Draft Convention article by article. The only reason for having a general discussion was to define more clearly what was to be understood by the word "convention". General discussion of any other kind would be contrary to the purposes of the Commission. His Delegation was prepared to accept a Draft Declaration if that were to precede a Convention, but if the Draft Declaration were to take the place of the Draft Convention his Delegation would be unable to support it.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) remarked that the same differences and vagueness of viewpoint seemed to be appearing within the Commission as had been noticeable at the outset of its work. His Delegation was there to arrive at practical solutions. There were three points to be considered. That of a Declaration on Human Rights seemed to him of little importance. The real point at issue was not the definition of these rights. However, the Belgian Delegation was not opposed to such a Declaration, since it would supplement the Charter and moreover meet the wishes expressed by certain representatives. The Draft Convention on the other hand he regarded as more important, since it involved obligations embodied in international law and in the municipal law of each of the States participating. Certain matters such as individual freedom and the economic and social rights of workers [7] in particular, might be introduced into such a Convention. Emphasis must however be laid on the difficulty of solution, when so many different Conventions might be drawn up, and on the importance of seeing that the conference of the Human Rights Commission was not turned into a codification conference. The third point, implementation, seemed to him the essential one. Either the Commission would become involved in academic arguments or it would produce something new and progressive, though that would only be possible if it set up machinery to secure the implementation of its plan. The difficulties were not only political but technical as well. One could aim at a single general system, which was what he thought preferable, or at a special system for each convention. In this connection he drew attention to the proposal that had been submitted by the Australian representative on various occasions at other conferences. This proposal was to set up an International Court of Human Rights. The Belgian Delegation would be entirely in favour of this and proposed that the Court in question should form part of the International Court of Justice, and become a special chamber of that Court. As regards methods of work he suggested two practical solutions. One was to appoint a small Sub-Committee to study the different drafts of the form the text produced by the Commission should take; after hearing the Sub-Committee's report, the Commission would be asked to take a formal decision by a vote. The second solution was to sub-divide the Commission into three Working Groups, each to devote itself to a particular question:

1) a general declaration;

[8]

- 2) the question of conventions, which might cover, as he had already suggested, classical or individual freedoms on the one hand and the economic and social rights of workers on the other;
- 3) the machinery for implementing the various solutions proposed.

MADAME MEHTA (India) felt the Commission was making very little headway; while a certain measure of agreement had been reached in the Drafting Committee's Report as to the content of the Draft Declaration, no final solution was recommended there as to the form the Draft should take. The Delegation of India could not give its consent to a solution consisting merely in drafting a Declaration. It would like to see measures for its implementation included in the Declaration, such as those proposed by the Secretariat in Articles 47 and 48 of its Draft Declaration. The Delegation of India was in favour of a preliminary declaration followed by conventions, and would like the Commission before going further to take a formal decision regarding the form of the text it would draw up.

THE CHAIRMAN announced that the Representative of the American Federation of Labor wished, with the Commission's permission, to make a statement.

MISS SENDER (American Federation of Labor) said she represented, before the Commission, the opinion of the workers affiliated to the Federation. Among them, the Commission's activities met with a scepticism which would disappear only if they were fully successful. It was essential to increase confidence throughout the world, that the Commission [9] should not be satisfied with making verbal promises, but should give proof of its determination to implement its declarations. It was certainly necessary to promulgate a Declaration defining the rules to be embodied in subsequent conventions. Moreover, such international rules would rank above the rights of national sovereignties, as was already the case with the principles of the Charter, and should therefore be respected whether the conventions were ratified or not. She agreed with the French representative that such a Declaration should be short and clear. As regards the conventions, she also agreed with the Belgian representative's proposal to the effect that the Commission should at this session prepare two draft conventions, on individual freedoms and economic and social rights, including, of course, trade union rights. The pressure of public opinion was one of the important factors which might lead Governments to ratify such conventions. The Commission could therefore, at this session, adopt not only a draft Declaration, but also draft conventions on the questions about which it could readily reach agreement. Finally, it might attempt to establish an International Court of Human Rights attached to The Hague Court.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) stressed the fact that there still remained in the world Nazi and Fascist elements whose aim it was to sow doubt and hatred and spread the idea of a new war. In its draft the Commission should therefore incorporate statements designed to eliminate any remaining traces of the Nazi spirit, to develop democratic forces, strengthen the bonds uniting individuals, and reinforce individual rights in democratic communities. For that purpose, it should prepare a document which would be concrete and brief, but rich in content and easily understandable. He therefore [10] proposed that they should adopt as a working method a general discussion, in the course of which the Commission would gather the material to be included in the draft Declaration. Other material might be furnished by Governments if the latter so wished.

THE CHAIRMAN said there had been a slight evolution in the United States' position with regard to the form which a Declaration on Human Rights should take. Her delegation thought that priority should be given to the draft Declaration, and that the latter should not be drawn up in such a way as to give the impression that Governments would have a contractual obligation to guarantee human rights. As regards the draft Convention or Conventions, the United States considered that the Commission should not proceed to draw them up until it was sure that such Conventions could be accepted and applied in all good faith by the participating States. Flagrant, prolonged and repeated violations of those Conventions could not fail to harm the United Nations. That did not mean, however, that her delegation would not be willing to examine the draft Convention or Conventions if the Commission so desired. The Commission should, however, take the time factor into account, and, if they had to make a choice, should first tackle the draft Declaration.

She hoped the United Kingdom representative was right in thinking that agreement could readily be reached on the draft Declaration, and that the Commission could then go on to study the draft Convention. Her delegation had proposed a draft Declaration which seemed to fit the type of document at which the Commission should arrive. Finally, while emphasizing the primary importance of the Declaration, she was prepared for one or more draft Conventions to be drawn up, which could be adopted as soon as possible.

LORD DUKESTON (United Kingdom) said it seemed to him dangerous to prepare a draft Declaration without a draft Convention. If the Commission did confine itself to drawing up a Declaration, delegates would tend to propose various amendments with a view to embodying in the Declaration ideas which could more appropriately be included in a Convention. The Commission would thus get a hybrid result which would be neither a Declaration nor a Convention. Moreover, machinery for implementation could not be contemplated within the framework of a Declaration. The latter could not legally bind Governments as could a Convention. A Declaration was nothing more than a document of propaganda. He recognized the difficulties involved in drafting conventions, but that was what the world needed today. Most delegates so far had expressed themselves in favour of combining the two systems of a Declaration and Conventions. Although he would have preferred to incorporate such Conventions in a single draft Convention, he would not oppose the method of drafting several Conventions. On this subject the general opinion of the Commission should be ascertained. Delegates who accepted the draft Convention would not on that account reject the idea of a draft Declaration. He therefore moved a formal proposal that a vote be taken on the question of whether the Commission was in favour of drafting a Convention (Document E/CN.4/42/Rev.1).

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) recalled that he had also put forward a proposal, consisting of two parts, the second of which he wished to retain as a formal proposal; this was to the effect that three working groups be set up. One of [12] those working groups might be appointed at once, and the two others the following week. His proposal involved an important question of principle: the simultaneous establishment of three working groups, one on the draft Declaration, another on the draft Conventions, and the third on implementation.

THE CHAIRMAN said that the Commission would vote on the two proposals at the end of the general discussion.

Revised Proposal Submitted by the United Kingdom Delegation

The Commission on Human Rights

1. Decides to proceed immediately to the preparation of a draft Bill of Human Rights, the terms of which will be binding on the States ratifying it.
2. Decides to give consideration to the preparation of a draft International Declaration of Human Rights expressed in terms of general principles representing the goal to which mankind is striving.

3. Decides accordingly to examine the Draft Convention and Declaration on Human Rights which have been prepared by its Drafting Committee with the object of adopting a Bill and a Draft Declaration for submission to Member States.

Belgian Proposal

1. The immediate setting up of three Working Parties, to deal respectively with the problem of the Declaration, the Convention or Conventions, and implementation.

2. The membership of these Working Parties would be determined in accordance with the Chairman's proposal.

3. The first Working Party (Declaration) would begin its work immediately upon its establishment. The second and third Working Parties would begin work as soon as the Secretariat services were in a position to assist them, and at latest on Monday, 8 December.

4. These Working Parties would present reports to the Plenary Commission as soon as possible; the Commission would, in the course of the present session, take such decisions in regard to their proposals as it deemed advisable.

Taking advantage of the fact that the Commission was in private session, [PROFESSOR DEHOUSSE (Belgium)] said that he had been very sorry to find that UNESCO, a specialized agency, had just published a report on "The Bases of an International Bill of Human Rights", a report which the UNESCO Committee had sent to the Human Rights Commission of the United Nations.<sup>25</sup> He wished to know whether UNESCO had been asked by the Secretariat to draw up that Report or whether the Secretariat had been consulted as to its opportuneness. Extracts from that Report had been published in the Weekly Bulletin of the United Nations, and he would like to know on whose initiative that Report had been drawn up. It would be regrettable if the initiative in the matter had been taken by UNESCO alone.

PROFESSOR HUMPHREY (Secretariat) said that the Secretary-General had not asked UNESCO to prepare either a Bill of Human Rights or documentation for such a Bill. He had the impression that UNESCO had acted on its own initiative. Nothing in the Resolutions of the Commission or of the Economic and Social Council could have decided UNESCO to draw up that Report.

As regards its publication in the Bulletin, although the question was outside his competence, he thought he could say that the fact that extracts had been published in the Bulletin in no way meant that the initiative in question had been sponsored by any United Nations organ whatsoever.

THE CHAIRMAN said that at the Commission's last session, Dr. Huxley, Director of UNESCO, had been present at one or two meetings. He had told her, in the course of a private conversation, that UNESCO would endeavour to establish certain principles of human rights. She explained that her opinion had not been asked. She did not know whether the Report submitted by UNESCO was the result of that endeavour.

PROFESSOR DEHOUSSE (Belgium) was relieved to find that the United Nations Secretariat and more especially, the Human Rights Division, was not responsible for the UNESCO Report. Nevertheless, UNESCO's action was most regrettable. The Review "Synthèses", published in Brussels, had devoted a special number to the Bill of Human Rights prepared by UNESCO. In all its articles the Human Rights Commission of the United Nations was not mentioned once. Political, diplomatic and literary circles in Brussels had been wondering, a few days previously, whether it was the Bill drawn up by UNESCO that was going to be discussed this week in Geneva. He urged that in future such incidents should be avoided.

PROFESSOR HUMPHREY (Secretariat) explained that the Report in question bore the title "The Bases of an International Bill of Human Rights". The sub-title explained that it was a "Report submitted by the UNESCO Committee on the Philosophical Principles of Human Rights to the Human Rights Commission of the United Nations". UNESCO had asked him to distribute the document to substantial collection of materials on human rights, with an introduction by Jacques Maritain: "Human Rights, Comments and Interpretations", UNESCO/PHS/3(rev.). Its work is discussed by Mary Ann Glendon, "Knowing the Universal Declaration of Human Rights", (1997-98) 73 Notre Dame Law Review 1153.

members of the Commission, and he intended to have it distributed later in the session. In his opinion, UNESCO had the right to request the distribution of such documents: he read out paragraph 6, Article 3 of the Agreement concluded between UNESCO and the United Nations, which authorized such distribution.

He took the opportunity of raising a somewhat similar question. He recalled that the nuclear Commission had recommended that the Secretary-General gather all useful information on the subject of war crimes where human rights were involved. That request had been confirmed on 21 June 1946 by a resolution of the Economic and Social Council.<sup>26</sup> The Secretariat had asked the International War Crimes Commission to prepare the documentation in question.

In the latter case, therefore, the Secretariat bore full responsibility for having requested that documentation from the War Crimes Commission. He asked representatives whether the voluminous document prepared by the United Nations Commission, although necessarily incomplete since all the trials had not been completed, should be reproduced and distributed as an official document of the United Nations. He proposed that the Commission, if it approved the action taken by the Secretariat, should vote a resolution thanking the United Nations Commission for the useful documentation it had got together.

THE CHAIRMAN proposed that the two questions be discussed separately. She considered that, as regards the UNESCO report, the Commission might either leave it to the Secretariat to solve the difficulty or take up the principles which might be useful in drawing up the Declaration and decide later whether to publish the UNESCO report or not. She explained, however, that the Secretariat was of the opinion that, under the terms of the Agreement between UNESCO and the United Nations, the document ought to be published.

COLONEL HODGSON (Australia), on a point of order, asked the Chairman to take a decision on the subject. In his view the two documents had no bearing on item 4 of the Agenda now under discussion, but were related to item 5.

THE CHAIRMAN agreed, but pointed out that this question had been brought up for discussion because the Commission was sitting in closed session.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) did not agree with the representative of Australia that there was a considerable difference between items 4 and 5 of the Agenda. He felt that the Commission should not devote any more time to the UNESCO document, particularly as several members of the Commission were not members of UNESCO. He proposed that the UNESCO report and the document of the United Nations War Crimes Commission be treated differently from the reports submitted by the Institute of International Law and the League of Human Rights. Those reference documents should be dealt with in the same way as the documents mentioned between brackets after item 5 of the Agenda.

[15]

THE CHAIRMAN stated that these documents, not being communications, could not be discussed before item 5 of the Agenda. . .

...

...

THE CHAIRMAN invited the representatives to express their views on the advisability of distributing the UNESCO document. She recalled that the Secretariat was of the opinion that, under the terms of the Agreement between UNESCO and the United Nations, this document ought to be reproduced and distributed.

PROFESSOR HUMPHREY (Secretariat) stated that had the members of the Commission not started a discussion on this point, the document would have been published. He pointed out to representatives that if they were to decide not to publish the document, UNESCO would be entitled to ask why the Commission did not treat its documents in the same way as the other documents reproduced by the Commission.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) wanted to turn the question round. He wondered why UNESCO had prepared this report without consulting the United Nations. He thought this constituted a very dangerous [17] precedent. He proposed that, to show the Commission's disapproval, the UNESCO report should not be reproduced but should be distributed to the members of the Commission only.

THE CHAIRMAN thought it would be preferable to reproduce and distribute the document in conformity with the existing agreement but the Secretariat should be requested to point out to UNESCO and to all the other specialized agencies that in similar cases contact with the Human Rights Commission was essential prior to any action such as had been taken by UNESCO.

MR. CASSIN (France) supported this proposal.

MR. AMADO (Panama) agreed with the representative of Belgium. He had heard that the first International Philosophic Congress, which met at Rome last year, had dealt with the problem of human rights and had decided to pass on the study of this problem to UNESCO.

COLONEL HODGSON (Australia) stated that the Commission had not asked UNESCO for the report, that UNESCO a specialized agency, had not consulted the United Nations, and that there had been no co-operation or liaison. The UNESCO document claimed to define the philosophical principles of an International Bill of Human Rights and even the implementation of such a Bill. Personally, he did not approve of the majority of the ideas put forward in the report and therefore saw no reason why the Commission should itself undertake public action.

THE CHAIRMAN, before putting the question to a vote, explained that, at the Commission's first session, Mr. Darchambeau, delegate of UNESCO, had informed the Commission that UNESCO intended to deal with the problem of human rights. She had replied that the Commission could not take up any position at that time. From that day to this she had heard no more of the matter.

Decision: The Commission decided, by eight votes to four with one abstention, not to reproduce the UNESCO report for distribution to all the Members of the United Nations.

3. Report of the Drafting Committee (Continuation of Discussion)

COLONEL HODGSON (Australia) felt that a great deal of confusion had been evoked by the terminology used in the previous [5] day's meeting, particularly as to the terms "declaration" and "bill". He was of opinion that the Commission's Terms of Reference did not require it to draft a Declaration of Human Rights. The Draft Declaration presented by the Drafting Committee was, in his opinion, equivalent to a preamble to a Bill of Rights, and as such it should contain a statement of general principles to cover the whole range of human rights and fundamental freedoms. He maintained that the Commission's task was to draft a Bill of Human Rights, not a Declaration which, he felt, entailed no legal obligations and would not in any way affect the lives of men and women unless translated into concrete action. In his opinion, an international bill was a law in both the domestic and international fields, and no executive or legislative organ of a government would be able to override its provisions. It was the Bill of Human Rights which should be submitted to Member Governments, in order that it might be seen whether its contents were in conflict with national legislation and whether new legislation to comply with its provisions would be necessary. Colonel Hodgson reminded the representatives that the Commission's work would continue for some time, as sufficient information was not yet available on certain subjects, but he felt that every effort should be made to carry on as far as possible in conformity with agreed principles. He considered that the Bill would be a great historic document, constituting a landmark in the progress and wellbeing and happiness of mankind, and that its preparation should not be delayed. He maintained that it would be difficult for the Commission to draft a precise declaration of general principles without first knowing the contents of the Bill, and foresaw that difficulties of interpretation might arise, if the Declaration were drafted before the Bill.

Regarding the question of implementation, Colonel Hodgson felt that some confusion of ideas existed. In his opinion, the only effective machinery for implementation of the Bill would be the establishment of an International Court of Human Rights, a suggestion that was receiving increasing support from all over the world. That Court would provide an opportunity for appeal, should redress in national courts be denied. He would support the proposal of the Belgian representative to establish working parties, if the first working party were to deal with the Bill of Rights, and the two subsequent ones with the Declaration and implementation.

THE CHAIRMAN said that she understood that a bill did not become law in the international field until it was put into the form of a treaty or a convention. A convention required ratification by governments, after which its contents became law. That explained the use of the term "Convention" by the Drafting Committee.

MRS. MEHTA (India) said she desired to see the International Bill of Rights become part of both international and domestic law. Most of the fundamental human rights had been incorporated by her Government in the Constitution which had been formulated, and after ratification they would become part of the national law. She was of opinion that the Bill should be in the form of both a Declaration and a Convention. She agreed with Colonel Hodgson that the Declaration should contain nothing which would not be implemented and felt that an article or clause should be inserted, either in the Declaration or in the Preamble, to the effect that the rights therein set out were to be implemented by the Member States of the United Nations. She felt that adequate machinery for implementation already existed in the International Court of Justice, and was opposed to the idea of creating new machinery.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) opposed the Belgian representative's proposal to establish Working Parties before the Commission had studied the Report of the Drafting Committee. Agreement had not yet been reached on the essential principles of human rights and there was, therefore, no basis on which Working Parties could work. He stated that the Soviet Union Delegation could, however, agree to consideration being given to the Draft Declaration contained in the Drafting Committee's Report. Regarding the Draft Convention, he reserved the Soviet Union Delegation's right to speak at a later stage of the Commission's work. He then moved that the Commission proceed without delay to consider the suggested "Declaration on Human Rights" submitted by the Drafting Committee and postpone the present discussion until after the Draft had been considered.

MR. AMADO (Panama) said his Government was not opposed to the drafting of one or more conventions, as the Commission might decide, or to the creation of machinery to implement such conventions, but in his opinion its first task was to draft a Declaration of Human Rights. He did not agree with the contention that a Declaration imposed no obligations on its signatories, and felt it was hardly possible that governments would appoint representatives to the Commission and afterwards disclaim all responsibility for its work. He warmly supported the proposal and the views of the United States representative.

LORD DUKESTON (United Kingdom) directed the attention of the Representatives to the original Terms of Reference of the Commission established by the Economic and Social Council at its meeting in London on 16 February 1947.<sup>28</sup> He submitted that the Terms of Reference established an order of priority for the work of the Commission and that its first task was to produce a Draft International Bill of Human Rights, which would become a legal [8] document and which could be implemented. He felt it was important to continue to use the term “bill”, which had a significance for the ordinary person not possessed by the terms “declaration” and “convention”. The question of a preamble was one on which he had an open mind. He had received an impression that some representatives favoured the idea that a declaration was an alternative to a bill, and he trusted that there was no support for that view. He proposed that the Commission should proceed to the preparation of a Draft Bill of Human Rights. This necessitated the alteration of the Resolution proposed by the United Kingdom. The words “to the preparation of a Draft Bill of Human Rights” should be inserted in place of “Draft International Convention”. He requested the Chairman to give a ruling on the Terms of Reference.

MR. CASSIN (France) thought that no detailed convention could replace a declaration of general principles and he felt that agreement on those principles could be reached by the Commission. Problems existed, such as the questions of nationality, minorities, agreement on the solution of which would be difficult, but he felt that the drafting of a Declaration to include fundamental freedoms could be done immediately. While agreeing with the order for consideration contained in the Belgian representative’s proposal, he considered that in practice no great difference existed between the Belgian proposal to create three Working Parties and the Soviet Union representative’s proposal to deal first with the Declaration. He was of opinion that the three parts of their work, the Declaration, the Convention and implementation, formed one entity.

MR. KLEKOVKIN (Ukraine) felt it was extremely difficult at that state to come to a decision. In his opinion it would be difficult to agree to the United Kingdom proposal to draft a [9] convention, because a convention entailed preliminary agreement as to principles; those principles had not yet been discussed by the Commission. For the same reason he opposed the Belgian proposal. He proposed that the Commission should start work on a Draft Declaration and that the question of drafting a convention should be laid aside for the time being.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that although the Terms of Reference specifically mentioned an International Bill of Rights, they did not say what form such a Bill should take. She reminded representatives that the Draft Report of the Drafting Committee included not only a Declaration but Conventions, and she maintained that the two points should be considered simultaneously by the Commission.

Proposal Submitted by the French Delegation

The Commission considers it in conformity with its terms of reference to prepare and submit simultaneously to the Economic and Social Council and to the Governments of the United Nations:

1. A draft International and General Declaration on Human Rights, to become a Charter annexed to the United Nations Charter.
2. A draft for a first multilateral convention concerning the definition and safeguarding of certain human rights.
3. Proposals for the practical implementation of human rights to be inserted both in the Declaration and in the first standard-Convention.

The Commission decides to discuss the Report of the Drafting Committee on the draft Declaration, and subsequently to establish, for the examination of the other questions, two working parties whose report will be discussed at the present session of the Commission.

E/CN.4/49

4 December 1947

Proposal Submitted by the United Kingdom Delegation

The Commission considers that it is necessary to prepare two documents, a Bill of Human Rights in the form of a Convention, and a Declaration of Human Rights.

The Commission will endeavour to draft both documents at this session.

The Commission will start considering the substantive articles of both simultaneously in plenary session, but will refer the precise drafting to a small committee.

The Commission will appoint a committee to consider the question of implementation and to report to the Commission at its present session.

Discussion of the Report of the Drafting Committee (E/CN.4/21)

PROFESSOR DEHOUSSE (Belgium) wished to clarify certain aspects of his proposal (E/CN.4/44). He pointed out that behind the divergences of view on procedure lay disagreement on matters of substance. A certain number of representatives seemed resolved to go no further than a Declaration, whilst others demanded the immediate formulation of one or more Conventions. With the object of bridging the gap between those two standpoints, the Belgian delegation had submitted a proposal for a compromise solution, involving mutual [3] concessions. Paragraph 1 of the proposal called for a simultaneous examination of the three main problems arising from the international protection of human rights; the Declaration, the Convention or Conventions, and implementation. Paragraph 4 gave the Commission the right to take a final decision on the conclusions reached by the three Working Groups. The objection that the proposal would lead to an examination of the problems of the Convention and implementation before agreement had been reached on the principles of the Declaration could, in his view, be met by co-ordinating the deliberations of the three Groups. Furthermore, the Group or Groups would have concrete considerations, such as the freedom of the individual and economic and social rights, as a basis for discussion. As regards the problem of implementation, it was not essential to know the substance of the Declaration or Conventions before deciding whether an International Human Rights Office should be established, whether there should be a Court of Justice, or how those organs should work.

The Declaration was almost ready. The Convention and implementation provisions could be quickly formulated in positive terms or even in formal texts. The Belgian proposal would enable the Commission to produce, by the end of its present session, a Declaration, a draft Convention and draft implementation provisions, which the Drafting Committee would be able to examine at its next session.

The Belgian proposal left the plenary Commission in full possession of its powers of final decision. The Belgian delegation made no secret, however, of the fact that it would press for the final decision to be the adoption of a draft Declaration, one or more draft Conventions, and draft implementation provisions.

Those members who were in favour of a Convention only were cherishing an illusion, as the Declaration was the most advanced of the three drafts and it was the wish of the majority of the Commission's members that the present discussions should at least produce a Declaration. He maintained that, despite its shortcomings, the present Declaration represented a substantial advance on the San Francisco Charter.

In his view the Commission should not disregard the question of the form of the Declaration. He believed that the only possible form was a recommendation of the United Nations General Assembly. A recommendation of the Assembly was, however, no more than an opinion, an advisory statement, a suggestion, which Members might or might not follow.

That was the precise legal character of a recommendation. Furthermore this was proved, as he saw it, by the fact that in at least two cases Members of the United Nations had refused to comply with recommendations of the Assembly. The first case concerned the treatment of Indians in South Africa;<sup>29</sup> the second concerned a country which had not carried out a recommendation regarding relations with Franco Spain.<sup>30</sup> A mere Declaration would be a frail and precarious form of <sup>29</sup> In 1946, South Africa enacted the racist Asiatic Land Tenure and Indian Representation Act, known as the "Ghetto Act". By Resolution 44(I), "Treatment of Indians in the Union of South Africa", adopted on 8 December 1946, the General Assembly declared that it was "of the opinion that the treatment of Indians in the Union should be in conformity with the international obligations under the agreements concluded between the two Governments and the relevant provisions of the Charter". South Africa did not comply with the Resolution.

<sup>30</sup> By Resolution 39(1) of 12 December 1946, the General Assembly recommended "that all Members of the United Nations immediately recall from Madrid their Ambassadors and Ministers plenipotentiary accredited there". It furthermore recommended "that if, within a reasonable time, there is not established a government which derives its authority from the consent of the governed, committed to respect freedom of speech, religion international protection of human rights. For this reason the Belgian delegation pressed for the Declaration to be accompanied by a Convention.

He also wished to draw the attention of representatives to the question of terminology. Some representatives spoke of a "Bill" of Human Rights, instead of a Convention. He accepted that term in the sense of a legal instrument having binding force, but it was an expression for which there was no French translation. He also rejected the term "Convention", [5] which designated international agreements of less importance than treaties. He preferred "Covenant" to "Charter". The latter term should, he thought, be reserved exclusively for the basic instrument of the United Nations.

Although paragraph 2 of the Belgian proposal left it to the Chairman to determine the composition of the Working Groups, he hoped that each of the Groups would consist of 6 members.

He asked the Chairman to put his proposal to the vote paragraph by paragraph. He added that if it did not obtain a majority, he would vote for the United Kingdom proposal (E/CN.42/Rev.1), which seemed to come closest to his own views. He had no wish to hide the fact that the Commission had reached a decisive point in its work. The solution it adopted would determine whether it was to linger over academic considerations or whether it would perform original and progressive work. An academic vote might even endanger the Commission's existence and would cause immense disappointment to a world that was awaiting positive solutions capable of influencing human destiny. He was thinking more particularly of all those who had clung to the hope of a reconciliation between the ideologies of the East and the West.

COLONEL HODGSON (Australia) stated that he had learnt from a study of the documentation that one of the first documents submitted to the Commission was a draft "Statement of Essential Human Rights", presented by the delegation of Panama. In his view, that draft advanced general principles but did not provide for any juridical obligation. The Economic and Social Council had referred the document in question to the Drafting Committee of the Commission on Human Rights for consideration during the elaboration of an [6] International Bill of Human Rights. Under the Commission's terms of reference, drawn up by the Economic and Social Council, it was an International Bill of Rights which was to be drawn up, not a Declaration.

and assembly and to the prompt holding of an election in which the Spanish people, free from force and intimidation and regardless of party, may express their will, the Security Council consider the adequate measures to be taken in order to remedy the situation". The following year, in GA Res. 114(II), the Assembly "[e]xpress[ed] its confidence that the Security Council will exercise its responsibilities under the Charter as soon as it considers that the situation in regard to Spain so requires". The Security Council decided not to include on its agenda the issue of relations of members of the United Nations with Spain: S/PV.327. Spain was admitted to the United Nations in 1955.

The representative of the Soviet Union wanted the Commission to confine itself to a Declaration. He therefore appeared to disregard the need for giving priority to essential tasks. Specifically, those tasks consisted of drawing up, as soon as possible, the text of a Bill of Human Rights. If the Commission followed the suggestions made by the Drafting Committee, it would have to draw up a Declaration or manifesto enumerating human rights and an international Convention relating to those rights. The difference between those two texts was that the second only would have the force of law. He would like to know whether the Declaration submitted by the United States delegation (E/CN.4/36) was to take the form of a recommendation of the General Assembly or whether it was a Declaration, to be ratified by States, in which case it would have binding force under both municipal and international law. Those who favoured a Declaration should explain what they meant; if it was merely to be a recommendation, the peoples of the whole world would be disappointed and the Commission would have taken a hypocritical decision. He was convinced that such was not the Commission's aim.

He approved the Belgian proposal (E/CN.4/44) with the exception of paragraph 3, which in his view was not convincing.

As regards the French proposal (E/CN.4/48), he could agree with the first three paragraphs, but could not accept the paragraph in which the Commission was recommended to [7] consider first of all a Declaration and afterwards a Convention. He was anxious to know when the Commission would be able to begin consideration of the Convention.

He would vote in favour of the first, second and fourth paragraphs of the Belgian proposal, but against the third because he considered that the Commission had an essential task to perform and the Covenant should have priority.

LORD DUKESTON (United Kingdom) pointed out that the Resolutions of the Economic and Social Council and the General Assembly were perfectly clear. The Commission's task was to prepare a Bill of Human Rights. The discussion had shown, however, that some representatives wished to confine themselves to the drafting of a Declaration, whilst others had taken up a position midway between the two extremes. The debate on the priority to be assigned to one or the other of the proposals gave rise to certain difficulties and a prolonged discussion would make it increasingly difficult, if not impossible, to reach a compromise solution.

The Commission should study a Declaration setting forth the aims, objectives and ideals, and imposing on States the moral obligation to implement its provisions according to the varying conditions in each country. History showed that Declarations imposing no juridical obligations had remained inoperative for centuries. According to jurists, a Convention was a legal instrument which had to be submitted to States for ratification on the international level. He was in favour of a Convention accompanied by a Declaration. His delegation would never agree to the Commission elaborating a Declaration without a Convention. He proposed that the Commission should prepare two documents; a Bill in the form of a Convention, and a Declaration of Human [8] Rights. The form of the latter was not very important, so long as it was followed by a Bill imposing a moral obligation to implement it. They should be careful, however, not to give those drafts a form which would prove unacceptable to certain States. Above all, the world should not receive the impression that the drafting of the Declaration would not be followed by a Convention until sometime in the more or less distant future. The Commission should act quickly since the world expected some practical result from its deliberations. If the sole fruit of its labours were to be the draft of a Declaration, irreparable harm would have been done.

As regards working procedure, it would be possible for Annexes F and G of the Report of the Drafting Committee (E/CN.4/21) to be discussed clause by clause by the plenary Commission. The texts were clear enough to be discussed in the Commission before being referred, together with the Commission's instructions, to the Working Groups. The Commission's primary task was to prepare a Bill in the form of a Convention and it was the completion of that task that public opinion anxiously awaited.

The United Kingdom delegation was not opposed to the Commission preparing the two documents simultaneously, if that were possible. In no circumstances would it agree to the Commission confining itself to the preparation of a mere Declaration. It would not allow itself to be drawn gradually into a position in which it would have to agree to examine the preparation of a Convention at a later session.

MR. AMADO (Panama) stated that the draft Declaration was to contain the general principles of human rights and that the implementation of those principles was subsequently to be ensured by one or more Conventions. He also recalled [9] that the Commission was under an obligation to the United Nations to secure the application of those principles. That obligation arose from Article 2, paragraph 2, of the Charter of the United Nations, and the Charter was the very essence of the Declaration. He was surprised that some representatives, appointed by their Governments and in possession of terms of reference from the United Nations, could take part in the Commission's discussions, draw up a mere Declaration of principles and avoid assuming responsibilities in connection with the implementation of those principles. A Declaration of that nature would be a legal monstrosity.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) observed that the Commission had spent three days on a discussion as to whether it was going to prepare a Declaration, or a Declaration and Conventions. It was also discussing whether it should or should not appoint Working Groups to prepare those documents. Four proposals had already been made regarding the last point. How could the three Groups carry out their work if the principles of a Declaration, such as for example the protection of the man-in-the-street against racial, national or religious discrimination had not been discussed beforehand? The Commission had as yet accomplished nothing in regard to the essential problems, whose solution was awaited by the whole world. He formally moved the closure of the discussion in progress and proposed that “the Commission proceed without delay to consider the draft Declaration on Human Rights submitted by the Drafting Committee and postpone the present discussion until after the draft has been considered.” Only after that had been done could agreement be reached on the question of which document the Commission should prepare.

DR. RIBNIKAR (Yugoslavia) recalled that the Economic and Social Council had instructed the Commission to prepare a Declaration on Human Rights. The Commission had also to decide whether that document should take the form of a resolution or of a recommendation to be submitted to the General Assembly. In his view it would rest with the Assembly to decide, after consultations between the Governments, whether a Bill or a Covenant should be drawn up as well. He also recalled his previous statement that he had no objection in principle to the preparation of one or more Conventions, provided they came after the drafting of a Declaration. It was impossible to prepare a draft Convention at present, even should agreement be reached on general principles. He therefore proposed that the Commission should prepare a Declaration, to be submitted to Governments for study and comment. He would vote against the proposals made by the representatives of Belgium, France and the United Kingdom, and would support the resolution submitted by the delegation of the Soviet Union.

DR. MALIK (Rapporteur) observed that the discussion was bringing out the same difficulties as had been encountered at the Commission’s first session. In his view it was the intention of the Economic and Social Council and also of the authors of the Charter that, in addition to a Declaration, a more substantial document should be drawn up – a legal instrument which would be submitted to States for ratification under the same conditions as any other international document. It was imperative that the Commission’s work should result in the drawing up of a Bill, a Convention or a Covenant, and not just a mere proclamation.

He did not underrate the importance of a Declaration and was at one with the representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics in asserting that the general principles should be defined, but he also felt that the Commission’s terms of reference and the international situation demanded the immediate elaboration of a Convention or a Covenant. The real point at issue was whether there was in the world today an international moral sense, whose principles could be incorporated in national laws, or whether such an anarchy existed in that field that only a vague proclamation of general principles could be achieved. If the latter were the case, the world would be in a very grave situation; the situation was already very gloomy, but the Commission should enlist the support of all men of goodwill to bring about an understanding which would help to brighten it. The Commission's work was the acid test of the world situation, and if it were to end in a breakdown, that situation would become desperate.

If certain representatives had received such narrow instructions that a breakdown could not be averted, he suggested that they should request their Governments to broaden them. He recalled that whilst the Commission was beginning its second Session, the "Big Four" were meeting in London to prepare the peace treaties. It could not be forgotten that for more than ten years the Hitler regime had trampled on the most sacred of human rights. Moreover, it was to those recent events that the Commission owed its creation. He could understand the difficult position of some Great Powers, but he believed that if the medium and small Powers combined their efforts, they could invite the "Big Powers" to follow their lead, in the same way as the [12] small and medium Powers followed the Great Powers in their efforts to secure peace; they could by contrast speak more frankly and act more freely to promote general agreement. He gathered from the Commission's discussions that the issue of a "Declaration" or a "Convention" was a challenge between small and great Powers. He trusted that hopes of agreement would not be disappointed.

He recalled that the Drafting Committee had decided to study the Declaration and Convention simultaneously, but it had soon become apparent that it had time only to prepare a Declaration; it was for that reason that Document E/CN.4/21 devoted so much space to the Declaration. If the Commission now decided to study both documents simultaneously, he was afraid it would encounter the same difficulties as the Drafting Committee. It would be dishonest, he thought, to say that the Commission wanted to prepare a Convention when it knew that the latter was a practical impossibility. Therefore representatives should say clearly whether they wished to have a Convention or not.

After examining the proposals presented by certain delegations he had decided that the one advanced by France was the least suitable, since the most important document was the Convention, which was moreover the end to which the Declaration was directed. The Belgian proposal seemed to him the best one since it conformed most closely to the Commission's terms of reference. As to the proposal submitted by the Soviet Union, it was very important for agreement to be reached on the general principles of Human Rights, and he would not be opposed to a prior examination of those principles, provided the Commission were determined to go further. He believed the proposals submitted by the [13] Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and Belgium could be brought together and harmonized provided only that the Commission declared its determination to prepare a Convention and stated that it would never publish a Declaration without a Convention. He supported the two latter proposals.

THE CHAIRMAN stated that the representative of Australia had submitted an amendment to the proposal made by the Belgian delegation, which had accepted it. The amendment in question replaced the word "Declaration" by "Covenant or Convention".

1. Report of the Drafting Committee (continuation of discussion)

THE CHAIRMAN welcomed General Romulo, representative of the Philippine Republic, to the Commission.

GENERAL ROMULO (Philippine Republic) thanked the Chairman and apologized for his late arrival. He went on to say that it appeared perfectly clear to him, from the Terms of Reference, that the Commission's primary function was to produce a draft International Bill of Human Rights. The drafting of a Declaration on Human Rights, although not excluded by the Terms of Reference, would appear to be subordinate to the main task. He shared the opinions of the representatives of Australia, Belgium and Lebanon concerning the lack of value of a Declaration, which might be approved by the General Assembly in the form of a recommendation to Member States. He cited the case of Chapter XI of the United Nations Charter, entitled "Declaration regarding Non-Self-Governing Territories". That chapter, he declared, had been attacked in the Committees of the General Assembly on the grounds that, because it is called "a Declaration" it was not legally binding on the metropolitan powers; it had been maintained that its force was exclusively moral. He said he wished to make it clear that, while he favoured the drafting of a Declaration, he considered it was incidental to the main task of drafting the Bill of Rights and some form of international agreement to secure implementation thereof. He therefore supported the Belgian resolution, as likely to produce concrete results. He was also prepared to support the Soviet Union resolution, provided it could clearly be inferred therefrom that the draft "Declaration on Human Rights" would form the basis for both a Declaration and a Convention, embodying a Bill of Rights.

He went on to say that, in his opinion, the representatives represented not only their own Governments, but the other Member States of the United Nations as well, and that they had a task to perform of the first importance for all the peoples of the world.

THE CHAIRMAN said that she wished to clarify the position regarding nomenclature. Paragraph (a) of the Terms of Reference spoke of "an International Bill of Rights", but did not define the term. She maintained that, whatever its meaning might be in the domestic field, the term had no accepted meaning in the international realm; there was no existing concept of "bills" as such in international law. Certain well-known terms existed in international law, such as treaties, conventions, resolutions, declarations, pacts, etc., to define international instruments. Such terms had come, through usage, to have well accepted meanings as to their binding effect. She stated that what the Commission was doing, or hoped to do, was to give the term "bill" a meaning in the international field; at the same time she pointed out that the effect of the work accomplished would not depend on the name of the instrument drafted, but on its type. In support of the view that "a Bill of Rights" need not necessarily be cast in convention form, she cited the opinions of a distinguished international lawyer, Mr. Lauterpacht, expressed in his book An International Bill of Rights of Man.

She went on to restate the position of the United States. Her Government felt that it would be fairly easy for the Commission to produce during the present session a very good Declaration; the material to do this was at hand in concise form. Her Government did not object to consideration of the Convention, but felt that the principles for the Convention would emerge from the discussion [5] of the Declaration. While agreeing that the Declaration had no legal method of enforcement, she considered its moral value would be great. Her Government did not consider it would be wise to draft the Convention until Member Governments had had an opportunity to comment on the draft Declaration.

THE CHAIRMAN went on to state that four proposals had been made, falling into two categories. The Belgian and the Soviet Union proposals dealt with procedural questions and she ruled that the Belgian proposal should be voted upon first, followed by a vote on the Soviet Union proposal. She considered that the two remaining proposals dealt with matters of substance and, as such, should be voted upon in accordance with Article 54 of the Rules of Procedure: first the French proposal, because it was most far-reaching, and second the United Kingdom proposal.

She added that the United States Government opposed the Belgian proposal as not likely to produce results. It would have been better, in her opinion, to have reached substantial agreement in Plenary Session and then appointed Committees for final drafting purposes. Her Government would support the Soviet Union proposal provided it was clearly understood that it did not exclude the possibility of work being started on the Convention. In the French proposal there were certain points, such as the plan to amend the Charter, and the proposal for implementation to be included in the Declaration as well as the Convention, with which her Government could not agree. She proposed an amendment to the United Kingdom proposal that the first sentence should read: "The Commission considers that it is necessary to prepare two documents, of which one will be a Declaration and the other a Convention". With that amendment, and with the exception of the [6] third paragraph, her Government would vote in favour of the United Kingdom proposal. She added that the Belgian representative had requested that the vote on his proposal should be taken paragraph by paragraph and that he accepted the amendment proposed by the representative of Australia that the word "(Declaration)" be changed to "(Bill or Convention)".

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) asked that the Soviet Union proposal be voted upon first. While it proposed the immediate discussion of the draft Declaration on Human Rights contained in the Drafting Committee's report, it did not preclude the possibility of discussion and elaboration of other documents at a later stage.

DR. MALIK (Lebanon), in an effort to simplify the procedure, suggested that there were only two basic issues to be decided: (1) whether or not the Commission should prepare in the present Session both a Declaration and a Convention; and, once that question was settled, (2) whether or not the study and preparation should be undertaken by committees or by the Commission as a whole. The question of implementation would be the only one remaining for a decision after these two points had been voted on.

THE CHAIRMAN, in view of Dr. Malik's remarks, felt it might be better to vote first on the proposals of substance.

GENERAL ROMULO (Philippine Republic) considered that the United Kingdom proposal and the Belgian proposal were alike in substance. He enquired what would happen to paragraphs 3 and 4 of the United Kingdom proposal if the vote on the Belgian proposal were taken first.

THE CHAIRMAN said that, if the votes were taken first on the proposals of substance, they would be taken in the following order: the French proposal with the exception of the last paragraph, the United States amendment to the first paragraph of the United Kingdom proposal, the Belgian proposal, the third paragraph of the United Kingdom proposal and the last paragraph of the French proposal. If the Belgian proposal were carried, the fourth paragraph of the United Kingdom proposal would automatically fall. The last vote would be on the Soviet Union proposal.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) disagreed with Dr. Malik's analysis of the position and said he could not accept the procedure he had proposed, which, in his opinion, involved an immediate choice between a Declaration and a Convention. He said that he preferred the original ruling of the Chairman, but that he had no objection to the Soviet Union proposal being voted upon first. In view of the importance of the votes, he requested that they should be taken by roll call.

MR. CASSIN (France) felt that the questions of substance ought to be decided first. He pointed out that a recommendation of the Economic and Social Council requesting the Commission to submit at the earliest possible date proposals as to means to assure the effective observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms had been omitted from the document embodying the Commission's Terms of Reference. It was important that the Commission keep that task in mind.

THE CHAIRMAN asked if her original ruling on procedure was challenged by any representative and, as no objection was raised, said they would therefore vote on procedural proposals first and would begin with the Soviet Union proposal.

[8]

M. CASSIN (France), while accenting the Chairman's ruling, requested that the Soviet Union proposal be voted upon in two parts: first "That the Commission proceed without delay to consider the draft 'Declaration on Human Rights' submitted by the Drafting Committee", and second "That the Commission postpone the present discussion until after the draft has been considered".

DR. MALIK (Lebanon) felt it was a dangerous procedure to vote first on the Soviet Union proposal. He cited the experience of the Drafting Committee to support his contention that there was a danger of exhausting the time at their disposal in the present session in elaborating the Declaration without doing anything about the Convention. He therefore proposed an amendment to the Soviet Union proposal: "That the Commission proceed without delay to consider the draft Declaration contained in Annex F, and the draft Articles for inclusion in a Convention contained in Annex G of the Report submitted by the Drafting Committee."

GENERAL ROMULO (Philippine Republic) supported the Lebanon amendment.

COL. HODGSON (Australia) asked the Soviet Union representative, through the Chairman, to indicate whether he accepted the undertaking asked for by the representative of the United States that the passage of the Soviet Union proposal did not preclude the immediate consideration of a Convention and of implementation at the present session.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said his proposal did not preclude the possibility that the Commission might formulate proposals as to the consideration of a draft Convention or any other document at a later stage of the Commission's discussions, after the draft Declaration had been considered. [9] He did not agree with the representative of Lebanon's views. If all the time at the disposal of the Commission were going to be used in considering the draft Declaration, how could Dr. Malik argue that it would take less time to consider simultaneously two documents?

THE CHAIRMAN asked the Soviet Union representative if he would accept Dr. Malik's amendment.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said the amendment of the representative of Lebanon merely tended to complicate the issue and maintained that it would be better for the Commission to concentrate its efforts on the draft Declaration. If agreement as to the contents of the Declaration were reached, he felt the further tasks would be more easily discharged.

DR. RIBNIKAR (Yugoslavia) was of opinion that the Lebanon proposal should be considered separately. In his opinion it was not an amendment to the Soviet Union proposal because it destroyed the very substance of it.

DR. MALIK (Lebanon) pointed out that, if his amendment were passed, the last clause of the Soviet Union proposal would automatically fall.

THE CHAIRMAN, in answer to the representative of Yugoslavia, stated that Dr. Malik's proposal was presented as an amendment to the Soviet Union proposal and would have to be considered as such.

LORD DUKESTON (United Kingdom) supported Dr. Malik's amendment. He felt it was quite clear that the intention of the Soviet Union proposal was to give priority to the Declaration; it was equally clear that the Commission was not going to have an opportunity of discussing the Convention in the present Session. He considered [10] the issues were, whether or not to have both a Declaration and a Convention, and, whether these should be considered and drafted simultaneously. In his opinion those questions had to be settled.

MR. CASSIN (France) said that by asking for the vote on the Soviet Union proposal to be taken in two parts, he had implied that its first paragraph was sufficient in itself. On that point he was in agreement with Dr. Malik. He said that he had an amendment to propose when the second part of the Soviet Union proposal was considered.

COL. HODGSON (Australia) asked the Chairman whether, if the Soviet Union proposal, as amended by the representative of Lebanon, were carried, it would follow that the Belgian, French and United Kingdom proposals would automatically fall? The question of implementation was contained in those proposals and should the Chairman rule them out, he felt he would be bound to submit another amendment.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) said he wished to support the remarks of the representative of Australia concerning implementation, and pointed out that should the Soviet Union proposal, as amended, be accepted, no decision on organization and method of work would have been taken. He therefore considered it necessary that the Belgian proposal dealing with procedure should be put to the vote.

THE CHAIRMAN ruled that regardless of what decision was taken on the Soviet Union proposal, votes would also be taken on the Belgian, French and United Kingdom proposals.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said he noted that the Soviet Union proposal had given rise to amendments [11] by the representatives of Lebanon, Australia and Belgium. If action were taken on all these amendments, he felt he would be in the position of having to vote against his own proposal. He contended that the original Soviet Union proposal should be voted upon and that the amendments should be considered as separate proposals.

THE CHAIRMAN said that only one amendment to the Soviet Union proposal had been made, that of the representative of Lebanon. The representative of France had suggested that the vote on the Soviet Union proposal should be taken in two parts. She asked the representative of the Soviet Union if he agreed to that.

MR. KLEKOVKIN (Ukrainian SSR) contended that the Lebanon amendment changed the substance of the Soviet Union proposal and it should therefore be considered separately. The Soviet Union proposal tended to exclude consideration of the draft Convention for the time being; after deciding on the draft Declaration the Commission would be able to decide whether or not to have a Convention. The Soviet Union proposal in its original form was merely a procedural one and should be retained in that form.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) stated that the Soviet Union Delegation could not agree to the amendments proposed by the representatives of Belgium, Lebanon and Australia. Regarding the French proposal to divide the vote into two parts he understood the procedure was that a division might be requested by any representative. In view of the fact that the whole proposal consisted of one sentence only, however, he was of the opinion that it would be more advisable to vote on it as a whole.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) understood the perplexity of the Soviet Union representative and suggested two means whereby the difficulty might be solved: (1) the Soviet Union representative might withdraw his resolution, or, (2) he might agree to the Belgian [12] proposal being voted upon first.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) was unable to accept either of those suggestions.

THE CHAIRMAN requested a vote by roll call on the amendment to the Soviet Union proposal:

“That the Commission proceed without delay to consider the draft ‘Declaration on Human Rights’ contained in Annex F, and the draft Articles for inclusion in a Convention contained in Annex G of the Report submitted by the Drafting Committee.”

The amendment was accepted by 10 votes to 4 with 1 abstention.<sup>31</sup>

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) stated that the Soviet Union Delegation had refused to accept the amendments of the representatives of Belgium, Lebanon and Australia and it considered the proposal just voted on, not as a Soviet Union proposal, but as a Lebanon proposal. The Soviet Union Delegation therefore withdrew its proposal.

THE CHAIRMAN requested a vote by roll call on the first paragraph of the Belgian proposal:

“1. The immediate setting up of three Working Parties, to deal respectively with the problem of the Declaration, the Convention or Conventions, and implementation.” The proposal was accepted by 8 votes to 6, with 1 abstention.

A vote by roll call was taken on paragraph 2 of the Belgian proposal:

“2. The membership of these Working Parties would be determined in accordance with the Chairman’s proposal”, and it was accepted by 10 votes to 1, with 4 abstentions.

DR. MALIK (Lebanon) raised a point of order in connection with paragraph 3 of the Lebanon proposal. He considered that “the first Working Party” really referred to the second Working Party and [13] suggested altering the numbering of the groups to put paragraph 3 into harmony with the principles in paragraph 1.

<sup>31</sup> Although a roll call vote was requested, there is no record of the results.

MR. CASSIN (France) proposed that the original draft of the Belgian proposal should be retained in the third paragraph.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) said he agreed with Dr. Malik regarding the alteration of the numbering of the groups in paragraph 3. He could not agree to the French proposal as he had already accepted the amendment proposed by the Australian representative.

MR. AMADO (Panama) said that should the word "Declaration" be changed to "Bill or Convention" in paragraph 3 of the Belgian proposal, he would be unable to vote in favour of paragraph 3.

THE CHAIRMAN requested a vote by roll call on the Australian amendment to change the word "(Declaration)" in line 1 of paragraph 3 of the Belgian proposal to "(Bill or Convention)". The amendment was rejected by 9 votes to 5 with 1 abstention.

She then asked for a vote on the French amendment to retain the original wording of paragraph 3 of the Belgian proposal. The amendment was passed by 3 votes with 12 abstentions.

She then asked for a vote on paragraph 3 of the Belgian proposal:

"3. The first Working Party (Declaration) would begin its work immediately upon its establishment. The second and third Working Parties would begin work as soon as the Secretariat services were in a position to assist them, and at latest on Monday, 8 December."

The proposal was accepted by 8 votes, with 7 abstentions.

A vote was then taken on paragraph 4 of the Belgian proposal:

"4. These Working Parties would present reports to the Plenary Commission as soon as possible; the Commission would, in the course of the present session, take such decisions in regard to their proposals as it deemed advisable."

[14]

The proposal was accepted by 10 votes to 1, with 4 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN then requested a vote on the Belgian proposal as a whole, and it was accepted by 9 votes to 5, with 1 abstention.

MR. CASSIN (France) said he was prepared to withdraw his resolution, and proposed the addition of a heading to the Belgian proposal just accepted: "The Commission, desirous of fulfilling its mission, resolves to proceed to:"

THE CHAIRMAN said that, as no objections were raised, the Commission accepted the text of the representative of France as a heading to the Belgian resolution. She stated that the United States amendment to the United Kingdom proposal would be voted upon next.

COL. HODGSON (Australia), on a point of order, asked whether the United Kingdom proposal fell by virtue of the Belgian proposal just accepted.

THE CHAIRMAN thereupon asked the United Kingdom representative whether he was willing to withdraw his proposal, in view of the passing of the Belgian proposal.

LORD DUKESTON (United Kingdom) felt that paragraph 1 of his proposal raised the issue of whether the document to be prepared would be called a "Bill" or a "Convention". In his opinion paragraph 2 was also important. He withdrew paragraphs 3 and 4, and asked that paragraphs 1 and 2 should be voted upon.

THE CHAIRMAN requested a vote on the United States amendment to the first paragraph of the United Kingdom proposal: "The Commission considers that it is necessary to prepare two documents, of which one will be a Declaration and the other a Convention." The amendment was rejected by 8 votes to 4, with 4 abstentions.

A vote was then taken on paragraph 1 of the United Kingdom proposal: "The Commission considers that it is necessary to prepare two documents, a Bill of Human Rights in the form of a [15] Convention, and a Declaration of Human Rights." The vote resulted in 6 for the proposal, 6 against it and 3 abstentions, and the Chairman stated that, according to Rule 39 of the Rules of Procedure, the proposal was rejected.

LORD DUKESTON (United Kingdom) agreed that the second paragraph of his proposal fell, in virtue of the rejection of the first paragraph.

COL. HODGSON (Australia) asked if it could be assumed that the Working Group on Implementation would have for the basis of its study Annex H of the Report of the Drafting Committee.

THE CHAIRMAN considered that that was a point which the Working Group itself would have to decide.

The meeting rose at 6:25 p.m.

World Jewish Congress

In a 7-page memorandum, dated November 1947, it is urged that first of all that at the present session of the Commission priority should be given to the problem of safeguarding human rights and fundamental freedoms, and of equality in law and in fact. A proper procedure for safeguarding human rights and the principle of equality as the basis of such rights, could be agreed to even before either the Declaration or Convention were completed.

...

A concluding section of the memorandum contains a number of specific amendments to various Articles in either the Draft Declaration or Draft Convention, which may be briefly summarized as follows. Any Bill of Rights should provide that every State is under obligation to respect the human rights of each of its subjects and has the right in return to the loyalty of every subject. In connection of freedom of movement (See Article 9, Secretariat Draft), it is suggested that only the most specific and explicit reasons connected with national security should be the permitted basis of any restrictive measures. The provisions of Article 9 of the Draft Convention should be of a nature to protect the honour and security not only of individuals but also of racial and religious groups. As regards rights of asylum, it is argued that this ancient right – often denied during recent years with tragic consequences to hundreds of thousands of Jews – should be formally re-established under the auspices of the United Nations. Similarly, stateless persons should enjoy all human rights and freedoms, under the protection of some agency of the United Nations.

World Jewish Congress and the Coordinating Board of Jewish Organizations for Consultation with the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations

These organizations jointly propose that wording adopted from the Woodrow Wilson Draft should provide the language for Article 20(2). Alternative text – of the Draft Declaration, as follows: “No law or regulation shall be made which prohibits or interferes with the free exercise of religion or any form of religious worship and observance, and no discrimination shall be made, either in law or in fact, against any person who practices any particular creed, religion or belief whose practices are not inconsistent with public order or public morals.”

[3]

Commission of the Churches on International Affairs

The following are the chief desiderata in a statement submitted to the Commission on Human Rights at its present Session. The Commission is urged to complete drafts both of a Declaration and a Convention; furthermore, to include in both documents adequate safeguards for freedom of religious belief and of religious expression, whether in relation to individuals or to corporate bodies.

The importance is stressed, in the event that the Articles are drafted in brief form, of using such general and inclusive terms that all the rights and freedoms attaching the exercise of religion will be embraced. If, on the contrary, the articles take a more detailed form, then it is urged that freedom of religion be defined in such a manner that no rights or freedoms essential to religious belief and practice, are excluded, whether by specific reference or by implication.

Consultative Council of Jewish Organizations

The Consultative Council of Jewish Organizations which is composed of the Alliance Israelite Universelle, the American-Jewish Committee and the Anglo-Jewish Association has submitted a memorandum with proposals for articles to be considered in a Convention.

1. It stresses at the outset the importance of founding an International Bill of Rights in the form of a Convention, with enforcement provisions. A declaration of principles without specific safeguards would not be adequate.

5 December 1947

Report Submitted to the Commission on Human Rights by the Sub-Commission on the Prevention of Discrimination and the Protection of Minorities

(Draft)

[2]

...

I.

Draft Declaration of Human Rights

The Sub-Commission had before it the draft International Declaration on Human Rights drawn up by the Drafting Committee (E/CN.4/21, Annex F.) It noted that certain articles in the draft were designed to prevent discrimination and protect minorities. Consequently, although the Draft Declaration had not been officially communicated to it, the Sub-Commission considered that it should take that important document into account. It felt that the best way of obtaining concrete results of immediate value was to start by dealing with the subjects coming under its terms of reference within the framework of those articles of the Draft Declaration which had been indicated as relating to those terms of reference.

The Sub-Commission therefore proceeded to study the following articles of the Draft Declaration: article 6, article 13, article 15, article 28, and article 36. For the most part this study resulted in amendments being proposed.

1. Article 6

Text proposed by the Sub-Commission:

“Every one is entitled to all the rights and freedoms set forth in this Declaration, without distinction of any kind, such as race, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, property status, or national or social origin.”<sup>1</sup>

(Adopted by 9 votes to 1, with 1 abstention).

Every one is entitled to the rights and freedoms set forth in this Declaration without distinction as to race, sex, language, or religion.

[3]

The Sub-Commission, in adopting the text, thought there was no need for a special mention of “colour”, as that was included in “race”.

It also considered that in completing by the words “political or other opinion, property status, or national or social origin”, the list given in paragraph 3 of Article 2 of the Charter (“without distinction as to race, sex, language, or religion”), it had not added to that list, but had merely interpreted and clarified it by means of examples. The Sub-Commission’s text (“without distinction of any kind such as race. . .etc.”) is, moreover, intended to show that its list is not exhaustive.

It will be seen that the Sub-Commission has referred in the article to “all the rights. . .etc.” It intended to show in this way that it was not necessary to develop the idea further in Article 6, as the substance of the rights and freedoms was established in the other articles of the Declaration.

Finally, the Sub-Commission wished to make it clear that the words “national origin” should be interpreted by taking the idea of “nationality” not in its legal sense (subject of a State), but in its sociological sense (national characteristics).

Remarks by Mr. Nisot (Belgium):

“I abstained from voting on article 6, since, in my view, it should have reproduced only the enumeration found in the Charter: ‘without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion’, instead of increasing this enumeration. The terms of the Charter, beyond all possible dispute, are binding upon all the Members of the United Nations. It would, therefore, have been wise strictly to adhere to them owing to the organic nature of the text in question (the Declaration).”

Remarks by Mr. Borisov (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics):

“As drafted by the Sub-Commission Article 6 is not satisfactory. In particular, there is no mention of prevention of racial discrimination and no direct reference to enjoyment of equal rights for all in the fields of economic, cultural and social-political life. Even part of those omissions would prevent the rights of everyone ‘without distinction of race, sex, language or religion’ from being secured by the Article.”

Mr. McNamara and Dr. Wu submitted a text amending the proposal of Mr. Borisov. Its wording was as follows:

“Any advocacy of national, racial and religious hostility and any action establishing a privilege or a discrimination based on distinctions of race, nationality or religion shall be prohibited by the law of the State.”

This text was not adopted, there being 5 votes for and 5 against, with 1 abstention.

On the other hand, the Sub-Commission adopted, by 10 votes with 1 abstention, the following recommendation:

“The Sub-Commission recommends to the Commission on Human Rights the inclusion in the proposed Convention or in the Declaration of Rights, in the appropriate places, of clauses condemning incitement to violence against religious groups, nations, races, and minorities.”

[4]

2. Article 13

Text proposed by the Sub-Commission:

“Subject to any general law not contrary to the purposes and principles of the United Nations Charter and adopted for specific reasons of security or in the general interest, there shall be liberty of movement and free choice of residence within the territory of each State.

Individuals shall be free to leave their own country and to change their nationality to that of any country willing to accept them.”<sup>2</sup>

(Adopted by 8 votes to 2, with 1 abstention.)

Discussion centred on the right to circulate outside the country and to emigrate and to change nationality. In the text proposed by the Sub-Commission, the right to emigrate and change nationality is not made dependent upon a condition.

Remarks by Mr. Borisov (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics):

“Mr. Borisov is in favour of deleting the second paragraph of Article 13.”

Remarks by Mr. McNamara (Australia):

“Mr. McNamara proposes the following text for consideration by the Commission on Human Rights, and by any Drafting Committee:

‘Further, any general law referred to herein shall not be inconsistent with Article 6 of the International Declaration on Human Rights, as amended by this Sub-Commission.’”

Remarks by Mr. Nisot (Belgium):

“I was unable to agree to Article 13, because of the absolute bearing of its second sentence, which is not subject to the reservation (concerning laws in conformity with the Charter) by which the first sentence is governed. In the absence of such a reservation, the possibility for individuals to leave their country or relinquish their nationality is made dependent, in principle, on their sole will, without the State being able, even for reasons of general interest or national security, to limit this possibility, in particular by making it contingent on authorization. Such a radical provision cannot, in my view, but diminish the probabilities of the Declaration being, on this point, accepted or observed by Governments.”

[2] Text established by the Drafting Committee:

“There shall be liberty of movement and free choice of residence within the borders of each State. This freedom may be regulated by any general law adopted in the interest of national welfare and security. Individuals may freely emigrate or renounce their nationality.”

[5]

3. Article 15

Article 15 of the Drafting Committee's text<sup>3</sup> gave rise to discussion.

Finally, by 7 votes to 2 (with 2 abstentions) the Sub-Commission decided to take no decision on this Article at the present stage, since the Commission on the Status of Women, which was to meet in January next, was the proper body to make an exhaustive study of the Article, particularly from the point of view of marriage, and the Sub-Commission should await its findings.

Remarks by Mr. McNamara (Australia):

Mr. McNamara submitted the following text for consideration by the Human Rights Commission or by a Drafting Committee;

“The following words to be added after ‘everyone has the right’:

‘On the basis of Article 6 as amended by this Sub-Commission’”

Remarks by Mr. Masani (India) and Mr. Daniels (United States)

“In view of the decision of the Sub-Commission that this Article was not yet open to discussion at this stage, in the absence of any recommendations from the Commission on the Status of Women, we would like to place on record our view that this Article should guarantee the right to everyone to consult with and be represented by counsel of his own choice.”

Remarks by Miss Monroe (United Kingdom)

“Since the Sub-Commission decided that there should be no discussion on the merits of Article 15, Miss Monroe wished it to be recorded that the right to be represented by counsel does not exist in some native courts in the British Colonial Empire. Representation by counsel has proved to be an alien importation into the judicial process of many backward people, and since it is in the British practice to allow Native Courts to develop in the manner best suited to the community which they serve, some courts still adhere to their customary procedure. Since the right to be represented by counsel is recognized in higher courts, including those which hear appeals from the Native Courts in question, the practice is not discriminatory.”

Remarks by Mr. Borisov (USSR)

“He said that the Drafting Committee of the Human Rights Commission had requested the Sub-Commission to take a decision not on Article 15 as a whole but only on the question of marriage.

As regards the question of marriage, this should, he thought, be protected and regulated by law on the basis of equality between men and women, without discrimination of race, religion or origin.”

[<sup>3</sup>] Everyone has the right to a status in law and to the enjoyment of fundamental civil rights.

Everyone shall have access to independent and impartial tribunals for the determination of his right, liabilities and obligations under the law. He shall have the right to consult with and to be represented by counsel.

[6]

4. Article 28

Text adopted by the Sub-Commission

“Everyone shall have equal opportunity to engage in public employment and to hold public office in the State of which he is a citizen. Access to examination for public employment shall not be a matter of privilege or favour.”<sup>4</sup>

(Adopted by 9 votes with 2 abstentions)

This article was adopted in the form in which it had been drawn up by the Drafting Committee, after a discussion in the course of which the value of examinations as an impartial method of selection was questioned by certain members of the Sub-Commission.

Remarks by Mr. McNamara (Australia)

“In the second sentence of Article 28, the words ‘and the subject matter of such examinations’ should be inserted after the words ‘public employment’.”

Remarks by Mr. Borisov (USSR)

“He observed that the system of examinations in various forms facilitated discrimination and non-admission of the poorer classes to public office or employment. The examination system had not proved satisfactory, as was shown by the second paragraph of Article 28 itself, according to which examinations were not open to all and involved privileges and favours for certain persons. He thought that the second paragraph of Article 28, which restricted the rights mentioned in the first paragraph of that article, should be omitted.”

5. Article 36

Text proposed by the Sub-Commission

“In States inhabited by well defined ethnic, linguistic or religious groups which are clearly distinguished from the rest of the population and which want to be accorded differential treatment, persons belonging to such groups shall have the right as far as is compatible with public order and security to establish and maintain their schools and cultural or religious institutions, and to use their own language and script in the press, in public assembly and before the courts and other authorities of the State, if they so choose.”<sup>5</sup>

Everyone shall have equal opportunity to engage in public employment and to hold public office in the State of which he is a citizen. Access to examinations for public employment shall not be a matter of privilege or favour.

“In States inhabited by a substantial number of persons of a race, language or religion other than those of the majority of the population, persons belonging to such ethnic, linguistic or religious minorities shall have the right as far as compatible with public order to establish and maintain their schools and cultural or religious institutions, and to use their own language in the press, in public assembly and before the courts and other authorities of the State.”

[7]

The text differs from the one prepared by the Drafting Committee in that it further defines what is meant in the Article by a minority group.

1. It no longer requires that a “substantial number” of individuals should be involved;
2. It requires that “well defined groups” should be involved;
3. It requires that such groups should be “clearly distinguished from the rest of the population” (objective criterion);
4. It requires that such groups should “want to be accorded differential treatment” (subjective criterion).<sup>6</sup>

In addition, the new text has the following special feature. Under its terms the determination of the persons who are to enjoy the rights enumerated in the Article (which henceforth include the right to use their own “script”) is based on the definition of the groups to which they belong.

Under the terms of the text, protection is granted to “persons” and not reserved for “citizens”. There is, therefore, no need to make a distinction as to whether the individuals concerned are or are not nationals of the country in which they are established.

Remarks by Mr. Nisot (Belgium):

“This Article has given rise to a long debate, bearing, in particular, on the question whether its benefit should be limited to nationals, or, on the contrary, should be extended to all individuals, nationals or aliens, members of the groups concerned. The latter solution prevailed: the word ‘persons’ was inserted in the text in preference to the word ‘citizens’. This is why I was unable to agree to Article 36. It appeared to me indeed excessive to grant the differential treatment in question to aliens. These, moreover, may be established on the territory only temporarily (tourists, migrant workers . . . etc.). It is hardly necessary to recall that the treaties and declarations on minorities which came into being between the two wars apply, in this connection, to nationals alone. It will be for the Commission on Human Rights to study the Draft Declaration from the viewpoint of its compatibility with paragraph 7 of Article 2 of the Charter, which forbids organs of the United Nations to intervene in matters essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of the member States. In my view, such a study will be particularly indicated with respect to Article 36 as adopted by the Sub-Commission.”

<sup>[6]</sup> Mr. Roy had submitted an amendment proposing the deletion of the final words of the Article: “if they so choose”. This amendment was not adopted, there being 5 votes in favour, 5 against and 2 abstentions.

[8]

Remarks by Mr. McNamara (Australia)

Mr. McNamara had proposed to modify as follows the text of the Drafting Committee.

1. Delete the words “a substantial number of”;
2. Delete words, “as far as compatible with public order”, and substitute for them the words “on the basis of loyalty to the State of which they are resident members”;
3. Add the words, “where they have not a practicable facility in the official language” between the words “and” and “before”, in the last line but one.

Summary Record of the Thirtieth Meeting
[of the Commission on Human Rights]

Held at the Palais des Nations, Geneva, on Friday,
5 December 1947, at 10 a.m.

Present: Chairman: Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt (United States of America). Members: Col. W. R. Hodgson (Australia); Professor F. Dehousse (Belgium); Mr. A. S. Stepanenko (Byelorussian SSR); Dr. Wu (China); Mr. Loutfi (Egypt); Professor Cassin (France); Mrs. H. Mehta (India); Mr. Pourevaly (Iran); Dr. C. Malik (Lebanon); Mr. M. Amado (Panama); General C. Romulo (Philippine Republic); Lord Dukeston (United Kingdom); Mr. Klekovkin (Ukrainian SSR); Mr. A. E. Bogomolov (USSR); Dr. V. Ribnikar (Yugoslavia). Representatives of the Commission on the Status of Women: Mrs. Begtrup; Mrs. Uralova. Secretariat: Professor J. P. Humphrey; Mr. E. Lawson. Specialized Agencies: Mr. J. de Givry (ILO). [2] Non-Governmental Organizations: Category A: Miss T. Sender (American Federation of Labor); Mr. Robinet de Cléry (Interparliamentary Union); Mr. Serrarens (International Federation of Christian Trade Unions). Non-Governmental Organizations: Category B: Dr. Bienenfeld (World Jewish Congress); Mr. Duchosal (International Committee of the Red Cross); Miss van Eeghen (International Council of Women); Mr. F. Nolde (Commission of the Churches on International Affairs); Miss de Romer (International Union of Catholic Women's Leagues); Mr. M. Winn (Consultative Council of Jewish Organizations).

THE CHAIRMAN stated that, since the Commission had formally decided in favour of the setting up of three Working Groups, those Groups would start their work simultaneously at the end of the present plenary meeting. The establishment of three Working Groups meeting simultaneously raised certain technical difficulties for the Secretariat, which it had endeavoured to overcome by forming linguistically homogeneous groups.

The composition of the Working Groups would be as follows:

1. Group on the Declaration: United States of America, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Byelorussian SSR, Philippines, Panama and China.
2. Group on the Convention: United Kingdom, Yugoslavia, India, France, Chile, Lebanon.

3. Group on Implementation: Australia, Belgium, Iran, Ukrainian SSR, Egypt and Uruguay.

The Commission needed to set up a Sub-Committee to deal with the Human Rights Yearbook, the examination of the Report of the War Crimes Commission and the document on the Evolution of Human Rights. That Sub-Committee would consist of the representatives of Belgium, Egypt and Yugoslavia.

PROFESSOR CASSIN (France) asked, in view of the part he had played over a long period in the work connected with the elaboration of an International Declaration of Rights, to be associated with the work of the Group on the Declaration, rather than with that of the Group on the Convention.

THE CHAIRMAN agreed to that request, and proposed that the representative of China should take Professor Cassin's place in the Group on the Convention.

DR. WU (China) agreed to that proposal.

COLONEL HODGSON (Australia) asked whether it would not be possible for a Delegation to take part in the work of two Groups at the same time.

THE CHAIRMAN did not think that was possible, as the Groups would be working simultaneously.

COLONEL HODGSON (Australia) suggested that the deputies or alternates of members might take their places.

THE CHAIRMAN stated that they would only be able to attend the meetings as observers without the right to vote; Article 11 of the Rules of procedure stipulated in fact that an alternate was only granted the right to vote when replacing an absent member: that was not the case in the present instance, and it would be more appropriate to call such observers "representatives", rather than alternates.

LORD DUKESTON (United Kingdom) stated that if the Working Groups overlapped they would hold each other up. It would be preferable if they confined themselves to their own work, which should subsequently be discussed in plenary session.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that it was merely a question of the Advisers of regular members of the Commission attending the meetings of the other Groups as representatives, with the right to take part in the discussion on request.

MR. LOUTFI (Egypt) stated that he would like to take part in the work of the Group on the Convention. Mrs. Mehta (India) would be willing to take his place in the Group on Implementation.

THE CHAIRMAN agreed to that change.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (USSR) wished it to be understood that the work of the Groups was no more than a preliminary stage, the final stage being the discussion in the plenary Commission. Members would therefore have the right to reserve their opinions, even on points concerning the work of their own Groups. Furthermore, he could see no advantage in the proposal of the Australian representative, since each Member would be able to state his criticisms in plenary session.

THE CHAIRMAN stated that the Australian proposal was prompted by a desire to save the Commission's time. Through the intermediary of the observers, members would be able to keep themselves informed of the work of the other Groups as it progressed, thereby avoiding unnecessary repetition during the discussions in plenary session.

COLONEL HODGSON (Australia) asked whether the representatives of the Specialized Agencies and Non-Governmental Organizations intended to speak before the close of the present plenary meeting.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (USSR) was glad the Australian representative had raised that question.

THE CHAIRMAN, before inviting the representatives of the Specialized Agencies or the observers to submit their observations, wished to point out that it was for each Working Group officially to invite one of the representatives of the Commission on the Status of Women to attend their meetings whenever a question within their sphere of interest was to be discussed.

MISS TONI SENDER (Representative of the American Federation of Labor) stated that it was customary for the representatives of the Non-Governmental Organizations to participate in Sub-Committees with the same rights as they enjoyed when participating in plenary Commissions. Those rights included permission to submit written statements.

MR. DE GIVRY (Representative of the International Labour Organization) stated that, with regard to questions such as trade union rights and implementation, the International Labour Organization would be glad to have its observations submitted orally by its delegates participating in the work of the various Groups.

DR. BIENENFELD (World Jewish Congress) expressed his gratitude to the Commission for the part it was allowing him to take in its work.

MR. WINN (Representative of the Consultative Council of Jewish Organizations) stated that the Organization he represented had already submitted a memorandum on the subject of the draft Declaration and Convention, and that he would submit his observations on the work undertaken in the Groups.

MR. ROBINET DE CLÉRY (Inter-Parliamentary Union) stated that Mr. Boissier and himself had already submitted a memorandum [6] on the activities of the Inter-Parliamentary Union in the field of Human Rights, and reserved the right to take part in the meetings of the Working Groups.

MR. SERRARENS (International Federation of Christian Trades Unions) stated that the Federation had already submitted a memorandum to the Commission and reserved the right to submit a new note relating to questions which concerned workers.

MR. NOLDE (Commission of the Churches on International Affairs) wished to express his gratitude to the Commission on Human Rights.

MISS DE ROMER (International Union of Catholic Women's Leagues) wished to recall that she had already proposed various amendments at the Commission's previous session on behalf of her organization, and reserved the right to submit them again in the various Groups.

THE CHAIRMAN thanked the representatives of the Specialized Agencies and Non-Governmental Organizations for their statements, adding that they would enjoy the same rights in the Working Groups as in the plenary Commission.

1. Elections of Officers

The Working Group proceeded to elect its Chairman.

Decision: Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt was elected Chairman.

The Working Group then proceeded to elect its Rapporteur.

Decision: Professor Cassin was elected Rapporteur.

THE CHAIRMAN observed that the Working Group might, if it wished, proceed to examine the proposal for a declaration submitted by the United States Delegation (Document E/CN.4/36). This Proposal was inspired by the desire to reduce to essentials the draft Declaration recommended by the Drafting Committee (Annex F to document E/CN.4/21). It therefore introduced no original element. Before proceeding to any study the Working Group should decide upon the length of the Declaration it intended to draw up. She herself was in favour of a short Declaration; brevity would facilitate its dissemination throughout the world.

PROF. CASSIN (France) thought that though a short draft was desirable the Declaration submitted by the United States was too brief. It would be well for the Declaration to begin with some articles of a general nature.

MR. AMADO (Panama) remarked that it was important that a clause be included in each article mentioning the duty of the State to implement the provisions contained in it. This suggestion did not involve any encroachment on the province of the Working Group on Implementation, but was merely designed to emphasize in the Declaration the State's duty to protect the rights defined therein.

[3]

GEN. ROMULO (Philippines) proposed that what Mr. Amado suggested should form part of a Preamble.

THE CHAIRMAN observed that it would be better for the Working Group not to discuss a Preamble at the present Session but to confine itself to defining the principles to be embodied in it.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) thought that the Working Group should take the draft Declaration given in Annex F as a basis for its work and study it article by article. Other documents, including the Proposal for a Declaration submitted by the United States, should be regarded as supplementary documents.

He hoped the Working Group would take a definite stand on this matter of basic documents.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the choice of a basic document depended on the length that the Working Group intended the Declaration to have. If the Working Group intended to draw up a long Declaration it would be best to use the report of the Drafting Committee, but if it preferred a short Declaration it would perhaps be as well to take the document submitted by the United States as a basis.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) observed that it was not a question of drawing up a short or a long Declaration but a clear, straightforward and complete one, such as would give real practical help in protecting the democratic rights of individuals. The duty of Governments to individuals could not be defined in the abstract. It would be better for the Working Group to confine itself to concrete study of the proposed rights.

MR. HEPPEL (United Kingdom) suggested that the adoption of a Preamble would make it easier to draw up the Declaration. The Declaration should be drawn up in a very different form from the [4] Convention. Whereas the Convention should be drafted in legal form, the Declaration was a statement of general principles which it would be best to make brief.

PROF. CASSIN (France) stated that in his opinion the essential differences between the Declaration and the Convention lay in their general character. The Declaration was a synthesis, a general view, whereas the Convention defined something more precise. He thought it better not to mention the State's duty to protect rights in each article. A special article to cover that would be sufficient. He emphasized however that the obligations of Governments could not be the same with regard to all rights, for instance with regard to the right to life and the right to a nationality, or the right to belong to trades unions and the right to health and hygienic housing conditions. Articles would therefore have to be worded differently. No right, moreover, except the right to freedom of thought, was unconditional. Every right had limitations imposed by the exigencies of law and order. These restrictions should also be defined in a special article rather than in connection with each right. The same applied to the principle of non-discrimination. The various articles in the Declaration could therefore be shortened considerably by embodying in a special article the obligations of the State, the limitation imposed by law and order or morality and non-discrimination.

MR. STEPANENKO (Byelorussian SSR) remarked that it did not matter whether the Declaration were long or short provided it covered all the rights. These should not be sacrificed to considerations of brevity. He supported the view expressed by both the Representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and the Representative of France that the Declaration should be drawn up before the preamble.

THE CHAIRMAN summed up the discussion and stated: (1) that the Committee noted the suggestion made by the Representative of Panama, with a view to including it in the preamble; (2) that certain articles in the present draft Declaration, such as the right to a nationality, could not be implemented by Governments. For that reason it would, in the opinion of the United States Delegation, be preferable to deal with them in later Conventions and clearly to distinguish the Declaration, which was a statement of principles without legal force, from Conventions, which constituted the legal enforcement of those principles.

Lastly she stated that in accordance with the proposal of the Representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, which had met with the Working Group's approval, the Working Group would take the Drafting Committee's report as the basic document and proceed to examine it at the next meeting. If the Representative of Panama did not agree to the including of the obligations of the State in the preamble he could express his views on the subject in the course of that discussion.

MR. ROMULO (Philippines) declared that he was against including the obligations of the State in each article.

Summary Record of the Second Meeting [of the Working Group on the Declaration of Human Rights]

Held at the Palais des Nations, Geneva, on Friday
5 December 1947, at 3 p.m.

Present: Chairman: Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt (United States of America). Rapporteur: Mr. Cassin (France). Members: Mr. Stepanenko (Byelorussian SSR); Mr. Amado (Panama); General Romulo (Philippines); Mr. Bogomolov (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics). Representatives of the Commission on the Status of Women: Mrs. Begtrup, Mrs. Uralova. Secretariat: Miss Kitchen. Specialized Agencies: Mr. De Givry (ILO); Mr. Havet (UNESCO). Non-Governmental Organizations: Category A: Mr. Robinet de Clery (Inter-Parliamentary Union); Mr. Vanistendael (International Federation of Christian Trade Unions); Category B: Dr. Duchosal (International Red Cross Committee); [2] Miss Van Eeghen (International Council of Women); Mr. Nolde (Commission of the Churches on International Affairs); Miss de Romer (International Union of Catholic Women's Leagues).

MR. AMADO (Panama) wished to emphasize the great importance of the Declaration. The ratification of a Convention was never certain. The only document possessing an immediate value would therefore be the Declaration. He was glad that members of the Working Group agreed to insert somewhere in the Declaration the duty of the State to guarantee human rights. He thought, however, that that provision might appear in each article. In the Declaration of Philadelphia, drawn up by twenty-four jurists under the auspices of the American Law Institute, each of the eighteen articles of that Declaration of Human Rights ended with a clause, different in each case, indicating the duty of the State to guarantee the right in question. As a citizen of a small country, he wished to state that it was the responsibility of the great Powers to draft a Declaration which was not merely idealistic but would effectively guarantee the rights it proclaimed.

MRS. BEGTRUP (Chairman of the Commission on the Status of Women) said that the drafting of a Declaration on Human Rights was of fundamental importance for women, who in certain countries were not even granted the rights which the most primitive constitutions granted to men. In the spirit of the proposed Declaration, all rights applied equally to women and men, but as sex equality was a right which had been acquired but recently, it would be necessary to emphasize it explicitly in certain Articles, and, even, to make particular mention of certain [3] rights guaranteed specially to women. She proposed that the following declaration be inserted in the Preamble: "When a word indicating the masculine sex is used in connection with a provision contained in the following Bill of Human Rights, the provision in question is to be considered as applying without discrimination to women."

THE CHAIRMAN suggested that the Group should proceed to examine the draft Declaration, beginning with the basic Articles, i.e. with Article 7. Articles 1 to 6 could be included in the Preamble and could be examined at the same time as the Report of the Sub-Commission on the Prevention of Discrimination and the Protection of Minorities.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) thought it preferable to follow the order in the Drafting Committee's Report and to start with article 1.

The group supported the view of the representative of the USSR.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) asked what procedure the Group intended to adopt for studying the draft Declaration: would each article be voted on separately, or would a vote be taken on the document as a whole after all the Articles had been discussed? The Soviet Delegation, for its part, regarded this document as a whole. Should the Group decide to vote on each Article separately, his Delegation would abstain from voting, but it formally reserved the right to vote on the Declaration as a whole.

THE CHAIRMAN stated that she was in favour of a vote being taken on each Article, but that did not prevent a final vote being taken on the document as a whole.
[4]

MR. CASSIN (France) declared that the two procedures were not incompatible, and proposed that a vote be taken provisionally on the substance of each Article, and that a final vote be taken later on the form and substance at a second reading of the document as a whole.

THE CHAIRMAN put the French representative's proposal to the vote.

Decision: The Working Group adopted the above proposal by 4 votes to 2.

THE CHAIRMAN then put to the vote the Panamanian representative's proposal for the insertion in each Article, or after each group of Articles, [sic] a clause mentioning or specifying the responsibility of the State in connection with the rights proclaimed in the Article.

Decision: The Working Group rejected the proposal submitted by Mr. Amado (Panama) by 2 votes to 1, with 3 abstentions.

Examination of Article 1

GENERAL ROMULO (Philippines) said there was no logical connection between the two parts of the sentence "Being endowed with reason and conscience, they are members of one family". He proposed the following draft "All men are brothers. Being endowed with reason and conscience, they are free and possess equal dignity and rights."

MRS. BEGTRUP (Chairman of the Commission on the Status of Women) pointed out that it would be preferable to substitute the term "human beings" for the term "men".

THE CHAIRMAN said that was rather a question of translation affecting the French text.

MR. AMADO (Panama) was opposed to the affirmation that "All men are brothers", which was a religious or philosophic concept and did not express in a sufficiently original manner the fundamental principles underlying this Declaration. [5]

MR. CASSIN (France) said that the authors of that Article had wished to indicate the unity of the human race regardless of frontiers, as opposed to theories like those of Hitler. He recalled, moreover, that the original French proposal started with the term "All human beings". He recognized that there was no logical connection between the two parts of the sentence "Being endowed with reason and conscience, they are members of one family". He himself would prefer to have the first part of the sentence deleted.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) considered that Article 1 contained abstract philosophical or religious notions but nothing concrete. It could not be compared with the principle of “Liberty, Equality, Fraternity” proclaimed in the Declaration of Rights of 1789. Even the latter had lent itself to varied interpretations. The Group should draw up principles in a concrete form.

MRS. URALOVA (Rapporteur of the Commission on the Status of Women) said the terms in which the Article was drafted were too high-flown to be easily understandable by all. Moreover its definitions were very general and even covered fascists. Finally, the equality of the sexes should be more clearly stated.

GENERAL ROMULO (Philippines) said that the proposal he had submitted only omitted the six words “they are members of one family”. In an Article of that kind they should not try to be original, nor be afraid of abstractions, since the concept of human rights was itself abstract.

MR. AMADO (Panama) said that if, as Professor Cassin had suggested, that Article was anti-hitlerian, it seemed to him superfluous.

THE CHAIRMAN thought that the Group, when drafting the present Article, should not have in mind the elimination of fascists, as they were to be regarded as criminals and as such, did not come within the present definition. She proposed to take a vote on the Philippine representative’s proposal.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) thought a distinction should be drawn between various degrees of abstraction. The first sentence, “All men are brothers”, expressed a more abstract idea than the affirmation, “they possess equal dignity and rights”. In his view it would be less abstract to speak of a duty of brotherhood.

MR. CASSIN (France) suggested that, to meet the wish of certain representatives and to avoid abstractions, it would be possible to say that men should refrain from inciting hatred. That would define a practical duty. The present draft of Article 1 was certainly imperfect, but he thought it essential, before defining concrete rights such as the right to life, etc. to define, in a form to be considered, values which were higher than life itself.

THE CHAIRMAN proposed that the Group should invite the representative of France to draft, in consultation with the representative of the Philippines, a new Article 1, and should pass on to Article 2.

GENERAL ROMULO (Philippines) agreed with that proposal and suggested that for the future meetings members should prepare in advance the alternatives they would like to have substituted for the Articles under examination, in order that the Group might discuss concrete proposals and not generalities.

MR. AMADO (Panama) suggested that a list of fundamental rights be drawn up, and that the Articles of the draft Declaration relating to each of those rights be then examined.

THE CHAIRMAN said that had been her intention when she suggested that the Group should take as its basic document the draft put forward by the United States. However, at the suggestion of the Soviet representative, the Group had decided straight away to take as its working document the draft prepared by the Drafting Committee. To clarify the position, however, a vote could be taken on the matter.

[7]

GENERAL ROMULO (Philippines) said they could not go back on the decision which had been taken.

MR. AMADO (Panama) supported that point of view.

THE CHAIRMAN said, that being so, the Group would proceed to discuss Article 2; she invited the French representative, in consultation with the Philippine representative, to submit a new text of Article 1.

Examination of Article 2

MR. AMADO (Panama) pointed out it was impossible to adopt Article 2 without knowing the contents of Article 1, to which it was related.

THE CHAIRMAN agreed that Article 2 referred to the rights formulated in Article 1, but it could be assumed that in any case the word “rights” would appear somewhere in Article 1. That being the case, they should decide whether they preferred one or other of the two alternatives proposed by the Drafting Committee. The United States Delegation proposed a third version, which was given at the end of Article 10 in its draft Declaration (Document E/CN.4/36). This read as follows: “The full exercise of these rights requires recognition of the rights of others and protection by law of the freedom, general welfare and security of all.”

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) considered that the second part of the United States proposal contained too general a description of the rights it proclaimed.

GENERAL ROMULO (Philippines) emphasized that the Declaration should define the duties of the individual towards the State as well as the duties of the State towards the individual. The second alternative proposed by the drafting Committee seemed to him preferable, if the beginning of the second sentence were slightly amended to read: “The individual owes duties . . .”

MR. AMADO (Panama) proposed the following draft: “In the exercise of his rights, everyone is limited by the rights of others and by the just requirements of the democratic State.”

GENERAL ROMULO (Philippines) agreed with the draft suggested by the representative of Panama and proposed that it be substituted for the first sentence of the Drafting Committee’s second alternative.

MR. CASSIN (France) pointed out that the first alternative proposed by the Drafting Committee was intended to introduce the idea of the object of society and the correlative idea of the solidarity of individuals within society. He thought, however, that the second alternative as amended by the representative of the Philippines and the representative of Panama was worthy of careful consideration.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the proposal submitted by the representative of the Philippines, reading as follows:

Article 2

In the exercise of his rights everyone is limited by the rights of others and by the just requirements of the democratic State. The individual owes duties to society through which he is enabled to develop his spirit, mind and body in wider freedom.

Decision: The Committee adopted Article 2 in the above form by 3 votes in favour, with 3 abstentions.

Examination of Article 5

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that Article 5 of the Drafting Committee's Report thus became Article 3. The United States Delegation proposed the following draft: "All are equal before the law and entitled to equal protection by the law. Everyone is subject to the law whatever his status." The amendment to the first sentence was purely formal. The second sentence omitted the [9] specific terms "public authorities" and "judges". That proposal was embodied in Article 1 and 7 of the draft submitted by the United States.

GENERAL ROMULO (Philippines) agreed with the Chairman's proposal, but wished to substitute the terms "regardless of office or status", which appeared in Article 7 of the United States draft, for the terms "whatever his status".

MR. CASSIN (France) expressed his readiness to accept the first sentence of the Article proposed by the United States Delegation, but pointed out that the second sentence of the Drafting Committee's Article 5 contained two ideas: first, everyone was subject to the law, second, the law was above public authorities and judges. This second idea was what was known in English as the "Rule of Law".

The new Article 3, in the form proposed did not imply this second idea.

MR. AMADO (Panama) said he could not vote for that Article. It was the most important Article in the Declaration. It should include explicit provision for preventing arbitrary discrimination and abuses in the application of laws.

THE CHAIRMAN proposed that a vote be taken on the first sentence of the new Article 3, subject to certain changes of form but not of substance. The first sentence read: "All are equal before the law and entitled to equal protection of the law."

Decision: The first sentence of Article 3 was adopted by 3 votes in favour, with 3 abstentions, subject to changes of form but not of substance.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the second sentence of Article 3 proposed by the United States Delegation as amended by the [10] representative of the Philippines, which read as follows: “everyone is subject to the law regardless of office or status”.

Decision: The second sentence of Article 3 was adopted by 3 votes to 1, with 2 abstentions, subject to changes of form but not of substance.

MR. CASSIN (France) said that the idea of the “Rule of Law” was not fully covered by Article 3 in the form just adopted. He reserved the right to produce the next day a new draft incorporating that idea which might be added to the new Article 3.

MR. AMADO (Panama) declared that he would likewise submit a proposal with regard to Article 3.

Draft Declaration on Human Rights

THE CHAIRMAN wished it to be mentioned on page 2 that it was the Drafting Committee of the Commission on Human Rights that had decided on the Articles to be submitted [4] to the Sub-Commission. He proposed to insert after the words “Certain Articles in the Draft” the words “which had been brought to its notice by the Drafting Committee”. Otherwise it might seem as if it was the Sub-Commission that had chosen the Articles in an arbitrary manner.

MR. NISOT (Rapporteur) accepted the proposal.

Decision: The proposal was adopted.

MR. SPANIEN (France) thought it would be sufficient to say “the Drafting Committee, which considered that it should draw the Sub-Commission’s attention to certain Articles”.

MR. MCNAMARA (Australia) stated that the second phrase created a false impression, seeing that all the Articles in the Draft were designed to protect minorities and prevent discrimination.

MR. NISOT (Rapporteur) pointed out that the text fully met Mr. McNamara’s point, since it would be stated that the Articles in question had been brought to the notice of the Sub-Commission.

MR. A. P. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) proposed for the sake of greater clarity the words “of the Articles of the Declaration mentioned below”.

MR. NISOT (Rapporteur) stated that if the Sub-Commission were to embark on a grammatical analysis of each sentence, its work would never end. When mention was made of the Declaration, that actually meant the Articles which had been submitted to the Sub-Commission. He recalled that the Commission on Human Rights expected to have the Sub-Commission’s Report by the morning of Monday, 7 December, at the latest.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the text proposed by Mr. Borisov and that of Mr. Nisot.

[5]

Decision: The text proposed by Mr. Nisot was adopted by 7 votes to 2, with 3 abstentions.

Article 6

On Mr. McNamara’s proposal, and with Mr. Nisot’s consent, the Sub-Commission decided to modify the text as follows:

Page 3, line 4, to replace “completing” by “extending”.

In the second paragraph of the English text, to replace “list” by “enumeration”. The French text is to remain unaltered.

To replace the words “paragraph 3 of Article 2 of the Charter” by “in Article 6 as drawn up by the Drafting Committee”.

To replace (page 3) the words “but had merely interpreted and clarified it” by “but had interpreted and clarified it”.

MR. MCNAMARA (Australia) considered that the paragraph immediately preceding Mr. Nisot's observation should be redrafted.

MR. NISOT (Rapporteur) asked for suggestions or formal proposals.

MR. MENESES (Ecuador), who had been unable to attend the first meetings of the Sub-Commission, asked for an observation to be inserted in the Report under his own name.

MR. DANIELS (United States of America), on a point of order, supported this proposal, on condition that no additional remarks by members who had attended all the meetings of the Commission should be allowed.

Decision: The proposal was adopted.

With the consent of MR. NISOT (Rapporteur) the Sub-Commission agreed to add Mr. Meneses' remarks to the other observations contained in the Report.

[6]

MR. SPANIEN (France) drew attention to the fact that if the word "nationality" in the fourth paragraph on page 3 were allowed to remain, it might cause confusion. He suggested that the paragraph be drafted as follows: "Finally, the Sub-Commission wished to make it clear that the words 'national origin' should be interpreted by taking this conception, not in the sense of citizen of a State, but in the sense of national characteristics."

Decision: This change was adopted.

MISS MONROE (United Kingdom) suggested that the word "included" on the second line of page 3 of the English text, be replaced by "embodied".

Decision: This change was adopted.

MR. A. P. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) asked that the text be discussed paragraph by paragraph in logical order. He proposed the following changes in the fourth paragraph on page 3:

To put a full stop after the word "nationality" and to replace the remainder of the text by the following sentence: "The Sub-Commission recommends to the Commission on Human Rights that this concept be defined more precisely."

THE CHAIRMAN, following an observation by Mr. Nisot, stated that the text, as amended by Mr. Spanien, had been adopted. He informed members that the remarks included in the Report were personal observations which ought not to be discussed.

MR. SPANIEN (France) pointed out that during the discussion he had announced his intention of making certain reservations. If the Sub-Commission decided it was too late to submit observations, he would bow to its decision; if not, he would submit the text to the Rapporteur.

[7]

THE CHAIRMAN recalled that Mr. Spanien had in fact expressed this wish. His remarks could therefore be inserted in the Report.

MR. A. P. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) stated that the observations he had made during the discussion were mentioned in the Summary Record of meetings. It was therefore superfluous to repeat them in the Report.

On the proposal of Miss Monroe it was decided that in the text of the Recommendation adopted by the Sub-Commission the words: "races and minorities" should be replaced by "races or minorities".

On the proposal of Mr. Borisov it was decided to reverse the order of the words: "Convention" and "Declaration" in the text of the Recommendation, and to insert in the first line of paragraph 7 on page 2, after the word "amending" the words "the second paragraph of a proposal".

Article 13

On the proposal of MR. McNAMARA (Australia) the Sub-Commission adopted the following changes: on page 4, line 12, after the word "circulate", the words "more freely" should be added.

On page 4, line 20, the words "the following text" should be replaced by "the following addition to the first paragraph".

MR. MENESES (Ecuador) asked for the following remarks to be inserted under Article 13:

"In my opinion paragraph 2 of Article 13 should also embody the following concepts:
No State may refuse to grant its nationality to persons born upon its soil.

[8]

No person may be deprived of the nationality of his birth, unless by his own free choice he acquires another nationality.

Every person is obliged to renounce the nationality of his birth or adoption upon acquiring a new nationality."

Article 15

The Sub-Commission adopted the Report on Article 15 without any observations.

Article 28

Following a proposal by MR. McNAMARA (Australia), the Sub-Commission agreed that in the English text the word "examination" should be put in the plural. The French text to remain unchanged.

The words "in the third line of the text" to be added to the remarks.

Article 36

MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) noted that the Summary Records contained all the necessary information on the changes in the original texts. The interpretations given by the Rapporteur did not reflect all the opinions that had been expressed. He proposed that all comments by the Rapporteur after Article 36 be omitted.

MR. NISOT (Rapporteur) expressed his willingness to omit all the comments.

MISS MONROE (United Kingdom) thought the text was clear enough to show the Commission what the Sub-Commission had done. It would be sufficient simply to point out how the text had been amended by such and such a member.

MR. A. P. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) thought the discussion that took place during the examination of this Article was reported in the Summary [9] Records of the meetings and should, therefore, not be given again in the Report.

MR. NISOT (Belgium) saw no objection to leaving in the Report the amendments made by members, as Miss Monroe had suggested.

DR. WU (China) agreed with Mr. Borisov. The addition of all the amendments would make the Report unnecessarily long. The text would become too academic. Merely by comparing it with the original text the Commission could easily see what changes had been made.

MR. MASANI (India) shared the view expressed by Mr. Borisov and Dr. Wu.

MISS MONROE (United Kingdom) withdrew her amendment.

MR. NISOT (Belgium) agreed to omit any remarks that were not essential.

MR. MCNAMARA (Australia) asked for the word "had" to be deleted from the English text of his remark.

Decision: This change was adopted.

The Sub-Commission adopted the first part of Mr. Nisot's Report.

Summary Record of the Third Meeting [of the Working Group on the Declaration of Human Rights]

Held at the Palais des Nations, Geneva, on Saturday,
6 December 1947, at 10 a.m.

Present: Chairman: Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt (United States of America). Rapporteur: Professor Cassin (France). Members: Mr. Stepanenko (Byelorussian SSR); Mr. Amado (Panama); General Romulo (Philippines); Mr. Bogomolov (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics). Observer: Mr. Heppel (United Kingdom). Representatives of the Commission on the Status of Women: Mrs. Begtrup, Mrs. Uralova. Secretariat: Miss Kitchen. Specialized Agencies: Mr. Bessling (ILO); Dr. Havet (UNESCO). Non-Governmental Organizations: Category A: Mr. Robinet de Clery (Inter-Parliamentary Union); Mr. Vanistendael (International Federation of Christian Trade Unions); Category B: Mr. Easterman (World Jewish Congress).

MR. CASSIN (France) stated that he had given up the idea of submitting a new draft embodying the idea of “rule of law” in Article 3. As regards Article 1, he has been unable to consult the Representative of the Philippines and would submit a new draft of that Article at the second reading.

MR. AMADO (Panama) submitted the following amendment to Article 2.

“Everyone has the right to protection against arbitrary discrimination in the provisions and application of the law because of race, religion, sex or any other reason.”

MR. STEPANENKO (Byelorussian SSR) pointed out that this text would replace the whole of the Article 3 already adopted and in substance would overlap with the provisions of Article 6 concerning which the Sub-Commission on the Prevention of Discrimination and the Protection of Minorities was to make a recommendation. He suggested therefore that the Commission defer its decision on this proposal until the Sub-Commission’s Report had been submitted. The text proposed by the Representative of Panama could then be incorporated in Article 6 which would no doubt also contain other provisions. Article 6 could then be incorporated in Article 3, if the Working Group so desired.

GENERAL ROMULO (Philippines) moved a point of order. The Commission had adopted Article 3 subject to changes in form but not in substance. But this text represented a change in substance. Furthermore, before envisaging the fusion of Article 6 with Article 3, he thought it necessary to know what the Drafting Committee’s intention had been with regard to these Articles.

MR. CASSIN (France) stated that the original Article 6 of the Drafting Committee’s Report contained two ideas, the idea of [3] equality and the idea of the prevention of arbitrary discrimination. In its present form Article 3 had only retained the idea of equality. The amendment submitted by the Representative of Panama was therefore appropriate. He proposed that it should be retained, as far as substance was concerned, as being appropriate in the present Article, and that the Working Group should wait until it had seen the recommendations of the Sub-Commission on the Prevention of Discrimination and the Protection of Minorities before deciding on its final form.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) considered that account should be taken of the Sub-Commission's recommendations in the case of Article 6 which dealt with discrimination in general. But Article 3 dealt with courts of law and there were cases where discrimination occurred in courts of law. It was therefore important that the principle of non-discrimination should be emphasized in that Article.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that it was not possible to go back on the decision taken by the Working Group. Therefore, they could not proceed to change the substance of Article 3. This did not exclude the possibility of including the proposal of the Representative of Panama in Article 6 and if necessary, of incorporating Article 6 in Article 3 when the Report of the Sub-Commission on the Prevention of Discrimination and the Protection of Minorities came up for consideration.

GENERAL ROMULO (Philippines) supported the proposal submitted by the Representative of Panama and stated he would vote in favour of it, if it were incorporated in Article 6, subject to the following slight modification:

“Every one has the right to protection against arbitrary discrimination in the provisions of the law and their application because of race . . .”

MR. AMADO (Panama) accepted this modification.

THE CHAIRMAN stated that Article 3 would therefore be left as it stood, subject to drafting changes. The Working Group would refer to the plenary meeting on 8 December the examination of Article 4, i.e. the original Article 6 of the Drafting Committee's Report and consideration of the amendment submitted by the Representative of Panama together with the possibility of incorporating the text adopted in Article 3.

GENERAL ROMULO (Philippines) drew the Working Group's attention to the danger which might result from a wrong interpretation of the second sentence of Article 3 in the absence of an exact definition of the nature of the law envisaged. He therefore proposed the insertion between Article 3 and Article 5 of an Article worded as follows:

“All laws, decrees and ordinances and all judicial and administrative acts in any State shall be in conformity with the purposes and principles of the United Nations as embodied in the Charter.”

The wording of this Article had been suggested to him after perusal of the memorandum submitted by the World Jewish Congress. Moreover, that undertaking on the part of Governments did not differ in substance from the one they had already given as Members of the United Nations under the terms of Article 2, paragraph 2 of the Charter. He strongly urged the Working Group to take note of the proposal he had just submitted when the time came to examine Article 6.

MR. CASSIN (France) pointed out that three different ideas had been put forward during the present discussion. First, the conformity of national laws with the principles of the Charter. Secondly, the idea of equality before the law. The amendment submitted by the Representative of Panama, if it were incorporated [5] in Article 3, would involve certain changes in the text adopted, as it would be necessary to bring the two texts into line, since one mentioned status and activities and the other sex, race and religion. Thirdly, the idea of the “rule of law”. It was impossible to introduce all these ideas into Article 3. The proposal submitted by the Philippines, in particular, was not bound up with Article 3 or Article 6, but was concerned with good laws and could be inserted elsewhere.

MR. AMADO (Panama) supported the proposal submitted by the Representative of the Philippines and agreed with the Representative of France that it was a question of position. He sought an understanding that his proposal would be examined in relation to Article 3 and jointly with Article 6.

Examination of Article 7

MR. CASSIN (France) stated that it had been the Drafting Committee’s intention to confine themselves to the ideas of liberty and personal security whereas the alternative texts submitted by Chile and Lebanon (E/CN.4/21 (Annex F)) appeared to expand considerably the idea expressed in this Article. He himself was in favour of the Drafting Committee’s proposal and he knew the Working Group on the Convention also took the same view.

THE CHAIRMAN proposed the retention of the text submitted by the Drafting Committee, substituting in the English text the words “security of the person” for the words “personal security”.

MR. AMADO (Panama) wished, on behalf of his Government, to make a statement concerning the whole of the provisions of the Declaration. The recognition and guarantee by Governments of human rights were one of the characteristics of the twentieth century. The most far-reaching work accomplished in this field had been carried out under the auspices of the American Law Institute by a group of 24 jurists under the direction of Dr. William [6] Draper Lewis.<sup>33</sup> These jurists had agreed to define in 18 Articles the minimum rights which each State should guarantee to the individual whether he was a citizen or resident of that State or not. This Declaration of fundamental human rights, known as the “Declaration of Philadelphia” was clear, precise and brief. At the San Francisco Conference Panama had submitted this Declaration for adoption by the United Nations. The First Committee, which was responsible for examining that proposal, recommended in a Resolution that the

General Assembly should examine the text proposed and give it an effective form. (See Report of the Rapporteur of the First Committee dated 1 June 1945, Document 944, I-I, 34). In 1946, Panama had again proposed the adoption of the “Declaration of Philadelphia” but that proposal had been referred to the Commission on Human Rights. It was to be feared that, owing to lack of time, the text finally adopted by the Commission would be inferior to that contained in the Philadelphia Declaration. Without underestimating the value of the work performed by the Drafting Committee, he wished to submit on behalf of his Government the following proposal on which a vote might be taken:

“That in any redrafting by the Commission at this session of a declaration or convention, the International Declaration of Fundamental Rights and Freedoms of Man which was presented to the Commission pursuant to the resolution of the General Assembly, 1st Session, Second Part, should be given special consideration.”

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the Declaration of Philadelphia had been used by the Secretariat in drawing up its first draft Declaration. She supported the proposal submitted by the Representative of Panama and suggested that the Declaration [7] proposed by the Delegation of Panama, which appeared in Document A/148, be considered jointly with the Drafting Committee’s text. She put this proposal to the vote.

GENERAL ROMULO (Philippines) pointed out that his Delegation had already supported the proposal of Panama in the First Committee of the San Francisco Assembly and would support it again.

Decision: The proposal submitted by the Representative of Panama was unanimously adopted.

MR. VANISTENDAEL (International Federation of Christian Trades Unions) wished to submit an observation concerning Article 7. In the text proposed by the Drafting Committee, the right to life was affirmed without any specification of the biological moment when human life began. The majority of laws included measures protecting life born or conceived. This idea, which was expressed in the supplementary text proposed by the Lebanon should, he thought, be taken up. Secondly it should be stated that everyone had the right to life, regardless of physical or mental condition. Finally, it was important that it should be stated that individuals should be able to live their lives in conditions worthy of the human race. Such a statement would contribute to the spiritual liberation of the working class by raising it to a spiritual level equal to that of the other members of human society. He therefore proposed the following text:

“Every one has the right to life, to personal liberty and to personal security.

The individual acquires these rights, regardless of his physical or mental condition, from the first moment of his physical development. This includes the right to conditions of life enabling him to live a dignified life and to develop his personality adequately.”

[8]

MRS. BEGTRUP (Representative of the Commission on the Status of Women) pointed out that the Commission on the Status of Women had not yet had an opportunity of meeting to examine the Draft Declaration of the Drafting Committee and reserved the right to revert to this matter at a later session. Mr. Vanistendael's proposal could not be reconciled with the provisions of certain advanced legislation which in certain cases provided for the right of abortion.

THE CHAIRMAN considered that the text submitted by the Drafting Committee covered all the aspects mentioned and proposed that a vote be taken on Article 7 which read as follows: “Every one has the right to life, to personal liberty and to personal security.”

Decision: The Commission adopted Article 7 by 4 votes with 2 abstentions.

MR. CASSIN (France) pointed out that more detailed provisions on this subject could be included in a Convention and that all matters relating to the development of human life in society should be dealt with elsewhere. If such were not the case, he would not be opposed, at second reading, to mentioning in this Article the right to conditions of life enabling the individual to live a dignified life and develop his personality adequately.

Examination of Article 8

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that there was an alternative form of the Article in Article 8 of the Declaration submitted by Panama and in Article 6 of the Declaration proposed by the United States.

GENERAL ROMULO (Philippines) stated that his Delegation supported the United States draft because it aimed at preventing arbitrary detention, the idea of which was not included in the text submitted by Panama.

[9]

MR. CASSIN (France) pointed out that the article contained in the United States draft had the advantage of mentioning the necessity for trial within a reasonable time. The article proposed by the Drafting Committee however contained another idea, that of verification of the conditions of detention, inspired by the Soviet Constitution. He proposed therefore that the article be retained but supplemented in one particular by the American draft. The article would then read: “No one shall be deprived of his personal liberty or kept in custody except in cases prescribed by law and after due process. Everyone placed under arrest or detention shall have the right to immediate judicial determination of the legality of any detention to which he may be subject and to trial within a reasonable time or to be released.”

MR. EASTERMAN (World Jewish Congress) drew the Group’s attention to the danger of using the word “law” in the first sentence of the article. Strictly speaking, the actions of the Nazis were legal. The amendment submitted by the Representative of the Philippines if adopted could avert this danger, but it would perhaps be better to substitute for the word “law” in the article the words “laws in conformity with the principles of the United Nations”.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) observed that the meaning to be attached to the word “law” appearing in texts of the Declaration was the laws of the State or of democratic society the first duty of which was to develop and consolidate democracy.

THE CHAIRMAN supported the Representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and stated that the question would be gone into more fully when the Group came to examine the [10] amendment submitted by the Representative of the Philippines. She put to the vote Article 8 as submitted by the Representative of France.

Decision: Article 8 was adopted by 4 votes in favour with 2 abstentions.

Examination of Article 9

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that this article corresponded with Article 7 of the Declaration submitted by Panama. In order to facilitate the Group’s work the United States Delegation had prepared a synoptic table of the United States proposal and the Drafting Committee’s text. The article proposed by the United States (Article 7 of its Declaration) was given in this document (E/CN.4/36/Add.2) at the top of p. 4.

MR. AMADO (Panama) supported the text included in the Declaration submitted by Panama and pointed out that the most important words in that article were: “by fair public trial by a competent tribunal”. The standards by which it was determined whether or not the trial were public and fair were those found in all Constitutions of civilized States.

MR. CASSIN (France) observed that the Drafting Committee’s text only had in view criminal proceedings whereas the article submitted by the United States dealt with the rights belonging to an individual accused of crime and the right to justice in general. The two ideas were separate. The Working Group must choose which it preferred.

THE CHAIRMAN thought that this article should cover both civil and criminal proceedings.

MR. STEPANENKO (Byelorussian SSR) said that the article ought to contain provisions concerning the right of the accused to use his own language in court.

[11]

MR. CASSIN (France) pointed out that this right was provided for in Article 36. Moreover Article 9 mentioned that the accused should be given “all necessary guarantees”, which included the use of his own language. These guarantees could be specified in a Convention on the subject.

GENERAL ROMULO (Philippines) supported the proposal of the Representative of Byelorussia. He was in favour of the article proposed by the United States, with the addition after “fair hearing” of the words “in fair public trial and in his own language”.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said it was dangerous to harness the work of this Group to that of the Group working on the Convention. What would happen if the General Assembly adopted the Declaration only? It was important for this Group to accomplish its task without reference to the work of the other groups.

MR. STEPANENKO (Byelorussian SSR) pointed out that Article 36 dealt with language in relation to national minority groups, not to non-self-governing countries that should be covered by the article now under discussion.

MR. CASSIN (France) thought that if the Group wished to deal in this article with the right to justice it might perhaps be as well to take the article proposed by the United States as a starting point. If, on the other hand the Group intended to deal with criminal proceedings the Article proposed by the Drafting Committee seemed to him preferable.

Perhaps in order to avoid repetition it would be best in this article to deal with the right to justice.

GENERAL ROMULO (Philippines) wished to emphasize that the proposal of the Representative of Byelorussia dealt not only with the national minorities, but with persons belonging to trust territories and non-self-governing regions as well as with [12] foreigners. He himself preferred the following text in place of the amendment that had been proposed: “in fair public trial and in a language he understands”. His Delegation thought that this Article should deal with the right to justice and that the proposal submitted by the United States should be adopted in its amended form.

THE CHAIRMAN stated that the drafting of this article could be left until the next meeting. She put to the vote the question whether the Group wished to restrict this Article to criminal proceedings or to extend it to all proceedings whether civil or criminal.

Decision: The Group decided by 4 votes in favour and 2 abstentions that the article in question should deal with the right to justice in general.

MR. CASSIN (France) stated that in light of this decision he would be able to draw up an Article on the right to justice in general and in the case of criminal trials in particular, the right to the necessary guarantees, including the use of the individual's own language. A distinction must be made between civil proceedings, in which the accused was entitled to counsel for the defence and criminal proceedings in which the accused appeared in person and the question of language was fundamental to enable him to grasp the proceedings.

Section I

Draft Declaration of Human Rights

The Sub-Commission had before it the draft International Declaration on Human Rights drawn up by the Drafting Committee (E/CN.421, Annex F.) It noted that certain articles in the draft were designed to prevent discrimination and protect minorities. Consequently, although the Draft Declaration had not been officially communicated to it, the Sub-Commission considered that it should take that important document into account. It felt that the best way of obtaining concrete results of immediate value was to start by dealing with the subjects coming under its terms of reference within the framework of those articles of the Draft Declaration which had been brought to its notice by the Drafting Committee as relating to those terms of reference.

The Sub-Commission therefore proceeded to study the following articles of the Draft Declaration: article 6, article 13, article 15, article 28, and article 36. For the most part this study resulted in amendments being proposed.

Article 6

Text proposed by the Sub-Commission

“Every one is entitled to all the rights and freedoms set forth in this Declaration, without distinction of any kind, such as race, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, property status, or national or social origin.”<sup>1</sup>

(Adopted by 9 votes to 1, with 1 abstention).

The Sub-Commission, in adopting the text, thought there was no need for a special mention of “colour”, as that was embodied in the word “race”.

It also considered that in extending by the words “political or other opinion, property status, or national or social origin”, the enumeration given in Article 6 as drawn up by the Drafting Committee (“without distinction as to race, sex, language, or religion”), it had not added to that enumeration but had interpreted and clarified it by means of examples. The Sub-Commission’s text (“without distinction of any kind such as race. . .etc.”) is, moreover, intended to show that its enumeration is not exhaustive.

[1] The Drafting Committee’s text was as follows: Every one is entitled to the rights and freedoms set forth in this Declaration without distinction as to race, sex, language, or religion.

It will be seen that the Sub-Commission has referred in the article to “all the rights. . .etc.” It intended to show in this way that it was not necessary to develop the idea further in Article 6, as the substance of the rights and freedoms was established in the other articles of the Declaration.

Finally, the Sub-Commission wished to make it clear that the words “national origin” should be interpreted by taking this conception, not in the sense of citizen of a State, but in the sense of national characteristics.

Remarks by Mr. Nisot (Belgium):

“I abstained from voting on article 6, since, in my view, it should have reproduced only the enumeration found in the Charter: ‘without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion’, instead of increasing this enumeration. The terms of the Charter, beyond all possible dispute, are binding upon all the Members of the United Nations. It would, therefore, have been wise strictly to adhere to them owing to the organic nature of the text in question (the Declaration).”

Remarks by Mr. Meneses Pallares (Ecuador)<sup>36</sup>

The enumeration is indeed exemplary and not exhaustive, but in order to preserve intact the organic unity and correlation of the Charter and its subsidiary instruments I should prefer the following text:

Everyone is entitled to all the rights and freedoms set forth in this Declaration without distinction of any kind, such as race, sex, language or religion, or on such grounds as political or other opinion, property status and national or social origin.

Remarks by Mr. Spanien (France):

The French expert is compelled for the following reasons to abstain from voting on the second part of the amendment to Article 6 which was proposed by the Soviet expert under the heading: “Mr. Borisov’s opinion”.

The place proposed for this amendment within Article 6 of the Draft Declaration; its introduction in a passage dealing with principles and not, as would have been logical, in a passage concerned with implementation; the vagueness of its provisions, at least as they appear in the French translation, in which incongruous notions are assimilated to each other; the arbitrary splitting up of the text, which results from a vote taken phrase by phrase. All this, in his view, makes it impossible for him to follow a course other than abstention.

The French expert, however, anxious to avoid any ambiguity or misunderstanding, would like to make it clear that he approves of Mr. Borisov's idea – if that is indeed the sense of his proposal – of applying penal sanctions to any infringements of the principle of non-discrimination.

Furthermore, the French expert feels he should state that when the Sub-Committee is in a position, at the present or at a later session, to enter into the discussion of this problem, he will be prepared to advocate or propose any text based on the following principles:

- I. The principle of making it compulsory for the various national constitutions and laws to include in their relevant statutes provisions for the punishment of infringements of the principles of non-discrimination and for redress of such infringements.
- II. The principle of setting up an International Tribunal of Human Rights.
- III. As regards sanctions applicable to discrimination, the principle of the pre-eminence of international over national law [6] to be enforced by means of conventions based on an appropriate limitation of national sovereignty.
- IV. The principle of the responsibility of public officials before the municipal and the international law.
- V. The principle of repudiating the principle of immunity based either on sovereign power or on obedience to high orders.

In addition, the role which the Sub-Commission might have to play, in an informal fashion, in facilitating conciliation during the period preceding any formal procedure, would deserve a special study.

-----

Mr. McNamara and Dr. Wu submitted a text amending the second paragraph of a proposal by Mr. Borisov. Its wording was as follows:

“Any advocacy of national, racial and religious hostility and any action establishing a privilege or a discrimination based on distinctions of race, nationality or religion shall be prohibited by the law of the State.”

This text was not adopted, there being 5 votes for and 5 against, with 1 abstention.

On the other hand, the Sub-Commission adopted, by 10 votes with 1 abstention, the following recommendation:

“The Sub-Commission recommends to the Commission on Human Rights the inclusion in the Declaration of Rights or in the proposed Convention, in the appropriate places, of clauses condemning incitement to violence against religious groups, nations, races, or minorities.”

Article 13

Text proposed by the Sub-Commission

“Subject to any general law not contrary to the purposes and principles of the United Nations Charter and adopted for specific reasons of security or in the general interest, there shall be liberty of movement and free choice of residence within the territory of each State.

“Individuals shall be free to leave their own country and to change their nationality to that of any country willing to accept them.”<sup>2</sup>

<sup>[2]</sup> Text established by the Drafting Committee: “There shall be liberty of movement and free choice of residence within the borders of each State. This freedom may be regulated by any general law adopted in the interest of national welfare and security. Individuals may freely emigrate or renounce their nationality.”

[7]

(Adopted by 8 votes to 2, with 1 abstention.)

Discussion centred on the right to move freely<sup>37</sup> outside the country and to emigrate and to change nationality. In the text proposed by the Sub-Commission, the right to emigrate and change nationality is unconditional.

Remarks by Mr. McNamara (Australia):

“Mr. McNamara proposes the following addition to the first paragraph of the text for consideration by the Commission on Human Rights, and by any Drafting Committee:

‘Further, any general law referred to herein shall not be inconsistent with Article 6 of the International Declaration on Human Rights, as amended by this Sub-Commission.’”

Remarks by Mr. Nisot (Belgium):

“I was unable to agree to Article 13, because of the absolute bearing of its second sentence, which is not subject to the reservation (concerning laws in conformity with the Charter) by which the first sentence is governed. In the absence of such a reservation, the possibility for individuals to leave their country or relinquish their nationality is made dependent, in principle, on their sole will, without the State being able, even for reasons of general interest or national security, to limit this possibility, in particular by making it contingent on authorization. Such a radical provision cannot, in my view, but diminish the probabilities of the Declaration being, on this point, accepted or observed by Governments.”

Remarks by Mr. Meneses Pallares (Ecuador):

“In my opinion, paragraph 2 of Article 13 should also embody the following concepts:

<sup>37</sup> The Sub-Commission agreed to replace the words “to circulate” in the draft Report with “to circulate more freely” (E/CN.4/Sub.2/SR.17, p. 7) but in the final version of the Report the word “circulate” is replaced with “move freely”.

“No State may refuse to grant its nationality to persons born upon its soil;
 “No person may be deprived of the nationality of his birth, unless by his own free choice he acquires another nationality;
 “Every person is obliged to renounce the nationality of his birth or adoption upon acquiring a new nationality.”

Article 15

Article 15 of the Drafting Committee’s text<sup>3</sup> gave rise to discussion.

Finally, by 7 votes to 2 (with 2 abstentions), the Sub-Commission decided to take no decision on this Article at the present stage, since the Commission on the Status of Women, which was to meet in January next, was the proper body to make an exhaustive study of the Article, particularly from the point of view of marriage, and the Sub-Commission should await its findings.

[3] Text established by the Drafting Committee: “Everyone has the right to a status in law and to the enjoyment of fundamental civil rights. Everyone shall have access to independent and impartial tribunals for the determination of his right, liabilities and obligations under the law. He shall have the right to consult with and to be represented by counsel.”

Remarks by Mr. Spanien (France):

Apart from the right of consultation and representation, Article 15 should cover the idea of assistance by counsel before the courts.

On the one hand, the right to be assisted by counsel constitutes the most essential guarantee for the defendant. On the other hand, in a penal procedure, under which the accused is liable to detention, representation by counsel is not permitted under the laws of some countries.

Remarks by Mr. McNamara (Australia):

Mr. McNamara submitted the following text for consideration by the Human Rights Commission or by a Drafting Committee;

“The following words to be added after ‘everyone has the right’:
 ‘On the basis of Article 6 as amended by this Sub-Commission’”.

Remarks by Mr. Masani (India) and Mr. Daniels (United States)

“In view of the decision of the Sub-Commission that this Article was not yet open to discussion at this stage, in the absence of any recommendations from the Commission on the Status of Women, we would like to place on record our view that this Article should guarantee the right to everyone to consult with and be represented by counsel of his own choice.”

Remarks by Miss Monroe (United Kingdom)

“Since the Sub-Commission decided that there should be no discussion on the merits of Article 15, Miss Monroe wished it to be recorded that the right to be represented by counsel does not exist in some native courts in the British Colonial Empire. Representation by counsel has proved to be an alien importation into the judicial process of many backward people, and since it is in the British practice to allow Native Courts to develop in the manner best suited to the community which they serve, some courts still adhere to their customary procedure. Since the right to be represented by counsel is recognized in higher courts, including those which hear appeals from the Native Courts in question, the practice is not discriminatory.”

Article 28Text adopted by the Sub-Commission

“Everyone shall have equal opportunity to engage in public employment and to hold public office in the State of which he is a citizen. Access to examination for public employment shall not be a matter of privilege or favour.”<sup>4</sup>

(Adopted by 9 votes with 2 abstentions)

This article was adopted in the form in which it had been drawn up by the Drafting Committee, after a discussion in the course of which the value of examinations as an impartial method of selection was questioned by certain members of the Sub-Commission.

Remarks by Mr. McNamara (Australia):

“In the second sentence of Article 28, the words ‘and the subject matter of such examinations’ should be inserted after the words ‘public employment’.”

Remarks by Mr. Meneses (Ecuador):

“In the second sentence of article 28, the words ‘when required by the State’ should be inserted after the words ‘public employment’.”

Article 36Text proposed by the Sub-Commission

“In States inhabited by well defined ethnic, linguistic or religious groups which are clearly distinguished from the rest of the population and which want to be accorded differential treatment, persons belonging to such groups shall have the right as far as is compatible with public order and security to establish and maintain their schools and cultural or religious institutions, and to use their own language and script in the press, in public assembly and before the courts and other authorities of the State, if they so choose.”<sup>5</sup>

(Adopted by 6 votes to 4, with 2 abstentions.)

[4] Text drawn up by the Drafting Committee. "Everyone shall have equal opportunity to engage in public employment and to hold public office in the State of which he is a citizen. Access to examinations for public employment shall not be a matter of privilege or favour."

[5] The following was the text prepared by the Drafting Committee. "In States inhabited by a substantial number of persons of a race, language or religion other than those of the majority of the population, persons belonging to such ethnic, linguistic or religious minorities shall have the right as far as compatible with public order to establish and maintain their schools and cultural or religious institutions, and to use their own language in the press, in public assembly and before the courts and other authorities of the State."

Remarks by Mr. Nisot (Belgium):

"This Article has given rise to a long debate, bearing, in particular, on the question whether its benefit should be limited to nationals, or, on the contrary, should be extended to all individuals, nationals or aliens, members of the groups concerned. The latter solution prevailed: the word 'persons' was inserted in the text in preference to the word 'citizens'. This is why I was unable to agree to Article 36. It appeared to me indeed excessive to grant the differential treatment in question to aliens. These, moreover, may be established on the territory only temporarily (tourists, migrant workers. . . etc.). It is hardly necessary to recall that the treaties and declarations on minorities which came into being between the two wars apply, in this connection, to nationals alone. It will be for the Commission on Human Rights to study the Draft Declaration from the viewpoint of its compatibility with paragraph 7 of Article 2 of the Charter, which forbids organs of the United Nations to intervene in matters essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of the member States. In my view, such a study will be particularly indicated with respect to Article 36 as adopted by the Sub-Commission."

Remarks by Miss Monroe (United Kingdom) and Mr. Spanien (France):

Mr. Spanien and Miss Monroe submitted the reservation that it would be necessary to make the word "persons", in the article as drafted, subject to a definition which excludes aliens from the privileges accorded to minority groups within the framework of national unity.

Remarks by Mr. McNamara (Australia):

Mr. McNamara proposes to modify as follows the text of the Drafting Committee.

1. Delete the words "a substantial number of";
2. Delete words, "as far as compatible with public order", and substitute for them the words "on the basis of loyalty to the State of which they are resident members";
3. Add the words, "where they have not a practicable facility in the official language" between the words "and" and "before", in the last line but one.

Examination of Article 11

THE CHAIRMAN said that no corresponding Article existed in the Declaration proposed by the Representative of Panama. The corresponding Article in the Declaration proposed by the United States was Article 5 (E/CN.4/36).

MRS. BEGTRUP (Chairman of the Commission on the Status of Women) asked whether by prohibiting slavery "in all its forms" Article 11 was intended to cover the traffic in women. Would it not be preferable to mention this matter?

MR. AMADO (Panama) suggested the inclusion of this Article in the provisions of a Convention.

MR. CASSIN (France) considered it impossible that a Declaration should make no mention of the prohibition of slavery. The text proposed by the Drafting Committee had in view human dignity, and in this general form it seemed to him to cover the prohibition of involuntary prostitution. He suggested the adoption of this text, possibly with the addition of the second paragraph of Article 5 of the Declaration proposed by the United States.

MR. ROMULO (Philippines) thought the second paragraph of the Article proposed by the United States could more appropriately be inserted in Article 10. He also proposed that in the English text of Article 11, the words “slavery which is” be replaced by “slavery being”. His delegation preferred the text proposed by the Drafting Committee.

MR. STEPANENKO (Byelorussian SSR) said that the text of Article 11 was inadequate. It should be stated that slavery was prohibited by law and that this prohibition was an obligation incumbent upon all States. In point of fact, slavery existed not only in colonial territories but also in certain democratic States, as had been emphasized in the Report on civic rights in the United States drawn up on President Truman’s request. He therefore [3] proposed the addition of the words “by law”.

THE CHAIRMAN stated that with regard to the United States, even if certain civic rights had not yet been granted to all, nevertheless slavery was non-existent.

MRS. URALOVA (Rapporteur of the Commission on the Status of Women) emphasized that slavery was the most humiliating condition, especially for women, and that the prohibition of traffic in women ought to be explicitly mentioned in Article 11. She supported the observation made by the representative of the Byelorussian SSR on the excessive looseness in the drafting of this Article.

MR. CASSIN (France) stated that, for his part, he would have liked to see Article 11 supplemented by provisions regarding the prohibition of forced labour. But in the Drafting Committee it had been suggested that it would be better to enumerate the different forms of slavery in a Convention, and that, moreover, the prohibition of slavery was such an essential assertion that to specify its forms in a text, be it a law or a decree, could only serve to weaken it. The abolition of slavery had formed the subject of treaties between various countries, of international conventions, and of intervention by the Trusteeship Council; to insert the words “by law” would be to narrow the scope of this Article for slavery must likewise be combated by means of international conventions, by the Trusteeship Council and by economic methods.

THE CHAIRMAN reminded the Group that the final drafting of the Articles need not be undertaken. It seemed to her that the text proposed by the Drafting Committee, slightly modified by the representative of the Philippines, might be adopted, a statement being inserted in the Summary Record to the effect that in adopting this Article the Group had agreed that it should cover traffic in women, involuntary servitude and forced labour. As the [4] Summary Records were public documents it would be possible for Governments and for the Drafting Committee at its next meeting to take cognizance of this observation and to decide whether it would be appropriate to extend and clarify this Article either in the Declaration or in a Convention.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) stated that he disagreed entirely with the opinion expressed by the representative of France, that the addition of the words “by law” would weaken the text. The laws of the metropolitan country could quite well prohibit slavery in colonial territories. Legal provisions should not be confined to prohibiting slavery, but should also cover all disguised forms of slavery, such as alleged agreements concluded by certain planters with illiterate natives to serve as a cloak for what was in reality forced labour. All these forms of slavery would disappear if they were explicitly prohibited by laws and decrees. Moreover, this Working Group should not concern itself with what might be included in a convention, but should embody all the provisions it deemed necessary straight away in the Declaration.

THE CHAIRMAN emphasized that even if it were accepted by the General Assembly, a Declaration would not be legally binding on States, and even if the provisions proposed by the representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics were included, slavery might therefore continue to exist.

MR. CASSIN (France) said he was opposed to all forms of slavery, and speaking on behalf of his country, which had been a party to numerous conventions for the abolition of slavery, he saw no objection to the insertion of the words "by law", which already appeared in many other Articles of the Declaration. He would therefore vote for the Soviet amendment.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the following amendment proposed [5] by the representative of the Byelorussian SSR: "Slavery in all its forms, being inconsistent with the dignity of man, shall be prohibited by law."

Decision: The Drafting Committee adopted Article 11 as amended by the representative of the Byelorussian SSR by 5 votes to nil with 12 abstentions.

MR. ROMULO (Philippines) asked for the following note to be inserted after the Article:

"Governments of administering and metropolitan Powers shall have special responsibility for abolishing slavery in the trust and non-self-governing territories for which they are responsible."

THE CHAIRMAN stated that this note would be equivalent to a direct recommendation to Governments, and that it seemed to her preferable merely to reproduce it in the Summary Record of the meeting. It would be for the Governments to decide whether or not to take this note into account. The United States delegation would therefore vote against the addition to Article 11 of the note proposed by the representative of the Philippines.

MR. CASSIN (France) considered that the text proposed by the representative of the Philippines should be included in the analysis of the vote appearing in the minutes, but not in the form of a note implying discrimination. There were also States that had no responsibility for trust territories, where slavery was nevertheless rife.

It was therefore necessary to be impartial and to mention forced labour, whether in self-governing countries or in non-self-governing territories.

MR. AMADO (Panama) proposed that the last part of the text submitted by the representative of the Philippines be amended to [6] read “. . .and non-self-governing territories under their jurisdiction”.

MR. ROMULO (Philippines) accepted the proposal made by the representative of Panama and Mr. Cassin’s suggestion.

Decision: Article 11 was adopted on the understanding that it covered traffic in women, servitude and forced labour and that the Governments of administering and metropolitan Powers should be specially responsible for abolishing slavery in trust and non-self-governing territories under their jurisdiction.

Examination of Article 9

MR. CASSIN (France) explained that he had drafted a new Article 9 dealing with the right to justice in general, and a new Article 10 relating to criminal law.

Article 9 read as follows: “Everyone shall have the right to justice. He shall have access to independent and impartial tribunals for the determination of his rights and obligations. He is entitled to aid of counsel, and, when his personal appearance is necessary, to understand the procedure and to use a language which he can speak.”

He emphasized that he had borne in mind the observations made by the representatives of the Philippines, Panama and Byelorussia, in regard to personal appearance and language.

THE CHAIRMAN stated that the United States Delegation accepted this text.

MR. ROMULO (Philippines) thought the Article might be made more precise by deleting the first sentence; it would then read: “Everyone shall have access. . .” He proposed that the words “He is” at the beginning of the second sentence be changed to “He shall be”.

[7]

MR. CASSIN (France) stated that the first sentence of this Article was a general statement, designed to impress public opinion.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) preferred the wording “when he appears personally” to “when his personal appearance is necessary”.

MR. CASSIN (France) accepted this proposal.

THE CHAIRMAN called for a vote on the text, as amended by the representative of the Philippines and by the representative of the Soviet Union, which now read as follows: “Everyone shall have access to independent and impartial tribunals for the determination of his rights and obligations. He shall be entitled to aid of counsel, and, when he appears personally, to understand the procedure and to use a language which he can speak.”

Decision: This text was adopted by three votes to nil, with three abstentions.

Examination of Article 10

MR. CASSIN (France) explained that this text combined parts of the original wording of Articles 9 and 10. The new text of Article 10 was as follows:

“No one shall be held guilty until proved innocent and convicted.

No one shall be convicted or punished for crime or any other offence except after public trial at which he has been given all guarantees necessary for his defence and which shall be pursuant to law in effect at the time of the commission of the act charged.”

This Article embodied three principles:

- (1) No one is guilty as long as the offence has not been proved.
- (2) All trials must be fair and must provide the necessary guarantees.
- (3) Criminal laws may not be retroactive.

THE CHAIRMAN proposed that the wording of the first sentence of the English text be improved so as to read: “Any person is presumed innocent until proved guilty”. She also proposed that the words “or any other offence” be deleted, since a certain number of mild offences were dealt with by the administrative authorities and did not require a public trial.

MR. AMADO (Panama) proposed that the word “fair” be inserted before the words “public trial”, since a trial, although held in public, might still be subject to illegal pressure. He also proposed that the words “conducted by a competent court” be added after the words “fair public trial”.

MR. CASSIN (France) agreed to the inclusion of the word “fair”. With regard to the proposal that the competence of the court should be mentioned, he felt that the words “pursuant to law in effect” already embodied this idea, since laws dealt with the substance of the case no less than with the penalty to be applied and the competence of the courts. This might be explained in the analysis of the vote contained in the Summary Record. With regard to minor offences where the proceedings were not held in public, a note should also be inserted in the Summary Record to the effect that the proposed text referred only to general cases and that these general provisions did not apply to cases of immorality heard in camera or to the reading of secret documents, the disclosure of which would be harmful to public security, provided always that the verdict was pronounced in public.

THE CHAIRMAN called for a vote on the amended text, reading as follows: “Any person is presumed innocent until proved guilty. No one shall be convicted or punished for a crime or any other offence except after fair public trial at which he has been given all guarantees necessary for his defence and which shall be pursuant to law in effect at the time of the commission of the act [9] charged.”

Decision: The Group adopted the Article by four votes to nil, with two abstentions, it being understood that the passage concerning guarantees necessary for defence and that concerning the application of the law in effect at the time the act was committed implied the existence of competent courts, and that the text laid down a general principle which was not applicable to administrative offences and did not prevent the Court from hearing cases involving secret documents in camera provided the verdict was pronounced in public.

The meeting rose at 12 noon.

Article 12 (Document E/CN.4/21, Annex F, E/CN.4.36/Add.2, A/148)

THE CHAIRMAN said that the United States Delegation was prepared to accept the Panama wording of this Article (Article 6, A/148), but would prefer a more positive beginning such as "everyone has the right".

PROFESSOR CASSIN (France) stated that the text of the Drafting Committee had been the result of a compromise, and was based on the text of several national constitutions. In his opinion, the US text (E/CN.4/36/Add.2), with possibly some modification, would be suitable. In reply to a question by the representative of the USSR as to the phrase "respect for reputation", he said that this meant the right of the individual to be protected from slander against his reputation. He considered the alternative text (Chile and France) given in the Drafting Committee's recommendation (E/CN.4/21) rather limited and proposed the following amendment based on the US text: "Everyone has the right to protection under law of the right to privacy, family, home, correspondence and reputation."

MR. AMADO (Panama) referred to Article 6 of the Panama Draft (A/148) and thought that inviolability of the person should be afforded the same guarantees as that of his domicile.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) remarked that the obligation to protect the private life of the individual [illegible in the original] law. Qualifications should be inserted to this effect.

PROFESSOR CASSIN (France) wished to reassure the representative of Panama on the question of protection of the person which had already been covered by the article on slavery. In Article 12 it was the liberty of the home which [3] was affirmed, not that of the individual. Replying to the representative of the USSR, he pointed out that protection by law implies conformity to that law. He agreed that there were some grounds for criticism of the present text, and suggested as a further modification the following wording: "Everyone is entitled to protection under law from unreasonable interference with his reputation, privacy and family."

MR. AMADO (Panama) said the Drafting Committee and Panama texts were linked, although different. He thought that the protection of "activities" should be included in the Article.

PROFESSOR CASSIN (France) said that the substance of the Panama text was included in the Declaration as a whole. Article 12 concerned the home and the family. The protection of activities was dealt with later, and he did not think it should be included in this Article.

Decision: After some discussion concerning the English rendering of the French proposal, the following text was adopted by 3 votes to none with three abstentions.

"Article 12. Everyone shall be entitled to protection under law from unreasonable interference with his reputation, his privacy and family. His home and correspondence shall be inviolable."

Article 10. Sentence 2

THE CHAIRMAN reminded the meeting that in adopting Article 10, only the first sentence had been considered.

PROFESSOR CASSIN (France) referred to statements made at a previous meeting by the representative of the Commission on the Status of Women who had spoken of including the Article on torture references to other degrading practices. [4] This could best be provided for by the US text (E/CN.4/36/Add.2) which included the word “indignity”.

GENERAL ROMULO (Philippines) supported this, but requested the inclusion of the words “unusual punishment or indignity”.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the word “unusual” might not cover all cases. In some countries inhuman practices might not be unusual.

The US text was adopted by 5 to none and 1 abstention, reading as follows: “No one shall be subjected to torture or to cruel or inhuman punishment or indignity.”

Article 14

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the US short text (E/CN.4/36/Add.2) considerably curtailed the wording without altering the substance of the Article.

DR. WEISS (IRO) requested the Committee to consider the views submitted by the International Refugee Organization (E/CN.4/41). The right of asylum was of vital importance to his organization and, in his opinion, the rights granted under Article 14 were very imperfect. He hoped that the Committee would reconsider the wording with a view to sponsoring more positive action.

MR. EASTERMAN (World Jewish Congress) supported the statement of the representative of the IRO. He contended that Article 14 accorded a right of escape with no corollary of a right of access to the country of reception. Many refugees from Germany had been denied this right which had resulted in the death of thousands. Moreover, Article 14 failed to implement Article 7, since persons who were denied the right of asylum frequently died and thus were denied the right to life.

MLLE ROMAN (International Union of Women’s Catholic Organizations) strongly supported the views expressed by the two previous speakers.

THE CHAIRMAN thought it would be dangerous to raise any false hopes in the Declaration and doubted whether it was within the province of the United Nations to tell Member States that they must grant asylum. She cited the US immigration laws as a concrete instance of these difficulties. It would perhaps be feasible to place a statement in the record expressing the hope that States would take steps to receive persons seeking asylum from persecution.

PROFESSOR CASSIN (France) remarked that right of asylum was a good illustration of the difference between a Declaration and a Convention. It was appropriate that the subject be expounded in a Declaration in order that the necessary steps for implementation could be secured in a Convention which would be binding on all nations where a right was not granted under the Constitution. He proposed the wording: “Everyone shall have the right to escape persecution by seeking asylum in another country.”

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that, if an article concerning the right of asylum were included, great care should be taken to define the type of individual entitled to that right. It should only be accorded to persons persecuted on racial or religious grounds. Many supporters of the Hitler regime had posed as refugees in order to escape from their own countries and intrigue against them.

THE CHAIRMAN said that criminals had no right of asylum. She added that their object was to prepare a document which would be of value over a period of time and in which it would [6] be unwise to attempt too definitive a text.

GENERAL ROMULO (Philippines) felt that this Article should be more positive as suggested by the representative of the IRO and the World Jewish Congress. It was not so much a question of raising false hopes as of establishing a principle to be followed by all. He supported the final paragraph of the IRO proposals (Document E/CN.4/41) which he thought worthy of consideration as a substitute for Article 14 of the text before the Committee.

PROFESSOR CASSIN (France) said that the question had two aspects. First, the Article should bring out more clearly that a principle of law was involved. This could possibly be done by the substitution in the US short text of the words "to find" for "to seek". Secondly, as regards the point raised by the representative of the USSR, Article 14 could not be invoked in favour of criminals or of persons subject to extradition proceedings and a note to this effect might be included. There was a political aspect and in this connection the text of the IRO document might be considered. He did not, however, like the word "opinion" in the final paragraph of this text. Persons should only be excluded as a result of acts and not be reason of their opinions.

MR. AMADO (Panama) referred to the experience of his government in many cases where refugees had been charged with the commission of a criminal offence, in order that they should be prevented from obtaining asylum. He thought that particular care should be taken in drafting the text to guard against this.

THE CHAIRMAN suggested that comments should be inserted as a footnote to this Article with a reservation in respect of [7] criminals together with an addition that the right of asylum did not exist in any real measure at this time, and expressing the hope that it would be more literally granted in the future.

MR. EASTERMAN (World Jewish Congress) appreciated the proposal that a comment should be made as a footnote to the text but considered the words "right to find an asylum" inadequate since these imposed an obligation on the individual. He was concerned with the fate of potential victims of persecution on whose behalf he pleaded the elemental human right to be freed from danger. He was aware of the judicial difficulties of this question. He did not suggest any alteration of laws nor a right to permanent residence, but only for temporary asylum. He requested the Committee to re-examine the question in the light of these contentions.

GENERAL ROMULO (Philippines) thought that the text as it stood put the onus of finding asylum on the refugee and suggested a more positive declaration to the effect that “all refugees from religious, racial and political persecution shall have the right to seek and be granted asylum, provided however that the right of asylum shall not be granted to political refugees whose acts or opinions are inconsistent with the aims and objects of the United Nations”.

PROFESSOR CASSIN (France) thought it unwise to attempt to qualify the word “persecution”. In his view the comment should stress the necessity for a Convention and point out the difficulties imposed on bona fide persons seeking asylum.

Decision. The following wording was then put to the vote; adopted by 4 to none, with 2 abstentions.

[8]

“Article 14

Everyone shall have the right to seek and be granted asylum from persecution. This right shall not be accorded to criminals nor to those whose acts are contrary to the principles and aims of the United Nations.”

Article 15

THE CHAIRMAN drew attention to the suggestion in the Report of the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities (E/CN.4/52) page 7, to refer Article 15 to the Commission on the Status of Women. As regards the text of the Article, the US delegation was prepared to accept the Drafting Committee’s version, but preferred the US short text (E/CN.4/36/Add.2).

MRS. BEGTRUP (Commission on the Status of Women) expressed surprise at the recommendation of the Sub-Commission in view of the conclusions recorded in the last Report of the Commission on the Status of Women (E/281/Rev.1) advocating full equality of civil rights. She agreed that these conclusions were too detailed for incorporation in the Declaration, but suggested that they could be included in a general statement to read “everyone has full equality of civil rights, irrespective of marriage, race, language or religion”.

GENERAL ROMULO (Philippines) thought the question would be covered when Article 6 came up for consideration.

THE CHAIRMAN suggested that women were included under the wording “everyone” in this Article.

PROFESSOR CASSIN (France) supported the Chairman and stressed the fact that Article 15 not only envisaged equality of sex but had two other points of significance. Firstly, it was the counterpart of the Article on the abolishment of slavery, [9] the conception of which it entirely eliminated. Secondly, it was an expression of the fundamental civil rights of man. The many different aspects of this important question had been brought out by the proposals contained in the Report of the Sub-Commission on Minorities (Document E/CN.4/52). In his opinion, it was impossible to achieve complete equality of civil rights at this juncture, but every State should be bound to concede those rights without which no human being should be forced to live, that is to say the fundamental civil rights. This was the sense of Article 15.

MISS LOMAN (International Union of Women's Catholic Organizations) said that, after hearing the views of the representatives of France and the Philippines, she was in agreement that the subject was generally covered by the Article in question, but thought that there should be some protection in the Declaration for the unity of the family.

MISS VAN EEGHEN (International Council of Women) claimed that women should have equal civil rights whether married or unmarried and stated that many countries gave women equality of civil rights which they lost on contracting marriage. She asked that the Declaration should affirm the right of women to enjoy the same status whether married or unmarried.

MRS BEGRUP (Commission on Status of Women) maintained that this intention was clearly in the minds of the Drafting Committee (as witness the note on Article 15) and also of the persons responsible for the Report of the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities (Document E/CN.4/52). She was not asking for any special concessions for women for equality of rights.

[10]

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that Article 5, which had already been adopted referred to "all as being equal before the law". She proposed the following text:

"Everyone has the right everywhere in the world to recognition as a person before the law and to the enjoyment of fundamental civil rights."

Decision: The above text was adopted by 3 to 1 with 2 abstentions. This text was adopted.

PROFESSOR CASSIN (France) thought it advisable to insert after Article 15 a further clause or separate Article on the contracting of marriage which should not be permitted without the free consent of both parties or to those whose age was not compatible with free consent.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that it would be preferable to have a separate Article on Marriage. In his country, marriage and the family were placed under the protection of the law which governed impartially the rights of both sexes. The mother and child were afforded a special safeguard. He thought that an Article should be drafted on the lines that men and women should have the same right of choosing a marriage partner, followed by a clause affording the protection of the State to the marriage, family and children.

THE CHAIRMAN ruled that further discussion of this matter should be postponed until all proposals were submitted in writing.

Article 16

THE CHAIRMAN proposed that consideration of this Article should be deferred until the economic and social rights were discussed. They began with Article 29. This proposal was supported by the representative of the Philippines.

PROFESSOR CASSIN pointed out that there was a logical order to the Chapters with which the Drafting Committee's [11] text was originally headed, but he had no objection to alternation of the sequence for the purposes of discussion.

Article 18

In reply to a question by the representative of the USSR as to what was meant precisely by the sentence "everyone has a right to a nationality", PROFESSOR CASSIN (France) said that nationality and the right of asylum were closely linked. As a result of the war there were thousands of stateless persons all over the world constituting a grave social issue, both from the point of view of the country harbouring them and of the people concerned. Whilst the United Nations had no power to grant nationality, a duty remained to call the attention of Member nations to a situation which would become increasingly serious. For these reasons, the principle enunciated by the Article should be the subject of a Convention.

DR. WEISS (IRO) expressed himself in agreement with the representative of France, and made reference to the IRO document E/CN.4/41. He said that such a Declaration, however, could amount to little more than a pious hope and that there would be stateless people for many years to come. Refugees did not enjoy the normal rights of persons possessing a nationality and his organization was in favour of the creation of a permanent special agency to exercise a more effective protection over these people. He requested that Article 16 should contain some proposal to this effect. The IRO itself was a non-permanent institution dealing with a limited class of persons only.

MR. WINN (Consultative Council of Jewish Organizations) asked whether the Committee could not insert an addendum to [12] this article in the following form:

“the United Nations recognize statelessness as a denial of Human Rights and contrary to the interests of the international community”.

MRS. BEGTRUP (Commission on the Status of Women) expressed a special interest in this subject, since many women forfeited their nationality on marriage. The question had been under consideration for many years, but there had been serious obstacles to its solution. She expressed the view that this issue should be made the subject of a Convention.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) felt that the right expressed under this Article would be void unless the obligation to grant nationality was clearly defined. He asked on whom the obligation was to be imposed, since the principle seemed an infringement of the sovereign rights of States. There were instances of stateless persons who had violated their national laws. He took the view that it was not within the scope of the Committee to deal with such a complex problem.

PROFESSOR CASSIN (France) agreed that it was impossible in the Declaration to touch on all the aspects of this question, but that it was essential to stress the importance of a matter which might exercise a great influence on the future well-being of the community of nations.

Decision: The text as proposed by the Drafting Committee (Document E/CN.4/21, Annex F) was adopted by 4 votes to 1 with 1 abstention.

GENERAL ROMULO (Philippines) suggested that the following paragraph from the statement of the Preparatory Commission of the International Refugee Organization (Document E/CN.4/41, page 3) might be adopted as a comment to Article 18.

“All persons who do not enjoy the protection of any State shall be placed under the protection of an International Organization established by the United Nations.”

THE CHAIRMAN said that this would involve putting on record a recommendation for the creation of a new specialized agency and she thought it would be preferable to make a more general comment.

PROFESSOR CASSIN (France) suggested that such a comment could be worded:

“The United Nations should assume certain responsibilities for those who have not a nationality and a Convention might be drawn up to this effect.”

Decision: The above comment was adopted without objection.

Examination of Article 15 (E/CN.4/21, Annex F)

THE CHAIRMAN said that the Committee had two proposals before it relating to the question of marriage.

MR. STEPANENKO (Byelorussian SSR) proposed that the question of marriage and the family be dealt with in a special article, and that this article be worded as follows:

“Marriage and the family shall be protected by the State and regulated by law, on the basis of equal rights for men and women, without distinction as to race, religion or origin. Mothers and children are entitled to special protection and assistance by the State.”

THE CHAIRMAN proposed the following article for insertion after Article 15:

“Women and men shall have the same freedom to marry and to choice of marriage partner, and the same access to remedies for breach of marriage.”

She pointed out that the Byelorussian proposal did not take into account the religious aspect of marriage. The United States proposal, without expressly mentioning the Church's right in the matter did not place the emphasis on exclusive control by the State, thus recognizing the rights both of the State and of the Church.

On the other hand, the United States proposal did not mention the right of mothers and children to special protection; that seemed to her to be a matter of social security (Article 34).

MRS. BEGTRUP (Chairman of the Commission on the Status of Women) said she would prefer to see mothers' rights and the protection of children mentioned in two separate paragraphs. It would be preferable to include the text in the provisions relating to social security, but if the Byelorussian representative's proposal was accepted, she would prefer the terms "mothers [3] rights" and "protection of children" to the terms "protection of mothers and children".

MISS DE ROMER (International Union of Catholic Women's Leagues) proposed the Group should adopt a text affirming equality as regards marriage without specifying whether it was a case of contracting marriage or dissolving it. She supported the proposal to insert a provision for the protection of the family.

MRS. URALOVA (Rapporteur of the Commission on the Status of Women) said that the status of married women, particularly married women who worked and who did not enjoy the protection of the State, was often inferior to that of married men.

The article proposed by the representative of Byelorussia was therefore very necessary. The Commission on the Status of Women had submitted recommendations on the subject to the effect that a married woman should receive her pay during the sick leave preceding and following confinement. She therefore supported the proposal of the representative of Byelorussia.

THE CHAIRMAN said that mothers' rights and the protection of children should be dealt with in a special article or be mentioned in Article 34 as they came under the head of social security.

MR. VANISTENDAEL (International Federation of Christian Trades Unions) asked the Group out of respect for human opinions and for Christian principles in particular to establish a text providing for equality of men and women with regard to marriage without any qualification. He warmly supported the observations of the representative of the Catholic Women's Leagues.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that in marriage in the twentieth century the free will of the [4] two parties was no longer the essential question. The question of marriage should be examined from the angle of the protection which the State must give the home, and the main emphasis should be placed on the protection of children. The question of civil or religious marriage was of secondary importance and in no way affected the text of the Byelorussian proposal. The protection of the married couple and of the home was a duty of the State, whatever their religious views. He considered, further, that the protection of mothers and children was more closely connected with the provisions dealing with marriage than with those dealing with social security, and should be included in the Article under discussion.

MR. CASSIN (France) considered it essential to affirm the principle of the free consent of the two parties, which was not universally recognized, and he ventured to suggest the following draft for the first paragraph: "Marriage requires the free consent of each of the parties; children cannot marry." The second paragraph would contain the first sentence of the Byelorussian representative's proposal: "Marriage and the family shall be protected by the State" to which he suggested adding "and by society", it being understood that all kinds of societies were meant, including churches. The third paragraph would contain the remainder of the Byelorussian proposal: "they shall be regulated by law, on the basis of equal rights for men and women, without distinction as to race, religion or origin." In order to preserve some kind of uniformity, the protection of mothers and children might be dealt with in another Article, relating to provisions of an economic and social character. In any case, the idea was covered by the mention of protection of the family by the State.

The Article would therefore include three points:

- (1) The fundamental right to marriage based on free consent;
- (2) The institution of marriage protected by the State and by society;
- (3) The regulation of marriage by the law on the basis of equality.

MR. ROMULO (Philippines) proposed the following draft, which seemed to him a compromise between the United States proposal, the Byelorussian proposal and the French proposal:

"Women and men shall have the same freedom to contract marriage in accordance with law, and to the same remedies for breach of marriage.

"Marriage and the family shall be protected by the State and society.

"Mothers and children are entitled to special protection and assistance by the State."

The last paragraph might be inserted in another part of the Declaration.

MR. AMADO (Panama) said he could not accept any of these proposals. Marriage had many religious and moral aspects as well as political ones. Some States were bound by laws based on Concordats with the Church and had, in respect of religious marriage and of divorce, obligations which would not permit them to accept the proposed texts. The Delegation of Panama proposed the following text: "Equal freedom to marry is the right of men and women."

THE CHAIRMAN said the United States Delegation was prepared to limit its proposal to the following terms: "Men and women shall have the same freedom to marry and to choice of marriage [6] partner." It was also willing to accept the proposal submitted by the representative of the Philippines.

The Group therefore had before it the following proposals:

- (1) The shortened proposal submitted by the United States representative which might be substituted for the proposal submitted by the representative of Panama.
- (2) The proposal submitted by the representative of Byelorussia.
- (3) The proposal submitted by the representative of France.
- (4) The proposal submitted by the representative of the Philippines.

She proposed that a vote be taken on the proposal submitted by the representative of the Philippines, it being understood that the provisions relating to mothers and children were accepted in principle by the Group, but that the place where they were to be inserted could be decided later. The Group therefore had only to vote on the first two paragraphs of the Philippine representative's proposal.

MR. ROMULO (Philippines) proposed, in order to satisfy the representative of Panama, to change the first sentence of his proposal as follows: "Women and men shall have the same freedom to contract marriage in accordance with the law."

MR. AMADO (Panama) said he was prepared to accept the first sentence in that form, but that he could not vote for the second sentence.

THE CHAIRMAN called for a vote on the first sentence of the Philippine representative's proposal, namely: "Men and women shall have the same freedom to contract marriage in accordance with the law."

[7]

Decision: the above text was adopted by 4 votes to nil, with 2 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN called for a vote on the second sentence of the Philippine representative's proposal, namely: "Marriage and the family shall be protected by the State and society."

Decision: the above text was adopted by 3 votes to 1, with 2 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN reminded the Committee that the text adopted would not be added to Article 15 but would form a separate article which would follow Article 15. The protection of mothers and children would be discussed in connection with Article 34 and could not form the subject of a separate article.

MR. HEPPEL (United Kingdom) said the text adopted by the Group might be completed by a provision to the effect that married people should have the right to reside together in any country from which they could not be lawfully expelled.

THE CHAIRMAN said that this provision should appear in the Comments on the Article rather than in the actual text. In any case, she thought it was covered by Article 13, the discussion of which had been postponed.

MR. ROMULO (Philippines) said that his Delegation was in favour of the text proposed by the United Kingdom representative being included in the Comments.

THE CHAIRMAN called for a vote on the proposal that this text be included in the Comment on the Group's decision.

Decision: The Group decided by 4 votes in favour, with 2 abstentions, to mention as a comment on its decision that married persons should have the right to reside together in any country from which they could not be lawfully expelled.

[8]

Examination of Article 19

THE CHAIRMAN said the United States Delegation was in favour of omitting this Article, which appeared to be covered by previous provisions.

MR. HEPPEL (United Kingdom) suggested that the end of the Article proposed by the Drafting Committee be amended as follows: "... may be arbitrarily expelled therefrom". That formula seemed to conform more closely to international usage.

MR. WEISS (International Refugee Organization) pointed out that this Article was a corollary of the right of asylum which had been adopted by the Group. The International Refugee Organization had proposed, on page 4 of the Report it had submitted (document E/CN.4/41), a draft Article on this subject. The Group might also take into consideration Article 33 of the original draft submitted by the Secretariat (Annex A, E/CN.4/21).

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said there was no occasion to deal with special rights of particular individuals in a Declaration of a general character, especially as such questions were usually settled by bilateral agreements between States parties to conventions.

MR. CASSIN (France) thought it was better to keep to the text submitted by the Committee, as that text was more precise than the British proposal. Experience had shown that some such measure was necessary. It appeared to him difficult, however, in a Declaration, to go beyond a simple affirmation of the right of asylum. He asked the Group to keep that text as a possible basis for a Convention.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) emphasized that the task of the Human Rights Commission was to protect human rights for the largest possible groups in largest [9] possible areas and that the Declaration should not deal with the obligation of certain States towards isolated individuals who did not belong to a State nor even to national minorities. For this general reason, therefore, he thought the Article was superfluous.

THE CHAIRMAN called for a vote on whether the Article should be omitted.

Decision: The Group decided to omit this Article by 3 votes to 2, with 1 abstention.

Examination of Article 20

THE CHAIRMAN explained that this Article corresponded to Article 1 of the Declaration submitted by the Delegation of Panama, and to Article 2 of the Declaration submitted by the United States Delegation. The text proposed by the Drafting Committee also embodied an alternative proposed by the United Kingdom.

MR. CASSIN (France) said that since the Article had been drafted, various churches had submitted an amendment aimed at included under religious freedom the right to philosophic and religious teaching. The Article might be considerably lightened by omitting the list of limitations necessary to protect public order and morals, which would be incorporated in a special article.

MR. NOLDE (Commission of the Churches on International Affairs) said that religious freedom had five aspects:

1. Freedom of worship;
2. Freedom of observance;
3. Freedom of teaching;
4. Freedom of association;
5. Freedom of practice.

[10]

He asked the Group, even if it preferred a short text, not to leave out any of these five points, nor a reference to their application.

MISS DE ROMER (International Union of Catholic Women's Leagues) said that with regard to religious teaching, she was in favour of the alternative proposed by the United Kingdom, subject to certain amendments as to the right of minors as well as of persons of full age to change their religion.

THE CHAIRMAN said she was in favour of any amendment which aimed at including in this Article the right to religious teaching, but the text proposed by the United Kingdom seemed to her too long.

MR. AMADO (Panama) proposed that the text submitted by his Delegation (A/148) be adopted, with the following amendment: "Freedom of belief and of worship and of religious teaching is the right of everyone." That right was implicitly linked with other rights, such as that of forming associations of a religious character and of free communication among religious authorities, and between religious authorities and the faithful.

MR. HEPPEL (United Kingdom) said that his Delegation's proposal had been drafted with a view to a Convention, and he saw no objection to shortening it. He thought it dangerous to leave out the limitations as long as there was no general Article embodying them.

MR. CASSIN (France) proposed that the first paragraph of the Article submitted by the Drafting Committee be kept, and that the second paragraph be amended by omitting the restrictions necessary to protect public order, morals and the rights and freedoms of others, and by adding a reference to religious teaching.

[11]

THE CHAIRMAN proposed the following text, to replace the second paragraph of Article 20:

“Every person has the right freely to manifest his beliefs in religious worship, public or private, in observance and in teaching, association and practice.”

MR. ROMULO (Philippines) supported the Chairman’s proposal.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that in countries where the Church was separate from the State, religious teaching was a private matter. Moreover, such an Article should grant freedom of conscience, not only for the practice of religion, but also for anti-religious propaganda. That was what was meant by freedom of conscience in a democratic State.

THE CHAIRMAN said it had been understood in the Drafting Committee that the first paragraph of Article 20 covered full freedom of conscience for believers and for atheists. Account might, however, be taken of the observations made by the Soviet representative by leaving out all mention of religion in the second paragraph.

MR. ROMULO (Philippines) agreed with that proposal.

MR. CASSIN (France) thought it dangerous to leave out the words “religious” and “religion” in the second paragraph for fear of raising there the problem of freedom of teaching in general, which was dealt with elsewhere.

In his opinion, it would have been preferable to keep the second paragraph of Article 20, adding to it a reference to religious and philosophic teaching, as that paragraph expressed the right of manifesting convictions, whether religious or anti-religious. However, if the text proposed by the Chairman were adopted, he would prefer to include in it the terms “philosophic” and “religious”. The paragraph would then read:

[12]

“Every person has the right freely to manifest his beliefs in religious worship, public or private, in observance and in philosophic and religious teaching, association and practice.”

MR. ROMULO (Philippines) said he could not accept that amendment.

THE CHAIRMAN proposed that a vote be taken on the proposal submitted by the French representative and that each part be voted on separately. She called for a vote on the first paragraph, which was identical with the first paragraph of Article 20 as submitted by the Drafting Committee.

Decided: The Committee adopted the first paragraph by 3 votes to 1, with 2 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put the second paragraph to the vote.

Decided: The Committee rejected this paragraph by 2 votes to 2, with 2 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the second paragraph of the proposal submitted by the Philippine representative, which read:

“Every person has the right freely to manifest his beliefs in worship, public or private, in observance and in teaching, association and practice.”

Decided: The Committee rejected the said paragraph by 2 votes to 2, with 2 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the proposal submitted by the representative of Panama. That proposal read:

“Freedom of belief, of worship and of religious teaching is the right of everyone.”

Decided: The Committee adopted the above proposal by 2 votes to 1, with 3 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN explained that the text of this Article [13] would have to be redrafted in order to avoid the repetition in the second paragraph of ideas expressed in the first.

The Comment on this decision would mention the fact that the Article covered freedom of worship, of religious observance, and of association.

Consideration of the Report of the Drafting Committee

Document E/CN.4/21, Annex F

Articles 21 and 22

THE CHAIRMAN expressed the view that, since the question of freedom of information would be fully debated at the Freedom of Information Conference to be held in March, 1948, it would be preferable to defer consideration of these two Articles until after that. It was clear that the recommendations of the Conference would furnish the basis for future consideration. She suggested that these two Articles be omitted and an explanatory footnote added in the Report.

This proposal was adopted without objection.

Article 23

THE CHAIRMAN called attention to the three different texts on this Article (Drafting Committee, Panama (A/148) & US (E/CN.4/36)). Her own opinion was that the United States' short text was more inclusive and more concise.

MR. AMADO (Panama) emphasized the importance of drawing a distinction between political associations which complied with democratic customs, and assemblies convened for the purpose of upsetting existing institutions or for other discreditable objects. He considered that an amendment should be included to exclude the latter.

MR. CASSIN (France) supported this suggestion. It would be advisable to link the nature of the associations with the aims of [3] the United Nations. He proposed a modification of the text with reference to associations which were not contrary to the principles of the United Nations.

The Article should also express the idea of international associations in order to give official status to recognized institutions of this type.

MR. STEPANENKO (Byelorussian SSR) contended that the Article contained nothing regarding legal guarantees of the right of association, nor did it indicate the democratic character that such assemblies should bear. They should only be permitted if existing for truly democratic purposes. The Article did not refer to Trades Union Associations whose rights were limited in many states, although these associations existed for the benefit of millions. He wished to draw particular attention to this matter.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out the difficulty of affording the right of assembly, without previous knowledge of what was intended. She thought the qualifying phrase “right of peaceful assembly” should be used.

A discussion ensued as to the advisability of describing the forms of association, such as economic, religious, social, cultural, political.

It was decided that no attempt at an enumeration could be exhaustive.

GENERAL ROMULO (Philippines) proposed the following wording: “Everyone has the right to freedom of peaceful assembly, and association for purposes not inconsistent with this Declaration.”

MR. CASSIN (France) suggested that the question of Trade Union rights would be discussed in the consideration of social rights.

[4]

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) considered that the clearest distinction should be made between democratic and undemocratic associations. The Declaration should afford the fullest protection to democratic organizations like the World Federation of Democratic Women. It should in no way protect any organization which was contrary to democratic principles. He emphasized that Trade Union rights should be specifically mentioned in Article 23.

THE CHAIRMAN thought that “association for purposes not inconsistent with the principles of the UN” would cover the point concerning democratic organizations.

MISS EDER (International Council of Women) considered it important and desirable that the words “national and international associations” should be used. Freedom of association could exist within a country and yet not internationally.

MR. VANISTENDAEL (International Federation of Christian Trades Unions) pointed out that the question of trade union rights had recently been referred by the Economic and Social Council to the International Labour Organization which had not yet concluded its study of the subject. He thought the ILO report should be examined before the trade union rights were fully implemented in a Convention.

MR. AMADO (Panama) proposed the following wording:

“Freedom to assemble peaceably with others and to form associations, either national or international, of a political, economic, religious, social, cultural or any other character, for purposes not inconsistent with these Articles, is the right of everyone.”

GENERAL ROMULO (Philippines) accepted the addition of the words “national and international” to his proposal.

MR. HEPPEL (United Kingdom) submitted that the addition of the word “local” as well as “national and international” might be advisable, since its meaning was not fully covered by the word “national”.

MR. CASSIN (France) thought that the text could be drafted on the basis of the Philippine proposal with the addition of the following: “for purposes of a political, cultural, economic, religious, social, trade union or any other character”. He considered that the adoption of the suggestion of the Soviet Union representative to restrict the mention to those associations which were engaged in the fight for democracy would exclude neutral but equally deserving institutions.

The following text was adopted by 4 votes to none with 2 abstentions:

“Article 23.

Everyone has the right to freedom of peaceful assembly and to participate in local, national and international associations for purposes of a political, economic, religious, social, cultural, trade union or any other character not inconsistent with this Declaration.”

MR. AMADO (Panama) said that he had wished to point out before the vote was taken that certain national constitutions forbade associations of an international character and consequently the Committee had voted for something which might not be acceptable to a number of Governments.

THE CHAIRMAN then requested approval of a suggestion from the representative of the Philippines to include the following as a footnote to Article 23:

“That no individual or association that aims to destroy the fundamental rights and freedoms set forth in this Declaration can claim protection under this Article.”

This was adopted without a vote.

[6]

Replying to the representative of Panama, the Chairman said that a comment could also be included to the effect that the Article was not intended to include international political associations forbidden by law.

Article 24

THE CHAIRMAN said that the United States Delegation was prepared to accept the Drafting Committee’s version, provided the Article began with the wording: “No one shall be denied the right.”

MR. CASSIN (France) was also agreeable to this text and suggested that the words “public authorities” should be substituted for “government”.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) asked why the individual was given a right of petition to the United Nations and in what capacity the latter could act. The United Nations had never been given the task of looking after the interests of the individual.

MR. HEPPEL (United Kingdom) said that his delegation wished to raise a somewhat similar query but on the grounds of the wisdom of encouraging petitions of this nature until the machinery at the disposal of the United Nations for dealing with such cases had been clearly defined.

GEN. ROMULO (Philippines) considered this to be a fundamentally important provision, particularly in connection with minorities, non self-governing peoples and peoples under trusteeship. The regulations of the Trusteeship Council expressly permitted such right of appeal, which provided the sole means of redress in the case of individuals from Trust territories.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) emphasized that this Article did not deal with the rights of minorities, but of individuals. Rights of minorities, and peoples of non self-governing and Trust territories would be protected under different provisions.

[7]

MR. CASSIN (France) wished to retain this Article. He thought the right of petition to the United Nations should be a right possessed by everyone, irrespective of whether they formed part of a minority or whether they lived in an autonomous state or in a non self-governing or Trust territory. He favoured a procedure by which such petitions could be made through recognized bodies which would tend to eliminate appeals of a frivolous character.

MR. HEPPEL (United Kingdom) wished it to be made clear that his delegation strongly supported the principle of the right of petition, which should be equally applicable in any part of the world. He was only concerned with the advisability of giving an impression that the United Nations was ready to redress grievances.

The following article was adopted by 4 votes to none with 2 abstentions:

“Article 24.

No one shall be denied the right, either individually or in association with others, to petition or to communicate with the public authorities of his state, of his residence, or the United Nations.”

Article 25

THE CHAIRMAN drew the attention of the meeting to the comment on this Article in the Drafting Committee's text and suggested that it should be considered for inclusion in the preamble.

It was agreed without a vote to consider this Article either in the preamble or at the end of the Declaration.

Articles 26 and 27

THE CHAIRMAN proposed that Articles 26 and 27 should be read together and if possible combined.

GEN. ROMULO (Philippines) proposed the following wording:

“Everyone has the right to take an effective part in his Government directly or indirectly through elections which should be periodic, free and by secret ballot.”

[8]

MR. CASSIN (France) said that he would prefer the expression “every citizen” to “everyone” as it was not everyone who was qualified to participate in government. He also considered that whatever text was adopted should not eliminate the phrase “will of the people” which was the source of all power.

THE CHAIRMAN preferred the retention of the word “everyone” as including the inhabitants of non self-governing territories who are not citizens but to whom the Declaration would afford some rights of participation in Government.

MR. HEPPEL (United Kingdom) said that he disliked the word “citizen” if it excluded persons in non self-governing territories. His delegation felt that the Secret Ballot was a form of democratic procedure which was neither understood nor accepted by some of the British African dependencies. Their forms of Native Government were based on old-established customs with which it was the policy of his Government to interfere as little as possible. The principle of developing democratic institutions was fully recognized. As an illustration of the difficulties, he quoted from a report to the Trusteeship Council from the Commission on Samoa, stressing the dangers of the arbitrary imposition of western democratic procedure. His delegation was reluctant to accept the words “secret ballot” in this Article.

THE CHAIRMAN felt it would be impossible to eliminate these words from the Article but said that the observations of the United Kingdom delegation could be inserted as a comment, possibly in the form of the extract from the report of the Trusteeship Council.

MR. AMADO (Panama) observed that there were three elements in the Articles under discussion. Firstly, the right to take part in the government of the state. Secondly, the duty of the State to conform to the will of the people. And thirdly, a form of procedure for expressing that will. Since all these essentials were conveyed by the Panama text (A/148), he advocated its adoption.

[9]

MR. STEPANENKO (Byelorussian SSR) considered that the right of the individual to take part in the government of his State was imperfectly expressed in the drafts. He submitted a fresh draft which he said was more concrete and precise, reading as follows:

“All citizens of any state regardless of race, sex, language, religion, fortune, education, national or social origin, have the right to elect and be elected in all organs of their government by universal, free and general elections.

“Everyone has the right to participate in the organs of the government of the state of which he is a citizen.”

MRS. BEGRUP (Commission on Status of Women) said that in practice there were still in many countries qualifications of class, income and sex regulating suffrage. She would like to see the word “equal” before “election”.

MISS EDER (International Council of Women) supported this view and emphasized equality of suffrage.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) supported the draft proposed by the representative of Byelorussia which, in his opinion, was complete and explicit. He said that the obligations imposed on nations responsible for non self-governing and trusteeship territories by the Charter Articles 73(b) and 76(b), which he quoted, were well-known, but discrimination still existed in matters of race, class, sex and wealth, as it did in metropolitan countries. Consequently, the Article should contain a clear definition of the unqualified right of the citizen to elect and to be elected and should emphasize the obligation on colonial powers to encourage self-government until independence were reached.

MRS. URALOVA (Commission on the Status of Women) said that the draft Articles did not clearly define the rights of women, who were still struggling for equality in the political and economic field. [10] She hoped that this equality would be fully recognized by the Declaration, since without it no real spirit of democracy could exist. Her Government<sup>39</sup> had given practical effect to these principles more than anywhere else in the world. She quoted instances where women were still partly or wholly excluded from the political, economic and social life. In reactionary countries there was a strong tendency to campaign against the participation of women in public life, and she asked that such propaganda should be condemned. She reminded the meeting that women everywhere were looking to this Declaration as the recognition of their aspirations and supported the Byelorussian draft as the most effective expression of these sentiments.

MISS ROMER (International Union of Women’s Catholic Organizations) stressed the solidarity of women on the matter of equality of political rights and suggested that a comment should emphasize that the word “everyone” in the Article contained no discrimination against women.

There was discussion on the wording of the Article between the Representatives of France, the Philippines and Panama, together with the Chairman. It was agreed to replace “The State has a duty” by “The State shall” and to add the word “fair” to the adjectives qualifying “elections”.

On the request of the Representative of the Byelorussian SSR, his proposal was put to the vote but was rejected by 3 votes to 1 with 2 abstentions.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) explained that, while he supported this proposal, he would abstain from voting on it in conformity with the declaration he had made at the first meeting of the Committee.

[11]

The following draft was then put to the vote and adopted by 4 votes to 1 with 1 abstention:

“Articles 26 and 27. Everyone without discrimination has the right to take an effective part in the Government of his country. The State shall conform to the will of the people as manifested in elections which shall be free, fair, periodic and by secret ballot.”

Article 28

THE CHAIRMAN said that this Article had been the subject of observations by the Sub-Commission on Minorities and she suggested that consideration should therefore be deferred.

Articles 29 and 30

THE CHAIRMAN accepted the suggestion made by the Soviet Union Representative that Articles 29 and 30 should be studied together. This was adopted without objection.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) considered that when establishing the right to work, it was also necessary to recognize the obligations of the State and particularly its duty to take steps to prevent unemployment. He thought this should be stated in the Article.

MR. STEPANENKO (Byelorussia) proposed the following wording:

“Everyone has the obligation and the right to work, i.e. the right to obtain a salary commensurate with his ability. The State has an obligation to take all necessary measures to eliminate unemployment.”

MR. CASSIN (France) was in favour of the Panamanian Article 12 (A/148), but wished to retain the phrase “Human labour is not a merchandise” in accordance with various ILO conventions.<sup>40</sup>

MR. VANISTENDAEL (International Federation of Christian Trade Unions) pointed out that it was a part only of the duty of the state to guarantee employment; it had the primary duty of [12] harmonizing the economic life of the nation to permit full employment. He suggested that the text should be so drawn up as to avoid any implication of compulsory labour.

<sup>40</sup> This is an unfortunate translation of the word “commodity”. The 1944 Philadelphia Declaration of the International Labour Organization declares “labour is not a commodity” as one of the “fundamental principles” on which the Organization is based. In French, the Declaration says “le travail n’est pas une marchandise”.

THE CHAIRMAN then called for a vote on the first sentence of the Article: "Everyone has the right to work", which was adopted by 5 votes to none with 1 abstention.

MR. CASSIN (France) suggested that the second paragraph of Article 12 of the Panamanian Draft (A/148) should form the second paragraph of the Article: "The state has a duty to take such measures as may be necessary to ensure that all its residents have an opportunity for useful work."

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that all States might not be able to guarantee useful work for all and suggested that the Article should read: "The State has a duty to make every effort to ensure. . ."

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that he was satisfied with the conception that the State was under an obligation to provide employment. That was recognized and complied with in the USSR, but there were other states which had been unable to discharge this duty. He considered that a clause should be incorporated underlining the responsibility of the State for taking every possible measure to prevent unemployment.

MR. CASSIN (France) pointed out that the duty of the State to give the right to work was governed by its potential for implementing this function, and he suggested a wording on the following lines:

"The State has a duty to take such measures as may be within its powers to ensure that all its citizens have an opportunity for useful work."

MR. STEPANENKO (Byelorussian SSR) said that unemployment was a distressing situation with such repercussions on family life that the onus to prevent it should be placed on the State.

[13]

MRS. URALOVA (Commission on Status of Women) stated that the right to work and to pay was of particular importance to women engaged in public employment where men were still receiving far higher rates than women. Frequently public appointments were kept open until a man was accepted. Not only equal rights of employment, but equal conditions in employment were required. The 1937 report of the Commission on the Status of Women had emphasized the aspect of equality in the right to work, to pay and to leisure, and she considered that the wording of this report could well be adopted in the Declaration.<sup>41</sup>

<sup>41</sup> Status of Women. Report Submitted by the First Committee to the Assembly. Official No. A.54.1937.V. Geneva: League of Nations, 1937.

MR. CASSIN (France) said the proposition fell under two headings: the right to work and the obligation of the State in this matter, and the conditions of work.

Paragraph 2 of Article 29 was adopted by 4 votes to none with 2 abstentions, reading:

“The State has a duty to take such measures as may be within its power to ensure that all its citizens have an opportunity for useful work.”

GENERAL ROMULO (Philippines) proposed the following Article to replace Article 30 of the Drafting Committee’s text:

“Everyone has the right to receive pay commensurate with his ability and skill, to work under just and favourable conditions, and to join trade unions for the protection of his interests.

The State shall take necessary measures within its power to ensure full employment. Women shall have the right to work under the same conditions as men and to receive equal pay for equal work.”

MR. CASSIN (France) pointed out that the Philippine amendment did not include the family. He proposed it should read: “. . .in securing a decent standard of living for himself and his family”.

[14]

THE CHAIRMAN said that she wished to point out the significance of the demand in relation to the pre-natal period, maternity and other aspects, that women should be given the right to work under the same conditions as men. She suggested the representatives of the women’s organizations might wish for further reflection on those problems before committing themselves on this Article.

MRS. BEGTRUP (Commission on the Status of Women) stated that she was prepared to accept the proposed text since adequate protection for the rights of motherhood appeared to be secured under Article 34.

MISS ROMER (International Union of Women’s Catholic Organizations) thought that a reservation should be inserted that nothing expressed in this clause should contravene the existing conventions for the protection of women.

The following text was adopted for Article 30 by 5 votes to 0 with 1 abstention. The reservation was made that a comment to this Article regarding protection of women would be considered later:

“Everyone has the right to receive pay commensurate with his ability and skill, to work under just and favourable conditions, to join trade unions for the protection of his interests in securing a decent standard of living for himself and his family.

Women shall have the right to work under the same conditions as men and to receive equal pay for equal work.”

The meeting rose at 7:30 p.m.

E/CN.4/AC.2/SR.8

10 December 1947

Summary Record of the Eighth Meeting [of the Working Group on the Declaration of Human Rights]

Held at the Palais des Nations, Geneva, on Wednesday,
10 December 1947 at 10 a.m.

Present: Chairman: Mrs. F. D. Roosevelt (United States of America). Rapporteur: Professor Cassin (France). Members: Mr. Stepanenko (Byelorussian SSR); Mr. Amado (Panama); General Romulo (Philippines); Mr. Bogomolov (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics). Observer: Mr. Heppel (United Kingdom). Representatives of the Commission on the Status of Women: Mrs. Begtrup, Mrs. Uralova. Secretariat: Miss Kitchen. Specialized Agencies: Mr. Havet (UNESCO); Mr. Barblé (IRO); Mr. de Givry (ILO). Non-Governmental Organizations: Category A: Mr. Vanistendael (International Federation of Christian Trades Unions); Category B: Mr. Easterman (World Jewish Congress); Mr. Brotman (Consultative Board of Jewish Organizations); [2] Mr. Winn (Consultative Council of Jewish Organizations); Mr. Nolde (Commission of the Churches on International Affairs); Mlle Romer (International Union of Catholic Women's Leagues); Miss Eder (International Council of Women).

Consideration of the Report of the Drafting Committee
(Document E/CN.4/21, Annex F)

Article 17

THE CHAIRMAN remarked on the difficulty of expressing the right to personal property in positive terms. After prolonged study, the only form which had proved generally acceptable for the United States was the brief sentence "no one shall be arbitrarily deprived of his property". The equivalent Panama article 10 (A/148) seemed too complicated and she hoped that the United States text would be accepted.

MR. AMADO (Panama) said there were two ideas involved. The recognition firstly, of the right to own property and, secondly of the right to protection against deprivation of property without compensation, both of which should be expressed.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) felt that the varying economic systems in different countries should be borne in mind. He instanced the social structure of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics where ownership of property was largely on a cooperative basis. It was impossible to think exclusively in terms of purely personal property for the purposes of this Article.

MR. AMADO (Panama) remarked that the same view had been expressed before the American Institute of Law by a Soviet [3] Representative which had been met by the formula "everyone has the right to own property under general law".

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) agreed that it would be preferable to find some abstract formula which made allowance for different social systems.

MR. CASSIN (France) suggested the following text as combining the Drafting Committee's text with the views of the Representative for Panama.

"Everyone has the right to own property in conformity with the general regime of the State in which such property is located", with the addition of the United States short text. In reply to the Representative of the Philippines, he defined "general regime" in the sense of the right of ownership given by law "within the economic structure of the country".

THE CHAIRMAN said that the French proposal, substituting the word "law" for "general regime", seemed to meet the views of the meeting and the following text was adopted by 4 votes to 0 with 2 abstentions.

"Article 17. Everyone has the right to own property in conformity with the laws of the State in which such property is located.

No one shall be arbitrarily deprived of his property."

Article 31

THE CHAIRMAN said that the United States Delegation was prepared to accept the Drafting Committee's text, with the substitution of the words "fundamental" for "primary". She would also like to see a reservation made as a commentary safeguarding the right of private education.

MR. EASTERMAN (World Jewish Congress) said that his Organization felt very strongly on this subject. Article 31 as drafted provided a technical framework of education but contained [4] nothing about the spirit governing education which was an essential element. Neglect of this principle in Germany had been the main cause of two catastrophic wars. He proposed the following wording:

"This education shall be directed to the full development of the human personality to strengthening respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms, and shall combat the spirit of intolerance and hatred against other nations or racial or religious groups everywhere."

MISS ROMER (International Union of Women's Catholic Organizations) raised the question of religious education which the Chairman felt was provided for under Article 20.

MR. AMADO (Panama) said that he agreed with the two last speakers and would be willing to sponsor their suggestions as proposals by his delegation.

GENERAL ROMULO (Philippines) also agreed, but suggested that the reference to religious teaching should be in the form of a Comment.

MR. CASSIN (France) thought that both the spiritual and religious aspects should be treated in more positive form. He thought the text presented by the World Jewish Congress was too long, and should be elaborated in a comment.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) considered the question of education to be of paramount importance. The Article should define more clearly the part played by the State in all grades of education, including the professional education of adults. In many countries, including his own, the church was separated from the State, whose responsibilities were therefore limited to education of a non-religious and non-sectarian character. This duty should, however, be clearly defined by the Article, so that education would be conducted on democratic lines and directed in a spirit of struggle against fascism and the horrors of war.

MR. AMADO (Panama) said that, whilst he respects the individual systems of government of different States, it was necessary to try and reconcile their views. There were two distinct points under discussion; religion and the struggle against intolerance. Article 20 correctly provided for the right to religious teaching, but Article 31 considered education in a concrete form. For most countries education without a religious background amounted merely to a form of training. The same was true of education which did not combat intolerance. These points should be incorporated in the main text of the Article and not inserted in the Commentary.

MR. HAVET (UNESCO) said that his organization insisted not only on the right to education but on its pacific character and spirit of toleration. UNESCO was working on a programme of fundamental education by which was meant the equal right of all to a minimum standard of education as a means to world cooperation. He asked that reference should be made to this programme in the Commentary.

MR. CASSIN (France) proposed the following wording:

“Education should aim at the full development of the physical, spiritual and moral powers of the individual. It shall be founded on the respect for human rights and must banish racial, national, religious or other hatreds.”

He objected to the reference to “intolerance” in the text suggested by the representative of the World Jewish Congress.

MR. AMADO (Panama) thought the words “physical, spiritual and moral” should be included.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) expressed the view that Article 31 was rendered cumbersome by the inclusion of all these potentialities. In his opinion it was an elemental proposition that education must be given to the individual to enable him to fulfil his obligations to the community.

[6]

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the text of Article 31 drawn up by the drafting Committee, with the substitution of the word “fundamental” for “primary” at the beginning of the second sentence.

This was accepted by 4 votes to 1 with 1 abstention.

The following wording submitted by the Chairman as a Commentary to Article 31 was adopted by 4 votes to 1 with 1 abstention.

“The right of private education shall be respected and in such countries as desire it religious education shall be permitted in the schools.”

Finally, the following Article as submitted by the Representative of the World Jewish Congress and amended in discussion was put to the vote and adopted as a new Article 31(a) by 5 votes to 0 with 1 abstention.

“Education will be directed to the full physical, spiritual and moral development of the human personality, to the strengthening of respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms and to the combatting of the spirit of intolerance and hatred against other nations or racial or religious groups everywhere.”

Article 32

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) considered that Article 32 was indispensable and should be so developed as to state the detailed conditions under which the employer, whether State or private enterprise, should bear the responsibility of providing leisure for employees. He added that the Trade Union organizations, in his opinion, should be empowered to supervise the protection of the employees’ right of leisure.

[7]

THE CHAIRMAN suggested that a difficulty was caused by different systems of employment in different countries. She pointed out, that in the United States of America employment by private enterprise was secured by contract and was supervised by Trade Unions, and that employment by the State was secured by law. She proposed that the text should remain as a statement of general principle, but that, if detail was required, the following words should be added to the text: “by agreement between worker and employer, or by law”.

MRS. URALOVA (Representative of the Commission on the Status of Women) emphasized the importance of the protection of the right of leisure for men and women workers. She considered that the State should have the responsibility, secured by law, of protecting the rights of employees to adequate rest, leisure, and satisfactory living conditions. She said that it was the opinion of the Commission on the Status of Women that the right of protection of health was of particular importance for women. She pointed out that in Byelorussia the protection of the health of men and women workers was a State responsibility supervised by the Trade Unions; free medical aid and many health organizations were available for men and women workers. Such a responsibility, in her opinion, should be expressly laid down in an Article of the Declaration, as it did not yet exist in all countries.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that provisions concerning Health would be discussed in the following Article.

GENERAL ROMULO (Philippines) proposed the deletion of the words "a fair share", as such a limitation had not been included in the text of previous Articles, which had been expressed in general terms. He proposed an addition of the words "Rest and [8] leisure should be ensured to everyone by laws or contracts, providing for reasonable limitations on working hours and for periodic vacations with pay."

MR. CASSIN (France) supported the text of the Drafting Committee, because he considered that there would be different types of contracts of employment in different countries. He suggested that the details and standards of the proposed supervision of the right of leisure should be formulated in a commentary. He accepted the amendment proposed by the Representative of the Philippines and suggested adding the words "in particular" after the word "providing".

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that, in his opinion, it would be inappropriate to separate statements of principle from measures of application and enforcement, as the Article might thereby be made ineffective. He proposed that the Working Group should vote as to whether such provisions of enforcement should remain in the main text of the Article.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that provisions of implementation of rights had, in many cases, been included in a commentary and not in the main text of the Article; she considered that it would, therefore, be unbalanced to include measures of implementation in the main text of Article 32.

MR. VANISTENDAEL (International Federation of Christian Trade Unions) supported the proposals of the Representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the motion that the proposed text of the commentary should be included in the main text of the Article which was rejected by 2 votes to 2 with 2 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the motion that the Drafting Committee text of Article 32 be retained which was adopted by 4 votes to 0 with 2 abstentions.

[9]

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the motion to adopt as a commentary the text proposed by the Representative of the Philippines with the addition of the words "in particular" after "providing".

This was adopted by 5 votes to 0 with 1 abstention.

GENERAL ROMULO (Philippines) proposed that there should be an introduction to this text as follows “It is the opinion of the Working Group that. . .” This was accepted.

Article 33

THE CHAIRMAN said that the wording of the Drafting Committee’s text of this Article was taken from the Constitution of the World Health Organization.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) considered that the translation of the Drafting Committee’s text was rather mystical in Russian. He thought it was too general. He proposed that the right of the individual to a proper protection of his health should be expressly formulated in this Article. He considered that it was the responsibility of the State to guarantee to the individual cheap and accessible medical assistance and to take general measures for the protection of his health.

THE CHAIRMAN suggested that the text of paragraph 2 regarding “the State and community” met this requirement of the Soviet Representative. She considered that no more detailed wording was practicable, as different provisions for the protection of health were established in different countries.

MR. CASSIN (France) agreed that the text was too vague and proposed the following more concrete wording: “Everyone has the right to the protection of his health, by means of good housing, adequate food and medical care.” He thought the second sentence might go into a comment.

THE CHAIRMAN also thought that the remainder of the Drafting Committee’s text of Article 33 be included in the commentary. In her opinion, many countries would have difficulty accepting all the provisions of this Article.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) considered that the text needed further clarification. He emphasized the importance of guaranteeing proper medical assistance to all classes, especially workers, of low financial status. That was not necessary for the more fortunate classes. He suggested that cheap medical care could be supplied by taxes levied on the more fortunate classes. He appreciated that free medical assistance was too idealistic, but he repeated that the most important object of Article 33 was the provision of adequate medical assistance to the poorer classes.

GENERAL ROMULO (Philippines) proposed the following amendment:

“Everyone without distinction as to economic or social conditions has the right to preservation of his health by means of adequate food, clothing, housing and medical care.”

MRS. URALOVA (Representative of the Commission on the Status of Women) considered that Article 33 was too abstract, because it did not state the obligation of the employer and the State. She said that, in her opinion, the duty of the State to provide accessible medical care to the poorer classes, especially workers, should be emphasized.

MR. VANISTENDAEL (International Federation of Christian Trade Unions) supported the views of the representatives of the Philippines and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out the similarity of the texts proposed by the representatives of the Philippines and of France. She suggested that the adoption of the text proposed by the Representative of the Philippines, together with paragraph 2 of [11] the Drafting Committee's text, would adequately express the responsibility of the State, as required by the Soviet Union representative.

MR. CASSIN (France) accepted the Philippine amendment.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the motion that the text of Article 33 should be composed of the proposal of the representative of the Philippines and paragraph 2 of the Drafting Committee's text.

This was adopted by 4 votes to 0 with 2 abstentions.

Article 34

THE CHAIRMAN referred to Article 15 of the draft submitted by the Delegation of Panama (A/148). As Representative of the United States of America, she said that she would accept the text of the Drafting Committee if the words "promotion of full employment" were omitted, as such a provision had been included in the amended text of Article 29. She suggested the following Amendment of the second paragraph:

"Mothers have the right to special provisions, care and welfare. Children are similarly entitled to special provisions."

MR. AMADO (Panama) accepted the first sentence, but not the second, of the text of the Drafting Committee. He said that it had been recognized by the American Law Institute that in many countries social security was a matter of private initiative, and should not, in that case, be taken over by the State. He proposed the following amendment to the Drafting Committee's text:

"The State has a duty to maintain, or to ensure that there are maintained, comprehensive arrangements for the promotion of health, for the prevention of sickness and accident, and for the provision of medical care and of compensation for loss of livelihood."

[12]

GENERAL ROMULO (Philippines) supported the Drafting Committee's text, but proposed that the text of the Panama Draft be included in the Article and amended as follows:

"The State has a duty to maintain or ensure the maintenance of comprehensive measures for the security of the individual against the consequences of unemployment, disability, old age and all other loss of livelihood for reasons beyond his control."

MR. STEPANENKO (Byelorussian SSR) said that Article 34 was of great importance to the working classes, who must have the right to protection when unemployed for reasons beyond their control. He considered that it was the duty of the State to take all measures in this respect for financing their support and ensuring the payment of old age and sickness pensions.

MRS. BEGTRUP (Commission on the Status of Women) said that she welcomed the separation of the provisions concerning mothers from those concerning children. She proposed that the word "Mothers" be replaced by the word "Motherhood", in order to cover the pre-natal state.

MR. CASSIN (France) considered that paragraph 1 of the Drafting Committee's text was good. He accepted the text with the following amendments; first, as suggested by the Representative of the Philippines, to express the duty of the State to sustain and ensure comprehensive measures for the protection of health; secondly, to delete the words "the promotion of full employment"; thirdly, to replace the words "security. . .against. . .old age", by the words "security against the consequences of old age".

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote paragraph 1 of the Drafting Committee's text, as amended by the Representative of the [13] Philippines which was adopted by 3 votes to 0 with 3 abstentions.

She proposed the following amendment to paragraph 2:

"Motherhood shall be granted special care and assistance. Children are similarly entitled to special care and assistance."

This was adopted by 3 votes to 0 with 3 abstentions.

MR. VANISTENDAEL (International Federation of Christian Trade Unions) supported the proposals made by the Representatives of the Philippines, of Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republics, and of the Commission on the Status of Women. He thought that the words "and family" should be added after the word "individual".

THE CHAIRMAN said that, in her opinion, "family" was covered by the words "everyone".

Discussion of the Report of the Drafting Committee (E/CN.4/21, Annex F)

Article 35

THE CHAIRMAN said she was prepared to accept the Drafting Committee's text.

MR. AMADO (Panama) proposed that the Article be omitted as its contents were covered by Articles which had already been adopted. Moreover, he recalled that in the view of some of the members of the Drafting Committee, the principle on which the Article was based should be embodied in the Preamble.

PROFESSOR CASSIN (France) considered that the Article ought to be retained, as it contained a new idea, that of participation in cultural life. He favoured the text proposed by the Drafting Committee.

GENERAL ROMULO (Philippines) said that he favoured the retention of the Article.

MR. HAVET (UNESCO) stressed the importance of this Article. It was necessary to assert that all had the same right to participate in culture, and thus to affirm the priority of cultural life over materialistic conceptions.

THE CHAIRMAN called for a vote on whether Article 35 should be retained in the Declaration.

Decision: The Working Group decided by 3 votes to 1, with 2 abstentions, to retain the Article.

MR. AMADO (Panama) proposed, with a view to defining the scope of the Article more clearly, an amendment to the effect that the words “by political propaganda or in any other manner” be inserted after the words “of the community”. To participate in the cultural life of the community meant for some people contributing to the development of certain [3] social ideas, which might include the development of certain ideas of a political character.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that this amendment bore no relation to Article 35. She put the amendment proposed by the representative of Panama to the vote.

Decision: The amendment was rejected by 3 votes to 1, with 2 abstentions.

The Chairman put the Article submitted by the Drafting Committee to the vote.

Decision: The Working Group adopted Article 35 by 3 votes to 1, with 2 abstentions.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) asked what was meant by sharing in the benefits that resulted from scientific discoveries.

PROFESSOR CASSIN (France) said that Article 35 in its present form had been adopted by the Drafting Committee at the request of a considerable number of cultural organizations. It had originally been linked to the right to rest and leisure, with which it might perhaps be advisable to connect it ultimately.

THE CHAIRMAN said that as regards sharing in the benefits that resulted from scientific discoveries, the idea of the Drafting Committee had been to stress the universality of such sharing.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that this phrase appeared to imply the obligation to reveal the patents of scientific discoveries.

THE CHAIRMAN said it would be possible to insert a comment to the effect that the Article did not imply the obligation [4] to reveal the secret of scientific discoveries that had been patented.

Article 35A

PROFESSOR CASSIN (France) desired to submit to the Group an Article 35A concerning the authors of artistic, literary or scientific works. He stressed the need to recognize that such authors had a moral right to their works or their discoveries, differing from the right of copyright or literary ownership. He proposed, in this connection, the following Article:

“Authors of all artistic, literary and scientific works and inventors shall retain, in addition to the just remuneration of their labour, a moral right on their works and/or discovery, which shall not disappear, even after such work shall have become the common property of mankind.”

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) pointed out that this question was a matter for bilateral or multilateral conventions.

GENERAL ROMULO (Philippines) said it was impossible to define the concept of a moral right, and that the legal right was covered by the Articles relating to literary ownership.

THE CHAIRMAN put the proposal submitted by the representative of France to the vote.

Decision: The Working Group rejected the proposal by 2 votes to 2, with 2 abstentions.

Article 36

THE CHAIRMAN thought the ideas expressed in this Article were already embodied in various parts of the Declaration. The position of the United States in the matter had been defined on many occasions. At the Conference of Lima, in 1938, it was asserted that a system of protection of ethnic, linguistic or racial groups could not be supported in America, where minorities did not exist as such.<sup>42</sup> At the Inter-American Conference of Chapultepec, in 1945, it was stated that it was not desirable that there should exist in America water-tight homogeneous groups claiming minority status by reason of their ethnic, linguistic or racial characteristics. She therefore thought that this question should be considered in relation to the conditions obtaining in each country. She drew attention to the fact that the Sub-Commission on the Prevention of Discrimination and the Protection of Minorities had proposed a draft article on page 9 of its Report (E/CN.4/52).

GENERAL ROMULO (Philippines) proposed they should now resume the discussion of Articles 6, 13, 15, 28 and 36, which had been postponed until the Group had <sup>42</sup> The Eighth International Conference of American States was held in Lima in 1938. The Conference decided that the “system of protection of ethnical, language or religious minorities cannot have any application whatsoever in the Americas, where the conditions which characterize the groups as minorities do not exist”. It declared that “residents who according to domestic law are considered aliens, cannot claim collectively the conditions of minorities; individually, however, they will continue to enjoy the rights to which they are entitled. . . [A]ny official action, therefore, on the part of the Government of the countries of which such aliens are nationals, tending to interfere with the internal affairs of the country in order to regulate the status or activities of those aliens is incompatible with the sovereignty of such State.” Cited in Louis B. Sohn, “The Contribution of Latin American Lawyers to the Development of the United Nations Concept of Human Rights and Economic and Social Justice”, in Antônio Augusto Cançado Trindade, ed., The Modern World of Human Rights: Essays in Honour of Thomas Buergenthal, San José, Costa Rica: Instituto Interamericano de Derechos Humanos, 1996, pp. 33–56, at p. 39.

received the report of the Sub-Commission on the Prevention of Discrimination and the Protection of Minorities.

The Working Group decided to examine Article 6.

Article 6

MR. AMADO (Panama) reminded the Group that it had been decided to discuss Article 17 of the Declaration submitted by Panama (A/148) and Article 3, at the same time as Article 6.

THE CHAIRMAN said she would like to omit from the text of the article proposed by the Sub-Commission on the Prevention of Discrimination and the Protection of Minorities the words “political or other opinion” and would prefer to keep to the wording of the Charter.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) recalled that in the course of the discussion of Article 6 in the Sub-Commission on the Prevention of Discrimination, the Soviet expert, Mr. Borisov, had submitted the following proposal: “Any advocacy of national, racial and religious hostility or of national exclusiveness or hatred and contempt, as well as any action establishing a privilege or a discrimination based on distinctions of race, nationality or religion, constitute a crime and shall be punishable under the law of the State” (E/CN.4/Sub.2/21). That text, which had not been adopted, was of the greatest importance, for in Article 6 it was not a question of the formal equality of all before the law, but of defining what was understood by all and what should be the political significance of those laws. By the equality of all must be understood all human beings irrespective of race, national origin, sex, language and religion or of social origin or property status. The affirmation of the quality of individuals before the law should be accompanied by the establishment of equal human rights in political, social, cultural and economic life. In terms of practical reality, this meant that one could not allow advocacy of hatred or racial, national or religious contempt and that any action establishing privileges or discrimination on grounds of race, nationality or religion constituted a crime and should be [7] punished by the law of the State. Without such a prohibition, any Declaration of Human Rights would be useless. It could not be said that to forbid the advocacy of racial, national or religious hatred constituted a violation of the freedom of the press or of free speech. Between Hitlerian racial propaganda and any other propaganda designed to stir up racial, national or religious hatred and incitement to war, there was but a short step. Freedom of the press and free speech could not serve as a pretext for propagating views which poisoned public opinion.

Propaganda in favour of racial or national exclusiveness or superiority merely served as an ideological mask for imperialistic aggression. That was how the German imperialists had attempted to justify by racial considerations their plan for destruction and pillage in Europe and Asia. Both in Europe and in Asia the Fascist regimes had been defeated. That victory of the common front of the democratic forces had rendered essential the task of extending and strengthening the democracies. The rights of millions of “men in the street” were involved, and they should be given the possibility of enjoying the wealth of the entire world, for, in the words of Mr. Molotov,<sup>43</sup> Minister for Foreign Affairs of the USSR, “they have a legal right to it, especially after their great exploits and the sacrifices undergone during the war”. Articles 73 and 76 of the United Nations defined a number of obligations devolving on the Powers administering mandated or trust territories. Under Article 73, the mandatory or trustee governments were required to develop self-government by the population. Under Article 76, they were required to [8] promote their progressive development towards self-government or independence as might be appropriate to the freely expressed wishes of the peoples concerned. The declaration that acts of racial, national or religious discrimination and propaganda of racial hatred or national exclusiveness were anti-social and criminal was a natural consequence of the honest fulfilment of these tasks and of the statement that all had equal rights.

The Soviet representative therefore moved the adoption by the Working Group of Mr. Borisov’s second paragraph (E/CN.4/Sub.2/21).

PROFESSOR CASSIN (France) proposed that they should take as a basis Article 6 as submitted by the Sub-Commission on the Prevention of Discrimination which laid down a principle of international importance. He suggested that a second paragraph be added based on the proposal submitted by the representative of Panama with a view to the application of that general principle by national laws. The question of measures of implementation raised by the Soviet representative should, in his view, form the subject of much more precise texts appended to the Declaration. It was a question of procedure not of principle and he was prepared, when the time came, to put forward definite proposals in that connection.

[9]

MR. EASTERMAN (World Jewish Congress) suggested that the text submitted by the Sub-Commission on the Prevention of Discrimination be amended by the addition, at the end, of the words “and everyone shall be able to exercise them freely”. He supported the proposal submitted by the Soviet Representative and suggested that the words “legislative, administrative or judicial” be added before the words “action” in Mr. Borisov’s proposal. Finally, he supported the proposal put forward by the representative of Panama which was designed to confirm the principles defined in this Article.

GENERAL ROMULO (Philippines) recalled that the Group had already adopted two phrases of Article 3 dealing with the equality of individuals before the law. The proposal submitted by the representative of Panama should be attached to that Article rather than to Article 6. He therefore proposed that a vote be taken on Article 3 supplemented by Article 17 of the Declaration as submitted by Panama, the latter being slightly amended so as to bring the two texts into accord.

DR. WEISS (International Refugee Organization) said that in its report to the Commission on Human Rights (E/CN.4/41), the Preparatory Commission for the International Refugee Organization had drawn attention to the need to avoid all discrimination on the grounds of nationality or lack of nationality, and to maintain equal rights, even in the absence of agreements between the various countries providing for reciprocity. It had also urged the desirability of providing under the civil and penal laws of the various countries adequate safeguards against discrimination and the advocacy of discrimination.

PROFESSOR CASSIN (France) said that Article 6, which defined a universal principle, raised a problem which was prior to that of equality before municipal law, dealt with in Article 3. The latter had only been adopted provisionally. It seemed to him at present preferable to place Article 6 first. Even if the Working Group was not of that opinion, a logical order must be adopted.

GENERAL ROMULO (Philippines) proposed that Article 6 should be placed at the end of the Declaration, in the form of a conclusion.

MR. AMADO (Panama) said that the place where his proposal was inserted was of secondary importance, but he insisted that it should be adopted as it stood, without any change.

PROFESSOR CASSIN (France) thought that the proposal submitted by the representative of Panama was intrinsically bound up with Article 6. He proposed that Article 6 and Article 3, supplemented by Article 17 of the Declaration submitted by Panama, be regarded as two paragraphs of the same Article. The first paragraph would define the principle, and the second its application.

MR. HEPPEL (United Kingdom) proposed the insertion in this Article of a provision to the effect that a person could be punished for what he had done or said, but he could not be punished for an opinion he held.

THE CHAIRMAN said this point could not be embodied in so general an Article as Article 6. She proposed to take a vote on the United States amendment, to the effect that the text submitted by the Sub-Commission on the Prevention of Discrimination be adopted down to the word “religion”, inclusive. If that amendment were rejected, she would take a vote on the whole of the text submitted by the Sub-Commission. If the latter were not adopted she would take a vote on the Soviet [11] proposal. Finally, the Working Group would have to take a decision on the proposal of the representative of France that Article 3 combined with the proposal of the representative of Panama, be added to Article 6.

She put to the vote the amendment submitted by the United States.

Decision: The Working Group rejected the amendment by 2 votes to 1, with 3 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the complete text submitted by the Sub-Commission on the Prevention of Discrimination.

Decision: The Working Group adopted this text by 3 votes, with 3 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN said it did not seem necessary to consider the Soviet representative's proposal and called for a vote on the second paragraph resulting from the fusion of Article 3 adopted by the Working Group and Article 17 of the Declaration submitted by Panama, with certain minor changes suggested by the French representative. This second paragraph read:

“All are equal before the law regardless of office or status and entitled to equal protection of the law against any arbitrary distinction in violation of this Declaration.”

Decision: The Working Group adopted this second paragraph by 3 votes to 1, with 2 abstentions.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) formally requested a vote on the second paragraph of Mr. Borisov's proposal, as a third paragraph of Article 6.

THE CHAIRMAN put the Soviet representative's proposal to the vote.

Decision: The Working Group rejected the proposal by 2 votes to 2, with 2 abstentions.

GENERAL ROMULO (Philippines) said he had abstained not because of any disagreement on substance, but because in no other Article of the Declaration had there appeared the idea of penalties and this idea seemed to him to be contained in the proposal of the representative of Panama.

[12]

PROFESSOR CASSIN (France) said he supported the idea expressed by the Soviet representative, but had abstained because the Declaration was not a penal text and, for the sake of method, he preferred to include measures of implementation in a separate text.

THE CHAIRMAN said that in her opinion too this provision should not appear in the text of the Declaration. She drew the Working Group's attention to the recommendation formulated by the Sub-Commission on the Prevention of Discrimination, to the effect that the idea expressed by the Soviet representative be embodied in a Convention.

Article 13

THE CHAIRMAN said that in this connection the Working Group had before it the following note intended as a comment:

“Recognizing that the right of emigration, affirmed above, would not be effective without facilities for immigration into and transit through other countries, the Working Group recommends that these questions be treated as a matter of international importance, and that Members of the United Nations co-operate in providing such facilities.”

MR. STEPANENKO (Byelorussian SSR) said that the second paragraph of the text proposed by the Sub-Commission on the Prevention of Discrimination made it possible to cover the flight of traitors to their country and a change of their nationality. That was particularly the case as regards Byelorussia. He asked for the deletion of that paragraph.

THE CHAIRMAN stated that the second paragraph of the Drafting Committee’s text dealt with implementation and would be more appropriate in a Convention.

[13]

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) pointed out that freedom to emigrate implied freedom to immigrate. This provision would conflict with the provisions of the United Nations, since in accordance with Article 2, paragraph 7, the United Nations were not authorized to intervene in matters which were essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of any State.

DR. WEISS (International Refugee Organization) supported the proposed comment, which would facilitate the resettlement of individuals under the supervision of the IRO.

MR. HEPPEL (United Kingdom) emphasized the importance of the words “individuals shall have the right to leave their own country”. Any restriction of this freedom would have serious consequences.

PROFESSOR CASSIN (France) thought that freedom to emigrate and to change one’s nationality must in any case be mentioned. The second paragraph of Article 13 proposed by the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination, made this freedom an unconditional right. Despite his sympathy with this viewpoint, he felt obliged to point out that there were national laws in France which, for instance, forbade persons of military service age to change their nationality. He therefore preferred the text submitted by the Drafting Committee which applied the same proviso to the second paragraph as to the first. He would, however, be prepared to amend the Drafting Committee's text by adding the words "to that of any country willing to accept them" after the words "change their nationality" since this provision would prevent the emergence of stateless persons.

[14]

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) stated that so far as concerned the Soviet Union, where several different peoples lived together on an equal footing from the point of view of nationality, renunciation of nationality was regarded as a problem which should not be treated lightly.

THE CHAIRMAN stated that the proposal submitted by the United States was not an amendment to the draft of the Sub-Commission on the Prevention of Discrimination but a text suggested by the Drafting Committee, for the deletion from Article 13 of the limitations covered by Article 2.

MR. HEPPEL (United Kingdom) stated that Article 13 should at least contain a reference to the limitations mentioned in Article 2. Such limitations should be applied to Article 13 for reasons of public order and also for reasons of town planning.

PROFESSOR CASSIN (France) on a point of order, asked for a separate vote on each part of the Article.

THE CHAIRMAN proposed to take a vote on the first sentence of the English text of Article 13, as submitted by the Drafting Committee.

PROFESSOR CASSIN (France) proposed the insertion of the following amendment as the beginning of this sentence:

"Subject to any general law not contrary to the purposes and principles of the United Nations Charter and adopted for specific reasons of security or in the general interest."

THE CHAIRMAN put the amendment proposed by the representative of France to the vote.

Decision: This amendment was adopted by 3 votes to 1, with 1 abstention.

[15]

THE CHAIRMAN called for a vote on the first sentence of the English text of the Article submitted by the Drafting Committee:

"There shall be liberty of movement and free choice of residence within the borders of each State."

Decision: This sentence was adopted.

GENERAL ROMULO (Philippines) proposed the following amendment to the third sentence of the Drafting Committee's text:

“Individuals shall have the right to leave their own country, and if they so desire to change their nationality to that of any country willing to accept them.”

MR. HEPPEL (United Kingdom) stated that freedom to leave the country should be subject to a provision restricting this right to persons not liable to military service in their country.

THE CHAIRMAN observed that this provision was covered by the amendment submitted by the French representative. She put the amendment submitted by the Philippines representative to the vote.

Decision: The Working Group adopted this amendment by 2 votes to 1, with 2 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN called for a vote on the insertion after the Article of the comment proposed to the Working Group.

Decision: The Working Group agreed to the insertion of the proposed comment after Article 13, by 3 votes to 1, with 1 abstention.

[16]

Article 28

MR. STEPANENKO (Byelorussian SSR) proposed to exclude all mention of examinations. Recruiting was not always conducted on the basis of examinations and furthermore he did not think examinations were an impartial method of selection.

PROFESSOR CASSIN (France) stated that examinations could not be made compulsory and proposed the following text in place of the second sentence.

“They may not be regarded as a matter of privilege or favour but shall be given to the most capable candidate chosen on a competitive or other basis.”

MR. STEPANENKO (Byelorussian SSR) called for a vote on his proposal for the deletion of the second sentence of the Article.

THE CHAIRMAN stated that if this deletion was accepted the Working Group would still have to take a decision on the amendment proposed by the representative of France, which referred to the whole Article.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) stated that the amendment submitted by the representative of France was merely a change of wording and had no bearing on the substance of the Article.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the amendment submitted by the representative of Byelorussia.

Decision: The Working Group rejected this amendment by 2 votes to 2 with 1 abstention.

GENERAL ROMULO (Philippines) remarked, in support of the view expressed by the representative of the Soviet Union, that the amendment proposed by France did not involve any change of substance. He requested that the sentence be left as it stood in the English text.

[17]

PROFESSOR CASSIN (France) asserted that the amendment he had proposed had a bearing on the substance of the Article. The Drafting Committee's text stated that access to examinations was not a matter of privilege, whilst his amendment stated that the award of an office was not a matter of favour. He was prepared to delete all mention of examinations. His amendment would then read:

“Everyone shall have equal opportunity to engage in public employment and to hold public office in the State of which he is a citizen. Such office or employment may not be regarded as a matter of privilege or favour.”

THE CHAIRMAN stated that a different school of thought existed in the United States, where it was held that access to public employment was not a privilege but that the tenure of a public office was. She therefore proposed the following text:

“Access to public employment shall not be a matter of privilege or favour.”

PROFESSOR CASSIN (France) accepted this proposal.

THE CHAIRMAN put this text to the vote.

Decision: The Working Group adopted this text by 4 votes to none.

Article 36

GENERAL ROMULO (Philippines) proposed that the Sub-Commission's text be taken as a basis of discussion.

THE CHAIRMAN stated that the United States delegation was in a somewhat difficult position with regard to this text since, although different ethnic and linguistic groups existed in the United States, there was no minority problem.

MR. HEPPEL (United Kingdom) suggested that the words “and other authorities of the State” be deleted since they might lead [18] to confusion in administration. He mentioned the possibility of persons belonging to certain linguistic groups claiming the right to fill administrative questionnaires in their own language. A refusal of this right would not constitute a denial of justice. However, the British delegation recognized the right to use the language of a certain linguistic group before courts of justice, in the Press and at public meetings.

THE CHAIRMAN stated that her delegation had no objection to the deletion requested.

MR. STEPANENKO (Byelorussian SSR) regarded this aspect of the minorities problem as one of the main points. The expression of views would not suffice to guarantee the protection of the rights of national groups; these guarantees should be provided in a practical way by the establishment of schools and cultural institutions. He suggested that the Article should be clearly worded and should guarantee that the State would not only establish standards but would furnish these national groups with the means of enlarging their real autonomy. He was amazed that Article 36 should contain a reservation embodied in the words "as far as is compatible with public order and security"; no such reservation was included in other Articles dealing with the use of languages.

PROFESSOR CASSIN (France) stressed the importance of the text under discussion. He realized that France had always been an immigration country. In the Mediterranean territories, Mohammedan and Catholic minorities lived side by side, without friction. If the human rights defined in this Declaration were everywhere respected a simple proclamation would be sufficient, but he thought it would be necessary to define the measures of implementation. His delegation would vote for [19] the whole of Article 36, provided the word "persons" was replaced by "citizens of the country". He accepted the amendment proposed by the British delegation, since he feared that the words "other authorities of the State" might lead, for instance, to the establishment of armed units who would be allowed to use a different language. Although this situation existed in certain countries, it offered no justification for making the establishment of separate military units compulsory.

THE CHAIRMAN, noting that no objection had been made to the foregoing slight modifications, took it that the replacement of the word "persons" by "citizens of the country" was adopted.

MR. STEPANENKO (Byelorussian SSR) moved the amendment of the text of Article 36 by the following addition:

"The rights of minorities must be guaranteed by the State by means of establishing standards and procuring the necessary means from State sources in order to give members of such groups rights of nation and nationality in the framework of national and territorial autonomy."

THE CHAIRMAN stressed all the various difficulties which might arise from a text applicable to all States. The application of the principle proposed by the representative of Byelorussia was possible under certain governmental systems, but not all. She felt it would be advisable to leave the detailed implementation of Article 36 to each State.

[20]

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics recalled that the Charter spoke of the obligation to promote the development of the peoples of non self-governing territories towards independence. In view of this he did not see why territorial autonomy could not be mentioned in Article 36.

PROFESSOR CASSIN (France) stated that the text proposed by the representative of Byelorussia would be altogether inappropriate in countries such as France, the United States and others. There were certain countries where different peoples, Christians, Mohammedans and Jews, had lived side by side for centuries; as in North Africa, for instance, and where such a text would be inapplicable. There were some non self-governing or trust territories where, no doubt, a problem of self-government existed, but there was no minorities problem.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that this problem could only be approached in the light of the conditions obtaining in different countries. She thought that the decision should rest with the different States. She also thought that it would be preferable to delete the whole of the text. She put this proposal to the vote.

Decision: This proposal was rejected by 2 votes to 1, with 2 abstentions. The text of Article 36 was therefore retained.

THE CHAIRMAN put the amendment proposed by the Byelorussian delegation to the vote.

Decision: This amendment was rejected by 3 votes to 2.

THE CHAIRMAN called for a vote on the text of Article 36, as proposed by the Sub-Commission on Minorities, in which the [21] word “persons” was replaced by the words “citizens of the country”.

PROFESSOR CASSIN (France) withdrew his amendment, since he considered that the text of this Article was not yet final and should therefore be held over. He proposed that this text be added to the Report and submitted to Governments for comment.

Decision: This proposal was adopted by 4 votes to 1.

THE CHAIRMAN stated that the remarks made by the Byelorussian delegation would also be annexed to the Report.

Resumption of the discussion of Article 1

GENERAL ROMULO (Philippines) proposed a new text:

“All men are brothers. Being endowed by nature with reason and conscience, they are born free and possess equal dignity and rights.”

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) stated that it would be an act of hypocrisy to place such a text at the beginning of a draft Declaration on Human Rights at a time when so much misunderstanding existed in the world.

PROFESSOR CASSIN (France) agreed that men did not always behave, today, as brothers, but he remarked that they should behave as such. All nations were called upon to point out to men what was their duty. In deference to the representative of the USSR he would agree to say: "All men should act like brothers" but such an article would not be appropriate in a Declaration on Human Rights.

THE CHAIRMAN proposed the following text:

"All men are born free and equal. They are endowed by nature with reason and conscience and should act like brothers."

[22]

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) pointed out that the Working Group had two proposals before it: the first derived from the French materialist philosophers of the 19th century; the second was of deistic origin, a proposal taken from the Gospels. He could not understand why the Declaration should contain solemn proclamations, devoid of meaning, which were less realistic than the terms of Article 1 of the Charter. He thought that the wording proposed would be harmful to the Declaration on Human Rights, which should be immediately applicable. He felt that such wording could not even be included in the preamble, since it would have a pompous and ridiculous effect. He asked for the deletion of this Article.

THE CHAIRMAN called for a vote on the text of Article 1, as proposed by the delegations of the Philippines and of France:

"All men are born free and equal in dignity and rights. They are endowed by nature with reason and conscience and should act towards one another like brothers."

Decision: This text was adopted by 3 votes to 2.

Comment on Article 36

THE CHAIRMAN announced that the representative of the Commission on the Status of Women had asked permission to append the following text to Article 36 in the form of a comment:

"In the conditions prevailing at present in the world, legislation providing varying degrees [23] of protection for women may be necessary, in particular in regard to heavy or specifically harmful work."

GENERAL ROMULO (Philippines) seconded this request.

THE CHAIRMAN called for a vote on the proposal.

Decision: This proposal was adopted by 5 votes.

THE CHAIRMAN recalled that the Philippine delegation had also submitted a note asking that the term “laws”, as used in the text of the Declaration, be construed as “laws in accordance with the spirit of the principles proclaimed in the United Nations Charter”. She proposed that it should be left to the Rapporteur to decide whereabouts in the text this note should be inserted.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) thought that this question should be discussed.

THE CHAIRMAN replied that it has been discussed and that the Working Group could proceed to the vote.

PROFESSOR CASSIN (France) stated that in his view this note should appear either at the beginning or at the end of the Declaration. He thought it would be preferable to place it at the end of the document; however, the final decision would rest with the Commission.

Decision: the proposal that it be left to the Rapporteur to decide where the note proposed by the Philippine representative should be inserted, was rejected by 2 votes to 2, with one abstention.

The meeting rose at 8.20 p.m.

Report of the Working Group on the Declaration on Human Rights

Chapter I

Introduction

1. The meetings of the Working Group of the Human Rights Commission were held from Friday, 6 December 1947 at 11.30 a.m. until . . . December. The following represented their respective countries:

Chairman: Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt; Rapporteur: Prof. René Cassin (France); Members: Mr. Stepanenko (Byelorussian SSR), Mr. Amado (Panama), General Romulo (Philippines), Mr. Bogomolov (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics).

The British Delegation sent Mr. Heppel as an observer.

Representatives of the Commission on the Status of Women: Mrs. Begtrup; Mrs. Uralova, Rapporteur.

Specialized Agencies: Mr. de Givry and Mr. Bessling (International Labour Organization); Mr. Havet (UNESCO); Dr. Weiss (Preparatory Commission for the International Refugee Organization (IRO)).

[2]

Non-Governmental Organizations: Category A: Mr. Robinet de Cléry, (Interparliamentary Union); Miss T. Sender (American Federation of Labor); Mr. P. G. S. Serrarens and Mr. Vanistendael (International Federation of Christian Trade Unions). Category B: Dr. Bienenfeld and Mr. Easterman (World Jewish Congress); Dr. Duchosal (International Red Cross Committee); Miss van Eeghen (International Council of Women); Mr. Winn, Professor Bentwich and Mr. Paul Mantoux (Consultative Council of Jewish Organizations); Mr. Nolde (Commission of the Churches on International Affairs); Miss de Romer (Union internationale des Ligues féminines catholiques).

2. The Working Group on the Declaration elected Mrs. F. D. Roosevelt, Chairman, and Professor René Cassin, Rapporteur. Miss Kitchen acted as secretary to the Working Group. The views expressed by the members of the Working Group will be found in the report and summary records of the various meetings.

Chapter II

Terms of Reference and Working Method

3. The Working Group on the Declaration was set up by the Human Rights Commission in pursuance of a draft resolution submitted by the Belgian Delegation and adopted on . . . It got to work as soon as it was constituted and is to report to the Plenary Commission so that the latter can, during the present session, take such decisions as it may think fit on these proposals.

[3]

4. A preliminary exchange of view took place on the question of the text which was to serve as the working document.

On the proposal of the delegate of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, the Draft Declaration drawn up by the Drafting Committee at Lake Success and contained in Annex F of its report (Document E/CN.4/21) was adopted as the basic document.

The Chairman stated that the United States delegation had drawn up a draft Declaration (Document E/CN.4/36) which was inspired by the desire to reduce to essentials the contents of the Drafting Committee's proposal. She expressed her preference for a short declaration, since brevity would facilitate its dissemination throughout the world.

The representative of France, while expressing the same preference, thought that the Declaration should begin with some Articles of a general character. The representative of Panama submitted a proposal relating to the draft submitted to the United Nations Assembly by his country in 1946, which was no other than the "Declaration of Philadelphia" drawn up between 1942 and 1944 by the jurists of 24 nations under the auspices of the American Institute of Law (Document A/148):

“That the Commission, with a view to any re-draft of the preliminary draft Declaration or Convention on human rights, should take special note of the International Declaration on Essential Human Rights and Freedoms submitted to the Commission in pursuance of the Resolution adopted by the General Assembly during the second part of its first session.”

This proposal was unanimously accepted.

5. On the Chairman’s proposal the Working Group decided not to discuss the preamble of the Declaration during the present session, [4] but to confine itself to defining the principles to be included therein.

6. The character of the future Declaration was then considered. The representative of the USSR observed that it was not a question of drawing up a short or a long declaration, but a clear, straightforward and complete one, such as would give real practical help in protecting the democratic rights of individuals. The United Kingdom representative thought that the Declaration should be drawn up in quite a different form from the Convention; whereas the Convention should be drafted in legal form, the Declaration was a statement of general principle which it would be best to make brief. According to the French representative the essential difference between the Declaration and the Convention lay in their general character. The Declaration was a synthesis, a general view, whereas the Convention or Conventions defined something more precise.

The representative of Panama stated that it was important that a clause be included in each Article mentioning the duty of the State to implement the provision contained in it. However the Working Party reserved its decision on this point. It also decided that in general limitations imposed by the exigencies of law and order or for other reasons should not be inserted in each Article in respect of the rights of freedoms granted therein. The same applies to the principle of non-discrimination.

The Chairman in reply to a question by the USSR representative, having stated that a separate, though not a final, vote would be taken on each of the Articles in the Declaration, the USSR representative declared his intention of abstaining from these separate votes and of voting only on the text as a whole.

Chapter III

Texts

Preliminary Articles:

Article I

Text suggested by the Philippines:

“All men are brothers. Being endowed with reason and conscience, they are free and possess equal dignity and rights.”

French Suggestion:

“All men are born free, and equal in dignity and rights, and shall regard each other as brothers.”

Comment. The two representatives submitted a new joint text and the Chairman read out the Article for adoption in the following form:

“All men are born free and equal in dignity and rights. They are endowed by nature with reason and conscience, and should act towards one another like brothers.”

Article 2

The first alternative appearing in the Report formed the subject of a comment by the delegate of France but was not maintained or put to the vote.

The second alternative formed the subject of amendments submitted by the Delegates of the United States, Panama and the Philippines. The following text was adopted:

“In the exercise of his rights everyone is limited by the rights of others and by the just requirements of the democratic State. The individual owes duties to society through which he is enabled to develop his spirit, mind and [6] body in wider freedom.”

Articles 3 to 6

Paragraph 1. “Everyone is entitled to all the rights and freedoms set forth in this Declaration, without distinction of any kind, such as race, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, property status, or national or social origin”.

Paragraph 2. “All are equal before the law regardless of office or status and entitled to equal protection of the law against any arbitrary discrimination in violation of this Declaration”.

Text adopted.

Comment. Paragraph 1 of the text reproduces the former Article 6 of the Drafting Committee’s proposal as amended by the Sub-Commission on the Prevention of Discrimination and the Protection of Minorities.

Paragraph 2 is a combination of Article 3 adopted by the Working Group at its second meeting on proposals made by Panama and the Philippines, with Article 17 of the draft of the Government of Panama.

An amendment by the Philippines to Article 3 regarding the conformity of laws, decrees, ordinances, and other administrative and judicial instruments of the various States, with the purposes and principles of the United Nations, was deferred for examination, as was also the amendment which the Delegate of France had proposed to submit regarding appeal by individuals against actions taken by authorities in violation of the law.

Life and liberty of the personArticle 7

“Everyone has the right to life, to liberty and security of person.”

Text adopted.

[7]

Article 8

The Drafting Committee’s text was adopted with an amendment proposed by the United States added to the end:

“No one shall be deprived of his personal liberty or kept in custody except in cases prescribed by law and after due process. Everyone placed under arrest or detention shall have the right to immediate judicial determination of the legality of any detention to which he may be subject and to trial within a reasonable time or to release.”

Article 9

“Everyone shall have access to independent and impartial tribunals for the determination of his rights and obligations. He shall be entitled to aid of counsel and, when he appears personally, to understand the procedure and to use a language which he can speak.”

Text adopted.

Comment. This text covers the whole of any individual’s right to justice and renders Article 15, paragraph 2, of the Drafting Committee’s draft redundant.

Article 10

“Any person is presumed to be innocent until proved guilty. No one shall be convicted or punished for crime or other offence except after fair public trial at which he has been given all guarantees necessary for his defence and which shall be pursuant to law in effect at the time of the commission of the act charged.

“No one shall be subjected to torture or to cruel or inhuman punishment or indignity.”

Comment. This Article 10 combines the former Article 9 and the former Article 10 of the Drafting Committee’s text. It was understood that the question of a competent court raised by [8] the delegate of Panama is covered equally by the passage concerning guarantees necessary for defence and that concerning the necessity to apply the law in effect at the time of the commission of the act charged. It was also understood that this text covers one of the general principles which are not applicable to minor administrative offences that do not always require legal proceedings. It also does not prevent a court from holding closed sessions or reading secret documents provided that the sentence be pronounced in public.

Article 11

“Slavery, in all its forms, being inconsistent with the dignity of man, shall be prohibited by law.”

Comment. In adopting Article 11 members of the Working Group meant it to cover traffic in women, involuntary servitude and forced labour, and governments of Powers exercising their jurisdiction in trust and non-self-governing territories to be specially responsible for abolishing slavery in those territories.

Article 12

“Everyone shall be entitled to protection under law from unreasonable interference with his reputation, his privacy and his family. His home and correspondence shall be inviolable.”

Article 13

“Subject to any general law not contrary to the purposes and principles of the United Nations Charter and adopted for specific reasons of security or in the general interest there shall be liberty of movement and free choice of residence within the borders of each state.

“Individuals shall have the right to leave their own country and, if they so desire, to change their nationality to that of any country willing to accept them.”

[9]

Comment. This Article is entirely in conformity with the text proposed by the Sub-Commission on the Prevention of Discrimination and the Protection of Minorities.

It was recognized that the right of emigration, affirmed above, would not be effective without facilities for immigration into and transit through other countries. The Working Group recommends that these corollaries be treated as a matter of international concern and that members of the United Nations co-operate in providing such facilities.

Article 14

“Everyone shall have the right to seek and be granted asylum from persecution. This right will not be accorded to criminals nor to those whose acts are contrary to the principles and aims of the United Nations.”

Comment. The Drafting Committee’s draft was amended both at the request of the International Organization of Christian Trades Unions and the International Refugee Organization (IRO) which found that the expression “to seek asylum” did not sufficiently express the right of a persecuted individual, and at the request of members of the Working Group who considered it necessary explicitly to exclude from the right of asylum ordinary criminals, who are generally subject to extradition laws, and all those whose acts are contrary to the principles and purposes of the United Nations.<sup>44</sup>

Fundamental Civil Rights

Article 15

“Everyone has the right everywhere in the world to recognition as a person before the law and to the enjoyment of fundamental civil rights.”

Article 15A

“Men and women shall have the same freedom to contract [10] marriage in accordance with the law.

“Marriage and the family shall be protected by the State and Society.”

Comment. It was understood that for application of this Article reference would be made to the general texts prohibiting discrimination, and also that the special protection due to mother and child having formed the subject of an amendment by the Delegation of Byelorussia would be discussed separately during examination of Article 34.

It was also noted that married persons should have the right to reside together in any country from which they could not be lawfully excluded.

Article 16

See Article 30.

Article 17

“Everyone has the right to own property in conformity with the laws of the State in which such property is located.

“No one shall be arbitrarily deprived of his property.”

Nationality

Article 18

“Everyone has the right to a nationality.”

Comment. The United Nations should assume certain responsibilities for those who at the present time do not have a nationality and they should work out one or more Conventions in order that the principle laid down in the text may become a reality through collaboration between States.

Article 19

(text proposed by the Drafting Committee)

“No alien legally admitted to the territory of a State may be expelled therefrom without having a fair hearing.”

[11]

Comment. The above text was rejected by a majority.

Public freedoms

Article 20

“Para 1. Individual freedom of thought and conscience, to hold and change beliefs is an absolute and sacred right.

“Para 2. Freedom of belief, of worship and of religious teaching is the right of everyone.”

Comment.

Para 1 was adopted without any change in the Drafting Committee’s text.

Para 2 was adopted on a motion by the Delegate of Panama, by 3 votes, with 3 abstentions, after the rejection of a French amendment and a Philippine amendment.

It is understood that the freedoms mentioned in Article 20 include the right of religious observance and practice, as well as the right of association for religious and moral purposes.

Article 21

“Everyone is free to express and impart opinions, or to receive and seek information and the opinion of others from sources wherever situated.

“No person may be interfered with on account of his opinions.”

Article 22

“There shall be freedom of expression either by word, in writing, in the press, in books or by visual, auditative [sic] or other means. There shall be equal access to all channels of communication.”

Comment. Neither of the above texts proposed by the Drafting Committee was discussed at all by the Working Group, owing to the fact that the International Conference on Freedom of Information and of the Press is to be held in March 1948.

[12]

Article 23

“Everyone has the right to freedom of peaceful assembly and to participate in local, national and international associations for purposes of a political, economic, religious, social, cultural, trade union or any other character, not inconsistent with this Declaration.”

Comment. It is understood that no individual or association that aims to destroy the fundamental rights and freedoms set forth in this Declaration can claim protection under this Article.

The Article is not intended to include international political associations forbidden by law.

Article 24

“No one shall be denied the right, either individually, or in association with others, to petition or to communicate with the public authorities of his State, or his residence or of the United Nations.”

Article 25

“When a Government, group or individual seriously or systematically tramples the fundamental human rights and freedoms, individuals and peoples have the right to resist oppression and tyranny.”

Comment. This text has been omitted with a view to inclusion either in the Preamble or in a Final Article.

*Articles 26 and 27*Political Rights

“Everyone without discrimination has the right to take an effective part in the Government of his country. The State shall conform to the will of the people as manifested by elections which shall be periodic, free, fair and by secret ballot.”

This text which combines Articles 26 and 27 of the Drafting Committee’s proposal is based on the Draft of the Government of [13] Panama, amended according to a Byelorussian amendment and to the recommendation of the Commission on the Status of Women.

Following the suggestion of the representative of the United Kingdom it was understood that in non-metropolitan territories the use of such balloting procedures as the secret ballot could not be imposed when its effect might be contrary to the intentions of Article 73 (d) of the Charter, or to the obligations contained in the relevant parts of the Trusteeship Agreements.

The French Delegation also remarked that the text adopted could not be construed as requiring Member States to enforce a specific form of ballot, in particular the “Family Vote” which confers on adults the voting rights that would belong to minors.

Article 28

“Everyone shall have equal opportunity to engage in public employment and to hold public office in the State of which he is a citizen.

“Access to public employment shall not be a matter of privilege or favour.”

Comment. The Drafting Committee’s proposal, taken up by the Sub-Commission on the Protection of Minorities, has been shortened.

Social, Economic and Cultural Rights

Article 29

“Everyone has the right to work.

“The State has a duty to take such measures as may be within its power to ensure that all its citizens have an opportunity for useful work.”

Article 30

“Everyone has the right to receive pay commensurate with his ability and skill, to work under just and favourable conditions, to join trade unions for the protection of his interests in securing a decent standard of living for himself and his family.

[14]

“Women shall have the right to work under the same conditions as men and to receive equal pay for equal work.”

Comment. In the conditions prevailing at present in the world, legislation providing varying degrees of protection for women may be necessary, in particular in regard to heavy or specifically harmful work.

Article 31

“Everyone has the right to education. Fundamental education shall be free and compulsory. There shall be equal access for higher education as can be provided by the State or community on the basis of merit and without distinction as to race, sex, language, religion, social standing, financial means, or political affiliation.”

Article 31A

“Education will be directed to the full physical, spiritual and moral development of the human personality, to the strengthening of respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms and to the combating of the spirit of intolerance and hatred against other nations or racial or religious groups everywhere.”<sup>45</sup>

Article 32

“Everyone has the right to rest and leisure.”

Comment. Rest and leisure should be ensured to everyone by laws or contracts providing in particular for reasonable limitations on working hours and for periodic vacations with pay.

Article 33

“Everyone without distinction as to economic and social conditions has the right to the preservation of his health by means of adequate food, clothing, housing and medical care.

“The responsibility of the State and community for the health and safety of its people can be fulfilled only by provision of adequate health and social measures.”
[15]

Article 34

“Everyone has the right to social security. The State has a duty to maintain or ensure the maintenance of comprehensive measures for the security of the individual against the consequences of unemployment, disability, old age and all other loss of livelihood for reasons beyond his control.

“Motherhood shall be granted special care and assistance. Children are similarly entitled to special care and assistance.”

Article 35

“Everyone has the right to participate in the cultural life of the community, to enjoy the arts, and to share in the benefits that result from scientific discoveries.”

Comment. It was understood that this does not mean that secret processes that have been patented should be revealed.

Article 35A

“Authors of all artistic, literary and scientific works and inventors shall retain in addition to the just remuneration of their labour, a moral right on their work and/or discovery, which shall not disappear, even after such work shall have become the common property of mankind.”

<sup>45</sup> Pursuant to document E/CN.4/57/Add.1, the following should be inserted regarding Article 31 and 31A:
“Comment. In such countries as desire it, the right of private education will be respected and religious education shall be permitted in the schools.”

Comment. The French amendment suggesting that this text should be taken up again, as proposed in the Drafting Committee, has been dropped.

Article 36

(Drafting Committee's text)

“In States inhabited by a substantial number of persons of a race, language or religion other than those of the majority of the population, persons belonging to such ethnic, linguistic or religious minorities shall have the right, as far as compatible with public order, to establish and maintain schools and cultural or religious institutions, and to use their own language in the press, in public assembly and before [16] the courts and other authorities of the State.”

Comment. The Sub-Commission on the Protection of Minorities has proposed the following text (CN.4/52):

“In States inhabited by well-defined ethnic, linguistic or religious groups which are clearly distinguished from the rest of the population, and which want to be accorded differential treatment, persons belonging to such groups shall have the right, as far as is compatible with public order and security, to establish and maintain their schools and cultural or religious institutions, and to use their own language and script in the press, in public assembly and before the courts and other authorities of the State, if they so choose.”

In the course of the discussion the following Byelorussian amendment was submitted:

“The rights of minorities must be guaranteed by the State by means of establishing standards and procuring the necessary means from State sources in order to give members of such groups rights of nation and nationality in the framework of national and territorial autonomy.”

A French amendment to replace the word “persons” in the fourth line by the term “citizens of the country” was also submitted. The United Kingdom representative suggested that the words “and other authorities of the State” after the words “the courts” should be deleted.

Finally it was decided by four votes to one to submit the Drafting Committee's text for Article 36, pointing out that it was only a suggestion for Governments to comment on and had not been adopted by the Working Group. The draft text of Article 36 proposed by the Sub-Commission on the Protection of Minorities was also referred to Governments.

Final Provisions

Article 37

“All the rights and liberties recognized in the present Declaration are limited by the reasonable requirements of public order and security, and morality.”

Comment. This general text, whose necessity was recognized at the outset of the Working Group's discussions was not voted upon by the Group.

Article 38

“The States Members of the United Nations shall ensure that their Law (statutes, regulations and all administrative acts) is brought into, and maintained in, conformity with the principles of the present Declaration.

“A system of effective judicial and administrative appeal shall be organised by each State for the purpose of penalising violations of these principles.”

Comment. The above text arises from a proposal presented by the Representative of the Philippines during the discussion of Article 3, a proposal made by the Representative of Panama, and an amendment to paragraph 2 proposed by the Representative of France. It was not voted upon by the Working Group.

1. Consideration of the Reports of the Working Groups on an International Convention on Human Rights (Document E/CN.4/56) and on the Declaration of Human Rights (Document E/CN.4/57)

THE CHAIRMAN welcomed the representative of China, Dr. C. H. Wu, who had previously been represented by Dr. Nan-Ju Wu. She stated that the Report on the Convention (Document E/CN.4/56) contained the final English text, but that the French version was an unofficial translation. The wording of the two Reports on the Declaration and Convention could not be regarded as final, but since they would be sent to all Member Governments for comment, she hoped that representatives would concentrate on substance rather than wording. She suggested that the Commission should study simultaneously the corresponding clauses in the Draft Declaration and the Draft Convention.

MR. RIBNIKAR (Yugoslavia) proposed a general discussion on the drafts as a whole before commencing a study of separate Articles.

THE CHAIRMAN did not think that that procedure would be useful, but was willing to put the proposal to the vote.

MRS. MEHTA (India) thought that some general remarks should be permitted. One of the drafts omitted allusion to certain rights which should be brought to the attention of the Commission.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that there was nothing to prohibit general observations on Articles under discussion.

MR. WU (China) suggested that consideration should proceed Article by Article, and the right to make general observations either in the preamble or at the end should be reserved.

THE CHAIRMAN reminded representatives that it had been decided not to draft the preamble at the second session.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) felt that everyone should be allowed to give an explanation of their general attitude to the two documents.

[4]

THE CHAIRMAN said that there would be no objection to representatives giving an explanation of their vote either on specific articles or on the document as a whole. The proposal to be put to the vote was whether the Commission should consider the corresponding Articles of the two documents simultaneously.

MR. CASSIN (France) feared that consideration of the Articles out of their numerical order would cause confusion. An understanding of the logical purpose of each Article was a necessary guide to consideration of the full text.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) thought that it would be simpler to take the Declaration Article by Article, starting with Article 1, and to consider at the same time the corresponding Articles in the Convention, whenever a common subject arose.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the proposal to consider the two Documents Article by Article which was adopted by 11 votes to 4, with 2 abstentions.

The Belgian proposal was then put to the vote and adopted by 11 votes to 0, with 6 abstentions.

2. Declaration on Human Rights (Document E/CN.4/57) – Article 1

MRS. MEHTA (India) said she did not like the wording “all men” or “and should act towards one another like brothers”, she felt they might be interpreted to exclude women, and were out of date.

THE CHAIRMAN replied that the word “men” used in this sense was generally accepted to include all human beings.

Article 1 was adopted by 12 votes to 0, with 5 abstentions.

Replying to a request by the representative of Belgium for a ruling on the point raised by the representative of India, the Chairman said that the text of Article 1 had been approved without modification, but that a comment could be inserted if so desired.

LORD DUKESTON (United Kingdom) proposed that, in order to avoid further discussion on the subject, a note should be included [5] at the beginning of both Documents to the effect that the word “men”, as used therein, referred to all human beings.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that the formula was of an abstract and philosophic character. It was also contradictory. It repeated the ideas of the materialistic French philosophers of the eighteenth century and ended by proclaiming a new philosophy. He was aware that abstract formulae were sometimes useful at the beginning of a document, but as such they should appear in the preamble. He could not accept that text as final.

THE CHAIRMAN observed that, as the Article had already been voted on, the remarks of the Soviet Union representative would be taken as an explanation of his vote.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) pointed out that the eighteenth century French philosophers were not all materialists. One example was Jean Jacques Rousseau. It was unreasonable to say that those responsible for the slogan “Liberty, equality, fraternity” had not reached the idea of universal brotherhood.

MRS. MEHTA (India) said that she had no objection to the United Kingdom suggestion, but Article 1 was the only place in the Declaration where the expression “men” appeared. She wished to have this changed to “human beings” or “persons”.

A discussion followed as to the advisability of: (1) accepting the alteration suggested by the Indian representative; (2) inserting a footnote to Article 1, or (3) adopting the proposal of the United Kingdom representative.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) thought it was necessary to insert a footnote since firstly, the expression “droit de l’homme” appeared repeatedly in the French version and, secondly, if the words “human beings” were used, it would be logical to add “brothers and sisters”.

[6]

THE CHAIRMAN then put to the vote the proposal of the United Kingdom representative which was adopted by 12 votes to 1, with 3 abstentions.

Article 2

THE CHAIRMAN said that the United States Delegation preferred the text it had proposed, (E/CN.4/36) and wished it to be inserted as a footnote.

MR. VICTORICA (Uruguay) agreed with the underlying spirit of the Article. Its provisions were in harmony with liberal constitutional law in the field of Human Rights. An Inter-American Law Commission was due to meet at Bogotá in March at which consideration would be given to limitations imposed within the framework of the law and in respect of public order. The rights of individuals should be limited by the just requirements of a democratic state. He suggested the addition to the present text of the sentence “formulated by the law” after the words “democratic state”. He also submitted the following as an amended text:

“The rights of each may be limited to secure the rights of others, by the exigencies of public order, the security of the state and the normal development of collective life as expressed by law.”

LORD DUKESTON (United Kingdom) objected to the term “democratic state” in a context which introduced distinctions and which might cause difficulties. He preferred a simpler and broader text, proclaiming the rights of individuals and their obligations to society for the creation of a more liberal atmosphere. He submitted the following:

“In the exercise of their rights, everyone must recognize the rights of others and his obligation to society so that all men may develop their spirit, mind and body in wider freedom.”

[7]

MR. CASSIN (France) said that the English words “spirit, mind and body” had not been very aptly rendered in the French version. He noted the remarks of the Uruguayan representative concerning the Inter-American Law Commission, and pointed out that the ground had already been covered to some extent by the Meeting of American Jurists in Philadelphia. The Drafting Committee text represented a compromise between the liberal eighteenth century ideas and the modern point of view.

THE CHAIRMAN said it was impossible at the present session to attempt to draft a Declaration in final form. It was also unnecessary since the whole would be revised at the next session. She suggested that representatives should submit their amendments for insertion as footnotes, which would then be circulated to Member Governments together with the formal text.

MR. WU (China) proposed amending the first sentence of Article 2 to read: "In the exercise of his rights everyone shall respect the rights of others and comply with the just requirements of the democratic State."

MR. CRUZ COKE (CHILE) supported the Chinese proposal. He emphasized the point made by the Chairman that the discussion should be kept to matters of substance rather than actual drafting.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) objected to the idea of adding alternative texts in the form of footnotes. He thought that the Declaration should be the expression of the views of the Commission as a whole, and that representatives who had not been members of the Working Group on the Declaration should be given an opportunity to propose amendments. He pointed out that, when the Declaration was sent to Governments, they would have the opportunity to make comments and propose alternative texts.

THE CHAIRMAN said that all formal proposals on matters of substance would be put to the vote. If, thereafter, a representative still considered his own text to be better than that which was [8] adopted, he would be free to insert it in a footnote.

MR. AMADO (Panama) pointed out that the draft Declaration under discussion was not simply the expression of the views of the six members of the Working Group, but that it had been based on the Drafting Committee's Report. He agreed with the Chairman that representatives should be allowed to include their own texts in the form of footnotes.

THE CHAIRMAN put the Uruguayan proposal to the vote.

It was rejected by 9 votes to 2, with 6 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the proposal made by the United Kingdom representative.

That was rejected by 7 votes to 5, with 4 abstentions.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) asked to have the Chinese proposal voted on by division.

The Chairman put the first sentence of the Chinese proposal to the vote:

"In the exercise of his rights, everyone shall respect the rights of others and comply with the just requirements of the democratic State."

The proposal was rejected by 7 votes to 4, with 6 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN then put to the vote the original text of article 2, as contained in Document E/CN.4/57.

The Article was adopted by 9 votes to 2, with 5 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN requested that a comment be included in the Report giving the United States' text (E/CN.4/36) and saying that the United States preferred its own version to that which had been adopted.

LORD DUKESTON (United Kingdom) requested that a similar remark should be inserted with regard to the United Kingdom text.

[9]

2. Articles 3 to 6 of the Draft Declaration (E/CN.4/57)
and Article 19 of the Draft Convention (E/CN.4/56)

MR. LOUFI (Egypt) proposed the deletion of the words “political or other opinion, property status, or national or social origin”. Those words had been added by the Sub-Commission on Discrimination and Minorities, but he preferred the original text proposed by the Drafting Committee. He suggested that the first sentence of the Article in the Declaration be amended to correspond to the wording of Article 19 of the Convention.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) opposed that proposal. He thought that the main fault of the Declaration was a lack of precision in enumerating those entitled to the rights and in providing methods to safeguard those rights. He read the proposal made by Mr. Borisov to the Sub-Commission (document on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities, E/CN.4/Sub.2/21) and suggested that it should be discussed:

“All people are equal before the law and shall enjoy equal rights in the economic, cultural, social and political life, irrespective of their race, sex, language, religion, property status, national or social origin.

Any advocacy of national racial and religious hostility or of national exclusiveness or hatred and contempt, as well as any action establishing a privilege or a discrimination based on distinctions of race, nationality, or religion, constitute a crime and shall be punishable under the law of the State.”

THE CHAIRMAN asked if the Soviet Union representative was proposing an amendment to the Declaration or to the Convention.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) asked that it be studied as an amendment to the Declaration, as the Convention was incomplete and many of the fundamental rights were not included.

[10]

MRS. MEHTA (India) pointed out that the word “colour” had been added to the Article in the Convention. She had understood the term “race” to include colour, but if there was any doubt on the subject, she thought that the word “colour” should be inserted in the Declaration.

MR. CRUZ COKE (Chile) did not agree with the Soviet Union proposal since it put all power in the hands of the State, and, in his opinion, the State constituted the chief threat to the rights of the individual.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) said that the representative of India had raised an important point since “race” and “colour” did not mean the same thing, neither was the conception of colour included in the term “race”.

MR. CASSIN (France) said that the Working Group on the Declaration had followed the practice of the Sub-Commission on Discrimination and Minorities and had considered the term “race” to include colour. He drew attention to the definition of “national origin” in the Sub-Commission’s Report and said that a general reference to that Report should be made in connection with the interpretation of the terminology. He agreed with the principle of the Soviet Union proposal, but he did not think that the question of implementation should be included in the Declaration.

THE CHAIRMAN said that her Government would be opposed to the introduction of the Soviet Union proposal in the Declaration. She did not think that a law such as that proposed by the Soviet Union representative could be applied in practice, and cited the prohibition law in the United States as an example.

GENERAL ROMULO (Philippine Republic) supported the Indian proposal that the word “colour” be added to the Article in the Declaration. He agreed with the Soviet Union proposal in principle, [11] but did not think it should be included in the Declaration. He announced his intention of abstaining from voting on it.

MRS. MEHTA (India) wished to change her proposal to read “race including colour” since colour was not mentioned in the United Nations Charter.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) emphasized the importance of reinforcing the general principles by some concrete measures for implementation. He did not think there would be any difficulty in specifically prohibiting acts of discrimination. He thought that if no provision were adopted to prevent acts of discrimination, it would mean that such practices as lynching of negroes would continue. He thought that it should be specifically stated that violation of the principles of the Declaration was a crime.

1. Examination of Articles 3 to 6 of the Declaration (E/CN.4/57)

PROFESSOR DEHOUSSE (Belgium) stated that the amendment submitted by the representative of India at the 34th meeting, to introduce the term "colour", did not seem to him scientifically accurate since, in his view, the concept of race included that of colour. He would, however, vote for this amendment. The amendment proposed by the Soviet representative (E/CN.4/Sub.2/21) was, he felt, unacceptable. There was no mention in the first paragraph of this amendment of "political opinion", as in the first paragraph of the proposed Declaration. The second paragraph of this amendment, relating to implementation, was, he considered, out of place in a Declaration which had no binding force. It also seemed inconsistent for the Soviet representative to oppose the implementation of the provisions concerning human rights when he agreed to their insertion in an Article of the Declaration. Finally, he did not feel it was possible to leave the responsibility of implementation to the States themselves. He proposed the following amendment, which would take into account the idea advanced in the second paragraph of the Soviet representative's amendment: at the end of paragraph 2 of Articles 3 to 6 of the proposed Declaration, add the words "and against any incitement to such discrimination".

LORD DUKESTON (United Kingdom) stated that the United Kingdom could not support the Soviet amendment because it did not protect the individual against discrimination on the grounds of his political opinions. In accordance with this amendment a one-party Government would not be obliged to take measures to safeguard the freedom of those professing a different political opinion from its own.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that it was logical for the terms "political or other opinion" to be omitted from the Soviet proposal. There were political opinions which tolerated not only the advocacy of racial or national hatred, but also the actions arising therefrom. Equal rights could not be granted to those who professed such opinions.

MR. CRUZ COKE (Chile) wished to know whether this meant that the Soviet representative would approve of an individual being persecuted for his political opinions.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) replied that this question bore no relation to the problem under discussion, which was whether propaganda and actions based on national or racial hatred should or should not be permitted.

DR. WU (China) suggested the following amendment to the Soviet representative's proposal: "Any advocacy of national, racial or religious hostility, designed to provoke violence, shall be forbidden under the law of the State". This amendment might be inserted in the Declaration or the Convention.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the Commission had before it the Soviet amendment, proposed for insertion in the Declaration. She asked the representative of China to explain whether his amendment was intended for insertion in the Declaration or in the Convention.

DR. WU (China) stated that he would reserve his amendment for insertion in the Convention.

THE CHAIRMAN called for a vote on the amendment proposed by the Soviet representative, to substitute for Articles 3 to 6 of the Declaration the proposal submitted by Mr. Borisov to the Sub-Commission on the Prevention of [5] Discrimination and the Protection of Minorities (E/CN.4/Sub.2/21).

Decision: The Commission rejected this amendment by ten votes to four, with three abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put the Belgian representative's amendment to the vote.

GENERAL ROMULO (Philippines) proposed that this amendment be inserted after the words "arbitrary discrimination".

PROFESSOR DEHOUSSE (Belgium) accepted this proposal.

Decision: The Commission adopted this amendment by ten votes to none, with six abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN stated that the Commission had before it the amendment proposed by the representative of China, to add the word "colour" after the word "race", and the amendment submitted by the representative of India to add the words "(i.e. also colour)" after the word "race".

MRS. MEHTA (India) pointed out that the amendment proposed by the representative of China implied that the concept of colour was not covered by that of race. She suggested that a vote be taken, in the first instance, on the proposal of the representative of India.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the amendment proposed by the representative of India.

Decision: This amendment was adopted by ten votes to none, with six abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN stated that the amendment proposed by the representative of China was consequently ruled out. Lastly the Commission had before it an amendment by the representative of Egypt to delete the words “political or other opinion” and the words “national or social origin” included in paragraph 1. She put this amendment to the vote.

[6]

Decision: The Commission rejected this amendment by eleven votes to one, with five abstentions.

2. Examination of Article 19 of the Draft Convention<sup>46</sup>

PROFESSOR DEHOUSSE (Belgium) stated that it would be logical to re-introduce in this Article the amendment he had proposed in respect of Articles 3 to 6 of the Declaration. He therefore suggested the insertion in the second sentence of Article 19, after the words “under the law”, of the words “against any incitement to such discrimination”.

MRS. MEHTA (India) proposed for the first sentence of Article 19 the amendment she had submitted for Articles 3 to 6 of the Declaration.

DR. WU (China) proposed that the amendment he had suggested to the proposal by the Soviet representative be inserted at the end of Article 19.

PROFESSOR CASSIN (France) proposed that the whole of paragraph 2 of Article 3 of the Declaration should be substituted for the second sentence of Article 19 of the Convention. In point of fact Article 3, paragraph 2, expressed the idea of equality before the law, which was not contained in the second sentence of Article 19.

MR. LOUTFI (Egypt) supported the proposal made by the representative of France.

PROFESSOR DEHOUSSE (Belgium) stated that he withdrew his amendment in favour of that proposed by the representative of France.

COLONEL HODGSON (Australia) pointed out that there was a great difference between the wording of the corresponding articles of the Declaration and of the Convention. Article 19 involved an obligation on the part of the State, [7] whereas Article 3 laid down a principle. In order to coordinate the two texts, whilst maintaining the binding character of Article 19 of the Convention, he proposed the following amendment to the second sentence of this Article:

“Every person, regardless of office or status, shall be entitled to equal protection under the law and shall be protected by the law against any arbitrary discrimination and against any incitement to such discrimination in violation of this Declaration.”

MR. AMADO (Panama) remarked that Article 19 used the term “Bill of Rights” instead of “Convention”. The English expression “Bill of Rights” had a sense which was not universally accepted and had, therefore, no international significance. He accordingly proposed that the words Bill of Rights be replaced by the term “Convention”.

LORD DUKESTON (United Kingdom) pointed out that all the amendments proposed referred to the restrictions placed on freedom of expression or information. It was, however, stated in paragraph 3 of the draft Resolution on Freedom of Information (page 14 of Document E/CN.4/56) that these questions were to be remitted for consideration to the Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information and of the Press and to the International Conference on Freedom of Information. He proposed therefore that this Resolution should be adhered to and that there should be no discussion of these amendments.

PROFESSOR CASSIN (France) maintained that the amendment submitted by the representative of Australia would represent an undeniable improvement to the text of Article 19 of the Convention. Moreover, he did not feel that the text of the Resolution mentioned by the United Kingdom representative, and the new text proposed for the second sentence of [8] Article 19, were absolutely identical. The latter related not only to freedom of information but also to administrative or educational questions.

PROFESSOR DEHOUSSE (Belgium) suggested that the choice of a title for the document be referred to the Drafting Committee, on the understanding that the term “Declaration” connoted an undertaking that was not binding, and “Convention” an international treaty.

GENERAL ROMULO (Philippines) supported the amendment proposed by the representative of Australia.

MR. AMADO (Panama) did not feel authorized to vote for an international instrument for which he was unable to furnish a concrete definition to his Government. He therefore asked that the question of the document’s title be put to the vote.

THE CHAIRMAN stated that she was prepared to call for a vote on the question as to whether this document should be called a “Bill of Rights” or a “Convention”. Representatives who did not share the majority opinion might state their views in a note which would be annexed to the document.

PROFESSOR DEHOUSSE (Belgium) recalled that he had proposed the substitution of the word “Covenant” for “Convention”. He asked that the vote should also cover this proposal.

MR. VICTORICA (Uruguay) stated that if it was to be effective the Declaration should form part of positive international law. He saw no clear-cut distinction, either in form or in substance, between the Declaration and the Convention. Both documents had the same legal scope; nevertheless, it would be easier to examine the Declaration first, so as to establish the general principles and then to pass on to the Convention. He therefore submitted the following motion: The Commission should continue its [9] examination of the text of the Declaration; after this has been completed it will be in possession of adequate legal criteria by which to examine the Convention.

THE CHAIRMAN explained that although it was to be hoped that the principles defined in the Declaration would be embodied in national legislation, this was not obligatory. Certain States might regard many of these principles merely as aspirations. In view of this, the Commission had split into three Working Groups in order to draw up, at the same time as the Declaration, a draft Convention which, once it had been ratified by States, would be binding. For the same reason the Commission had decided to proceed to a simultaneous study of the corresponding articles of the draft Declaration and the draft Convention.

GENERAL ROMULO (Philippines) stated that the Commission had become involved in a procedure which was inadmissible. It had decided on the parallel discussion of the articles of the Convention and the Declaration. He asked the Chairman to declare any motion contrary to this decision inadmissible. Furthermore, a number of representatives had received precise instructions from their Governments and therefore could not record their votes until the Commission had decided whether to call the instrument a "Declaration" or a "Convention". He felt that the proposal made by the Delegation of Panama to the effect that the Commission should decide between the titles "Convention" and "Bill of Rights" should be taken into consideration. He asked that the vote on this question be given priority.

LORD DUKESTON (United Kingdom) saw no objection, from a legal standpoint, to the use of the words "Bill of Rights"; the main point was the form given to the document, since it [10] would be its form and not its title which would give it the force of an international Convention involving legal obligations. Personally he preferred the term "Bill of Rights", not only on historical grounds, but also because the peoples for whom the Commission was preparing this instrument expected a Bill of Rights. He did not think the Commission could decide on a title merely on the strength of Article 19. Whatever the title adopted when a vote was taken on each article, the latter could be brought into conformity with the title at the end of the debate. In these circumstances he proposed that no decision on the title be taken until the actual contents of the document had been discussed.

THE CHAIRMAN proposed, to avoid any further discussion, that all three terms be employed and the title considered at the end of the debate.

She called for a vote on the amendment proposed by the representative of France, and further amended by the Australian Delegation, to replace the last sentence of Article 19 by the following:

“Every person, regardless of office or status, shall be entitled to equal protection under the law and shall be protected by the law against any arbitrary discrimination and against any incitement to such discrimination in violation of this Declaration.”

DR. MALIK (Lebanon) held that three or thirty titles might be employed, but the one term that could not be adopted was “Declaration”. The Commission had received its Terms of Reference from the Economic and Social Council, and these referred merely to a “Bill of Rights” and not to a Convention or Declaration.

PROFESSOR DEHOUSSE (Belgium) felt that the Commission would make no headway in its work unless it adopted the [11] Chairman’s proposal. The whole question depended in fact on what was meant by the words “Bill of Rights.” To him, the words meant “Convention” but he repeated that they could not be translated into French.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) pointed out that in Russian, “Bill of Rights” meant “English law”.

PROFESSOR CASSIN (France) supported the proposal that the various terms be discussed after the articles had been considered.

THE CHAIRMAN called for a vote on the amendment to Article 19, proposed by the French Delegation, and further amended by the Australian Delegation.

Decision: This amendment was adopted by eleven votes to one with four abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN called for a vote on the amendment proposed by the Chinese Delegation, to add a new paragraph to Article 19:

“Any advocacy of national, racial or religious hostility, designed to provoke violence, shall be forbidden under the law of the State”.

COLONEL HODGSON (Australia) felt that this text might throw Article 19, which dealt with discrimination, out of balance. The text of the amendment proposed by the representative of China contained a new idea which might be embodied in a separate article.

DR. WU (China) accepted this proposal.

THE CHAIRMAN proposed that consideration of this amendment be postponed until after the vote on the amendment submitted by the Delegation of India which, following the addition of the term “colour” to Article 3, called for the insertion in Article 19 of the words “(i.e. also colour)” after the word “race”.

Decision: This amendment was adopted by eleven votes to none, with four abstentions.

[12]

DR. WU (China) asked that the text of his amendment should be inserted immediately after Article 19, since it also related to one aspect of discrimination.

THE CHAIRMAN put the amendment, in the form of a new article, to the vote.

Decision: The article was adopted by seven votes to two, with seven abstentions.

3. Article 7 of the Declaration and Article 4 of the Convention

THE CHAIRMAN declared discussion open on Article 7 of the Declaration and Article 4 of the Convention, concurrently.

MR. SERRARENS (International Federation of Christian Trade Unions) felt that the purport of the second paragraph of Article 4 was exceptionally serious. Admittedly certain countries had laws authorising abortion, but the fact that such a law existed did not justify an act which was in itself unlawful. Furthermore, the majority of national laws forbade the practice of abortion, thus recognizing morality born of the reasoning faculty given to man by the Creator. He trusted that paragraph 2 would be deleted.

MR. CRUZ COKE (Chile) was amazed that the Working Group had adopted paragraph 2 of Article 4 of the Convention, since it sanctified an unscientific principle. The words in paragraph 2: "except in a case in which it is permitted by law" were a contradiction to the first line of paragraph 1 which read: "It shall be unlawful to deprive any person of his life". He pointed out that the Hitler regime had also adopted these practices "in good faith". The paragraph likewise provided for an exception in cases where it was necessary "to prevent the birth of a child of unsound mind". As a doctor, he declared that it could not be forecast before birth whether a child would [13] or would not be of unsound mind.

As regards the prevention, provided for in the paragraph, of the birth of a child "to parents suffering from mental disease", he pointed out that in some cases children of mentally deranged parents had become famous men or even geniuses. As regards pregnancy resulting from rape, experience had shown that the majority of women seeking abortion used rape as a pretext. In his view paragraph 2 of Article 4 was a shameful provision which should be deleted.

MRS. BEGTRUP (Chairman of the Commission on the Status of Women) stated that the question under discussion would be considered at the next session of the Commission on the Status of Women. However, she drew the attention of the Commission on Human Rights to the fact that the laws of a large number of civilized countries allowed abortion, in cases clearly specified by the law, in order to preserve the life of the woman. She felt that the deletion, pure and simple, of paragraph 2 would prevent the ratification of the Convention by certain countries.

THE CHAIRMAN proposed that a vote should first be taken on Article 7 of the Declaration and that discussion should then be resumed of Article 4, taken paragraph by paragraph.

MR. VICTORICA (Uruguay) felt that the expression “everyone” was too narrow. He would prefer a wider term which would include all human beings. He proposed the following amendment:

“Human life is inviolable. The State shall grant protection to all persons born or those suffering from incurable diseases and those physically or mentally deficient are also entitled to it.

The right to life includes the right of obtaining from the State minimum standards for a dignified and worthy life.

The death penalty shall never be applied to political offenders. With regard to criminal offenders, it shall only be applied after sentence rendered under existing laws after a trial with the necessary guarantees for a just sentence.”

[14]

He stated that on philosophical, sociological and moral grounds many countries refused to apply the death penalty. His delegation would uphold the principle that the death penalty could never be imposed for a political offence.

MR. CRUZ COKE (CHILE) supported this proposal.

PROFESSOR DEHOUSSE (Belgium) asked for a separate vote on each part of the proposal, since the text submitted by the delegation of Uruguay contained several different ideas.

MRS. MEHTA (India) drew the Commission’s attention to the fact that if it accepted the proposed text, paragraph 2 of Article 4 should be maintained; otherwise it would conflict with the facts, since exceptions might be made for “unborn persons.”

THE CHAIRMAN called for a vote on the text proposed by the delegation of Uruguay in the place of Article 7 of the Declaration.

Decision: The first paragraph was rejected by eleven votes to three, with four abstentions.

The second paragraph was rejected by ten votes to three, with four abstentions.

The third paragraph was rejected by nine votes to three, with five abstentions.

She put the original text of Article 7 of the Declaration to the vote.

Decision: This text was adopted by sixteen votes.

1. Consideration of the Reports of the Working Groups on an International Convention on Human Rights (Document E/CN.4/56) and of the Declaration of Human Rights (Document E/CN.4/57) (contd.)

Article 8 of the Declaration and Articles 8 and 9 of the Convention

THE CHAIRMAN said that no amendments had been submitted to Article 8.

COLONEL W. R. HODGSON (Australia) suggested that:

- (1) the Reports of the Working Groups should not be passed over too lightly; the respective Rapporteurs might be called on to give a brief summary of the arguments in the case of contentious Articles; and
- (2) since all Member States of the United Nations were interested, it did not follow that rejected amendments might not be found acceptable when the final draft was presented to them; alternative texts should therefore be appended as a footnote.

DR. BIENENFELD (World Jewish Congress) said that the point he wished to raise was of great importance. Article 8 of the Declaration laid down that no-one should be deprived of his liberty except in cases prescribed by the law. It did not, however, specify the nature of the law. Under the Nazi regime thousands of people had been deprived of their liberty under laws which were perfectly valid. Law in that sense ought therefore to be in conformity with the principles of the Declaration. Otherwise a Bill of Human Rights might become a Bill against Human Rights. He suggested that the word "law" should be defined as "law conforming to the principles of the United Nations".

GENERAL ROMULO (Philippine Republic) supported this proposal. The suggestion was for a transposition of the text of Article 38 rather than an amendment. Article 38 should either be introduced before Article 8 or combined with it. His Delegation had made a similar suggestion at a meeting of the Working Group on the [4] Declaration on which no vote had been taken.

THE CHAIRMAN said that it had been decided to follow the text Article by Article, and that the present proposal was a change of procedure which could not be accepted. The Rapporteur could, at the appropriate time, be instructed to transpose Article 38.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (USSR) observed that Article 8 of the Convention proclaimed in paragraph 1 the essential right of inviolability which was written in all democratic constitutions. The remainder of the Article specified the exceptions to the general rule. Those exceptions were the subject of different legislation in each country. Those nations which wished to conclude a Convention would only accept the limitations which were imposed by their respective legislatures. He considered that the Commission should take note only of paragraph 1 of the Article, as it was not empowered to take any decision on the second paragraph. The opinions of the majority of the Working Group on the Declaration could be recorded as a footnote.

LORD DUKESTON (United Kingdom) moved the deletion of Article 9 of the Convention on the grounds that it was merely a repetition of parts of Articles 7 and 8.

THE CHAIRMAN, after discussion, put to the vote a motion that Article 8 of the Declaration should be considered before Article 9 of the Convention which was adopted by 9 votes to 1 with 4 abstentions.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon), commenting on the statement of the representative of the World Jewish Congress, said that there was no doubt that Article 38 of the Declaration had a direct bearing on Article 8. He felt that it would be necessary to qualify the word "law" in the Declaration. Whilst he concurred with the Chairman's ruling, it was a matter of convenience to take the two Articles together. Two points of importance were raised in considering the documents as a whole. The order in which Articles [5] had been presented in the Declaration, with which he was not satisfied. The logical grouping could be improved, he thought. Secondly, many Articles were related. He suggested that a general Article, similar to that appearing at the end of the Convention, should be inserted to cover all Articles relating to each other. In that connection he drew attention to the text of a United States proposal (Document E/CN.4/59) which read:

"In construing the Articles of this Bill of Rights, the several Articles shall be regarded in their relation to each other."

THE CHAIRMAN replied that the Working Group on the Declaration had recognized that there would have to be regrouping of Articles but had preferred to leave that to the Rapporteur.

MR. C. H. WU (China), whilst agreeing with the views of the Representative of the World Jewish Congress, thought that Article 38 should remain at the end of the Declaration.

MR. CASSIN (France) supported the remarks of the representative for Lebanon. It had been understood that Article 8 should be construed in a general sense. It should therefore be interpreted through Article 38.

COLONEL W. R. HODGSON (Australia) commented on the confusion of thought which was apparent in the Declaration. Some Articles took the form of affirmations of a general character; such as Article 8 which read "no-one shall be deprived". In contrast, Article 38 required that every affirmation in the Declaration should be incorporated in the internal laws of the signatories. The document was therefore a combination of simple affirmations with a mandatory "shall" for domestic law.

In reply to a question to the Chairman, the representative of Australia said that he was commenting on both Articles 8 and 38.

THE CHAIRMAN then put Article 8 of the Declaration (Document E/CN.4/57) to the vote which was adopted by 11 votes to none with 6 abstentions.

COLONEL W. R. HODGSON (Australia), in explanation of his vote, said that he approved of the principle set out in Article 8. He had abstained from voting on account of the drafting which was in mandatory language applicable to a convention. That consideration would govern his subsequent votes.

THE CHAIRMAN said that all explanations regarding voting would be included in the records if passed to the Secretariat in writing. She would now pass to Article 8 of the Convention. The suggestions of the Soviet Union representative could be inserted as a footnote or voted upon if he wished.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (USSR) said that in the present state of the Commission's work he did not wish to insist on the point.

MR. CASSIN (France) wished to reassure those representatives who had voted in favour of Article 8 of the Declaration. In doing so they had voted for a text which was embodied in the constitutions of most nations. The case of Article 8 of the Convention was different and it would require careful scrutiny. He would suggest two amendments. Firstly, in 2(a) the substitution of the words "criminal offence" for "crime" to cover minor offences. Secondly, in paragraph 5, whilst he agreed that compensation was the ideal solution, he found that this was not provided for by the laws of many States. He suggested that the sense should be moderated by altering the word "shall" to "should" in that paragraph.

MR. E. CRUZ COKE (Chile) felt that it was necessary to protect the rights of human beings from arbitrary acts by the State. The words "criminal offence" were too wide and laid the paragraph open to the Nazi interpretation of arrest for any offence. He did not consider it wise to make too many exceptions which might render the text valueless.

COLONEL W. R. HODGSON (Australia) agreed that it was always dangerous to enumerate and asked if this text was intended to be [7] exhaustive. The language of Article 8 of the Convention was mandatory and, in order to be consistent, the wording of paragraph 3 should be changed in two places from "has the right to" to "shall".

MR. MALIK (Lebanon), in reply, said that the text of paragraph 2 of Article 8 of the Convention was certainly not intended to be exhaustive. It represented the restrictions which had occurred to members of the Working Group, and representatives were free to suggest others based on the internal laws of their countries. The greatest precision, however, was essential in drafting the Convention in order to render it acceptable to Member Governments. He accepted the amendment suggested by the Australian representative.

THE CHAIRMAN said that the United States delegation agreed to the text of the Article, with the insertion of the following footnotes:

to paragraph 2(b) – “The United States does not think that this covers adequately all cases of civil arrest.”

to paragraph 3 – “It is not clear that adequate safeguards have been given to insane persons, aliens and possibly others.”

THE CHAIRMAN then put the Australian amendment to the vote which was adopted by 11 votes to none with 4 abstentions.

MR. CASSIN (France) proposed that in paragraph 5 the word “shall” should be replaced by the word “should”.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the amendment proposed by the representative of France which was rejected by 8 votes to 2 with 7 abstentions.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) said that he had only received three written comments on the Article which had been proposed by the representative of the United States of America. He asked that all Members should submit to him their comments in writing; he said [8] that he would only include in the Report such comments as were submitted in writing and whose inclusion had been expressly requested.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote Article 8 of the Convention which was adopted by 11 votes to 0 with 7 abstentions.

Article 9 of Declaration and Article 12 of the Convention

LORD DUKESTON (United Kingdom) said that as a point of procedure, it was not possible to provide that everyone should “understand the procedure”, but only to provide that the procedure should be “explained to him in a manner which he can understand”. In his opinion, it was not necessary to specify “aid of counsel”, which was covered by the general term “fair hearing”. He added that it was not always appropriate for an individual to be represented by counsel; for example, there were many tribunals established in the United Kingdom to deal with cases of conscientious objectors, military service hardship appeals, and insurance disputes, which had been set up by a system of social service and which made decisions outside the courts.

MR. CASSIN (France) considered that the words “fair hearing” implied that an interested party could appear in person and with or without counsel. He pointed out that in some countries there was no right of personal appearance before all courts; for example, all pleas before the Court of Cassation in France were in writing only. For that reason, he preferred the words “independent and impartial hearing”.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that no alteration of the first sentence of Article 9 had been suggested. Referring to the second sentence, she suggested that the use of the wording of Article 12 of the Convention would clarify the text. She therefore proposed that the following words be used: "he shall be entitled to a fair hearing of his case and to the aid of a qualified representative of his own choice."

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) supported the first part of the amendment proposed by the Representative of the United Kingdom. He said that he could not support the second part because experience in Belgian litigation had shown that the use of one language was adequate, although two languages were in common use.

LORD DUKESTON (United Kingdom) said that he did not object to the alteration of the first part of his amendment. Referring to the second part, he accepted the alternative proposed by the Representative of the United States of America of the words "a qualified representative of his own choice". He repeated his objection to the inclusion of the words "aid of counsel" and gave as an example the practice in England of Military Service Hardship Tribunals.

He said that, in these tribunals, young men had the right of appeal against military call-up for reasons of hardship to their families. These tribunals were composed of laymen appointed from lists of government nominees and were assisted by a legal adviser. He said that in England the whole system of social services was similar, and had been built up throughout the country on 36 years [10] experience and a basis of case law. He added that the presence of counsel before such tribunals would increase litigation costs out of proportion to the value of the consideration involved.

THE CHAIRMAN suggested that Members would be able to accept part 1 of the proposed amendment, and that a vote could be taken on the inclusion of the original text or of the United Kingdom amendment in part 2 of the Article. Voting on the Article would therefore be in three parts.

DR. WU (China) said that he accepted the wording proposed by the Chairman because the Working Group on the Convention had discussed and agreed upon such a text.

COLONEL HODGSON (Australia), referring to the first sentence of Article 9 of the Declaration, said that he was fully aware of the need to harmonize the Article with Article 12 of the Convention. For that reason, he proposed the very important and wide field of "criminal cases", for example, charges of sabotage against the State, should be included with "rights and obligations". He accordingly proposed that the words "of any criminal charge against him" should be added after the word "determination".

MR. CASSIN (France) supported the proposal made by the Representative of Australia, because he also considered that Article 9 of the Declaration was in general terms and should be made to harmonize with Article 12 of the Convention. He said that, in his opinion, the wording of the Article should not be too precise, but should be sufficiently flexible to cover all systems. He also proposed that the words “as a general rule” be added after the words “of his case and”.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the amendment proposed to the first sentence by the Representative for Australia, which was adopted by 12 votes to 0 with 5 abstentions.

[11]

THE CHAIRMAN said that two amendments had been proposed to paragraph 2. First, the addition proposed by the Representative of the United Kingdom of the words “a qualified representative of his own choice” after the words “entitled to aid of”. Secondly, the amendment proposed by the Representative of France to amend the second paragraph as follows: “he shall be entitled to a fair hearing of his case and, as a general rule, to the aid of qualified Counsel”.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the amendment proposed by the Representative of the United Kingdom. This was adopted by 7 votes to 6 with 3 abstentions.

She said that the proposal of the Representative for Belgium to retain the original text would no longer be effective.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the third part of Article 9 with the amendment proposed by the Representative of the United Kingdom, which was adopted by 7 votes to 6 with 4 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote Article 12 of the Convention, which was adopted by 10 votes to 1 with 4 abstentions.

MR. VICTORICA (Uruguay) felt that the hearing of all criminal offences, and not only of crimes, should be in public.

MR. CASSIN (France), explaining his voting on Article 12, said that according to French Law, it would be absurd to include provisions for the appearance of counsel on all occasions.

Article 10 of Declaration and Articles 12 and 13 of the Convention

THE CHAIRMAN, referring to Article 10, pointed out that paragraph 1 corresponded to Articles 12 and 13 of the Convention, and paragraph 2, to Article 6 of the Convention. She referred to three amendments proposed for Article 10 from the Representatives of the Philippines, United Kingdom and Belgium (E/CN.4/58).

GENERAL ROMULO (Philippines) said that his proposed amendment was almost the same as that presented by the Representative of [12] Belgium. It was specially concerned with the Nuremburg War Crimes Trial and with all major War Crimes Trials, which, according to the original text of Article 10, would be illegal. It should read as follows: Add to Article 10 (in Declaration) and Article 13 (of Convention): “Nothing in this Article shall prejudice the trial and punishment of any person for the commission of any act which, at the time it was committed, was criminal according to the general principles of law recognized by civilized nations”.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the amendment proposed by the Representatives of the Philippines and of Belgium would be for inclusion after paragraph 1. She suggested that Members should vote first on the amendment to paragraph 1 proposed by the Representative of the United Kingdom.

LORD DUKESTON (United Kingdom) said his amendment was to delete the words “and which shall be pursuant . . . act charged”, and substitute the language of Article 13 of the Convention.

COLONEL HODGSON (Australia) said that he did not agree that the original text would be improved. He pointed out that the text of the Convention was becoming identical with that of the Declaration, and that no government would be able to distinguish between them. He said that mandatory language should be reserved for the Convention, and that he was submitting a note of a general objection to that effect.

PROFESSOR CASSIN (France) said that he agreed generally with the wording of Article 10, but that he supported the objection made by the Representative of Australia.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) referred to the question of “retroactive laws” in Article 13 of the Convention. He pointed out that in the Nazi War Crimes Trials the defence had frequently been raised that the accused had been “acting according to laws existing at the time when the crimes were committed”. He considered, therefore, that the text should be [13] exactly formulated so as to exclude such a defence.

MR. VICTORICA (Uruguay) said that he supported Article 10 and all the arguments submitted in its favour. He considered that the Article summed up all the fundamental principles for the protection of the individual prosecuted under criminal law.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote paragraph 1 of Article 10 as amended by the Representative of the United Kingdom, which was adopted by 7 votes to 3 with 8 abstentions.

The Chairman then referred to the proposed amendments of the Representatives of the Philippines and of Belgium to be added after paragraph 1 of Article 10.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) explained that the purpose of his amendment was to prevent the possibility of German historians, discussing the responsibility for the war, using the wording of the original text to try and prove the illegality of the War Crimes Trials, especially at Nuremberg.

THE CHAIRMAN said that the Representative of Belgium had accepted the text proposed by the Representative of the Philippines as the official English translation of his amendment.

She suggested that Members should vote on the inclusion of the amendment in Article 10 of the Declaration, and discuss later the question of its inclusion in Article 13 of the Convention.

As Representative of the United States of America, she would prefer the amendment to be included as a note, as she considered that its implication was wide and needed further study.

DR. WU (China) said that, in his opinion, the Commission was on the horns of a dilemma. On the one hand, there was the principle that no-one should be judged guilty of an act which was not a crime at the time of its commission. On the other hand, he could understand the points of view of the Representatives of Belgium and the Philippines that the Nuremberg War Crimes Trial [14] should not be declared illegal. He suggested, therefore, that the words in the Philippine amendment “at the time it was committed, was criminal” should be replaced by the words “constitutes a grave crime against humanity”.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) raised a point of order. He said that the Chairman had already suggested that an amendment should be supported in discussion by the proposer only. He suggested that the proposal by the Chairman be put into force forthwith, because he considered that it was essential to maintain the proposed programme of work, so as to hold a full discussion on the fundamental issue of implementation.

THE CHAIRMAN accepted the suggestion and said that she would rule that only one speech for and against each amendment should be allowed.

Consideration of the Reports of the Working Groups on the Declaration (Document E/CN.4/57) and the Convention (Document E/CN.4/56)

Declaration Article 10 and Convention Article 13

THE CHAIRMAN read the two amendments which had been proposed.

(1) The amendment proposed by the Chinese Delegation to add to both Articles: "Nothing in this Article shall prejudice the trial and punishment of any person for the commission of any act which constitutes a grave crime against humanity according to the general principles of law recognized by civilized nations."

(2) The amendment proposed by the Representatives of Belgium and the Philippine Republic to insert the following text between paragraphs 1 and 2 of Article 10 of the Declaration: "This provision shall not, however, preclude the trial and conviction of persons who have committed acts which, at the time of their commission, were regarded as criminal by virtue of the general principles of law recognized by civilized nations."

DR. WU (China) thought that his amendment would cover the case of the Nuremburg trials. He felt that the amendment proposed by the Representatives of Belgium and the Philippine Republic would be open to abuse.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) said that he was opposed to Dr. Wu's amendment for two reasons. First, because it seemed to speak of war criminals with compassion, and secondly, because it restricted the offence by using the term "grave crime against humanity". That was only one of the three categories of crime which had been defined and pronounced punishable according to international law.

THE CHAIRMAN put Dr. Wu's amendment to the vote. It was rejected by 6 votes to 4 with 7 abstentions.

COLONEL HODGSON (Australia) supported the amendment submitted by the Representatives of Belgium and of the Philippine Republic. He mentioned the Special Report of the War Crimes [4] Commission in which the three categories of crime punishable under international law were clearly defined.

THE CHAIRMAN said that she would prefer the amendment to be included in the form of a footnote rather than as part of an Article since the subject was very important and demanded careful study.

DR. WU (China) opposed the amendment as he thought it would be open to abuse and should not be added simply to justify the Nuremberg trials.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the amendment submitted by the Representatives of Belgium and of the Philippine Republic. It was adopted by 8 votes to 1 with 8 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the proposal that the same words be added as a second paragraph to Article 13 of the Convention. The proposal was adopted by 8 votes with 9 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the first paragraph of Article 13 of the Convention.

"No person shall be held guilty of any offence on account of any act or omission which did not constitute such an offence at the time when it was committed, nor shall he be liable to any greater punishment than that prescribed for such offence by the law in force at the time when the offence was committed."

The paragraph was adopted by 11 votes with 5 abstentions.

Declaration Article 10 Paragraph 3 and Convention Article 6

THE CHAIRMAN put paragraph 3 of Article 10 of the Declaration to the vote: "No one shall be subjected to torture, or to cruel or inhuman punishment or indignity." The paragraph was adopted by 12 votes with 5 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN proposed substituting those words for Article 6 of the Convention. She thought it was essential to mention punishment to take care of criminal cases.

[5]

LORD DUKESTON (United Kingdom) thought that if the word "punishment" were included in the Convention it would mean that all forms of physical punishment would have to be abolished. His Government had abolished physical punishment except in the case of prison mutinies when violent prisoners attacked their guards. He thought that physical punishment was necessary in that case and he therefore opposed the Chairman's motion.

PROFESSOR CASSIN (France) supported the Chairman's motion. He said that the case mentioned by the United Kingdom Representative was covered by the words "cruel or inhuman punishment".

COLONEL HODGSON (Australia) thought that the words "cruel or inhuman" should be repeated before the word "indignity".

THE CHAIRMAN accepted Colonel Hodgson's suggestion. She put to the vote the proposal that Article 6 of the Convention should read: "No one shall be subjected to torture or to cruel or inhuman punishment or to cruel or inhuman indignity." The proposal was adopted by 8 votes to 2, with 5 abstentions.

Declaration Article 11 and Convention Article 7

THE CHAIRMAN read the amendment submitted by the United Kingdom Representative to Article 11 of the Declaration to the effect that the comment be deleted and the following text added as a second paragraph to the Article: "Compulsory labour is obnoxious to the dignity of man and should not be resorted to except in the case of war or other emergency threatening the life or wellbeing of the community or in the case of punishment of persons sentenced by a competent court in due process of law."

LORD DUKESTON (United Kingdom) said that he had submitted his amendment because he objected to the wording of the comment which he considered implied an attack on the administration of Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories. He suggested that the comment, [6] together with the last clause of Article 7 of the Convention, be referred to the International Labour Office.

THE CHAIRMAN said that any specialized agencies or organizations would have the right to comment on any of the Articles when the Commission's Report was sent to Member-Governments.

She put Lord Dukeston's amendment to the vote. It was rejected by 7 votes to 4 with 5 abstentions.

DR. MALIK (Lebanon) asked for specific instructions with regard to the comments which were to be included in the final Report.

THE CHAIRMAN said that the comments which had been adopted by the Commission should be included in the Report and that a vote would have to be taken on the others, when the discussion of the Articles had been completed.

She read the amendment submitted by the Lebanon Representative that the following words should be added at the end of paragraph 3(a) of Article 7 of the Convention: "provided that the civilian service of conscientious objectors be compensated with adequate maintenance and pay".

DR. MALIK (Lebanon) explained that his amendment was intended to apply only to those countries which recognized conscientious objectors. He wished to ensure a genuine respect for conscientious objectors in the countries where they were recognized so that they would not be subjected to conditions comparable to those in concentration camps.

PROFESSOR CASSIN (France) pointed out that no provisions for maintenance and pay had been made for any other category of person. He suggested that the amendment should be worded in such a way as to ensure that conscientious objectors would not be treated worse than soldiers, but he felt that any provision which gave better treatment to conscientious objectors than to soldiers would arouse opposition.

[7]

DR. MALIK (Lebanon) did not accept Professor Cassin's suggestion to change the wording of his amendment, as he did not wish to enter into any details connected with military regulations in countries where conscription was enforced.

THE CHAIRMAN put Dr. Malik's amendment to the vote. It was rejected by 6 votes to 4 with 7 abstentions.

LORD DUKESTON (United Kingdom) proposed changing the words "life and wellbeing" to "life or wellbeing" in paragraph 3(b) of Article 7 of the Convention.

The proposal was accepted without a vote.

THE CHAIRMAN put the whole of Article 7 of the Convention to the vote. The Article was adopted by 12 votes, with 5 abstentions.

Declaration Article 12

THE CHAIRMAN put the Article to the vote; it was adopted by 14 votes, with 2 abstentions.

Declaration Article 13 and Convention Article 10

MR. KLEKOVKIN (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) proposed that the second paragraph of Article 13 of the Declaration be deleted, since he thought that it would encourage emigration.

COLONEL HODGSON (Australia) wished to retain the first half of the paragraph. He thought that the second half should be deleted since the right to acquire nationality could not be guaranteed.

LORD DUKESTON (United Kingdom) drew attention to the words "to change their nationality to that of any country willing to accept them" which he felt should cover Colonel Hodgson's point. He thought that the facilities for acquiring a new nationality should be made as easy as possible in view of the large number of displaced persons in the world. He therefore opposed the motion that the paragraph be deleted.

[8]

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the proposal that the second paragraph of Article 13 of the Declaration be deleted. The proposal was rejected by 11 votes to 4, with 3 abstentions.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) objected to the method of work which had been adopted at the morning meeting. He proposed that each Representative should be allowed to express his opinion on each Article, even if he had no amendment to propose.

After some discussion the Chairman called for a vote on the ruling which had been adopted at the morning meeting that one representative should speak in favour and one against each amendment and that any member could state his opinion in writing for inclusion in the report. The Chairman's ruling was sustained by 9 votes to 5, with 3 abstentions.

MR. AMADO (Panama) asked for a vote to be taken on his earlier proposal that the Report of the Working Group on the Declaration be adopted without further discussion and that Representatives should hand in their opinions on the Declaration in writing, so that the Commission could proceed to the study of the Convention immediately.

THE CHAIRMAN put the proposal to the vote; it was rejected by 5 votes to 4, with 7 abstentions.

COLONEL HODGSON (Australia) proposed an alteration to the United Kingdom amendment to Article 13: "to acquire the nationality of any country willing to grant it", which was accepted by the United Kingdom Representative. The amendment, as altered, was accepted by 11 votes, with 7 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN then put to the vote Article 13 as amended; it was adopted by 12 votes to 4, with 1 abstention.

MRS. MEHTA (India) pointed out that Article 10 of the Convention contained no provision for freedom of movement within a State. She therefore proposed that paragraph 1 of Article 13 of the Declaration should be inserted at the beginning of Article 10. She asked that the vote should be taken on the substance of the proposal; [9] the wording could be modified later if necessary. The amendment was carried by 11 votes to 2, with 2 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN then put to the vote Article 10 of the Convention; it was adopted by 12 votes to 2, with 2 abstentions.

Declaration Article 14 and Recommendation 4 of the Convention Report (page 15)

MR. KLEKOVKIN (Ukrainian SSR) felt that Article 14 of the Declaration was not sufficiently clear and precise. In his opinion, the text might allow several interpretations and might even be used to afford protection to anti-democratic elements. He therefore proposed the following substitute text:

“Any individuals persecuted on account of their democratic convictions, of their defence of democracy and of the interests of the workers, or on account of their fight for national freedom, of their scientific activity, or any individuals persecuted for racial and religious reasons have the right of asylum outside the territory of the country where such individuals are submitted to such persecution”.

The amendment was rejected by 6 votes to 4, with six abstentions.

LORD DUKESTON (United Kingdom) pointed out that some countries might be incapable of absorbing large numbers of refugees and, in his opinion, the State should have the right, for any reason considered right and proper, to refuse to grant asylum. He therefore proposed that the original text of the Drafting Committee should be restored: “Everyone has the right to escape persecution on grounds of political or other beliefs or on grounds of racial prejudice, by taking refuge on the territory of any State willing to grant asylum.”

[10]

MR. CASSIN (France) felt that it was a humanitarian duty for a State to grant asylum to refugees; in his opinion, it was for the Members of the Commission to give an example in that respect to the rest of the world.

The United Kingdom amendment was rejected by 11 votes to 4, with 2 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote Article 14 of the Declaration; it was adopted by 11 votes to 1, with 5 abstentions.

DR. MALIK (Lebanon), with regard to Recommendation No. 4 on page 15 of the Convention Report, proposed the insertion of the words “the Commission on Human Rights resolves to” in place of the words “this Working Party recommends that the Commission on Human Rights should,” at the beginning of the Recommendation, in order to give it proper form.

Recommendation No. 4 on page 15 of the Convention Report, as amended by Dr. Malik, was adopted by 11 votes to 1, with 6 abstentions.

Declaration Article 15 and Convention Article 14

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote Article 15 of the Declaration; it was adopted by 15 votes, with three abstentions.

LORD DUKESTON (United Kingdom) proposed that paragraph 2 of Article 14 of the Convention should be deleted on the grounds that it was impracticable and incomplete. In his opinion, several categories in addition to those enumerated ought to have been included.

DR. MALIK (Lebanon), speaking as Rapporteur of the Working Group on the Convention, pointed out that the consensus of opinion there had been against the inclusion of the 2nd paragraph of Article 14. However, in deference to the views expressed by Mr. Cassin in the Drafting Committee meetings, it [11] had been decided to retain the text in order to allow discussion in the Plenary Meeting.

MR. CASSIN (France) stated that he agreed with the observations of the United Kingdom representative and he would not therefore oppose the amendment.

The United Kingdom amendment was carried by 12 votes, with 4 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN then put to the vote Article 14 of the Convention as amended; it was adopted by 11 votes to 1, with 3 abstentions.

Declaration Article 15A

DR. MALIK (Lebanon) proposed the following substitute text for the second sentence of Article 15A:

“The family deriving from marriage is the natural and fundamental group unit of society. It is endowed by the Creator with inalienable rights antecedent to all positive law and as such shall be protected by the State and Society.”

He pointed out that the word “family” was mentioned for the first and only time in the Declaration. He maintained that society was not composed of individuals, but of groups, of which the family was the first and most important unit; in the family circle the fundamental human freedoms and rights were originally nurtured. It therefore deserved greater prominence, he thought, than that given to it in the original text. Regarding the second sentence of his amendment, he said that he had used the word “Creator” because he believed that the family did not create itself. That word might give rise to objections, but he would very much like to have it [12] retained. He also contended that the family was endowed with inalienable rights, rights which had not been conferred upon it by the caprice of man, and he cited the use of the phrase “endowed by nature” in Article 1 as a precedent for the wording.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) opposed Dr. Malik’s amendment; the definition of “family”, as given in it, was not acceptable to the Soviet Delegation. He pointed out that varied forms of marriage and family life existed in the world, each form corresponding to the special economic conditions of the people concerned. Different religions had different ideas regarding the position of woman in the family; some religions allowed polygamous families and some did not accord an equal status to men and women. He also reminded the Representatives that many people did not believe in God, and that the Declaration was meant for mankind as a whole, whether believers or unbelievers.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) asked for the vote on Dr. Malik's amendment to be taken in two parts, and Dr. Malik requested that it should be taken by roll call.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the first sentence of Dr. Malik's amendment; it was carried by 9 votes to 5, with 4 abstentions. The second sentence was rejected by 9 votes to 6, with 3 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN then put to the vote Article 15A as amended; it was adopted by 15 votes.

Declaration Article 17

Article 17 was adopted by 13 votes, with 4 abstentions.

[13]

Declaration Article 18 and Resolution 2 of the Convention Report (page 15)

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) proposed the following alternative text for Article 18:

“Everyone has the right to a nationality. All persons who do not enjoy the protection of any Government shall be placed under the protection of the United Nations. This protection shall not be accorded to criminals, nor to those whose acts are contrary to the principles and aims of the United Nations.”

He pointed out the tragic situation of stateless persons who had no diplomatic protection. The purpose of his amendment was to give such people the protection of the United Nations. From that protection were excluded persons who had committed criminal offences according to the common Criminal Law.

LORD DUKESTON (United Kingdom) opposed Mr. Dehousse's amendment on the grounds that it might place a heavy burden and one impossible to fulfil upon the United Nations. He also felt it was a proposal which might raise false hopes.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote Mr. Dehousse's amendment; it was carried by 12 votes to 6.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) proposed the following amended text for the draft Resolution 2 on page 15 of the Convention Report:

“The Commission on Human Rights recommends that early consideration be given by the United Nations to the legal status of persons who do not enjoy the protection of any Government, in particular, pending the acquisition of nationality as regards their legal and social protection and their documentation.

[14]

It is recommended that such work should be undertaken in consultation with specialized agencies at present assuming the protection of some categories of persons not enjoying the protection of any Government and that due regard should be paid to relevant International Agreements and Conventions.”

He pointed out that the word “persons” on the third line of his amendment included not only adults but children, as he wished to see ameliorated the tragic fate of stateless children. He also drew attention to the phrase “pending the acquisition of nationality”; that would obviously take some time and he considered it would be inhuman to leave people unprotected during that period. Regarding documentation, he felt that information should be available to the stateless persons regarding the opportunities for work and the living conditions of any country willing to accept them. He did not feel that the acceptance of his amendment would place an impossible burden upon the United Nations, and in support of that contention he cited the Nansen Organization which had functioned under the League of Nations.

MR. CASSIN (France), while supporting the Belgian amendment, proposed the insertion of the words “expresses the wish first that the United Nations make recommendations to Member States with a view to concluding a Convention on Nationality; second . . .” in line 1 after the word “Rights”.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) accepted the French amendment.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said his Delegation opposed the Belgian amendment. He pointed out that no agreement had been reached between countries interested in stateless persons. He therefore considered it unwise to include in the Declaration an article dealing with the subject, and felt that the Belgian amendment should be rejected.

[15]

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the Belgian amendment, as altered by Mr. Cassin; it was carried by 13 votes to 2, with 3 abstentions.

Declaration Article 20 and Convention Article 15

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote paragraph 1 of Article 20; it was adopted by 13 votes, with 4 abstentions.

GENERAL ROMULO (Philippine Republic) proposed the following substitute text for paragraph 2 of Article 20:

“Every person has the right, either alone or in community with other persons of like mind and in public or private, to manifest his beliefs in worship, observance, teaching and practice.”

He felt that the original text was redundant and that it was desirable to keep a logical pattern for Articles dealing with principles; in his opinion the first paragraph should state the general principle, and the second paragraph the practical application.

MR. AMADO (Panama) opposed the Philippine amendment. He reminded the Representatives that the Article in question was of a controversial nature, and the text agreed upon by the Working Group had been a compromise one. He also pointed out that the text had been incorporated in Article 15 of the Convention. He therefore felt it should be retained.

THE CHAIRMAN put the Philippine amendment to the vote; it was carried by 6 votes to 5, with 6 abstentions.

MR. LOUTFI (Egypt) proposed that the words “and endeavour to persuade other persons of full age and sound mind of the truth of [16] his beliefs” should be deleted from paragraph 2 of Article 15 of the Convention. He pointed out that freedom of religion was already assured by Article 11 of the Convention, and, in his opinion, the original text of Article 15 might raise difficulties in regard to ratification.

DR. WU (China) opposed the Egyptian amendment on the grounds that the freedom in question was only part of the freedom of speech. He pointed out that beliefs are not necessarily religious beliefs and therefore Article 11 of the Convention did not cover the point.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the Egyptian amendment; it was carried by 4 votes to 3, with 9 abstentions.

MR. CRUZ COKE (CHILE) proposed that paragraph 3 of Article 15 should be deleted. He felt that the Commission was endeavouring to establish a standard for national laws. By adopting paragraph 3 they were opening the door to abuses which might exist in present national laws.

LORD DUKESTON (United Kingdom) opposed the Chilean amendment on the grounds that it would place religious bodies above the law. The conditions imposed by paragraph 3 were, in his opinion, absolutely necessary. He directed attention to paragraph (b) of Article 2, which stated that national laws were required to conform with the general principles prescribed by the United Nations.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the Chilean amendment to Article 15 of the Convention; it was rejected by 7 votes to 4, with 6 abstentions.

A vote was then taken on Article 15 of the Convention; it was adopted by 9 votes, with 7 abstentions.

Declaration Articles 21 and 22 and Resolution 1 of the Convention Report (page 14)

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that Articles 21 and 22 of the Declaration and Article 16 of the Convention dealt with freedom of [17] information. The Working Group had decided that no action could be taken on the Articles until the report of the Commission on Freedom of Information was received. She proposed that the draft resolution on page 14 of the Convention report should be accepted.

LORD DUKESTON (United Kingdom) moved the deletion of paragraph 5 of the resolution on the grounds that freedom of information should not be dependent on social, economic and political conditions.

DR. MALIK (Lebanon) said that paragraph 5 had been incorporated in the resolution with a view to obtaining the expert opinions of the Commission on Freedom of Information on the point.

MR. VICTORICA (Uruguay) felt that it was unwise to wait for the opinions of the Commission on the Freedom of Information. In his opinion the problem should be dealt with immediately and he emphasized the necessity for not only safeguarding freedom of information but also for safeguarding the right of access to source of information.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the United Kingdom amendment to delete paragraph 5; it was rejected by 9 votes to 4, with 3 abstentions.

A vote was then taken on the draft Resolution on Freedom of Information contained in pages 14 and 15 of the Convention report; it was adopted by 11 votes, with 6 abstentions.

Article 23 of Declaration and Articles 17 and 18 of the Convention

THE CHAIRMAN referred to Article 23 of the Declaration, which she said corresponded to Articles 17 and 18 of the Convention. She said that no amendments had been proposed and asked if any member wished to speak either for or against these Articles. As no member wished to speak, she proposed that these Articles be put to the vote.

MR. VICTORICA (Uruguay) agreed that the amendment, which he had proposed to replace Article 23, should be published in the Minutes. In conformity with the Constitution of Uruguay, he said that he supported the principle that the Right of Assembly should be recognized by all States. He said that, in his opinion, no grounds should be recognized whereby States could be excused from a compulsory recognition of this right; but that the State and the local authorities had the duty to provide full opportunity for this expression of public opinion. He admitted that there were limitations, based on well-founded law, to the exercise of this right. As examples, he quoted laws concerning public order, security of the State, the development of social life, and the harmonious exercise of other rights.

THE CHAIRMAN put Article 23 of the Declaration to the vote. There were 10 in favour, 0 against, and 5 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN said that, as no member wished to speak for or against Article 17 of the Convention, she would put this Article to the vote. There were 11 in favour, 0 against, and 4 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN then asked if any member wished to speak concerning Article 18 of the Convention.

PROFESSOR CASSIN (France) said that, in his opinion, the texts of the Convention and the Declaration should be in harmony. He said that, in principle, the Convention was drafted in more detail than the Declaration, and therefore all the provisions of the Declaration should be included in the Convention.

He then proposed, as an amendment to Article 18 of the Convention, that the words “not inconsistent with the aims of the Declaration” should be added after the word “object” in line 4.

LORD DUKESTON (United Kingdom) considered that the amendment proposed by the representative of France was partly covered by the word “lawful” in line 3 of Article 18. He further considered that it was a mistake at that stage to alter the text of the Convention so as to reconcile it with the text of the Declaration. He said that he did not believe that those who had drafted the Convention wished to alter the text by the transfer to it of language from the Declaration.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the amendment proposed by the representative of France. There were 3 in favour, 5 against, and 8 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN then put Article 18 of the Convention to the vote. There were 11 in favour, 1 against, and 4 abstentions.

Article 24 of Declaration

Referring to Article 24 of the Declaration, the Chairman said that, no amendments had been proposed and that there were no corresponding Articles in the Convention.

[17]

COLONEL HODGSON (Australia) proposed, as a point of drafting, that the words “Everyone has the right” should be used to introduce this Article, as in Articles 23 and 26. He did not think that the language of the Convention should be used.

THE CHAIRMAN put the proposed amendment by the representative of Australia to the vote. There were 11 in favour, 1 against, and 4 abstentions.

LORD DUKESTON (United Kingdom) proposed the following amendment of the text that the words “of the State of which he is a national or in which he resides or of United Nations” should replace the words “of his State, or his residence or of the United Nations”.

PROFESSOR CASSIN (France) said that, as Rapporteur of the Working Group concerned, he accepted the proposed amendment.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the proposed amendment of the representative of the United Kingdom. There were 11 in favour, 0 against, and 4 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN then put to the vote Article 24 of the Declaration. There were 11 in favour, 0 against, and 4 abstentions.

Examination of the Reports of the Working Groups on the Declaration and the Convention (E/CN.4/57 and E/CN.4/56)

Article 25 of the Declaration

THE CHAIRMAN stated that the present Article had been left aside by the Working Group on the Declaration for inclusion in the Preamble or in a Final Article. She proposed to postpone discussion of it until the Commission had discussed the whole document.

Articles 26 and 27 of the Declaration

THE CHAIRMAN put the text of the above Articles to the vote.

Decision: The Commission adopted these Articles by 9 votes, with 4 abstentions.

Article 28 of the Declaration

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) pointed out that there was no corresponding Article in the draft Convention. That omission appeared to him regrettable.

DR. MALIK (Lebanon) said that the draft Convention was not exhaustive and remained open for any additions which representatives might propose.

THE CHAIRMAN stated that the Soviet representative's observation might appear in the comment for the information of the Governments and the Drafting Committee.

COL. HODGSON (Australia) said that many laws limited the holding of public office to nationals. The text of Article 28 only mentioned citizens, who might not be nationals. He therefore proposed the addition of the words "or national" after the word "citizen". In Australia there were people who had the right of citizenship, although they were not yet nationals.

LORD DUKESTON (United Kingdom) said that in the United Kingdom the two grades, citizen and national, mentioned by the Australian representative did not exist. There were only aliens [4] or nationals. He was against the amendment put forward by the Australian representative because of the complications it would involve in a country like the United Kingdom.

COL. HODGSON (Australia) said that his amendment aimed at making the Article conform with the provisions of the legislation of the largest possible number of countries.

THE CHAIRMAN said that the United States were in a similar position to the United Kingdom, but that she was prepared to transmit the text in the amended form proposed by the Australian representative to the Governments for their observations. A final text could not be adopted until Governments had stated their position. She put the Australian representative's amendment to the vote.

Decision: The amendment was adopted by 5 votes to 3, with 4 abstentions.

The Chairman put Article 28, with the adopted amendment, to the vote.

Decision: The Commission adopted the Article by 8 votes, with 6 abstentions.

Article 29 of the Declaration

THE CHAIRMAN said the Commission had before it an amendment to this Article submitted by the Byelorussian representative (Document E/CN.4/67).

MR. STEPANENKO (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) said he was prepared to accept the first paragraph of Article 29, but the second paragraph did not seem to him to be such as to guarantee the application of the principle laid down in the first part. He proposed that the following amendment be substituted:

“The State is bound to take all necessary steps to prevent unemployment.”

The present text represented a slight modification of that appearing in Document E/CN.4/67; the modification did not affect the original Russian text but only the translation.

THE CHAIRMAN recalled that the second paragraph of Article 29 was the result of a compromise reached during discussion of the Article by the Working Group on the Declaration after an amendment in the same sense had been rejected because of the compulsory nature of the measures it prescribed. The amendment submitted by the Byelorussian representative tended to re-establish the compulsory nature of the State action, which had been rejected by the Working Group.

LORD DUKESTON (United Kingdom) thought that the right to social security defined in the first paragraph of Article 34 should appear in Article 29. The right to work could not be separated from the right to social security.

MR. VICTORICA (Uruguay) said that the term “its citizens” in the second paragraph of Article 29 appeared to be inaccurate. Work should be guaranteed to all human beings and not only to citizens. He proposed that the term “its citizens” be replaced by “persons”.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that the amendment proposed by the Byelorussian representative seemed to him very important. The idea it embodied did not appear in the present text of Article 29. Under the Soviet economic and social system in which all industrial undertakings belonged to the State, it was normal for the latter to undertake to provide its citizens with work. The Declaration, however, was also intended for countries where private undertakings existed side by side with the State, and where the State could not accept [6] all the responsibilities connected with the work of its citizens. In such cases, it could, however, take effective action, by means of economic measures, to prevent unemployment. There was therefore a difference between the duty of providing work for citizens and that of taking steps to prevent unemployment.

PROFESSOR CASSIN (France) said that the text which had been adopted made it possible to attain both the objectives indicated by the Soviet representative, as it required the State not to provide work for its citizens, but to take all necessary steps to ensure that its citizens had an opportunity to work. The real difference between the text of the Byelorussian representative’s amendment and the text of Article 29 of the draft Declaration lay in the fact that the former defined the duty of the State as absolute and the latter defined it as relative. It was not always possible for the State to undertake such an absolute and unconditional obligation. Moreover, the State was not the sole agency responsible for preventing unemployment. The international community of nations should also help to prevent it. Otherwise, unemployment might be abolished in one State and continue to exist in a neighbouring State. He proposed that the text of Article 29 be retained in its existing form. He agreed to the amendment proposed by the representative of Uruguay. As regards the amendment put forward by the representative of the United Kingdom, he pointed out that the provisions of Articles 29 and 30 related to people who worked, whereas those of Article 34 related to those who were not able to work. There was a difference between the right to work and the right to social security.

THE CHAIRMAN informed the Commission that the representatives of the Ukraine and Byelorussia proposed the insertion of the amendment of the Byelorussian representative after the second paragraph of Article 29, instead of its substitution for that paragraph. She therefore called for a vote on the addition of that amendment to the present text of Article 29.

Decision: The Commission adopted the amendment by 7 votes to 4 with 5 abstentions.

The Chairman said that the amendment proposed by the representative of Uruguay had been modified as follows: the words “all its citizens” were to be replaced by the words “all persons ordinarily resident in its territory”. She put this amendment to the vote.

Decision: The Commission adopted this amendment by 11 votes, with 3 abstentions.

The Chairman put the United Kingdom amendment to the vote. The first paragraph of Article 29 would then read “Everyone has the right to work or to social security” and paragraphs 2 and 3 would remain in the form in which they had been adopted. The first paragraph of Article 34 would become paragraph 4 of Article 29.

LORD DUKESTON (United Kingdom) said that to prescribe the right to work whilst separating it from the right to social security would be tantamount to prescribing forced labour.

The provisions of Article 29 in fact implied the right of the State to direct skilled workers to unskilled jobs. To avoid any abuse, such transfers demanded the attention of qualified services and the existence of appropriate social security laws.

[8]

GENERAL ROMULO (Philippines) said that the order of the Articles of the Declaration followed a clearly defined plan and he was against the amendment proposed by the United Kingdom representative. The provisions of Articles 32 and 34 made it impossible to interpret Article 29 as applying to forced labour.

THE CHAIRMAN put the United Kingdom amendment to the vote.

Decision: The amendment was rejected by 5 votes to 3 with 7 abstentions.

Article 30 of the Declaration

MRS. DUCHESNE (Women’s International Democratic Federation) said she would prefer a more forceful draft, such as the following:-

“Women should work under the same conditions as men and receive equal pay for equal work”.

She pointed out that in the 5th line of the first paragraph of the French text of Article 30, the words “pour lui” should be changed to “pour elle”. She would like to see the comment made more precise. The present text might serve as a pretext for keeping women away from work they were able to perform on the grounds of so-called protection of female labour. In point of fact, women often did work which was very harmful although poorly paid. It would thus be merely theoretical to forbid them to undertake certain types of work regarded as too harmful. The Women’s International Democratic Federation was particularly anxious that the Commission should stress the following points in connection with the equality of men and women:

[9]

1. Equality in the legal as well as in the social sphere;
2. The universal grant of the vote to women;
3. Application of the equal pay for equal work rule in all industries;
4. Equal rights of the mother and the father in respect of their children;
5. Full civil status to be granted to women.

She would like the above statement to be inserted, if possible, as a note in the Minutes.

LORD DUKESTON (United Kingdom) said he could not agree to the phrase “under the same conditions as men” which appeared in the second paragraph of Article 30. If those words meant under the same conditions of employment as men, that Article nullified all the legislation for the protection of female labour, built up over half a century. All industrial legislation had to provide for different working conditions for women as compared with those applicable to men. That difference did not mean inequality of pay. It was idle to quote war-time measures as an example, as many of them had been harmful to female health and would never have been taken in time of peace. He therefore proposed that the words “under the same conditions as men” be deleted.

THE CHAIRMAN proposed to take a separate vote on each paragraph of Article 30. She put the first paragraph to the vote.

Decision: The Commission adopted this paragraph by 16 votes.

GENERAL ROMULO (Philippines) pointed out that when the present Articles were discussed in the Working Group on the Declaration, the representatives of the Commission on the Status of Women had agreed to the present text.

[10]

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) observed that women worked, not only under the same conditions as men, but under more difficult conditions, because of their family responsibilities. As regards harmful work, women could either avoid it, or accept it if their physical strength allowed. In such cases the State should adopt the necessary measures to facilitate their work. He therefore supported the view of the representative of the Women’s International Democratic Federation that difficult working conditions should not serve as a pretext for exercising discrimination against women.

THE CHAIRMAN said that the representatives of the Commission on the Status of Women and the representative of the American Federation of Labor had not agreed to the present wording of Article 30, but had agreed to the comment accompanying the Article.

PROFESSOR DEHOUSSE (Belgium) recalled that many States were parties to international labour conventions which prescribed conditions for women similar to those outlined by the United Kingdom representative. Those conventions were in force. If the amendment submitted by the United Kingdom representative were not adopted, those States would find themselves in a difficult position.

Decision: The Commission rejected the United Kingdom amendment by 8 votes to 6 with 2 abstentions.

MR. VICTORICA (Uruguay) proposed as a compromise the following amendment:

“Women shall work with the same advantages as men and receive equal pay for equal work”.

THE CHAIRMAN put this amendment to the vote.

Decision: The Commission adopted the amendment submitted by the representative of Uruguay by 8 votes with 7 abstentions.
The Comment was retained without change.

Article 31 of the Declaration

THE CHAIRMAN said that in the case of the present Article the Commission had before it a United Kingdom amendment proposing the insertion at the end of the second sentence of the following words: “to the greatest extent permitted by the resources of the State or Community” (E/CN.4/65).

LORD DUKESTON (United Kingdom) said the amendment was necessary in view of existing differences in the state of economic and social progress throughout the world.

MR. VICTORICA (Uruguay) said he could accept neither the amendment proposed by the United Kingdom, nor the text submitted by the Working Group. The Constitution of Uruguay recognized the social value of primary and higher education being free. The least that could be stipulated in the present Article was that, so far as the resources of the State allowed, public education and, in particular, secondary and higher education, should be free.

Secondary education should be compulsory.

MR. KLEKOVKIN (Ukraine) said he was against the United Kingdom amendment.

THE CHAIRMAN put the amendment to the vote.

Decision: The Commission rejected the amendment by 11 votes to 5.

The Chairman put Article 31 as proposed by the Working Group to the vote.

Decision: The Commission adopted the Article by 15 votes.

Article 31A of the Declaration

THE CHAIRMAN said that the Commission had before it an amendment to the Article submitted by the representative of the Lebanon.

[12]

DR. MALIK (Lebanon) said that his proposed amendment was for the insertion of the word “intellectual” in the English text and the word “spirituel” in the French text. He indicated that his original proposal related to the English text, and suggested that the French representative be left to produce the French translation.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) asked for an explanation of the difference between the terms “spirituel” and “intellectual”.

DR. MALIK (Lebanon) said that the aim of education was to develop not only the spirit, but also the intellect, and that there was a great difference both in English and Arabic between the two terms.

PROFESSOR DEHOUSSE (Belgium) thought it preferable to reverse the order of the terms “physical, spiritual and moral” as the primary aim of education should be the full moral, intellectual and – finally – physical development of the personality. He was opposed to the inclusion of the term “spirituel” which was already covered by the term “moral”.

THE CHAIRMAN said that it was a question of translation; the word “spiritual” in English could include the sense of the word “intellectual”. She proposed that the settlement of the question be left to the representatives of the Lebanon and France.

DR. MALIK (Lebanon) asked for a vote on the principle of including in the English text the term “intellectual”.

THE CHAIRMAN put that proposal to the vote.

Decision: The Commission adopted the proposal by 9 votes to 3, with 4 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put Article 31A to the vote.

Decision: The Commission adopted the Article by 11 votes with 4 abstentions.

MR. HAVET (UNESCO) said he wished the following comment on Articles 31 and 31A to be included in the Report:

“The United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization expresses its approval of the principles laid down in Articles 31 and 31A of Document E/CN.4/57 (Report of the Working Group on the Declaration to the Commission on Human Rights), which correspond to those governing its own action in the two fields of Fundamental Education (Education de Base), the campaign against illiteracy and ignorance, and Education for International Understanding (Education pour la Compréhension Internationale). However, it wishes to draw attention to the fact that the application of the principles expressed in Article 31 entails not only the outlay of a certain sum, but also the training of a sufficient number of qualified teachers. The ideal represented by the text of Article 31 should therefore be related to the need for international action by the United Nations and the competent Specialized Agencies directed towards assuring equal educational opportunities for all. The resources of the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization are at the disposal of the United Nations for any action on those lines.”

GENERAL ROMULO (Philippines) pointed out that when Article 31A had been discussed by the Working Group, it had been decided that the Article would be followed by a Comment to the effect that religious establishments would have full freedom.

THE CHAIRMAN said that the Working Group had agreed upon the following formula: “The right of private education shall be respected”.

[14]

She pointed out that this Comment, which appeared in the English text, had been omitted by error from the French text.

Article 32 of the Declaration

THE CHAIRMAN said that in the case of the present Article the Commission had before it an amendment submitted by the representative of Yugoslavia, proposing the insertion of the words “with pay” after the word “rest”.

DR. RIBNIKAR (Yugoslavia) said that the words “periodic vacations with pay” which appeared in the Comment should be included in the Article itself. The right to rest without pay meant nothing.

LORD DUKESTON (United Kingdom) emphasized that the text should explicitly mention that rest with pay was granted to employees.

THE CHAIRMAN said that the Comment had been drafted to that end. It showed that all had a right to rest and leisure, and that the workers’ contracts entitled them to vacations with pay.

MR. VICTORICA (Uruguay) proposed the following amendment: “Employees and workers have the right to periodic vacations with pay”.

PROFESSOR DEHOUSSE (Belgium) proposed that the present text of Article 32 be retained with the addition, as a second paragraph, of the text which appeared in the Comment.

MR. VICTORICA (Uruguay) agreed to that proposal.

THE CHAIRMAN put the amendment submitted by the representative of Yugoslavia to the vote.

Decision: The Commission rejected the amendment.

[15]

The Chairman put the amendment submitted by the representatives of Uruguay and Belgium to the vote.

Decision: This amendment was adopted by 11 votes, with 2 abstentions.

Article 33 of the Declaration

THE CHAIRMAN said that in the case of the present Article the Commission had before it an amendment submitted by the United Kingdom, proposing that the words “by means of adequate food . . . and medical care” be replaced by the words “through the highest standard of food, clothing, housing and medical care which the resources of the State or community can provide.”

LORD DUKESTON (United Kingdom) emphasized that it was a mistake to proclaim rights without mentioning the duties of the beneficiaries. The terminology used should not lead to misunderstanding of the part to be played by the State. The services the latter provided were governed by the resources it had available.

MR. VICTORICA (Uruguay) said he was opposed to the amendment submitted by the United Kingdom and to the text of Article 33.

He thought it would be preferable to state that everybody had a duty to look after his health, and when he had not the means to do so, it became the State’s responsibility.

THE CHAIRMAN put the United Kingdom amendment to the vote.

Decision: The Commission adopted the amendment by 8 votes to 2 with 5 abstentions.

The Chairman put to the vote the amendment submitted by the representative of Uruguay, proposing the insertion of the words “Everybody has a duty to look after his health” in paragraph 1 of Article 33.

Decision: The Commission rejected the above amendment by 8 votes to 2 with 5 abstentions.

[16]

THE CHAIRMAN put the whole of Article 33 as amended to the vote. She pointed out that the following slight drafting change, which did not affect the French text, was desirable in the English text: replace “can be . . . only” by “can only be”.

MR. VICTORICA (Uruguay) said that in the second sentence of the French text the word “citoyens” should be changed to “habitants”.

THE CHAIRMAN said that this was a matter of translation which could be left to the French representative. She put the Article to the vote.

Decision: The Commission adopted the Article by 11 votes to 1 with 4 abstentions.

Article 34 of the Declaration

THE CHAIRMAN put the Article to the vote.

Decision: The Commission adopted this Article by 14 votes, with 2 abstentions.

MR. LOUTFI (Egypt) proposed that the order of Articles 30 to 34 be changed by the insertion of Articles 33 and 34 between Articles 30 and 31.

DR. MALIK (Lebanon) supported that proposal.

Decision: The Commission adopted this proposal by 14 votes.

Article 35 of the Declaration

THE CHAIRMAN put the Article to the vote.

Decision: The Commission adopted this Article by 14 votes, with 2 abstentions.

Articles 35A, 36, 37 and 38

THE CHAIRMAN said that Article 35A had not been approved by the Working Group and should therefore be left aside. Articles 36 and 37 had not been voted on by the Working Group and therefore should also be left aside.

[17]

MR. STEPANENKO (Byelorussian SSR) drew the Commission's attention to a faulty translation of the Byelorussian amendment to Article 36. He asked the Secretariat to have a new translation of that amendment made for insertion in the Report.

THE CHAIRMAN said the Commission had before it an amendment to Article 38. As the latter had not been voted on by the Working Group, the amendment could not be considered unless a member of the Commission asked for discussion of Article 38.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) pointed out that in the document sent to the Governments Articles 37 and 38 should appear not as Articles of the "Declaration" but as the comments of certain members of the Commission.

THE CHAIRMAN stated that those Articles would be attached to the "Declaration" in the form of notes.

PROFESSOR CASSIN (France) called attention to the fact that the principle of Article 37 had been recognized at the outset of the Working Group's discussion, and if that Article were not inserted in the Declaration, a serious omission would result.

The limitations connected with public order and morality had been omitted from the body of the Articles as it had been understood that they would be inserted in a special Article. He therefore moved that Article 37 be inserted in the Declaration.

DR. MALIK (Lebanon) said he was against that insertion. The substance of the Article was already embodied in Article 2 which had been adopted. Further, the text opened the door to all kinds of abuse by unscrupulous States.

The Chairman called for a vote on the insertion of Article 37 in the "Declaration".

Decision: This proposal was rejected by 10 votes to 4 with 2 abstentions.

The meeting rose at 1 p.m.

16 December 1947

Summary Record of the Forty-First Meeting [of the Commission on Human Rights]

Held at the Palais des Nations, Geneva, on Tuesday,
16 December 1947, at 3 p.m.

Present: Chairman: Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt (United States of America); Rapporteur: Mr. C. Malik (Lebanon). Members: Colonel W. R. Hodgson (Australia); Professor F. Dehousse (Belgium); Mr. A. S. Stepanenko (Byelorussian SSR); Dr. C. H. Yu (China); Mr. O. Loutfi (Egypt); Professor R. Cassin (France); Mrs. Hansa Mehta (India); Mr. A. G. Pourevaly (Iran); Mr. M. Amado (Panama); General C. P. Romulo (Philippine Republic); Mr. M. Klekovkin (Ukrainian SSR); Mr. A. E. Bogomolov (USSR); Lord Dukeston (United Kingdom); Mr. J. J. C. Victorica (Uruguay); Dr. V. Ribnikar (Yugoslavia). Representative of the Commission on the Status of Women: Mme. Uralova. Secretariat: Professor J. P. Humphrey; Mr. E. Lawson. Specialized Agencies: Mr. J. de Givry (ILO); Mr. J. Havet (UNESCO). 1. Consideration of the Report of the Working Group on the Declaration on Human Rights (Document E/CN.4/57) (contd.)

MR. VICTORICA (Uruguay) said that he wished to speak in explanation of his vote on Article 37. He was unable to agree to the text proposed since, in his opinion, it constituted a negation of the rights and freedoms recognized in the Declaration. In the view of his Government, and in that of most American Republics, the Declaration should not take the form of a recommendation, but should specifically mention the following three points:

- (1) That all the rights recognized and guaranteed therein should be limited only by reasonable laws.
- (2) That those laws should be based on the exigencies of public order, the security of the State and the life of the community as a whole.
- (3) That the Declaration should be considered as international law and that the enumeration of rights, duties and guarantees therein should not exclude the exercise of the inalienable rights of human beings or those derived under the democratic system.

Article 38

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) suggested that Article 38 should be deleted and inserted in the Commentary.

GENERAL ROMULO (Philippine Republic) reminded representatives that the Article had originally been suggested in the Working Group by the Philippine Delegation and was now presented in the form proposed by the representative of France. The objection had been made that the proposed text introduced a reference to implementation. In his view it was necessary to define the meaning of "law", as used in the Declaration; in the past many crimes had been committed in the name of the law. He proposed an amended text which read:

"All laws in any State shall be in conformity with the purposes and principles of the United Nations as embodied in the Charter".

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) maintained that the Article would be better placed in the Commentary. He pointed out that two stages of procedure still remained. First, States would have to agree on the text as a whole and on the steps for implementing the Declaration; secondly, they would have to decide how to harmonize the provisions with their respective national constitutions.

MR. CASSIN (France) suggested as a compromise that the second paragraph of Article 38, dealing with implementation, should be treated as a Commentary. If that were done, he would accept the text as amended by the Delegate for the Philippine Republic, with the addition of the words "and Declaration dealing with Human Rights". It was not possible to ask Member States to modify their laws without indicating in what manner they were to be changed.

GENERAL ROMULO (Philippine Republic) thought that the inclusion of the word “Declaration” implied implementation, which might not be acceptable to some representatives. He therefore preferred that his text should be put to the vote separately from the French amendment.

MR. CASSIN (France) agreed to the deletion of the word “Declaration”.

After further discussion, the following text for Article 38 was adopted by 13 votes, with 3 abstentions:

“All laws in any State shall be in conformity with the purposes and principles of the United Nations as embodied in the Charter in so far as they deal with human rights”.

[5]

THE CHAIRMAN, referring to the French proposal that the second paragraph of the draft of Article 38 (Document E/CN.4/57) should be inserted as a comment, pointed out that the suggestion differed from the Soviet Union proposal, which was to delete the whole Article and treat it as a comment.

COLONEL HODGSON (Australia) thought it had been made quite clear in the previous meetings that the question of ensuring that national laws were in conformity with the Declaration had no bearing on the Declaration itself; the matter had been treated under implementation. Whilst he had no objection to the substance of Article 38, he strongly opposed its inclusion in the Report either in the form of an Article or of a comment.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) said that whether or not a vote was taken on the French proposal, the French representative had the right, in common with other representatives, to make any comment he desired.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that the remarks of the Australian representative might be taken to infer that, whilst the Convention was a serious document which required measures of implementation, the Declaration had no such significance. He did not accept that view. On the contrary, he regarded the Declaration as an extremely important document. His previous observations did not imply that provisions on implementation should not be contained in the Declaration, but that to include them at the present stage was premature. The text should first be referred to Member Governments for comment. The first step was to ensure agreement upon the full Declaration, and until its substance was approved, it was not, in his opinion, logical to insert references to implementation in the Commentary.

THE CHAIRMAN observed that the discussion was academic, in view of the comment by the Rapporteur.

[6]

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) agreed with the Chairman’s view and moved the closure of the debate.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the motion for closure of the debate on Article 38; it was adopted unanimously.

Article 39 proposed by the French Delegation (Document E/CN.4/70)

MR. CASSIN (France) said that, as the Article concerned implementation, he desired that it should be withdrawn and accepted as a comment.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) considered that it would be useful to include the proposed Article. He therefore asked the representative of France to reconsider his decision and allow the question to be debated.

MR. CASSIN (France) said that he had not finally withdrawn the text as an Article, but thought that the moment was ill-chosen for discussion, as it had been agreed that all decisions on implementation should be referred to the next Session of the Commission.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) said that the treatment of comments was of importance to him as Rapporteur and asked that a vote should be taken on this procedure at the end of consideration of the Declaration (Document E/CN.4/57).

THE CHAIRMAN agreed to that proposal. The French proposal was withdrawn for inclusion as a comment.

Proposal by representative of Lebanon for an additional Article to be inserted at the end of the Declaration (Document E/CN.4/74)

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) proposed the insertion of the following Article at the end of the Declaration:

“In construing the Articles of this Declaration the several Articles shall be regarded in their relation to each other”.

He reminded representatives that the United States' Delegation had suggested the insertion of a similar Article at the end of the Convention.

[7]

MR. KLEKOVKIN (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) enquired what purpose the proposed Article would serve.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon), in reply, stated that, during discussion of Article 38, the question of the order of the Articles had been raised. It had then been decided to review the order after consideration of the Report. He had at the same time suggested that a covering Article should be introduced at the end of the Declaration, stating that all Articles should be considered in their relationship to each other.

MR. KLEKOVKIN (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) felt that the document on the Declaration was becoming too long and cumbersome with the result that it would be difficult for the ordinary people to understand it. The last suggestion, if adopted, would render the text still more complicated. He considered that the efforts of representatives should be directed rather to producing a clear and simple Declaration, which would be easily understood by the man in the street.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the proposal of the representative of Lebanon, which was rejected by 7 votes to 7, with 2 abstentions.

Proposal by the representative of Lebanon for an addition at the end of the Declaration (Document E/CN.4/74)

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) suggested that the following words should be added at the end of the Declaration:

“Nothing in this Declaration shall be considered to recognize the right of any person to engage in any activity aimed at the destruction of any of the rights and freedoms prescribed therein.”

He felt that the intention of the proposal should be clear. The Declaration granted all kinds of rights to mankind. Persons who were opposed to the spirit of the Declaration or who were working to undermine the rights of men should not be given the protection of those rights. It might be possible, particularly in the early [8] days of a despotic regime, for would-be tyrants to engage in activities under cover of and without infringement of the Declaration. Many Articles of the Declaration were open to such abuse and a provision of that nature was an essential protection. Its object was to prevent any persons from engaging in any subversive activities which might be in any direct or indirect manner damaging to the rights of man.

COLONEL HODGSON (Australia) enquired why the Article was limited to “persons”, since in the past it had frequently been States which were the chief offenders against human rights. He proposed the phrase “. . . right of any State or any person . . .” should be used.

MRS. MEHTA (India) pointed out that the Declaration dealt with the rights of individuals and not of States.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) said that the observation of the representative of India was strictly correct, but he had no objection if the Australian representative wished the rights of Governments to be included.

MR. VICTORICA (Uruguay) stated that, since amendments introduced by him had not been translated into English and placed before the Commission, he had decided to abstain from voting. In his opinion the wording of the proposed Article was obscure.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the proposal of the representative of Lebanon, as amended by the Australian representative, which was adopted by 8 votes, with 7 abstentions.

Article 25

THE CHAIRMAN reminded the Commission that consideration of Article 25 had been deferred until the end of the debate on the Declaration. It would have to be decided whether it was to be included in the Preamble, or inserted as the final Article, or deleted.

[9]

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) did not feel that the text was satisfactory enough for inclusion as a separate Article. He suggested that it should be inserted in the Commentary, with a note recommending that it should be taken into consideration in the drafting of the Preamble.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the proposal of the Soviet Union representative, which was adopted by 10 votes, with 6 abstentions.

The Chairman asked the Rapporteur to state his views regarding the treatment of the comments in Document E/CN.4/57.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) pointed out that nearly every Article of Document E/CN.4/57 had some comment by a member of the Working Group appended. Representatives who had not served on the Working Group might also have comments to make. He therefore proposed that his Report should contain only those comments passed to him in writing by Delegations for inclusion in the Annex.

THE CHAIRMAN said that the effect of the Rapporteur's proposal would be that he would include in the Annex to his Report only such comments as were given to him in writing. She pointed out that other comments by representatives appeared in the Summary Records of the Commission and of the Working Groups.

Replying to a question by the representative of China as to the treatment to be accorded to the two versions of Article 36, the Chairman agreed that the draft text proposed by the Sub-Commission on the Protection of Minorities would be included in the Annex.

The proposal of the representative of Lebanon was accepted without a vote.

The Chairman directed attention to the United States' Resolution contained in Document E/CN.4/72. She reminded representatives of the advantages of a clear, brief text, which could be readily understood by the ordinary man and woman. The Convention [10] was essentially a legal document, and as such it might not be easily understandable; on the other hand the Declaration ought to be in terms whose meaning would be immediately clear. She pointed out that the present draft of the Declaration contained 36 Articles in considerable detail. The United States'

Resolution had been proposed in the hope that the Drafting Committee might be able to shorten it, while retaining all the essential provisions.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) asked if a vote would be taken on the document as a whole.

THE CHAIRMAN said that, if it was desired, a vote would be taken on the whole document.

MRS. MEHTA (India), supporting the proposed Resolution, stated that, in her opinion, the Bill of Human Rights should be simple, short and intelligible to all; she felt that necessary details should be included in the Convention or Conventions.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) agreed in substance with the proposed Resolution. He considered, however, that the suggestion that the document should be shorter ought to have been made at the beginning of the work of the Commission. He suggested that the Drafting Committee might consider that abbreviation of the draft document should have been done by the Commission. He proposed the following wording:

“The Human Rights Commission requests the Drafting Committee, in revising the Draft Declaration in its second session, to make it as short as possible.”

GENERAL ROMULO (Philippines) pointed out that the Working Group had considered, but had not approved, the abridged Declaration, suggested by the United States (E/CN.4/36). He felt that simplicity of language was more important than the length of the Declaration, and he did not agree with the amendment proposed by the representative of Lebanon.

[11]

THE CHAIRMAN said that the question of adopting the Declaration proposed by the United States of America did not arise, and she put to the vote the Resolution as amended by the representative of Lebanon.

This was adopted by 8 votes to 3, with 5 abstentions.

The Chairman then proposed that the vote on the Declaration as a whole should be deferred until the Rapporteur had produced his report for consideration.

GENERAL ROMULO (Philippines) proposed that the Commission should vote immediately on the Declaration as a whole.

COLONEL HODGSON (Australia) raised the problem of the drafting of proposals, the substance of which had been accepted by the Commission. In his opinion it was necessary to use language easily intelligible both to the peoples of the world and to governments. He referred to Articles 11, 12, 13, 14 and 22 which were drafted in imperative language; and to Articles 15 to 21 which were, he thought, correctly drafted in declaratory language. He said he had understood that the Rapporteur would make the final and correct draft of the Declaration.

THE CHAIRMAN said that she had understood that members who had proposed verbal amendments would co-operate with the Rapporteur for drafting purposes and with the representative of France for the translation.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) felt that the proposal by the representative of Australia was one of substance. He explained that some articles had lent themselves to a declaratory form, but that others, not yet fully developed in substance, had been drafted in imperative form. He suggested that the point raised should be included in a note to the effect that the declaratory language of the Declaration should be kept distinct from the imperative language of the Convention. He also proposed that the final drafting should be left to the Drafting Committee.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium), referring to the proposal by the representative of the Philippines, said that, in his opinion, the Declaration was both insufficient and inoperative. This was not, he said, by reason of its contents, which he considered to be good, but because the Declaration by its legal nature could not be obligatory. However, he would support the proposal for two reasons: first, as a token of his good will, as he considered that international co-operation involved the appreciation of other points of view; secondly, because he considered that the Declaration was the first step towards the protection of human rights.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) felt that the draft Declaration was insufficient with regard to the protection of human rights. He stated that the Soviet Union Delegation reserved the right to present at a later date its own version of a draft Declaration of Human Rights.

MR. AMADO (Panama) said that it had frequently been stated, in these discussions, that what was asked for in the documents of the San Francisco Conference and in those of subsequent meetings of the United Nations, was not an International Declaration of Human Rights, which would have no binding force, but an International Bill of Rights. Such a Bill of Rights had been defined by some delegates as consisting of the whole Declaration, one or more Conventions, and machinery for implementation. He said that instead of a clear-cut Declaration with inter-connected articles, a general text had now been drawn up which readily lent itself to various interpretations and which might give rise to regrettable disputes.

At the San Francisco Conference the adoption had been proposed of a Declaration of Fundamental Human Rights and a Declaration of the Rights and Duties of the Nations, to constitute jointly an International Bill of Rights. Panama intended to submit her [13] draft for a Declaration of the Rights and Duties of States at the next meeting, for incorporation in a pact of fellowship between American Republics.

American opinion, he said, was that a Declaration of the reciprocal Rights and Duties of States constituted a valuable foundation for the future clarification of International Law. In 1933, the American nations concluded a Convention on the Rights and Duties of States.<sup>47</sup> He considered that there was no reason why the United Nations should declare themselves incapable of making a similar effort.

The international protection of the individual, which they were now advocating, required a previous recognition that the human person, like the State, is a subject of international law. In urging the imperative need for a Declaration, he said that Panama was not merely paying lip service to these principles.

He said that it had also been stated that, merely by drawing up a Declaration, one or more Conventions and machinery for implementation, effective, if not complete, protection of the individual was obtained. The fact that the individual was a subject of international law is remembered, but he considered that the fact that he is a citizen of the State is forgotten. It is obvious, he said, that, even for the purpose of completing the protection of the individual himself, the simultaneous conclusion of a declaration of human rights (supplemented by conventions and machinery for implementation) and a declaration on the rights and duties of nations is required. This necessity, in his opinion, had not always been taken into account, in drawing up the preliminary draft declaration. The individual needs to know not only what are his internationally recognized rights, but also what are the rights and the duties of the State, of which he is a citizen, towards other States and other individuals.

He considered that a knowledge of the consequences of a national breach of those duties would act as a strong brake on dictatorship, and would be one of the most certain means of establishing the democratic ideals of the United Nations.

In short, to carry out the Declaration, he said, was a binding obligation, but it does not offer complete protection, even from the point of view of the individual, without a Declaration of the Rights and Duties of States.

LORD DUKESTON (United Kingdom) referred to the Document E/CN.4/38, at page 4, concerning the "task of promotion of human rights". He proposed that this statement should be adopted as an introduction both to the Declaration and to the Convention. He asked whether his proposal could be moved in any form, or whether any such motion for an introduction should be deferred until the third session of the Commission in May 1948.

THE CHAIRMAN said that it had been agreed by the Commission that a Preamble should be considered by all members from a political and from a literary point of view, in order that the Commission could choose the best version when the draft Declaration was finally ready.

LORD DUKESTON (United Kingdom) said that he understood the problem to be whether any proposed draft introduction should be discussed at that session or should be forwarded in time for the discussion of the draft Convention and Declaration in May 1948. If the latter was the case, he said that he could not force a consideration of the introduction proposed by his Delegation before the consideration of similar proposals by other countries. MR. CASSIN (France) said that he would support the entire text of the Declaration. He realised its imperfections, but considered that it would be operative if a Convention, or other organ of implementation, was agreed.

[15]

MR. MALIK (Lebanon), referring to the statement by the representative of Panama, paid a tribute to Dr. Alfaro for his contribution to the work of Human Rights since the time of the San Francisco Conference. He added that he had great respect for the humane and juridical culture of Latin America which had contributed essentially to the Declaration.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the adoption of the Declaration.

It was adopted by 13 votes to 0, with 4 abstentions.

MR. VICTORICA (Uruguay), in explanation of his vote, said that he regarded the Declaration as a vague document, but one with a good intention. He considered that the Declaration should be positive and not only a statement of recommendations.

Article 1 of the Convention

MR. CASSIN (France) said that his proposed amendment (E/CN.4/71) was designed to show the connection between the Declaration and the Convention. He said that, in his opinion, it was necessary to show at the beginning of the Convention, and that this was only the first of, perhaps, several Conventions. He would be willing for it to be included in a Preamble.

LORD DUKESTON (United Kingdom) said that the French amendment was an Introduction and not an amendment to Article 1.

Summary Record of the Forty-Second Meeting
[of the Commission on Human Rights]

Held at the Palais des Nations, Geneva, on Tuesday,
 16 December, 1947 at 9 p.m.

Present: Chairman: Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt (United States of America); Rapporteur: Dr. Charles Malik (Lebanon). Members: Col. W. R. Hodgson (Australia); Mr. F. Dehousse (Belgium); Mr. A. S. Stepanenko (Byelorussian SSR); Dr. C. H. Wu (China) (Alternate); Mr. O. Loutfi (Egypt) (Alternate); Mr. R. Cassin (France); Mrs. Hansa Mehta (India); Mr. A. G. Pourevaly (Iran); Mr. M. Klekovkin (Ukrainian SSR); Mr. A. E. Bogomolov (USSR); Lord Dukeston (United Kingdom); Mr. J. J. C. Victorica (Uruguay) (Alternate); Dr. V. Ribnikar (Yugoslavia). Secretariat: Prof. J. P. Humphrey; Mr. E. Lawson. Specialized Agencies: Mr. J. de Givry (ILO). Non-Governmental Organizations: Category A: Miss Toni Sender (American Federation of Labor); Mr. van Istendael (International Federation of Christian Trade Unions). Category B: Mr. O. F. Nolde (Commission of the Churches on International Affairs); Mr. A. F. Ennals (World Federation of U.N. Associations); Mr. Riegner (World Jewish Congress); Mr. Weill (Co-ordinating Board of Jewish Organizations).

[The initial portion of the meeting concerned the draft convention. A discussion of the name of the convention followed. It has been included because of its relevance to the name of the Declaration and of the International Bill of Rights.]

[8]

...

THE CHAIRMAN invited the Commission to decide on the name to be given to the Convention. She recalled that in the course of the discussions certain delegations had proposed the terms Bill, Convention and Covenant.

[9]

COL. HODGSON (Australia) was in favour of the term Bill of Human Rights, since that was the term which had been employed in the General Assembly, the Economic and Social Council, the War Crimes Commission and the Human Rights Commission itself. Furthermore, that term was employed constantly in the Nuremberg doctrine. His chief reason, however, was that "Bill" was the word used in the Commission's terms of reference.

DR. WU (China) regarded the term "Bill" as so sacred that he would like it to cover the threefold aspects of the Commission's work: the Convention, the Declaration and Implementation. He would agree to the term "Bill" (in French “Charte”) being used for that triptych, but would vote against that title if it were used solely for the Convention.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) recalled that he had already proposed the term “Pacte” (in English “Covenant”). He was opposed to “Convention” which was a nondescript term applied to the most diverse instruments. Nor could he accept the term “Bill” as there was no French, Russian or Spanish translation for it. He understood that in English the word “Bill” meant an instrument of national law. But this was an international instrument. He formally moved that the Convention be called the “Covenant on Human Rights”, not only for the negative reason that the other terms did not seem to him to have any special merit, but also for the positive reason that a Covenant set a seal on friendly relations between States and was applicable to political as well as to security and mutual assistance agreements between States. What were Human Rights but a form of security and mutual assistance among men? He was categorically opposed to the term “Charte” (English “Bill”), which held bitter memories for all the countries of Western Europe. He was sorry, moreover, that the term in [10] question had been chosen for the basic document of the United Nations. In point of fact, a “Charte” was not obtained by the people, but granted to them by a King endowed with Divine right who consented to renounce some of his sovereign rights.

MR. CASSIN (France) stated that, at the present stage of its work, the Commission should give the various instruments their appropriate technical names. He proposed that the Convention be called a Convention and the Declaration, a Declaration. It was impossible for the Convention to be termed a “Bill”. He recalled that when the President of the United States referred at the San Francisco Assembly to a “Bill of Rights”, he was thinking of a Declaration to be annexed to the United Nations Charter. The Economic and Social Council itself, when it had examined the Commission’s terms of reference, had mentioned a “Bill” in the sense of a Declaration.

He asked the Commission to leave the question of names open. He would agree to the Convention being called a “Covenant”, since it would thereby gain in solemnity and since it was to serve as a model for other agreements.

MR. LOUTFI (Egypt) supported the French representative’s remarks.

MR. VICTORICA (Uruguay) agreed with the representative of France that the Convention should be called a Convention and the Declaration a Declaration. He recalled, however, that at all the American Conferences on Human Rights, particularly the Mexico Conference, it was agreed, having regard to the terminology of the United Nations Charter, that the Declaration should have the legal character of a Convention between States.

[11]

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) pointed out for the Commission's information that in Russian the word "Bill" had the meaning of "English law" and the term "Charter" also the meaning of "English law" but with a wider scope. The terms "Convention" and "Covenant" were broad legal expressions, used for agreements between States. Lastly, there was the word "Treaty" which was the most commonly used in Russian.

DR. MALIK (Lebanon) observed that the Commission could not disregard the terminology contained in its terms of reference and should therefore use the word "Bill" somewhere. He recalled that that was the term used by the Nuclear Commission in the Economic and Social Council, when the question of the Commission's terms of reference was being discussed, and on a second occasion when those terms of reference were revised. He would agree to call the Declaration a "Declaration" and the Convention a "Covenant" as Professor Dehousse had proposed, and agreed to Dr. Wu's proposal that the whole collection of instruments should be called the "Bill".

THE CHAIRMAN invited the Commission to vote successively on the proposals made by the delegations of Australia, China, Belgium and France.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) wished to clear up a point connected with the voting procedure. He noted that the Chairman was putting four proposals to the vote in a chronological order which rested solely on chance. In his view the Lebanese representative's proposal was a compromise proposal for which he requested priority.

DR. WU (China) seconded the Lebanese representative's proposal.

[12]

THE CHAIRMAN accordingly put to the vote the Sino-Lebanese proposal that the Declaration he called a Declaration, the Convention a Covenant and the whole thing a Bill ("Charte").

Decision: This proposal was adopted by four votes to one with five abstentions.

The Chairman put the document as a whole to the vote, under the name "Covenant".

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) stated that at the outset of the Commission's work, the Soviet delegation had emphasized that its primary task was to make a careful and serious study of the draft Declaration. Only an effective discussion of essential human rights could provide a satisfactory foundation for subsequent work in other fields, such as the elaboration of a Convention or other international undertakings. The Soviet delegation still considered that to be the main task of the Commission, which should endeavour to define what it meant by "Human Rights" and what that concept comprised. In the course of the discussion on those rights, the Soviet delegation had laid emphasis on the simplest and most essential of them: the right to work, leisure, education, social security and the inviolability of the human person. Unfortunately, the greatest difficulties had arisen in connection with precisely those essential rights. In the draft Convention, in whose elaboration the Soviet delegation had been unable to take part, there were no detailed provisions concerning the fundamental rights of concern to the common man, e.g. the right to work, to education, to social security, on which there had been no discussion. The Soviet delegation therefore asked for the following note to be recorded in the Report: "The Soviet delegation considers that the [13] drafting of a Convention is premature before the end of the work on the preparation of a text of a Declaration on Human Rights and before discussion of the opinion of the Governments on this Declaration. For these reasons, it will vote against taking any decision on the acceptance of this document."

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) reminded the Commission and the Soviet representative that the proposed Convention did not exhaust the subject. It was only the first of a series and should not be found fault with because it contained only a limited number of stipulations. For its part the Belgian delegation was determined to press for it to be followed by other Conventions enumerating other rights, particularly the economic and social rights on which it had laid emphasis in the early stages of the present session. He would like this statement to appear in the summary record. He had no wish, however, to regard the Soviet representative's statement as holding out no hope. The latter had merely pointed out that he regarded the drafting of a Convention as premature. It was therefore only a question of a difference of opinion as to timing, not a final rejection.

MR. CASSIN (France) stated that the French delegation would vote for the draft Convention. Since June it had been of the opinion that the methods of a Declaration and a Convention could be employed simultaneously by the Commission in drafting the document it was preparing. The first draft Convention now before the Commission offered a good illustration of that method. If the Commission had tried to draw up a Convention covering rights less universally recognized, it might have been accused of imprudence. Future conventions should be drawn up slowly and carefully with the assistance of experts. The French delegation would vote for the proposed Convention, as a preface to other Conventions.

DR. RIBNIKAR (Yugoslavia) explained that he stood by the statement he had made before the Working Group on the Convention, as summarized in the Working Group's Report. The Yugoslav delegation would vote against the proposed Convention.

LORD DUKESTON (United Kingdom) stated that the British delegation would support the draft Convention. He admitted it to be incomplete, but in the sense indicated by the Soviet representative's criticisms, he thought that in the nature of things it could not be otherwise. However, it covered fundamental freedoms without which social security measures could not take shape unless they were imposed by a philanthropic State, the awareness of those freedoms and rights not having had the chance to develop freely in the minds of men. It could be said, therefore, that economic and social rights and social security rested primarily on the affirmation of freedom of speech and the right of association. Hence the first essential was to lay the foundations of the elementary freedoms. There was always a great temptation to criticize a draft for its omissions, but there could be no final text. If the rights and freedoms proclaimed in the present Bill became a reality, they would contribute to the gradual establishment of the other freedoms. Therefore he considered that in the time allowed it the Commission had done excellent work. It could not be deemed to have formulated all the rights and freedoms concerning mankind, but its task was to draw up a text of world-wide application. That text had not been drawn up for States where the practice of such freedoms had become customary. It was intended to be applied more especially in areas where those rights were still only partially recognized. One of the documents drawn up defined an ideal. In order to extend the field of human rights, the Commission had begun by [15] laying down the fundamental rights, which would become weapons in the battle for freedom. In no democratic country had freedom developed otherwise. Human rights developed primarily through the recognition of freedom of speech, then they passed into law. Each of those rights, in order to be clearly understood and effective, had to be drawn up when the time was ripe. It was better to teach the common man how democracy worked than to regard him as a child and impose certain rules on him. Such an attitude might bear some resemblance to dictatorship systems. The world needed free men and not well-fed slaves. Therefore, in developing human rights, it was necessary to begin by proclaiming freedom of speech, freedom of association and freedom of thought. Without those fundamental freedoms, human rights could not be developed. It was in that spirit he hoped that the Commission had drawn up a Convention covering the fundamental freedoms, so as gradually to bring them to the knowledge of those who did not yet enjoy them.

THE CHAIRMAN stated that the United States delegation had always been in favour of drawing up a Declaration and a number of Conventions.

MR. LOUTFI (Egypt) stated that he would vote for the draft Convention. Although it covered only the most elementary rights, he hoped it would be possible to supplement it later by a number of other instruments. He urged that, when the text was submitted to the Governments for their observations, the Secretariat should point out that it was merely a draft which would have to be put into proper legal shape by a Committee of Experts.

MR. KLEKOVKIN (Ukrainian SSR) regretted that the Commission had not devoted more care and attention to its essential [16] task of drafting the texts of a Declaration and a Convention on Human Rights. In his view the Convention was lacking in sincerity. It dealt with only one aspect of human rights and completely disregarded economic rights such as trade union rights, social insurance, the prevention of unemployment, etc., which were the very foundation of all other rights. The Commission had forgotten that those instruments were intended for the great mass of workers, whose views on life had changed considerably since the World War. He was afraid that when the peoples became aware of the contents of the documents produced by the Commission's work they would take up a critical attitude and might even make fun of them. The rights covered by the Convention might be compared with the right of a negro to be taken to a police station just like a white man. The Convention contained no guarantee of protection against unemployment and economic crises. He feared that in periods of economic depression the principles contained in the present Convention on Human Rights might sound hollow. The Convention confirmed the truth of the expression he had heard in the United States: "Men are free, but are dying of hunger".

The common man was only interested in freedom of speech and freedom of the press, when he was protected against poverty; yet the Convention provided no guarantee of material living conditions. He concluded that the Commission's work had been unproductive because it had been unable to find a means of harmonizing the economic and the political rights of man.

THE CHAIRMAN put the draft Covenant on Human Rights to the vote.

[17]

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) asked for a vote by roll call.

Decision: The Commission adopted the draft Covenant on Human Rights by ten votes to four.

The following voted in favour: Belgium, China, Egypt, France, India, Iran, Lebanon, the United Kingdom, the United States of America, Uruguay.

The following voted against: Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, and Yugoslavia.

Absent: Australia, Chile, Panama and the Philippines.

The meeting rose at 12:25 a.m.

Chapter I

Introduction

1. The Second Session of the Commission on Human Rights opened at 10 a.m. Tuesday, 2 December 1947, at the European Headquarters of the United Nations, Geneva, Switzerland. The Commission held Plenary Meetings and terminated its work on ____ December 1947.

2. The following Representatives of Member Nations on the Commission attended:

Chairman: Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt (United States, Representative); Rapporteur: Dr Charles Malik (Lebanon, Representative). Col. W.R. Hodgson (Australia, Representative); Mr. Fernand Dehousse (Belgium, Representative); Mr. A. S. Stepanenko (Byelorussian SSR, Representative); Senator E. Cruz Coke (Chile, Alternate); Dr. C. H. Wu (China, Alternate); Mr. Omar Loutfi (Egypt, Alternate); Prof. René Cassin (France, Representative); Mrs. Hansa Mehta (India, Representative); Mr. A. G. Pourevaly (Iran, Alternate); Mr. M. Amado (Panama, Alternate); Brig. Gen. Carlos P. Romulo (Philippine Republic, Representative); Mr. Michael Klekovkin (Ukrainian SSR, Representative); Mr. A. E. Bogomolov (USSR, Representative); Lord Dukeston (United Kingdom, Representative); Mr. Juan J. C. Victorica (Uruguay, Alternate); Dr. Vladislav Ribnikar (Yugoslavia, Representative).

3. The following Representatives also present at the session: International Labour Organization: Mr. J. de Givry, Mr. P. de Briey, and Mr. J. Bessling; United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization: Mr. J. Havet; Preparatory Commission for the International Refugee Organization: Miss M. Barblé, and Mr. Weiss.

4. The following consultants from non-governmental organizations were also present: Category A: American Federation of Labor: Miss Toni Sender; International Federation of Christian Trade Unions: Mr. A. van Istendael and Mr. P. J. S. Serrarens; Inter-Parliamentary Union: Mr. Leopold Boissier and Mr. A. R. de Cléry. Category B: Catholic International Union for Social Service, and the International Union of Catholic Women's Leagues: Mlle. E. de Romer; Commission of the Churches on International Affairs: Mr. O. Frederick Nolde; Coordinating Board of Jewish Organizations: Mr. A. G. Brotman; Consultative Council of Jewish Organizations: Prof. Norman Bentwich, Mr. Milton Winn, Mr. Eugene Weill and Prof. Paul Mantoux; International Abolitionist Federation: Mr. Th. de Félice; International Committee of the Red Cross: Mr. J. M. E. Duchosal and Mr. C. Pilloud; International Council of Women: Dr. Eden and Miss van Eeghen; [4] Women's International Democratic Federation: Mrs. Gabrielle Duchène; World Federation of United Nations Associations: Mr. John A. F. Ennals; World Jewish Congress: Dr. F. R. Bienenfeld, Mr. Alex Easterman and Mr. Gerhard M. Riegner.

5. Although scheduled to meet on December 1st, the Commission could not open its session before December 2nd, owing to the unavoidable delay in arriving in Geneva of the Chairman and several other Representatives.

6. The Representatives or Alternates representing Chile (Senator Cruz-Coke), China (Dr. C. H. Wu), Lebanon (Dr. Charles Malik), the Philippines (Brig.-Gen. Carlos P. Romulo), the United Kingdom (Lord Dukeston) and Uruguay (Mr. Juan J. C. Victorica) were unavoidably delayed in reaching the session. Senator Cruz-Coke participated from the 33rd to the 37th meeting; Dr. Wu and Dr. Malik participated in the 28th and following meetings, Brig.-Gen. Romulo in the 29th and following meetings, Lord Dukeston in the 24th and following meetings, and Mr. Juan J. C. Victorica in the 32nd and following meetings. Dr. C. H. Wu was represented at the 23rd to the 27th meeting by Dr. Nan-Ju Wu. Brig.-Gen. Romulo was represented at the 28th meeting by Mr. Salvador P. Lopez. Lord Dukeston was represented at the 23rd meeting by Mr. A. Campbell.

7. Observers representing the Governments of Greece, Poland, Romania and Turkey, and the Holy See, attended the Session.

8. Prof. John P. Humphrey, Director of the Division of Human Rights, represented the Secretary-General. Mr. Edward Lawson acted as Secretary of the Commission.

9. The Commission took note of the Rules of Procedure for Functional Commissions adopted by the Economic and Social Council on 12 August 1947.

[5]

10. The Commission adopted the Provisional Agenda (Document E/CN.4/22/Rev.2) as its Agenda, with the understanding that the listing of documents in brackets after each item was for information purposes only.

11. In accordance with Resolution 46(IV) of the Fourth session of the Economic and Social Council, the Commission invited the officers of the Commission on the Status of Women to be present and to participate without vote in its deliberations when sections of the draft of the International Bill of Human Rights concerning the particular rights of women were being considered. The Commission on the Status of Women was represented by Mrs. Bodil Begtrup, Chairman, and Mrs. E. Uralova, Rapporteur.

12. The expression of the views of the Members of the Commission is embodied in the summary records of the plenary meetings (documents E/CN.4/SR.23 to _____) and in the summary records (Documents E/CN.4/AC.2/SR.1 to 9, E/CN.4/AC.3/SR.1 to 9, and E/CN.4/AC.4/SR.1 to 7) and the reports of the 3 working groups (documents E/CN.4/53, E/CN.4/56 and E/CN.4/57).

13. (The Commission authorized the Chairman, or in the absence of the Chairman, the Rapporteur, to present this report to the Economic and Social Council).

14. The Commission instructed the Secretary-General to transmit the draft articles contained in Annexes A and B of this Report to all States members of the United Nations for their observations, suggestions and proposals, to be submitted to the Drafting Committee prior to its meeting in May 1948 in conformity with Resolution 46(IV) of the Economic and Social Council. The Commission also instructed the Secretary-General to transmit the discussion on implementation contained in Annex C to all States members of the United Nations requesting them to submit their comments to the Drafting Committee in time for consideration in its meeting of May 1948.

[6]

Chapter II

Plan of Work in Regard to the Bill of Human Rights

15. The Commission decided to proceed without delay to consider the suggested Articles for inclusion in an International Declaration of Human Rights, contained in Annex F of the Report of the Drafting Committee (Document E/CN.4/21); and the suggested Articles for inclusion in an International Convention of Human Rights, contained in Annex G of the same Report.

16. In order to fulfil its mission, the Commission decided to set up three working groups immediately, to deal respectively with the problem of the Declaration, the Convention or Conventions, and Implementation. The membership of these working groups, as determined by the Chairman with the approval of the Commission, was as follows:

Working Group on the Declaration: The Representatives of the Byelorussian SSR, France, Panama, the Philippines, the USSR and the USA.

Working Group on the Convention or Conventions: The Representatives of Chile, China, Egypt, France, Lebanon, the United Kingdom and Yugoslavia.

Working Group on Implementation: The Representatives of Australia, Belgium, Iran, the Ukrainian SSR, and Uruguay.

17. The Working Groups began their work immediately upon establishment, and met simultaneously. The Working Group on the Declaration met 9 times, that on the Bill or Convention 9 times, and that on the question of implementation 7 times. When the Commission received the Reports of the three Working Groups (Documents E/CN.4/53, E/CN.4/56 and E/CN.4/57 respectively) it decided to examine first the proposed Articles for the Declaration Article by Article, referring to corresponding Articles in the Convention wherever such existed. [7] The Commission did not attempt to draft the articles of either document in a final form, being of the opinion that this could only be done after comments had been received from the Governments.

18. Four titles were frequently used in respect of the documents under preparation, Declaration and Convention. The latter was to be entered into and ratified by Governments and not only to be discussed and passed by the General Assembly. The question arose whether the term "Bill of Rights" was to be applied only to the Convention or to the two documents taken together. No decision was taken on this point. Other terms suggested were Covenant and Pact.

19. In discussing the Articles for the two documents, the Commission accepted a ruling of the Chairman (which was challenged and upheld) that in order to save time only one person would be recognized to speak for, and only one to speak against, each article or proposed amendment.

20. It was agreed that every Representative had a right to submit to the Rapporteur, in writing, any comment he wished to make upon a particular article or upon the documents as a whole, for inclusion in the Report.

[8]

Chapter III

International Declaration of Human Rights

21. The Working Group on the Declaration on Human Rights held nine meetings. Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt (United States) was elected Chairman and Professor René Cassin (France), Rapporteur. The views expressed by the members of the Working Group will be found in its Report (Document E/CN.4/57) and in the summary records of its meetings (Document E/CN.4/AC.2/1 to 9).

22. The Report of the Working Group was received and noted by the Commission, and Chapter 3, containing articles suggested for inclusion in an International Declaration on Human Rights, was considered in detail. Members commented upon the form and substance of the various articles, and proposed alterations. These comments and proposals are found in the summary records. The result of this examination is embodied in Annex A of this Report.

Chapter VII

Freedom of Information and of the Press

...

31. The Commission adopted the following resolution:

The Commission on Human Rights

1. Recognizes that freedom of expression and of information is one of the most fundamental freedoms;
  2. Affirms that this freedom must be included both in the International Declaration and in the Convention on Human Rights;
  3. Decides, having before it two texts on this subject for inclusion in the International Convention, one submitted by the United States of America and one by the Drafting Committee, not to elaborate a final text until it has before it the views of the Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information and of the Press and of the International Conference on Freedom of Information and of the Press these two texts for its consideration, requesting it further:
    - (a) to take into account the two resolutions of the General Assembly on this question (document A/C.1/228, "Measures to be taken against Propaganda and the Inciters of a New War" and document A/C.3/180, "Slandorous Information");
- [13]
- (b) to consider the social, economic and political conditions which will render this fundamental freedom real;
  - (c) to consider the possibility of denying this freedom to publications and other media of public expression which aim or tend to inflict injury, or incite prejudice or hatred, against persons or groups because of their race, language, religion or national origin.
4. Recommends to the Economic and Social Council that it remit to the International Conference on Freedom of Information the same documents with identical instructions; and
  5. The Commission also decided to refer Articles 21 and 23 of the draft Declaration to the Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information and of the Press for its consideration and report and to request the Economic and Social Council to refer these articles also to the Conference on Freedom of Information for its own consideration and report.

Draft International Declaration on Human Rights***

(Numbering of Articles corresponds to numbering in Chapter III of the Report of the Working Group on a Declaration (Document E/CN.4/57))

Article 1

All men are born free and equal in dignity and rights. They are endowed by nature with reason and conscience, and should act towards one another like brothers.

(Wherever the word “men” is used, the Commission implied both men and women).

Article 2

In the exercise of his rights everyone is limited by the rights of others and by the just requirements of the democratic State. The individual owes duties to society through which he is enabled to develop his spirit, mind and body in wider freedom.

The Representative of China suggested the following wording: “In the exercise of these rights everyone shall respect the rights of others and comply with the just requirements of the democratic State.”

The Representative of the United Kingdom expressed the view that the State should not be regarded as limiting the rights of individuals but as promoting the rights of all. He proposed the following alternative text, which he requested should be placed on record: “In the exercise of these rights everyone must recognize the rights of others and his obligation to society so that all may develop their spirit, mind and body in wider freedom.”

[*] The Soviet delegation feel that the draft “Declaration on Human Rights”, as prepared by the Commission, is not sufficient for the protection of the essential human rights. Consequently, the Soviet delegation reserves its right to present, at a later stage of the work, a Soviet draft “Declaration of Human Rights.”

[2]

3. The Representative of the United States preferred the following text, which she had suggested: “The full exercise of these rights requires recognition of the rights of others and protection by law of the freedom, general welfare and security of all.”

Article 3

Everyone is entitled to all the rights and freedoms set forth in this Declaration, without distinction of any kind, such as race, which includes colour, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, property status, or national or social origin.

All are equal before the law regardless of office or status and entitled to equal protection of the law against any arbitrary discrimination, or against any incitement to such discrimination, in violation of this Declaration.

Article 7

Everyone has the right to life, to liberty and security of person.

Article 8

No one shall be deprived of his personal liberty or kept in custody except in cases prescribed by law and after due process. Everyone placed under arrest or detention shall have the right to immediate judicial determination of the legality of any detention to which he may be subject and to trial within a reasonable time or to release.

(The Representative of Australia expressed the view that the language of this and other articles of the Declaration is confused in that it is both declaratory and mandatory.

As it has been agreed that the Declaration imposes no legal obligation and requires no measures for implementation, it should be drafted throughout in declaratory form only, or in present indicative tense. For this reason proposed Article 38 is quite out of place, and is applicable only to the Convention or Bill of Human Rights. Australia suggests that some such wording as “No one is to be deprived of . . .” or “Everyone has the right . . .” should be used in articles of the Declaration. Further, the wording of every article in the Convention should be in mandatory form.)

[3]

Article 9

Everyone shall have access to independent and impartial tribunals in the determination of any criminal charge against him, and of his rights and obligations. He shall be entitled to a fair hearing of his case and to have the aid of a qualified representative of his own choice, and if he appears in person to have the procedure explained to him in a manner in which he can understand it, and to use a language which he can speak.

Article 10

Any person is presumed to be innocent until proved guilty. No one shall be convicted or punished for crime or other offence except after fair public trial at which he has been given all guarantees necessary for his defence. No person shall be held guilty of any offence on account of any act or omission which did not constitute such an offence when it was committed, nor shall he be liable to any greater punishment than that prescribed for such offence by the law in force at the time when the offence was committed.

Nothing in this Article shall prejudice the trial and punishment of any person for the commission of any act which, at the time it was committed, was criminal according to the general principles of law recognized by civilized nations.

No one shall be subjected to torture, or to cruel or inhuman punishment or indignity.

Article 11

Slavery, in all its forms, being inconsistent with the dignity of man, shall be prohibited by law.

Article 12

Everyone shall be entitled to protection under law from unreasonable interference with his reputation, his privacy and his family. His home and correspondence shall be inviolable.

[4]

Article 13

Subject to any general law not contrary to the purposes and principles of the United Nations Charter and adopted for specific reasons or security or in the general interest there shall be liberty of movement and free choice of residence within the borders of each State.

Individuals shall have the right to leave their own country and if they so desire, to acquire the nationality of any country willing to grant it.

Article 14

Everyone shall have the right to seek and be granted asylum from persecution. This right will not be accorded to criminals nor to those whose acts are contrary to the principles and aims of the United Nations.

Article 15

Everyone has the right everywhere in the world to recognition as a person before the law and to the enjoyment of fundamental civil rights.

Article 15A

The family deriving from marriage is the natural and fundamental unit of society. Men and women shall have the same freedom to contract marriage in accordance with the law.

Marriage and the family shall be protected by the State and Society.

(The Representative of Lebanon made a motion to amend Article 15-A of the Declaration by substituting for the second sentence of the text the two sentences following: "The family deriving from marriage is the natural and fundamental group unit of society. It is endowed by the Creator with inalienable rights antecedent to all positive law and as such shall be protected by the State and society." Only the first of these substitute sentences was adopted. Consequently the Representative of Lebanon desires that the second sentence be further considered in the future.)

[5]

Article 17

Everyone has the right to own property in conformity with the laws of the State in which such property is located.

No one shall be arbitrarily deprived of his property.

Article 18

Everyone has the right to a nationality.

All persons who do not enjoy the protection of any government shall be placed under the protection of the United Nations. This protection shall not be accorded to criminals nor to those whose acts are contrary to the principles and aims of the United Nations.

Article 20

Individual freedom of thought and conscience, to hold and change beliefs, is an absolute and sacred right. Every person has the right, either alone or in community with other persons of like mind and in public or private, to manifest his beliefs in worship, observance, teaching and practice.

Articles 21 and 22

(The Commission decided not to elaborate a final text on these articles until it had before it the views of the Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information and of the Press and of the International Conference on Freedom of Information.)

Article 21

Everyone is free to express and impart opinions, or to receive and seek information and the opinion of others from sources wherever situated.

No person may be interfered with on account of his opinions.

Article 22

There shall be freedom of expression either by word, in writing, in the press, in books or by visual, auditative [sic] or other means. There shall be equal access to all channels of communication.

[6]

Article 23

“Everyone has the right to freedom of peaceful assembly and to participate in local, national and international associations for purposes of a political, economic, religious, social, cultural, trade union or any other character, not inconsistent with this Declaration.”

Comment. It is understood that no individual or association that aims to destroy the fundamental rights and freedoms set forth in this Declaration can claim protection under this Article.

The Article is not intended to include international political associations forbidden by law.

Article 24

Everyone has the right, either individually, or in association with others, to petition or to communicate with the public authorities of the State of which he is a national or in which he resides, or with the United Nations.

Articles 26 and 27

Everyone without discrimination has the right to take an effective part in the Government of his country. The State shall conform to the will of the people as manifested by elections which shall be periodic, free, fair and by secret ballot.

Article 28

Everyone shall have equal opportunity to engage in public employment and to hold public office in the State of which he is a citizen or a national.

Access to public employment shall not be a matter of privilege or favour.

[7]

Article 29

Everyone has the right to work.

The State has a duty to take such measures as may be within its power to ensure that all persons ordinarily resident in its territory have an opportunity for useful work.

The State is bound to take all necessary steps to prevent unemployment.

Article 30

Everyone has the right to receive pay commensurate with his ability and skill, to work under just and favourable conditions, to join trade unions for the protection of his interests in securing a decent standard of living for himself and his family.

Women shall work with the same advantages as men and receive equal pay for equal work.

Article 33

Everyone without distinction as to economic and social conditions, has the right to the preservation of his health through the highest standard of food, clothing, housing and medical care which the resources of the State or community can provide. The responsibility of the State and community for the health and safety of its people can only be fulfilled by provision of adequate health and social measures.

Article 34

Everyone has the right to social security. The State has a duty to maintain or ensure the maintenance of comprehensive measures for the security of the individual against the consequences of unemployment, disability, old age and all [8] other loss of livelihood for reasons beyond his control. Motherhood shall be granted special care and assistance. Children are similarly entitled to special care and assistance.

Article 31A

Education will be directed to the full physical, intellectual, moral and spiritual development of the human personality, to the strengthening of respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms and to the combating of the spirit of intolerance and hatred against other nations or racial or religious groups everywhere.

Article 32

Everyone has the right to rest and leisure.

Rest and leisure should be ensured to everyone by laws or contracts providing in particular for reasonable limitations on working hours and for periodic vacations with pay.

Article 35

Everyone has the right to participate in the cultural life of the community, to enjoy the arts, and to share in the benefits that result from scientific discoveries.

Article 31

Everyone has the right to education. Fundamental education shall be free and compulsory. There shall be equal access for higher education as can be provided by the State or community on the basis of merit and without distinction as to race, sex, language, religion, social standing, financial means, or political affiliation.

[9]

Article 36

(The Commission did not take a decision on the two texts reproduced below, but submits both for consideration.)

Text Proposed by the Drafting Committee

“In States inhabited by a substantial number of persons of a race, language or religion other than those of the majority of the population, persons belonging to such ethnic, linguistic or religious minorities shall have the right, as far as compatible with public order, to establish and maintain schools and cultural or religious institutions, and to use their own language in the press, in public assembly and before the courts and other authorities of the State.”

Text Proposed by the Sub-Commission on the Prevention of Discrimination and the Protection of Minorities:

“In States inhabited by well-defined ethnic, linguistic or religious groups which are clearly distinguished from the rest of the population, and which want to be accorded differential treatment, persons belonging to such groups shall have the right, as far as is compatible with public order and security to establish and maintain their schools and cultural or religious institutions, and to use their own language and script in the press, in public assembly and before the courts and other authorities of the State, if they so choose.”

New Article No. 1

All laws in any State shall be in conformity with the purposes and principles of the United Nations as embodied in the Charter, insofar as they deal with human rights.

[10]

New Article No. 2

Nothing in this Declaration shall be considered to recognize the right of any State or person to engage in any activity aimed at the destruction of any of the rights and freedoms prescribed herein.

CommentsComment No. 1

The Representative of France proposed that the following article, which appears as Article 38 in the Report of the Working Group on the Declaration, be considered for inclusion;

“The States Members of the United Nations shall ensure that their Law (statutes, regulations and all administrative acts) is brought into, and maintained in, conformity with the principles of the present Declaration.

“A system of effective judicial and administrative appeal shall be organized by each State for the purpose of penalizing violations of these principles.”

Comment No. 2

The Representative of France proposed that the following additional article be considered for inclusion in the Declaration:

“The United Nations shall recommend all the international conventions and shall take, with the assistance of the Member States, all necessary measures to give full effect to the provisions of the Charter and of this Declaration, in order to safeguard those rights and freedoms throughout the world.”

[11]

Comment No. 3

The following Article, which appears as Article 25 in the Report of the Working Group on the Declaration, is suggested for consideration in connection with the formulation of a preamble to the Draft Declaration:

“When a government, group or individual seriously or systematically tramples the fundamental human rights and freedoms, individuals and peoples have the right to resist oppression and tyranny.”

Comment No. 4

The Representative of Lebanon proposed the addition of the following Article at the end of the Declaration:

“In construing the Articles of this Declaration, the several articles shall be regarded in their relation to each other.”

This proposal was lost by 7 votes for to seven against. The Representative of Lebanon wishes this Article to be further considered in the future.

Comment No. 5

The Representative of the Philippines proposed the following comment on Article 13 in the Report of the Working Group on the Declaration:

“It was recognized that the right of emigration, affirmed above, would not be effective without facilities for immigration into and transit through other countries. The Working Group recommends that these corollaries be treated as a matter of international concern and that members of the United Nations cooperate in providing such facilities.”

[12]

Comment No. 6

The Representative of the Philippines requested that the following comment on Article 31 be inserted in the Report of the Commission:

“The right of private education will be respected and in such places or countries as desire it, religious education shall be permitted in the schools.”

Comment No. 7

The Representative of Australia suggested that all Articles of the Declaration be put in declarative form, for which the indicative mood is alone appropriate. The imperative mood is more proper for the Convention. The Commission agreed to pass this suggestion on to the Drafting Committee.

Comment No. 8

The Representative of France requested that the following comment be inserted in the Report of the Commission:

[The French text of the amendments is omitted.]

The French Delegation withdrew the two following amendments which it had proposed:

Art. 38. “A system of effective judicial and administrative appeal shall be organized by each State for the purpose of penalising violations of these principles.”

Art. 39. “The United Nations recommends . . . all the International Conventions and would take, with the assistance of Member States, all necessary steps to give full effect to the provisions of the Charter and of the present Declaration, in order to safeguard these rights and freedoms throughout the world.”

This withdrawal was dictated solely by the desire to reserve for a suitable stage all discussions concerning the “implementation” of human rights both in the International Declaration and in the multilateral Conventions to follow.

Communication Addressed by the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization to the Chairman of the Commission on Human Rights

I.

The following letter was addressed by Mr. J. L. Havet to Mrs. Roosevelt on 13 December 1947:

On behalf of UNESCO, which I represent at the Commission on Human Rights, I have the honour to submit to you and the Commission the following information on the work UNESCO proposes to undertake in matters related to questions falling within your Commission's field of competence. I am referring to the UNESCO programme in the field of philosophy as confirmed by a vote of the General Conference at Mexico City two weeks ago.

However, in order to place this information in its proper context, it is necessary for me to give you a few preliminary explanations regarding the work undertaken by UNESCO in that field in the year 1947 in pursuance of the instructions of the first General Conference.

UNESCO's work in the field of philosophy consists mainly in trying to bring about a better understanding among men belonging to different cultures and professing different ideologies. Under this programme, the General Conference of November 1946 decided that the first centre of interest would be the difficult problem of the philosophical bases of human rights.

Of course, a purely philosophical inquiry into the bases of human rights is very different from the task of drafting an International Declaration or a Convention. However, certain of the fundamental difficulties, which it was essential to solve for the purpose of drafting such texts, sprang from the clash of opposing ideological viewpoints. It was therefore decided that UNESCO's work should be carried out in collaboration with the United Nations Commission on Human Rights and that the conclusions it reached should be respectfully communicated to the Commission, in the conviction that this classification of opposing ideologies and this attempt at a constructive synthesis could be used by the delegates to reach an agreement, without their being bound by them in any way.

May I retrace briefly the history of these contacts in our work?

The permanent representative of UNESCO at the United Nations, Mr. Darchambeau, informed the Commission at its first session of the measures UNESCO proposed to take. In January 1947, UNESCO was represented at the Economic and Social Council by a special observer, Mr. Archibald MacLeish, who stated the Organization's point of view and gave a detailed analysis of its programme of action. I would only remind you of the subsequent exchange of letters between the Director-General of UNESCO and yourself. From that time onwards liaison between the Secretariat of UNESCO and the Human Rights Division has been continuous. UNESCO was represented by a special observer at the session of the Drafting Committee last June. Finally, the Report of the Drafting Committee to the Commission on Human Rights was transmitted to UNESCO in July, and the Organization is requested to submit its comments to the United Nations in its capacity as a Specialized Agency. It was in answer to that request that the document (UNESCO/Phil/10), which was distributed to the Commission at the beginning of the present session, was sent to the United Nations.

July 14th 1947

Dr. Julian Huxley

Director-General

United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization

Sir,

I have the honour to invite the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization to send a representative to participate in the second session of the Commission on Human Rights, which will convene in Geneva on the 25th of August for a period of approximately two weeks.

Your attention is directed to the provisional agenda of this session (document 2/CN4/22 [sic]) and to the report of the Drafting Committee (document 2/CN4/21 [sic]). The latter document contains two proposed working papers: Annex F, comprising suggested articles for an International Declaration of Human Rights; and Annex G, comprising suggested articles for an International Convention on Human Rights.

The United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization is requested to send any comments it may wish to make upon the report of the Drafting Committee to the Division on Human Rights, Geneva, in time for translation and distribution before the opening of the session; and to inform the Division of the name of the representative.

I have the honour to be, Sir,

Your obedient servant

Signed: Jan Stanczyk

Acting Assistant Secretary-General in Charge of Social Affairs.

Note. Article 33 of the draft contained in the Report of the Drafting Committee on an International Bill of Human Rights was accompanied by the following commentary:

“The Drafting Committee suggested that each Article referring to economic and social rights should be referred to the appropriate Specialized Agencies for their consideration and comment.”<sup>1</sup>

The United Nations Secretariat has accordingly referred to the various Specialized Agencies, including UNESCO.

Report to the Economic and Social Council on the Second Session of the Commission [on Human Rights]
Held at Geneva, from 2 to 17 December 1947

Chapter I

Introduction

1. The Second Session of the Commission on Human Rights opened on Tuesday, 2 December 1947, at the European Headquarters of the United Nations, Geneva, Switzerland. The Commission held twenty-three Plenary Meetings and terminated its work on Wednesday, 17 December 1947.

2. The following representatives of Member Nations on the Commission attended: Chairman: Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt (United States of America); Rapporteur: Dr. Charles Malik (Lebanon); Australia: Colonel W.R. Hodgson; Belgium: Mr. Fernand Dehousse; Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic: Mr. A. S. Stepanenko; Chile: Senator E. Cruz-Coke (alternate); China: Dr. C. H. Wu (alternate); Egypt: Mr. Omar Loutfi (alternate); France: Professor René Cassin; India: Mrs. Hansa Mehta; Iran: Mr. A. G. Pourevally (alternate); Panama: Mr. M. Amado (alternate); Philippines: General Carlos P. Romulo; Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic: Mr. Michael Klekovkin; Union of Soviet Socialist Republics: Mr. A. E. Bogomolov; [2] United Kingdom: Lord Dukeston; Uruguay: Mr. Juan J. Carbajal Victorica (alternate); Yugoslavia: Mr. Vladislav Ribnikar.

3. The following representatives of specialized agencies were also present at the session: Mr. J. de Givry, Mr. P. de Briey, and Mr. J. Bessling: International Labour Organization; Mr. J. Havet: United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization; Miss M. Barblé, and Dr. P. Weiss: Preparatory Commission for the International Refugee Organization.

4. The following consultants from non-governmental organizations were also present: Category A: Miss Toni Sender, American Federation of Labor; Mr. A. van Istendael and Mr. P. J. S. Serrarens, International Federation of Christian Trade Unions; Mr. Leopold Boissier and Mr. A. R. de Cléry, Inter-Parliamentary Union. Category B: Miss E. de Romer, Catholic International Union for Social Service, and the International Union of Catholic Women's Leagues; Mr. O. Frederick Nolde, Commission of the Churches on International Affairs; Mr. A. G. Brotman, Co-ordinating Board of Jewish Organizations; Professor Norman Bentwich, Mr. Milton Winn, Mr. Eugène Weill and Professor Paul Mantoux, Consultative Council of Jewish Organizations; Mr. Th. de Félice, International Abolitionist Federation; Mr. J. M. E. Duchosal and Mr. Pilloud, International Committee of the Red Cross; Dr. Eder and Miss van Eeghen, International Council of Women; Mrs. Alva Myrdal, International Federation of Business and Professional Women; Mrs. Gabrielle Duchène, Women's International Democratic Federation; Mr. John A. F. Ennals, World Federation of United Nations Associations; Dr. F. R. Bienenfeld, Mr. Alex Easterman and Mr. Gerhard M. Riegner, World Jewish Congress.

5. Although scheduled to meet on 1 December, the Commission could not open its session before 2 December, owing to the unavoidable delay in arriving in Geneva of the Chairman and several other Representatives.

6. The representatives or alternates representing Chile (Senator Cruz-Coke), China (Dr. C. H. Wu), Lebanon (Dr. Charles Malik), the Philippines (General Carlos P. Romulo), the United Kingdom (Lord Dukeston) and Uruguay (Mr. Juan

J. Carbajal Victorica) were unavoidably delayed in reaching the session. [3] Senator Cruz-Coke participated from the thirty-third to the thirty-seventh meeting; Dr. C.H. Wu participated in the thirty-first and following meetings; Dr. Malik participated in the twenty-eighth and following meetings; Mr. Amado from the twenty-third to the forty-first meeting; General Romulo from the twenty-ninth to the forty-first meeting; Lord Dukeston in the twenty-fourth and following meetings; and Mr. Juan J. Carbajal Victorica in the thirty-second and following meetings. Dr. C.H. Wu was represented from the twenty-third meeting to the thirty-first by Dr. Nan-Ju Wu. General Romulo was represented at the twenty-eighth meeting by Mr. Salvador P. Lopez. Lord Dukeston was represented at the twenty-third meeting by Mr. A. Campbell.

7. Observers representing the Governments of Greece, Poland, Rumania and Turkey, and the Holy See, attended diverse meetings of the Session.

8. Professor John P. Humphrey, Director of the Division of Human Rights, represented the Secretary-General. Mr. Edward Lawson acted as Secretary of the Commission.

9. The Commission took note of the Rules of Procedure for Functional Commissions adopted by the Economic and Social Council on 12 August 1947.

10. The Commission adopted the Provisional Agenda (document E/CN.4/22/Rev.2) as its Agenda, with the understanding that the listing of documents in brackets after each item was for information purposes only.

11. In accordance with Resolution 46(IV) of the Economic and Social Council, the Commission invited the officers of the Commission on the Status of Women to be present and to participate without vote in its deliberations when sections of the draft of the International Bill of Human Rights concerning the particular rights of women were being considered. The Commission on the Status of Women was represented by Mrs. Bodil Begtrup, Chairman, and Mrs. E. Uralova, Rapporteur.

12. The expression of the views of the members of the Commission is embodied in the summary records of the plenary meeting (documents E/CN.4/SR.23 to 45) and in the summary records (documents E/CN.4/AC.2/SR.1 to 9, E/CN.4/AC.3/SR.1 to 9, and E/CN.4/AC.4/SR.1 to 7) and the reports (documents E/CN.4/53, E/CN.4/56 and E/CN.4/57) of the three working groups.

13. Taking into consideration the necessity for the Drafting Committee to be fully informed of the replies from the Governments before its next meeting on 3 May 1948, the Commission requested the Secretary-General (a) to transmit [4] this Report to the Governments during the first week of January 1948; (b) to fix the date of 3 April 1948 as the time limit for the reception of the replies from Governments on the draft International Bill of Human Rights, and (c) to circulate these replies to the members of the Commission as soon as they are received.

14. In respect of the report of its third session to the seventh session of the Economic and Social Council, the Commission requested the Economic and Social Council to waive, if necessary, its rule requiring the submission of Reports of Commissions at least six weeks in advance of the session of the Council in which the Reports would be considered.

Chapter II

Plan of Work in Regard to the Bill of Human Rights

15. The Commission decided, by a majority vote of ten to four with one abstention, to proceed without delay to the consideration of the Articles suggested for inclusion in an International Declaration of Human Rights, contained in Annex F of the Report of the Drafting Committee (document E/CN.4/21); and the Articles suggested for inclusion in an International Convention on Human Rights, contained in Annex G of the same Report.

16. In order to fulfil its mission, the Commission decided to set up three Working Groups immediately, to deal respectively with the problem of the Declaration, the Convention or Conventions, and Implementation. The membership of these Working Groups, as determined by the Chairman with the approval of the Commission, was as follows:

Working Group on the Declaration: The Representatives of the Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, France, Panama, the Philippines, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and the United States.

Working Group on the Convention or Conventions: The Representatives of Chile, China, Egypt, Lebanon, the United Kingdom and Yugoslavia.

Working Group on Implementation: The Representatives of Australia, Belgium, India, Iran, the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic and Uruguay.

17. The Working Groups began their work immediately upon establishment, and met simultaneously. The Working Group on the Declaration met nine times, that on the Convention nine times and that on the question of Implementation seven times. When the Commission received the Reports of the three Working Groups (documents E/CN.4/57, E/CN.4/56 and E/CN.4/53) respectively, it decided to examine first the [5] proposed Articles for the Declaration, article by article, referring to corresponding Articles in the Convention wherever such existed.

18. Two titles were frequently used in respect of the documents in preparation, Declaration and Convention. The latter was to be entered into and ratified by Governments and not only to be discussed and adopted by the General Assembly. The question arose whether the term "Bill of Rights" was to be applied only to the Convention, or only to the Declaration, or to the two documents taken together. In its night meeting on 16 December 1947 the Commission decided:

- (a) To apply the term “International Bill of Human Rights”, or, for brevity, “Bill of Rights”, to the entirety of documents in preparation: the Declaration, the Convention and the Measures of Implementation;
- (b) To use the term “Declaration” for the articles in Annex A of this Report;
- (c) To call the Convention on Human Rights embodied in Annex B, “The Covenant on Human Rights”; and
- (d) To refer to the outcome of the suggestions embodied in Annex C as “Measures for Implementation”, regardless of whether these measures will eventually form part of the Covenant or not.

19. In discussing the Articles for the Declaration and the Convention, the Commission accepted a ruling of the Chairman (which was challenged and upheld) that in order to save time only one person would be recognized to speak for, and only one to speak against, each Article or proposed amendment.

20. It was agreed that every Representative had a right to submit to the Rapporteur, in writing, before the closure of the session, any comment he wished to make upon a particular Article or upon the documents as a whole, for inclusion in the Report, provided that such comment be read first to the Commission.

Chapter III

International Declaration on Human Rights

21. The Working Group on the Declaration on Human Rights held nine meetings. Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt (United States) was elected Chairman and Professor René Cassin (France), Rapporteur. The views expressed by the members of the Working Group will be found in its Report (document E/CN.4/57) and in the summary records of its meetings (documents E/CN.4/AC.2/1 to 9).

[6]

22. The Report of the Working Group was received and noted by the Commission, and Chapter 3, containing articles suggested for inclusion in an International Declaration on Human Rights, was considered in detail. Members commented upon the form and substance of the various articles, and proposed alterations. These comments and proposals are found in the summary records. The result of this examination is embodied in Annex A of this Report.

[Chapters IV and V concern the Covenant and the question of implementation. Chapter VI deals with communications.]

Chapter VIII

Freedom of Information and of the Press

31. The Commission noted the Report of the first session of the Sub-Commission on the Freedom of Information and of the Press (document E/441), which had been submitted directly to the Economic and Social Council in conformity with that Council's Resolution No. 46 (IV) of 28 March 1947.

32. The Commission decided to recommend to the Economic and Social Council the extension of the life of the Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information and of the Press for one additional year, in order that this Sub-Commission might hold a meeting after the session of the United Nations Conference on Freedom of Information which will open on 23 March 1948.

33. The Commission adopted the following resolution:

The Commission on Human Rights

1. Recognizes that freedom of expression and of information is one of the most fundamental freedoms;
2. Affirms that this freedom must be included both in the International Declaration and in the Covenant on Human Rights;
3. Decides, having before it two texts on this subject for inclusion in the International Covenant, one submitted by the United States of America and one by the Drafting Committee, not to elaborate a final text until it has before it the views of the Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information and of the Press and of the United Nations Conference on Freedom of Information, and remits to the Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information and of the Press these two texts for its consideration, requesting it further:
  - (a) To take into account the two resolutions of the General Assembly on this question (document A/428, "Measures to be taken against Propaganda and the Inciters of a New War" and document A/C.3/180/Rev.I, "False or Distorted Reports");
  - (b) To consider the social, economic and political conditions which will render this fundamental freedom real; and
  - (c) To consider the possibility of denying this freedom to publications and other media of public expression which aim or tend to inflict injury, or incite prejudice or hatred, against persons or groups because of their race, language, religion or national origin;
4. Recommends to the Economic and Social Council that it remit to the United Nations Conference on Freedom of Information the same documents with identical instructions; and
5. Decides to refer articles 17 and 18 of the draft Declaration to the Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information and of the Press for its consideration and report and to request the Economic and Social Council to refer these Articles to the Conference on Freedom of Information for its own consideration and report.

Annex APart IDraft International Declaration on Human Rights*Article 1*

All men are born free and equal in dignity and rights. They are endowed by nature with reason and conscience, and should act towards one another like brothers.

Article 2

In the exercise of his rights everyone is limited by the rights of others and by the just requirements of the democratic State. The individual owes duties to society through which he is enabled to develop his spirit, mind and body in wider freedom.

Article 3

1. Everyone is entitled to all the rights and freedoms set forth in this Declaration, without distinction of any kind, such as race (which includes colour), sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, property status, or national or social origin.

2. All are equal before the law regardless of office or status and entitled to equal protection of the law against any arbitrary discrimination, or against any incitement to such discrimination, in violation of this Declaration.

Article 4

Everyone has the right to life, to liberty and security of person.

Article 5

No one shall be deprived of his personal liberty or kept in custody except in cases prescribed by law and after due process. Everyone placed under arrest or detention shall have the right to immediate judicial determination of the legality of any detention to which he may be subject and to trial within a reasonable time or to release.

Article 6

Everyone shall have access to independent and impartial tribunals in the determination of any criminal charge against him, and of his rights and obligations. He shall be entitled to a fair hearing of his case and to have the aid of a qualified representative of his own choice, and if he appears in person to have the procedure explained to him in a manner in which he can understand it and to use a language which he can speak.

Article 7

1. Any person is presumed to be innocent until proved guilty. No one shall be convicted or punished for crime or other offence except after fair public trial at which he has been given all guarantees necessary for his defence. No person shall be held guilty of any offence on account of any act or omission which did not constitute such an offence at the time when it was committed, nor shall he be liable to any greater punishment than that prescribed for such offence by the law in [16] force at the time when the offence was committed.

2. Nothing in this Article shall prejudice the trial and punishment of any person for the commission of any act which, at the time it was committed, was criminal according to the general principles of law recognized by civilized nations.

3. No one shall be subjected to torture, or to cruel or inhuman punishment or indignity.

Article 8

Slavery, in all its forms, being inconsistent with the dignity of man, shall be prohibited by law.

Article 9

Everyone shall be entitled to protection under law from unreasonable interference with his reputation, his privacy and his family. His home and correspondence shall be inviolable.

Article 10

1. Subject to any general law not contrary to the purposes and principles of the United Nations Charter and adopted for specific reasons of security or in general interest, there shall be liberty of movement and free choice of residence within the border of each State.

2. Individuals shall have the right to leave their own country and, if they so desire, to acquire the nationality of any country willing to grant it.

Article 11

Everyone shall have the right to seek and be granted asylum from persecution. This right will not be accorded to criminals nor to those whose acts are contrary to the principles and aims of the United Nations.

Article 12

Everyone has the right, everywhere in the world, to recognition as a person before the law and to the enjoyment of fundamental civil rights.

Article 13

1. The family deriving from marriage is the natural and fundamental unit of society. Men and women shall have the same freedom to contract marriage in accordance with the law.
2. Marriage and the family shall be protected by the State and Society.

Article 14

1. Everyone has the right to own property in conformity with the laws of the State in which such property is located.
2. No one shall be arbitrarily deprived of his property.

Article 15

Everyone has the right to a nationality.

All persons who do not enjoy the protection of any Government shall be placed under the protection of the United Nations. This protection shall not be accorded to criminals nor to those whose acts are contrary to the principles and aims of the United Nations.

[17]

Article 16

1. Individual freedom of thought and conscience, to hold and change beliefs, is an absolute and sacred right.
2. Every person has the right, either alone or in community with other persons of like mind and in public or private, to manifest his beliefs in worship, observance, teaching and practice.

(With regard to the following two articles, 17 and 18, the Commission decided not to elaborate a final text until it had before it the views of the Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information and of the Press and of the United Nations Conference on Freedom of Information.)

[Article 17]

- (1. Everyone is free to express and impart opinions, or to receive and seek information and the opinion of others from sources wherever situated.
2. No person may be interfered with on account of his opinions.)

[Article 18]

(There shall be freedom of expression either by word, in writing, in the press, in books or by visual, auditive or other means. There shall be equal access to all channels of communication.)

Article 19

Everyone has the right to freedom of peaceful assembly and to participate in local, national and international associations for purposes of a political, economic, religious, social, cultural, trade union or any other character, not inconsistent with this Declaration.

Article 20

Everyone has the right, either individually, or in association with others, to petition or to communicate with the public authorities of the State of which he is a national or in which he resides, or with the United Nations.

Article 21

Everyone without discrimination has the right to take an effective part in the government of his country. The State shall conform to the will of the people as manifested by elections which shall be periodic, free, fair and by secret ballot.

Article 22

1. Everyone shall have equal opportunity to engage in public employment and to hold public office in the State of which he is a citizen or a national.
2. Access to public employment shall not be a matter of privilege or favour.

Article 23

1. Everyone has the right to work.
  2. The State has a duty to take such measures as may be within its power to ensure that all persons ordinarily resident in its territory have an opportunity for useful work.
  3. The State is bound to take all necessary steps to prevent unemployment.
- [18]

Article 24

1. Everyone has the right to receive pay commensurate with his ability and skill, to work under just and favourable conditions and to join trade unions for the protection of his interests in securing a decent standard of living for himself and his family.
2. Women shall work with the same advantages as men and receive equal pay for equal work.

Article 25

Everyone without distinction as to economic and social conditions has the right to the preservation of his health through the highest standard of food, clothing, housing and medical care which the resources of the State or community can provide. The responsibility of the State and community for the health and safety of its people can be fulfilled only by provision of adequate health and social measures.

Article 26

1. Everyone has the right to social security. The State has a duty to maintain or ensure the maintenance of comprehensive measures for the security of the individual against the consequence of unemployment, disability, old age and all other loss of livelihood for reasons beyond his control.

2. Motherhood shall be granted special care and assistance. Children are similarly entitled to special care and assistance.

Article 27

Everyone has the right to education. Fundamental education shall be free and compulsory. There shall be equal access for higher education as can be provided by the State or community on the basis of merit and without distinction as to race, sex, language, religion, social standing, financial means, or political affiliation.

Article 28

Education will be directed to the full physical, intellectual, moral and spiritual development of the human personality, to the strengthening of respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms and to the combating of the spirit of intolerance and hatred against other nations or racial or religious groups everywhere.

Article 29

1. Everyone has the right to rest and leisure.

2. Rest and leisure should be ensured to everyone by laws or contracts providing in particular for reasonable limitations on working hours and for periodic vacations with pay.

Article 30

Everyone has the right to participate in the cultural life of the community, to enjoy the arts and to share in the benefits that result from scientific discoveries.

[Article 31]

(The Commission did not take a decision on the two texts that follow. They are reproduced here for further consideration.)

[19]

(Text proposed by the Drafting Committee:

In States inhabited by a substantial number of persons of a race, language or religion other than those of the majority of the population, persons belonging to such ethnic, linguistic or religious minorities shall have the right, as far as compatible with public order, to establish and maintain schools and cultural or religious institutions, and to use their own language in the Press, in public assembly and before the courts and other authorities of the State.)

(Text proposed by the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities:

In States inhabited by well-defined ethnic, linguistic or religious groups which are clearly distinguished from the rest of the population, and which want to be accorded differential treatment, persons belonging to such groups shall have the right, as far as is compatible with public order and security, to establish and maintain their schools and cultural or religious institutions, and to use their own language and script in the Press, in public assembly and before the courts and other authorities of the State, if they so choose.)

Article 32

All laws in any State shall be in conformity with the purposes and principles of the United Nations as embodied in the Charter, insofar as they deal with human rights.

Article 33

Nothing in this Declaration shall be considered to recognize the right of any State or person to engage in any activity aimed at the destruction of any of the rights and freedoms prescribed herein.

Part II

Comments on the Draft International Declaration on Human Rights

General Comments on the Draft Declaration

1. Wherever the word “men” is used, the Commission implied both men and women.

2. The Commission decided to suggest the following article, which appears as article 25 in the Report of the Working Group on the Declaration, for consideration in connexion with the formulation of a preamble to the Draft Declaration:

“When a Government, group, or individual seriously or systematically tramples the fundamental human rights and freedoms, individuals and peoples have the right to resist oppression and tyranny.”

3. The Representative of Australia expressed the view, with which the Representative of the United States associated herself, that the language of the articles of the Declaration is confused in that it is both declaratory and mandatory. He felt that as it had been agreed that the Declaration imposes no legal obligation and requires no measures for implementation, it should be drafted in declaratory form only, or in the present indicative sense. For this reason he felt that Article 38 proposed by the Working Group (document E/CN.4/57, page 17) was out of place, since it appeared to be applicable only to the Covenant on Human Rights. The Representative of Australia suggested some such wording as “No one is to be deprived of . . .” or “Everyone has the right . . .” should be used in articles of the Declaration; and that the wording of every article in the Covenant should be in mandatory form.

4. The Representative of France withdrew the following two amendments which he had proposed:

Article 38. “A system of effective judicial and administrative appeal shall be organized by each State for the purpose of penalizing violations of these principles.”

Article 39. “The United Nations recommends . . . all the International Conventions and would take, with the assistance of Member States, all necessary steps to give full effect to the provisions of the Charter and of the present declaration, in order to safeguard these rights and freedoms throughout the world.”

This withdrawal was dictated solely by the desire to reserve for a suitable stage all discussions concerning the “implementation” of human rights, both in the Declaration and the Convention or Conventions to follow.

5. The Representative of France requested that the following comment be inserted in the Report:

“In voting for the draft Declaration, the French delegation emphasized that it constitutes the first stage reached after eighteen months work. Its defects do not detract from the fact that it contributes something new: the individual becomes a subject of international law in respect of his life and liberty; principles are affirmed, side by side with those already laid down by the majority of national laws which no national or international authority had hitherto been able to proclaim, let alone enforce.”

6. The Representative of France also requested that attention be directed to the suggestions he submitted for articles of the International Declaration of Human Rights during the first session of the Drafting Committee. These suggestions are contained in Annex D of the Report of the Drafting Committee to the Commission on Human Rights (document E/CN.4/21, pages 48–68).

7. The Representative of Lebanon proposed the addition of the following Article at the end of the Declaration:

“In construing the Articles of this Declaration, the several articles shall be regarded in their relation to each other.”

The proposal was lost by seven votes for to seven against. The Representative of Lebanon wishes this article to be further considered in the future.

8. The Representative of Panama made the following comments:

“1. The draft has been made under the definite assumption that the Declaration implies no obligation whatever, and as a consequence, the drafting of the instrument is neither clear nor precise.

“2. The present draft, although it should have taken into special consideration, according to a unanimous vote by the Group that worked on the Declaration, the text submitted by the delegation of Panama since the San Francisco Conference, (see document E/CN.4/53, page 3), actually has ignored the text proposed by Panama.

“3. The present draft carries as articles what in the text proposed by Panama goes into the comments. The present draft includes some controversial wording of rights which will not be acceptable to several Governments.

“4. In the course of the discussion it has been evident that the only basis of discussion can be the text originally proposed by Panama, not only because of the various provisions already taken in its behalf, but particularly because it contains a minimum of rights acceptable to all, drafted in a series of eighteen short articles, worded with juridical correctness and precision.

“5. The delegation of Panama points out that in the San Francisco Conference three Latin-American Republics – Panama, Cuba and Mexico – proposed the drafting of an international Bill of Rights made up of two Declarations: one on the fundamental rights of man and the other on the duties and rights of the States. The guarantees of the individual cannot be satisfactorily declared unless the duties and rights of the State, of which he is a citizen, are also recognized.”

9. The Representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics felt that the draft “Declaration on Human Rights”, as prepared by the Commission is not sufficient for the protection of the essential human rights. Consequently, he reserved his right to present, at a later stage of the work, a Soviet draft “Declaration on Human Rights”.

10. The Representative of the United States requested that the following articles, suggested by her at the commencement of the second session, be included as a comment. The articles might be considered by Member Governments which would prefer a shorter and less technical Declaration:

Article 1

Everyone is entitled to life, liberty, and equal protection under law.

Article 2

Everyone has the right to freedom of information, speech, and expression; to freedom of religion, conscience, and belief; to freedom of assembly and of association; and to freedom to petition his Government and the United Nations.

Article 3

No one shall be subjected to unreasonable interference with his privacy, family, home, correspondence or reputation. No one shall be arbitrarily deprived of his property.

Article 4

There shall be liberty to move freely from place to place within the State, to emigrate, and to seek asylum from persecution.

Article 5

No one shall be held in slavery or involuntary servitude. No one shall be subjected to torture or to cruel or inhuman punishment or indignity.

Article 6

No one shall be subjected to arbitrary arrest or detention. Anyone who is arrested has the right to [22] be promptly informed of the charges against him, and to trial within a reasonable time or to be released.

Article 7

Everyone, in the determination of his rights and obligations, is entitled to a fair hearing before an independent and impartial tribunal and to the aid of Counsel. No one shall be convicted or punished for crime except after public trial pursuant to law in effect at the time of the commission of the act charged. Everyone, regardless of office or status, is subject to the rule of law.

Article 8

Everyone has the right to a nationality. Everyone has a right to take an effective part in his government directly or through his representatives; and to participate in elections, which shall be periodic, free and by secret ballot.

Article 9

Everyone has the right to a decent living; to work and advance his wellbeing; to health, education and social security. There shall be equal opportunity for all to participate in the economic and cultural life of the community.

Article 10

Everyone, everywhere in the world, is entitled to the human rights and fundamental freedoms set forth in this Declaration without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion. The full exercise of these rights requires recognition of the rights of others and protection by law of the freedom, general welfare and security of all.

11. The Working Group on the Declaration suggested the following Article, which the Commission omitted from its draft with a view to inclusion of its substance either in the preamble or in a final Article:

“When a Government, group or individual seriously or systematically tramples the fundamental human rights and freedoms, individuals and peoples have the right to resist oppression and tyranny.”

Comments on Specific Articles of the Draft DeclarationArticle 2

1. The Representative of China suggested the following wording:

“In the exercise of these rights everyone shall respect the rights of others and comply with the just requirements of the democratic State.”

2. The Representative of the United Kingdom expressed the view that the State should not be regarded as limiting the rights of individuals but as promoting the rights of all. He proposed the following alternative text, which he requested should be placed on record: “In the exercise of his rights everyone must recognize the rights of others and his obligation to society so that all may develop their spirit, mind and body in wider freedom.”

3. The Representative of the United States preferred the following text, which she had suggested:

“The full exercise of these rights requires recognition [23] of the rights of others and protection by the law of the freedom, general welfare and security of all.”

4. The Representative of Uruguay proposed that the provision adopted be replaced by another, more in harmony with the final provisions of the Declaration and the Convention he had himself proposed, which provide for the deprivation and limitation of rights, specifying the juridical acts required for this purpose, which, in principle, must be the law, and the reasons on which these acts must be based: public order and the security of the State; normal development of social life; harmonious exercise of all rights.

Article 10

The Representative of the Philippines requested that the following comment on Article 10 appear in the Report:

“It was recognized that the right of emigration, affirmed above, would not be effective without facilities for immigration into and transit through other countries. It is recommended that these corollaries be treated as a matter of international concern and that Members of the United Nations co-operate in providing such facilities.”

Article 13

1. The Representative of Lebanon made a motion to amend Article 13 by substituting for the second sentence of the text the two sentences following:

“The family deriving from marriage is the natural and fundamental group unit of society. It is endowed by the Creator with inalienable rights antecedent to all positive law and as such shall be protected by the State and society.”

Only the first of these substitute sentences was adopted: consequently the Representative of Lebanon desires that the second sentence be further considered in the future.

2. The Representative of the United Kingdom suggested the following additional wording for Article 13:

“Married persons shall have the right to reside together in any country from which they cannot be lawfully excluded.”

3. The Representative of Uruguay stated, with reference to the motion of the Representative of Lebanon, that his country would not accept any national or international document, whether legal or political, embodying assertions of a religious nature, on account of his country’s Constitution which provided for the separation of Church and State, though at the same time it ensured freedom of worship and instruction.

Article 19

1. It is understood that no individual or association that aims to destroy the fundamental rights and freedoms set forth in this Declaration can claim protection under this Article. The Article is not intended to include international political associations forbidden by law.

2. The Representative of Uruguay, in accordance with the position of his country on liberty of thought and all its logical consequences and with the formula submitted to replace the article of the Covenant dealing with the right of assembly disapproves any restriction on the right of assembly.

[24]

Article 21

Following the suggestion of the Representative of the United Kingdom, it was agreed that in non-metropolitan territories the use of such balloting procedure as the secret ballot could not be imposed when its effect might be contrary to the intentions of Article 74 (b) of the Charter, or to the obligations contained in the relevant parts of the Trusteeship Agreements.

Article 24

A. The Representative of the United Kingdom expressed the view that the first line of Article 24 should read, "Everyone has the right to work or to maintenance," and that Article 24 should be placed immediately after the end of Article 27. In this way the responsibility of society for providing adequate measures of social security would be placed in its proper relationship with the right of the individual to work.

B. The Representative of the United States questions the desirability of setting forth positive duties of the State in this Article, since it tends to throw the rest of the Declaration (the Articles of which with a few exceptions do not set forth such positive duties) out of balance.

C. The Representative of the Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic suggested the following addition to this Article:

"The State is obliged to take all necessary measures against unemployment."

Article 25

The Representative of Uruguay calls attention to the necessity to insert in the first paragraph of this article: "Everyone has the duty to preserve his health." Although his proposal was rejected, he urges that this duty justifies the intervention of the State in matters of health.

Article 26

See comment of the Representative of the United States (B above) on Article 24.

Article 27

1. The Representative of the Philippines suggested the following additional text for this Article:

"The right of private education will be respected and in such places or countries as desire it, religious education shall be permitted in the schools."

2. The Representative of Uruguay voiced the opinion that, in accordance with the provisions of the Uruguayan Constitution, free State-provided elementary, secondary, higher vocational, artistic and physical education should be declared to be nationally and internationally beneficial.

Discussion on Human Rights and the Prevention of Discrimination on Grounds of Sex – Item 8 of the Agenda (document E/CN.6/SR.22/Rev.1)

(a) Report of the Officers of the Commission on sections of the draft of the International Bill of Human Rights concerning the particular rights of women

MRS. BEGTRUP (Denmark) who, together with Mrs. Uralova (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic), represented the Commission on the Status of Women as chairman and rapporteur respectively at the session of the Commission on Human Rights held at Geneva from 2 to 17 December 1947, gave an account of her interventions during the discussion of the draft bill of human rights. Mrs. Street (Australia), <sup>48</sup> This is the date of the meeting. The document was issued on 14 January 1948.

<sup>49</sup> Pursuant to E/CN.6/SR.28/Corr.1 of 20 January 1948, the name of Miss F. Fairchild (ILO) should be included among the representatives of specialized agencies present at the meeting.

former vice-chairman had not been able to attend the session of the Commission on Human Rights.

The Commission on Human Rights had divided into three working groups dealing respectively with the declaration, the covenant and the implementation. Mrs. Begtrup and Mrs. Uralova had mainly followed the discussion of the working group on the declaration as presenting the greatest interest from the point of view of the Commission on the Status of Women.

Mrs. Begtrup emphasized the difficulty of participating in a debate without vote or the right to propose a motion. She could only express wishes and had made the following suggestions: that the idea of equality between men and women should be stressed in the preamble by means of a note stating that “when a noun or pronoun denoting the male sex is used in respect of any provision contained in the Bill of Human Rights, such provision shall apply without discrimination to the female sex.”

She supported the inclusion of some words to the effect that all human beings should behave towards each other like brothers, but expressed the view that the words “all men are brothers” proceeded from an antiquated conception and should be replaced by a phrase expressing more adequately the wishes of a new world.

A new text was presented and adopted as article 1 (document E/600, Annex A, Part I).

Article 3 seemed to be satisfactory, and could be deemed to cover also the discriminatory treatment of prostitutes or women presumed to be prostitutes.

With regard to article 4 some delegates and voluntary organizations wanted a definition as to when life begins, the intention being to protect life from the moment of conception. As this matter had not been discussed by the Commission on the Status of Women, Mrs. Begtrup could not express any view in its name, but suggested that the question should be [3] left open without any definition as to when life began.

With regard to article 8, Mrs. Begtrup received the assurance that it was meant to cover the traffic in women and children or white slavery.

She understood that this assurance appeared in the form of a comment, but PROFESSOR JOHN P. HUMPHREY (Director, Division of Human Rights) explained that document E/600 reproduced only such comments as were accepted by the plenary commission on human rights. All the comments included in the reports of the three working groups did not appear in the report.

Moving to article 13, Mrs. Begtrup stated that she had suggested the inclusion of a clause ensuring “full equality in all civil rights, irrespective of marriage, nationality, race, language or religion”.

She found that the article was not satisfactory in its present form, as it did not mention specifically equal freedom in respect of the dissolution of marriage.

Article 15 raised the question of the nationality of married women – a problem solved differently in various countries. The Commission on Human Rights agreed that this problem should be solved on international lines and that it should be settled by the convention envisaged on the subject of nationality.

For article 21, she had suggested the wording: “everyone has an equal right to take an effective part in the government of his country”.

The Commission, however, adopted the expression “without discrimination” which Mrs. Begtrup found satisfactory.

Paragraph 2 of article 24 which runs: “Women shall work with the same advantages as men and receive equal pay for equal work”, could be credited to a large extent to Mrs. Uralova, who had made a strong plea for the equality of economic and social rights as between men and women. The present wording was accepted by Mrs. Begtrup on the understanding that the rights of motherhood as formerly agreed upon should be safeguarded elsewhere in the declaration.

Working group 1 had included in its report a comment presented by Mrs. Begtrup to the effect that the conditions prevailing at present in the world might require legislation providing varying degrees of protection for women, in particular in regard to heavy or specifically harmful work.

A short discussion ensued, Mrs. Uralova and the representative of the American Federation of Labor stating that the plenary Commission on Human Rights had adopted that comment to be embodied in its report, though the [4] report as compiled (document A/600) did not include it.

Article 26 safeguarded the rights of motherhood as apart from the protection owed specifically to children.

Mrs. Begtrup had addressed to the Chairman of the working group on the draft convention on human rights a message drawing his attention to the desirability of stating explicitly that when a noun or pronoun denoting the male sex is used in respect to any provision contained in the Bill of Human Rights, such provision shall be taken to apply without discrimination to the female sex. She thought that such a statement could be made in a footnote.

In conclusion, Mrs. Begtrup stated that the experience gained by attending the last session of the Commission on Human Rights showed the importance of having a representative of the Commission attend the debates of drafting groups, and urged that the Commission on the Status of Women should not fail to send representatives to the next session of the Commission on Human Rights which was due to start on 18 May 1948.

THE CHAIRMAN opened the discussion on the draft declaration on human rights and observed that any change which the Commission might like to advocate should be presented in the form of recommendations to the Economic and Social Council.

MRS. DE URDANETA (Venezuela) wished, before the discussion started, to impart to the Commission the terms of recent laws adopted by the Government of Venezuela concerning the nationality of married women. This legislation provided for the assumption of Venezuelan nationality by the wife of a Venezuelan if the laws of her country contained no provision to the contrary.

The Venezuelan woman married to a foreigner kept her nationality unless she expressed the will to renounce it and thereby acquired the nationality of her husband.

MRS. STREET (Australia) moved that the provision included in comment 1 on the draft declaration, and stating that wherever the word “man” is used the Commission on Human Rights implied both men and women, should appear as article 1 in the body of the declaration.

She pointed out that although the text obviously included women, this terminology had been interpreted restrictively in the past so that women had had to wage a constant fight to secure the same rights as men for voting, university education and access to liberal professions.

MISS KENYON (United States of America) thought that the term “persons” or “people”, which latter appeared in the Charter could be used in article 1 and could achieve the objective sought by Mrs. Street; otherwise the declaration on Human Rights should be explicit in itself and should avoid the use of sentences meant to explain the text which was essentially the function of a footnote. The idea expressed by Mrs. Street could be [5] incorporated in a footnote or left as a comment but footnotes or comments were not desirable in a declaration of this character.

MRS. BEGRUP (Denmark) pointed out that article 1 in its present form provided the wrong start for a declaration in which equality between men and women was to be expressed. She supported Miss Kenyon’s suggestion. She proposed further that the Commission should deal with specific points which would best secure the advantages sought by women.

MISS ZUNG (China) thought that the idea of equality of women and men would be best expressed in a sub-heading to the title of the declaration.

The Commission decided by 7 votes to replace the term “man” in the declaration by a more general term.

MISS ZUNG (China) thought that the term “brothers” used in article 1 should be replaced by some more general term like “members of the same family”, and BEGUM HAMID ALI (India) suggested: “in a spirit of brotherhood”. After some discussion as to whether “in a spirit of brotherhood and sisterhood” would not preserve equality still better, the Commission felt that the “spirit of brotherhood” sufficiently expressed the idea advocated.

By 12 votes in favour the Commission decided to recommend that the words "and should act toward one another like brothers" appearing at the end of article 1 should be changed to "and should act toward one another in a spirit of brotherhood".

A short discussion followed as to the proper place for article 2, as some of the delegates felt that if article 3 were to appear as 2 the emphasis on equality would be enhanced.

MISS KENYON (United States of America) pointed out, article 2 set forth the limitations within which all the rights enumerated further could be exercised and it could only be placed before the enumeration of the rights.

The Commission agree to leave the sequence of the articles unchanged.

MISS SUTHERLAND (United Kingdom) thanked Mrs. Begtrup for the extreme vigilance which she had displayed on behalf of the rights of women.

She wished to draw particular attention to the right to marriage. The drafting group proposed to include that right in article 15, but had postponed consideration until a decision had been reached on the subject by the Sub-Commission on the Prevention of Discrimination and the Protection of Minorities. Marriage was now protected by articles 12 and 13, which seemed insufficient however, as they did not provide for freedom of choice.

Since a situation had actually arisen in which married couples were prevented from joining each other in the country of their choice, Miss Sutherland submitted that the fundamental right to freedom of choice was thereby infringed, and moved that it should be safeguarded by the [6] inclusion in article 13 of a provision stating that: "married persons shall have the right to reside together in any country from which they cannot be lawfully excluded".

BEGUM HAMID ALI (India) supported the motion.

MRS. STREET (Australia) thought that the Commission should be careful in making recommendations of this sort, since it was working in a world unsettled by post-war conditions, where the Australian Government had found necessary, temporarily, at all events to make regulations which would not conform to the recommendation advocated by Miss Sutherland. Even if the Economic and Social Council should agree to the proposal, individual countries would not be able to implement such clauses at present. She could not, therefore, accept the suggestion, although she agreed with the principle and trusted that conditions would allow the implementation in due course.

MISS SUTHERLAND (United Kingdom) thought that principles should be supported, even though representatives might not be in agreement with the measures enforced by their own governments.

MISS KENYON (United States of America) considered that the declaration should follow the broad pattern of the United States Bill of Rights, defining first the duties of the state toward the individual and protecting the individual from possible tyrannical acts by the state. She thought that the family should be explicitly protected against the state, but pointed out that the concern voiced by Miss Sutherland was not in fact a matter of discrimination against women, so that the Commission was not empowered to deal with that subject.

MRS. URALOVA (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) submitted that some specific provision might be included to provide government protection for married couples.

MISS SUTHERLAND (United Kingdom) welcomed this statement as giving support to her proposal.

MRS. URALOVA (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) pointed out that it should not be understood as giving support to Miss Sutherland's point of view, since she was thinking in terms of protection within the boundaries of a given country.

MRS. BEGRUP (Denmark) felt sure that every member of the Commission supported protection of marriage both nationally and internationally, but thought, as did several other delegates, that freedom of movement was sufficiently ensured by the wording of article 10.

THE CHAIRMAN, speaking as representative of France, also considered that article 10 ensured freedom of movement, and stated that she would abstain if the matter were put to a vote, since she agreed with the [7] principle but thought it had already been safeguarded.

A vote was taken by show of hands.

4 votes were cast in favour of the motion and 4 against, with 6 abstentions. Miss Sutherland's motion was therefore rejected.

MRS. STREET (Australia) proposed that article 13 should contain some provisions for divorce. She pointed out that in some countries women could be divorced on the slightest pretext where in others a divorce was practically unobtainable for them.

BEGUM HAMID ALI (India) supported this motion. She also expressed the wish that the Commission would support the principle of monogamy, which had now been proclaimed in part of India.

THE CHAIRMAN suggested that the Commission might recommend the addition of the words "and to dissolve marriage" after the words "to contract marriage" in article 13.

The motion was adopted by 11 votes.

THE CHAIRMAN requested Begum Hamid Ali (India) and Mrs Uralova (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) to present texts for the afternoon meeting for their respective motions.

Continuation of the Discussion on the Report of the Commission on Human Rights

MRS. BEGTRUP said she had sent a letter to the Chairman of the Human Rights Commission drawing her attention to document E/CN.4/21, Annex C, and asking that a footnote might be added explaining that all its provisions should be taken to apply without discrimination to the female sex. Article 20 of the Draft International Covenant on Human Rights covered that point.

With regard to the treatment of prostitutes, the Commission on Human Rights considered that that would be covered by the word "indignity" in Article 7.

Report of the Representatives of the Commission Concerning the Deliberations of the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities Regarding Items Relating to Discrimination Based on Sex: Item 8 of the Agenda: Action by the Commission

THE CHAIRMAN referred to the suggestion of the Sub-Commission on the Prevention of Discrimination and the Protection of Minorities that the Commission on the Status of Women should give its opinion concerning Article 15 of the Draft International Declaration on Human Rights drawn up by the Drafting Committee (document E/CN.4/21, Annex F) especially insofar as the question of marriage was concerned. She asked whether the Commission would like to state its opinion on that matter.

MRS. BEGRUP (Denmark) pointed out that the Sub-Commission's request for the present Commission's advice could not come directly to the Commission on the Status of Women, but would have to be transmitted by the Commission on Human Rights to which the Sub-Commission reported. As the Commission on Human Rights had not asked the opinion of the Commission on the Status of Women, there was no opportunity for it to answer the Sub-Commission's request.

THE CHAIRMAN suggested that the Commission might ask the Economic and Social Council to express to the Commission on Human Rights whatever views it might decide to adopt.

MISS SUTHERLAND (United Kingdom), supported by Mrs. Begtrup (Denmark), felt that the Commission should repeat and perhaps expand the ideas it had already expressed on the subject of marriage in its first report to the Economic and Social Council (document E/281). It would certainly be useful to have the Commission's views on the subject recorded again in case they might be needed before the Commission should meet again.

In that connection, BEGUM HAMID ALI (India) proposed the following resolution:

"The Commission on the Status of Women expresses its belief in the principle of monogamy and advocates its acceptance by the United Nations. It forwards the resolution to the Economic and Social Council for action."

[7]

THE CHAIRMAN thought that Begum Hamid Ali's resolution might be considered a proposed amendment to Article 13 of the Draft Articles for an International Declaration on Human Rights (document E/600, Annex A).

In spite of the difficulties in making any amendment to that Declaration, the point raised by Begum Hamid Ali was important enough to be presented to the Economic and Social Council.

MRS. STREET (Australia) thought it might be sufficient to suggest that the second sentence of Article 13 of the Draft Articles for an International Declaration on Human Rights be changed to read:

"Men and women shall have the same freedom to contract marriage and obtain divorce in accordance with the law."

BEGUM HAMID ALI (India), supported by MRS. DE URDANETA (Venezuela), felt that it was important to emphasize the Commission's belief in monogamy.

MISS SUTHERLAND (United Kingdom) suggested that in its report to the Economic and Social Council, the Commission should add a note in connection with Article 13 of the Draft Declaration on Human Rights, in which it should draw to the Council's attention all its views on the subject of marriage as stated in its previous report and as enlarged by any decisions it might take at the present session.

THE CHAIRMAN, BEGUM HAMID ALI (India), and MRS. DE URDANETA (Venezuela) agreed to the procedure proposed by Miss Sutherland.

E/CN.6/69

14 January 1948

Draft Resolution on Marriage Submitted by the Representatives of India and the United Kingdom

The Commission on the Status of Women draws the attention of the Economic and Social Council to the following extract from the statement of aims adopted at its first session:

“Full equality in all civil rights, irrespective of nationality, race, language or religion, including

(a) Marriage – Freedom of choice, dignity of the wife, monogamy, equal right to dissolution of marriage.”

1. Monogamy. The Commission emphasizes its belief in the principle of monogamy and urges the United Nations to work for the acceptance of this principle.
2. Freedom of Choice. This right cannot be fully guaranteed unless it is recognized that individuals have the right to leave their country on marriage and to reside with the other partner in any country from which they cannot lawfully be excluded. ## Chapter V

Section of the Draft of the International Bill of Human Rights Concerning the Particular Rights of Women

26. In accordance with Resolution 48(IV) of the Economic and Social Council, the preliminary draft of the International Bill of Human Rights, prepared by the Commission on Human Rights at its Second Session, was circulated to the Members of the Commission on the Status of Women. The Commission reviewed this Report. The former Chairman and Rapporteur of the Commission, who represented the Commission at the Second Session of the Commission on Human Rights, reported on the discussions that took place concerning the particular rights of women and on their participation in those deliberations. The representative of France reported on her participation in the First Session of the Sub-Commission on the Prevention of Discrimination and the Protection of Minorities.

Following upon its review of the Report of the Commission on Human Rights, the Commission on the Status of Women adopted the following resolutions:

Amendment to the Text of Article 1 of the Draft International Declaration on Human Rights:
All people are born free and equal in dignity and rights. They are endowed by nature with reason and conscience, and should act towards one another in the spirit of brotherhood.

Amendment to Article 13 of the Draft International Declaration on Human Rights:
Men and women shall have equal rights to contract or dissolve marriage in accordance with the law.

[14]

Chapter VI

Marriage

27. The Commission on the Status of Women decided to draw the attention of the Economic and Social Council to the following extract from the statement of aims adopted at its first session:

Full equality in all civil rights, irrespective of nationality, race, language or religion, including

(a) Marriage – Freedom of choice, dignity of the wife, monogamy, equal right to dissolution of marriage.

To this statement of aims the Commission decided to add the following observations:

1. Monogamy. The Commission emphasizes its belief in the principle of monogamy and urges the United Nations to work for the acceptance of this principle.

2. Freedom of Choice. This right cannot be fully guaranteed unless it is recognized that individuals have the right to leave their country on marriage and to reside with the other partner in any country from which they cannot lawfully be excluded. The Commission therefore notes with satisfaction the terms of Article 10(2) of the Draft Declaration on Human Rights (E/600) as recognizing a right essential for safeguarding freedom of choice in marriage.

Draft Articles for a Covenant and Declaration of Human Rights
(Item 4, Provisional Agenda – Document E/CN.4/Sub.1/35/Rev. 1)

At its Second Session, the Commission on Human Rights decided as follows (document E/600):

The Commission on Human Rights

1. Recognizes that freedom of expression and of information is one of the most fundamental freedoms;
  2. Affirms that this freedom must be included both in the International Declaration and in the Covenant on Human Rights;
  3. Decides, having before it two texts on this subject for inclusion in the International Covenant, one submitted by the United States of America and one by the Drafting Committee, not to elaborate a final text until it has before it the views of the Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information and of the Press and of the International Conference on Freedom of Information and of the Press these two texts for its consideration, requesting it further:
    - (a) To take into account the two resolutions of the General Assembly on this question (document A/C.1/228, “Measures to be taken against Propaganda and the Inciters of a New War” and document A/C.3/180/rev.1, “False or Distorted Reports”);
    - (b) To consider the social, economic and political conditions which will render this fundamental freedom real; and
    - (c) To consider the possibility of denying this freedom to publications and other media of public expression which aim or tend to inflict injury, or incite prejudice or hatred, against persons or groups because of their race, language, religion or national origin.
- [2]
4. Recommends to the Economic and Social Council that it remit to the International Conference on Freedom of Information the same documents with identical instructions; and
  5. Decides to refer Articles 17 and 18 of the draft Declaration to the Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information and of the Press for its consideration and report and to request the Economic and Social Council to refer these Articles to the Conference on Freedom of Information for its own consideration and report.

Draft Declaration on Human Rights

Concerning Articles 17 and 18, of the Draft Declaration the Commission decided not to elaborate a final text until it had before it the views of the Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information and of the Press and of the International Conference on Freedom of Information.

(Article 17)

- (1. Everyone is free to express and impart opinions, or to receive and seek information and the opinion of others from sources wherever situated.)
- (2. No person may be interfered with on account of his opinions.)

(Article 18)

(There shall be freedom of expression either by word, in writing, in the press, in books or by visual, auditive or other means. There shall be equal access to all channels of communication.)

The suggestion was adopted by 5 votes.

MRS. URALOVA (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) felt that the wording of Article 1 of the draft Universal Declaration of Human Rights was too general, and that it should contain a reference to the necessity for guaranteeing equality before the law. ### Discussion of the Order of Items in the Agenda

MR. HUMPHREY (Secretariat) stated that the Commission on Human Rights was putting before the Economic and Social Council and the States Members of the United Nations two bills of human rights: a declaration in the form of a resolution to be submitted for the approval of the General Assembly, which imposed no binding legal obligations, and a convention known as the Covenant on Human Rights, which would have to be ratified by the Member States, and which would then become legally binding. The Sub-Commission had been asked by the Commission on Human Rights to draft articles for both documents.

...

MR. MACKENZIE (United Kingdom) suggested that the draft Covenant on Human Rights should be considered before the draft Declaration on Human Rights, that being the order in which the subjects had been referred to the Sub-Commission on Human Rights.

MR. ILLUECA (Panama) proposed that the Declaration on Human Rights should be considered first. The Covenant would impose certain legal obligations on the States which ratified it. It appeared logical to examine first the broad general principles outlined in the Declaration, and to proceed next to the narrower and more definite provisions of the Covenant.

MR. CHAFEE (United States of America) supported Mr. Illueca's proposal.

A vote was taken by show of hands. Mr. Illueca's proposal that the draft Declaration on Human Rights should receive first consideration was adopted by 8 votes to 8.

Articles Concerning Freedom of Information for Inclusion in a Draft Declaration of Human Rights and a Draft Covenant on Human Rights (Document A/600)

THE CHAIRMAN proposed that the Sub-Commission begin discussion of Articles 17 and 18 of the draft Covenant,<sup>51</sup> concerning freedom of information.

MR. CHAFEE (United States of America) reminded the members of the Sub-Commission that the United States representative had submitted a draft declaration on human rights to the Geneva Conference of the Commission on Human Rights. Article 2 of this draft concerned freedom of information, as did the articles now being discussed. It said:

“Every man has a right to freedom of information, of speech and of expression; to freedom of religion, conscience and opinion; to freedom of meeting and association; to freedom to address petitions to his government and to the United Nations.”

<sup>51</sup> The reference to the Covenant seems incorrect. Earlier in the day, at the close of the previous session, the Sub-Commission had agreed to consider the draft Declaration before the draft Covenant. The Commission had asked the Sub-Commission to examine articles 17 and 18 of the draft Declaration and article 17 of the draft Covenant. Reference here and in the subsequent discussion to articles 17 and 18 provides confirmation that the Sub-Commission is in fact speaking of the draft Declaration, and that either the Chairman misspoke or the précis writer drafting the summary record was in error.

MR. MACKENZIE (United Kingdom) said that the aim of the Human Rights Commission was to establish universally acceptable principles in as concise a form as possible. The Sub-Commission should examine Article 17 and 18 in that spirit. Except for the phrase “access to means of communication of ideas shall be equal for everyone”, he would be prepared to accept the articles.

He believed that Articles 17 and 18 might be combined in the following text:

“Every man has the right to freedom of opinion and expression and to freedom to seek and collect the information of others from sources wherever situated.”

MISS SENDER (American Federation of Labor) did not agree that it was necessary to combine Articles 17 and 18; they established different moral obligations. She was also opposed to Mr. Mackenzie’s proposal to delete the last sentence of Article 18, referring to equal access to all channels of communication.

THE CHAIRMAN observed that the Sub-Commission’s task was to offer any proposals it might consider good on the articles relating to freedom of information. It would be able to do this twice, first, during discussion of the draft declaration; secondly, during debate on the international covenant.

MR. CHAFEE (United States of America) asked the Director of the Human Rights Division to explain the last sentence of Article 18: “There shall be equal access to all channels of communication.”

MR. HUMPHREY (Secretariat) believed that this sentence established the [3] freedom of everybody to make use of such media of information as press and radio. It was a general political principle.

MR. FERGUSON (Canada) asked whether that principle provided for freedom of the material means of information.

MR. HUMPHREY (Secretariat) replied that that question had not been discussed in detail.

THE CHAIRMAN was of opinion that the sentence was not precise. It was not possible to determine, for example, whether it concerned free use of press organs or of newsprint.

MR. HUMPHREY (Secretariat) referred the members of the Sub-Commission to document E/CN.4/Sub.1/38, which summarized the drafting committee’s work.

THE CHAIRMAN thought that it would be difficult to interpret the sentence and proposed its deletion.

MR. MACKENZIE (United Kingdom) supported the Chairman.

MR. LOMAKIN (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) declared that the Commission on Human Rights had sent the articles back to the Sub-Commission because difficulties had already arisen over them. Was freedom of expression to be extended to propaganda in favour of murder or to warmongering? Would one of Hitler's satellites be allowed full freedom to express the idea of revenge? It was important to guard against such a possibility.

The members of the Sub-Commission did not seem prepared for a discussion of articles of such wide scope.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the present issue was not difficulties regarding freedom of expression but equal rights of access to means of expression.

MR. CHAFEE (United States of America) remarked that Mr. Lomakin had brought out two of the Sub-Commission's difficulties.

The first difficulty related to the limitations to be placed on freedom of expression. The draft International Covenant listed those limitations. He referred Mr. Lomakin to Articles 4 and 33 of the draft International Declaration on Human Rights, but added that he himself preferred a more general expression of principle to a detailed statement.

The second difficulty was to guard the individual's freedom of expression. The American Constitution was designed to protect the individual against abuse of power by the Federal Government; Article 24 of the draft Covenant provided for extension of its principles to a Federal State.

When possibility of access to means of communication of ideas was under discussion, the obstacles which certain private groups might put in the way of freedom of expression were also under consideration. For example, everybody [4] should have free access to radio stations and to time on the air.

MR. GÉRAUD (France) recalled that the French Declaration of the Rights of Man – that of 1789, not the Declaration of 1791 – guaranteed to everybody the right of free communication of ideas, of free speech, of free writing and printing, except on matters forbidden by law.

The principle of freedom of information should be combined with the ideas of responsibility and, in this monopolistic era, of equality.

THE CHAIRMAN reminded the Sub-Commission that it was the moral obligations of governments that were under discussion. If it took up the question of monopolies, it would be going into too much detail.

MR. MACKENZIE (United Kingdom) agreed with the Chairman that the declaration should be only a general statement. Article 2 of the draft Declaration made clear the individual's responsibility for the use he made of his freedom.

He repeated his previous suggestion to delete the sentence about equal access to all channels of communication from the draft of Article 18.

THE CHAIRMAN suggested that discussion on access to channels of communication should be deferred until the members had had time to make up their minds on the matter.

He would like the Sub-Commission's views on Mr. Mackenzie's proposal to combine Articles 17 and 18.

MR. FERGUSON (Canada) supported Mr. Mackenzie's proposal.

Mr. Mackenzie's proposal was adopted.

MR. FERGUSON (Canada) asked what was the meaning of the phrase "Everyone is free to express and impart opinions" in Article 17, and whether the two words "express" and "impart" were not repetitious.

MR. CHAFEE (United States of America) suggested that the words "to hold" should be added to the article and the right of expression should be defined by one word. A man might for example be compelled to express an opinion because of moral pressure or even physical threat. Some Congressional Committees had compelled American citizens to state their view of communism under penalty of contempt.

MR. LOMAKIN (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) thought that the discussion showed that there had not been sufficient preliminary study of the articles the Sub-Commission was considering. The articles were in rough shape and it was not possible to vote on them. It was difficult to adopt a combined text of Articles 17 and 18 when the sense of those articles was not clear to the members of the Sub-Commission. He proposed that a drafting committee be appointed.

[5]

THE CHAIRMAN was of the opinion that a drafting committee might be useful later. For the moment the Sub-Commission should continue its discussion; specifically it should decide whether Article 17 should include the word "express", the word "impart", or both.

After an exchange of views the Chairman suggested that the Sub-Commission should approve the phrasing "to hold and to impart", thus assuring freedom to have and express opinions to everyone.

The Chairman's proposal was adopted.

MISS SENDER (American Federation of Labor) remarked that to ensure individual freedom to hold and to impart opinion was not enough. It was necessary also to ensure the right freely to receive information.

MR. MACKENZIE (United Kingdom) pointed out that Article 17 provided for precisely this freedom to "seek information and the opinion of others from sources wherever situated".

MR. CHAFEE (United States of America) reminded the Sub-Commission that the Japanese had a law against dangerous thoughts.

MR. MORA (Uruguay) thought it necessary to ensure freedom both to hold and to impart opinions. The individual should be free not to express his thoughts, and he should not be obliged to express an opinion contrary to his conscience.

MR. ILLUECA (Panama) recalled that the United States and Panamanian draft declarations had emphasized another point; the importance of ensuring an individual's ability to collect the information necessary to the formation of an opinion.

THE CHAIRMAN thought the Sub-Commission should consider the draft Mr. Mackenzie had proposed in substitution for Articles 17 and 18.

MR. CHAFEE (United States of America) believed that the members should discuss ideas rather than words, and that they should define their ideas clearly before asking a committee to prepare a draft.

THE CHAIRMAN asked what was the meaning of the phrase in Article 17 "from sources wherever situated".

MR. FERGUSON (Canada) said that this might mean that some opinions could be expressed by other than the usual channels.

MR. GÉRAUD (France) asked whether it would not be better to speak of the "right to" rather than the "freedom of" expression and quoted the following passage from the French Declaration of the Rights of Man: "Free expression of thought and opinions is one of man's most sacred rights."

MR. HUMPHREY (Secretariat) pointed out that the draft declaration generally used the word "right".

[6]

MR. MACKENZIE (United Kingdom) quoted Article 19 of the Declaration, which spoke of the right of association.

MR. CHAFEE (United States of America) referred to the following passage from Article 16: "Individual freedom of thought and conscience, to hold and change beliefs, is an absolute and sacred right."

This article used both the word "right" and the word "freedom" and in Mr. Chafee's opinion the word "freedom" was preferable.

MR. MACKENZIE (United Kingdom) proposed that they keep close to the draft in Article 19 and say, "Everyone shall have the right to freedom of opinion and expression". That was to say that everyone should freely enjoy the right of opinion and expression.

THE CHAIRMAN suggested that the question be submitted to a drafting committee. Replying to a question from Mr. Chafee, he said that the Sub-Commission's task was to draft some articles of a declaration of human rights. The word "right" therefore seemed suitable. It would however, be for the drafting committee to decide between the words "right" and "freedom", or to use both.

MR. MACKENZIE (United Kingdom) pointed out that article 3 of the draft declaration used both "rights" and "freedoms". He himself preferred "rights".

THE CHAIRMAN proposed the appointment of a drafting committee of three members which would bear in mind the opinions expressed during the discussion.

It was decided by nine votes to appoint a drafting committee.

THE CHAIRMAN proposed that the Committee be composed of Mr. Géraud, Mr. Ferguson and Mr. Mackenzie.

The Chairman's proposal was approved.

Report of the Drafting Committee on an Article for the Declaration on Human Rights

The Drafting Committee on an Article for the Declaration on Human Rights met at 1 p.m. on 20 January. Mr. Ferguson, Mr. Géraud, and Mr. McKenzie were present. Mr. Ferguson was chosen chairman and Mr. Mackenzie, rapporteur.

The Commission decided to pass to the Sub-Commission two texts:

- (a) Everyone shall have the right to freedom of opinion and expression; freedom to seek and receive information and the opinions of others by any medium, within and beyond the borders of his own land; and having regard to the rights of others, to transmit all information and opinion without limitation.
- (b) The free communication of thoughts, opinions, and facts, regardless of frontiers, is one of the rights of man. Everyone has, therefore, the right to speak, to write, to print, to employ freely all modes of expression, being liable only for the abuses of this freedom in cases determined by the law of nations.

...

THE CHAIRMAN then called upon MR. MACKENZIE to comment on the alternative texts for inclusion in the Declaration on Human Rights.

MR. MACKENZIE (United Kingdom) explained that text A was a redraft by Mr. Ferguson of the text of the previous day. Text B was a new one largely due to Mr. Géraud, and was based on the famous Declaration of Rights of 1789. The words "regardless of frontiers" should be inserted after the word "facts" in the first line of that text.

MR. MACKENZIE expressed his preference for text B, though he expressed doubts as to the limitation imposed at the end, since it had been his understanding that in the Declaration, as opposed to the Covenant, there would be no restrictive phrases in the articles.

MR. FERGUSON (Canada) stated that he had been so impressed by the wording of text B, which largely reproduced that of the solemn Declaration of Rights of 1789, that he had been loath to suggest any modification thereto, though he felt that they might be desirable.

In reply to Mr. Chafee, who said that no provision seemed to have been made as regards freedom to "hold" opinions, MR. MACKENZIE (United Kingdom) stated that in his opinion the word "communication" in text B covered that point. Communication implied forming or holding an opinion, expressing an opinion and receiving an opinion. He asked whether these three stages were adequately covered or needed to be specified.

MR. SYCHRAVA (Czechoslovakia) expressed his dissatisfaction with the text. No liberty of information or of the press could be conceived of, if [3] such liberty were prejudicial to the common welfare. The problem at issue was to define the word liberty and the limitations thereto. The greatest crimes in history had been committed in the name of liberty. He felt that the expression "law of nations" was inadequate and required clarification.

THE CHAIRMAN recalled that it had been previously agreed that the Declaration should consist of brief articles of a positive character. He stated that article 33 of the Declaration laid down the desired limitations very clearly. In his opinion Mr. Sychrava's suggestion would be valuable in the drafting of the Covenant but not of the Declaration.

MR. CHAFEE (United States) called attention to article 2 of the Declaration which made every provision to keep liberty within bounds. He felt that it was undesirable to introduce restrictive clauses in particular articles.

MR. MAHOU (UNESCO) said that it was necessary to distinguish between two fundamental freedoms: freedom of information and freedom of opinion. Information meant the objective knowledge of facts; opinion implied a personal judgment of an interpretative or appreciative character. Freedom of information came first in order of logic.

In the 18th and 19th centuries, the press was used as a vehicle of personal opinion; it was now a vehicle of information. The immediate consequence of that change, was that at present the "subject of right" was the public, whose freedom of information had to be guaranteed, rather than the individual's liberty of expression.

He therefore expressed his preference for a text that should speak first of freedom of information. That was a universal concept to which everyone would adhere. Then should come the right of expressing an opinion, which involved the individual's responsibility, and necessarily entailed numerous limitations.

He therefore suggested that the proposed article should contain two paragraphs or two sentences, the first referring to freedom of information without restrictions, the second to freedom of expression with the necessary restrictions.

MR. FERGUSON (Canada) and MR. GÉRAUD (France) felt that the distinction drawn was too clear-cut. There was a shadow line between freedom of information and freedom of opinion and except in reporting absolute material facts, the journalist's personality played a great part.

MR. ILLUECA (Panama) agreed with the representative of UNESCO that a distinction should be drawn between the two concepts and suggested that the article should be re-examined.

He recalled that Mr. Ricardo Alfaro's draft Bill of Rights<sup>52</sup> contained [4] two articles on freedom of thought and freedom of expression respectively. The United States delegation at San Francisco had itself divided the concept of the freedom of the press into freedom of opinion, of expression and of transmission.

THE CHAIRMAN thought that it was impossible to separate the two concepts and that moreover text A covered the two points raised.

MR. MAHOU (UNESCO) said that text B made no reference to seeking information. He therefore preferred text A, provided that freedom of information was mentioned first.

MR. FERGUSON (Canada) thought that the word "communication" in text B was adequate to cover the two concepts and thought that the distinctions were unnecessary.

MR. LOMAKIN (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) stated that the Sub-Commission was approaching the whole problem from a wrong angle. However much he respected historical declarations, they could not be used as a background for present day conditions. The world had just emerged from a terrible war, the objectives and scope of the press had changed and it was necessary to set limitations to the liberty of the press if it were used as a vehicle of war propaganda and exhortation to revenge. It was impossible to reach a definitive formula in the present circumstances, since every generation had to formulate the principles it thought best fitted for the prevailing political conditions.

He stated that he did not agree with either of the two texts proposed.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the question whether freedom of information and freedom of opinion should be the subject of two separate paragraphs as had been suggested, or dealt with in one sentence.

The Sub-Commission decided by 9 votes that the two concepts of freedom of information and of opinion should be included in one and the same sentence.

MR. CHAFEE (United States of America) suggested the addition, in the first line in text A, of the words "freedom to hold his opinion without interference".

MR. MACKENZIE (United Kingdom) supported the suggestion made by Mr. Chafee and proposed further changes so that paragraph A would read:

"Everyone should have the right to seek and receive information and the opinions of others by any medium within and beyond the boundaries of his own land; the right to hold his opinion without interference; and the right to express his opinions through all lawful means of communication."

The last part of the sentence was thus clearer than the proposed text: “and having regard to the rights of others, to transmit all information and opinions without limitation”.

[5]

MR. CHAFEE (United States of America) suggested that the members of the Sub-Commission should write out all suggestions for alterations and the Drafting Committee might then work on the text again.

THE CHAIRMAN thought that the Drafting Committee should reconsider both texts A and B.

MR. MACKENZIE (United Kingdom) felt that it would be better for the Sub-Commission to decide whether or not it wished to retain the restrictive phrases in the two texts.

MR. CHAFEE (United States of America) approved the deletion of all restrictive phrases. The limitations stated in article 2 and 33 of the Draft Declaration on Human Rights were sufficient, and there was no need to repeat them in the article under discussion. In text B, the reference to the “law of nations” was not intended to mean international law, but referred rather to the articles of the proposed Covenant.

To delete all mention of limitations would be an unrealistic approach to the problem.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that in order for a person to be punished by his Government in accordance with the articles of the Covenant, they would have to be incorporated into the criminal law of the State.

MR. CHAFEE (United States of America) said that the Declaration might very well go into effect before the Covenant, thus making reference to the “law of nations” meaningless.

MR. GÉRAUD (France) suggested the words “by law”.

MR. CHAFEE (United States of America), supported by MR. MACKENZIE (United Kingdom), observed that merely to state that a person would be held responsible only in cases determined by law was no protection against tyranny.

MR. MORA (Uruguay) favoured eliminating all mention of limitations from the articles in the Declaration other than that made in articles 2 and 33.

THE CHAIRMAN put the question to the vote.

The Sub-Commission decided by 8 votes to delete from text B the clause “being responsible only for the abuses of this freedom in cases determined by the law of nations”.

The Sub-Commission decided by 7 votes to delete the restrictive phrase “having regard to the rights of others” from text A.

MR. MACKENZIE (United Kingdom) thought that a distinction should be made between freedom of thought and freedom of expression, and asked for the [6] Sub-Commission's opinion.

MR. FERGUSON (Canada) and MR. GÉRAUD (France) felt that the words "free communication" in text B clearly implied both freedom of thought and freedom of expression.

The Sub-Commission decided by 6 votes to 3 that specific mention should be made of freedom of opinion.

Continuation of the Consideration, Pursuant to a Resolution of the Second Session of the Commission on Human Rights (E/600) of Articles Concerning Freedom of Information for Inclusion in a Draft Declaration on Human Rights and a Draft Covenant on Human Rights: Examination of the Rights, Obligations and Practices Which Should be Included in the Concept of Freedom of Information

MR. MACKENZIE (United Kingdom) submitted the following proposed draft of Article 17 for the Declaration on Human Rights, which had been unanimously adopted by the Drafting Committee:

“Everyone shall have the right to freedom of thought and communication: this shall include freedom to hold opinions without interference; and to seek, receive and impart information and ideas by any means and regardless of frontiers.”

MR. CHAFEE (United States of America) thought this was to some extent a repetition of Article 16 of the Draft Declaration; for example, the words “freedom of thought” occurred in both articles. He assumed that Article 16 intended religious freedom to be interpreted very broadly. Article 16 of the Covenant, which corresponded to Article 16 of the Declaration, appeared to support that view. The new draft Article 17 for the Declaration covered other freedoms. He suggested retaining the draft and recommending to the Commission on Human Rights that the word “thought” should be deleted from Article 16.

MR. FERGUSON (Canada) pointed out that in the proposed Article 17 the word “thought” had been substituted for “opinion” for reasons of style.

MR. MACKENZIE (United Kingdom) agreed that it would be more logical to include the idea of freedom of thought in article 17 and to concentrate on freedom of conscience in article 16.

On MR. FERGUSON’s suggestion it was decided to leave the new draft of Article 17 as it stood and to recommend to the Commission on Human Rights the deletion of the words “thought and” in Article 16; if that were to raise any difficulties “thought” could be replaced by “opinion” in the draft Article 17.

[4]

MR. MARTIN (International Organization of Journalists) reminded the Sub-Commission that the original draft had read “expression of opinion”. Freedom of thought or opinion was meaningless without freedom of expression.

MR. MACKENZIE (United Kingdom) was prepared to accept the word “expression” instead of “communication”.

The Sub-Commission decided by seven votes to replace “communications” by “expression”.

MR. GÉRAUD (France) said that he would abstain from voting on the rest of the draft article.

The proposed Article 17 of the Draft Declaration on Human Rights was adopted by eight votes with one abstention.

Mr. J. Lomakin (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics)

In the interests of democracy, everyone shall be guaranteed by law the right to free expression of opinion, especially freedom of speech and the press and also of graphic representation.

It is inadmissible to use freedom of speech and of the press for purposes of the propaganda of fascism and aggression, the dissemination of false news and dishonest information and also for the purposes of fomenting hostility between peoples.

...

Paragraphs 6, 7, 8, 9, 10 and 11 were adopted without discussion

MR. GÉRAUD (France) drew attention to the fact that the text of the article proposed in paragraph 12 did not include the word “responsibility”, and requested that a note should be inserted stating that because of that omission he had resigned from the drafting committee responsible for the text as it finally appeared.

MR. SYCHRAVA (Czechoslovakia) asked whether a further note could be incorporated in paragraph 12 stating that although he had been absent from the discussion owing to ill health he had intended to propose a text mentioning other points.

THE CHAIRMAN considered that the best course would be to ask the Sub-Commission to vote immediately on the draft articles submitted by Mr. Lomakin (document E/CN.4Sub.1/56) and Mr. Sychrava (document E/CN.4/Sub.1/60).

Mr. Lomakin's proposal was rejected by six votes to one.

Mr. Sychrava's proposal was rejected by six votes to two.

Summary Record of the One Hundred and Twenty-Eighth Meeting [of the Economic and Social Council]

Held at Lake Success, New York, on Thursday,
5 February 1948, at 11 a.m.

President: MR. CHARLES MALIK (Lebanon)

THE PRESIDENT welcomed Mrs. Roosevelt, Chairman of the Commission on Human Rights, and requested her to present the Commission's report (E/600).

MRS. ROOSEVELT said that the Commission did not expect the Council to pronounce itself at the current session either on the draft declaration of human rights or on the draft covenant, since the Commission was awaiting the comments of the various governments to which those documents had been submitted and would prepare a final draft at its next session in the light of those comments.

...

MR. STINEBOWER (United States of America) recalled that his delegation had always attached the greatest importance to the work of the Human Rights Commission.

He considered that the detailed discussion of the declaration and the covenant should be undertaken at the seventh session of the Council, after the Commission had had the opportunity of revising the draft in the light of the observations received from the various governments.

...

...

MR. MUNIZ (Brazil) said that Brazil was happy to be able to make its contribution to the drafting of the bill of rights by presenting its comments thereon.

The principles embodied in the declaration and in the covenant were recognized by all civilized nations. It was essential that precise definitions of norms of conduct should be established and practical measures taken for their implementation.

...

MR. ARUTIUNIAN (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that the Commission's report could be divided into two parts. The first, composed of chapters II to V inclusive, dealt with the declaration and the covenant of human rights. . .

In accordance with the Council's resolution 46(IV), the first part was still in the drafting stage, since the observations of the various governments had not yet been received.

[45]

...

He suggested that the Council should ask the Trusteeship Council to provide such information and to give its advice on the drafting of the part of the bill of rights which dealt with the subject [of the social, political and educational status of the peoples of Non-Self-Governing Territories, Trust Territories and colonies]. Though some colonial Powers might be loath to do so, it was essential to take practical steps to safeguard the fundamental rights and freedoms of the peoples of those territories.

...

In conclusion, he said that chapters II to V of the report should be referred to the next session of the Council without discussion.

...

MR. MAYHEW (United Kingdom) congratulated the Commission on Human Rights on its excellent report.

He agreed with the U.S.S.R. representative that the first part of the report could not suitably be discussed by the Economic and Social Council at its current session.

...

MR. DEDMAN (Australia) considered that the Commission on Human Rights had rightly devoted most of its time to the drafting of an international bill of rights. A declaration of rights was not [46] sufficient; there must be a covenant, whereby governments would undertake to give effect to it.

...

MR. THORN (New Zealand) thanked the Commission on Human Rights for its industry and competence in preparing its report. The draft declaration and covenant embodied principles which could be accepted by every civilized human being. The Commission had adopted a business-like procedure, and by the use of committees had accomplished praiseworthy results in the short space of two weeks.

...

The declaration of human rights, which listed all those rights for which human beings should strive, was of necessity broader than the covenant, [47] which embodied certain human rights to which all nations could subscribe. It was therefore essential to define human rights clearly in the declaration before drafting the covenant in its final form. In that connexion, he would like to point out, without in any way detracting from the work of the Commission, that the language of the draft declaration was somewhat confusing at certain points. Certain articles defined certain human rights, while others outlined what things were to be done and what were not to be done. The latter were more suitable for inclusion in a legal document, and were out of place in a declaration of human rights.

The views of Member States on the draft declaration must be assembled before the Council could consider it. The covenant could only be written finally after mature consideration and examination, based on the proposals which would ultimately be laid down in the declaration.

MR. GELISSEN (Netherlands)...did not intend to discuss the declaration, but would point out that in article 31 no distinction was made between national minorities and groups of persons living in a State without being nationals of it.

...

MR. CHANG (China) congratulated the Commission on Human Rights on its work and thanked the Secretariat for its contribution to that work, emphasizing the great importance given to the formulation of the declaration and covenant by his country.

THE PRESIDENT noted that there appeared to be agreement that chapters I to V, together with annexes A and B, as suggested by the representative of the USSR, should not be considered at the current session.

[The Committee adopted an amendment, proposed by the United States, requesting the Conference on Freedom of Information and of the Press to express its views on the texts of draft article 17 of the Covenant adopted by the Drafting Committee and the Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information and of the Press.]

MR. HUMPHREY (Secretariat) drew the attention of the Committee to the fact that it would also be desirable to submit to the Conference Article 17 of the Draft International Declaration on Human Rights prepared by the Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information and of the Press. Paragraph B of the resolution would therefore need to be correspondingly altered, if the Committee agreed.

<sup>55</sup> This is the date of the meeting. The document was issued on 23 February 1948.

MR. HARRY (Australia) agreed with Mr. Humphrey's suggestion, and proposed that paragraph B of the resolution be amended as follows:

"To remit Articles 17 and 18 of the Draft International Declaration on Human Rights (Document E/600, Annex A), together with the draft prepared by the Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information and of the Press (document E/CN.4/80, paragraph 12) to the Conference [4] on Freedom of Information for its consideration and report."

MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) opposed the amendment since the Sub-Commission's draft had not been considered by the Council.

MR. KOTSCHNIG (United States of America) emphasized that the Australian representative's amendment was a necessary consequence of the amendment to paragraph C which had just been adopted.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the amendment to paragraph B of the resolution proposed by the Australian representative.

The Australian amendment was adopted by fifteen votes with two abstentions.

MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) recalled the decision of the Council not to discuss any drafts of the International Bill of Human Rights at the present session. MR. STINEBOWER (United States of America) supported the observations of the USSR representative. In that spirit, he suggested that the first paragraph should be amended to read:

“Transmits to the Commission on Human Rights and its Drafting Committee suggestions of the Commission on the Status of Women for amendments to the draft International Declaration of Human Rights.”

MR. BORISOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) approved the text suggested by the United States representative, understanding it to mean that the Council had not examined the substance of the amendments suggested by the Commission and did not express approval of them.

Freedom of information and of the Press

MR. KAMINSKY (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) pointed out that, in considering the report of the Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information and of the Press (E/CN.4/80), the Council had decided (155th meeting) to transmit the document in question to the United Nations Conference on Freedom of Information. It was unnecessary to go back on the question.

Mr. Kaminsky therefore proposed that paragraphs 1 and 2 should be deleted.

MR. STINEBOWER (United States of America) agreed that the resolution involved repetition but felt that the Byelorussian proposal would delete too much. Since article 17 and 18 of the Draft International Declaration of Human Rights had not yet been transmitted to the Conference, the first part of paragraph 1 should be retained.

Mr. Stinebower proposed that the words “together with the draft proposed by the Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information and of the Press (E/CN.4/80)” in paragraph 1 should be deleted but paragraph 2 should be retained.

THE PRESIDENT put to the vote the Byelorussian amendment by which paragraphs 1 and 2 would be deleted.

Amendment to Article 17 of the Covenant and the Declaration on Human Rights, Submitted by the Hungarian Delegation

The Hungarian Delegation,

Considering that freedom of expression cannot be conceived as an abstract right taking no account of the requirements of the peoples and the experiences of the second world war,

Proposes that it be stated in Article 17 of the Covenant on Human Rights and in Article 17 of the Declaration on Human Rights

- a) that freedom of expression shall be exercised in the interest of the community, thereby becoming a fundamental human right,
- b) that freedom of expression, as a fundamental right, cannot be extended to those who in abuse of that right, engage in warmongering attacks or endanger international co-operation and understanding.

Consideration of Document E/CONF.6/C.4/1, Item B, Annex B, Part I

MR. TIMOTYEVIC (Yugoslavia), raising a question of procedure, said that it had been decided in the General Committee to refer the Draft Articles concerning Freedom of Information of the Draft Declaration and Covenant of Human Rights (Document E/600) to Committee I for consideration of their general political implications, and then to Committee IV for consideration of their juridical aspects. This decision had not been mentioned in the Report of the General Committee to the Conference (Document E/CONF.6/36), doubtless owing to an oversight on the part of the Secretariat.

MR. ROSCHIN (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said they could not escape the question as to whether they could deal with political matters or not. If they could not, then the question should be referred back to Committee I.

MR. CHAFEE (United States) said that they could ask the General Committee to change its allocation of items for their consideration, but the General Committee had felt that this subject could properly be referred to this Committee. They were competent to discuss all its aspects.

The Chairman explained that the matter had been discussed at length in the General Committee. It had been agreed that Committee I could discuss all aspects of the question. But it had been thought that decisions on action to be taken came within the competence of Committee IV.

MR. EVANS (United Kingdom) referred to Point 1 of Document E/CONF.6/C.4/3. That suggested that the draft [3] articles prepared by the Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information and the Press for inclusion in the Declaration and Covenant on Human Rights should be adopted by Committee IV as a starting point for the discussion of Items B and E of its agenda (documents E/CONF.6/C.4/1 and E/CONF.6/C.4/1/Rev.1).

The Drafting Committee of the Commission on Human Rights had begun to draft the Covenant in June, 1947. It had adopted a number of articles dealing with liberty of information. This draft had been remitted to the Commission on Human Rights last December. The Commission on Human Rights had decided, before drafting a Covenant, to wait for the views of the Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information and of the Press and of this Conference. The Sub-Commission had produced its own draft in January last, which was set out in Chapter III of its report. The draft superseded former ones. They should begin where the Sub-Commission had left off, and adopt this draft as a working document.

MR. CHAFEE (United States) as a member of the Sub-Commission, was gratified to think that its work had been considered an advance. He would support the United Kingdom motion. The United States Delegation, however, would submit an amendment to the draft of Article 17 by proposing general limitations in place of the specific limitations there laid down.

SIR DHIRON MITRA (India) suggested that they take up consideration of the Article recommended by the Sub-Commission to the Commission on Human Rights, as presented in Paragraph 16 of Chapter III of Document E/CN.4/80.

MR. ROSCHIN (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) felt that they should go beyond the draft suggested by the Sub-Commission, and deal with the question as a whole on the basis of all the proposals before them.

[4]

THE CHAIRMAN suggested that, while not limiting their discussions to the draft suggested by the Sub-Commission, they should take it as a basis for discussion.

MR. SZABO (Hungary) said that the Drafting Committee of the Sub-Commission on Human Rights had fallen into the same error as did the authors of the French Constitutions 160 years ago. The text as suggested was abstract and unpractical. It did not take into account recent developments.

They should ask themselves whether those articles would serve the cause of peace. They must take into account the recent painful experience of humanity, when human rights had been trampled underfoot by fascism, all traces of which his country was bound by her Peace Treaty to eradicate. It was inadmissible that other Governments should not do the same.

Consequently the texts before them should specify clearly that freedom could only be used in the interest of all, and not as a vehicle for incitement to war or for fascist propaganda.

...

After some discussion, MR. ROSCHIN (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) presented the amendment contained in Document E/CONF.6/C.4/8, (quoted above), it being understood that this amendment, which applied to the whole of the article, was submitted in the first instance as an amendment to paragraph 1<sup>59</sup> and that, in the event of its adoption, he would call for the deletion of subsequent paragraphs of the Sub-Commission's draft.

MR. EVANS (United Kingdom) opposed the Soviet Union amendment on the grounds that the text was less precise than that proposed by the Sub-Commission, and that the second sentence of the text was inappropriate for insertion in a document such as the Covenant.

MR. KOTSCHNIG (United States of America) could not support the Soviet amendment since, in addition to the deficiencies indicated by the representative of the United Kingdom, the [9] qualifications required were in any case contained in subsequent paragraphs. Moreover, the objections were in respect of matters which were covered by Article 21 of the Covenant, and since the latter Article had not been referred to the Committee, the amendment was out of order.

MR. ROSCHIN (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) with a view to meeting this objection, proposed that the phrase in line 6 "to sow racial, national or religious hatred" be omitted.

In response to a remark by MR. TERROU (France) that the second sentence referred to limitations of freedom, which in any case figured in paragraph 2, he pointed out that if the amendment were accepted in principle it might thereafter be divided into paragraphs as required.

On a vote being taken, the amendment proposed by the representative of the USSR was rejected by 16 votes to 5.

The meeting rose at 1:20 p.m.

<sup>59</sup> Although the Soviet amendment applied to both the Declaration and the Covenant, the focus of the debate was on article 17 of the Covenant.

Discussion of Amendment to Article 17 of the Covenant and the Declaration on Human Rights, Submitted by the Hungarian Delegation (document E/CONF.6/C.4/10).

THE CHAIRMAN requested the representative of Hungary to explain in what respect he considered his amendment differed from the amendment of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, which had already been voted on.<sup>61</sup>

MR. SZABO (Hungary) recalled that, in the course of the previous discussion, he had explained the motives for the amendment to Article 17 of the Covenant and the <sup>60</sup> The title of the Greek proposal indicates that it pertains to the Declaration as well as to the Covenant, but the text appears to relate only to the Covenant.

Declaration on Human Rights. The text submitted by the Sub-Commission was too abstract and needed to be completed by more concrete proposals to define freedom of expression. Freedom of expression should not be permitted to those who used it for the purpose of incitement to war.

THE CHAIRMAN ruled that the representative for Hungary had not substantiated his claim that his proposal differed from the proposal of the Soviet Union which had already been rejected. His proposal was therefore out of order.

MR. ROSCHIN (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) appealed against this ruling, and on the proposal of MR. CHAFEE (United States of America), who invoked Article 22 of the Rules of Procedure, the ruling of the Chairman was put to the vote.

The Chairman's ruling on the Hungarian amendment was accepted by 15 votes to 5 with 1 abstention.

THE CHAIRMAN suggested, and the Committee agreed, that the Greek amendment (Document E/CONF.6/C.4/17) should be discussed in connection with the above-mentioned British amendment to sub-paragraph (d).<sup>63</sup>

MR. VEZANI (Greece) emphasizing the profoundly devout character of the Greek people, whose religious beliefs were protected by constitutional laws, felt that those religious beliefs ought to be protected against atheist propaganda.

<sup>63</sup> The United Kingdom amendment, E/CONF.6/C.4/3, concerned the Covenant only. Its purpose was to add reference to blasphemy to accepted limitations on freedom of expression.

MR. MENCEL (Poland) opposed the United Kingdom proposal because any provision against blasphemy might lead to clerical abuse.

[11]

He appealed to the Greek representative to withdraw his amendment in favour of the Polish proposal relating to “expressions which incite to war or to racial, national or religious hatred”.<sup>64</sup>

After a lengthy discussion on the Greek amendment, during which MR. NINOFF (Bulgaria) and MR. ROSCHIN (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) strongly opposed it, MR. VEZANI (Greece) stressed that he had only referred to the protection of all creeds and of the religion of the people.

MR. EVANS (United Kingdom) wished to make it quite clear that the offence of blasphemy could not be held to justify any religious controversy. Blasphemy was punishable in the United Kingdom only when there was an element of vilification or ridicule, or when used to exasperate the feelings of others.

The Greek proposal (Document E/CONF.6/C.4/17) was put to the vote and rejected by 13 votes to 2 with 10 abstentions.

Consideration of Texts of the Draft International Declaration of Human Rights (Document E/CONF.6/C.4/1), Draft of Article 17 of the Declaration and Covenant Submitted by the Soviet Union (Document E/CONF.6/C.4/8)

MR. ROSCHIN (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that his proposal dealt with major principles which had already been commented upon at previous meetings, and required no further explanation

The Soviet proposal for a new text of Article 17 was put to the vote and rejected by 18 votes to 5.

Amendment Submitted by France to the Draft Text of Article 17 (Document E/CONF.6/C.4/9)

MR. TERROU (France) stated that the text of the Sub-Commission omitted any reference to the responsibility which he believed was implied in the right to freedom of expression.

MR. CHAFEE (United States of America) explained that the Sub-Commission had felt that the principle of responsibility was included in the Declaration as a whole since Article 2 clearly stressed that rights were limited by the rights of others and by the just requirements of the democratic State.

MR. EVANS (United Kingdom) although not entirely in agreement with Mr. Chafee, could not support the French amendment.

[8]

MR. TERROU (France) maintained that it was essentially necessary to define the limits of freedom of expression. The text of the French amendment was similar to the Bill of Rights introduced in France in 1789, which stated that freedom of expression existed except in cases of abuses of that freedom. If a reference to responsibility were not included in Article 17, there would be a contradiction between the Covenant and the Declaration.

The French amendment was put to the vote and rejected by 10 votes to 3 with 10 abstentions.

Hungarian Amendment to Article 17 on the Declaration of Human Rights (Document E/CONF.6/C.4/10)

THE CHAIRMAN ruled that paragraph (b) of the amendment was out of order since it was essentially the same as the USSR amendment which had been rejected.

MR. SZABO (Hungary) speaking on paragraph (a), explained that his amendment was not submitted as a final text, but to affirm a certain principle directly concerned with freedom of expression.

In reply to MR. EVANS (United Kingdom), MR. SZABO (Hungary) stressed that his amendment differed from article 2 since it referred to freedom of expression exercised in the interests of the community.

The Hungarian amendment was put to the vote and rejected by 16 votes to 4 with 3 abstentions.

The text of Article 17 of the Draft Declaration on Human Rights submitted by the Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information and of the Press and referred to Committee

2. Communication received from Canada

Department of External Affairs Canada

Ottawa, April 1, 1948

Sir:

I have the honour to refer to your letter of January 9, 1948, in which was enclosed a report on the Second Session of the Commission on Human Rights, [2] and to inform you that the proposals contained in the draft International Bill of Human Rights have been closely considered by officials of the Government, and it is expected that they will be considered by a Joint Parliamentary Committee on Human Rights. A discussion of this subject by Parliament has not yet been possible, however, and the Canadian Government would not wish to express views on a matter of such importance without having had the benefit of learning the opinion of Parliament. This is especially true in view of the nature of the Canadian Constitution, and the Canadian Government, therefore, regrets that final comments on the Declaration will not be available for April 3rd.

The Canadian Government is anxious that ample opportunity be afforded to comment on the International Bill of Rights both at the meeting of the Economic and Social Council in July and at the meeting of the General Assembly in September.

It is the opinion of the Canadian Government that the final drafting of an International Bill of Rights is a serious task involving the reconciliation of differing philosophies and judicial principles. It is therefore respectfully suggested that the final expression by the United Nations of human rights and fundamental freedoms may well require much more time than is at present contemplated, and that postponement of approval of the Draft Bill from the 1948 to the 1949 Session of the General Assembly might be with advantage taken into consideration.

3. Communications Received from the Netherlands

Netherlands Delegation

April 9, 1948

With reference to your letter dated January 9, 1948, No. SOA 17/1/01, concerning the observations, suggestions and proposals which Member Governments might wish to make relating to the Draft International Declaration on Human Rights, the Draft International Covenant on Human Rights, and the Question of Implementation, contained in Annexes A, B and C of the Report of the Second Session of the Commission on Human Rights, I have the honour to submit herewith the observations of the Netherlands Government on the above Report of the Commission on Human Rights.

[3]

Observations of the Netherlands Government on the Report of the Commission on Human Rights (E/600)

The Netherlands Government have submitted the report of the Commission on Human Rights to the National Commission established in conformity with the resolution of the Economic and Social Council of 21 June 1946. Having taken cognizance of the report presented by this National Commission, the Government have the honour to present the following observations.

A. General Observations

1. The Netherlands Government welcome the work accomplished by the Commission on Human Rights. As the Netherlands representative said in the Economic and Social Council, on 5 February last, the Netherlands is keenly interested in this problem. It is the wish of the Netherlands Government that by the further study of this matter an "International Bill of Human Rights", in the sense given to this term by the Commission on Human Rights, may be attained in a near future.

Some co-ordination, however, of the various provisions proposed will be indispensable before deciding on their final form; on the whole a shorter and less detailed text might in some cases be preferable; finally it might be advisable, to leave out certain provisions (f.i. Articles 29 and 30 of the Declaration) which, because of their vague nature, can be of no use.

2. The Netherlands Government agree with the proposal of the Commission to prepare at the same time a Declaration and a Covenant, it being understood that the Declaration gives a great number of general directions, whereas the Covenant contains those provisions which in the present stage of international development will probably be acceptable to a number of States as provisions of a formal treaty. In conformity with the Commission the Government assume the Declaration having only a moral importance, to be adopted by the General Assembly, whereas the Covenant which will be a legally binding instrument will have to be ratified or accepted in a formal way by the States.

In accepting this distinction between the two instruments Her Majesty's Government feel that a further and different definition of their nature would be desirable. In the same way as the International Labour Conference uses to adopt a recommendation as an addition to a Convention, laying down in the recommendation provisions which States are not willing to accept in a binding form, it might be suggested that the Declaration on Human Rights should be considered as a supplement to the Covenant. The Netherlands Government are not in favour of such a conception: in their opinion the Declaration should cover the whole field of human rights and should therefore deal with [4] all the problems treated in the Covenant; this latter document should elaborate in a treaty-form some of the principles laid down in the Declaration. By this procedure Members of the United Nations who are not prepared to ratify the Covenant, will by their vote in the Assembly, have an opportunity to accept the contents of the Declaration as general directives. Although the Netherlands Government do not share the opinion that the drafting of the Covenant is premature so long as the text of the Declaration is not completed and the opinions of the Governments on the Declaration have not been received and considered, priority should be given to the Declaration.

As observed by the representative of France the Covenant now under discussion may be considered as a first Convention of a series of international instruments to be elaborated later on.

3. In the opinion of the Netherlands Government it is not advisable to bind the Parties to the Covenant with regard to the manner in which they will bring their national legislation in conformity with the Covenant; some Parties will have recourse to a modification of the Constitution, but it should be left to each State to decide whether or not the provisions of the Covenant should be included in the Constitution. On the other hand, it should be stated explicitly that, by ratifying the Covenant, the parties undertake to bring their national legislation in conformity with the contents of the Covenant. It goes without saying that equally all the other organs of the State which has become a Party must act accordingly; Article 2 of the Covenant which deals with this problem should be shortened and drafted in a more precise way.

4. The drafts of the Declaration and of the Covenant submitted by the Commission contain some isolated provisions with regard to discrimination as to race, sex, religion a.s.o. In the Declaration, Article 3 contains a general rule on this matter; Articles 21 and 25 repeat the terms “without discrimination” or “without distinction”; as to the Covenant, Article 20 contains a general rule. If in fact, the principles of non-discrimination could be accepted on the whole line, it would be preferable if both instruments contained one article of a general character on this point. It must, however, be admitted that such stipulations will hardly be acceptable to countries where populations of a totally different character are living together.

5. In some cases the rights granted to individuals are expressed in the form of a duty imposed on the State (f.i. Articles 21 and 23 of the Declaration). It should be remembered that the instruments to be [5] elaborated do not deal with rights and duties of States but should as a rule be confined to rights and freedoms of the individual.

6. Both the Declaration and the Covenant admit limitations of the rights and freedoms which are accorded; these limitations are of a various nature.

In Article 16, paragraph 2, persons who are not “of full age and sound mind” are excluded.

Article 16, paragraph 3 of the Covenant introduces limitations “as are prescribed by law and are necessary to protect public order and welfare, morals and the rights and freedoms of others”.

Article 17 of the Covenant dealing with the freedom of information enumerates in paragraph 3 a number of restrictions.

In Article 19 of the Declaration the right to freedom of assembly and of association is stated to be subject to the condition that this right is not inconsistent with this Declaration.

On the other hand, in some articles (Articles 2 and 33 of the Declaration, Article 22 of the Covenant) an attempt has been made to put a general limit to the human rights by stipulating that no one will have the right to aim at the destruction of the rights and freedoms prescribed in the Declaration or Covenant.

The Netherlands Government suggest that this question of limitations should be considered as a whole. Anyhow, it is essential to make clear that a human right may never be exercised in such a way as to destruct any human right of other people.

7. Finally, attention may be drawn to the safeguarding clause which is to be found in Article 4 of the Covenant, and which may imperil the success of the work of the Commission. The expression “other public emergency” seems so vague, that it might for instance include an economic crisis or other abnormal conditions in a country. If possible, the circumstances under which a Party may evade its obligations should be defined as precisely as possible. Moreover it will be necessary to state explicitly that the application of this clause will also be subject to the jurisdiction provided for in the Chapter on implementation.

Declaration

Article 1

It seems superfluous to state explicitly that the word “men” implies both men and women.

[6]

Article 3

The words “regardless of office or status” should be deleted.

Comment: The use of the word “status” in paragraph 2 probably means to prohibit a distinction by race, sex, language, etc. as mentioned in paragraph 1. The word “status”, however, may also be interpreted in a more restrictive sense as “civil status”. Such an interpretation should be excluded, because, if accepted, discrimination on the grounds mentioned in paragraph 2, would be lawful. If the words “regardless of office or status” are deleted it is made clear that paragraph 2 has in view the prohibition of the same discrimination as paragraph. 1.

Article 4

This article should read as follows: “Everyone has the right to life, to bodily integrity and to liberty of person”.

Comment: The right to “security of person” is too vague an expression. The proposed wording which is in conformity with Article 6 of the Covenant, although being somewhat more restrictive, would be preferable.

Article 7

This article deals with two different matters: one is the protection of the individual against unjust treatment, the other is a doctrine of general character. Therefore it is suggested that the article should be divided into two articles: the first to contain the first two sentences of paragraph 1 together with paragraph 3, the other consisting of the rest of the first paragraph and the second paragraph.

Article 9

This article should read as follows: “No one shall be subjected to unreasonable interference with his privacy, family, home correspondence or reputation”.

Comment: In order to enable legal exceptions to the principle of inviolability of home and correspondence, the first sentence of Article 3 proposed by the United States is to be preferred to the text as proposed by the Commission.

Article 10

It is suggested to insert in paragraph 2 after the word “individuals” the words “who are not subject to any lawful deprivation of liberty or to any outstanding obligations with regard to national service, tax liabilities or voluntarily contracted obligations binding the individual to the Government”.

[7]

Comment: An unrestricted right, to emigrate is inadvisable. The question may be raised whether a Government, in view of urgent national necessity, may not retain within the borders of the country persons exercising a special profession. Anyhow, the freedom to emigrate should not be given to persons who have undertaken special obligations to the Government which commitments have not yet been fulfilled. Finally, it goes without saying that people who are lawfully imprisoned should not be free to leave the country.

Article 11

It may be doubted whether the problem of asylum enters within the scope of the Declaration. As the Commission decided to examine this question at an early opportunity, the Netherlands Government prefer not to pronounce themselves for the moment on this article.

Article 12

It must be understood that this article does not exclude a legal provision that special categories of individuals, for instance married women, will need the authorization of other individuals when they have to appear before a Law Court.

Article 15

The first paragraph should be deleted.

Comment: It appears from the second paragraph that the object of this article is to ensure that everyone will have the right to invoke some official protection; for this purpose paragraph 1 stipulating that everyone has the right to a nationality is not necessary, and as this right is not a very clear denotation, it had better be left out.

If the suggestion of the protection of the United Nations to be given to stateless persons is accepted the question arises whether such a protection should be given by the United Nations themselves or whether it would be preferable to entrust this task to the International Refugee Organization.

Article 16

(a) Paragraph 1 should read as follows: "Every person shall have the right to freedom of thought, religion, conscience and belief, including the right, either alone or in community with other persons of like mind, to hold, adopt and manifest any religious or other belief, to practise any form of religious worship and observance and he shall not be required to perform any act which is contrary to such worship and observance."

[8]

Comment: The suggested draft which is in conformity with Article 16 of the Covenant is to be preferred to the draft proposed by the Commission.

(b) It may be asked whether the last part of this paragraph “and he shall not be required etc.” does not go too far for certain cases in which the refusal to perform such an act would be contrary to existing legislation.

(c) It is suggested to add to paragraph 2 “and to persuade other persons of the truth of his beliefs”.

Comment: The freedom of conversion should be included.

Article 20

It should be understood that the right “to petition or to communicate with the public authorities” can only be exercised in writing.

Article 22

The meaning of the words “citizen” and “national” in contradiction to a foreigner should be made clear.

Article 24

(a) The acceptance of the principle of equal pay for equal work for men and women should not exclude the system of family allowances being given to married people, although, in practice, such a system implies that different people do not get equal remuneration for equal work.

(b) The condition that women shall work with the same advantages as men should not exclude the possibility of special prohibitive laws with regard to the labour of women, such as a prohibition of night work for women only.

Article 25

The second sentence should be deleted.

Comment: Apart from the question as to whether the regulation of this matter really enters in the scope of the Declaration, the inclusion of such an obscure provision should be avoided.

Article 27

(a) The first sentence should read: “Everyone has the right to fundamental education”.

Comment: Other education than fundamental education cannot be demanded as a right.

(b) The second sentence should be deleted.

Comment: The Declaration cannot deal with the problem whether education should be free and compulsory; should the sentence be maintained, the question arises whether the gratuitous education should not be limited to those who are unable to pay.

[9]

(c) In the third sentence the words “higher education” should be replaced by “other than fundamental education”.

Comment: By this substitution instruction such as technical education will also be included. It should be understood that the term “fundamental education” means general education and not merely technical education. Perhaps the word “elementary” would be preferable to make this clear.

Article 31

The Netherlands Government reserve the right to determine their point of view with regard to the important problem of schools and language of minorities. In any case, it should be made clear that stipulations on these problems will only apply to nationals and not to foreigners.

[Comments on the Covenant and on implementation have been omitted.]

4. Communication Received from Australia

Australian Mission to the United Nations

14 April 1948

I have the honour to refer to your Note SOA-17-1-01 of 9th January 1948. I am setting out in the following paragraphs the comments of the Australian Government on the draft International Bill of Human Rights prepared by the Commission on Human Rights at its Second Session.

Draft International Declaration of Human Rights

The Australian Government considers that the Draft Declaration in the form proposed by the Second Session of the Commission is not satisfactory, and contains many provisions which would be more appropriately inserted in the Covenant. The Declaration should be an instrument of popular appeal and persuasion, and the present text should be replaced by a more concise statement of general principles. The Australian Government reserves the right to make detailed comments, both at the meeting of the Drafting Committee and the following session of the Commission, on the present text and on any other proposal there put forward.

The Government also considers that the Declaration should be incorporated as a preamble to the Covenant. It should also be promulgated as a separate instrument.

[Comments on the draft International Covenant and implementation are omitted.]

[17]

5. Communication Received from the United States

15 April 1948

The United States Representative at the Seat of the United Nations presents his compliments to the Secretary-General of the United Nations and, with reference to his note of January 9, 1948 has the honour to transmit herewith the observations, suggestions and proposals of the United States relating to the Draft International Declaration on Human Rights, and the Draft International Covenant on Human Rights contained in Annexes A and B of the Report of the Commission on Human Rights, dated December 17, 1947.

The observations with respect to implementation will be forwarded at a later date.

[18]

Observations, Suggestions and Proposals of the United States Relating to the Draft International Declaration on Human Rights, and the Draft International Covenant on Human Rights Contained in Annexes A and B of the Report of the Commission on Human Rights Dated December 17, 1947

The Government of the United States desires in the first place to indicate its awareness and appreciation of the intensive and able work which has been done on the Bill of Human Rights by the Commission, its Drafting Committee and by the Secretariat. The work that has thus far been done is of great significance, taking into account the magnitude of the task and the multiplicity of possible approaches to its accomplishment. This Government believes, however, that much needs to be done in the way of refinement of the documents so far produced in order that they may serve the purpose for which they are intended.

A basic difficulty which the Government of the United States finds with both the draft Declaration and draft Covenant is that they are too long and complex effectively to accomplish their purpose.

Declaration – General Comments

The Declaration is envisaged as properly fulfilling two functions:

1. To serve as basic standards to guide the United Nations in achieving, within the meaning of the Charter, international co-operation in promoting and encouraging respect for and observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms for all;
2. To serve as a guide and inspiration to individuals and groups, throughout the world in their efforts to promote respect for and observance of human rights.

For the achievement of the first of these purposes, a shorter and more concise declaration will be more effective than a long and detailed declaration. The Declaration is not intended to be a legislative document in any sense. The manner in which the United Nations will undertake the task of promoting and encouraging respect for and observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms remains to be determined but it will almost necessarily have to adopt as a general rule, a broad rather than a detailed approach. However, its freedom to take up matters of detail would be enhanced, rather than diminished, by a declaration in broad and comprehensive terms.

With respect to the second purpose of the Declaration, namely to serve as a focal point for the development of world public opinion, this [19] objective is largely defeated by a long and complicated instrument. The first prerequisite to such a result is a document that is set forth in as simple and readily understandable terms as possible. A spelling out of details in the Declaration itself cannot increase its usefulness for such purposes.

The United States accordingly is strongly in favour of a short and concise Declaration.

Since it is the proper purpose of the Declaration to set forth basic human rights and fundamental freedoms, as standards for the United Nations, it is inappropriate to state the rights in the Declaration in terms of governmental responsibility. In particular it is improper to state in the Declaration that certain things shall be unlawful. If such references are retained, it will be difficult to know what the purpose and meaning of the Declaration is, especially in contrast to the Covenant. The same consideration applies to some extent to assertions of governmental responsibility found in some parts of the draft Declaration. It is true that the guaranty of certain rights, such as the right to fair trial, rests exclusively in the hands of the Government. In the case of other rights, such as the right to work, the right to health and the right to social security, there are widely different theories and practices in different parts of the world as to the manner in which the Government can best facilitate the desired end.

The United States believes that the Declaration should proclaim rights, but should not attempt to define the role of government in their ultimate attainment. This role will necessarily vary from country to country. The United States not only feels that this difference is inevitable, but that the flexibility of approach which results from it is valuable, and should be preserved.

In concluding its commentary on the Declaration, the United States believes that it cannot better express its view of the nature and purpose of this document than by setting forth the following statement by Abraham Lincoln. Referring to the assertion of human equality in the United States Declaration of Independence, he said:

“They [the drafters] did not mean to assert the obvious untruth that all were then actually enjoying that equality, or yet that they were about to confer it immediately upon them. In fact, they had no power to confer such a boon. They meant simply to declare the right, so that the enforcement of it might follow as fast as circumstances should permit.

“They meant to set up a standard maxim for free society which should be familiar to all, – constantly looked to, constantly [20] laboured for and even though never perfectly attained, constantly approximated, and thereby constantly spreading and deepening its influence, and augmenting the happiness and value of life to all people, of all colours, everywhere.”<sup>66</sup>

Communication from Mexico (Ministry of Foreign Affairs)

Comments of the Mexican Government of the Draft International Declaration on Human Rights and the Draft International Covenant on Human Rights

With reference to the Report of the United Nations Economic and Social Council's Commission on Human Rights Second Session, Geneva, 2 December to 17

<sup>66</sup> Lincoln was speaking in Springfield, Illinois on 26 June 1857 about Dred Scott v. Sandford, 60 U.S. 393, decided by the United States Supreme Court earlier that year. The Court held that “the legislation and histories of the times, and the language used in the Declaration of Independence, show that neither the class of persons who had been imported as slaves nor their descendants, whether they had become free or not, were then acknowledged as a part of the people, nor intended to be included in the general words used in that memorable instrument”. In 2010 the United States Supreme Court confirmed that the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution “declares that persons may be citizens of the United States without regard to their citizenship of a particular State, and it overturns the Dred Scott decision by making all persons born within the United States and subject to its jurisdiction citizens of the United States”. McDonald v. Chicago, 561 U.S. 3025 (2010).

December 1947, document E/600, containing a “Draft International Declaration on Human Rights” (Annex A, pages 17 to 22), a “Draft International Covenant on Human Rights” (Annex B, pages 30–36) and a Report of the Working Group on Measures of Implementation (Annex C, pages 41–64), the Government of Mexico wishes to submit the following comments:

I.

Mexico has always been eager to see fundamental human rights codified in an international declaration. At the Inter-American Conference on Problems of War and Peace (Mexico, 1945) she took the initiative in this question; and the outcome was the adoption of Resolution XL by the Conference. At the San Francisco Conference she proposed the drafting of an “International Declaration on Human Rights” to be annexed to the United Nations Charter.

These earlier proposals were not simply a response to immediate circumstances, prompted by the strong reaction of world opinion to the crimes against human dignity committed by certain countries; they derived, rather, from the deep conviction that a peaceful international order necessarily presupposes a regime of liberty and respect for the rights of the human personality.

For these reasons Mexico welcomes with great interest the Draft International Declaration on Human Rights drawn up by the Commission on Human Rights, an organ of the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations.

The Mexican Government notes with real satisfaction that this Draft fully conforms to the purposes and principles of the United Nations, as declared both in the Preamble and in Articles 1, 3, 4, 55 (c), 56, 62 (2) and 68 of the Charter. The Declaration in no way conflicts with the principle of the sovereign equality of States on which the United Nations is based, nor is it inconsistent with the principle of domestic jurisdiction which, according to authoritative interpretation (UNCIO, Report of the Rapporteur of Committee II/3, document 861, II/3/55/1, pages 3–4), was recognized at the time the Charter was drafted to be the basis of human rights, and is laid down in Article 2 (7).

The Charter’s provisions on human rights correspond to one of the functions of the United Nations, namely to create (over and above the legal preventive measures and the machinery of sanctions to deal with threats to the peace or acts of aggression or war) the essential conditions of stability and wellbeing which are necessary for peaceful and friendly relations among nations. Amongst these conditions the Charter expressly mentions the economic ones and universal respect for, and observance of, human rights and fundamental freedoms.

As the Commission recognized and clearly stated at the time the Geneva drafts were being prepared, the Declaration on Human Rights imposes no legal obligation on States “and requires no measures for implementation”; it should therefore “be drafted in declaratory form only” (document E/600, page 23). The Working Group on Implementation shared this opinion of the Working Group on the Declaration, stating that “the Group ruled out completely any further consideration of the question of implementing the Declaration” (document E/600, page 44).

The Mexican Government acknowledges with satisfaction the correctness of these early statements, which are fully in accordance with its conception of an International Declaration on Human Rights.

The usefulness and importance of the Declaration are not lessened by the fact that it includes no provisions for legal sanctions. The Declaration has a real and effective value in itself; first, because it states precisely the human rights and fundamental freedoms which States Members undertook in signing the Charter of the United Nations to promote and develop, and second, because it solemnly proclaims before the whole world a standard of justice and freedom to serve as guide and encouragement to States in their own practice, and enjoying the approval of international public opinion.

But the very latitude of the Declaration serves its fundamental objectives, since the fact that it is drafted in rather broad terms and lays down a bare minimum of guarantees and rights will make it readily acceptable by almost all States. The Declaration will thus achieve a character of universality. Furthermore it must be remembered that although this Declaration imposes no precise legal obligations on Members, these in signing the Charter undertook to fulfil in good faith the principles stated therein; and these principles include the promotion and respect of human rights. The General Assembly, moreover, may discuss any questions relating to the maintenance of international peace and security brought before it by any Member of the United Nations, and may make recommendations [4] with a view to securing the human rights and fundamental freedoms of all; it may also call the attention of the Security Council “to situations which are likely to endanger international peace and security” (Article 11(3)).

The Government of Mexico therefore expresses its approval of an International Declaration on Human Rights of the above described character, considering it the most effective means of promoting these rights; and it declares its agreement with the general lines of the Draft Declaration prepared by the Commission on Human Rights at its second session in Geneva, subject to certain comments thereon, as set forth below:

Article 2: The first sentence of this Article should be amplified as follows:

“In the exercise of his rights everyone is limited by the rights of others, by the legal safeguards for the liberty, general welfare and security of all, and by the just requirements of the democratic State”.

Article 5: On grounds of justice, and for political and historical reasons, the following paragraph should be added:

“No one may be imprisoned for purely civil debts.”

Article 10: In paragraph 2 of this Article the words “temporarily or permanently” should be inserted. The paragraph would thus read as follows:

“Individuals shall have the right to leave their own country temporarily or permanently and, if they so desire, to acquire the nationality of any country willing to grant it”.

Article 13: The Government of Mexico considers that this Article fails to lay down the principle of freedom to contract marriage sufficiently broadly. It proposes that the Article be redrafted to read as follows:

“Men and women shall have the same freedom to contract marriage, and the law guarantees them that freedom without distinction as to race, nationality or religion.”

Article 16: The Mexican Government considers that this Article is incorrectly drafted in view of the provisions of Article 2; and it therefore proposes that the first part of Article 16 be redrafted as follows:

“Individual freedom of thought and conscience and freedom to hold and change beliefs are fundamental human rights.”

The Mexican Government proposes that the second paragraph of this Article be redrafted as follows:

“Every person has the right, either alone or in community with [5] other persons of like mind, to manifest his beliefs by means of worship, the observance of rites, practices and teachings in churches or other places provided for by the national law applicable.”

Article 18: This article should be redrafted as follows:

“Every person has the right to use the spoken or written word, the press, books and all visual, auditive or any other means of expression. There shall be equal access for all to all channels of communication of ideas.”

Article 22: The Mexican Government proposes that this article be redrafted as follows:

“Every person shall have equal opportunity to engage in public employment and to hold public office in the State of which he is a citizen, subject or national, except in special cases provided for in the national law.

“Access to public employment shall not be a matter of privilege or favour.”

Article 23: The first paragraph of this article would be more adequately drafted as follows:

“Everyone has the right to paid work.”

Article 28: The drafting of this article is correct, but the provisions with respect to international relations are purely negative. The Mexican Government therefore proposes the addition of the following text:

“It will use all means to promote understanding and concord amongst peoples and to develop effective support of the pacific activity of the United Nations.”<sup>67</sup>

Article 30: The following text should be added to this article:

“Everyone is likewise entitled to just protection, compatible with the progress of mankind, for his moral and material interests in any inventions or literary, scientific or artistic works of which he is author.”

Comments on the Draft International Covenant on Human Rights

Articles 1, 2, 3 and 4 of the Draft provide that States shall undertake to secure effectively in their domestic legislation the human rights stated in the Declaration. Hence, the second part of the Covenant (Articles 5 to 22), which in effect confirms and provides for implementing the Declaration on Human Rights, appears unnecessary. If States undertake to respect human rights in their domestic legislation no such confirmation would seem to be required; and as for implementation, this should preferably be left to the domestic jurisdiction of each country.

Summary Record of the Tenth Meeting [of the United Nations Conference on Freedom of Information]

Held at the Palais des Nations, Geneva, on Tuesday,
20 April 1948 at 3 p.m.

Chairman: MR. CARLOS P. ROMULO (Philippines)

...

...

MR. DAVIES (United Kingdom) stated that the proposed Articles 17 and 18 of the Draft Declaration on Human Rights and [4] the proposed Article 17 of the Draft Covenant on Human Rights were a joint product of the Commission on Human Rights, the Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information and of the Press, and of Committee IV of the present Conference, and had been thoroughly discussed in those bodies. They were therefore sound, worthy of adoption by the Conference, and should be recommended to the Commission on Human Rights. Section I contained a brief statement of fundamental universal human rights and could be accepted by all. The text contained in Section II, as was fitting for a solemn agreement binding all signatory states, was a precise legal definition of those rights and an enumeration of the duties and responsibilities attaching to them. The United Kingdom delegation had opposed a motion for a general clause for the limitation of freedom of expression, since it considered that the permissible restrictions of such freedom should be defined as narrowly as possible, if any guarantee in that regard was not to be illusory. The point of view had gained acceptance in the Commission on Human Rights, the Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information and of the Press, and in Committee IV of the present Conference. Section III recognized the fact that suitable additions to the list of restrictions might be made and provided for their presentation.<sup>69</sup>

The amendment proposed by the Soviet Union representative (Document E/CONF.6/69) was inadequate and would not improve the present text. Similarly, the amendment proposed by the Polish delegation (Document E/CONF.6/74) should be rejected, since the Article had already been discussed fully by the Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information and of the Press. The Commission on Human Rights might decide to refer the Articles to the Sub-Commission, but no explicit directions in this regard should be given by the Conference.

[5]

MR. BENTON (United States of America) supported the Article proposed for the draft Declaration of Human Rights.

...

MR. BOLDISZAR (Hungary) stated that the Hungarian Government's concern for human rights was exemplified by the laws it had passed, the treaties it had concluded, and its efforts in the international field.

The present text of the draft articles lacked any precise guarantee for the human rights championed by the Hungarian Government. The information agencies in those countries which claimed absolute freedom in this sphere were, in fact, restricted by material factors; the draft articles should contain a provision condemning this state of affairs. During consideration of the texts in Committee IV, the Hungarian delegation had submitted amendments prescribing that freedom of information should not be extended to agencies serving selfish interests or to those engaged in warmongering or in the destruction of friendly relations between peoples. Certain delegations, however, had not accepted those texts and it was to be doubted whether they sincerely accepted the relevant language of the Charter. The Hungarian delegation opposed the present text because it offered no protection against the return of fascism and no safeguard for the democratic governments which had been established in many countries. It would, however, welcome any improved wording that might be proposed.

MR. ROSCHIN (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics), convinced of the great importance of the articles under discussion, believed that they should be designed to serve the vital interests of peoples and democracies. Quoting the preamble of the Charter, line one, and Article 1 of the Charter, he pointed out that no provision prohibiting practices detrimental to the aims therein enunciated had been [7] included. It was in the vital interests of all peoples that peace should be maintained, and that measures should be taken against fascist and militaristic ideologies. . . The Soviet Union Delegation opposed the text as it stood, and recommended the amendment contained in Document E/CONF.6/69.

MR. MENCEL (Poland) considered the text of Annex B vague and inadequate.

With regard to Clause 1, the principle of freedom of information could not be stated without mentioning the principle of responsibility and physical equality.

...
[8]

...

There was nothing in the text as a whole which introduced the modern concept of collective defamation, which had developed out of the notion of individual slander.

He moved the adoption of the Polish amendment (Document E/CONF.6/74).

MR. RIBNIKAR (Yugoslavia) thought that the texts contained in Annex B were abstract and empty formulae which, instead of containing the quintessence of the deliberations of the Conferences, merely reproduced the original draft submitted to it by the Committee on Human Rights. The declaration circulated by the Yugoslav delegation at the beginning of the Conference clearly set forth the point of view held by his Government. Their main task was to adopt resolutions which would condemn and aim to prevent the dissemination of false and distorted news, and remove the dissemination of news from the power of trusts and monopolies.

...

In spite of the unanimous agreement reached with regard to war-mongering, this principle had not been inserted in the draft article. The draft article attempted to protect the dissemination of news irrespective of the degree of truth it contained and tended to ensure the domination of organizations belonging to large monopolies throughout the world. He supported the amendment submitted by the Soviet delegation.

MR. TERROU (France) agreed that their most important task was not to proclaim freedom of information but to formulate principles in respect to it. The limits to that freedom had to be closely defined, and Committee IV had done its best to cope with this difficult task.

[10]

The Polish amendment proposed to submit Annex B to the Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information. But it was not the Sub-Commission which had referred the drafting of Article 17 to the Conference. Annex B was not an abstract text. Its basis was to be found in the Declaration on Human Rights first enunciated in 1788 [sic] which he thought might be conceded to have brought about considerable changes.

...

...

MR. COOREMANS (Belgium) stated that it was not without hesitation that the Belgian delegation had decided to vote for the present text. The Belgian Constitution was clear upon this subject. Article 18 of that Constitution stated that the Press was free and that no censorship could be set up.

...

MR. WATT (Australia) supported the Draft Declaration.

...

[13]

...

On a vote being taken, the Russian amendment (Document E/CONF.6/69) was rejected by 23 votes to 6 with 3 abstentions.

...

Clause I of Annex B was adopted by 29 votes to 6, with no abstentions.

...

The Polish amendment (Document E/CONF.6/74) was rejected by 24 votes to 6, with 2 abstentions.

Communication received from Brazil

The Brazilian delegation to the United Nations presents its compliments to the Secretary-General of the United Nations and, with reference to the Secretariat's note No. SOA/17/1/01, of January 9, 1948, has the honour to transmit the enclosed comments and observations of the Brazilian Government on the draft International Declaration, the draft International Covenant and the suggestions on implementation, prepared by the Commission on Human Rights at its Second Session.

New York, April 19, 1948

[2]

Comments and Observations of the Brazilian Government on the Draft "Bill of Rights"

Draft International Declaration of Human Rights

1. The International Declaration on Human Rights should be as broad as possible. There would hardly be any point in making a declaration embodying only those principles already accepted by the States. The Declaration should constitute an ideal that the States would strive to reach, thereby fulfilling the deficiencies in their juridical organizations. It would thus become a stimulus to the progress of the legal organization of all States.

2. On the other hand, the text of the Declaration should be as concise as possible. Such conciseness, however, should not prevent an accurate definition of acknowledged rights.

3. Attention should be paid to the duties that correspond to the rights. This relation has been emphasized in juridical doctrine and in the most advanced legislations. It seems that, aside from the general reference in Article 2, it has not been always felicitously indicated in the draft Declaration.

4. In the draft there are references to duties of the State. It may be observed that such references would fit better in a specific Declaration of Rights and Duties of States than in the present one.

5. In certain instances the guarantees of the rights are presented as substantive rights. It is well known, furthermore, that guarantees are often as important as the corresponding rights, or even more so, for without guarantees such rights are void. For this reason, it would be better to replace the expression “rights and liberties”, used in the draft, by “rights and guarantees”.

Comments on the Articles of the International Draft Declaration

Article 1

It would seem that this article could be dropped as an independent provision. Only a part of it, namely the statement that all men “should act towards one another like brothers”, might be retained and incorporated into Article 2 since it involves a duty which should go along with the other duties of the individual, stated in that article. The remainder of Article 1 has a certain philosophical and mystical quality. Unfortunately, it is not exactly true that all men are endowed by nature with reason and conscience. [3]

Article 2

As mentioned in the foregoing comment, it should be added here that “all should act toward one another like brothers” – or, at least, in a fraternal spirit. The text would thus become complete, for the exercise of the rights of each one is limited not only by the rights of others but also by this duty of fraternity, which modern law recognizes in a revival of the old Roman precept: summum jus, summa injuria.<sup>70</sup>

Instead of “just requirements” it would be better to say “legal requirements”. The requirements of the State should not be motivated by a vague and subjective notion of justice, but by strict legality. The Commission on Human Rights was quite justified in adopting the form – democratic state – proposed by the representative of China.

<sup>70</sup> “The rigour or height of law, is the height of wrong.” Hob. 125; 1 Chan. Rep. 4.

The Brazilian Government is in accord with the view expressed by the representative of the United Kingdom that the State should not be regarded as “limiting” the rights of the individual. It would be preferable, however, to say that the exercise of the right is “conditioned” by the rights of others, by the legal requirements of the State and by the duty of fraternity.

Finally, it is the view of the Brazilian Government that the proper position for this article reworded as suggested in the text should be after all others dealing with individual rights. The restriction contained in Article 16, No. 3, of the Covenant, should be included in this article.

Article 3

In accord with the preceding comments, this article would become No. 1. This would be, in fact, the proper position for it in view of its text.

Article 4

In this article there should be included the restriction contained in Article 5 of the Covenant, also the amplification contained in Article 6 of the Covenant.

Article 5

Article 9 of the Covenant mentions in detail the cases in which arrest or detention may be effected. These exceptions indicate that the article under discussion should not be drafted in terms as broad as those appearing in the text submitted. It is also made, evident that it should not be said “after due process” but rather “by due process”.

Article 6

There might be added after the last word: “and in which he can be understood”. This would complete the guarantees given the accused in the matter of expression.

[4]

Article 7

No. 2 should be deleted from this article, since it involves an unacceptable derogation of the traditional precept – nullum crimen sine lege.

On the other hand, it is suggested that there might be added that no one can be compelled in any way to confess responsibility for an act or omission of which he be accused.

Article 8

No comment.

Article 9

The first part should be redrafted as follows: “Everyone shall be entitled to protection under law not only from unreasonable interference with, but also from any offence against his reputation, his privacy and his family” (additions are in italics).

It would be proper to mention freedom from threats, terror or oppression.

The inviolability of the home is subject to restrictions arising out of the necessity for repressing crime – and it should so be stated.

The inviolability of correspondence should figure in Article 17 which deals with freedom of expression.

Article 10

The statement of principle in No. 1 is followed immediately by the restriction applying thereto, while that in No. 2 is presented in absolute terms and its restriction appears in Article 11, No. 2, of the Covenant.

Reference should be made in this article to the guarantees of the alien against arbitrary expulsion, which appear in Article 12 of the Covenant.

Article 11

It is stated that asylum shall not be accorded to criminals. Exception should be made of persons accused of crimes having a merely political nature.

Article 12

Because of its broadness, the precept contained in this article should be incorporated into Article 3 of the draft, which, in accord with previous comments, would become Article 1.

Article 13

There is, perhaps, a small flaw in drafting technique in this article. It is evident, and as such it has been expressly stated in the General Comments on the Draft Declaration, No. 1, that the word “men” comprises both men and women. In this article, however, it has been used in a restrictive sense. This and No. 2 of Article 24 are the only instances of specification in the matter appearing in the Declaration. It would be preferable to use [5] here a generic expression, such as “everyone” or “every person” which appear repeatedly throughout the Declaration.

The Brazilian Government considers acceptable the additional wording proposed by the Representative of the United Kingdom, “married persons shall have the right to reside together in any country from which they cannot be lawfully excluded”, or at least the first nine words of the foregoing.

The following item, from the draft on the same subject prepared by the Inter-American Juridical Commission, should be added:

“The parents have the right of paternal power over their children during the minority of the latter and the essential obligation to maintain and support them.”

It might be possible to improve the text, to read as follows:

“Parents shall have paternal power over their minor or non-emancipated children, involving the obligation to provide them with sustenance and education.”

Article 14

It is not enough to say that “no one shall be arbitrarily deprived of his property.” It should be said also “or without prior and fair indemnity.”

Article 15

The Brazilian Government recommends the following disposition:

“No State shall deny its nationality to a person having right thereto by birth, in accord with local legislation, nor deprive of such nationality any person who may have acquired it by birth, except by motive of an act declared by law to be incompatible with subsistence of nationality.”

It would be advisable to include also the following item proposed by the Inter-American Juridical Commission in drafting a similar document:

“Every person shall be entitled to renounce his nationality, whether such nationality be native or acquired, and to adopt the nationality of another State.”

It might be convenient to add: “. . . in accordance with the laws of the latter and without detriment to prior obligations”.

Article 16

In No. 1 of this article, it would be better to say “unrestricted” instead of “absolute and sacred”.

The manifestation of beliefs, in public or in private, as mentioned in No. 2, is subject to restrictions arising out of requirements of public order and it should so be stated therein, as is done, perhaps in somewhat too broad a manner, in Article 16 of the Covenant.

[6]

Articles 17 and 18

The Brazilian Government would prefer that the text of the Declaration follow the draft text proposed by the Commission on Human Rights for Article 17 of the Covenant.

In further connection with these Articles, attention is drawn to the comments to follow, under Article No. 19.

Article 19

The principle embodied in this article is presented without the restrictions which are mentioned in Article 18 of the draft covenant. The right to establish associations is regulated by Article 19 of the Covenant. In the comments on Article 19 of the Draft Declaration, which appear in Annex A, Part II, of the Report of the 2nd Session of the Human Rights Commission, the remark is found that “it is understood that no individual or association that aims to destroy the fundamental rights and freedoms set forth in this Declaration can claim protection under this article”. It is recommended that a disposition to that effect be included both in the text of the Declaration and in that of the Covenant and extended so as to apply to associations aiming at the violent destruction of social or political order.

The right to constitute associations in the manner prescribed by law should be added to that of “participating” therein.

The constitutions and the legislation of some countries contain justifiable restrictions to the participation of aliens in certain associations. An example of such restrictions is found in the Brazilian Constitution, Articles 155 and 160. Domestic regulations of this nature should be admissible under the International Bill of Rights.

Article 20

No remarks.

Article 21

The right set forth in this article should be subject to restrictions in political capacity through legal incompetence (minority, criminality, etc.).

Article 22

No. 2 appears unnecessary in view of the comprehensiveness of No. 1.

Article 23

As pointed out by the United States representative, it would be best not to mention positive duties of the State. However, if it is decided that such mention is to be made, No. 3, which appears redundant in view of No. 2, might be worded as proposed by the representative of Byelorussia: "The State is obliged to take all necessary measures against unemployment."

[7]

The question of compulsory labour, which is clearly set forth in No. 2 and 3 of Article 8 of the Covenant, has not been taken into consideration in the article under review.

Article 24

No. 2 seems unnecessary in view of Article 3, which assures all rights and freedoms set forth in the Declaration, without distinction of sex.

Article 25

The Brazilian Government endorses the additional wording suggested by the delegate of Uruguay: "Everyone has the duty to preserve his health". Here, likewise, the observation of the United States representative as to the declaration of positive duties for the State should be taken into account.

Article 26

The remarks under Articles 24 and 25 also apply to this article.

Articles 27 and 28

No remarks.

Article 29

This article would be better placed immediately following Article 24, thus bringing together the dispositions relating to labour. This would result in the further advantage that the present Article 30 would be located immediately following Articles 27 and 28 which deal with education.

Article 30

Add: without detriment to literary, scientific and artistic property rights.

Article 31

The Brazilian Government would prefer the text proposed by the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities. It would seem advisable, however, to add that such provisions do not refer to groups formed by immigration, whether spontaneous or officially fostered, into independent States already in existence at the time of immigration.

Article 32

Besides the Charter, reference might be made to the Bill of Rights.

Article 33

No remarks.

The Brazilian Government is in agreement with the article suggested in Annex A, Part 2, No. 2 of the Report of the Commission on Human Rights:

“When a Government, group, or individual seriously or systematically tramples the fundamental human rights and freedoms, individuals and peoples have the right to resist oppression and tyranny.”

Such right to resist should be recognized, not only as against [8] oppression and tyranny, but always against illegality, and it should be manifested through adequate judicial recourse, through non-co-operation and even, in extremis, by force.

It should be made evident that the enumeration of rights in the Declaration is not exhaustive but merely exemplary and that it does not preclude the consideration of implied rights; a statement to this effect should be included in the Declaration.

Sir,

With reference to your letter SOA 17/1/101 of 9th January regarding the resolution adopted by the Commission on Human Rights on 17th December, 1947, it is regretted that it has not been possible for my Government to finalize their comments on the draft Convention and draft Declaration on Human Rights in time for submission by April 3rd. However I now enclose herewith the observations which my Government desire to offer on these two documents and it would be appreciated if these comments could be submitted to the Commission on Human Rights.

Draft Declaration on Human Rights:

Article 3, Articles 6 and 7(1) and (2), Article 7(3), Article 10, and Article 19 of the draft declaration, correspond with Articles 20, 13, 7, 11 and 18, respectively, of the Draft Convention. The Union Government have no further comment to offer on these articles of the declaration except to say in regard to the presumption referred to in Article 7 that there are many statutory qualifications of this presumption.

Article 9: This article obviously goes too far in declaring a man's home and correspondence "inviolable". That would, for instance, preclude the execution of search warrants in respect of homes, and the opening by post office officials of insufficiently addressed letters, in order to return them to the senders.

Article 11: The first part of this article appears to be in conflict with every restriction on immigration existing anywhere in the world. The second part seems to say that criminals and persons who have acted "contrary to the principles and aims of the United Nations", are not to be granted asylum from persecution. This would mean that once convicted of a crime or once having acted contrary to those principles and aims the offender forfeits his right to asylum, on whatever ground he may be persecuted. There is the further objection that the phrase "those whose acts are contrary to the principles and aims of the United Nations" is so wide and vague as to mean everything and nothing. Would this category of persons include, for instance, the members of a Government who pursued a policy which is contrary to a recommendation of the United Nations? Would the supporters of such a Government fall within the same category?

Article 12: This article introduces a further refinement of confusion into the already chaotic picture of proposed fundamental human rights. It purports to include in such rights, the right to the enjoyment of so called fundamental civil rights. This is a definition of the unknown, by what is even more unknown. What are fundamental civil rights? Are we to have another convention and another declaration to define these? Are we to delve from fundamentals to fundamentals until we have cut every root of national autonomy?

Article 13: The intention and purpose of the provision that "men and women shall have the same freedom to contract marriage in accordance with the law", are somewhat obscure. Is it the intention to say inter alia that there shall be no difference as to the respective ages at which men and women may contract marriage, that where there is an annus luctus<sup>71</sup> for a widow there must be the same annus luctus for a widower, and that where a State recognizes the right of men to contract polygamous marriages, it is bound also to recognize the right of women to contract polyandrous marriages? It may be said that the answers to these questions are to be found in the words "in accordance with the law", but if that is so, this provision becomes meaningless, because that would leave every State free to impose legal restrictions upon the freedom of women to contract marriage which are not applicable to men, and vice versa.

<sup>71</sup> Term for the year of mourning following the death of her husband during which a widow was not permitted to remarry.

Article 14: If it is the intention to say that a State may not deprive any person of all right to own property, or limit this right in such a way as to render it altogether ineffective it would be desirable to re-word the article.

Article 15: The provision that everyone has the right to a nationality seems to imply some underlying obligation on the part of a State in whose territory a stateless person may be resident, to grant that person its nationality. It may even imply that there is an obligation not to denationalize any person, where the result would be to make him a stateless person. If these are in fact the intended implications of this provision, they would require the revision of the laws relating to Union nationality, as in terms of these laws there is no legal obligation to naturalize if certain requirements are not complied with, and there is no restriction which would prevent denaturalization where the person concerned would become stateless. The provision that all persons who do not enjoy the protection of any government shall be placed under the protection of the United Nations, comes perilously near to the recognition of the United Nations as a super-state. To make this protection effective, the Organization would have to issue passports, and may have to appoint officers exercising the functions of diplomatic or consular representatives in States harbouring any considerable number of stateless persons. The United Nations would, presumably have the same status to make representations as to the treatment of such persons, as a State would have in regard to the treatment of its own nationals, and that may open another door to international pressure in internal affairs.

The last sentence of this Article corresponds with the second part of Article 11, on which we have already commented above.

Articles 17 and 18: The Sub-Committee on Freedom of Information and of the Press, have recommended an article to take the place of these articles. This article corresponds with Clause 1 of the article recommended by the Sub-Commission for inclusion in the convention. We have dealt with this latter article in our comments on Article 17 of the convention.

Article 20: The addition at the end of this Article of the words “or with the United Nations”, constitutes, in its context, a recognition of the right of individuals to petition the United Nations on whatever matter they may desire to raise. This implies a jurisdiction on the part of the United Nations, which they obviously do not possess. If the intention is to deal only with petitions relating to fundamental human rights, the matter could be best dealt with when the implementation of the convention is under consideration.

Article 21: The scope of this Article would appear to be too wide; convicts, stateless persons, aliens and in some cases, absentee voters cannot take an effective part in the government of all countries. Nor can persons who cannot comply with property and literacy or educational qualifications where such qualifications are in vogue.

Article 22: It is difficult to see how equal opportunity to engage in public employment and to hold public office can be regarded as a fundamental human right. In some countries members of the Communist Party, in others members of a fascist party, or an organization with subversive objectives are debarred from holding public office. The Union Government regard restrictions, imposed for purposes of national security and public peace as legitimate.

Article 23: The second and third clauses of this Article do not constitute human rights or freedoms, but duties of the State concerning which a separate Convention or declaration is being considered. These clauses should be deleted.

Article 24: What criterion is to be applied to determine whether the pay received is commensurate with an individual's skill in circumstances where so often the wage paid is determined by the law of supply and demand? It would be preferable to be realistic and stipulate for a "fair and reasonable" wage, all circumstances considered.

As regards reference to Trade Unions, see remarks under Article 19 of the draft Covenant.

This article further embodies the contentious principle of equal pay for men and women for equal work. Where this principle for good reasons is not universally recognized it would be preferable to leave it out, as not an acknowledged fundamental human right.

Articles 25–29: The general principles enunciated in these articles are no doubt highly commendable, but in some cases are too sweeping in their generality. Many of the provisions inserted here do not comprise fundamental human rights at all but rather the duties of States and it would be preferable to consider such duties in conjunction with the draft Convention or declaration concerning the latter subject.

General: In conclusion the Union Government would point out that some of the articles of this draft declaration do not purport expressly or by implication, to define any right or freedom at all. (See Article 1, Article 13 (except the second sentence of Clause (1)), Article 28 and Article 32). Others again, describe in general terms the duties of States, rather than the specific rights and freedoms of individuals. (See Article 23 (2) and (3), Article 25 (the last sentence of Article 26 (1)), Article 28 and Article 32). Some articles, moreover, would seem to go much beyond the scope of what could legitimately be regarded as rights and freedoms so fundamental as to call for international protection by the society of nations. Amongst these we would refer to the following:

Article 7. The right to be presumed innocent, which, however important, is no more than a question of onus of proof.

Article 10. General freedom of movement and choice of residence, and the right to leave one's own country and to acquire another nationality.

Article 15. The right to a nationality.

Article 21. The right to take part in the government.

Article 22. The right to engage in public employment.

Article 23. The right to useful work, and to claim from the State all necessary steps to prevent unemployment.

Article 24. The right to remuneration commensurate with ability and skill, to just and favourable conditions of work, and to join trade unions, and the right of women to equal pay for equal work.

Article 25. The right to the highest standard of health which the State can provide.

Article 26. The right to social security.

Article 27. Free and compulsory education.

Article 29. The right to leisure, to reasonable limitations on working hours and to periodic vacations with pay.

Article 30. Participation in the cultural life of the community, enjoyment of the arts and a share in the benefits of scientific discoveries.

[25]

In the submission of the Union Government these go beyond the elementary essential rights which are indispensable for physical and mental existence as a human being, and with which alone the United Nations are called upon to concern themselves. These articles no doubt give expression to certain ideals of advanced development, but a condition of existence does not constitute a fundamental human right merely because it is eminently desirable for the fullest realization of all human potentialities. What the Charter envisages is the protection of that minimum of rights and freedoms which the conscience of the world feels to be essential, if life is not to be made intolerable, at the whim of an unscrupulous Government. This declaration embraces very much more than that, and to the extent to which it does so, it trespasses upon matters which should be left where they belong, in the domestic sphere of the member States.

In regard to the economic rights, i.e. the right to work, and to do useful work, the right to rest and leisure, the right to remuneration commensurate with ability, the right of women to equal pay for equal work, the right to social security, etc., it will be apparent that the extent to which they can be assured will depend also upon the action taken by private employers. They cannot be effectively ensured for all without the co-operation, compulsory or otherwise, of private employers. If, therefore, they are to be taken seriously (as is intended) it would, in the submission of the Union Government be found necessary to resort to more or less totalitarian control of the economic life of the country. To declare them to be fundamental human rights, would therefore amount to an injunction by the United Nations to State members to move to the left, by assuming greater and greater economic control, an injunction, in fact, to move nearer to the communistic economic system, under which, in practice, many essential human rights are being denied.

It seems to be realized that a declaration of this nature, if passed by the Assembly, would not create legal rights and obligations. That is why, perhaps, it has been drawn with so little regard for precision and particularity, or for the true scope of fundamental rights and freedoms. But it will undoubtedly be invoked as a source of moral rights and obligations, and may therefore lead not only to intensified internal unrest and agitation, but also to repeated embarrassment and agitation before the United Nations and their various organs. It is of the greatest importance, therefore, that it should not be passed in a form so completely unacceptable.

Copy of a Resolution on Religious Freedom Adopted by the Foreign Mission Committee of the Church of Scotland on 17 February 1948***

“9845. Resolution on Religious Freedom. The Secretary submitted a draft Article on the subject of Religious Liberty and the Sub-Committee agreed to approve this draft for consideration by the Foreign Mission Committee. It was proposed that an Article along these lines should be sent in the name of the Foreign Mission Committee to the United Nations Commission on Human Rights.

“The Foreign Mission Committee of the Church of Scotland has heard with appreciation of the efforts of the United Nations Commission on Human Rights to secure agreement to a Declaration and Covenant which will embody the essentials of human rights for all men. We beg to draw your attention to the fact that the question of religious liberty is bound up with the general question of human rights and that, where it is threatened or denied, freedom of speech and assembly, the rights of minorities, the family, and the status of women are soon endangered. By religious liberty we mean not only freedom of conscience and belief, but freedom to change one’s beliefs, to express religious beliefs in corporate worship and observance, and to form associations which can hold property according to law without discrimination on the grounds of religion. We are [illegible] that every person should be free, provided he does not infringe the freedom of other citizens, to persuade others of the truth of his beliefs and, in the case of a minor, that the parent or guardian should be entitled to decide what religious teaching he or she shall receive. We would point out that, in the conditions of this modern world, religious freedom involves freedom for a religious community to maintain schools for its own members or to provide religious teaching for its own children within the State educational system.

“We urge that, provided it is open to members of other faiths to take advantage of a conscience clause, the schools of a religious community should be free to follow their own curriculum, subject to the normal government requirements as to health, administration and efficiency, and that they should not be obliged to provide teaching in any religion other than their own.

“The Foreign Mission Committee, on behalf of the Church of Scotland, assures the United Nations Commission that these matters are all of vital importance in the areas where it works, and that in no case can the concern for human rights in general be fully implemented without regard to the religious convictions of individuals and associations as represented in this Article.

“Approved for sending to the United Nations Commission on Human Rights.”

Opinion of the United Nations Conference on Freedom of Information on Articles 17 and 18 of the Draft International Declaration on Human Rights and Article 17 of the Draft International Covenant on Human Rights

Note by the Secretary-General

The Commission on Human Rights at its Second Session decided to refer Articles 17 and 18 of the Draft International Declaration on Human Rights and Article 17 of the Draft International Covenant on Human Rights to the Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information and of the Press for its consideration and report, and to request the Economic and Social Council to refer these Articles to the Conference on Freedom of Information for its own consideration and report (document E/600, paragraph 33).

The Economic and Social Council by its resolution 118 (VI) decided:

- A. To remit Articles 17 and 18 of the Draft International Declaration on Human Rights (document E/600, Annex A) to the United Nations Conference on Freedom of Information for its consideration and report.
- B. To request the Conference to express its view upon the two texts on Freedom of Information submitted for inclusion in the International Covenant on Human Rights by the Drafting Committee on the International Bill of Human Rights and the Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information and of the Press.

In compliance with this request the United Nations Conference on Freedom of Information considered these articles and passed the following resolution: (Final Act E/CONF.6/79, Annex B):

[2]

Draft Declaration and Draft Covenant on Human Rights

The United Nations Conference on Freedom of Information,

Having considered the resolution of the Economic and Social Council of 3 March 1948 referring to the Conference for its consideration and report Articles 17 and 18 of the Draft Declaration on Human Rights and Article 17 of the Draft Covenant on Human Rights with the recommendations of the Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information and of the Press,

Is of the opinion that:

I. Articles 17 and 18 of the Declaration may be embodied in one Article as follows:

Everyone shall have the right to freedom of thought and expression; this right shall include freedom to hold opinions without interference and to seek, receive and impart information and ideas by any means and regardless of frontiers.

II. Article 17 of the Draft Covenant on Human Rights may be as follows:

1. Every person shall have the right to freedom of thought and the right to freedom of expression without interference by governmental action; these rights shall include freedom to hold opinions, to seek, receive and impart information and ideas, regardless of frontiers, either orally, by written or printed matter, in the form of art, or by legally operated visual or auditory devices.
2. The right to freedom of expression carries with it duties and responsibilities and may, therefore, be subject to penalties, liabilities or restrictions clearly defined by law, but only with regard to:
  - (a) matters which must remain secret in the interests of national safety;
  - (b) expressions which incite persons to alter by violence the system of Government;
  - (c) expressions which directly incite persons to commit criminal acts;
  - (d) expressions which are obscene;
  - (e) expressions injurious to the fair conduct of legal proceedings;
  - (f) infringements of literary or artistic rights;
  - (g) expressions about other persons natural or legal which defame their reputations or are otherwise injurious to them without benefiting the public;

[3]

- (h) the systematic diffusion of deliberately false or distorted reports which undermine friendly relations between peoples and states;

A state may establish on reasonable terms a right of reply or a similar corrective remedy.

3. Measures shall be taken to promote the freedom of information through the elimination of political, economic, technical or other obstacles which are likely to hinder the free flow of information.
4. Nothing in this Article shall be deemed to affect the right of any State to control the entry of persons into its territory or the period of their residence therein.

III. The Conference having considered the above Articles of the Declaration and the Covenant, and the Second Report of the Sub-Commission,

Is of the opinion that Article 17 of the Covenant is intended to apply to the freedom of expression of individuals as well as to the freedom of media of information and, considering there are particular provisions in many sources of law which restrict the freedom of expression and information other than those permitted by Draft Article 17 suggested above,

Resolves, that the problem created by the omission of such provisions be called to the attention of the Commission on Human Rights.

Comments from Governments on the Draft International Declaration on Human Rights, Draft International Covenant on Human Rights and the Question of Implementation

Communication Received from Norway

With reference to your letter SOA 17/1/01 of 19 January 1948 concerning the Draft Articles for an International Declaration on Human Rights and Draft Articles for an International Covenant on Human Rights, I have the honour to submit the following observations from my government:

With regard to Article 9 in the Draft International Declaration, my government should like to suggest a limitation by adding the following: "except in cases prescribed by law and after due process". Furthermore, my government understands that it has been agreed, that the Declaration imposes no legal obligations.

As to Article 9, 2(a) in the Draft International Covenant, the provisions to arrest a person to prevent his committing a crime, might be open to objections on principle. As to Article 9, 2(b), it seems advisable to extend these measures to include also persons suffering from contagious diseases (confer Norwegian law of 12 December 1947 on measures against venereal diseases, article 8). In this connection I should also like to draw your attention to the fact that in Norway alcoholics may be subject to detention according to a Norwegian law of May 26, 1939, article 7.

Regarding Article 13, 2, it is presumed that this provision does not exclude punishment in those cases especially provided for by law, where fines may be imposed by the police.

Comments from Governments on the Draft International Declaration on Human Rights, International Covenant on Human Rights and the Question of Implementation

Communication Received from Egypt

Cairo, 21 April 1948

Memorandum

The Royal Ministry of Foreign Affairs presents its compliments to the Secretary-General of the United Nations and has the honour to inform him, with reference to his letter No. SOA 17/I/01/JH of 9 January 1948, that the Royal Government approves in principle of the draft International Declaration on Human Rights and the draft International Covenant on Human Rights. It would nevertheless make the following observations on these two drafts and on the question of implementation:

A. Observations on the Draft Declaration

1. The Draft Declaration, which contains virtually a complete enumeration of all possible human rights, would be improved by making it more concise.

2. With regard to Article 10(2), the Royal Government would point out that some legislations make it obligatory for nationals wishing to acquire foreign nationality to obtain the prior authorization of their own Governments. It is understood that this formality does not conflict with the provisions of the aforesaid Article.

3. The freedoms and rights enumerated in Articles 16, 17, 18 and 19 are not in the Draft Declaration made subject to any restrictions, whereas in the Draft Covenant on Human Rights they are subject to restrictions. The Royal Government considers that, unless both drafts are put into effect simultaneously, the freedoms and rights enumerated in the above-mentioned Articles should be made subject to the same restrictions as in the Covenant.

4. The duty incumbent on the State under the provisions of Article 23 [2] is a positive one; all that can be required of the State is that it should do everything possible to organize its domestic economy in such a way as to give all persons ordinarily resident in its territory an opportunity for useful work.

5. The Royal Government proposes that the following paragraphs be added at the end of Article 26:

“It is understood that the rights enumerated in Articles 23, 24, 25 and 26 can only be exercised so far as the economic conditions and potentialities of each State permit”.

6. With regard to Article 31, which deals with the problem of minorities, and on which no decision was taken by the Commission, the Royal Government considers that such an article is out of place in a declaration on human rights, the object of such a declaration being to enumerate the rights of man and not those of minorities. Minority rights should be covered by a convention on minorities. It is to be hoped, moreover, that when the International Declaration on Human Rights is put into effect by States and men are given equal treatment everywhere the problem of minorities will disappear.

[Comments on the Covenant and on implementation are omitted.]

Collation of the Comments of Governments on the Draft International Declaration on Human Rights, Draft International Covenant on Human Rights and the Question of implementation

(Note by the Secretary-General)

The present document has been prepared by the Secretariat in order to facilitate the work of the Commission on Human Rights and its Drafting Committee in considering the comments from Governments on the Draft International Declaration on Human Rights, Draft International Covenant on Human Rights and the question of implementation. It reproduces the replies from Governments received by the Secretariat by 30 April 1948 arranged according to subjects. Replies from the following Governments are collated in the order as they were received: Canada, Netherlands, Australia, United States, Mexico, Brazil, United Kingdom, Union of South Africa, Egypt and Norway.

[2]

I. General Observations on the Work of the Commission on Human Rights and its Importance

1. Canada

It is the opinion of the Canadian Government that the final drafting of an International Bill of Rights is a serious task involving the reconciliation of differing philosophies and judicial principles. It is therefore respectfully suggested that the final expression by the United Nations of human rights and fundamental freedoms may well require much more time than is at present contemplated, and that postponement of approval of the Draft Bill from the 1948 to the 1949 Session of the General Assembly might be with advantage taken into consideration.

2. Netherlands

1. The Netherlands Government welcome the work accomplished by the Commission on Human Rights. As the Netherlands representative said in the Economic and Social Council, on 5 February last, the Netherlands is keenly interested in this problem. It is the wish of the Netherlands Government that by the further study of this matter an "International Bill of Human Rights", in the sense given to this term by the Commission on Human Rights, may be attained in a near future.

Some co-ordination, however, of the various provisions proposed will be indispensable before deciding on their final form; on the whole, a shorter, and less detailed text might in some cases be preferable; finally it might be advisable to leave out certain provisions (f.i. Articles 29 and 30 of the Declaration) which, because of their vague nature, can be of no use.

2. The Netherlands Government agree with the proposal of the Commission to prepare at the same time a Declaration and a Covenant, it being understood that the Declaration gives a great number of general directions, whereas the Covenant contains those provisions which in the present stage of international development will probably be acceptable to a number of States as provisions of a formal treaty. In conformity with the Commission the Government assume the Declaration having only a moral importance, to be adopted by the General Assembly, whereas the Covenant which will be a legally binding instrument will have to be ratified or accepted in a formal way by the States.

In accepting this distinction between the two instruments Her Majesty's Government feel that a further and different definition of their nature would be desirable. In the same way as the International Labour Conference uses to adopt a recommendation as an addition to a Convention, laying down in the recommendation provisions which States are not willing to accept in a binding form, it might be suggested that the Declaration on Human Rights should be [3] considered as a supplement to the Representative of the Netherlands Government are not in favour of such a conception. In their opinion, the Declaration should cover the whole field of human rights and should therefore deal with all the problems treated in the Covenant; this latter draft should elaborate in a treaty form some of the principles laid down in the Declaration. By this procedure Members of the United Nations who are not prepared to ratify the Covenant will by their vote in the Assembly have an opportunity to accept the contents of the Declaration as general directives. Although the Netherlands Government do not share the opinion that the drafting of the Covenant is premature so long as the text of the Declaration is not completed and the opinions of the Governments on the Declaration have not been received and considered priority should be given to the Declaration.

As observed by the representative of France the Covenant now under discussion may be considered as a first Convention of a series of international instruments to be elaborated later on.

3. In the opinion of the Netherlands Government it is not advisable to bind the Parties to the Covenant with regard to the manner in which they will bring their national legislation in conformity with the Covenant; some Parties will have recourse to a modification of the Constitution but it should be left to each State to decide whether or not the provisions of the Covenant should be included in the Constitution. On the other hand, it should be stated explicitly that by gratifying the Covenant; the Parties undertake to bring their national legislation in conformity with the contents of the Covenant. It goes without saying that equally all the other organs of the State which has become a Party must act accordingly; Article 2 of the Covenant which deals with this problem should be shortened and drafted in a more precise way.

4. The drafts of the Declaration and of the Covenant submitted by the Commission, contain some isolated provisions with regard to discrimination, as to race, sex, religion, a.s.o. In the Declaration, Article 3 contains a general rule on this matter, Articles 21 and 25 repeat the terms “without discrimination” or “without distinction” as to the Covenant; Article 20 contains a general rule. If, in fact, the principles of non-discrimination could be accepted on the whole line, it would be preferable if both instruments contained one article of a general character on this point. It must, however, be admitted that such stipulations will hardly be acceptable to countries where populations of a totally different character are living together.

5. In some cases the rights granted to individuals are expressed in the form of a duty imposed on the State (f.i. Articles 21 and 23 of the Declaration). It should be remembered that the instruments to be elaborated do not deal with rights and duties of States but should as a rule be confined to rights and freedoms of the individual.

6. Both the Declaration and the Covenant, admit limitations of the rights and freedoms which are accorded; these limitations are of a various nature. In Article 167 paragraph 2, persons who are not “of full age and sound mind” are excluded.

Article 16, paragraph 3 of the Covenant introduces limitations “as are prescribed by law and are necessary to protect public order and welfare, morals and the rights and freedoms of others”.

Article 17 of the Covenant dealing with the freedom of information enumerates in paragraph 3 a number of restrictions.

In Article 19 of the Declaration the right to freedom of assembly and of association is stated to be subject to the condition that this right is “not inconsistent with this Declaration.”

On the other hand, in some articles (Articles 2 and 33 of the Declaration, Article 22 of the Covenant) an attempt has been made to put a general limit to the human rights by stipulating that no one will have the right to aim at the destruction of the rights and freedoms prescribed in the Declaration or Covenant.

The Netherlands Government suggest that this question of limitations should be considered as a whole. Anyhow, it is essential to make clear that a human right may never be exercised in such a way as to destruct any human right of other people.

7. Finally attention may be drawn to the safeguarding clause which is to be found in Article 4 of the Covenant, and which may imperil the success of the work of the Commission. The expression “other public emergency” seems so vague, that it might for instance include an economic crisis or other abnormal conditions in a country; if possible, the circumstances under which a Party may evade its obligations should be defined as precisely as possible. Moreover it will be necessary to state explicitly that the application of this clause will also be subject to the jurisdiction provided for in the Chapter on implementation.

3. United States

The Government of the United States desires in the first place to indicate its awareness and appreciation of the intensive and able work which has been done on the Bill of Human Rights by the Commission, its Drafting Committee and by the Secretariat. The work that has thus far [5] been done is of great significance taking into account the magnitude of the task and the multiplicity of possible approaches to its accomplishment. This Government believes, however, that much needs to be done in the way of refinement of the documents so far produced in order that they may serve the purpose for which they are intended.

A basic difficulty which the Government of the United States finds with both the draft Declaration and draft Covenant is that they are too long and complex effectively to accomplish their purpose.

[6]

II. Draft International Declaration on Human Rights

A. General Comments on the Declaration

1. Netherlands

(See above under i; General Observations)

2. Australia

The Australian Government considers that the Draft Declaration in the form proposed by the Second Session of the Commission is not satisfactory, and, contains many provisions which would be more appropriately inserted in the Covenant. The Declaration should be an instrument of popular appeal and persuasion, and the present text should be replaced by a more concise statement of general principles.

The Australian Government reserves the right to make detailed comments, both at the meeting of the Drafting Committee and the following session of the Commission, on the present text and on any other proposal there put forward.

The Government also considers that the Declaration should be incorporated as a preamble to the Covenant. It should also be promulgated as a separate instrument.

3. United States

The Declaration is envisaged as properly fulfilling two functions:

1. To serve as basic standards to guide the United Nations in achieving, within the meaning of the Charter, International co-operation in promoting and encouraging respect for and observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms for all;
2. To serve as a guide and inspiration to individuals and groups throughout the world in their efforts to promote respect for and observance of human rights.

For the achievement of the first of these purposes, a shorter and more concise declaration will be more effective than a long and detailed declaration. The Declaration is not intended to be a legislative document in any sense. The manner in which the United Nations will undertake the task of promoting and encouraging respect for and observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms remains to be determined but it will almost necessarily have to adopt as a general rule, a broad rather than a detailed approach. However, its freedom to take up matters of detail would be enhanced, rather than diminished, by a declaration in broad and comprehensive terms.

With respect to the second purpose of the Declaration, namely to serve as a focal point for the development of world public opinion, this objective is largely defeated by a long and complicated instrument. The first prerequisite to such a result is a document that is set forth in [7] as simple and readily understandable terms as possible. A spelling out of details in the declaration itself cannot increase its usefulness for such purposes.

The United States accordingly is strongly in favour of a short and concise Declaration.

Since it is the proper purpose of the Declaration to set forth basic human rights and fundamental freedoms, as standards for the United Nations, it is inappropriate to state the rights in the Declaration in terms of governmental responsibility. In particular it is improper to state in the Declaration that certain things shall be unlawful. If such references are retained, it will be difficult to know what the purpose and meaning of the Declaration is, especially in contrast to the Covenant. The same consideration applies to some extent to assertions of governmental responsibility found in some parts of the draft Declaration. It is true that the guaranty of certain rights, such as the right to fair trial, rests exclusively in the hands of the Government. In the case of other rights, such as the right to work, the right to health and the right to social security, there are widely, different theories and practices in different parts of the world as to the manner in which the Government can best facilitate the desired end.

The United States believes that the Declaration should proclaim rights, but should not attempt to define the role of government in their ultimate attainments. This role will necessarily vary from country to country. The United States not only feels that this difference is inevitable, but that the flexibility of approach which results from it, is valuable and should be preserved.

In concluding its commentary on the Declaration the United States believes that it cannot better express its view of the nature and purpose of this document than by setting forth the following statement by Abraham Lincoln. Referring to the assertion of human equality in the United States Declaration of Independence, he said:

“They [the drafters] did not mean to assert the obvious untruth that all were then actually enjoying that equality, or yet that they were about to confer it immediately upon them. In fact, they had no power to confer such a boon. They meant simply to declare the right, so that the enforcement of it might follow as fast as circumstances should permit.

“They meant to set up a standard maxim for free society, which should be familiar to all, constantly looked to, constantly laboured for, and even though never perfectly attained, [8] constantly approximated, and thereby constantly spreading and deepening its influence, and augmenting the happiness and value of life to all people, of all colours, everywhere.”

4. Mexico

Mexico has always been eager to see fundamental human rights codified in an international declaration. At the Inter-American Conference on Problems of War and Peace (Mexico, 1945) she took the initiative in this question; and the outcome was the adoption of Resolution XL by the Conference. At the San Francisco Conference she proposed the drafting of an “International Declaration on Human Rights” to be annexed to the United Nations Charter.

These earlier proposals were not simply a response to immediate circumstances, prompted by the strong reaction of world opinion to the crimes against human dignity committed by certain countries; they derived, rather, from the deep conviction that a peaceful international order necessarily presupposes a regime of liberty and respect for the rights of the human personality.

For these reasons Mexico welcomes with great interest the Draft International Declaration on Human Rights drawn up by the Commission on Human Rights, an organ of the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations.

The Mexican Government notes with real satisfaction that this Draft fully conforms to the purposes and principles of the United Nations Charter, as declared both in the Preamble and in Articles 1, 3, 4, 55(c), 56, 62(2) and 68 of the Charter. The Declaration in no way conflicts with the principle of the sovereign equality of States on which the United Nations is based, nor is it inconsistent with the principle of domestic jurisdiction which, according to authoritative interpretation (UNCIO, Report of the Rapporteur of Committee II/3, document 861, II/3/55/1, pages 3–4) was recognized at the time the Charter was drafted to be the basis of human rights, and is laid down in Article 2(7).

The Charter’s provisions on human rights correspond to one of the functions of the United Nations, namely to create (over and above the legal preventive measures and the machinery of sanctions to deal with threats to the peace or acts of aggression or war) the essential conditions of stability and wellbeing which are necessary for peaceful and friendly relations among nations. Amongst these conditions the Charter expressly mentions the economic ones and universal respect for, and observance of, human rights and fundamental freedoms.

As the Commission recognized and clearly stated, at the time the Geneva drafts were being prepared, the Declaration on Human Rights [9] imposes no legal obligation on States and requires no measures for implementation; it should therefore “be drafted in declaratory form only” (document E/600, page 23). The Working Group on implementation shared this opinion of the Working Group on the Declaration, stating that “the Group ruled out completely any further consideration of the question of implementing the Declaration” (document E/600, page 44).

The Mexican Government acknowledges with satisfaction the correctness of these early statements, which are fully in accordance with its conception of an International Declaration on Human Rights.

The usefulness and importance of the Declaration are not lessened by the fact that it includes no provisions for legal sanctions. The Declaration has a real and effective value in itself; first, because it states precisely the human rights and fundamental freedoms which States Members undertook, in signing the Charter of the United Nations to promote and develop, and second, because it solemnly proclaims before the whole world a standard of justice and freedom to serve as guide and encouragement to States in their own practice, and enjoying the approval of international public opinion.

But the very latitude of the Declaration serves its fundamental objectives, since the fact that it is drafted in rather broad terms, and lays down a bare minimum of guarantees and rights will make it readily acceptable by almost all States. The Declaration will thus achieve a character of universality. Furthermore it must be remembered that although this Declaration imposes no precise legal obligations on Members, these in signing the Charter undertook to fulfil in good faith the principles stated therein; and these principles include the promotion and respect of human rights. The General Assembly, moreover, may discuss any questions relating to the maintenance of international peace and security brought before it by any Member of the United Nations and may make recommendations with a view to securing the human rights, and fundamental freedoms of all; it may also call the attention of the Security Council "to situations which are likely to endanger international peace and security" (Article 11(3)).

The Government of Mexico therefore expresses its approval of an International Declaration on Human Rights of the above described character considering it the most effective means of promoting these rights and it declares its agreement with the general lines of the Draft Declaration, prepared by the Commission on Human Rights at its second session in Geneva, subject to certain comments thereon.

5. *Brazil

1. The International Declaration on Human Rights should be as broad as possible. There would hardly be any point in making a declaration [10] embodying only those principles already accepted by the States. The Declaration should constitute an ideal that the States would strive to reach, thereby fulfilling the deficiencies in their juridical organizations. It would thus become a stimulus to the progress of the legal organization of all States.
2. On the other hand, the text of the Declaration should be as concise as possible. Such conciseness, however, should not prevent an accurate definition of acknowledged rights.
3. Attention should be paid to the duties that correspond to the rights. This relation has been emphasized in juridical doctrine and in the most advanced legislations. It seems that, aside from the general reference in Article 2, it has not been always felicitously indicated in the draft Declaration.
4. In the draft there are references to duties of the State. It may be observed that such references would fit better in a specific Declaration of Rights and Duties of States than in the present one.

5. In certain instances the guarantees of the rights are presented as substantive rights. It is well known, furthermore, that guarantees are often as important as the corresponding rights, or even more so, for without guarantees such rights are void. For this reason, it would be better to replace the expression “rights and liberties”, used in the draft, by “rights and guarantees”.

Special Comment

The Brazilian Government favours the inclusion, in the International Bill of Rights, of Articles 5, 6 and 7, proposed by the United Kingdom and mentioned in the Report of the Commission, Annex C, Part 2, No. 4.

6. Union of South Africa

Draft Declaration on Human Rights

Article 3, Articles 6 and 7(1) and (2), Article 7(3), Article 10, and Article 19 of the draft declaration, correspond with Articles 20, 13, 7, 11 and 18, respectively, of the Draft Convention. The Union Government have no further comment to offer on these articles of the declaration except to say in regard to the presumption referred to in Article 7 that there are many statutory qualifications of this presumption.

Articles 25–29: The general principles enunciated in these articles are no doubt highly commendable, but in some cases are too sweeping in their generality. Many of the provisions inserted here do not comprise fundamental human rights at all but rather the duties of States and it would be preferable to consider such duties in conjunction with the draft Convention or declaration concerning the latter subject. [11]

General: in conclusion the Union Government would point out that some of the articles of this draft declaration do not purport expressly or by implication, to define any right or freedom at all. (See Article 1, 13 (except the second sentence of Clause (1)), Article 28 and Article 32). Others again, describe in general terms the duties of States, rather than the specific rights and freedoms of individuals (See Articles 23 (e) and (3), Article 25 (the last sentence of Article 26(1)), Article 28 and Article 32). Some articles, moreover, would seem to go much beyond the scope of what could legitimately be regarded as rights and freedoms so fundamental as to call for international protection by the society of nations. Amongst these we would refer to the following:

Article 7. The right to be presumed innocent, which, however important, is no more than a question of onus of proof.

Article 10. General freedom of movement and choice of residence, and the right to leave one's own country and to acquire another nationality.

Article 15. The right to a nationality.

Article 21. The right to take part in the government.

Article 22. The right to engage in public employment.

Article 23. The right to useful work and to claim from the State all necessary steps to prevent unemployment.

Article 24. The right to remuneration commensurate with ability and skill, to just and favourable conditions of work and to join trade unions and the right of women to equal pay for equal work.

Article 25. The right to the highest standard of health which the State can provide.

Article 26. The right to social security.

Article 27. Free and compulsory education.

Article 29. The right to leisure, to reasonable limitations on working hours and to periodic vacations with pay.

Article 30. Participation in the cultural life of the community, enjoyment of the arts and a share in the benefits of scientific discoveries.

In the submission of the Union Government these go beyond the elementary essential rights which are indivisible for physical and mental existence, as a human being, and with which alone the United Nations are called upon to concern themselves. These articles no doubt give expression to certain ideals of advanced development, but a condition of existence does not constitute a fundamental human right merely because it is eminently desirable for the fullest realization of all human potentialities. What the Charter [12] envisages is the protection of that minimum of rights and freedoms which the conscience of the world feels to be essential, if life is not to be made intolerable, at the whim of an unscrupulous Government. This declaration embraces very much more than that, and to the extent to which it does so, it trespasses upon matters which should be left where they belong, in the domestic sphere of the member States.

In regard to the economic rights, i.e. the right to work, and to do useful work, the right to rest and leisure, the right to remuneration commensurate with ability, the right of women to equal pay for equal work, the right to social security, etc., it will be apparent that the extent to which they can be assured will depend also upon the action taken by private employers. They cannot be effectively ensured for all without the co-operation, compulsory or otherwise, of private employers. If, therefore, they are to be taken seriously (as is intended) it would, in the submission of the Union Government be found necessary to resort to more or less totalitarian control of the economic life of the country. To declare them to be fundamental human rights, would therefore amount to an injunction by the United Nations to State members to move to the left, by assuming greater and greater economic control, an injunction, in fact, to move nearer to the communistic economic system, under which, in practice, many essential human rights are being denied.

It seems to be realized that a declaration of this nature, if passed by the Assembly, would not create legal rights and obligations. That is why, perhaps, it has been drawn with so little regard for precision and particularity, or for the true scope of fundamental rights and freedoms. But it will undoubtedly be invoked as a source of moral rights and obligations, and may therefore lead not only to intensified internal unrest and agitation, but also to repeated embarrassment and agitation before the United Nations and their various organs. It is of the greatest importance, therefore, that it should not be passed in a form so completely unacceptable.

7. Egypt

The Royal Government approves in principle of the draft International Declaration on Human Rights and the draft International Covenant on Human Rights. It would nevertheless make the following observations on these two drafts and on the question of implementation:

The Draft Declaration, which contains virtually a complete enumeration of all possible human rights, would be improved by making it more concise.

[13]

The freedoms and rights enumerated in Articles 16, 17, 18 and 19 are not in the Draft Declaration made subject to any distinctions, whereas in the Draft Covenant on Human Rights they are subject to restrictions. The Royal Government considers that, unless both drafts are put into effect simultaneously, the freedoms and rights enumerated in the above mentioned Articles should be made subject to the same restrictions as in the Covenant.

[14]

B. Comments on the Articles of the Draft International Declaration on Human Rights

Article 1

All men are born free and equal in dignity and rights. They are endowed by nature with reason and conscience, and should act towards one another like brothers.

1. Netherlands

It seems superfluous to state explicitly that the word “men” implies both men and women.

2. Brazil

It would seem that this article could be dropped as an independent provision. Only a part of it, namely the statement that all men “should act towards one another like brothers”, might be retained and incorporated into Article 2 since it involves a duty which should go along with the other duties of the individual, stated in that article. The remainder of Article 1 has a certain philosophical and mystical quality. Unfortunately, it is not exactly true that all men are endowed by nature with reason and conscience.

Article 2

In the exercise of his rights everyone is limited by the rights of others and by the just requirements of the democratic State. The individual owes duties to society through which he is enabled to develop his spirit, mind and body in wider freedom.

1. Mexico

The first sentence of this Article should be amplified as follows:

In the exercise of his rights everyone is limited by the rights of others, by the legal safeguards for the liberty, general welfare and security of all, and by the just requirements of the democratic State.

2. Brazil

It should be added here that “all should act toward one another like brothers” or, at least, in a fraternal spirit. The text would thus become complete, for the exercise of the rights of each one is limited not only by the rights of others but also by this duty of fraternity, which modern law recognizes in a revival of the old Roman precept summum jus, summa injuria.

Instead of “just requirements” it would be better to say “legal requirements”. The requirements of the State should not be motivated by a vague and subjective notion of justice, but by strict legality. The Commission on Human Rights was quite justified in adopting the form – democratic state – proposed by the representative of China.

The Brazilian Government is in accord with the view expressed by the representative of the United Kingdom that the State should not be regarded as “limiting” the rights of the individual. It would be preferable, however, to say that the exercise of these rights is “conditioned” by the rights of others, by the legal requirements of the State and by the duty of fraternity.

Finally, it is the view of the Brazilian Government that the proper position for this article reworded as suggested in the text should be after all others dealing with individual rights. The restriction contained in Article 16, No. 3, of the Covenant, should be included in this article.

[16]

Article 3

1. Everyone is entitled to all the rights and freedoms set forth in this Declaration without distinction of any kind such as race (which includes colour), sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, property status, or national or social origin.

2. All are equal before the law regardless of office or status and entitled to equal protection of the law against any arbitrary discrimination, or against any incitement to such discrimination, in violation of this Declaration.

1. Netherlands:

The words “regardless of office or status” should be deleted.

Comment: The use of the word “status” in paragraph 2 probably means to prohibit a distinction by race, sex, language, etc. as mentioned in paragraph 1. The word “status”, moreover, may also be interpreted in a more restrictive sense as “civil status”. Such an interpretation should be excluded, because, if accepted, discrimination on the grounds mentioned in paragraph 2, would be lawful. If the words “regardless of office or status” are deleted it is made clear that paragraph 2 has in view the prohibition of the same discrimination as paragraph 1.

2. Brazil

In accord with the preceding comments, of the Brazilian Government on Articles 1 and 2, this article would become No. 11. This would be, in fact, the proper position for it, in view of its text.

[17]

Article 4

Everyone has the right to life, liberty and security of person.

1. Netherlands

This article should read as follows: “Everyone has the right to life, to bodily integrity and to liberty of person”.

Comment: The right to “security of person” is too vague an expression. The proposed wording which is in conformity with Article 6 of the Covenant, although, being somewhat more restrictive, would be preferable.

2. Brazil

In this article there should be included the restriction contained in Article 5 of the Covenant, also the amplification contained in Article 6 of the Covenant.

[18]

Article 5

No one shall be deprived of his personal liberty or kept in custody except in cases prescribed by law and after process. Everyone placed under arrest or detention shall have the right to immediate judicial determination of the legality of any detention to which he may be subject and to trial within a reasonable time or to release.

1. Mexico

On grounds of justice, and for political and historical reasons, the following paragraph should be added:

“No one may be imprisoned for purely civil debts”.

2. Brazil

Article 9 of the Covenant mentions in detail the cases in which arrest or detention may be effected. These exceptions indicate that the article under discussion should not be drafted in terms as broad as those appearing in the text submitted. It is also made evident that it should not be said “after due process” but rather “by due process”.

[19]

Article 6

Everyone shall have access to independent and impartial tribunals in the determination of any criminal charge against him, and of his rights and obligations. He shall be entitled to a fair hearing of his case and to have the aid of a qualified representative of his own choice, and if he appears in person to have the procedure explained to him in a manner in which he can understand it and to use a language which he can speak.

1. Brazil

There might be added, after the last word: “and in which he can be understood”. This would complete the guarantees given the accused in the matter of expression.

[20]

Article 7

1. Any person is presumed to be innocent until proved guilty. No one shall be convicted or punished for crime or other offence except after fair public trial at which he has been given all guarantees necessary for his defence. No person shall be held guilty of any offence on account of any act or omission which did not constitute such an offence at the time when it was committed, nor shall he be liable to any greater punishment than that prescribed for such offence by the law in force at the time when the offence was committed.

2. Nothing in this Article shall prejudice the trial and punishment of any person for the commission of any act which, at the time it was committed, was criminal according to the general principles of law recognized by civilized nations.

3. No one shall be subjected to torture, or to cruel or inhuman punishment or indignity.

1. Netherlands

This article deals with two different matters: one is the protection of the individual against unjust treatment, the other is a doctrine of general character. Therefore it is suggested that the article should be divided into two articles: the first to contain the first two sentences of paragraph 1 together with paragraph 3, the other consisting of the rest of the first paragraph and the second paragraph.

2. Brazil

No. 2 should be deleted from this article, since it involves an unacceptable derogation of the traditional precept nullum crimen sine lege. On the other hand, it is suggested that there might be added that no one can be compelled in any way to confess responsibility for an act or omission of which he be accused.

[21]

Article 8

Slavery, in all its forms, being inconsistent with the dignity of man shall be prohibited by law.

No comments received.

[22]

Article 9

Everyone shall be entitled to protection under law from unreasonable interference with his reputation, his privacy and his family. His home and correspondence shall be inviolable.

1. Netherlands

This article should read as follows: “No one shall be subjected to unreasonable interference with his privacy, family, home correspondence or reputation”.

Comment: In order to enable legal exceptions to the principle of inviolability of home and correspondence, the first sentence of Article 3 proposed by the United States is to be preferred to the text as proposed by the Commission.

2. Brazil

The first part should be redrafted as follows: “Everyone shall be entitled to protection under law not only from unreasonable interference with, but also from any offence against his reputation, his privacy and his family” (additions are underlined).

It would be proper to mention freedom from threats, terror or oppression. The inviolability of the home is subject to restrictions arising out of the necessity for repressing crime and it should so be stated. The inviolability of correspondence should figure in Article 17 which deals with freedom of expression.

3. Union of South Africa

This article obviously goes too far in declaring a man's home and correspondence "inviolable". That would, for instance, preclude the execution of search warrants in respect of homes, and the opening by post office officials of insufficiently addressed letters, in order to return them to the senders.

4. Norway

The Norwegian government should like to suggest a limitation by adding the following: "except in cases prescribed by law and after due process". Furthermore, my government understands that it has been agreed, that the Declaration imposes no legal obligations.

[23]

Article 10

1. Subject to any general law not contrary to the purposes and principles of the United Nations Charter and adopted for specific reasons of security or in general interest, there shall be liberty of movement and free choice of residence within the border of each State.

2. Individuals shall have the right to leave their own country and, if they so desire, to acquire the nationality of any country willing to grant it.

1. Netherlands

It is suggested to insert in paragraph 2 after the word "individuals" the words "who are not subject to any lawful deprivation of liberty or to any outstanding obligations with regard to national service, tax liabilities or . . . voluntarily contracted obligations binding the individual to the Government".

Comment: An unrestricted right to emigrate is inadvisable, the question may be raised whether a Government, in view of urgent national necessity, may not retain within the borders of the country persons exercising a special profession. Anyhow, the freedom to emigrate should not be given to persons who have undertaken special obligations to the Government which commitments have not yet been fulfilled. Finally, it goes without saying that people who are lawfully imprisoned should not be free to leave the country.

2. Mexico

In paragraph 2 of this Article the words "temporarily or permanently" should be inserted. The paragraph would thus read as follows:

"Individuals shall have the right to leave their own country temporarily or permanently and, if they so desire, to acquire the nationality of any country willing to grant it".

3. Brazil

The statement of principle in No. 1 is followed immediately by the restriction applying thereto, while that in No. 2 is presented in absolute terms and its restriction appears in Article 11, No. 2, of the Covenant.

Reference should be made in this article to the guarantees of the alien against arbitrary expulsion, which appear in Article 12 of the Covenant.

4. Egypt

With regard to Article 10(2), the Royal Government would point out that some legislations make it obligatory for nationals wishing to acquire foreign nationality to obtain the prior authorization of their own Governments. It is understood that this formality does not conflict with the provisions of the aforesaid Article.

[24]

Article 11

Everyone shall have the right to seek and be granted asylum from persecution. This right will not be accorded to criminals nor to those whose acts are contrary to the principles and aims of the United Nations.

1. Netherlands

It may be doubted whether the problem of asylum enters within the scope of the Declaration. As the Commission decided to examine this question at an early opportunity, the Netherlands Government prefer not to pronounce themselves for the moment on this article.

2. Brazil

It is stated that asylum shall not be accorded to criminals. Exception should be made of persons accused of crimes having a merely political nature.

3. Union of South Africa

Article 11: The first part of this article appears to be in conflict with every restriction on immigration existing anywhere in the world. The second part seems to say that criminals and persons who have acted “contrary to the principles and aims of the United Nations”, are not to be granted asylum from persecution. This would mean that once convicted of a crime or once having acted contrary to those principles and aims the offender forfeits his right to asylum, on whatever ground he may be persecuted. There is the further objection that the phrase “those acts are contrary to the principles and aims of the United Nations” is so wide and vague as to mean everything and nothing. Would this category of persons include, for instance, the members of a Government who pursued a policy which is contrary to a recommendation of the United Nations? Would the supporters of such a Government fall within the same category?

[25]

Article 12

Everyone has the right everywhere in the world to recognition as a person before the law and to the enjoyment of fundamental civil rights.

1. *Netherlands

It must be understood that this article does not exclude a legal provision that special categories of individuals, for instance married women, will need the authorization of other individuals when they have to appear before a Law Court.

2. *Brazil

Because of its broadness the precept contained in this article should be incorporated into Article 3 of the draft, which in accord with previous comments, would become Article 1.

3. *Union of South Africa

Article 12: This article introduces a further refinement of confusion into the already chaotic picture of proposed fundamental human rights. It purports to include in such rights, the right to the enjoyment of so called fundamental civil rights. This is a definition of the unknown by what is even more unknown. What are fundamental civil rights? Are we to have another convention and another declaration to define these? Are we to delve from fundamentals to fundamentals until we have cut every root of national autonomy?

[26]

Article 13

1. The family deriving from marriage is the natural and fundamental unit of society. Men and women shall have the same freedom to contract marriage, in accordance with the law.

2. Marriage and the family shall be protected by the State and Society.

1. *Mexico

The Government of Mexico considers that this article fails to lay down the principle of freedom to contract marriage sufficiently broadly. It proposes that the article be redrafted to read as follows:

“Men and women shall have the same freedom to contract marriage, and the law guarantees them that freedom without distinction as to race, nationality or religion.”

2. Brazil

There is, perhaps, a small flaw in drafting technique in this article. It is evident, and as such it has been expressly stated in the General Comments on the Draft Declaration, No. 1, that the word “men” comprises both men and women. In this article, however, it has been used in a restrictive sense. This and No. 2 of Article 24 are the only instances of specification in the matter appearing in the Declaration. It would be preferable to use here a generic expression, such as “everyone” or “every person” which appear repeatedly throughout the Declaration.

The Brazilian Government considers acceptable the additional wording proposed by the representative of the United Kingdom, “married persons shall have the right to reside together in any country from which they cannot be lawfully excluded”, or at least the first nine words of the foregoing.

The following item, from the draft on the same subject prepared by the inter-American Juridical Commission, should be added:

“The parents have the right of paternal power over their children during the minority of the latter and the essential obligation to maintain and support them.”

It might be possible to improve the text, to read as follows:

“Parents shall have paternal power over their minor or non-emancipated children, involving the obligation to provide them with sustenance and education.”

3. Union of South Africa

Article 13: The intention and purpose of the provision that “men and women shall have the same freedom to contract marriage in accordance with the law” are somewhat obscure. Is it the intention to say inter alia that there shall be no difference as to the respective ages at which men and women may contract marriage, that where there is an annus luctus for [27] a widow there must be the same annus luctus for a widower, and that where a State recognizes the right of men to contract polygamous marriages, it is bound also to recognize the right of women to contract polyandrous marriages? It may be said that the answers to these questions are to be found in the words in accordance with the law, but if that is so, this provision becomes meaningless, because that would leave every State free to impose legal restrictions upon the freedom of women to contract marriage which are not applicable to men, and vice versa.

[28]

Article 14

1. Everyone has the right to own property in conformity with the laws of the State in which such property is located.

2. No one shall be arbitrarily deprived of his property.

1. Brazil

It is not enough to say that no one shall be arbitrarily deprived of his property. It should be said also “or without prior and fair indemnity”.

2. Union of South Africa

Article 14: if it is the intention to say that a State may not deprive any person of all right to own property, or limit this right in such as to render it altogether ineffective it would be desirable to re-word the article.

[29]

Article 15

Everyone has the right to a nationality.

All persons who do not enjoy the protection of any government shall be placed under the protection of the United Nations. This protection shall not be accorded to criminals nor to those whose acts are contrary to the principles and aims of the United Nations.

1. Netherlands

The first paragraph should be deleted.

Comment: It appears from the second paragraph that the object of this article is to ensure that everyone will have the right to invoke some official protection; for this purpose paragraph 1 stipulating that everyone has the right to a nationality is not necessary and as this right is not a very clear denotation, it had better be left out if the suggestion of the protection of the United Nations to be given to stateless persons is accepted. The question arises whether such a protection should be given by the United Nations themselves or whether it would be preferable to entrust this task to the International Refugee Organization.

2. Brazil

The Brazilian Government recommends the following disposition:

“No State shall deny its nationality to a person having right thereto by birth, in accord with local legislation, nor deprive of such nationality any person who may have acquired it by birth, except by motive of an act declared by law to be incompatible with subsistence of nationality.”

It would be advisable to include also the following item proposed by the Inter-American Juridical Commission in drafting a similar document:

“Every person shall be entitled to renounce his nationality, whether such nationality be native or acquired, and to adopt the nationality of another State.”

It might be convenient to add “. . . in accordance with the laws of the latter and without detriment to prior obligations”.

3. Union of South Africa

Article 15: The provision that everyone has the right to a nationality seems to imply some underlying obligation on the part of a State in whose territory a stateless person may be resident, to grant that person its nationality. It may even imply that there is an obligation not to denationalize any person, where the result would be to make him a stateless person. If these are in fact the intended implications of this provision, [30] they would require the revision of the laws relating to Union nationality, as in terms of these laws there is no legal obligation to naturalize if certain requirements are not complied with and there is no restriction which would prevent denaturalization where the person concerned would become stateless. The provision that all persons who do not enjoy the protection of any government shall be placed under the protection of the United Nations, comes perilously near to the recognition of the United Nations as a super-state. To make this protection effective, the Organization would have to issue passports, and may have to appoint officers exercising the functions of diplomatic or consular representatives in States harbouring any considerable number of stateless persons. The United Nations would, presumably have the same status to make representations as to the treatment of such persons, as a State would have in regard to the treatment of its own nationals, and that may open another door to international pressure in internal affairs. The last sentence of this article corresponds with the second part of article 11, on which we have already commented above.

[31]

Article 16

1. Individual freedom of thought and conscience, to hold and change beliefs is an absolute and sacred right.

2. Every person has the right, either alone or in community with other persons of like mind and in public or private to manifest his beliefs in worship, observance, teaching and practice.

1. Netherlands

(a) Paragraph 1 should read as follows: “Every person shall have the right to freedom of thought, religion, conscience and belief, including the right, either alone or in community with other persons of like mind, to hold, adopt and manifest any religious or other belief, to practise any form of religious worship and observance and he shall not be required to perform any act which is contrary to such worship and observance.”

Comment: The suggested draft which is in conformity with Article 16 of the Covenant is to be preferred to the draft proposed by the Commission.

- (b) it may be asked whether the last part of this paragraph “and he shall not be required etc.” does not go too far for certain cases in which the refusal to perform such an act would be contrary to existing legislation.
- (c) it is suggested to add to paragraph 2 “and to persuade other persons of the truth of his beliefs”.

Comment: The freedom of conversion should be included.

2. Mexico

The Mexican Government considers that this article is incorrectly drafted in view of the provisions of Article 2, and it therefore proposes that the first part of Article 16 be redrafted as follows:

“Individual freedom of thought and conscience and freedom to hold and change beliefs are fundamental human rights.”

The Mexican Government proposes that the second paragraph of this article be redrafted as follows:

“Every person has the right, either alone or in community with other persons of like mind, to manifest his beliefs by means of worship, the observance of rites, practices and teachings in churches or other places provided for by the national law applicable.”

3. Brazil

In No. 1 of this article, it would be better to say “unrestricted” instead of “absolute and sacred”.

[32]

The manifestation of beliefs, in public or in private, as mentioned in No. 2, is subject to restrictions arising out of requirements of public order and it should so be stated therein, as is done, perhaps in somewhat, too broad a manner, in Article 16 of the Covenant.

[33]

(Article 17)

(1. Everyone is free to express and impart opinions, or to receive and seek information and the opinion of others from sources wherever situated.)

(2. No person may be interfered with on account of his opinions.)

(Concerning Articles 17 and 18 the Commission on Human Rights decided not to elaborate a final text until it had before it the views of the Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information and of the Press and of the United Nations Conference on Freedom of Information).

1. Brazil

The Brazilian Government would prefer that the text of the Declaration follow the draft text proposed by the Commission on Human Rights for Article 17 of the Covenant.

In further connection with these articles, attention is drawn to the comments to follow, under Article No. 19.

2. Union of South Africa

Articles 17 and 18: The Sub-Committee on Freedom of Information and of the Press, have recommended article to take the place of these articles. This article corresponds with Clause 1 of the article recommended by the Sub-Commission for inclusion in the convention. We have dealt with this latter article in our comments on Article 17 of the convention.

The Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information and of the Press at its second session decided to recommend to the Commission on Human Rights the following article, which embodies Articles 17 and 18 of the Draft Declaration (document E/CN.4/80, page 4):

“Everyone shall have the right to freedom of thought and expression; this shall include freedom to hold opinions without interference, and to seek, receive and impart information and ideas by any means and regardless of frontiers.”

The United Nations Conference on Freedom of Information adopted the following opinion on Articles 17 and 18 (Final Act, E/CONF.6/79, Annex B):

Articles 17 and 18 of the Declaration may be embodied in one Article as follows:

“Everyone shall have the right to freedom of thought and expression; this right shall include freedom to hold opinions without interference and to seek, receive and impart information and ideas by any means and regardless of frontiers.”

[34]

(Article 18)

(There shall be freedom of expression either by word, in writing, in the press, in books or by visual, auditive or other means. There shall be equal access to all channels of communication).

(Concerning Articles 17 and 18, the Commission decided not to elaborate a final text until it had before it the views of the Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information and of the Press and of the International Conference on Freedom of Information.)

1. Mexico

This article should be redrafted as follows:

“Every person has the right to use the spoken or written word, the press, books and all visual, auditive or any other means of expression. There shall be equal access for all to all channels of communication of ideas.”

2. Brazil

The Brazilian Government would prefer that the text of the Declaration follow the draft text proposed by the Commission on Human Rights for Article 17 of the Covenant.

In further connection with these articles, attention is drawn to the comments to follow, under Article No. 19.

The Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information and the United Nations Conference on Freedom of Information decided to recommend to the Commission on Human Rights that Articles 17 and 18 should be embodied into one article, the proposed texts of which are quoted under the preceding Article.

Article 19

Everyone has the right to freedom of peaceful assembly and to participate in local, national and international associations for purposes of a political, economic, religious, social, cultural, trade union or any other character, not inconsistent with this Declaration.

1. Brazil

The principle embodied in this article is presented without the restrictions which are mentioned in Article 18 of the draft covenant. The right to establish associations is regulated by Article 19 of the Covenant. In the comments on Article 19 of the Draft Declaration, which appear in Annex A, Part II, of the Report of the 2nd Session of the Human Rights Commission, the remark is found that it is understood that no individual or association that aims to destroy the fundamental rights and freedoms set forth in this Declaration can claim protection under this article. It is recommended that a disposition to that effect be included both in the text of the Declaration and in that of the Covenant and extended so as to apply to associations aiming at the violent destruction of social or political order.

The right to constitute associations in the manner prescribed by law should be added to that of “participating” therein.

The constitutions and the legislation of some countries contain justifiable restrictions to the participation of aliens in certain associations. An example of such restrictions is found in the Brazilian Constitution, Articles 155 and 160. Domestic regulations of this nature should be admissible under the International Bill of Rights. [36]

Article 20

Everyone has the right, either individually or in association with others, to petition or to communicate with the public authorities of the State of which he is a national or in which he resides, or with the United Nations.

1. Netherlands

It should be understood that the right to petition or to communicate with the public authorities can only be exercised in writing.

2. Union of South Africa

Article 20: The addition at the end of this article of the words “or with the United Nations”, constitutes, in its context, a recognition of the right of individuals to petition the United Nations on whatever matter they may desire to raise. This implies a jurisdiction on the part of the United Nations, which they obviously do not possess. If the intention is to deal only with petitions relating to fundamental human rights, the matter could be best dealt with when the implementation of the convention is under consideration.

Article 21

Everyone without discrimination has the right to take an effective part in the Government of his country. The State shall conform to the will of the people as manifested by elections which shall be periodic, free, fair and by secret ballot.

1. Brazil

The right set forth in this article should be subject to restrictions in political capacity through legal incompetence (minority, criminality, etc.).

2. Union of South Africa

Article 21: The scope of this article would appear to be too wide; convicts, stateless persons, aliens and in some cases, absentee voters, cannot take an effective part in the government of all countries. Nor can persons who cannot comply with property and literacy or educational qualifications where such qualifications are in vogue.

[38]

Article 22

1. Everyone shall, have equal opportunity to engage in public employment and to hold public office in the State of which he is a citizen or a national.

2. Access to public employment shall not be a matter of privilege or favour.

1. Netherlands

The meaning of the words “citizen” and “national” in contradiction to a foreigner should be made clear.

2. Mexico

The Mexican Government proposes that this article be redrafted as follows:

“Every person shall have equal opportunity to engage in public employment, and to hold public office in the State of which he is a citizen, subject or national, except in special cases provided for in the national law.

“Access to public employment shall not be a matter of privilege or favour.”

3. Brazil

No. 2 appears unnecessary in view of the comprehensiveness of No. 1.

4. Union of South Africa

Article 22: it is difficult to see how equal opportunity to engage in public employment and hold public office can be regarded as a fundamental human right. In some countries members of the Communist Party, in other members of a fascist party, or an organization with subversive objectives are debarred from holding public office. The Union Government regard restrictions, imposed for purposes of national security and public peace as legitimate.

[39]

Article 23

1. Everyone has the right to work.

2. The State has a duty to take such measures as may be within its power to ensure that all persons ordinarily resident in its territory have an opportunity for useful work.

3. The State is bound to take necessary steps to prevent unemployment.

1. Mexico

The first paragraph of this article would be more adequately drafted as follows:

“Everyone has the right to paid work.”

2. Brazil

As pointed out by the United States representative, it would be best not to mention positive duties of the State. However, if it is decided that such mention is to be made. No. 3, which appears redundant in view of No. 2, might be worded as proposed by the representative of Byelorussia: “The State is obliged to take all necessary measures against unemployment.”

The question of compulsory labour, which is clearly set forth in Nos. 2 and 3 of Article 8 of the Covenant, has not been taken into consideration in the article under review.

3. Union of South Africa

Article 23: The second and third clauses of this article do not constitute human rights or freedoms, but duties of the State concerning which a separate Convention or declaration is being considered. These clauses should be deleted.

4. Egypt

The duty incumbent on the State under the provisions of Article 23 is a positive one; all that can be required of the State is that it should do everything possible to organize its domestic economy in such a way as to give all persons ordinarily resident in its territory an opportunity for useful work.

[40]

Article 24

1. Everyone has the right to receive pay commensurate with his ability and skill, to work under just and favourable conditions and to join trade unions for the protection of his interests, in securing a decent standard of living for himself and his family.

2. Women shall work with the same advantages as men and receive equal pay for equal work.

1. Netherlands

(a) The acceptance of the principle of equal pay for equal work for men and women should not exclude the system of family allowances being given to married people, although, in practice, such a system implies that different people do not get equal remuneration for equal work.

- (b) The condition that women shall work with the same advantages as men should not exclude the possibility of special prohibitive laws with regard to the labour of women, such as a prohibition of night work for women only.

2. Brazil

No. 2 seems unnecessary in view of Article 3, which assures all rights and freedoms set forth in the Declaration, without distinction of sex.

3. Union of South Africa

Article 24: What criterion is to be applied to determine whether the pay received is commensurate with an individual's skill, in circumstances where so often the wage paid is determined by the law of supply and demand? It would be preferable to be realistic and stipulate for a "fair and reasonable" wage, all circumstances considered.

As regards reference to Trade Unions, see remarks under Article 19 of the draft Covenant. This article further embodies the contentious principle of equal pay for men and women for equal work. Where this principle for good reasons is not universally recognized it would be preferable to leave it out, as not an acknowledged fundamental human right.

Article 25

Everyone without distinction as to economic and social conditions has the right to the preservation of his health through the highest standard of food, clothing, housing and medical care which the resources of the State or community can provide. The responsibility of the State and community for the health and safety of its people can be fulfilled only by provision of adequate health and social measures.

1. Netherlands

The second sentence should be deleted.

Comment: Apart from the question as to whether the regulation of this matter really enters in the scope of the Declaration, the inclusion of such an obscure provision should be avoided.

2. Brazil

The Brazilian Government endorses the additional wording suggested by the delegate of Uruguay: "Everyone has the duty to preserve his health".

Here, likewise, the observation of the United States representative as to the declaration of positive duties for the State should be taken into account.

[42]

Article 26

1. Everyone has the right to social security. The State has a duty to maintain or ensure the maintenance of comprehensive measures for the security of the individual against the consequence of unemployment, disability, old age and all other loss of livelihood for reasons beyond his control.

2. Motherhood shall be granted special care and assistance. Children are similarly entitled to special care and assistance.

1. Brazil

The remarks of the Brazilian Government to Articles 24 and 25 also apply to this article.

2. Egypt

The Royal Government proposes that the following paragraphs be added at the end of Article 26:

“It is understood that the rights enumerated in Articles 23, 24, 25 and 26 can only be exercised so far as the economic conditions and potentialities of each State permit.”

[43]

Article 27

Everyone has the right to education. Fundamental education shall be free and compulsory and there shall be equal access for higher education as can be provided by the State or community on the basis of merit and without distinction as to race, sex, language, religion, social standing, financial means or political affiliation.

1. Netherlands

(a) The first sentence should read: “Everyone has the right to fundamental education”.

Comment: Other education than fundamental education cannot be demanded as a right.

(b) The second sentence should be deleted.

Comment: The Declaration cannot deal with the problem whether education should be free and compulsory; should the sentence be maintained, the question arises whether the gratuitous education should not be limited to those who are unable to pay.

- (c) in the third sentence the words “higher education” should be replaced by “other than fundamental education”.

Comment: By this substitution instruction such as technical education will also be included. It should be understood that the term “fundamental education” means general education and not merely technical education. Perhaps the word “elementary” would be preferable to make this clear.

[44]

Article 28

Education will be directed to the full physical, intellectual, moral and spiritual development of the human personality, to the strengthening of respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms and to the combating of the spirit of intolerance and hatred against other nations or racial or religious groups everywhere.

1. Mexico

The drafting of this article is correct, but the provisions with respect to international relations are purely negative. The Mexican Government therefore proposes the addition of the following text:

“It will use all means to promote understanding and concord amongst peoples and to develop effective support of the pacific activity of the United Nations.”

[45]

Article 29

1. Everyone has the right to rest and leisure.
2. Rest and leisure should be ensured to everyone by laws or contracts providing in particular for reasonable limitations on working hours and for periodic vacations with pay.

1. Brazil

This article would be better placed immediately following Article 24, thus bringing together the dispositions relating to labour. This would result in the further advantage that the present Article 30 would be located immediately following Articles 27 and 28 which deal with education.

[46]

Article 30

Everyone has the right to participate in the cultural life of the community, to enjoy the arts and to share in the benefits that result from scientific discoveries.

1. Mexico

The following text should be added to this article:

“Everyone is likewise entitled to just protection, compatible with the progress of mankind, for his moral and material interests in any inventions or literary, scientific or artistic works of which he is author.”

2. Brazil

Add: without detriment to literacy, scientific and artistic property rights.

[47]

(Article 31)

(The Commission did not take a decision on the two texts below. They are reproduced here for further consideration)

(Text proposed by the Drafting Committee:)

(In States inhabited by a substantial number of persons of a race, language or religion other than those of the majority of the population, persons belonging to such ethnic, linguistic or religious minorities shall have the right, as far as compatible with public order, to establish and maintain schools and cultural or religious institutions, and to use their own language in the press, in public assembly and before the courts and other authorities of the State.)

(Text proposed by the Sub-Commission on the Prevention of Discrimination and the Protection of Minorities:)

(In States inhabited by well-defined ethnic, linguistic or religious groups which are clearly distinguished from the rest of the population, and which want to be accorded differential treatment, persons belonging to such groups shall have the right, as far as is compatible with public order and security, to establish and maintain their schools and cultural or religious institutions, and to use their own language and script in the press, in public assembly and before the courts and other authorities of the State, if they so choose.)

1. Netherlands

The Netherlands Government reserve the right to determine their point of view with regard to the important problem of schools and language of minorities. In any case, it should be made clear that stipulations on these problems will only apply to nationals and not to foreigners.

2. Brazil

The Brazilian Government would prefer the text proposed by the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities.

It would seem advisable, however, to add that such provisions do not refer to groups formed by immigration, whether spontaneous or officially fostered, into independent States already in existence at the time of immigration.

3. Egypt

With regard to Article 31, which deals with the problem of minorities, and on which no decision was taken by the Commission, the Royal Government considers that such an article is out of place in a declaration on human rights, the object of such a declaration being to enumerate the rights of man and not those of minorities. Minority rights should be covered by a convention on minorities. It is to be hoped, moreover, that when the International Declaration on Human Rights is put into effect by States and men are given equal treatment everywhere the problem of minorities will disappear.

[48]

Article 32

All laws in any State shall be in conformity with the purposes and principles of the United Nations as embodied in the Charter, insofar as they deal with human rights.

1. Brazil

Besides the Charter, reference might be made to the Bill of Rights.

[49]

Article 33

Nothing in this Declaration shall be considered to recognize the right of any State or person to engage in any activity aimed to the destruction of any of the rights and freedoms prescribed herein.

1. Brazil

No remarks.

The Brazilian Government is in agreement with the article suggested in Annex A, Part 2, No. 2 of the Report of the Commission on Human Rights:

“When a Government, group, or individual seriously or systematically tramples the fundamental human rights and freedoms, individuals and peoples have the right to resist oppression and tyranny.”

Such right to resist should be recognized, not only as against oppression and tyranny, but always against illegality, and it should be manifested through adequate judicial recourse, through non-co-operation and even in extremis, by force.

It should be made evident that the enumeration of rights in the Declaration is not exhaustive but merely exemplary and that it does not preclude the consideration of implied rights; a statement to this effect should be included in the Declaration.

[50]

III. Draft International Covenant on Human Rights<sup>73</sup>

A. General Comments on the Covenant

...

2. Australia

The Australian Government considers that the Covenant should be more comprehensive, and include more provisions for the implementation of the general principles of the Declaration. In particular the Covenant does not at present give definitive effect to the principles contained in the Draft Declaration in its present form in Articles 1, 9, 11, 13, 14, 15, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 29, 30, 32 and additional articles of the Covenant should be included accordingly. The Australian Government reserves the right to propose appropriate additional articles, and also to make comments on matters of detail in the Covenant as a whole.

3. The United States

The United States is of the opinion that brevity and conciseness are at least as important in the Covenant as in the Declaration.

...

[52]

...

4. Mexico

Articles 1, 2, 3 and 4 of the Draft provide that States shall undertake to secure effectively in their domestic legislation the human rights stated in the <sup>73</sup> The parts of the document concerning the International Covenant that make reference to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights are included.

Declaration. Hence, the second part of the Covenant (Articles 5 to 22), which in effect confirms and provides for implementing the Declaration on Human Rights, appears unnecessary. If States undertake to respect human rights in their domestic legislation no such confirmation would seem to be required; and as for implementation, this should preferably be left to the domestic jurisdiction of each country.

Article II

Every person has the right to freedom of conscience and belief, to freedom of assembly and of association, and to freedom of information, speech and expression.

Article III

Every person has the right to a decent living, to work and leisure, to health, education, economic and social security.

Article IV

Every person has the right to take part in the affairs of his government directly or through his representatives.

Article V

Every person has the right to equal protection under law.

Article VI

Every person has the right to seek asylum from persecution.

Article VII

No person shall be subjected to unreasonable interference with his privacy, family, home, correspondence or reputation.

Article VIII

No person shall be subjected to arbitrary arrest or detention.

Article IX

No person shall be held in slavery or involuntary servitude or be subjected to torture or to cruel or inhuman punishment or indignity.

Article X

Every person is entitled to the human rights and fundamental freedoms set forth in this declaration without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion. The exercise of these rights requires recognition of the rights of others and the just requirements of the community in which he resides.

Summary Record of the Twentieth Meeting [of the Drafting Committee, Second Session]

Lake Success, New York,
Monday, 3 May 1948 at 3.15 p.m.

Present: Mr. Heywood<sup>74</sup> (Australia); Mr. Santa Cruz (Chile); Dr. Wu (China); Mr. Ordonneau (France); Mr. Malik (Lebanon); Mr. Fearnley (United Kingdom); Mrs. Roosevelt (United States of America); Mr. Pavlov (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics). Specialized Agencies: Mr. René Lebar (UNESCO). Non-Governmental Organizations: Miss Toni Sender (American Federation of Labor). Secretariat: Dr. E. Schwelb; Mr. John Male.

1. Opening of the Meeting and Adoption of the Provisional Agenda

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) opened the meeting and welcomed the members of the Committee. She urged that the Committee proceed with its work as quickly as possible, enumerated the items of the Draft Provisional Agenda, and asked for comments from members.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) considered that with reference to Item 4 of the Draft Provisional Agenda, it would be more correct to hold a general debate on the basic questions concerning the Draft Declaration on Human Rights, the Draft Covenant on Human Rights and the Measures of Implementation than to discuss the drafts prepared by the [2] Commission on Human Rights article by article. He pointed out that it was in this way that work on the Charter of the United Nations was carried on. He would be in a position, if Item 4 of the agenda were changed, to submit a draft outline of a Draft Covenant on Human Rights.

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) understood the delegate of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics to mean that if this new method of discussion were adopted, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics would be ready to submit a draft document of a Covenant on Human Rights. Considering this, she felt that the Committee should first adopt the Provisional Agenda. After adoption of the agenda, <sup>74</sup> The name of the Australian representative on the Drafting Committee is spelled inconsistently (Heywood and Heyward) in the summary records. In the final report of the Committee, it is spelled Heyward.

the Committee could proceed, when Item 4 was under consideration, to a discussion of the method proposed by the delegate of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) stated that approval of the agenda did not place the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics under an obligation to discuss article by article the provisions listed under Item 4. He felt that it would be more correct to word this item "to provide for a general discussion of the basic questions of the Declaration which could be the basis for fundamental provisions and which could be the foundation of the Draft International Declaration on Human Rights, and the Draft Covenant on Human Rights".

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) pointed out that since much work had already been done with regard to the Declaration and Covenant and since some Governments had already submitted their comments, she felt that in this last stage of the work, it would be difficult to ignore the documents that had been prepared. She was under the impression that the reason the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics had not submitted comments was that the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics wanted to change the whole approach to the problem.

According to the Economic and Social Council resolution, the observations, suggestions and proposals of Governments were to be used as a basis for re-drafting, which might include preparation of a Draft Declaration, a Draft Covenant and Measures for Implementation. The task of the Drafting Committee, therefore, would be to produce documents on all three points, unless the question of Measures of Implementation were to be incorporated into the Covenant, in which case only two documents would be required. Ideally the Committee should base its new text on the comments on Governments accepting what was found to be valuable and rejecting what was disapproved by the Committee. She declared that little would be gained by a discussion of general principles, since this was not the time for theoretical conjecture. [3]

The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, however, had suggested that the Committee proceed to a discussion of general principles. She considered that this would be contrary to the procedure envisaged by the Economic and Social Council and that the question should be postponed, in any case, until after the election of officers.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) stated the task of the Drafting Committee was quite clearly defined in the terms of reference established by the Economic and Social Council and the Commission on Human Rights. He pointed out that in the Fourth Session of the Economic and Social Council, it had been decided to establish the Drafting Committee of the Commission on Human Rights with a view to preliminary consideration of the problem, after which the Commission on Human Rights, at its Second Session, would prepare a draft document. This would be submitted to Governments for comment, after which it would be the task of the Drafting Committee to re-draft the document for submission to the Third Session of the Commission, which would refer the completed document to the Economic and Social Council.

The task, therefore, of the Drafting Committee was to revise the document already prepared by the Second Session of the Commission, on the basis of comments of governments. The Committee could, of course, discuss general principles under Item 4 of the Provisional Agenda and he felt that comments received from the Governments would provide a good field for such discussion. Should any member of the Committee decide to propose a new draft, this procedure would be entirely acceptable.

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) stated that full opportunity will be given to the delegate of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics to present his views when Item 4 of the Provisional Agenda was being discussed.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) felt that the problem before the Committee was carefully to prepare the basis of its work, in order that a solid foundation be established. Therefore, he felt that before taking up any Draft Declaration, Draft Covenant or Measures for Implementation, a general discussion under Item 4 of the Provisional Agenda should be held. He disagreed with the statement of the Chairman that discussion could be based only on the draft document prepared by the Commission on Human Rights at its second session.

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) explained that the Economic and Social Council's recommendation would not prevent the Committee from changing anything in the documents already presented, nor would it prevent a member of the Committee from presenting a new draft document if he so desired. However, the documents which were already before the Committee [4] would have to be considered as the basis of discussion. She felt that too much consideration had been given to these documents for them to be ignored.

She would put the Provisional Agenda to a vote with the understanding that under Item 4 new suggestions and procedures would be presented for consideration but that the Committee should take as a basis for discussion the documents which had already been presented to it together with the comments from Governments.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) quoted part of Resolution 46(IV) of the Economic and Social Council concerning the work of the Commission and its Drafting Committee. According to this Resolution, a preliminary draft document was to have been prepared in the first instance by the Drafting Committee. The draft as developed by the Commission on Human Rights was to be submitted to all States Members of the United Nations for their observations, suggestions and proposals which then were to be considered as a basis for a redraft, if necessary, by the Drafting Committee. The resulting document was to be submitted to the Commission on Human Rights for final consideration.

Consequently, he pointed out that the final stage of the work had arrived for the Committee. He felt that it was within the power of any delegate to say that he did not agree with the comments of governments or the draft document itself and thus could present an entirely new draft if he chose to do so.

The Provisional Agenda was adopted by 6 votes for, to none against with one abstention.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) stated that he had abstained from voting on the Provisional Agenda because he did not feel that the wording and substance of Item 4 of the Provisional Agenda should be binding on his views. He considered that the item might have been more appropriately worded.

2. Election of Chairman

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) asked the Committee to proceed with the Election of officers.

MR. HEYWOOD (Australia) proposed that the officers of the Commission on Human Rights be maintained. He then proposed Mrs. Roosevelt (United States of America) for Chairman.

M. ORDONNEAU (France) supported the nomination.

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) then asked Dr. Schwelb, of the Secretariat, to take the chair while the vote was being taken.

Mrs. Roosevelt (United States of America) was unanimously elected Chairman and took the chair.

[5]

3. Election of Vice-Chairman and Rapporteur

THE CHAIRMAN asked for nominations for the Vice-Chairmanship of the Committee.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) stated that he supported the representative of Australia in his proposal that the same officers be maintained for the Drafting Committee. However, since Dr. Chang (China) would be unable to be present, he considered that the functions of the Vice-Chairman and Rapporteur could be combined under one office. He then nominated Dr. Charles Malik (Lebanon).

M. ORDONNEAU (France) supported the nomination.

Dr. Malik (Lebanon) was elected Vice-Chairman and Rapporteur.

THE CHAIRMAN asked the Committee to decide upon its hours of work.

DR. SCHWELB (Secretariat) said that the Secretariat was at the disposal of the Committee but that he would like to point out that due to the fact that a meeting of the Ad Hoc Committee on Genocide<sup>75</sup> was scheduled for the following afternoon, and since several members of the Drafting Committee were also members of the Committee on Genocide, he would ask the Drafting Committee to hold a morning session only on that day. Due to budgetary limitations, it might be advisable for the Committee to refrain from evening or Saturday sessions.

<sup>75</sup> The Ad Hoc Committee on Genocide was established by the Economic and Social Council to prepare a draft Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide which, after consideration by the Third Committee, was adopted by the General Assembly on 9 December 1948.

It was agreed that the Drafting Committee would meet on Tuesday morning, 4 May 1948 at 10.30 a.m.

The Committee decided by a vote of 6 for, with 1 against, its working hours would be daily from 10.30 to 1.00 and from 2.30 to 5.30, exclusive of weekends.

Before proceeding to a general discussion, the Chairman asked those members of the Committee who had not yet sent in written comments, as well as those who wished to make additional comments, to present them to the Secretariat as soon as possible. She recommended to the Secretariat that all comments from governments be assembled in one document and grouped according to subject matter without acknowledgement of authorship.

DR. SCHWELB (Secretariat) stated that a document of this nature was being prepared, and would shortly be available.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) wondered whether, under a grouping of material, such as suggested by the Chairman, it would be possible to become familiar with all the comments of any one government, or even any one given point as set out by a Government in its comments.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) supported the representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and felt that the comments of governments should be circulated separately. He further wished to know whether it would be possible to have a verbatim record of the proceedings of the Drafting [6] Committee. If this was not possible, at least it would be desirable that the summary records be as complete as possible.

DR. SCHWELB (Secretariat) stated in answer to the first point of the representative of Chile that the Secretariat had prepared a comprehensive document arranging the written comments received from governments according to subject matter under the following main headings: General Comments, Comments on the Draft Declaration, Comments on the Draft Covenant and Problems of Implementation.

He explained that the delay in presenting the document to the Committee resulted from the tardy arrival of the comments from the Governments. He considered that this document would be satisfactory to the representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics since it embodied comments from eleven Governments now before the Committee in separate documents.

In answer to the second point raised by the representative of Chile, Dr. Schwelb stated that the provisions laid down by the General Assembly did not permit verbatim reports.

4. General Discussion

DR. WU (China) wished to make a few general observations on the Draft Declaration, the Draft Covenant and the question of implementation. In the view of his delegation, the Draft Declaration as contained in the Report of the Second Session of the Commission on Human Rights was too lengthy, too technical and sometimes disorganized in ideas and in form. Some articles were in a declaratory, and some in a mandatory form. Some of the articles implied and demanded obligations on the part of governments. He considered that to be of value, in affecting and influencing public opinion and sentiment, the Declaration should be short, simple and appealing. He maintained that the Declaration could only serve as a moral standard towards which mankind should aspire.

He considered that the same applied to the Covenant, which is also too lengthy, and contained too many detailed limitations which might hinder its acceptance by governments. At this stage of the work, the Covenant should be more concise, with one overall clause of limitation which might be empowered in the future to include the economic and social rights which were so important today.

With regard to the question of implementation, he understood its necessity and importance. The International Bill of Human Rights would be quite meaningless without a provision on implementation. It was his opinion that at this stage of political and social development of human society, the creation of a World Court, either independently or as an adjunct to the present International Court of Justice, could not solve the [7] problem of implementation. Implementation should be provided for not by immediate creation of international machinery of a radical nature, but through gradual processes of education.

He hoped that the Committee would avoid singling out the state as the arch-enemy of men; and that the document it forwarded to the Commission would not set the individual, directly or indirectly, at odds with the community in which he resided. It is better, he added, to start with a modest beginning and achieve some success, than to start on an ambitious scale, with probable disappointments.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) reserved his right to make general comments at a later meeting.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) considered that the Committee was not prepared to present its views before considering the Secretariat's document.

DR. SCHWELB (Secretariat) stated every endeavour was being made to have the document ready for the following meeting of the Committee.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the separate comments from Governments were in the hands of the Committee.

The meeting rose at 4.35 p.m.

Comments from Governments on the Draft International Declaration on Human Rights, Draft International Covenant on Human Rights and the Question of Implementation

1. Communication Received from India

1st May 1948

Sir,

I have the honour to refer to your letter No. SOA 17/1/01/JH, dated the 9th January 1948, and to forward herewith a note containing the comments of the Government of India on the Draft Declaration on Human Rights, the Draft Covenant on Human Rights, and the Question of Implementation contained in Annexes A, B and C of the Report of the Commission on Human Rights – Second Session.

[2]

Government of India's Comments
Covenant on Human Rights Annexure B of document E/600.

Article 1. Substitute “civilized nations” by “principles of law recognized by Members of the United Nations”.

Article 2(a). It will not be possible to guarantee all rights in part II of Covenant to persons other than citizens of State. Government of India do not favour application of Article 17, 18, 19 and 20 to persons other than citizens of State.

Article 8. Reference to conscientious objectors should in our view be omitted altogether. Specific exclusion of conscientious objectors from compulsory military service laws as contemplated in Article 8(3)(a) may rather tend to encourage conscientious objection in time of war and in any case experience of last two wars shows that number of conscientious objectors was not too large and did not require any special protection. We also think that Article 8 3(c) should be omitted as such a provision might be interpreted to justify exactions of labour often made from backward communities under pretext of communal services.

Article 9. The list of cases justifying arrest should be treated as illustrative and not exhaustive.

Article 10. Should not apply to contractual obligations undertaken by any individuals towards State.

Article 11. The principle of this Article is most important condemning as it does restriction on movements and residential segregation within a State. As at present drafted however it leaves loophole to governments to apply such restrictions and segregation in “general interests” which is a wide term. Government of India is strongly of the view that this Article should be redrafted as to leave no manner of doubt and would therefore suggest that expression “for specific reasons of security or in the general interest” should be substituted by “for specific purpose of security in a state of emergency or for prevention of epidemics”.

Article 12. This article should read as “No alien legally admitted into the territory of a State shall be expelled therefrom except in accordance with procedure prescribed by law”.

Article 13. To clause (2) may be added a sentence “Such public trials may be dispensed with when considerations of security or public morals are involved”.

Article 14. Clause (2) is vague and seems unnecessary to provide for and may be omitted. Cases like war crimes can be dealt ad hoc by victorious powers whenever they arise in future.

Article 15. The meaning and purpose of this Article are not understood. It may be omitted.

[3]

Article 24. Clause (2) is in our opinion inappropriate. It ignores the fundamental fact that in States with Federal constitution it is Federal Government which always speaks for the whole country in foreign affairs and binds the State as a whole to treaty obligations. If this clause stands Governments may avoid their obligations undertaken by Covenant on the ground that they had no jurisdiction over the federal units in particular matters. In our view the only sound proposition tenable in international law is that an acceding state should bind the state as a whole irrespective of its internal constitution and Article 24 should be amended to give effect to it.

Article 25. For the same reasons we strongly object to this Article in its present form. If it is allowed to remain the benefits of Covenant may be denied to persons in colonies where they are in most need of its application. This Article should also be amended so as to make it clear that ratification by metropolitan power binds not only metropolitan territory but all other territories such as colonies, trust territories and protectorates for administration of which such metropolitan power is responsible.

[Comments on implementation are omitted.]

...

4. We generally agree with Draft Declaration subject to such modifications as may be necessary in the light of our comments on Covenant.

Summary Record of the Twenty-First Meeting [of the Drafting Committee, Second Session]

Held at Lake Success, 4 May 1948 at 10.30 a.m.

Present: Chairman: Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt (United States of America); Vice-Chairman and Rapporteur: Mr. Charles Malik (Lebanon). Mr. J. D. L. Hood (Australia); Mr. H. Santa Cruz (Chile); Dr. T. Y. Wu (China); Mr. P. Ordonneau (France); Mr. A. P. Pavlov (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics); Mr. G. Wilson (United Kingdom). Representatives of Specialized Agencies: Mr. Oliver Stone (International Refugee Organization). Consultants from Non-Governmental Organizations: Miss Toni Sender (American Federation of Labor). Secretariat: Dr. J. P. Humphrey; Mr. John Male.

1. Communication from the World Jewish Congress

THE CHAIRMAN said that the World Jewish Congress, as a non-governmental organization in Category 'B', had asked to be heard by the Committee. She read a letter offering the co-operation of the organization and reminded the Committee that if it decided to grant the permission requested it must be prepared to give similar permission to other organizations in the same category.

[2]

DR. HUMPHREY (Secretariat) explained that although the full Commission had in the past heard organizations in Category 'A', there was no instance of an organization belonging to Category 'B' having been heard in the Committee, but that in Geneva such organizations had been heard in the working parties.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) said that in Geneva the World Jewish Congress had made a real contribution to the work of the Commission.

MR. ORDONNEAU (France) asked whether the Committee was prepared to give more favourable treatment to non-governmental organizations than to Member States which were not represented on the Committee and which were not given a chance of being heard. Moreover, the Committee was informed of the views of organizations through their written communications.

THE CHAIRMAN, replying to a question from MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics), explained that organizations in Category 'A' had the ex officio right to sit in the Committee and that organizations in Category 'B' had the right to ask for a hearing although none had so far exercised that right. She then put the question to the vote.

It was unanimously agreed that it was not possible to hear the World Jewish Congress.

2. General Discussion

The representatives of France and of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics both asked that French and English translations of documents be circulated as soon as possible and simultaneously.

DR. HUMPHREY (Secretariat) explained that many comments from Governments had come in late, and that the technical services of the Secretariat were being strained by the work required by the Special Session of the General Assembly and for the other United Nations organs now in session, which had priority over the Drafting Committee.

THE CHAIRMAN asked the members if they had any general statements to make.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) stated that his delegation was not satisfied with the Draft Declaration presented to the Committee. It did not make proper provision for the respect of human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, creed, sex or religion as provided in the Charter. The Declaration and the Convention should enact an effective guarantee of implementation, bearing in mind the political, economic and social factors. The Declaration, moreover, should describe not only the rights of the individual but his obligations to his country, his people and his State.

[3]

None of these requirements were to be found in the documents presented to the Committee. They dealt at length with the just requirements of democratic States, but made no reference to the basic democratic principle that every effort should be made to combat fascism, Nazism and racial hatred. Without this, the provisions of the Draft Declaration were mere abstractions, providing ample room for the propagation of their views by Fascist and Nazi organizations. The world was again threatened by terror imposed by reactionary elements. The absence of any provisions to combat this made the Soviet delegation sceptical as to the practical results of those documents.

In addition, the documents did not condemn discrimination because of race, sex or religion, and did not provide for its abolition. They dealt at length with voluntary discrimination, but made no provision to combat discrimination tolerated by law. Yet the situation of coloured people in the United States or of Indians in South Africa were matters of great concern.

As an example of what could be done, the representative quoted Article 123 of the Constitution of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics which emphasized the equality of all people irrespective of race, sex and other factors and made all direct or indirect privileges based on these notions, or the defence of discrimination, punishable by law.

He added that the documents limited themselves to the formal establishment of rights without any provisions for their implementation. Again he cited the Constitution of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics as providing real guarantees for rights such as the right to work. What good did it serve the individual if the right to work were proclaimed in the Declaration, but in fact there was unemployment? In support of this contention he quoted figures on unemployment in the United States of America.

Another fault of the Draft Declaration was that it considered the right of citizens as unilateral, without correlative reference to the obligation of citizens to the State. The Declaration permitted anyone to leave his country and change his nationality without consideration of the higher interests of his homeland. Yet during the struggle against fascism, collaboration with the enemy had taken a terrible toll of human lives. How could the Soviet delegation recognize a document which would permit such practices?

Furthermore, there were provisions in the drafts which would violate the principle of the sovereignty of states, such as those contained in [4] Articles 20 and 22 of the Declaration. Article 20 dealt with the right of a person to petition the United Nations against his own government. This was in contradiction to Article 2(7) of the Charter and an encouragement to anti-patriotic doctrines.

Mr. Pavlov cited the fact that the Constitution of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics guaranteed every citizen the right to due process in his own language, a fact which did not appear in the drafts, which provided no real guarantee or safeguard for linguistic minorities.

For these reasons the Soviet delegation was not prepared to accept the draft document as a basis for discussion. It proposed that it be rejected, and that basic principles be defined so as to give a clear anti-Fascist orientation to the work, give actual guarantees of implementation of every right stated, and ensure the punishment of all forms of discrimination. Only on this basis could the document be realistic. In the course of future work he would come back to each individual point and explain how he felt the instrument should be drafted. He recalled that the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics had reserved the right to present a Declaration on Human Rights which would be in conformity with the basic principles he had stated.

THE CHAIRMAN asked the representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics to submit as soon as possible any concrete changes he envisaged in the drafts. The fact that he was concerned about the relationship of the state to the individual should be made very clear. She called his attention to the fact that certain rights could not be guaranteed by certain states without radical changes in their constitution. It must be remembered that the world comprised many states with many forms of government, and that they all had to work together. This should be kept in mind when drafting any declaration of human rights.

As representative of the United States, the Chairman declared that her delegation favoured presentation of a draft Declaration and Covenant to the Seventh Session of the Council and to the Third Session of the General Assembly. The drafts prepared in Geneva during the second session of the Commission could be improved, and an effort should be made to produce simple documents on which to work.

As regards the Declaration, the United States felt that a short document would meet with a wider appeal. It should not be regarded as a legislative document, but as a statement of standards, which, however, carried no legal weight. The description of legal rights would be found in the Covenant. Moreover, it was undesirable to spell out rights [5] in terms of government responsibility. The Declaration should state the rights of the individual and not deal with the rights of the government. The Covenant should be limited to civil rights which were widely accepted. The United States felt unable to enter a Covenant which was hedged in by limitations. Here again, the document should be simple.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) expressed great interest in the statement made by the representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, which he welcomed as the first positive contribution of that country to the drafting of a Bill of Human Rights. His delegation had welcomed the inclusion of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics in the Committee precisely because that country represented a different philosophy of the subject. It was important, therefore, that the Soviet proposals be made available as soon as possible in order that an attempt might be made to find a common denominator. This endeavour might supply something so far lacking. The whole structure of Covenant depended on the relationship of the individual to the state. One might conceive of an omnipotent state, or one might give more importance to the individual, considering that society, national and international, was organized for his protection. He added that he would like to see the statement of the Soviet representative in writing, together with his views on the relationship between the state and the individual.

MISS SENDER (American Federation of Labor) said that the American Federation of Labor thought it encouraging that many governments had commented favourably on the question of implementation. The Federation considered that the Declaration should be concise, but at the same time comprehensive. It seemed a wrong approach to envisage it from the angle of national law, as national legislation must be adapted to international law. The Declaration represented an ideal towards which the states must look. The Federation noted with satisfaction the reminder in the comments submitted by the Government of Mexico that in adhering to the Charter, states had contracted obligations which they must respect.

It was important from the point of view of judicial interpretation to make it clear that the Declaration would not be exhaustive, and to have a general limitation clause subject to later judicial interpretation.

Many South American states had criticized the vagueness of such expressions as “cruel or inhuman”. This, however, did not seem a defect, as ideas on these matters were subject to change in time and space.

[6]

Finally, she wished to make the following suggestions:

1. that the final drafting be done by one or two people, and brought out in one language;
2. that an attempt must be made to arrive at a more logical order within each document;
3. that the Declaration be checked against the Covenant, and these points of the Declaration on which agreement could be reached be taken into the Covenant.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) declared that the discussions of the Committee would remain on an abstract plane unless the historic origin of the present concern for human rights were kept in mind. In recent years, men had arisen who embodied the worst aspects of human nature and had trampled on the dignity of the human being. That was the reason for the present desire to make the future safe against the recurrence of such monstrosities.

It seemed that the basic factors of modern life should be taken into account in a recast of ideas on human rights. He could quote four main factors. First of all came the maladjustments and ills of society resulting from the impersonal working of economic and social factors. Man was cramped by the social ills of modern society and this must be taken into account.

Secondly, the world was faced with a tendency to “statism”, or the determination by the state of all relations and ideas, thus supplanting all other sources of convictions. The state insisted on the individual’s obligations and duties to it. This too was a grave danger, for man was not the slave of the state, and did not exist to serve the state only. This applied also to the relative position of the individual and other groups to which he belonged. There were innumerable other intermediate loyalties which the individual must respect, such as those towards his family, his profession, his friends, and also towards philosophical laws. The state could not be the exclusive arbiter of truth and beauty. Real freedom sprang from the loyalty of the individual not to the state but to these intermediate forms. These must find their place in the general social picture.

Another modern evil was the exclusive concentration on material needs. Material abundance was not everything in life, and the requirements of culture, of the intellect and of the spirit must be taken into account.

Group pressure also should be curbed. Loyalty was owed to the group to which one belonged, but the individual must not be overwhelmed by the group, or he would lose his essential freedom.

[7]

Should the Committee disregard these dangers, it would merely serve the trends of the age without improving it. Man might live in a perfect state, have all material security, be free from all social maladjustments, and yet not be the man which the Charter of the United Nations had in mind, a man with a worth and a dignity of his own. This exact worth and dignity must be determined. Man must be able to think and choose freely and even to reject freely and to rebel freely. He considered that the Declaration should be shorter, while the Covenant, which was more important, should be as wide as possible.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) stated that one of the main difficulties confronting the Committee was the definition of fascism and Nazism. If German law had guaranteed the rights of Jews, Communists, Socialists and other groups, Nazism would never have arisen there.

The delegation of the United Kingdom felt that the Declaration should be more concise. Whether the Covenant should have a general limitation clause was of fundamental importance. The Covenant was a piece of international statute law and therefore it could never be couched in simple terms. For example, the article on freedom of information had proved one of the most difficult to draft. He would be disappointed if the vague phrase "subject to the general welfare of the state" were accepted. The question of a general limitation clause might have to be decided by the full Commission or even beyond the Commission.

As a practical point, he felt that the Committee must face the fact that it might not be possible to accomplish its work in time for the coming sessions of the Economic and Social Council and General Assembly. It had taken three or four months for eleven governments, about one in five of all governments consulted, to make comments on the drafts. The remaining governments might make equally useful contributions and it was more important to work well than merely to work quickly.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) commenting on the remarks of the Chairman, said that his Government did not wish to impose its experience on anyone. The aim should be to achieve a maximum within the limits of existing conditions in the various countries. If the United States was unable, as was well realized, to eradicate unemployment, could something nevertheless not be done in favour of the [8] principle of equal pay for equal work of men and women, of equal pay for equal work of minors and adults doing the same type of work? The experience of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics might be presented as an ideal, but that was not a reason for discarding other possibilities.

The fact that it is difficult to define fascism and Nazism was no reason for not adopting measures to prevent their recurrence. In combat, the allied armies did not need a clear definition of fascism and Nazism to know what they had to do in face of the enemy. The waging of an effective struggle against fascism and Nazism could safely be inscribed in the documents; the people of the world would know the meaning.

3. Programme of Work

THE CHAIRMAN stated that the next meeting of the Committee would be on Wednesday, 5 May, at 10.30 a.m. and she suggested discussing the Covenant first, then the question of implementation and then the Declaration. Assuming that the Committee had eight days in which to work, three would be allotted to the Convention, two to the problem of implementation and three to the Declaration.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) suggested that the Committee consider the Declaration first, beginning with basic principles, then examine the Covenant and then the question of implementation.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) preferred that work start on the Declaration and MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) preferred to start with the Covenant.

MR. WU (China) suggested starting with the Covenant first and then proceeding to the Declaration, and considering implementation last.

MR. HOOD (Australia) suggested that one and a half days be allotted to consideration of the Declaration, three to the Covenant and that the Committee then return to the Declaration and the problem of implementation.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) reminded the Committee that they had decided at the chair's suggestion in adopting the provisional agenda, that the discussion should cover the Declaration, the Covenant and then the problem of implementation.

THE CHAIRMAN said that the right had been reserved to reverse this order.

The proposal to consider the Covenant first, the Declaration second and implementation third received three votes in favour and three against with two abstentions, and was declared lost.

[9]

The proposal to consider the Declaration first, the Covenant second and implementation third received three votes in favour and three against, with two abstentions, and was declared lost.

The proposal of the representative of Australia was defeated by one vote in favour to seven against.

A proposal to consider the Covenant first was then approved by five votes in favour and one against with two abstentions.

The meeting rose at 1:00 p.m.

Draft International Declaration on Human Rights (Document E/600) with United States' Recommendations

General Comment

The United States submits herewith certain suggestions for re-wording of individual articles of the Declaration. These suggestions envisage the substantive rights being expressed under an overall clause stating "Everyone is entitled to" these rights and freedoms, and will obviate the necessity of repeating "Everyone is entitled to" or similar wording in each article.

The United States representative is profoundly impressed by the draft Declaration submitted by China at this session of the Committee. It is encouraged to find that so brief and entirely understandable a Declaration will be considered. It will lend full support to a very substantial further curtailment of the length of the Declaration and considers that the length of the draft presented by China may well come close to the ideal.

Declaration on Human Rights, the Draft International Covenant on Human Rights, and Methods of Application

Communication Received from the French Government

I. Draft Declaration

Preamble

We, the Peoples of the United Nations,

1. Whereas ignorance and contempt for human rights are one of the root causes of human suffering, and of the threats and barbarous acts which have outraged the conscience of mankind before and more especially during the last world war;
2. Whereas there can be no peace without respect for human rights and freedoms; that respect for these rights and freedoms can be assured to all only by abolishing war and the threat of war;
3. Whereas the establishment of a system in which human beings have freedom of speech and belief and are protected from terror and hardship was proclaimed to be the highest stake in the recent conflict;
4. Whereas in the opening lines of the Charter of 26 June 1945 we reaffirmed our faith in fundamental human rights, in the dignity and worth of the human person and in the equal rights of all men and women;
5. Whereas one of the objects of the United Nations is to achieve international co-operation in promoting and encouraging respect for human rights and for fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion;
6. Whereas it is essential, if mankind is not to be compelled, as a last resource, to revolt against tyranny and oppression, that human rights should be protected by the community of nations and guaranteed both by international and by national law;

[2]

Have resolved to define in a solemn Declaration the essential rights and fundamental freedoms of the human being, so that this Declaration may be held constantly before all members of the world society to remind them at all times of their rights and duties, and so that the United Nations and its members may steadfastly apply the principles thus laid down,

And have therefore adopted the following Declaration:

Article 1

All members of the human family are born free and equal in dignity and rights. They remain so by virtue of the laws. They are one brotherhood. Each is responsible for the life, liberty and dignity of all.

Article 2****

Man owes duties to the society which allows him to shape and freely develop his personality. In their discharge, the right of each is limited only by the rights of others and by the just laws of the democratic State.

Article 3

Everyone is entitled to all the rights and freedoms set forth in this Declaration without any distinction of race, colour, sex, language, religion, opinion, status or national or social origin.

The equality of all men before the law is an inviolable rule. The law affords protection against arbitrary discrimination and against incitements to such discrimination.

Article 4

Everyone has a right to life, to liberty and security of person.

Slavery, in all its forms, shall be prohibited. Its practice is a challenge to the conscience of the world.

Article 5

No one shall be deprived of his personal liberty or kept in custody except in cases prescribed by the law and after due process. Everyone placed under arrest or detention shall have the right to immediate judicial determination of the legality of any detention to which he is subject. He has the right to demand trial or release within a reasonable time.

Article 6

Everyone shall have access to independent tribunals which may, after fair discussion, impartially determine his rights and obligations or the authenticity of any charges made against him. He shall be entitled to have the procedure explained to him and to state his own case in a language which he knows.

[3]

Article 7

Any person is presumed to be innocent until he has been legally proved guilty. No one shall be held guilty except after a public trial* at which he has been given all the safeguards necessary for his defence.

No one shall be convicted for any act or omission which did not constitute a criminal offence at the time when it was committed. No one may be given a heavier sentence than that laid down by the law in force at the time the offence was committed. This provision shall not prejudice the trial and punishment of any person for the commission of any act which, at the time it was committed, was criminal according to the general principles of law recognized by civilized nations.

The horror inspired by crime shall never justify the use of cruel or degrading treatment either for its discovery or for its punishment. Torture in all its forms shall be eliminated from modern law.

Article 8

The law shall protect the honour and reputation of citizens, the freedom of private and family life and the inviolability of the home and of the secrecy of correspondence.

Article 9

Subject to any general law not contrary to the purposes and principles of the United Nations Charter and adopted for specific reasons of security or in the general interest, there shall be liberty of movement and free choice of residence within the borders of each State; individuals shall have the right to leave their own country and, if they so desire, to acquire the nationality of any country willing to grant it.

Article 10

Everyone shall have the right to seek asylum from persecution. The United Nations is bound to secure them such asylum. Prosecutions genuinely justified by crimes against common law or by acts contrary to the purposes and principles of the United Nations shall constitute persecution.

Article 11

Everyone has the right, everywhere in the world, to be recognized as a legal person and to the enjoyment of fundamental civil rights.

[*] This provision does not preclude a hearing in camera.

[4]

Article 12

The family deriving from marriage is the natural and fundamental unit of society. Men and women of marriageable age shall have equal freedom to contract marriage in accordance with the law.

Marriage and the family shall be protected by the State and society.

Article 13

Property is a right. Its regulations shall conform with the laws of the country where the property is situated. No one shall be arbitrarily deprived of his property.

Article 14

Everyone has the right to a nationality. It is the duty of the United Nations and the Member States to prevent statelessness.

All persons who do not enjoy the protection of any Government shall be placed under the protection of the United Nations.

Article 15

Personal freedom of thought and conscience, freedom to hold or change one's beliefs, are absolute and sacred rights.

Every person has the right, either alone or in association, to manifest his beliefs, subject to respect for public order, by teaching and practising them, and by worship and observance.

Article 16

(Subject to reservation)

No person may be interfered with on account of his ideas or opinions. Everyone, on his own responsibility, is free to express, impart and publish these ideas or opinions. Everyone has the right to obtain and seek, without hindrance, any information on ideas and facts. There shall be freedom of expression either by word, in writing, in the press, in books or by any other means. Access to all channels for the communication of ideas shall be open to all.

Article 17

Everyone has the right to peaceful assembly and to membership in local, national, and international associations for purposes of a political, economic, religious, social, cultural, trade union or any other character, not inconsistent with this Declaration.

Article 18

Everyone has the right, either individually, or in association with others, to communicate with or to petition the public authorities of the State of which he is a national or in which he resides, and, in respect of human rights, the relevant organs of the United Nations.

[5]

Article 19

Every citizen without discrimination has the right, either personally or through his representatives, to take part in the management of public affairs in his country. The State shall conform to the will of the people as manifested by elections which shall be periodic, free, fair and by secret ballot.

Article 20

Everyone shall have equal opportunity to engage in public employment in the State of which he is a citizen or a national.

Access to public employment shall not be a matter of privilege or favour.

Article 21

Everyone has the right to work.

The State is bound to take such measures as may be within its power to prevent unemployment and to ensure that all persons ordinarily resident in its territory have an opportunity for useful work.

Every worker has the right to receive pay which shall be commensurate with his ability and skill and which shall secure for himself and his family a full, decent and dignified life. He also has the right to fair and satisfactory working conditions. He shall be free to join trade unions for the protection of his interests.

Women shall work with the same advantages as men and receive equal pay for equal work.

Article 22

Everyone has a right to social security.

The State has a duty to maintain or ensure the maintenance of comprehensive measures for the security of the individual against various social risks. In particular, the individual shall be guaranteed against the consequences of unemployment, disability, old age, and the loss of livelihood in circumstances beyond his control.

Mothers and children shall be granted special care and assistance.

Everyone without distinction as to economic or social conditions has the right to protection of his health by all the appropriate means relating to food, clothing, housing and medical care to as great an extent as the resources of the State or community permit.

It is the duty of the State and the community to take all adequate health and social measures to meet the responsibilities incumbent upon them.

Article 23

Everyone has a right to education. Fundamental education shall be free and compulsory. Everyone shall have equal access to higher education so far as it can be provided by the State or community on the basis of merit and without distinction as to race, sex, language, religion, social standing, financial means or political affiliation.

Article 24

Education will be directed to the full physical, intellectual and moral development of the human personality, to the strengthening of respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms. It shall combat the spirit of intolerance and hatred against other nations or racial or religious groups everywhere.

Article 25

Everyone has a right to rest and leisure.

Rest and leisure should be ensured to everyone by laws or contracts providing in particular for reasonable limitations on working hours and for periodic vacations with pay.

Everyone has the right to participate in the cultural life of the community, to enjoy the arts and to share in the benefits that result from scientific discoveries.

Article 26

Authors of creative works and inventors shall retain, apart from financial rights, a moral right over their work or discovery, which shall remain extant after the financial rights have expired.

Article 27

In States inhabited by well-defined ethnic, linguistic or religious groups which are distinguished from the rest of the population, and which want to be accorded differential treatment, persons belonging to such groups shall have the right, as far as is compatible with public order and security, and in conformity with the degree of legislative unity in the State, to establish and maintain their schools and cultural or religious institutions and to use their own language and script.

Article 28

It is the duty of every State to establish an efficient judicial and administrative system to prevent, punish and remedy any violation of the principles stated in the present Declaration.

The United Nations, recognizing the necessity for establishing an international court of appeal, recommends the adoption of all the international conventions aimed at the full implementation of the [7] provisions of the Charter and of the present Declaration and, with the assistance of Member States, will take all the necessary measures to safeguard these rights and freedoms throughout the world.

Article 29

In all States no laws on human rights shall be considered equitable unless they are in conformity with the purposes and principles laid down in the Charter.

Article 30

Nothing in this Declaration shall imply the recognition of the right of any State or person to engage in any activity aimed at the destruction of any of the rights and freedoms prescribed herein.

Comments from Governments on the Draft International Declaration on Human Rights, Draft International Covenant on Human Rights and the Question of Implementation

Communication Received from the United Kingdom

5th May 1948

Sir,

I have the honour to refer Your Excellency to my letter No. 84 (522/40/48) of the 20th April, 1948.

. . . 2. I am now enclosing the preliminary comments of His Majesty's Government on the Draft Declaration of the International Bill of Human Rights. I should like to stress to Your Excellency that these comments do not purport to represent all that His Majesty's Government may have to say in regard to the Declaration and are not intended to represent their final views.

[2]

General Comments

There are three General Comments which His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom (hereafter referred to as H. M. G.) wish to make at the outset.

(a) The assumption on which His Majesty's Government have been studying the Draft Declaration is that it is a statement of ideals, a goal towards which mankind should strive, and in no way a document creating binding legal provisions, such as the Covenant. His Majesty's Government consider it important therefore that this point should be given due prominence, preferably both in the preamble to the text of the Declaration and in the text of the Assembly Resolution (see Part II (2) of the draft resolution at Appendix I of His Majesty's Government's written comments on Implementation) which will embody the General Assembly's approval both of the Declaration and of the Covenant.

A text on the following lines would meet the case:

As regards the Preamble:

“The states party to the Declaration on Human Rights reaffirm their faith in the principles of Fundamental Freedoms and Human Rights set out therein and solemnly declare that they will strive to realize this statement of ideals, having due regard to the safeguards required by their security, public order and general welfare.”

(b) His Majesty's Government second comment is that the Draft Declaration should be throughout in declaratory and not in mandatory form. This would be more in accordance with the purpose of the Declaration, which is to be a statement of ideals.

(c) The last comment, which His Majesty's Government wish to make, is that delegates of member states should agree, one and all, to try and keep the text of the Draft Declaration short, inspiring and on the lines, for instance, indicated in the United States Draft Declaration, (pages 25 and 26 of document E/600). There are a number of provisions in the existing text which are too detailed and verbose to be suitable for a declaration and are yet too loose to be suitable for a covenant. (See also paragraph 50 of E/600)

Detailed Comments

Preamble. This point has hardly been considered by delegations as yet and it is assumed that it will be given careful attention by the Drafting Committee. In (a) of the previous paragraph His Majesty's [3] Government have offered a suggestion for the preamble.

Article 1

Attention is drawn to the resolution of the Economic and Social Council passed on 3 March 1948, which recommends to the Human Rights Commission the following amendments:

“All people are born of [sic] free and equal in dignity and rights. They are endowed by nature with reason and conscience and should act towards one another in the spirit of brotherhood.”

It is suggested that the amendment be accepted, but that the word “persons” be used in lieu of the word “people”, as being more appropriate to the language of a Bill.

Articles 2 and 3

It would be preferable if the order of Articles 2 and 3 were reversed.

Article 2. Member States will probably agree that there exist diverging interpretations about the meaning of the phrase “just requirements of the democratic state”.

It is suggested, therefore, that the following draft, which omits any mention of the words “democratic state” and which appears to be more in accordance with the language and spirit of a Draft Declaration should be inserted in lieu of the present text:

“The just claims of the State, which all men are under a duty to accept, must not prejudice the respect for man’s right to freedom and equality before the law and the safeguard of Human Rights, which are primary and binding conditions of all just Government.

“In the exercise of his rights everyone must recognize the rights of others and his obligations to society so that all may develop their spirit, mind and body in wider freedom.”

Article 3(1)

A shortening of this text by the Drafting Committee would be welcomed by His Majesty’s Government.

Article 3(2)

Many member states will probably find it difficult to accept this provision. The following redraft is suggested in lieu of the present text in the hope that it may find more general acceptance:

“All persons are entitled to equal protection of the law against any act of arbitrary discrimination, regardless of the office or status of the person, who commits such an act of arbitrary discrimination.”

[4]

Articles 4 and 5

If Article 4 is accepted, as appears to be reasonable, Article 5 seems unnecessary.

Articles 6 and 7

The following text is suggested as a drafting improvement instead of the original one which seems to fall half way between language appropriate for a Declaration and a Covenant.

“Any person is presumed to be innocent until proved guilty. Everyone shall be entitled to a fair hearing.

“No-one shall be subjected to torture or to inhuman indignity.”

Article 8

The following more comprehensive test is suggested in lieu of the present one:

“Slavery or enforced servitude in any form being inconsistent in the . . .”

Article 9

This Article appears to include a number of unrelated elements. The points concerning the family, it is suggested, should be omitted and should be dealt with in the context of Article 13.

As regards the remaining points the following redraft is suggested as representing an improvement on the original text:

“There shall be respect for the sanctity of the home and for the privacy of correspondence. The law shall afford protection for a person’s good reputation.”

Article 10(1)

The beginning of the present “Subject _____ . . . general interest” seems inappropriate for a declaration of ideals while yet being too imprecise for a covenant. The following redraft is suggested in lieu of the original:

“There shall be liberty of movement and free choice of residence within the borders of each state.”

Article 10(2)

The meaning of the second line of this paragraph is not clear. His Majesty’s Government have assumed that it aims at ensuring that “everyone has the right to divest himself of his nationality, if he wishes to do so.”

His Majesty’s Government are not convinced of the need to include a provision covering the above point. If the majority of other member states should wish it, however, His Majesty’s Government would suggest a provision on the lines indicated above.

Article 11

A number of member states will probably find it difficult to accept the [5] present formula. His Majesty’s Government wish to suggest the following text in lieu of the original one:

“Everyone shall have the right to seek and may be granted asylum from political, racial and religious persecution.”

The second sentence of this Article should be omitted altogether. A criminal seeking refuge is not a person seeking asylum from persecution. A prohibition against giving refuge to criminals is hardly suitable in this Declaration of ideals.

Article 12

It is suggested that this Article would fit more appropriately higher up in the text of the Declaration, i.e. before Article 4.

Article 13

It is suggested that this Article be simplified and recast as follows:

“The family deriving from marriage is a natural and fundamental unit of society,

- (ii) Marriage and the family should be protected by law.
- (iii) Men and women shall have equal rights to contract or dissolve marriage in accordance with the law.
- (iv) Marriage shall not be contracted before the age of puberty and without the full consent of both intending spouses.”

(N.B. (iii) above is in accordance with a resolution adopted on 3 March last by the Economic and Social Council. (It was originally suggested by the Commission on the Status of Women)).

Article 14(1)

It is suggested that the following draft would be more appropriate in the Declaration:

“Everyone has the right to own property.”

The meaning of this text is that some right of ownership of private property is regarded as an essential human right. It is not intended to mean that every sort of property must be susceptible of private ownership.

Article 15(1)

The meaning of this Article is not clear. It is assumed that it refers to stateless persons and that it endeavours to provide that no persons may be deprived of the right of holding the nationality he has possessed at birth, unless he has obtained another nationality. If the above interpretation is the correct one, it is suggested that the text should be redrafted as follows:

“Persons shall not be deprived of their nationality, which they have acquired at birth, unless possessing another nationality.”

[6]

Article 15(2)

The text of this paragraph is also not very clear. It appears no longer to concern stateless persons only, but to be mainly directed to the protection of refugees from Governments, of which such refugees are nationals, but whose protection they no longer enjoy.

If the above is the correct interpretation of the meaning of this text, before commenting on the suggestions made, His Majesty's Government would like to know the nature and the scope of the protection, which it is suggested the United Nations might be expected to extend to such persons, and secondly, the manner in which this protection should be exercised. It is questionable if this should be adopted as an ideal unless and until there is some general agreement on these points.

Articles 16(2), 17, 18 and 19

It is suggested that all the above mentioned articles could be amalgamated and that the provisions contained in them could be set out more concisely and shortly in the following redraft:

“There shall be freedom of religion, of expression of opinion, and of peaceful assembly.”

Article 20

The meaning of this Article is not clear, but, if it has been correctly understood, it would seem to raise a problem of considerable difficulty. Anybody may send a petition to the United Nations by post, but the substantial questions are

1. whether he is to be immune from penalties and liabilities for so doing and if so under what conditions;
2. what will be done with the petition when received.

As indicated above the intention of the provision is not clear. It may refer to the right of making petitions with regard to the operation of the Declaration. As it is however questionable whether it is appropriate to have any system of petition in respect of the operation of the Declaration, since petitions are in the nature of enforcement measures and the Declaration is a Declaration of Ideals, not calling for enforcement.

This Article, however, may aim at providing that everyone shall have the right to petition the head of his state and the United Nations on matters arising under the Covenant. If that is the intention the Declaration is not the place to deal with it.

It may be however that the intention of Article 20 with regard to petitions is not so much to create a right to petition with regard to the fulfilment of the Declaration, or the Covenant, but to create a right to [7] petition a Head of a State and the United Nations about any matter, as a fundamental right. If this is the proposal, it demands most careful consideration.

Let us distinguish here between the two problems raised, namely the petition on any matter addressed to the Head of the State and the similar petition addressed to the United Nations. As regards the former, a petition addressed to the Head of a State is a thing essentially different from a petition addressed to an extraneous organization, whatever it may be since in the former case the whole matter is a domestic one.

The right to petition the Head of a Government with a high measure of immunity is part of the longstanding law and practice in the United Kingdom. His Majesty's Government would have no special observations on this point.

As regards the petition on any matter to the United Nations, this is a more complicated problem. As stated above, creating a right to petition means in effect to provide the right of privileged communications from individuals in an indefinite field. The right could not be unconditional. Such communications might be the means of transmitting the most secret information contrary to national security. It might be the means of transmitting enticement to committing offences.

It is questionable whether it would be right for the United Nations to hold itself out as a recipient of a petition on any conceivable subject irrespective of whether the subjects come within its scope or not. To create the right to petition on any matter might be held to connote a corresponding right of interference by the United Nations in an internal matter of a state.

The distinction between internal petitions and petitions to the United Nations is thus a profound one. Apart from the consideration mentioned one must recall other problems such as the possibility of a petitioner including matter, which is libellous or otherwise transcending the limits laid down in the Covenant on freedom of expression, the system of sanctions to be set up, the protection which a petitioner may enjoy under the law and the degree of confidentiality, in which petition will be dealt with at the United Nations.

In the circumstances it is suggested that it would be preferable to consider only the question of the right to petition the United Nations with regard to the various subjects with which the United Nations deal and to consider in connection with each of these subjects, whether there should be a right to petition and what, if any, should be the machinery for dealing with these petitions.

[8]

Article 21

In view of Article 3(1), it is suggested that the words "without discrimination" in the first line should be omitted.

Article 23

Sub-paragraph (1) is not clear in that it does not distinguish between the right to do work and the right to receive maintenance. Sub-paragraphs (2) and (3) furthermore do not appear to represent a suitable provision for inclusion in the Declaration. It is suggested therefore that this Article should be redrafted as follows:

“Everyone has the right to work or maintenance.”

Article 24(2)

Equal enjoyment of all human rights and fundamental freedoms is already provided for in Article 3(1). Furthermore there is no reason for singling out at this point “women”, whose rights equal to man’s should be considered as implicit in the expression “Human Rights”. It is suggested therefore that this provision be omitted.

Article 25

It is suggested that the words “without restriction to economic and social conditions” in the first line should be omitted as this point is already provided for in Article 3.

His Majesty’s Government would also appreciate an attempt at stating this provision in a more concise fashion.

Article 26

The right to social security referred to in this Article expresses in a general way matters, which are covered in Articles 23 to 26. There appears also to be an overlapping of ideas in Articles 23 to 26.

His Majesty’s Government hope that the Drafting Committee will agree to redraft this section by

- (a) bringing the phrase “Everyone has the right to social security” higher up in the text of the declaration and then
- (b) continuing by some words to the effect that social security includes certain other matters and
- (c) then specifying the provisions in question.

Article 27

It is suggested that the words “without distinction as to . . .” to the end should be omitted as the point in question is already dealt with in Article 3(1).

Article 29(2)

It is suggested that this provision is too verbose and detailed for [9] inclusion in the Declaration, and that it should be omitted altogether.

Article 31

His Majesty's Government propose the following text as an alternative:

“Minorities shall be entitled to preserve their culture, religion, and language.”

Article 32

The meaning of this Article is not clear, as the purpose of the Declaration and of the Covenant is to carry out the provisions of the Charter regarding Human Rights. If the laws of member states are therefore in conformity with the Declaration and the Covenant, they must ex hypothesi be in conformity with the principles of the Charter in so far as these deal with Human Rights.

Article 33

Please see His Majesty's Government's comments on the corresponding provision in the covenant. The provision seems to be out of place altogether in the Declaration.

E/CN.4/AC.1/29

11 May 1948

Speech by Mr. A. N. Pavlov, Representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics in the *Drafting Committee of the Commission on Human Rights

4 May 1948 – Lake Success, New York

You have seen fit to reject the Soviet delegation's proposal for a general discussion in this Committee on the question of fundamental human rights. Such a discussion might have provided a firm basis for the subsequent elaboration of a draft of the basic provisions of a “Declaration on Human Rights”, and also, later of the “Declaration” itself.

Without even trying to obtain general agreement on the basic principles of such a “Declaration” and other documents connected with it, you prefer to proceed immediately to a consideration article by article of the draft Declaration and not only of that, of the draft International Convention on Human Rights submitted to the Drafting Committee as the result of the work of the Second Session of the Commission on Human Rights held in Geneva in December 1947.

Such a course of procedure may, of course, be logical. But such logic has nothing in common with the logic of sincere and loyal international co-operation which is essential for the satisfactory discharge by the Committee of the tasks before it.

In connection with the Committee's acceptance of the working procedure referred to, I have already had occasion to state that such a working procedure reminds one most of all of the actions of people who, having decided to build a house, begin not by laying a firm foundation (as the Soviet delegation proposed) or even by setting up the walls, but begin straightaway to build the roof, and even to quarrel about how high above the ground this roof should be placed and how it should best be decorated.

You may blame yourselves, Gentlemen, if in the end the building you have constructed collapses, or turns out to be built on sand and unfit for habitation.

So far as concerns the Soviet delegation, it cannot of course assume responsibility for the construction of such houses of cards, which are bound in advance to dissolve into dust at the first contact with reality.

Let us now consider what value can be attached to the "Declaration on Human Rights" which was drawn up at Geneva in December 1947 and is now submitted here for our attention. I am empowered to state that the draft "Declaration" submitted to the Drafting Committee is unsatisfactory and unsuitable even as a basis for discussion. As a matter of fact, if this draft were converted into a "Declaration on Human Rights", such a "Declaration" would not properly guarantee human rights.

In this connection the Soviet delegation reserves the right to submit its own draft "Declaration" in place of this one at a later stage in the work of the Committee.

What requirements should a "Declaration on Human Rights" in fact satisfy?

1. A "Declaration on Human Rights" should first of all guarantee respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms for all, without distinction of race, nationality, class, religion, language or sex, in accordance with the principles of democracy, State sovereignty, and the political independence of States.
2. A "Declaration on Human Rights" must not only proclaim rights but guarantee their realization, regard being had, of course, to the economic, social, national and other peculiarities of each country.
3. A "Declaration on Human Rights" must not only define the rights but also the obligations of citizens towards their country, people and State.

The draft "Declaration" before us does not satisfy a single one of these requirements.

Take the question, for instance, of how far the contents of the “Declaration” are consistent with the basic principles of democracy. Surely a true democracy must, especially in present-day conditions, imply the necessity of combating Fascism and Nazism as manifestations of imperialist aggression and reaction which are most repulsive, bloody and dangerous to humanity and democracy itself! Can any genuine democrat in our day be other than an anti-Fascist, an anti-Nazi? Can we consider anyone a democrat who, in spite of the experience of the Second World War, which was an anti-Fascist war of liberation, wants now to stand aside from the fight with the remnants of Fascism and Nazism and the danger of their revival?

[3]

What can be said in this connection of the draft “Declaration on Human Rights”, in which there is a most solemn reference to the “just requirements of the democratic State” (Article 2 of the draft “Declaration”), but not a single word about such basic requirements of democracy as the obligation to fight against Fascism and Nazism, the prohibition of Fascist propaganda, the inadmissibility of propaganda in favour of nationalist and racial enmities, which undermine the very foundations of democracy!

In this connection one might point not only to Article 2 of the draft Declaration but also to Article 3, 17 and 18 on the fundamental human rights and freedoms. In all these articles, which talk about the freedom of political convictions, of the expression and transmission of thought and the dissemination of views, there is nothing which could prevent the open and secret enemies of democracy of all kinds, Fascist and Nazi, from using, or rather abusing, these rights and freedoms, and from exposing democracy and human rights to deadly danger once again.

It is impossible not to acknowledge that such a “Declaration”, which provides full scope for the activity of Fascist and Nazi elements and organizations and complete freedom for propaganda in support of Nazi and Fascist “theories” and views has nothing at all to do with the principles of true democracy.

The authors of the draft “Declaration” invite us, as it were, to close our eyes to the self-evident fact that, in spite of the defeat of Fascism and Nazism in the war that ended victoriously three years ago, peace is again threatened by the revival of that reactionary force which is attempting to stop and turn back the wheel of history, by the advent of a regime of open, terrorist dictatorship exercised by the most reactionary, aggressive and imperialistic elements. But after the frightful experience of the past, when Fascism not only trampled on human rights and freedoms and spread inequality and oppression by dividing people into “higher” and “lower” races, but actually destroyed millions of innocent people in the Maidaneks, Oswiecims<sup>76</sup> and other death camps in the countries ruled by them and in the occupied territories and subjugated whole peoples to the horrors of terror, slavery and ruin, – after all this we cannot and will not forget the Fascist danger and look on complacently while people who deem themselves democratic are preparing to set the Fascist beast at liberty.

[4]

There is a Russian proverb which says: “If you let the fire burn too long, you won’t be able to put it out.” I think we could hardly do better than remember that proverb in the present circumstances.

The Soviet delegation therefore disapproves of the draft “Declaration” submitted, and thinks it should be disapproved by all members of the Drafting Committee, if only because, as has been said above, it does not warn peoples and Governments of the danger of the revival and growth of Fascism and Nazism in various forms, if only because it does not call upon them not to permit the establishment and operation of all kinds of Fascist organizations and associations, if only because it does not outlaw Fascist and pro-Fascist propaganda, the propaganda of racial, national and religious hostility and exclusiveness. A “Declaration on Human Rights”, based on such a draft, could not seriously hinder imperialist reaction in its attempts to revive Fascism and Nazism and with their help to deal a fresh blow to human rights, the freedom of peoples, and democracy.

Let us now take another question, that of respect for human rights and basic freedoms for all without distinction of race, nationality, class, religion and sex, and see how the draft “Declaration” proposes to guarantee these.

In Article 3 of the draft are to be found the relevant words about everyone being entitled to all the rights and freedoms without distinction of any kind on racial, national or any other grounds. There is also a reference to the effect that “all are equal before the law”, and entitled to protection against “arbitrary discrimination”.

However, if the text of this article is closely examined, it will easily be seen that it is quite abstract and has no practical significance.

In fact the “Declaration” does not contain the slightest criticism, or call for the elimination either of incitement to discrimination or of discrimination itself on grounds of race, sex, language, etc. In this respect it should be particularly noted that the Article talks only of “arbitrary discrimination” and incitement thereto, whereas discrimination in general is not mentioned. This constitutes a direct justification of this so-called “non-arbitrary” discrimination, i.e. discrimination based on the law. But one need only recall the mass discrimination, most disgraceful and offensive to human dignity, which is embodied in the laws against Negroes in the United States of America or against Indians in the Union of South Africa to understand how wretched, incomplete and consequently hypocritical and false is Article 3 of the draft “Declaration” in its present form.

It is obvious that such an Article does not and cannot guarantee a real respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction of race, nationality, class, religion, sex, etc.

The bare statement in Article 3 about the desirability of equality, without at least, an accompanying expression of censure and the characterization as criminal (with all the ensuing consequences) of both discrimination itself, whether racial, national or of any other kind, and in all its aspects without exception, and of propaganda in favour of such discrimination, – is of little value and can only lead honest men astray as to the “Declaration’s” real significance.

As a contrast to the hybrid and misleading article which it is proposed to include in the “Declaration” on the question of discrimination, whether racial, national, or other, I would like to read here the text of Article 123 of the Fundamental Law of my country, the Stalin Constitution, which condemns and punishes any kind of discrimination, not only “arbitrary” discrimination, and any propaganda in favour of discrimination in any form.

Our Constitution reads as follows:

“Equality of rights of citizens of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, irrespective of their nationality or race, in all spheres of economic, State, cultural, social and political life, is an infeasible law.

“Any direct or indirect restriction of the rights of, or, conversely, any establishment of direct or indirect privileges for, citizens on account of their race or nationality, as well as any advocacy of regional or national exclusiveness or hatred and contempt, is punishable by law.”

You may, of course, say that in the countries that you represent and also the other capitalist countries it is not possible to ensure equal rights to people irrespective of their race or nationality as effectively and as fully as this has been done in our country. However, it would be wrong to think that in these countries too it is not possible at present to make some progress in the direction indicated in the Article of our Constitution which I have quoted, but first these countries must at least rid themselves of those survivals of the past which most vividly remind one of slavery, the Middle Ages or the Fascist and Nazi regimes which were defeated in the recent war.

The Soviet delegation would suggest that Article 3 of the draft Declaration be redrafted to this effect.

In this connection special consideration should be given to Articles 6 and 31 of the draft Declaration establishing the right of every individual “if he appears (in court) in person to have the procedure explained to him in a manner in which he can understand it and to use a language which he can speak” and stating the right of persons belonging to “ethnic, linguistic or religious minorities to establish and maintain schools and cultural or religious institutions, and to use their own language in the Press, in public assembly and before the courts and other authorities of the State”.

It is noteworthy that in both versions of Article 31 of the Declaration, on which the Commission on Human Rights failed to reach a final decision, a substantial reservation is attached to this list, namely, “as far as compatible with public order” (the second version even adds “. . . and security”). How and in what circumstances the use of their own language by national minorities and the instruction in schools of children in the language of these minorities could be considered as incompatible with public order and still more as a threat to security remains the secret of the authors of the draft. Apparently, they are so terrified of granting national minorities equal rights with the majority of the population in the use of their language in schools and courts that they attach to the relevant articles of the Declaration reservations that can easily nullify even emasculated and formal rights of national minorities which are laid down in Articles 6 and 31 of the draft. And this despite the fact that the Declaration after all is not dealing with the establishment or development of national schools, with the conduct of court proceedings in the language of national minorities, or any similar questions.

This definition of the rights of national minorities which is so perverted and so unsatisfactory from the standpoint of democratic principles should be compared with the solution of similar questions given in the Constitution of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

In our country the State ensures all citizens, whether they belong to a national majority or minority, instruction in their own language in the schools, whereas under the draft Declaration the establishment of schools using minority languages is only permitted with many reservations and, at the best, depends on the existence among the national minority of wealthy individuals able and willing to undertake the establishment and maintenance of such schools.

[7]

With regard to the poorer classes of national minorities, they are in fact offered and guaranteed nothing but a formal and limited right “to establish and maintain schools” of which they will certainly not be able to take advantage.

The same applies to judicial proceedings in the language of national minorities.

In our country “Judicial proceedings are conducted in the language of the Union Republic, Autonomous Republic or Autonomous Region, persons not knowing this language being guaranteed every opportunity of fully acquainting themselves with the material of the case through an interpreter and likewise the right to use their own language in court” (Article 110 of the Constitution).

In contrast to this, Articles 6 and 31 of the draft Declaration state merely that the representative of a national minority has the very meagre right to have the proceedings which are therefore conducted in the language of the ruling nationality – a language which he does not know, explained to him; and may use his own language.

Is it not clear that all these emasculated, hypothetical clauses in the Declaration, which are not guaranteed in practice, are permeated with the blatant, panic-stricken and shameful fear which the great “civilized” colonial Powers feel towards the growth of the culture and consciousness of the indigenous colonial peoples and oppressed national minorities which have no civil rights? In any case, these feeble articles in the Declaration have nothing in common with real guarantee of actual national equality and the respect for human rights without distinction as to race, language or nationality.

Let us now consider whether the Declaration as a whole guarantees the realization of the fundamental human rights.

Take, for example, the right to work, as embodied in Article 23 of the Declaration, which is of extreme importance for all members of the wage-earning class.

What does the Declaration say about that right?

“(1) Everyone has the right to work.

(2) The State has a duty to take such measures as may be within its power to ensure that all persons ordinarily resident in its territory have an opportunity for useful work.

(3) The State is bound to take all necessary steps to prevent unemployment.”

[8]

It is easy to understand that this article does not really give the working man any real guarantee against unemployment.

This article in fact says that the State must take “such measures as may be within its power” and “all necessary steps” to guarantee work to everyone and prevent unemployment.

But there is not a single concrete reference to these measures or their content. We do not know whether these necessary measures within the State’s power will be sufficient for the purpose, i.e., for guaranteeing work to everyone and abolishing unemployment or at least remedying to some extent the situation in this respect. Furthermore, it follows from the indefinite, vague and ambiguous nature of all these formulas that this article is not intended to do anything really significant to help unemployed persons, not to mention the fact that the impossibility of dealing with the problem of unemployment is admitted in advance.

Thus the Declaration does not contain any really effective, even partial, let alone complete, guarantee of employment, or any guarantee against unemployment or even of the right to receive assistance in the event of unemployment; there is no point in cherishing any illusions on this subject.

Actually, it is a matter of entire indifference, after all, to an unemployed man who is starving and poverty-stricken whether or not the State considers that it had already done for him everything necessary and essential, if in reality he is in any case receiving no assistance. And in the face of such flexible definition what person can, when he is unemployed, claim any help at all from the State?

In contrast to the purely formal, ambiguous, and emasculated article in the Declaration which does not grant or guarantee anything to anybody, may I quote the text of Article 118 of the Constitution of the Soviet Union which deals with the same question in our country in the following terms:

“Citizens of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics have the right to work, that is, are guaranteed the right to employment and payment for their work in accordance with its quantity and quality.

“The right to work is ensured by the socialist organization of the national economy, the steady growth of the productive forces of the Soviet system, the elimination of the possibility of economic crises, and the abolition of unemployment.”

In the Soviet Union the right to work is a complete reality; we settled the problem of unemployment completely and decisively about twenty years ago; in our country unemployment not only has not [9] existed during those years and does not now exist, but it cannot exist. Since the victory of the socialist system of economy a generation of young people has grown up in our country which has no personal experience of unemployment and has never seen its fathers and mothers and the older generation in general unemployed. That is a great source of happiness for the people of our country.

The achievement of the Soviet Union in this field should be contrasted with the situation, for example, in the United States of America and other capitalist countries. We can say with pride that even such a technically and economically advanced capitalist country as the United States of America seems, from the point of view of the right to work, incredibly savage and backward in the eyes of the Soviet people.

May I remind you that in the United States in 1939, the year before the war, there were approximately nine million unemployed; in the year following the end of the war, that is to say in 1946, the number of unemployed according to the monthly official figures did not once fall below rather more than two millions (the New York Times for 17 June 1947, incidentally, gave another figure – three millions). Moreover, millions of workers do not have a full working week, that is to say they are partially unemployed.

What right to work and what real freedom can one speak of in the case of a man who is poor and hungry and does not know where to go or what to do, particularly when even the trade unions which could help him to find suitable employment meet with serious obstacles and difficulties in their development? It is sufficient in this connection to point to the Taft-Hartley Law of 15 May 1947 in the United States, which was greeted with righteous indignation by the working classes in America and throughout the world.<sup>77</sup>

I cannot see how the Declaration, if it is adopted in the form at present before the Drafting Committee, can help the twenty or thirty million needy and half-starved, or starving, people who for decades have formed the permanent army of the unemployed in the capitalist countries, not to mention India, China and the other countries of the East.

The same sad state of affairs, as or even worse that applying to the right to work, exists in the Declaration with regard to the right to the preservation of health (Article 25), the right to social security (Article 26), the right to education (Article 27), the right to rest and leisure (Article 29), etc.

At a later date when the Declaration is considered paragraph by paragraph, I may return to this subject and give some concrete examples to prove how worthless the drafts before us are. Meanwhile I shall restrict myself in this connection to what has been said about the right to work.

This example alone throws sufficient light on the draft Declaration's most serious shortcoming; namely, that while it proclaims democratic principles it restricts itself to defining the formal rights of citizens and disregards the conditions needed to put these rights into effect and the ways and means of implementing them.

It may be objected that the authors had every good intention in expressing all these pious hopes in the draft Declaration. I doubt that; but even if it were true it would not improve matters. There is a well-known old proverb which says that the road to hell is paved with good intentions.

Let us take, in conclusion, the question of those duties which are indissolubly linked with the basic human rights. In actual life the duties of citizens to their country, their people and their State exist side by side with their rights. There should be no one who enjoys every right but bears no responsibilities; just as there should be no persons having only obligations and enjoying no rights.

But how is this problem dealt with in the draft Declaration?

Not only does the Declaration fail to mention the above-mentioned duties of citizens to their country, their State and their people, but, on the contrary, it contains articles which openly declare that people should be completely free from such obligations.

For example, let me refer particularly to Article 10(2) of the draft Declaration, which provides that individuals shall have the right to leave their own country and to acquire the nationality of any other country, regardless of the laws and interests of their homeland. This sub-paragraph contains not the slightest reference to the duties of citizens to their homeland, their State and their Country.

Apart from every other consideration it does not even mention the requirement that individuals should obtain the consent of their national authorities to their emigration.

It might be objected that Article 2 of the draft Declaration does in fact mention in a general way that there are limitations to human rights, deriving from the requirements of the democratic State and from the individual's "duties to society".

What value have these abstract, dry-as-dust formulas in Article 2, however, when in practice the Declaration ignores, in a matter of so great importance, the interests of States and nations and frees the individual emigrant from any restrictions and obligations whatsoever to the State and society of which he is a member?

In this instance the authors of the draft in effect directly encourage people to disregard their civil obligations and to ignore their State. The democratic peoples of the United Nations have learnt the value of true patriotism and of the loyal discharge of national obligations from their experience of the way in which individuals and groups basely betrayed the national interests of their own countries during the anti-Fascist war – whether as Quislings or followers of Pétain. Surely it ill befits the Drafting Committee of the United Nations Commission on Human Rights to retain Article 10(2), and similar provisions which oppose the interests of individuals to those of their countries and give preference to the former, in their draft Declaration. The disgraceful facts of collaboration, lack of civic loyalty and all other forms of treachery are still too fresh in the minds of humanity; and such treachery derives from the fact that some individuals and groups prefer their own selfish interests to the interests of their peoples and disregard their duties and obligations to their homeland.

Nor, as has already been made clear, can the draft Declaration be approved from the standpoint of consistency with the principles of State sovereignty and the political independence of States.

Not only, indeed, have the authors of the draft Declaration failed to mention certain elementary duties of citizens, but they have disregarded the corresponding right of States.

The draft Declaration directly violates the principle of State sovereignty by failing in many instances to give proper consideration to national, domestic legislation. More than that, it openly assumes (Article 20) that any national may lodge with the United Nations a complaint against his own nation, his own State!

If such an article is embodied in the Declaration it may become a direct incitement to, and encouragement of, the anti-patriotic activities of people who have broken with their own people and homeland.

Apart from the consideration that this is at variance with Article 2(7) of the United Nations Charter, which forbids the United Nations to intervene in matters which are essentially within the democratic jurisdiction of any State, all this is a direct violation of the principle of State sovereignty.

[12]

Let me summarize what I have said about this unfortunate draft Declaration on Human Rights, which is about to be discussed article by article in the Drafting Committee.

In the opinion of the Soviet delegation the draft Declaration should not be used as a basis for discussion; it should be rejected and in its place a new draft prepared which would provide a basis for a future declaration.

The Declaration on Human Rights will have to satisfy the basic demands of which I have already spoken. In particular, its orientation should be clearly anti-Fascist and it should not merely state empty formulas on equality and the rejection of discrimination, but declare outright that every Member of the United Nations must extirpate discrimination based on race, religion, nationality, sex, or any other motive, and suppress and punish incitement to discrimination.

With regard to the most important human rights, namely the right to work, rest, education, housing, social security, etc., the Declaration should not content itself with pious hope and empty definitions but should indicate ways and means of really ensuring and giving effect to these rights comparable at least to some extent with what has been done in those progressive countries which have carried out a profound and consistent democratization of their social and State system. I say nothing of the most advanced country of all, where real and complete democracy – that is, socialist democracy – exists: the Soviet Union.

The Declaration should include, together with the fundamental human rights, also the most important human duties – at least those owed to one's country, people and State.

It should contain no provision directly or indirectly undermining the sovereignty and independence of nations and States. Only in these circumstances can the Declaration help to further the progress of democracy and effectively secure the human rights and the interests of all peace-loving peoples.

A great deal of what I have said on the draft Declaration applies equally to the draft Covenant on Human Rights which has been submitted by the Drafting Committee. Until we have reached agreement in principle on the fundamental human rights and their implementation, however, there is no point in discussing a draft Covenant.

As for the third document submitted to the Committee, namely, the Report on Implementation (methods for implementing the principles on human rights), it would be still more premature to discuss means of applying appropriate standards to examine the draft plan in substance before agreement in principle has been reached on the definition of the fundamental human rights.

[13]

I consider that the Drafting Committee will be making a serious mistake and testifying to its own shortcomings if it fails to give due consideration to these observations and suggestions of the Soviet delegation.

Continuation of the Discussion on the Covenant

Article 1 (Documents E/CN.4/85, E/CN.4/AC.1/19, E/CN.4/82/Add.8)

THE CHAIRMAN read the comments made by the Governments of the Netherlands, Brazil, the United Kingdom and the Union of South Africa on Article 1.

MR. ORDONNEAU (France) said that the Geneva text of Article 1 was not clear and was incomplete. It would be dangerous to allow it to be thought that the theory of human rights began with the drafting of the Covenant. Reference should be made in Article 1 to the Charter, which laid down certain broad principles, and to the Declaration, as in the French draft (document E/CN.4/82/Add.8).

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) thought mention should be made of the Declaration and the Charter but in the Preamble rather than in Article 1. The last words of the Geneva text of Article 1 should be retained. They were taken from Article 28 of the Statutes of the International Court of Justice.<sup>78</sup> Many international lawyers believed they represented the same principles as jus gentium. In the Covenant international law was being developed and made more clear and precise and it should therefore be linked up with the “general principles of law recognized by civilized nations.” It would be unnecessary to amend “civilized nations” to “United Nations” until a change had been made in the Statutes of the International Court.

THE CHAIRMAN proposed that the word “principles” should be amended to read “rights and freedoms”, which was more concrete. The words “among the. . .” should be retained to make it clear that there were other rights and freedoms apart from those dealt with in the present Covenant, [3] and which might be embodied in another document in the future. The first Covenant should include only the basic rights and freedoms; this would allow as many States as possible to adhere to it. The French version was too broad.

<sup>78</sup> Article 38(1)(c) of the Statute of the International Court of Justice lists “the general principles of law recognized by civilized nations” as one of the sources of law to be applied by the Court.

MISS SENDER (American Federation of Labor) said the French text made it clear that the Covenant would be binding on all States which were bound by the Declaration and the Charter.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) said that when the Declaration and Covenant were presented to the General Assembly there would have to be a resolution approving the documents and requesting Member States to accede to them. Some statements made in the preamble and the first article might be embodied in that General Assembly Resolution. Therefore to avoid duplication, the question of what they should contain should not be definitely decided until later.

MR. ORDONNEAU (France) could accept a preamble containing the ideas expressed in the French text of Article 1, but added that there was no assurance that the General Assembly Resolution would include them. Even if they did appear in the Resolution they would not be made generally known, as only the Declaration and the Covenant would be published widely. The Preamble should therefore read: "The States parties hereto, being resolved to give effect to the general principles proclaimed in the United Nations Charter and specified in the International Declaration of Human Rights adopted on . . . have agreed on the following:" with Article 1 of the Geneva draft to follow.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) accepted the French proposal, reserving his right to reopen later if necessary the question of whether the ideas in the Preamble and Article 1 should be expressed elsewhere. He preferred the deletion of "among the" but supported the substitution of "rights and freedoms" for "principles".

[4]

It was agreed to leave open the whole question of the Preamble and Article 1 until the following meeting.

Discussion of the Draft Declaration on Human Rights

THE CHAIRMAN thought that the Committee might decide to consider those articles as accepted on which no comments have been made nor amendments submitted.

Secondly, she felt that the Committee should first consider the substantive articles beginning with Article 4 which practice had been applied during the discussion of the Covenant.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) drew the attention of the Committee to the statement of the USSR which had been circulated to the Committee. This statement applied to the Declaration as well as to the Covenant. He reserved the right to make further amendments for the improvement, if need be, of the Declaration.

[15]

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) read the general comments of the United Kingdom on the Draft Declaration as contained in document E/CN.4/82/Add.1, page 2.

The Committee decided to discuss first the substantive articles of the Declaration and then proceed to a discussion of Articles 1, 2, and 3.

Summary Record of the Thirty-Fifth Meeting [of the Drafting Committee, Second Session]

Lake Success, New York on Monday,
17 May 1948, at 11 a.m.

Chairman: Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, United States of America; Vice-Chairman and Rapporteur: Mr. Charles Malik. Present: Mr. E. J. R. Heyward, Australia; Mr. H. Santa Cruz, Chile; Mr. T. Y. [2]

THE CHAIRMAN informed the Committee of the death of Lord Dukeston, representative of the United Kingdom on the Human Rights Commission, and moved that a minute of silence should be observed in honour of his memory. The Committee instructed the United Nations Secretariat to convey by telegram its condolences to the family of the deceased.

Examination of Article 4 of the International Declaration on Human Rights (documents E/CN.4/85, E/CN.4/82/Add.8, E/CN.4/82/Add.9, E/CN.4/AC.1/18, E/CN.4/AC.1/20)

THE CHAIRMAN proposed the appointment of a sub-committee to draft the articles accepted in principle by the Drafting Committee.

MR. CASSIN (France) thought that the Drafting Committee's most essential task was to shorten and clarify the Draft Declaration. He thought that article 4 should be merged with article 8 on slavery, to read as follows:

"Everyone has the right to life, to liberty and security of person.

"Slavery, in all its forms, being inconsistent with the dignity of man, shall be prohibited by law."

Mr. Cassin believed that the articles following article 4 should constitute a sort of explanation of the main ideas embodied in that article.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) observed that article 4 did not take into account the fact that millions of people were dying of hunger, sickness and other scourges. The Committee should express its desire to make the right to life fully effective. Mr. Pavlov added that he would be prepared to support the French proposal to incorporate the article on slavery in article 4 on condition that slave-trade were condemned in all its forms.

[3]

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) supported the United States proposal suggesting that fundamental rights should be grouped together. He was in favour of shortening the declaration provided that the substance of each article was left intact.

Mr. Malik pointed out that the Lebanese proposal submitted in Geneva corresponded to the suggestion made by the Netherlands and Chilean delegations concerning the need to incorporate the principle of physical integrity in article 4.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) thought that the Declaration should be as short as possible. The Committee should, however, add some lines of explanation to the provision for the right to life. Mr. Santa Cruz wished the Committee to study the addition to article 4 proposed by the Chilean delegation in Geneva. The addition was as follows:

"Unborn children, incurables, the feeble-minded and the insane have the right to life.

"Everyone has the right to enjoy conditions of life compatible with human dignity and the normal development of his or her personality.

"Persons incapable of satisfying their own needs have the right to maintenance and support."

MISS SENDER (American Federation of Labor) remarked that the article on slavery made no reference to forced labour. She proposed that a condemnation of forced labour should be embodied in article 4.

MR. WU (China) was in favour of the appointment of a sub-committee entrusted with the task of condensing the Declaration. He thought that article 4 should be as short and as simple as possible.

[4]

THE CHAIRMAN opened the discussion on the substance of article 4.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) proposed the following version of article 4:

“Everyone has the right to life and to physical integrity from the moment of conception regardless of his or her physical or mental condition. Everyone has the right to liberty and personal safety.”

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) supported the principle upheld by the Lebanese representative, but wished article 4 to include the principle of security.

MR. CASSIN (France) remarked that the conception of “personal safety” was not identical with that of “personal liberty”.

Mr. Cassin expressed his readiness to accept the Netherlands proposal to include the words “physical integrity” in article 4. He agreed with the substance of the Lebanese and Chilean proposals, but thought that the Declaration should only contain ideas acceptable to all the members.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) stated that in view of the fact that the International Covenant contained no articles dealing with the principle of security, he was obliged to insist on its inclusion in the Declaration.

THE CHAIRMAN, speaking as the representative of the United States of America, thought that the Declaration should be as short as possible. The United States delegation would agree to the inclusion of the words “physical integrity” in article 4, but would vote against all the other proposals.

[5]

THE CHAIRMAN asked for a vote on the question whether the words “from the moment of conception” should be added at the end of the sentence reading “Everyone has the right to life, to physical integrity, etc.”

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) remarked that laws against abortion did not exist in all countries. He thought, on the other hand, that article 4 should contain a pronouncement against unemployment, famine, sickness and fascism, scourges which threatened millions of lives.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) asked that reference should be made in the summary record of the meeting to the statements made by the representatives of China, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, and the United Kingdom in connection with article 4. Mr. Malik believed that while the delegations of those three countries wished to omit the phrase “from the moment of conception” in the interests of brevity, they considered that idea to be implied in the general terms of article 4.

MR. WU (China) stressed that the wording of article 4 did not imply but actually contained the idea expressed by the Lebanese representative.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) thought that the wording of article 4 could be understood to contain that idea but did not necessarily do so.

THE CHAIRMAN, speaking as the representative of the United States, stated that the terms of article 4 were sufficiently broad to comprise [6] certain ideas which a country might wish to adopt as general principles. She believed a concise and general wording to be the most desirable.

The proposal to include the words "from the moment of conception" was rejected by six votes to two.

The proposal to include the words "regardless of his or her physical or mental condition" was rejected by six votes to two.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) pointed out that paragraphs 2 and 3 of his proposal had not yet been examined by the Committee.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) drew the Committee's attention to the fact that articles 25, 26 and 27 of the Declaration dealt with the economic rights of the individual.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) stated that the principles of the security of the individual should find expression in the definition of the right to life even if it already occurred in other articles of the Declaration.

MR. CASSIN (France) shared the view expressed by the Lebanese representative. He thought that articles 25, 26 and 27 could be drafted differently, but that the idea of security should not be expressed in article 4.

The inclusion of paragraphs 2 and 3 of the Chilean proposal in article 4 was rejected by three votes to one, with four abstentions.

MR. HEYWARD (Australia) thought that the meaning of the words "physical integrity" was not sufficiently clear.

MR. WU (China) was in favour of the words "personal safety".

[7]

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) thought that the words "personal safety" were more explicit and, therefore, more appropriate than the words "physical integrity".

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) pointed out that personal safety and physical integrity were two different conceptions. Article 4 should be worded so as to include both ideas.

MR. CASSIN (France) thought that "personal safety" meant the security under which an individual could live. He saw no objection to the inclusion of the words "physical integrity" in article 4. He pointed out that article 4 was a chapter heading and that the following articles were governed by it.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) was in favour of the insertion of the words "physical integrity".

MISS SENDER (American Federation of Labor) proposed replacing the text of article 4 by that adopted at the Bogotá Conference.<sup>79</sup>

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) pointed out that the ideas formulated at the Bogotá Conference were already contained in article 2 which had not yet come under discussion. He thought, therefore, that it was preferable to retain the text of article 4 as adopted in Geneva.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) proposed adding the words “physical integrity” to the text of article 4.

The Committee decided against the inclusion of the words “physical integrity” in article 4 by four votes to four.

[8]

Article 4 as drafted at the Geneva conference was adopted by seven votes, with one abstention.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) wished to point out that the Russian text of article 4 seemed to be more broadly framed than the French and English texts.

Examination of Article 5

MR. CASSIN (France) stated that he was prepared to accept article 5 as it stood and would be unable to vote for the Mexican or Brazilian proposals (the latter affecting only the English text of the article).

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) proposed the deletion of article 5, which he described as nothing but a list of methods for the preservation of liberty already contained in the International Covenant.

MR. WU (China) was in favour of the deletion of article 5.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) thought that the relationship between the Declaration and the Covenant should be clearly laid down. His opinion was that each article of the Covenant should have a counterpart in the Declaration. He thought that article 5 should be supplemented by paragraph 5 of article 9 of the Pact, which read as follows: “Every person shall have an enforceable right to compensation in respect of any unlawful arrest or deprivation of liberty.” He considered that article 5 should be retained in the Declaration so as it gave it additional force.

<sup>79</sup> The American Declaration of the Rights and Duties of Man was adopted at the Ninth International Conference of American States in Bogotá, Colombia, on 2 May 1948. It was formally circulated within the United Nations as E/CN.4/122, issued on 10 June 1948, but by mid-May it was being referred to in the proceedings of the Second Session of the Drafting Committee, where it was described as the “Bogotá Declaration.” The first draft of the Declaration was published by the Inter-American Juridical Committee on 31 December 1945. It was submitted by Chile and published as an official United Nations document in early 1946 (E/CN.4/2) whereby it influenced the early discussions on the draft Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

THE CHAIRMAN, speaking as the representative of the United States, reserved her position with regard to the deletion of article 5. She felt that any decision on that point would depend on the final form which the Committee agreed to give to the Declaration.

Mrs. Roosevelt pointed out that if article 5 were to be retained, two amendments to its text were proposed in the recommendations submitted by the United States (document E/CN.4/AC.1/20). She thought that the drafting of that article should be entrusted to the Committee.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) stated that if article 5 were retained, he would propose to replace its present text by that adopted at the Bogotá Conference.

MR. HEYWARD (Australia) suggested that the Declaration should be submitted to the Human Rights Commission in two versions of different length. He did not think that the Geneva Declaration could be shortened without detriment to its substance. He proposed, therefore, that each article should be examined with a view to its forming part of a long Declaration, but that a short Declaration should be drafted at the same time.

He stressed that in drafting the Declaration it was essential to preserve its declaratory form.

The Committee decided to retain article 5 by five votes to two, with one abstention.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) pointed out that the amendments he proposed issued directly from the terms of article 5.

[10]

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) supported the USSR proposal. He pointed out that the wording proposed by the French representative was practically identical with the text adopted at the Bogotá Conference.

MR. CASSIN (France) did not think that the text of the Declaration should make provision for measures of implementation if the latter were not drafted concisely. He pointed out that France had voted in favour of the USSR amendment to article 9 of the Covenant, but stated that he would vote against the inclusion of the latter in the Declaration.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) shared the views of Mr. Cassin.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) pointed out that article 5 as adopted at the Bogotá Conference proclaimed merely that everyone had the right to humane treatment while under preventive arrest.

The Committee decided against the inclusion of the USSR amendment in article 5 by five votes to three.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) proposed that the phrase “. . . and the right to humane treatment while under detention” should be added at the end of article 5.

THE CHAIRMAN remarked that article 7 covered that particular point. She suggested that a sub-committee should draft articles 5, 6, and 7, keeping in view the opinions expressed at the Bogotá Conference. She appointed a sub-committee composed of the representatives of Chile, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, China and the United States of America.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) wished the Sub-Committee also to bear in mind the fact that article 9 of the Covenant contained the general principle which article 5 of the Declaration was to embody. He recalled that article 13 of the Covenant had to do with the same principle.

The meeting rose at 1:15 p.m.

[2]

THE CHAIRMAN read the text of a telegram addressed to Lady Dukeston expressing the Committee's condolence for the death of Lord Dukeston, whose loss was mourned by all who had collaborated with him in the work of the Human Rights Commission.

Consideration of articles 7 through 11 of the Draft International Declaration of Human Rights (E/CN.4/85)

THE CHAIRMAN suggested that the representative of the World Jewish Congress, who had requested permission to speak on article seven, should be invited to do so at that time, so that the sub-committee, to which the drafting of that article had been referred, might take his remarks into account.

DR. MALIK (Lebanon) heartily welcomed the opportunity to hear the views of the representative of the World Jewish Congress, who had made an important contribution to the work carried out in Geneva.

MR. BIENENFELD (World Jewish Congress) thanked the Committee for affording him the opportunity make a statement. He wished to refer to paragraph 2 of article seven, the deletion of which had been proposed by the representative of Brazil.

It was important that the paragraph should remain in the text of the article, for the principle of international law must be respected by all countries. It was this principle which was at the base of international trials of war criminals; deletion of the paragraph would prevent such trials in the future, and would be in disharmony with resolutions adopted by the General Assembly. He therefore appealed to the members of the Committee to leave the text of paragraph 2 intact.

[3]

Article 8

THE CHAIRMAN proposed the following drafting for article 8: "Everyone is entitled to freedom from slavery and servitude in any form. Their practice is a challenge to the conscience of the world."

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) felt that it was not enough to state that slavery was inconsistent with the dignity of man, or was "a challenge to the conscience of the world"; the phrase "and shall be prohibited by law" should be included.

His delegation proposed the following draft for the article on slavery:

"Slavery shall be prohibited in any form, direct or indirect. Slave trade shall be prohibited and attempts to engage in slave trade shall be punishable by law."

THE CHAIRMAN thought that reference to prohibition by law would be inappropriate in a document such as the Declaration on Human Rights, because it concerned a method of enforcement.

Furthermore, in her opinion, reference to slave trade would be unnecessary if slavery as a whole were outlawed.

MR. CASSIN (France) agreed with the representative of the United States that the prohibition of slavery should be expressed as a general principle, without stating specific examples, many of which were already covered by existing international conventions.

However, he expressed agreement with the USSR representative as to the existence, at present, of slave trade, but thought that the text proposed by his delegation would be a suitable one on which to reach a [4] compromise agreement:

"Slavery, in all its forms, shall be prohibited. Its practice is a challenge to the conscience of the world."

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) expressed his readiness to accept either the United States or the French text, but wondered as to the appropriateness of the phrase "its practice is a challenge to the conscience of the world" in the Declaration. That phrase constituted a commentary on the principle enunciated in the article and, whereas he agreed with the idea expressed, he thought that the inclusion of such commentary in one article might lead to the inclusion of similar commentaries in all the articles of the Declaration. He would therefore vote in favour of the proposed United States text, but with the omission of the last sentence.

MR. WU (China) agreed with the remarks of the United Kingdom representative. He suggested that the article should be worded as follows:

"Everyone is entitled to freedom from slavery or involuntary servitude."

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) favoured the French text which, in his opinion, could serve as a compromise text. Although he agreed with the criticisms of the United Kingdom representative, he thought that, in view of the gravity of the matter and taking into consideration the remarks of both the USSR and French representatives concerning the existence of slavery at the present time, the last sentence should be retained.

[5]

THE CHAIRMAN stated that the United States delegation would support the text proposed by the Chinese representative, which she proposed should be put to the vote first, after which the USSR and French proposals would be voted upon.

The proposal of the Chinese representative was rejected by three votes to three, with one abstention.

The USSR proposal was rejected by four votes to one, with one abstention.

The first sentence of the French proposal, "Slavery in all its forms shall be prohibited," was adopted by five votes to one, with one abstention.

The second sentence of the French proposal, "Its practice is a challenge to the conscience of the world," was rejected by three votes to two, with two abstentions.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) thought that in view of the brevity of the article as adopted, it could easily be included in article 4, as suggested by the French delegation.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) disagreed, and observed that the inclusion of the sentence into article 4 would reduce the article dealing with the right to life to a mere prohibition of slavery. It would be more logical to leave article 4 as drafted, and include the statement on slavery under a separate article.

THE CHAIRMAN suggested placing the article on slavery immediately following article 4, thus changing its number from article 8 to article 5.

THE CHAIRMAN'S suggestion was unanimously adopted.

Article 9

MR. CASSIN (France) felt that the text proposed by his delegation for article 9 (document E/CN.4/82/Add.8) was preferable to the original Geneva text because it combined man's various attributes, his honour and reputation, [6] the right to privacy of family life and of correspondence in one whole. Moreover, he objected to the use in the French translation of the Geneva text of the word "abusif".

MR. HEYWOOD (Australia) thought that the French text was similar to the one proposed by the United States (document E/CN.4/AC.1/20) but he preferred the former because it contained a reference to protections by the law of the various rights mentioned, rather than a general reference to the fact that everyone was entitled to freedom from interference with those various rights.

MR. WU (China) favoured the draft proposed by the Netherlands delegation which emphasized the rights of the individual rather than stressing the lawfulness of those rights.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) thought that it would be more appropriate to include reference to family life in article 13, which dealt with that subject at greater length.

He drew the Committee's attention to the text proposed by his delegation, contained in document E/CN.4/82/Add.9.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) agreed that it would be preferable not to mix different concepts in the same article. He drew the Committee's attention to the Declaration adopted in Bogotá, where the honour and reputation of an individual, the inviolability of his domicile and the secrecy of his correspondence were dealt with in three paragraphs. He agreed with the representative of China that those concepts should be stressed as being the rights to which everyone was entitled.

THE CHAIRMAN proposed a rewording of the United States proposal, eliminating reference to "family".

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) withdrew the United Kingdom proposal and expressed his support of the new United States text.

[7]

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) said that he would be ready to support the United States text provided the word "unlawful" were included to qualify the word "interference," since interference could be unreasonable and yet fully in compliance with existing legislation.

MR. HEYWOOD (Australia) pointed out that the use of the words "protection under law from" instead of "freedom from" would meet the obligations expressed.

MR. CASSIN (France) favoured the Australian suggestion as "protection under law" was a wide concept which included both statute law and common law.

THE CHAIRMAN proposed that the article would be drafted as follows:

“Everyone is entitled to protection under the law from unreasonable inference with his reputation, family, home, or correspondence.”

The Chairman’s proposal was unanimously adopted.

Article 10

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) suggested that the two paragraphs of the article should be considered separately.

With reference to paragraph 1, he proposed that everything up to the words “there shall be liberty” should be deleted.

THE CHAIRMAN thought the text should then be rephrased in accordance with the wording adopted for the preceding article, and should read: “Everyone is entitled to freedom of. . . etc.”

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) said that since no limitations were stated in the corresponding article of the covenant, none should appear in the Declaration.

[8]

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that it had not been finally decided whether the limitations in the covenant would be stated specifically in every article or expressed generally to cover all articles. She drew attention to the fact that the limitation contained in article 2 of the Declaration would apply to the rights expressed in article 10.

MR. CASSIN (France) felt that there was some danger in relying too greatly on one article to provide limitations for the whole Declaration.

Moreover, the more one concerned oneself with the rights of the individual, the more the rights and interests of society as a whole become apparent.

Recalling the sudden influx of a half million refugees into Europe during the Spanish Civil War, Mr. Cassin observed that, had the Government allowed those refugees to move about without restrictions, they might have caused themselves and the host country a great deal of damage by settling in already overcrowded areas. His country was among the most progressive in the world, he said, but in the interests of its own people it could not endorse freedom of movement without specifying certain restrictions under the law.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) stated that he would support paragraph 1 insofar as it corresponded to the parallel article in the Covenant. He thought, however, that the words “general law” were not clear and should be replaced by a more precise expression.

With respect to paragraph 2, he thought that an important omission had been made and suggested the addition of the phrase “in accordance with the established laws of that country” after the words “their own country.” Without that phrase, the second paragraph implied that individuals could leave their country at will, forgetting duty to the fatherland. The war had produced numerous examples of the results of such negligence. It would be morally wrong and contrary to democratic ideals to encourage such disregard of duty. Therefore, the paragraph should be amended as he proposed.

[9]

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) felt that the USSR representative had raised an interesting point in connection with the rights of individuals and society. He agreed that obligations of individuals toward their respective states were determined by the states themselves; but in view of the varying extent of national obligations, he opposed any general limitation in Article 10 of the right to free movement, and stated that he would only consider expressly defined limitations.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) drew a distinction between the declaration, which laid down the absolute, positive principles on which the rights of man were based, and the convention, which indicated the limitations of those rights. He therefore suggested that the question of limitation should not be considered in connection with articles of the declaration.

THE CHAIRMAN, noting that the discussion had drifted to paragraph 2 of Article 10, reverted to paragraph 1. The United States amendment to omit the limitations in paragraph 1, being further removed from the Geneva text than the French proposal, was put to the vote first.

The Committee adopted the United States amendment by five votes to one with one abstention.

The Chairman then took up paragraph 2 to which, she said, the United States drafting amendment also applied. The Brazilian amendment raised no objections, but the Mexican amendment might be superfluous in view of the fact that paragraph 2 seemed to deal mostly with the acquisition of new nationality. The Chairman also pointed to a USSR amendment to that paragraph.

[10]

MR. CASSIN (France) stated that while the problem of free movement involved both emigration and immigration, the present article was only concerned with individuals' right to emigrate; that right might create a problem for the countries of emigration which, contrary to countries of immigration, might then have no control over the matter. He therefore felt that the Netherlands amendment to paragraph 2 constituted the most reasonable compromise between the rights of individuals to free movement and the right of states to impose certain obligations on their citizens. Consequently, he proposed that the limitation clause of paragraph 1 should be included in paragraph 2; should that proposal be rejected he would suggest a vote on the Netherlands amendment.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that over-all limitations of individuals' rights would be laid down in Article 2. As regards the present article, its purpose might be to cover cases similar to that of the Russian wives who were unable to join their English and American husbands abroad.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) agreed with the Chairman's remarks. He also supported the Lebanese representative's statement and felt that limitations in the declaration, beyond the general principles in Article 2, once started, would lead to an infinite number of restrictive provisions. The declaration should rather aim at the positive absolute of human rights. He further suggested that the text of the first part of paragraph 2 might be brought in line with Article 11 of the draft covenant, to read as follows: "the right to leave any country, including his own. . ."

[11]

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) felt that his amendment to paragraph 1 – which corresponded to the Netherlands amendment to paragraph 2, both amendments setting certain limits to free emigration – was even more justified in the light of the United Kingdom suggestion since the departure of any foreigner from a given country always entailed some procedure. He strongly protested against reference to the case mentioned by the representative of the United States, stating that it was a completely domestic matter. He insisted that a vote should be taken on his amendment.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) felt that while not objecting to the French amendment, he would vote against it in view of consideration which had explained before [sic].

THE CHAIRMAN then proceeded to the vote on amendment to the first part of paragraph 2.

The USSR amendment was rejected by five votes to one, with one abstention.

THE CHAIRMAN stated that, as Representative of the United States, she would vote against the French amendment.

MR. WU (China) also said that he would vote against that amendment as being superfluous in view of the limitations contemplated in Article 2.

The French amendment was rejected by four votes to two, with one abstention.

The United States amendment was accepted by five votes to none, with two abstentions.

The amendment suggested by the United Kingdom representative was accepted by five votes to none, with one abstention.

[12]

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom), speaking on the second part of paragraph 2, felt that the text was not clear in its present form. If the intention was to lay down the right of individuals to immigrate, then the following clause might be included: "and if they so desire, settle in any country willing to allow them to do so.” He thought that it was essentially a question of an individual’s right to divest himself of his nationality.

THE CHAIRMAN agreed, and recalled that the intention in Geneva had been to ensure individuals’ right to divest themselves of their nationality.

MR. CASSIN (France) agreed that the text as it stood might lead to dual citizenship.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) also thought that the article might raise difficulties and suggested that the matter of citizenship should be considered in a separate article, article 10 to deal thus only with the right of free movement.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) agreed with the representative of Chile, and pointed out that the question of citizenship could be taken up in connection with Article 15, dealing with nationality.

MR. BIENENFELD (World Jewish Congress) saw a misunderstanding with regard to that article which, unrelated to immigration, was only intended to provide emergency asylum to persecuted persons unable to obtain visas in time. He recalled that Lord Dukeston had also opposed that article on the grounds that it confused the concepts of immigration and asylum; it had consequently been proposed to add the [13] following sentence to the Geneva draft of Article 11: “Everybody has the right to seek and be granted temporary asylum for persecution until he himself, or an international agency working under the auspices of the United Nations, has found a new place of residence for him.” Thus it would be clear that the asylum granted was temporary and that the refugees would be taken care of in accordance with provisions in the IRO Constitution.

MR. WU (China) proposed that the word “granted” in the first sentence should be deleted because it constituted an imposition on governments. He also proposed the deletion of the second sentence of paragraph 2, which included a limitation clause.

MR. CASSIN (France), in the light of the remarks by the representatives of China and of the World Jewish Congress, felt that since it was unreasonable to expect individual countries to assume responsibility for refugees, it should be the duty of the United Nations to find asylum for refugees. To that end the United Nations could carry on negotiations with specialized agencies and individual states. Feeling that a universal declaration should include provisions not otherwise found in national constitutions, he disagreed with the Netherlands view on that question. He further noted that the points raised by the Brazilian and Chinese Governments would be met by the French alternative draft of that article (document E/CN.4/82/Add.8, – Article 10). However, he opposed deletion of the limitation clause.

[14]

MISS SENDER (American Federation of Labor), pointing out that the declaration had been inspired by Nazi persecutions, recalled that many refugees had perished because they had been returned to Germany by countries in which they had sought refuge. Furthermore, provision for international action would not necessarily cover emergency cases. She therefore suggested that the text should be retained in its present form.

MR. WU (China) raised the question of whether, according to the French proposal, the United Nations Organization or its individual members would have to take action on behalf of the refugees.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) thought that further definition of “the right to asylum” was required in order to distinguish it from “the right to immigrate.”

With regard to the French suggestions, he thought that since countries would have to deal principally with cases arising at their frontiers, there would be no time for international consultation. His own government preferred deletion of the second sentence, and the following re-drafting of the first sentence: “Everyone shall have the right to seek, and may be granted temporary asylum, from political, racial and religious persecution.” In that way governments could not be attacked for granting asylum. He thought that the text suggested by the representative of the World Jewish Congress was too detailed and that the addition of the word “temporary” was sufficient.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) supported the French proposal, as well as the enumeration of types of persecution in the United Kingdom amendment which however, he felt, should also include scientific persecution.

He also supported the French representative’s proposal to retain the limitation clause, without which it might be possible for some governments to grant asylum to war criminals on the basis of the declaration. He stated that he would support both amendments, but agreed with the representative of China that the role of the United Nations in the matter had not been clearly defined.

MR. CASSIN (France), in reply to the United Kingdom representative, said that the declaration should be based on the rights of individuals and not states. While agreeing with the USSR representative that scientific persecution was a reality, he preferred reference to persecution in general. As regards the part to be played by the United Nations, he stated that it would be the duty of the Organization as such to guarantee that asylum granted by its Members to refugees would be temporary; knowing thus that they would not carry the burden alone, countries would hesitate less to grant asylum. MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) agreed with the representative of France and supported his proposals.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) asked for clarification of the “right to seek refuge” in article 10 of the French text (E/CN.4/82/Add.8). Under that article, he said, rapid action could be taken if United Nations co-operation were provided not by agreement on each case, but after the refugee had been granted asylum; he was ready to accept such an interpretation. As regards the question of criminals, he pointed out that the meaning of the word “persecution” would solve the difficulty since fugitive criminals were never considered victims of persecutions. He thought that enumeration of types of persecution should be avoided lest some types be inadvertently omitted. He concluded by saying that the Chinese proposal might be amended to include the words “temporary” and “the right to find asylum”.

[16]

MR. WU (China) accepted the United Kingdom formula “may be granted”. He opposed enumeration of types of persecution.

MR. CASSIN (France), in reply to the representative of China, said that the most important consideration was to induce Members of the United Nations to say from the outset that, in case of persecution, they would grant asylum to the refugees. He was against the inclusion of the word “temporary.”

THE CHAIRMAN proposed the formation of a working group to draft a new article 11.

THE CHAIRMAN’S proposal was accepted.

The meeting rose at 5:50 p.m.

Examination of articles 11 and 12 of the Draft International Declaration on Human Rights

THE CHAIRMAN opened the discussion on article 12 of the Draft Declaration (document E/CN.4/85) and invited members to submit their comments. The article read as follows:

“Everyone has the right everywhere in the world to recognition as a person before the law and to the enjoyment of fundamental civil rights.”

Speaking as the representative of the United States of America, she submitted to the Drafting Committee the re-draft of article 12 proposed by her delegation (document E/CN.4/AC.1/20), which, after the suppression of the words “in the world”, read:

“Everyone is entitled everywhere to the right to recognition as a person before the law.”

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) remarked that the Draft Covenant contained an article dealing with the same point.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that article 15 of the Draft Covenant established that “No person shall be deprived of his juridical personality.”

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) recalled that when the articles of the Draft Covenant had been discussed, his delegation had supported that text, although the United Kingdom and United States delegations had objected that the expressed “juridical personality” had no meaning in the law of their countries. In his country, as in many others, that expression meant the right of the individual to exercise certain rights and to incur certain obligations, for example, the right to be represented in law. The authors of the article had intended it to reaffirm the principle of non-discrimination, according to which every person must enjoy fundamental civil rights. Even if those rights were already defined elsewhere, it was desirable to reaffirm them in this context.

MR. CASSIN (France) stated that his delegation had submitted no amendment to the text of article 12 because it thought it essential to retain it in the Draft Declaration as it stood. The text had a double significance. On the one hand, the expression “a person before the law” laid down the principle that everyone had the right to enjoy fundamental civil rights. That provision was directed against the modern forms of slavery which the Committee had condemned at its last meeting and which were twofold. For instance, there would have been no need to reaffirm that a human being could not constitute the property of another human being, had not certain heads of State, such as Hitler, sought in the last ten years to revive the ancient idea that an individual considered as a slave had no right to marry, to be a creditor or to own property.

In reply to the Chairman, who did not think that the word “everywhere” was of great importance, he would point out that it did have a bearing on fundamental civil rights. Here was a difficult problem, left unsolved by the declaration, namely, the status of individuals living on foreign soil. There was not a single country which did not discriminate to some extent between its own subjects and aliens. The rights of aliens in respect of the countries in which they lived should therefore be defined more closely. The Draft Declaration should guarantee them a minimum of fundamental rights.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom), supporting a statement made by the United States representative, stressed that the phrase “fundamental civil rights” had no meaning in Anglo-Saxon legislation and that its inclusion in the article under discussion might cause some confusion.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) agreed with the point of view expressed by the French representative. He observed that the conception of fundamental civil rights was basically the same in all legislations. It provided for the right of the individual to marry, to make wills, to sign [4] leases, etc. The aim of the provision in question was to avoid the discrimination toward foreigners which might be exercised in certain countries. He did not see how it could call forth opposition and suggested it should be carefully studied before the Committee considered its suppression.

THE CHAIRMAN remarked that the difficulty had arisen because the American lawyers who had been consulted had been unable to agree on the exact meaning of the phrase “fundamental civil rights”. If that expression were adopted by the Committee, it would have no meaning in Anglo-Saxon law. For that reason, the United States delegation had formulated the proposal which she had read out at the beginning of the meeting.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) asked whether it would not be possible to adopt the formula used in the Covenant, where the USSR legislation corresponded to the conception embodied in French law. He had in mind political, economic and social rights, and thought the wording of the Declaration should correspond to the text of the Covenant in that respect. He proposed that the words “in accordance with the laws of the country” should be added to that formula.

THE CHAIRMAN, speaking as the representative of the United States, recalled that her delegation had pointed out at the time of the discussion of the Covenant that the conception of “juridical personality” did not exist in United States legislation, and that it had decided to agree to the provisional inclusion of that phrase only on condition that legal experts would later come to an understanding on its exact meaning.

[5]

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) observed that two distinct conceptions were involved: that of the juridical personality and that of fundamental civil rights.

The concept “juridical personality” contained in it recognition that a person had certain rights and obligations in accordance with the laws of his or her country, varying according to age, sex and other conditions.

The concept of fundamental civil rights referred to in the second part of the article was a different one. Its aim was to protect the individual from measures of discrimination and to ensure his or her enjoyment of fundamental rights.

It would be logical for the Committee to retain the first part of the sentence, but he urged that the second part of the sentence should in any case remain in the Draft Declaration; it had a wider scope and should contain a condemnation of possible discriminatory measures against aliens.

THE CHAIRMAN, speaking as the United States representative, insisted that an exact definition of fundamental civil rights should be formulated before her delegation was called upon to reach a decision.

MR. WU (China) submitted a draft of article 12 which, he believed, would receive the approval of all the members. The text was as follows:

“Every person has the right to recognition before and equal protection under the law.”

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) pointed out that civil rights were a matter entirely distinct from political, economic and social rights. Such civil rights were moreover analogous in a number of countries, [6] including the United States of America, the United Kingdom, France and Chile. He thought that an equivalent term covering rights relating to marriage, wills, gifts, leases, sales, and the like, i.e. transactions between individuals in general, must exist in Anglo-Saxon legal language.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) wished to know whether the adjective “fundamental” added anything to the meaning of the article, and proposed its deletion.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) explained that the word was intended to single out the most important of the many civil rights which existed.

MR. CASSIN (France) agreed with the representative of Chile that the word “fundamental” should be retained, as it was impossible, in the present state of feeling, to impose on any Government the obligation to treat aliens on a footing of absolute equality with its own nationals.

The recent example of Hitler, who had shown it was possible to impose the concept that a whole class of individuals could be deprived of a large part of their elementary civil rights, made it all the more essential that these fundamental rights should be guaranteed. That was quite a different matter from a mere denial of the juridical personality, which in fact amounted to telling the individual that he was non-existent.

THE CHAIRMAN, speaking as the United States representative, observed that in her country there were as many jurisdictions as there were States and that no federal authority was capable of compelling those States to alter their own laws.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) observed that in the State of Georgia of the United States, a married woman had no legal existence apart from her husband's. He asked whether article 12 envisaged laws of that kind.

[7]

THE CHAIRMAN, speaking as the United States representative, repeated that her delegation could not agree to the reference to fundamental civil rights, since no exact definition of those rights existed in her country, where they varied from State to State.

[8]

MR. WU (China) withdrew his amendment.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile), replying to a proposal by the Chairman, moved that a vote should be taken first on the deletion of the last part of article 12 (“...and to the enjoyment of fundamental civil rights”), as proposed by the United States amendment.

The amendment proposed by the United States delegation was adopted by three votes to two, with two abstentions.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) proposed a slight drafting change of the English text of the article, involving no change in the French text.

Article 12 was adopted in the following form:

“Everyone has everywhere the right to recognition as a person before the law.”

MR. CASSIN (France) read the new text of article 11 of the Draft Declaration as drawn up by a Drafting Sub-Committee composed of the representatives of China, France and the United Kingdom (document E/CN.4/AC.1/39):

“Everyone shall have the right to seek and may be granted asylum from persecution. The United Nations is bound to secure this asylum in agreement with Member States.

“Prosecutions genuinely arising from non-political crimes or from acts contrary to the purposes and principles of the United Nations do not constitute persecution.”

He would add that the wording had been inspired by the fact that it was impossible to recognize a right, in this case the right to asylum, if no one was bound to respect it. The United Nations should, therefore, conclude agreements to provide material assistance in those very varied cases where some countries might have to grant asylum but not be able to bear alone the resulting financial burden.

[9]

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) asked that the words “shall have the right. . .” in the first sentence of the proposed text should be replaced by “has the right. . .”.

MR. CASSIN (France) agreed to this alteration on behalf of the Drafting Sub-Committee.

THE CHAIRMAN felt that the obligation for the United Nations to grant asylum to any persecuted person should be in the form of a resolution of the General Assembly and should not be embodied in the text of the Declaration.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) could not accept the text of the Drafting Sub-Committee. The right to asylum should be stated clearly and explicitly. Moreover, any measures implementing the exercise of that right were out of place in the Declaration, and should be laid down in a Convention, one on nationality, for example.

He suggested the following wording for the first sentence:

“Everyone has the right to seek and to be granted asylum during persecution.”

MR. WU (China) agreed with Mr. Azkoul. The Declaration must not contain any implementing articles and the whole of it should be so worded as to be understood by the greatest possible number of people, more particularly by those not versed in the law.

MISS SENDER (American Federation of Labor) preferred the wording of Article 11 as drafted in Geneva.

Replying to the comments made by the Lebanese representative, MR. CASSIN (France) said the Committee should take into account the fact that all countries did not accept unconditionally the principle of the right to asylum. The article would therefore be quite ineffective if the United Nations failed to encourage States to grant asylum and to give them the necessary assistance. It was not stated which States had to grant asylum in a specified case. [10] The State nearest to the one where persecution had taken place might not have the necessary funds to take in those who were persecuted and, what was more, the influx of refugees might have a disturbing effect on the national life of that country.

To secure the General Assembly’s agreement to accept the new obligation to grant asylum, it had been necessary to make it clear that prosecutions genuinely arising from non-political crimes did not constitute persecution.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) reaffirmed that the Declaration must proclaim the right to asylum, even though that right might not be universally recognized today. The United Nations must bear a share of the burden falling upon the countries granting asylum to persecuted persons, but that principle had to be established by means of a resolution of the General Assembly and not by a clause of the Declaration. Lastly, it was obvious that prosecutions arising out of a crime under common law did not constitute persecution.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) approved the use of the following expression in the first sentence: "Everyone. . . may be granted asylum." It had to be borne in mind that the obligation to grant asylum would not be assumed by all States.

THE CHAIRMAN asked for the first sentence to be amended as follows:

"Everyone has the right to seek and may be granted temporary asylum from persecution in other countries."

It was to be foreseen that victims of persecution would receive temporary asylum and that the country receiving them was not bound to guarantee them the right of permanent residence. Furthermore, cases of religious persecution had to be excepted by specifying that the article referred to persecutions in another country. As regards the obligations the United Nations might assume under that article, it should be remembered that it was unable to act rapidly; one should bear in mind the difficulties encountered in [11] connexion with the setting up of the International Refugee Organization, which was not a permanent body.

MR. HEYWARD (Australia) could not agree to article 11 containing implementation measures: the obligations to be entered into by the United Nations must be recorded in the text of a convention.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) approved the action of the Drafting Sub-Committee in mentioning the obligations of the United Nations as regards the right to asylum. Otherwise, the first sentence would proclaim the right for all persecuted persons to seek asylum without really enabling them to find such an asylum.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) asked that article 11 should specifically debar Fascists and Nazis from the right to find asylum, and proposed the following addition to the text: "in particular, the right of asylum shall not be granted to Fascists and Nazis prosecuted for their activities."

MR. CASSIN (France) asked for a separate vote to be taken on the three sentences composing the draft text of article 11, and then for a vote to be taken on the whole of that text.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) approved the request of the French representative and stressed the importance of the USSR amendment depriving Fascists and Nazis of the right to asylum.

[12]

THE CHAIRMAN accepted the procedure proposed by the French representative, which was in accordance with the Rules of Procedure.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) proposed to vote first on the USSR amendment, and then on each of the sentences of the article, beginning with the last and proceeding in the reverse order, i.e. the third, then the second, and then the first.

THE CHAIRMAN accepted the proposal of the Lebanese representative.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) said that he would vote against the USSR amendment because Fascist and Nazi activities formed part of the "Acts contrary to the purposes and principles of the United Nations” as specified in the text of the Drafting Sub-Committee.

The addition proposed by the USSR representative was rejected by four votes to one, with two abstentions.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) enquired whether the Committee accepted the interpretation of the United Kingdom representative and meant the activities of Fascists and Nazis to be excluded from the right to asylum as “Acts contrary to the purposes and principles of the United Nations.”

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) said that was the way he interpreted the proposed text, which covered all acts contrary to the purposes and principles of the United Nations and not only those of Fascists and Nazis.

MR. CASSIN (France) said that he too interpreted the text in the same way as the United Kingdom representative.

[13]

The third sentence of article 11 was adopted by five votes to two.

The text being as follows: “Prosecutions genuinely arising from non-political crimes or from acts contrary to the purposes and principles of the United Nations do not constitute persecution.”

The second sentence: “The United Nations is bound to secure this asylum in agreement with member States”, was not adopted, the voting being three votes for and three against.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) withdrew the amendment he had submitted to the first sentence of the article, as the discussion had shown that the Committee was not prepared to proclaim unconditionally the right to asylum. But he asked the United States representative to replace the expression “temporary” by the expression “during persecution”.

Speaking as the United States representative, the Chairman pointed out that, if persecution were to continue, the State granting asylum might wish to be released from its obligation.

MR. CASSIN (France) stressed again the importance of the sentence relating to the obligations of the United Nations, in the absence of which some States might be led to refuse that right of asylum.

Mr. Cassin thought there was no need to speak of “temporary asylum” or “asylum during persecution”, but he agreed to the insertion of the words “in other countries” proposed by the United States delegation.

Replying to a remark made by the United States representative, MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) said there was no need to limit the period during which a State could grant asylum, because the obligation to grant such [14] asylum was not contained in the text on which the Committee was about to vote.

By five votes to none, with two abstentions, the Committee adopted the following draft of the first sentence:

“Everyone has the right to seek and may be granted asylum from persecution.”

By three votes to two, with one abstention, it rejected the addition to the first sentence of the expression “during persecution”, suggested by the Lebanese delegation.

With a vote of two for, two against, and three abstentions, it did not adopt the insertion into the first sentence of the word “temporary” which the United States delegation had proposed adding to the word “asylum”.

By six votes to none, with one abstention, it adopted the addition of the expression “in other countries” proposed by the United States delegation.

By six votes to none, with one abstention, the Committee adopted the whole of article 11 thus amended.

The meeting rose at 1:15 p.m.

Continuation of the Discussion on the Draft International Declaration on Human Rights

Article 14

THE CHAIRMAN called the Committee’s attention to article 14 of the Draft International Declaration on Human Rights. She read the article and the comments made by the Governments of Brazil and the Union of South Africa.

MR. CASSIN (France) reminded the meeting that he had proposed another text for this article, which he considered better, i.e. “ownership of property is a right, its exercise shall be regulated by the laws of the land”.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) suggested simplifying the text by deleting the end of the first paragraph, which would then read “Everyone has the right to own property.”

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) supported the United Kingdom’s representative’s suggestion, which would remove any allusion to limitation of this right.

THE CHAIRMAN, speaking as the representative of the United States, declared herself in favour of retaining article 14; she proposed, however, to modify the second paragraph. She supported the comment made by the Brazilian Government.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) recalled the text of the draft adopted by the Inter-American Juridical Committee at the Bogotá Conference; “everyone has a right to own such private property as meets the essential needs of decent living, and helps to maintain the dignity of the individual and of the home.”

[3]

He thought that article 14 in its present form was wrong, because a right was not affirmed if it was stated at the same time that it could be suspended by law. The question to be decided was whether ownership of property was an essential and fundamental right. The idea of ownership of property was regarded from different angles in different countries; it was necessary to find a minimum common denominator or, if that proved impossible, to abandon the question altogether.

THE CHAIRMAN thought that the text submitted by the Chilean representative appeared to limit the ownership of property to the level necessary to satisfy essential needs. That raised a difficulty; who would define exactly these “essential needs”? She would prefer the text suggested by the United Kingdom representative.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) pointed out that the text drawn up at Bogotá did not limit the right to own property; it merely established to what extent it was to become an essential right, and each country would be free to determine reasonable limits in that connexion.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) agreed with the arguments put forward by the Chilean representative. As he had not before him a copy of the proposed text, he made reservations as to the wording, but accepted the principle, which appeared to him correct.

MR. CASSIN (France) pointed out that the text which would be adopted could only be the result of compromise. The members of the Committee were certainly in agreement on three points; (a) the natural inclination of everyone to possess material objects; this gave rise to [4] the statement: “Ownership of property is a right”; (b) the conception of the extent of the right to ownership of property: the formula suggested by the Chilean representative was likely to displease some countries; it was, therefore, necessary to state that ownership of property should be subject to the legislation of each country; (c) it was impossible to state categorically that an individual was entitled to such and such compensation; it had simply to be said that he would not be deprived of his property by any arbitrary measures.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) regretted that he could not agree with the point of view put forward by the French representative. The purpose of the declaration, which was to establish essential rights, should not be forgotten. If States were granted the right to legislate on the matter, all that remained would be an abstract right.

He recalled that the French representative had asked for a formula based on a spirit of compromise. The easiest way would be to adopt a definition of the right to ownership of property and that provided by the text adopted at Bogotá seemed the most suitable.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) agreed with the French representative, that property should be subject to the laws of the land; he thought that this principle should be accepted by all. It seemed to him difficult to attempt to impose a system of property ownership, as each State might have a different conception of the matter. In Soviet countries common ownership was the basis of the regime, and such countries would be opposed to the adoption of any other system. He concluded that it was necessary to retain the idea that ownership applied alike to private ownership and common ownership, in conformity with the laws of the different States.

MR. WU (China) pointed out that divergences of opinion arose chiefly in the interpretation of the right to own property. He agreed with the French representative that the final text of article 14 could only be the result of a compromise. It would be wise to try to find a compromise formula acceptable to all. If it were not possible to arrive at complete agreement, he suggested that article 14 should be deleted in toto.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) said that his point of view had been interpreted in several different ways. He had not spoken in favour of any special system of ownership, but had simply said that the present text of the article established no such right. He thought that the conception held by the USSR fitted perfectly into the framework of the text which he proposed. He concluded that it was possible to establish that at least part of the property held should be held as of essential right.

THE CHAIRMAN summed up the discussion, pointing out that the Committee had before it four amendments. The first, submitted by China, suggesting the deletion of the entire article; the second, put forward by Chile, suggesting the adoption of the text drawn up at Bogotá by the Inter-American Juridical Committee; the third, submitted by the United Kingdom, suggesting the deletion of the end of the first paragraph; the fourth, proposed by the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, suggesting the addition of the words "private or common" to qualify property.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the Chinese amendment for the deletion of article 14.
[6]

The amendment was rejected four votes to two, with two abstentions.

The Chairman put to the vote the Chilean amendment.

The amendment was adopted by three votes to two, with three abstentions.

As the two other amendments were no longer relevant, the Chairman put to the vote the question of retaining the second paragraph of article 14.

The retention of the second paragraph was approved by seven votes to none, with one abstention.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) asked if the text of article 14 referred to “private property” or “property.” He recalled that in the USSR private property was not the essential basis of “decent living” for individuals.

THE CHAIRMAN read the text which had been approved.

Following an exchange of views, in which the representatives of Chile, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and the United Kingdom took part, MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) suggested deletion of the word “private.”

The proposal was adopted.

THE CHAIRMAN suggested a modification in the text of the second paragraph.

MR. CASSIN (France) pointed out that the proposed text could not be translated into legal French, although there was no basic difference in meaning.

[7]

MR. HEYWOOD (Australia) suggested a new working of the text, consisting of the incorporation of the second paragraph in the first, which would then end with the words: “. . .and not be arbitrarily deprived of it.”

The proposal was adopted.

THE CHAIRMAN then stated that article 14 now consisted of a single paragraph, containing the text proposed by the Chilean representative, with the word “private” deleted, and concluding with the sentence suggested by the Australian representative.

Article 13

THE CHAIRMAN read the draft of article 13 and the various documents relating to it. As the representative of the United States, she thought that this article might well be suppressed, since all the rights set forth therein appeared in other parts of the Declaration.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) had no objection to the suppression of this article. He suggested in particular, that the first sentence should be suppressed, and he thought that the text suggested by the Economic and Social Council might be adopted. He recalled that suggested by the United Kingdom delegation:

“Marriage shall not be contracted before the age of puberty and without the full consent of both intending spouses.”

MR. CASSIN (France) did not think that this article was useless. He did not think it was possible to disregard human groups and to consider each person only as an individual. There was in the world an unanimous movement to give the institution of marriage its full character and dignity.

[8]

As regards freedom of consent, he thought that the form proposed by the United Kingdom representative might be improved. He recalled the text proposed by the French delegation:

“No marriage can be contracted except by a man and woman of marriageable age and with their full consent.”

MR. MALIK (Lebanon), Rapporteur, recalled that at Geneva, he had made certain reservations concerning this article. It had just been suggested that this article should be omitted entirely because the rights set forth therein were mentioned elsewhere in the Draft Declaration. He thought that this omission would be exceedingly regrettable.

The family was the cradle of all human rights and liberties. It was in the family that everyone learned to know his rights and duties and it would be inexplicable if everything were mentioned except the family's right to existence. The text of article 13 represented a bare minimum, and he suggested once again the amendment which he had already proposed at Geneva and which had been rejected because certain countries, such as Uruguay, objected to the name of the Creator being mentioned with a capital. He did not see how the adoption of that amendment could go against the doctrine of the separation of Church and State.

After all, he pointed out, the “Creator” was not necessarily God; in certain philosophies, it might be Nature. There was no theological implication. He saw no reason why the word “Nature” should not be used instead of the word “Creator”. The point on which he wished to insist was the fundamental and inalienable importance of the family.

[9]

He thought that the family was entitled to protection from the State and the law and he asked the Committee to consider his amendment and to adopt the text drawn up at Geneva.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that on fundamentals he was in agreement with the Lebanese representative. He pointed out that in the USSR the family was protected by law, but he thought the amendment proposed by Mr. Malik was pointless and might give rise to objection and complications.

As regards the second paragraph, he felt that it was unnecessary to bring any philosophical theories into the Declaration.

He suggested retaining the second part, emphasizing the equality of rights between man and woman after marriage. He proposed the following text:

“Men and women shall have the same right to contract marriage and shall have equal rights in their family life in conformity with the laws.

“The family deriving from the consent of both parties shall be protected by law.”

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) sympathized with the Lebanese representative's point of view. He thought, however, that it was not appropriate to introduce at this point any comments, however relevant, on any given right. He suggested that the Lebanese representative might insert his amendment in the initial articles of the draft declaration which already contain certain philosophical considerations. In conclusion, he said he would vote against the Lebanese amendment and against the first sentence of Article 13.

[10]

Speaking as the representative of the United States of America, THE CHAIRMAN agreed with the representatives of the Lebanon and the United Kingdom. As far as the second paragraph was concerned, she proposed the following wording:

“Marriage and the family shall be protected by the law.”

The Chairman put the Lebanese amendment to the vote.

The amendment was rejected by six votes to one, with one abstention.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon), Rapporteur, recalled that the draft of the Inter-American Juridical Committee of the Bogotá conference contained the same idea.

He was entirely in agreement with the United Kingdom representative's suggestion provided that this fundamental conception of the family was inserted somewhere in the Draft Declaration.

MR. CASSIN (France) thought that the Lebanese representative was right and the subject of the family could not be passed over in silence. He said that the first articles of the Declaration were devoted entirely to the individual and article 13 was the first which connected up the human being with the family; in like manner, article 15 linked the individual to the nation, etc. In the circumstances, it was necessary to consider the relationship of the individual with the family.

Discussion of the First Sentence of Article 13

MR. CASSIN (France) was in favour of retaining the first sentence.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) thought there was no purpose in laying down that the family was based on marriage because it could hardly be based upon anything else.

[11]

MR. MALIK (Lebanon), Rapporteur, considered that a distinction should be made in the possible types of association. There could be family without the solemn ceremony of marriage.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) noted a contradiction in this because a marriage was possible even if it was not solemnized, and he thought that the family, that is to say, the children, should be protected in all cases.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the question of whether or not the first sentence of article 13 should be retained.

The vote was taken.

There were three votes for, three against and two abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN ruled that the first sentence was deleted, but the representatives of the United Kingdom, Lebanon and France opposed this interpretation.

After a short discussion, the question was again put to the vote at the suggestion of the Lebanese representative.

It was decided to delete the first sentence by four votes to three, with one abstention.

Second sentence

THE CHAIRMAN recalled the proposal submitted by the Commission on the Status of Women. As the representative of the United States of America, she wished to propose the following which appeared preferable to her:

[12]

“Men and women shall have the same rights to contract marriage in accordance with the law.”

MR. CASSIN (France) feared that by stressing equality of rights the fundamental point of freedom of consent was being overlooked. He recalled that France had proposed the following text which bore in mind the proposal of the International Alliance of Women:

“Men and women of the age of puberty shall have the same freedom to contract marriage in accordance with the law.”

THE CHAIRMAN thought that the wording proposed by the United States of America was wider.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) considered the point raised by the French representative was important and he recalled the amendment which he had already proposed:

“Marriage shall not be contracted before the age of puberty and without the full consent of both intending spouses.”

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) was in favour of the amendment proposed by the United Kingdom representative which had the merit of covering the idea expressed by the French representative as well as laying down the equality of men and women in marriage. He thought that it should be established that men and women had the same fundamental right to dissolve marriage, although this was not recognized in all countries.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon), Rapporteur, noticed a difference between the text adopted at Geneva and the amendment proposed by the United Kingdom: the latter brought the question within the purview of the authorities, instead of emphasizing the fundamental right of men and women to contract marriage.

[13]

MR. VAN ISTENDAEL (International Federation of Christian Trade Unions) drew the Committee's attention to the controversy which the text proposed by the Commission on the Status of Women might raise. The dissolution of marriage was unacceptable to millions of Christians and the text proposed was consequently in contradiction to that belief. He thought that the principle of complete equality between men and women should be maintained and those who wished to interpret that principle as being applicable also to the dissolution of marriage could do so without thereby hurting the feelings of Christians.

THE CHAIRMAN put the text proposed by the Commission on the Status of Women to the vote.

The text was rejected by three votes to one, with two abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN then put the following United States amendment to the vote:

“Men and women shall have equal rights as to marriage in accordance with the law.”

The United States amendment was adopted by five votes to none, with one abstention.

After a short discussion, the Chairman put the following United Kingdom amendment to the vote:

“Marriage shall not be contracted without the consent of the two parties and before the age of puberty.”

The United Kingdom text was adopted unanimously.

Paragraph 2

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) considered that while the State could protect women, Society could not, and he proposed replacing the words “by the State and Society” by the words “by the law”.

[14]

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) noted the difference between article 13 and article 26. Article 26 laid down the right of the family to social protection in the sense that the social legislation of the State should ensure the protection of the family. Article 13, however, laid down the moral and spiritual rights of the family; that was a wider conception and should be retained.

The Committee was drawing up a declaration and not a convention; it could, therefore, be stated that Society should protect the family and it would be for the State to promulgate the necessary laws.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) considered it better to speak of the State and Society, rather than of the law.

He proposed the following text:

“Marriage and the family as well as the equality of rights of the spouses in marriage shall be protected by the State and Society.”

THE CHAIRMAN remarked that the point raised by the USSR representative was already covered by the United States amendment.

MR. CASSIN (France) agreed with the representatives of Chile and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and considered that mention of the protection of the law alone would belittle the family and marriage. He also thought that the United States amendment already adopted made the amendment proposed by the USSR representative purposeless.

THE CHAIRMAN put the United Kingdom amendment to the vote.

[15]

The United Kingdom amendment was not accepted, by three votes to three, with one abstention.

The USSR amendment was rejected by three votes to two, with two abstentions.

Paragraph 2, as adopted at Geneva, was retained by three votes to one, with three abstentions.

The meeting rose at 5:50 p.m.

Report of the Drafting Sub-Committee Consisting of the Representatives of Chile, China, United States of America, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, on Articles 5, 6, 7 of the International Declaration on Human Rights (Document E/600)

No person may be arbitrarily deprived of his liberty. Arrest or detention may be allowed only in the cases, and according to procedures, established by pre-existing law.

Everyone who has been deprived of his liberty has the right to be promptly informed of the charges against him and to have the legality of his arrest or detention ascertained in a fair hearing before a court within the shortest possible time or to release.

Everyone is entitled to:

- (a) Freedom from torture or mutilation, or cruel or inhuman punishment or indignity;
- (b) The right to a fair hearing in conformity with law before an independent and impartial tribunal in the determination of his rights and obligations;
- (c) The right in all criminal cases to be presumed innocent until proved guilty, and to a public trial within a reasonable time in accordance with pre-existing law;
- (d) The right to compensation in respect of any unlawful arrest or deprivation of liberty.

Comments from Governments on the Draft International Declaration on Human Rights, Draft International Covenant on Human Rights and the Question of Implementation (Communication received from Sweden)

Stockholm, May 11, 1948

Sir,

I beg to advise that the Draft of International Bill of Human Rights referred to in your letter of January 9, 1948, No. SOA/17/1/01/JH, has been examined by the Swedish Government. This examination has been of a preliminary nature. Its first object has been that of finding out to what extent Swedish law might be compatible with the Bill. The outcome of such an examination is presented below. The question of the implementation of the principles laid down in the Bill has not been the subject of any closer examination. The Swedish Government do therefore reserve their right to propose formal as well as material amendments to the Bill at such time as the Bill shall have been submitted to the General Assembly.

The principles laid down in the Draft of International Declaration on Human Rights are mostly identical with principles either expressly stated in the Swedish Constitution or otherwise embodied in Swedish law. From a Swedish point of view it would therefore be most gratifying if these principles were raised to the international level and fitted into the system of international law. It should be noted, however, that on certain points present Swedish law is not quite compatible with the Declaration. Thus with regard to Article 7(2) there is reason to point out that Swedish law is rigidly governed by the principle that no one shall be subject to punishment for an act that was not punishable at the time when committed. With regard to Article 14 it should be borne in mind that the right of aliens to acquire real property is restricted by Swedish law. Furthermore, a close examination of the extent to which the principle of equal opportunity to hold public office, as expressed in [2] Article 22, may be acknowledged by Swedish law reveals that, strictly speaking, said principle – otherwise established in Swedish law – does not apply to the posts of cabinet ministers, holders of such office according to an old provision of the Swedish Constitution being obliged to belong to the Swedish State Church. Also the principle laid down in Article 24(2) of the Declaration that women shall work with the same advantages as men is a basic rule which in Sweden may not have penetrated into all professions.

The question whether the Draft International Covenant on Human Rights is compatible with Swedish law requires a profound study, which it has not yet been possible to complete. As far as basic principles are concerned, it is however possible already at this time to state that the principles laid down in the Draft Covenant are essentially in agreement with deeply rooted Swedish rules of law. Comments on individual articles given below are merely intended to emphasize certain points of possible disagreement between Swedish law and said articles. It seems that these points may need some further explanation.

Article 6 of the Draft Covenant states that it shall be unlawful to subject any person to any form of medical or scientific experimentation against his will. According to Swedish law persons suspected of having been intoxicated while driving motor vehicles shall undergo blood tests regardless of whether they consent to it or not. Also in paternity cases the judge may order the mother to undergo blood tests regardless of her consent. The Swedish Government take it that legal actions of this nature would not be inconsistent with the article just quoted.

According to Swedish law vagrants as well as persons neglecting their duty of maintenance imposed by law may be required to perform forced labour. Swedish law also states that persons belonging to said two categories as well as alcoholics may be detained against their will and confined to special institutions. Naturally actions of this nature are subject to legal control. Nevertheless, they may not be in full agreement with Articles 8 and 9 of the Draft Covenant. What has already been remarked about Article 7(2) of the Draft Declaration obviously applies also to Article 14 of the Draft Covenant. As regards the principle of freedom of religion as expressed in Article 16 of the Draft Covenant it should be observed that according to Swedish law any member of the Swedish State Church who wishes to relinquish his membership is legally unable to do so, unless he becomes a member of certain other congregations recognized by the Swedish State. It is thus legally impossible for a Swedish citizen to leave the Swedish State Church for the reason of [3] joining a religious group not recognized by the Swedish State or for that of remaining outside of any confessional organization. A new law liberalizing these provisions is however now being prepared.

The report of the Commission on Human Rights contains, in addition to the Bill, a number of suggestions relating to the implementation thereof. The Swedish Government hold the view that they could not examine these suggestions already at this time.

Summary Record of the Thirty-Ninth Meeting [of the Drafting Committee, Second Session]

Held at Lake Success, New York, on Wednesday,
19 May 1948, at 10:30 a.m.

Chairman: Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, United States of America. Members: Mr. Heywood, Australia; Mr. Santa Cruz, Chile; Mr. Wu, China; Professor Cassin, France; Mr. Azkoul, Lebanon; Mr. Pavlov, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics; Mr. Wilson, United Kingdom. Non-Governmental Organizations: Miss T. Sender, American Federation of Labor; Mr. A. J. van Istendael, International Federation of Christian Trade Unions; Mr. O. F. Nolde, World Federation of United Nations Associations. Secretariat: Professor Humphrey, Director, Division of Human Rights; Mr. Lawson, Division of Human Rights.

[2]

1. Consideration of the Report of the Drafting Sub-Committee on Articles 5, 6 and 7 of the Draft International Declaration on Human Rights (document E/CN.4/AC.1/40)

THE CHAIRMAN observed that the words “arrest or” at the beginning of the second sentence of the first paragraph should be deleted. She added that during the discussion in the Sub-Committee, the USSR representative had expressed the desire that sub-paragraph (c) of document E/CN.4/AC.1/40 should be supplemented by the addition of article 7, paragraph 2 of the Geneva text. Mr. Pavlov also wished to include in the Declaration the right of a person to receive all documents in a language familiar to him and to have the services of an interpreter, if the Court used a language he did not understand.

MR. CASSIN (France) considered that article 7, paragraph 2 would be more appropriate in the Declaration than in the Covenant. He added that provisions concerned with criminal law should be separated from civil provisions.

The idea of compensation for arbitrary arrest should be included in the Covenant but not in the Declaration.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) suggested that the Committee might revert to article 6 of the Declaration (document E/CN.4/AC.1/20) for the determination of civil rights and obligations, or else adopt the relevant text drawn up at the Bogotá Conference. He accepted the drafting of the first paragraph of the Sub-Committee’s report and agreed with Mr. Cassin on the necessity of separating criminal provisions from civil provisions.

MISS SENDER (American Federation of Labor) pointed out that the article submitted by the Sub-Committee made no reference to an accused person’s right to choose his representative. She also considered that sub-paragraph (c) should apply to political as well as to criminal cases.

[3]

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) thought that Miss Sender’s interpretation of the word “criminal” was too narrow; it applied to political cases as well as to those of a strictly criminal nature.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) proposed a number of additions and amendments to the text submitted by the Sub-Committee. In his view it was necessary:

1. To add the following phrase to the text of the article, in order to avoid possible discrimination: “All men are equal before the Court”;
2. To add paragraph 2 of article 7: “Nothing in this article shall prejudice the trial and punishment of any person for the commission of any act which, at the time it was committed, was criminal according to the general principles of law recognized by civilized nations.” The words “democratic countries” should be substituted for “civilized nations”;

3. To retain sub-paragraph (d) on the right to compensation in respect of any unlawful arrest or deprivation of liberty. He considered the question of compensation to be of primary importance, since it was a general principle that should be included in the Declaration;
4. To add a paragraph regarding the right “to have the aid of a qualified representative of his own choice, and if he appears in person to have the procedure explained to him in a manner in which he can understand it and to use a language which he can speak”;
5. To state that “No person shall be imprisoned in consequence of mere inability to fulfil a contractual obligation.”

Mr. Pavlov also emphasized that judicial procedure must be based on democratic principles.

MR. WU (China) proposed that the Drafting Committee should adopt the provisions already initiated in the draft International Covenant regarding the choice of a qualified representative and the services of an interpreter to assist the accused if he could not understand or speak the language used by the Court.

[4]

He proposed that those two principles should be included as paragraphs (c) and (d). Paragraphs (c) and (d) of the article would thus become (e) and (f).

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) thought that the text submitted by the Sub-Committee should be divided into two articles, the first concerning detention and the procedure relating thereto, and the second concerning judicial procedure proper.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) considered that in view of the obvious wish of several members of the Committee to amplify the text of the Declaration, the Committee could adopt the provisions of the Covenant; but he himself did not share that wish. The Declaration should only include general principles. He pointed out that the Commission on Human Rights had asked the Committee to draft the articles of the Declaration as concisely as possible.

He thought, therefore, that the article in question should contain only the following general principles:

1. No person may be arbitrarily arrested or detained.
2. Everyone shall have the right to a fair hearing.
3. Any accused person is presumed to be innocent until proved guilty.
4. Everyone shall have access to independent and impartial tribunals.
5. Criminal laws may not be retroactive.
6. No one shall be subjected to torture or inhuman treatment.

THE CHAIRMAN, speaking as representative of the United States, expressed her agreement with the United Kingdom representative. She was opposed to the inclusion of paragraph 2 of article 7, proposed by Mr. Cassin. On the other hand, she would accept the insertion of the paragraphs on presumption of innocence and the right of the accused to be defended by a representative of his own choice.

[5]

MR. CASSIN (France) agreed with the representative of Chile that the paragraphs on detention and trial must be examined separately. He also agreed with the United Kingdom representative that only the main general principles should be stated, without going into detail. In his opinion, however, the paragraph on war criminals did not constitute an implementation problem but was a fundamental principle of the community of nations.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) thought that the Declaration should be a separate document, independent of the Covenant, so that Governments might adhere either to the Declaration or to the Covenant without being obliged to adhere to both. Consequently, all the general principles should be included in both documents. He pointed out that the amendments and additions proposed by the USSR delegation consisted of general principles such as:

1. All persons shall be equal before the courts.
2. Judicial procedure shall be based on democratic principles.
3. Article 7, paragraph 2 concerning war criminals.
4. A person's right to be defended by a representative of his own choice, to have the services of an interpreter, to speak in his native language, to receive compensation for unlawful arrest.

With regard to imprisonment for breach of contractual obligations, he thought that although that provision was not, strictly speaking, a general principle, it would be useful to include it in the Declaration. He proposed that his amendment on the equality of persons before the courts should be inserted in the first paragraph of the article. The other amendments could be inserted in the second paragraph.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) observed that the USSR representative seemed to think that the Declaration and Covenant constituted two alternative documents; he also pointed out that the equality of persons [6] before the law was already included in article 3, paragraph 2.

In his opinion, the paragraph on war criminals should appear either in the Declaration or in the Covenant, but not in both documents. He agreed with the representatives of France and of Chile on the necessity of separating the paragraphs dealing with arrest and trial.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) considered that the concept of equality before the courts differed from that of equality before the law. He suggested that a vote should first be taken on the first two paragraphs of the article and on the amendments dealing with imprisonment for breach of contractual obligations and compensation for unlawful arrest.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) thought that the relation between the Covenant and the Declaration must be determined at once. The Declaration should be an expression of the human intellect inspired by the conscience of mankind; the Covenant, on the other hand, was determined not only by intellectual, but also by practical considerations. Consequently, the Declaration should be wider than the Covenant.

THE CHAIRMAN decided that the text submitted by the Sub-Committee and the various amendments would be voted on during the afternoon meeting.

2. Consideration of Article 15, Concerning Nationality (document E/CN.4/AC.1/20)

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) suggested the following amendment to the first sentence of the article:

“Persons shall not be deprived of their nationality, which they have acquired at birth, unless possessing another nationality.”

He thought that the second sentence should be deleted in view of the decision taken by the Sub-Committee that obligations could not be imposed upon the United Nations in a similar case concerning the right to asylum.

[7]

THE CHAIRMAN, speaking as representative of the United States, suggested the deletion of article 15. She thought that the problem of stateless persons should be left to the Economic and Social Council.

MR. CASSIN (France) pointed out that the Geneva text had been approved by the French Government. He thought that the work of the Economic and Social Council on statelessness should not prevent the General Assembly from condemning it in principle. The purpose of article 15 was to express one of the general principles of mankind and to affirm that every human being should be a member of a national group. The United Nations should contribute to putting an end to statelessness by urging the necessary measures upon sovereign States. He pointed out that the responsibility of a community of nations in respect of statelessness was no novelty. The Nansen passports<sup>80</sup> introduced by the League of Nations proved that. Every person had a right to legal protection. He recalled that since the war, France had made it a strict rule not to declare forfeiture of nationality. It was the duty of the <sup>80</sup> So-called “Nansen passports” were issued by the High Commissioner for Refugees, Fridtjof Nansen, who was named to the post by the League of Nations. They facilitated travel by stateless persons and refugees, initially for those fleeing the civil war in Russia and, over the years, in many other contexts. In 1938, Nansen received the Nobel Peace Prize for his pioneering work.

Commission on Human Rights to prepare the work of the General Assembly, with a view to granting everyone the right to nationality.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) asked the French representative whether he thought that every individual should be forced to choose his nationality if circumstances so required.

MR. CASSIN (France) replied that the solution of technical problems of nationality was not the Committee's present concern; however, unlimited freedom should not be granted to the individual. He considered that nationality could legitimately be imposed upon the individual to avoid confusion.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) asked who would be authorized to take measures imposing a nationality.

[8]

MR. CASSIN (France) replied that a solution could only be found through international agreements sponsored by the United Nations.

The Drafting Committee decided not to delete article 15, by three votes to three, with one abstention.

The Committee rejected the United Kingdom amendment to article 15 by four votes to two, with one abstention. (Amendment quoted above).

The Committee decided to retain the first sentence of article 15: "Everyone has the right to a nationality," by three votes to three, with one abstention.

MR. CASSIN (France) suggested that the second sentence of article 15 should be replaced by the following text: "It is the duty of the United Nations, as well as the States Members, to prevent statelessness."

The Committee rejected the amendment by four votes to two, with one abstention.

The Committee decided to delete the second sentence of article 15 by four votes to two with one abstention.

The Committee did not vote on the third sentence, which was rendered superfluous by the deletion of the second.

The meeting rose at 1 p.m.

Draft International Declaration on Human Rights (Continuation of discussion)

Article 16

THE CHAIRMAN read the article and recalled that comments on it had been submitted by the Netherlands, Mexico and Brazil (document E/CN.4/85, pp. 31 and 32). The United States of America, preferring an explicit statement of the principle of freedom of religion, had presented an amendment (document E/CN.4/AC.1/20, page 7), but was prepared to support the Geneva text.

MR. CASSIN (France) pointed out that the text proposed by the French Government (document E/CN.4/82/Add.8) retained the Geneva draft for the first paragraph, with the following purely drafting amendment in the second paragraph: "Every person has the right, either alone or in association, to manifest his beliefs, subject to respect for public order, by teaching and practising them, and by worship and observance."

At the request of MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile), THE CHAIRMAN read out the relevant text adopted for the draft Covenant. The Chairman added that the United States of America had proposed the following drafting amendment in accordance with the principles of the Geneva text: "Everyone is entitled to freedom of religion, conscience, and belief, including the right, either alone, or in community with other persons of like mind, to hold and manifest any religious or other belief, to change belief, and to practise any form of religious worship and observance." (document E/CN.4/AC.1/20, page 7).

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) supported that text.

In reply to a question by MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics), THE CHAIRMAN explained that the Geneva text pertained to freedom "of conscience and belief" only, while the United States proposal would specifically add to it freedom of religion.

[3]

MR. CASSIN (France) remarked that in French freedom of religion was already implied in the concept of "freedom of conscience and belief" of which the former, although important, was only a part. However, he would not object to the addition of the word “religion”.

On the other hand, the expression “Everyone is entitled to . . .”, had no force when translated literally into French: (“Toute personne peut se prévaloir du droit à . . .”). It would be better to come straight to the point by saying “Everyone has the right to . . .”

THE CHAIRMAN thought that the English version might state: “Everyone has the right of freedom. . .”, which could then be rendered into French as follows: “Toute personne a la liberté de conscience, de religion, de pensée, . . .etc.”

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) thought that it would be well to add to the second paragraph another sentence on the right to convert other persons to one’s own belief.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) felt that a formal declaration was not enough, and requested that the article should be drafted in more forceful terms, guaranteeing the freedom of conscience in the following manner:

“Every person shall have the right to freedom of thought and to freedom to practise religious observances in accordance with the laws of the country and the dictates of public morality”.

In order to avoid further discussion, MR. WU (China) proposed that the Committee should revert to the Geneva draft of article 16.

THE CHAIRMAN said that the United States of America was prepared to withdraw its amendment in favour of the Geneva draft, but pointed out that there was still the USSR amendment to be considered.

[4]

MR. CASSIN (France) also supported the Geneva text, subject to the following drafting amendment to the last sentence: “de manifester ses croyances par leur enseignement et leur pratique, et par le culte et l’accomplissement des rites”. The English version would read: “to manifest his belief in teaching, practice, worship and observance.”

THE CHAIRMAN put the following USSR amendment to the vote:

“Every person shall have the right to freedom of thought and freedom to practise religious observances in accordance with the laws of the country and the dictates of public morality”.

The USSR amendment was rejected by 4 votes to 1 with 2 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN then put the Geneva text to the vote together with the following amendment, proposed by the French representative: “to manifest his belief in teaching, practice, worship and observance.”

The amended text was adopted by 6 votes to none with 1 abstention.

Articles 5, 6 and 7

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) proposed a new arrangement of the articles. The first article would begin with the two first paragraphs of the drafting sub-committee's report, followed by an amendment proposed by Chile: "No person shall be imprisoned merely on the grounds of inability to meet a contractual obligation." That text could also be replaced by article 10 of the draft Covenant.

The second amendment would serve to settle problems of arrest and detention. It read as follows:

"Everyone has the right to compensation in respect of any unlawful arrest or deprivation of liberty."

A second article would follow dealing with the legal procedure and the rights of the individual in case of accusation. The article would begin as follows:

"The rights and obligations of every person confronted with a criminal accusation must be determined or judged by independent and impartial tribunals."

At that point, the following USSR amendment might be [5] included:

"...tribunals which are governed by democratic principles."

The text would then continue:

"...impartial and independent tribunals, before which all persons are equal".

The next paragraph would define the judgment:

"Everyone accused of an offence must be judged within a reasonable time by courts established beforehand and in accordance with pre-existing laws in a public trial."

Certain concepts, taken from the last part of the sub-committee's report, would follow. The text might state: "In the judgments and decisions, everyone has the right to:" – followed by paragraphs (a), (b) and (c) of the sub-committee's report. A paragraph (d) would deal with the right of defence including the question of interpreters, as provided in the USSR proposal.

Finally, the Committee might express its views with regard to the USSR proposal to take up again article 7, paragraph 2, dealing with war criminals.

THE CHAIRMAN opened discussion on the Chilean proposals.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) thought that most of the United Kingdom amendments were met either by the sub-committee's proposals or by the Chilean amendments.

MR. CASSIN (France) thought that the Chilean suggestions were interesting. It would be necessary, however, to weigh the provisions carefully, in order to achieve the necessary conciseness and precision in drafting.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) would have liked to see some parts of his previously proposed amendments inserted in the sub-committee draft. He would agree to basing the discussion on the composite draft presented by Chile which he supported in principle, subject to a few amendments. He recalled that his proposal stated: "All persons are equal before the tribunals" and not: "before the law".

[6]

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote first the United Kingdom amendment to replace the first two paragraphs of the sub-committee draft by the following sentence: "No one may be subjected to arbitrary arrest or detention."

The United Kingdom amendment was not adopted. Three votes were cast in favour of the amendment, and 3 against, with 1 abstention.

THE CHAIRMAN read the first paragraph of the sub-committee draft.

MR. HEYWARD (Australia) and MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) felt that the words "arrest" and "detention" should be retained. While arrests were made by legal authorities, detentions could be caused by anyone.

MR. CASSIN (France) considered the expression "can be authorized" to be inexact since arrest or detention could, in fact, occur without authorization. It would be simpler and better to use at that point the text of the draft declaration, article 5. The text would then read:

"No one may be arbitrarily deprived of his liberty. Arrest or detention may be allowed only according to pre-existing law and in accordance with due process."

On the suggestion of MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics), the Chairman put the first sentence to the vote first:

"No one may be arbitrarily deprived of his liberty."

The text was adopted by 6 votes to none.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the English text should begin with the words "No one" instead of the words "No person"; she then opened the discussion of Mr. Cassin's proposed text for the second sentence.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) requested that the word "imprisonment" should be added to the words: "arrest" and "detention". In Russian, at any rate, the three words had different connotations.

[7]

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) supported that suggestion. Arrest and detention were measures taken by authorities or tribunals during the period of inquiry, or during the trial, while imprisonment constituted a punishment. Moreover, the discussion had shown that it would be better not to enter into legalistic terminology. The representative of Chile consequently proposed a more general formula:

“No one may be arbitrarily deprived of his liberty, except in accordance with pre-existing law and in accordance with due process.”

MR. CASSIN (France) might accept the additional word: “imprisonment”. If, however, as the representative of Chile had proposed, a more general formula was to be accepted, it would be best to revert to the first sentence of article 5 of the Geneva text, which read:

“No one shall be deprived of his personal liberty or kept in custody except in cases prescribed by law and after due process.”

THE CHAIRMAN remarked that the first sentence of the sub-committee text had already been adopted. For the second sentence, Mr. Cassin’s proposed formulation might be accepted:

“Arrest or detention may be allowed only according to pre-existing law and in accordance with due process.”

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) thought that imprisonment should be mentioned together with arrest and detention, as suggested by the USSR representative. But it would be simpler to adopt a formula avoiding legal definitions, and to state, for instance, after the principle was laid down:

“Deprivation of liberty is only allowed according to pre-existing laws and in accordance with due process.”

MR. WU (China) wondered if the discussion served any useful purpose. He proposed simply accepting the Geneva text and going on to the following articles. [8]

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) agreed.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) would regret the adoption of such a solution, after a three day discussion during which improvements had been made. He proposed the insertion of the words: “arrest, detention, and imprisonment”.

MR. CASSIN (France) did not think the problem was very complicated. It could be solved by incorporating the word “imprisonment” in the sub-committee text. With regard to the remainder of the text, a more satisfactory French draft would be possible, but the present drafting was acceptable.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) also proposed to use the three words “arrest, detention, and imprisonment”. Their meaning was undoubtedly very similar, but each however had an exact and different meaning. “Arrest”, for instance, was used more in an administrative sense; “detention” had, in some way, a political character (reference was often made to political detention); “imprisonment” was punishment for a crime or an infringement of the law. As the three words did not have exactly the same meaning, there was no disadvantage, and probably some advantage, in using all three.

THE CHAIRMAN said that the United States delegation did not object to the inclusion of the word “imprisonment” and would like to see the sentence adopted with the addition of that word.

MR. WU (China) would generally favour the sub-committee text, which contained the essential ideas expressed in articles 5, 6 and 7 of the Geneva text in abridged form. If the USSR representative insisted that the text should be replaced by his own draft, however, the Chinese delegation would agree.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the various suggestions submitted had resulted in the following text:

[9]

“Arrest, detention or imprisonment may be allowed only according to pre-existing law and in accordance with due process.”

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) stated that he could not find what had been proposed by the sub-committee in that text.

MR. CASSIN (France) affirmed that all the essential ideas of the sub-committee had been faithfully interpreted.

THE CHAIRMAN stated that in order to reach an agreement on the different points of view expressed, it would be necessary to put both texts to the vote.

The text supported by Mr. Cassin was adopted by 3 votes to 2, with 2 abstentions.

The Committee passed to the examination of the second paragraph.

MR. CASSIN (France) asked that the difference between the two very distinct ideas evoked by the text should be clearly established.

There was first of all the question of the legality of arrest. But an arrest might be legal at the moment when it was made and become an abuse owing to prolongation of the detention. It was then that the necessity for trial within a reasonable time arose. To avoid any misunderstanding on that point, Mr. Cassin proposed the following text:

“. . . to immediate judicial determination the legality of any detention to which he may be subject and to trial within a reasonable time or to release.”

In other words, a distinction should be made between the necessity for controlling the legality of the measures for arrest, and the necessity for trial and verdict, within a reasonable period of time.

THE CHAIRMAN said that her delegation would favour the drafting sub-committee text, which was more in accordance with the national legislation of the United States. [10]

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) supported Mr. Cassin's views.

THE CHAIRMAN thought that the text should first of all specify the principal fact, which was that any individual who was arrested should be promptly tried or freed; that should be followed by the idea of verifying the legality of the arrest.

MR. CASSIN (France) thought it was preferable to deal with the facts in their chronological order, as was done in the Geneva text.

THE CHAIRMAN remarked that that order was respected in the sub-committee text.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) stated that certain ambiguities would have been avoided by adopting the text he had proposed. He would take it up again in the plenary session of the Commission. He considered, however, the Geneva text would be preferable to that of the sub-committee for the reasons expressed by the representatives of France and Chile.

THE CHAIRMAN asked Mr. Cassin if he would be willing to accept the Geneva text in place of the one proposed by the sub-committee.

MR. CASSIN (France) replied in the affirmative with the reservation that one correct idea should be taken from the sub-committee text, that was, the obligation to notify the accused of the charges made against him. That idea had been omitted from the Geneva text, and it was necessary to correct that omission. Mr. Cassin added that he would be more willing to accept the proposed substitution if, in the English text, the words "a reasonable time" were replaced by "the shortest delay".

As a result of the various suggestions made, the Committee had before it the following text:

"Everyone who has been deprived of his liberty has the right to be promptly informed of the reasons for his detention [11] and to immediate judicial determination of the legality of any measures to which he may be subject and to trial within a reasonable time or to release."

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) proposed that the part of the text on which there appeared to be general agreement should be put to the vote as had been done previously.

THE CHAIRMAN put the following sentence to the vote:

"Everyone who has been deprived of his liberty has the right to be promptly informed of the reasons for his detention."

The sentence was approved by 5 votes to none, with 2 abstentions.

With regard to the last part of the paragraph, the Chairman thought it might be preferable to return to the Geneva text.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) stated that whatever text was adopted should contain sufficient guarantees with regard to the notification to the accused of the charges made against him, and the time within which he would be tried. Mr. Pavlov added that that period of time should not only be as short as possible, but he asked for measures which would make it possible to fix a date for the trial from the moment of the accused's detention.

According to THE CHAIRMAN, the Geneva text covered that requirement perfectly.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) wished to define the scope of the present discussion. What was in question was not, in his opinion, the time which the tribunal would require to judge a case, at the appropriate moment with complete independence, and within a period of time which, it was simply stated should be reasonable. What was in question was the duty of the authority, arresting an individual, to place him, without delay, at the disposal of the courts.

MR. HEYWARD (Australia) supported the Geneva text.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) stated that he would also return to the Geneva text, but that he wished to make it more specific. He expressed his thought by taking as an example a person suspected of stealing. Once that person was arrested, it would be necessary, first of all, to give a competent opinion on the legality of the arrest. But that was not sufficient; it would also be necessary for the arrested person to know the period of time within which he would be tried, as his detention could not be prolonged indefinitely merely on suspicion. That suspicion must be either specified or abandoned within a reasonable time.

MR. CASSIN (France) agreed that the idea expressed by the USSR representative was very interesting but he thought that the Committee should remain within certain limits. The best measures established by the Geneva text and by the sub-committee had been retained, but the boat must not be overloaded, as that would bring the risk of even those governments who had the greatest respect for individual liberty, rejecting the text finally drawn up.

The USSR representative's suggestion was rejected by 2 votes to 1, with 4 abstentions.

The next text put to the vote was taken from the Geneva draft, with the addition of the word "imprisonment", and the measures previously adopted with regard to the notification of the charges. The text read as follows:

"Everyone who has been deprived of his liberty has the right to be promptly informed of the charges made against him.

“Everyone placed under arrest, detention or imprisonment shall have the right to immediate judicial determination of the measures taken against him and to trial within a reasonable time or to release.”

Those paragraphs were adopted by 5 votes to none, with 2 abstentions.

[14]

THE CHAIRMAN requested the Committee to decide on various amendments, the first of which followed the old Geneva draft of the international covenant.

“No one shall be imprisoned or held in servitude merely on the grounds of inability to meet a contractual obligation.”

The amendment was adopted by 3 votes to 1, with 3 abstentions.

A second amendment, based on paragraph (d) of the last sub-paragraph of the Draft Committee’s proposals, was as follows:

“Everyone has a right to compensation in respect of any unlawful arrest or illegal deprivation of liberty.”

The amendment was adopted by 4 votes to 2, with 1 abstention.

The next item under consideration was an amendment submitted by the Chilean delegation, which did not appear in either the Sub-Committee or the Geneva text.

“The rights and obligations of each person and the criminal accusations against him must be determined or judged by independent and impartial tribunals, before which tribunals all persons are equal.”

The USSR delegation submitted the following amendment to that text:

“The judicial procedure of each state must be established on democratic principles.”

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) asked that a vote should first be taken on his amendment, with which everyone should be in agreement.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) stated that he would vote against the amendment because he feared that the expression “democratic principles” did not mean the same thing to him and to his USSR colleague.

The USSR amendment was rejected by 3 votes to 1, with 3 abstentions.

[15]

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the first part of the Chilean amendment which read:

“The rights and obligations of each person and the criminal accusations against him must be determined or judged by independent and impartial tribunals. . .”

The text was adopted by 3 votes to none, with 4 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put the last part of the Chilean amendment to the vote.
It read:

“...before which tribunals all persons are equal.”

The Chairman pointed out that the text fulfilled the aim of the USSR representative who favoured the following text: “All men are equal before the law.”

The end of the Chilean amendment was adopted by 3 votes to 1, with 3 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN called for discussion of the following Chilean proposal:

“Any person accused of an offence shall be tried within a reasonable time, in accordance with the law in force and in a public trial.”

MR. CASSIN (France) thought that the text should be limited to the passage providing for public trial, and that the reference to “reasonable time” might be omitted in the interest of brevity. It was already mentioned.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) replied that the provision previously adopted specified that any individual placed under arrest must be brought to trial within a reasonable time, while the text under discussion involved the statement that the trial of any accused person, whether under arrest or not, must take place within a reasonable time.

[16]

THE CHAIRMAN put the following amendment to the vote:

“Any person accused of an offence must be judged within a reasonable time by courts established beforehand and in accordance with the law in force at the time the offence was committed and in a public trial.”

The amendment was adopted 2 votes to 1, with 4 abstentions.

MR. CASSIN (France) said that he had not realized that the text contained the words “in accordance with the law in force at the time the offence was committed”. That clause honoured the principle of non-retroactivity of laws and, under those conditions, the representative of France agreed to have his vote added to those in favour of the text just approved.

THE CHAIRMAN then called for discussion of the next amendment, worded as follows:

“In judgments and rulings, everyone shall have the right:”

That text would be followed by the principles indicated in sub-paragraphs a), b), c) etc. of the Sub-Committee’s text.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) explained that some of the principles involved, for example the prohibition of torture and cruel or degrading treatment, applied not only to persons in custody but also to persons sentenced.

THE CHAIRMAN was of the opinion that, since the rest of the text related to trial procedure, the provision dealing with torture, mutilation, and cruel or degrading treatment should form a separate article. Moreover, that arrangement would give the text greater force.

[17]

MR. CASSIN (France) also believed that the provision should be placed at the end. The text under discussion involved trial procedure. Logically, the Committee should now consider the USSR amendment relating to war criminals which France supported. Actually that provision constituted an exception to the principle set forth in the paragraph which had just been adopted.

Next, the Committee should take up the problem of presumed innocence and only after that the question of torture and mutilation.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) had no objection to the proposal that the paragraph on torture, mutilation etc. should be placed in a separate article. He also agreed that the Soviet amendment should be voted upon immediately.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) pointed out that his amendment was not a new text since it merely repeated paragraph 2 of Article 7 of the Geneva draft.

THE CHAIRMAN read the text of the USSR amendment, which was:

“Nothing in this Article shall prejudice the fair trial of any person for the commission of any act which, at the time it was committed was criminal according to the general principles of law recognized by civilized nations.”

MR. CASSIN (France) agreed in principle with the text but would prefer that it be clarified as follows: “This provision shall not prejudice. . .” Actually the provision of the text immediately preceding was involved.

THE CHAIRMAN recalled that the United States did not favour provisions of that kind. If, however, the Committee decided otherwise, the text might read:

[18]

“These shall not prejudice the trial and punishment of any person for the commission of any act. . .”

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) felt that the word “these” lacked precision. He would prefer keeping the original text: “Nothing in this Article shall prejudice. . .” He would however accept: “The preceding provisions shall not prejudice. . .”

MR. CASSIN (France) accepted that wording.

THE CHAIRMAN put the following amendment to the vote:

“The preceding provisions shall not prejudice the trial and punishment of any person for the commission of any act, which at the time it was committed, was criminal according to the general principles of law recognized by civilized nations.”

The amendment was adopted by 4 votes to 1, with 2 abstentions.

The Chairman read the following amendment:

“During the trial everyone is entitled, in all criminal cases, to a fair hearing and to be presumed innocent until proved guilty.”

The USSR had proposed an amendment as follows:

“... is entitled to have full knowledge of all documents before the court and shall have the right to address the court in his native language.”

The representative of China had introduced an amendment guaranteeing defence but had withdrawn it.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) felt that it was not necessary to go into the details of defence since the forms might vary according to national legislation. What was necessary was to assure the guarantee of defence. Accordingly the USSR representative proposed the following:

[19]

“Every accused person is entitled to the right of defence. In case a person who does not know the language used by the court is prosecuted, the accused shall be entitled, through an interpreter, to be fully informed of the material in the case and to address the court in his own language.”

The idea had already been accepted when the covenant was discussed.

MR. CASSIN (France) observed that the statement “Pendant le jugement” might appear to limit the guarantees to the final procedure. It would be better for the French text to read: “Pendant toute la procédure”.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) accepted the USSR proposal in principle but thought it unnecessary to go into all the details. It would in any case be paradoxical for the declaration to be more detailed than the covenant. If the declaration must deal with the same ideas, it should at least repeat the terms of the covenant itself.

MR. WU (China) supported Mr. Wilson’s statement. The Geneva articles expressed the same principle and did it better than the proposed text. A declaration was not intended for the intellectual or the jurist but rather for the man in the street. The Chinese delegation would therefore vote against the amended article.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) stated that he would also vote against the amended article for the same reasons.

MR. HEYWARD (Australia) also felt that it would be better to retain the Geneva text.

THE CHAIRMAN was of the opinion that it would really be a pity merely to return to the original text after so long a debate.

MR. CASSIN (France) shared the misgivings expressed by his colleagues from China and the United Kingdom. The Committee, however, had accomplished useful work and should not lose hope. The representative of France proposed retention of the first texts adopted by the Committee up to its consideration of questions of criminal procedure. From that point on, the Committee could retain the wording of Article 7 of the Geneva draft and improve it by making it shorter.

THE CHAIRMAN felt that it was better not to reconsider texts which had already been voted upon. She proposed that the discussion, which in any case was nearing its end, should be closed and that both the Geneva text and the text drawn up by the Drafting Committee should be sent to the full Commission.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) supported the Chairman's proposal. He urged the Committee not to lose courage and to continue the discussion.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) considered the text of the Sub-Committee as well as the Geneva text acceptable provided that the version which was adopted included the statement that an accused person was entitled to be heard in his native language and the presumption that an accused person was innocent until proved guilty.

THE CHAIRMAN thought that the two texts could be sent to the Commission together and proposed a vote on the following paragraph:

“Any person being tried is entitled to a fair hearing. In criminal cases, the person being tried must be presumed innocent until proved guilty.

“When a person who does not know the national law is prosecuted, he shall be entitled, through an interpreter, to be fully informed of the material of the case and to address the court in his own language.”

It was decided to vote first on the last sentence. The sentence was adopted by 3 votes to 1, with 3 abstentions. The entire paragraph was adopted by 3 votes to none, with 4 abstentions.

Before the entire text was voted upon, MR. CASSIN (France) asked that the Geneva text and the text drawn up by the Drafting Committee should be submitted to the Commission. Technically he had the impression that the Committee had not distorted the text entrusted to it. From the standpoint of the majority, there was still a great deal to be achieved. He hoped that the Commission would aid in the task.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) did not oppose either of the two and also recommended the submission of both. He, however, felt that the Drafting Committee must by a vote express its opinion on the text drawn up in the course of its discussion.

The entire text was rejected by 3 votes to 2 with 2 abstentions. By 4 votes to 1 with 2 abstentions, the Committee decided to transmit to the full Commission both the Geneva text and the text which had been rejected.

By 6 votes to none, with 1 abstention, it was also decided to submit the following text to the Commission:

“No one shall be subjected to torture, mutilation or to cruel or inhuman treatment or indignity.”

Articles 17 and 18

THE CHAIRMAN recalled that the Commission had decided not to draft a definitive text of the two articles until it was informed of the opinion of the Conference on Freedom of Information. That Conference had recommended that the two articles should be combined in a single article for which it had proposed a text. Since, however, it would be difficult for the Committee [22] to reach any decision without a rather long discussion, the Chairman suggested that the question should be referred to the Commission which could reach a decision on the basis of the suggestions presented by the Conference on Freedom of Information or otherwise.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) stated that he would not oppose that procedure provided the Commission was at the same time notified of the proposals on the same subject drawn up by his delegation.

The Committee voted unanimously to transmit all texts in connection with Articles 17 and 18 to the full Commission.

The meeting rose at 5:40 p.m.

Draft of the Declaration on Human Rights (continuation of the discussion)

Article 19

THE CHAIRMAN read Article 19.

She suggested, on behalf of the United States delegation, that the words: “political, economic, religious, social, cultural, trade unions or any other” be replaced by the words: “for the promotion, defence and protection of purposes”.

MR. CASSIN (France) saw no objection to deleting the mention of the objections of the associations, especially as the words “trade unions” had already appeared in the part dealing with economic questions.

That did not, however, apply to the words “not inconsistent with this Declaration” as was proposed in the United States text on page 8 of document E/CN.4/AC.2/20.<sup>81</sup> The democracies had been in a tragic position during the years before the war. In the name of freedom they had given all the arms to those very people who had wished to destroy it. France wanted to remain liberal, but she could not on that account guarantee the right of association to persons who wished to organize fascism or massacre.

He thought that the Geneva text was still the best.

MR. WU (China) supported the United States text contained in document E/CN.4/AC.1/20.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) recalled the fairly recent campaigns by the trade unions for the recognition of the right of union association, and said that the Economic and Social Council and the General Assembly had instructed the Commission on Human Rights to examine all the comments on that matter made by the World Federation of Trade Unions, the American Federation of Labor etc., and to study how they could be written into the Declaration on Human Rights.

[3]

Under those circumstances he thought it useful to retain in Article 19 the catalogue of the political, economic, religious, social and cultural rights long recognized by the Constitutions of almost all the nations of the world, and, more recently, the right of trade union association.

<sup>81</sup> The reference should be to E/CN.4/AC.1/20.

THE CHAIRMAN wondered whether the addition of the words “association. . . for the object of promotion, defence and protection of political aims. . .” would not answer the purpose.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) thought that all the texts submitted had the same end in view, and he would, therefore, vote for them in the order in which they were presented.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) said that he would vote for the text which had just been submitted, although he would have preferred the words: “political, economic, religious, social, cultural, trade union or any other” to be deleted. Furthermore, he did not think the words “promotion, defence and protection” were necessary.

MR. CASSIN (France) stressed the importance of the Chilean representative’s statement. The old declaration on human rights in dealing with freedom of assembly had not had trade union organizations in view.

He wondered whether it would not be possible to leave out the catalogue, but to mention the right of trade union association. The text would then be as follows:

“Everyone has the right to freedom of peaceful assembly and to participate in local, national and international associations and trade union organizations whose purposes are not inconsistent with this Declaration.”

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) and MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) accepted that wording.
[4]

THE CHAIRMAN asked for the words “for the promotion, defence and protection of legitimate interests” to be added.

MR. CASSIN (France) approved of that idea.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) thought the word “legitimate” vague and liable to be misinterpreted. If occasion arose, the State would have to judge what aims were legitimate. The phrase: “not inconsistent with this declaration” seemed to him to cover the idea behind the word “legitimate”.

After a remark by MR. CASSIN (France), THE CHAIRMAN said that the word “purposes” in the English text had not been translated into French but that the meaning of both texts was nevertheless the same.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) would have preferred the aims to have been listed, the list not being exclusive.

Special reservation should, however, be made in regard to fascist and Nazi gatherings.

THE CHAIRMAN thought it would be difficult to insert the idea mentioned by the representative of the Soviet Union since it was unquestionably included in the declaration and therefore did not need special mention.

She repeated the reasons given by Mr. Cassin and Mr. Santa Cruz, why the right of trade union association should be mentioned.

In answer to a question by the Chairman, MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) asked for a vote on his amendment, which was to add to the proposed text a sentence to the following effect:

“Freedom of assembly or association should not be granted to fascists or Nazis, or for any other propaganda based on racial or national hatred or religious enmity.”

The text was rejected by 6 votes to 1, with 1 abstention.

MR. CASSIN (France) explained that he had voted against the addition proposed by the representative of the Soviet Union as he thought that the words “not inconsistent with this Declaration” specifically excluded recognition of the right of assembly for the purpose of hate propaganda, and that there was, therefore, no need to repeat them.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) replied that his text was broader than Mr. Cassin’s interpretation of it. It was not merely a question of right of assembly and freedom of association, but of forbidding fascists and Nazis to carry on hate propaganda, for example, in democratic meetings.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the following wording of Article 19:

“Everyone has the right to freedom of peaceful assembly and to participate in associations or organizations or local, national or international trade unions for the promotion, defence and protection of interests and aims not incompatible with this Declaration.”

The text was adopted by 6 votes to 1, with 1 abstention.

Article 20

THE CHAIRMAN read Article 20.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) objected to the inclusion of “or with the United Nations” and referred the members of the Committee to document E/CN.4/82/Add.9 which raised important questions and to the remarks of the delegation of the Union of South Africa (document E/CN.4/85, page 36). He preferred the text suggested by the French delegation, namely, “and in respect of human rights, the relevant organs of the United Nations”.

The question of petitions was closely linked with the implementation of the Declaration and that was why he suggested that no decision be taken until that problem had been solved.

THE CHAIRMAN supported that suggestion.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) pointed out that the right to petition dealt with in Article 20 did not only apply to human rights but to all rights, as was indicated in the comments by the Union of South Africa (document E/CN.4/85, page 36).

He then suggested adding at the end of Article 20 the following words taken from the Bogotá text: “. . .and the right to obtain prompt action thereon”.

The petitioner should know in fact that his request had been examined and be given a reply, whether favourable or not.

MISS SENDER (American Federation of Labor) thought especially that as the Declaration constituted an ideal, there was no need to fear providing for the right to petition, even if it was not yet applicable. Furthermore, the document under consideration included a recognition of other rights also not yet applied in some countries. Moreover, a certain number of communications, some of which were virtually petitions, had already been received by the United Nations.

MR. CASSIN (France) said that the observations of some Governments, particularly that of the United Kingdom, coincided with those of his Government. A distinction should be made between the right of petition within the domestic jurisdiction of a country and the right of petition to the United Nations. The Constitutions of almost every country in the world recognized the domestic right of petition unconditionally and without restrictions. But as far as the United Nations was concerned, as there was no question of sanctioning an ancient right, it should be clearly realized that a petition could only be serious in so far as the Organization was competent to deal with it.

[7]

THE CHAIRMAN, speaking as the United States representative, suggested that the words: “communicate with the United Nations” be used since the word “petition” might lead to misunderstandings.

The right to communicate with Governments should also be limited, and she proposed the following wording: “To petition the public authorities for redress of grievances.” Governments would be inclined to refuse to receive certain petitions, for example, from aliens in regard to elections.

MR. HEYWOOD (Australia) supported the French proposal and the Australian suggestion to reserve decision on that Article until the question of implementation was considered. Moreover, he preferred the word “petition” which was more precise to the expression “communicate with”.

MR. WU (China) approved of the Australian proposal. A very unfavourable impression would be created were the United Nations to decide that petitions could be sent to it without being in a position to take action on them.

It was decided by 6 votes to 1, with 1 abstention not to redraft Article 20 in final form until the Drafting Committee had considered the question of the implementation of the Declaration.

Articles 21 and 22

THE CHAIRMAN read Articles 21 and 22 as follows:

“Article 21

“Everyone, without discrimination, has the right to take an effective part in the Government of his country. The State shall conform to the will of the people as manifested by elections which shall be periodic, free, fair and by secret ballot.”

“Article 22

“1. Everyone shall have equal opportunity to engage in public employment and to hold public office in the State of which he is a citizen or a national.

“2. Access to public employment shall not be a matter of privilege or favour.”

[8]

She suggested considering the two texts together. The United States delegation had suggested combining them (document E/CN.4/AC.1/20).

After a somewhat prolonged discussion, the Committee approved Articles 21 and 22 by 2 votes to none, with 5 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN read the text proposed by the United States delegation (document E/CN.4/AC.1/20, pages 8 and 9) and added that the words: “without discrimination” had only been deleted because that idea was already included in Article 3. The same consideration prompted the deletion of paragraph 2 of Article 22 which stated:

“Access to public employment shall not be a matter of privilege or favour.”

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) read the Bogotá text:

“Every person having legal capacity is entitled to participate in the government of his country, directly or through his representative, and to take part in popular elections, which shall be by secret ballot, and shall be genuine, periodic, and free.”

MR. CASSIN (France) wished the new text to include the idea that a Government of a country must express the will of the people to which the State shall conform.

THE CHAIRMAN thought sub-paragraph (b) of her delegation’s text answered that proposal.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) preferred Article 21 of the Geneva text to sub-paragraph (b) of the United States text. It should be possible to incorporate it. If that were not done, he would vote against the United States text.

MR. WU (China) thought that the second sentence of Article 21 (text adopted at the second session of the Commission) was undesirable and should not be included. He suggested the following text:

[9]

“Everyone has the right to take an active part in the Government of his country, either directly or through representatives.”

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) supported that proposal. He would vote for it but, if it was rejected, he would propose that the second sentence of Article 21 be retained. Moreover, the first paragraph of Article 22 should become the second sub-paragraph of Article 21.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) was in favour of retaining the text adopted at the second session of the Commission for the same reason as was Mr. Cassin. He suggested redrafting the first sentence of the article as follows:

“Everyone, without discrimination, has the right to take an effective part, either personally or through his representative, in the Government of his country.”

The second sentence would not be changed, while the first sub-paragraph of Article 22 would be deleted. He did not mind whether paragraph 2 of Article 22 were deleted or not.

MR. CASSIN (France) pointed out that, in France, taking part in public affairs did not mean the same as holding public office. If it was desired to incorporate this latter idea, it would have to be stated specifically.

He pointed out, in regard to the words “everyone, without discrimination,” that both the right to vote and the right to hold public office presupposed legal capacity. The expression: “Every person having legal capacity” used at Bogotá should be employed.

THE CHAIRMAN asked Mr. Cassin and Mr. Santa Cruz to confer, as rapidly as possible, with a view to preparing a text to be voted on.

[10]

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) stressed the unsatisfactory character of Articles 21 and 22 of the draft adopted at the second session of the Commission. It was not sufficient to ask the French and Chilean representatives to submit a fresh text, if one remembered the comments on those two articles made by some countries such as the Union of South Africa, which wished some types of discrimination to be maintained by preventing certain categories of persons (illiterates) from taking part in elections, by excluding the coloured populations, as far as possible, from taking part in public affairs, or by making the access of public office conditional on ownership of a certain amount of property.

In order to ensure that suffrage should be universal, articles 21 and 22 should be redrafted so as to satisfy the following four democratic requirements:

1. The right to vote should not be conditional on the possession of property, residence, social origin, religion, race or political beliefs.
2. All electors to vote on an equal footing. No elector should have more or fewer votes than others.
3. An extremely important democratic principle. Suffrage should be direct. Every citizen should vote in person.

4. The fourth requirement, that of secret ballot, was already provided for in the draft under discussion.

Finally, rather than entrust the French and Chilean representatives with the preparation of a text which would not guarantee essential democratic requirements, it would be better to instruct a sub-committee to improve articles 21 and 22 radically.

THE CHAIRMAN said that she had simply asked Mr. Cassin and Mr. Santa Cruz, who had drawn up similar forms of words, to confer with the view to submitting one amendment. The appointment of a sub-committee for the sole purpose of redrafting articles 21 and 22 seemed useless.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) saw certain gaps in the present draft of the articles; other factors should be considered and the members should state their views before a new draft was made. Some representatives had pointed out that every Constitution laid down some limitations (age, convictions by the ordinary courts, criminal records, etc.). Moreover, Mr. Pavlov desired to include a provision prohibiting distinction on the ground of sex, race, social status, ownership of property, etc. Those two points should be allowed for and should be suitably incorporated in the text. Care should be taken to be sure that wording such as “having legal capacity” should not have the effect of sanctioning discrimination in the law.

Two concepts should be merged and clearly expressed, if necessary by an ad hoc sub-committee: (1) the first should have the effect of the words “everyone without discrimination as to race, sex, wealth, language, social origin etc. provided he is recognized as capable in law etc.”; (2) as the members were defining the essential elements of electoral law (free and fair elections of secret ballot etc.), the equality of suffrage stressed by the representative of the Soviet Union was not mentioned anywhere; that important point could be covered by the form: “everyone. . . has the right to take an effective part, on an equal footing in public affairs”.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) said that, with the exception of the representative of the Soviet Union, no one had raised any serious objection to the text adopted at the second session of the Commission. The only suggestion made had aimed at improving the form and not the substance. The wisest course would be to retain that text without trying to attain the highest degree of perfection, but to rely on the fact that articles 21 and 22 in their present wording had met with a great measure of agreement.

Every one of the articles of the declaration contained limitations but it was useless to catalogue them in the present document, the purpose of which was to establish principles.

[12]

Mr. Wilson agreed with his colleagues on the principle underlying the formula against discrimination on the grounds of sex, race, etc.; if however, that was stated in the articles under discussion it would have to be repeated in all the other articles. It would be more satisfactory to agree upon a general introductory article which would provide that such rights belong to everyone without distinction as to race, sex, etc.

THE CHAIRMAN proposed to put to the vote the question of whether the Committee wished to keep the text adopted at the second session of the Commission dividing the new article (as it had already agreed to combine articles 21 and 22) into paragraphs 1, 2 and 3.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) preferred the text adopted at the second session of the Commission to the other texts and merely wished to include two slight drafting amendments as follows:

1. "Everyone, without discrimination as to race, sex, language, creed or social class, possessing legal capacity. . ." It was necessary to set out the different forms of discrimination before mentioning legal capacity, in order to prevent the law itself from making some of those discriminations.
2. After the words: "to take an effective part" add: "on an equal footing."

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) put forward an amendment to leave out from the text adopted at the second session of the Commission the words "without discrimination".

THE CHAIRMAN proposed that the second part of article 21 of the text adopted at the second session of the Commission should be amended as follows: "a Government conforming to the will of the people as manifested by elections which shall be free, fair and by secret ballot".

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) supported the amendment submitted by Mr. Wilson. He proposed as an amendment to Mr. Santa Cruz' second amendment a further amendment which he thought would express better what Mr. Santa Cruz probably wished to say. The text would read as follows: "Everyone has the right to take an effective part in the Government of his country and to participate on an equal footing in elections which shall be fair, universal, etc."

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) thought that the United Kingdom amendment, which was farthest from the text and which proposed the redrafting of article 21 in a way which would not directly and unreservedly eliminate all discrimination, would allow the retention of dangerous discrimination, which were practised in certain countries, in the form in which they had been openly upheld by the Governments of those countries.

As advocated by Mr. Santa Cruz, the text should read as follows: "every one without discrimination as to sex, race, nationality, creed, education, residence, social class or extent of wealth has a right to take an effective part in the Government of his country”.

MR. CASSIN (France) recalled that the French Government in its written comments, had proposed the following text, which was very close to that of the text adopted at the second session of the Commission (document E/CN.4/82/Add.8, page 5, article 19):

“Every citizen, without discrimination, has the right either personally or through his representative, to take part in the management of public affairs in his country.”

That formula was repeated in Mr. Wu’s proposal.

In regard to Mr. Wilson’s observations, he was inclined to leave out mention of legal capacity, which belonged to detailed regulation. [14] He could not, however, support the United Kingdom amendment, which proposed the omission of the words “without discrimination”.

He was willing to keep the text adopted at the second session of the Commission and to omit any catalogue qualifying the discrimination. A few points of detail might, however, be amended.

To facilitate the discussion, THE CHAIRMAN and MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) withdrew their respective amendments.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile), while seeing no objection to the French proposal, remarked that the Constitution of Chile laid down a minimum age for eligibility to vote, and also for registration in the voting lists. The word “citizen” had a restricted meaning which would not extend to everybody.

It would be desirable to take into consideration the limitation imposed by the words “legal capacity,” which it was understood would no discrimination [sic], a word which would itself have to be defined by a suitable enumerative specification.

THE CHAIRMAN considered that the two proposals should be put to the vote: first, the Chinese amendment, to the following effect: “Everyone has the right to take an effective part in the Government of his country, either personally or through his representative”; second the Lebanese amendment to one of the two Chilean amendments; and last the two Chilean amendments.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) recalled his own amendment, which he said partly corresponded to Mr. Santa Cruz’ draft and would list more causes for discrimination.

He proposed adding to the second sentence of article 21 (text adopted at the second session of the Commission) after the words: “by elections which shall,” the words: “be universal, equal, direct, periodic, free, fair, and by secret ballot”.

[15]

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) withdrew his second amendment, which proposed adding the words: “and on an equal footing.”

He accepted the introduction of the word “universal” qualifying the suffrage.

With regard to discrimination, he requested a vote first of all on the principle of no discrimination and then on each of the suggested grounds for discrimination in the list.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) observed that his amendment on participation in elections on an equal footing was covered by Mr. Pavlov’s amendment and asked Mr. Pavlov whether he would accept a slightly different form, making no difference to the meaning, which would join the first sentence in article 21 to the second by the words: “. . .to take an effective part in the Government of his country and to participate in elections. . .” which would be followed by the list proposed by Mr. Pavlov.

MR. CASSIN (France) thought the difficulties could be met by voting first either on the deletion of the words “without discrimination” requested by Mr. Wilson, or on the addition of the qualifications suggested by Mr. Santa Cruz. If both amendments were rejected the text adopted at the second session of the Commission could be left.

Mr. Wu’s amendment to include the words “personally or by his representative” could also be voted upon.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) did not press his suggestion.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote Mr. Wu’s amendment, by which the first sentence would be made to read: “Everyone has the right to take an effective part in the Government of his country, personally or through his representative.”

The amendment was rejected by 4 votes to 3.

[16]

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote Mr. Pavlov’s amendment to Mr. Santa Cruz’ amendment, which would have made it read: “Everyone, without discrimination as to sex, race, nationality, creed, education, residence, social class, or extent of wealth, has a right to take an effective part in the Government of his country.”

The amendment was rejected by 4 votes to 1 with 2 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote Mr. Santa Cruz’ amendment as follows: “Everyone, without discrimination on the grounds of sex, race, nationality, creed, education, residence or social class, enjoying legal capacity, has a right to take an effective part in the government of his country.”

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) pointed out the desirability of finding a satisfactory English translation of the French expression “capacité légale”.

Mr. Santa Cruz’ amendment was adopted by 4 votes to 3.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote Mr. Pavlov’s amendment to the second sentence of article 21 (text adopted at the second session of the Commission), namely, the addition after the words: “. . . by elections which shall. . .” of the following phrase: “be universal, equal, direct, periodic, free, fair and by secret ballot”.

Mr. Pavlov's statement was rejected by 5 votes to ___.<sup>82</sup>

MR. CASSIN (France) said that he had been unable to vote for the amendment because of the one word “direct”, and asked for Mr. Pavlov's amendment, as rejected, to be put to the vote again but without the word “direct”.

The amendment was rejected by 4 votes to 3.

The whole of paragraph 1 of the new Article 21, as amended by the various votes, was adopted by 3 votes to 2, with 2 abstentions.

Paragraphs 2 and 3 of Article 21 (Article 22 of the text adopted at the second session of the Commission)

At the request of MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics), a discussion was opened on the meaning of the expression “of which he is a citizen or a national”.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) recalled that that point had been discussed at length by the Drafting Committee the previous year, and that the wording in question had been decided upon so as to take into consideration the position of federal republics.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) could not quite understand the meaning of a wording which would enable non-nationals of a country to hold important government posts. He would abstain from voting on that paragraph.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote paragraph 2 of article 21 as it appeared in paragraph 1 of Article 22 of the text adopted at the second session of the Commission: “Everyone shall have equal opportunity to engage in public employment and to hold public office in the State of which he is a citizen or a national.”

The paragraph was adopted by 5 votes to none, with 2 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote paragraph 3 of Article 21 (Article 22, paragraph 2 of the text adopted at the second session of the Commission) as follows: “Access to public employment shall not be a matter of privilege or favour.”

The paragraph was adopted.

THE CHAIRMAN saw no need to take a vote on Article 21 as a whole. She suggested submitting the text proposed by the United States delegation to the Commission for its information.

The meeting rose at 1:15 p.m.

[2]

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) pointed out that the Spanish of the words “human rights” had been incorrectly translated in the documents already circulated in Spanish. It should be “Derechos del hombre”.

THE CHAIRMAN proposed that, in view of the short time left for the Committee to finish its work, the remaining Articles of the Draft Declaration should be submitted to the Commission on Human Rights, as contained in the Report of the Second Session of the Commission, (E/600) together with any amendments to any of these Articles submitted in writing at the current session of the Drafting Committee. The Committee could then devote its remaining meetings to the discussion of implementation.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) said that it would be better to finish the discussion of the Declaration, which was as important as implementation. The remaining Articles covered economic and social rights. These had not been included in the Covenant, which was an added reason for not overlooking them in the Declaration.

MR. HEYWARD (Australia) supported the Chairman’s proposal, pointing out that the experience of the Committee had been, that, after several hours of discussion, the text finally adopted did not differ greatly from that contained in the Report of the Second Session of the Commission on Human Rights.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) said that the Rapporteur must have time to make his report to the Commission.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that the Committee should finish its work on the Declaration. It would be difficult for the Rapporteur to make a report unless he had the contents for such a report.

[3]

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) said that the Commission should continue its work on the Declaration, and then refer to the Commission any Articles which the members had not had time to discuss, with the amendments proposed.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) said that he would have supported the proposal to continue discussion of the Declaration, if the remaining Articles had been non-controversial. As this was not the case, he considered it would be a waste of time to discuss the eight Articles dealing with economic and social rights. He supported the Chairman's proposal to refer to the third session of the Commission the text of the remaining Articles as given in the Report of the second session, together with any positive suggestion which any representative wished to make.

MR. WU (China) suggested that the Committee should have a general discussion on the economic and social rights, without considering formal amendments or adopting a final text.

MR. HEYWARD (Australia) said that the Committee should continue its work by discussing the remaining Articles individually and then refer to the Commission whatever Articles were left, with the amendments and suggestions submitted in writing.

The Committee decided, at the suggestion of Mr. Wilson (United Kingdom), to finish its consideration of the Covenant by examining Articles 24 and 25 as drafted by the Drafting Sub-Committee (document E/CN.4/AC.1/42), and then decide how to proceed, on the basis of the amount of time left.

Continuation of Discussion of the Draft Report of the Drafting Committee to the Commission on Human Rights

On opening the Meeting, the Chairman asked whether there would be any objection to the inclusion of the last paragraph of document E/CN.4/AC.119 in the draft report. It would be included as an additional article proposed by the United States of America, with a note to the effect that no action had been taken upon it.

As there was no objection, the paragraph was so included.

In reply to an inquiry from MR. CASSIN (France) about a document containing supplementary articles proposed by his delegation, MR. HUMPHREY (Secretariat) said that the document would presently be produced.

Turning to Annex A of the draft report, THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that Articles 6–8, 21–22, 24–30, and 32–33 in the draft of the International Declaration of Human Rights should bear the notation, “Text originally proposed by the Commission on Human Rights” or “Geneva text”.

The Chairman also proposed the following amendments, which were agreed without discussion:-

Page 11: Substitution of the words “alternative texts” for the words “amendments and comments” and of the words “this purpose” for the word “consideration” in the Note preceding Article 23.

Page 11: Addition of the words “for Articles 23 and 24” after the heading “Alternative text suggested by the United States”.

Page 15: Addition in parenthesis of the words “First Session” after the heading “Text proposed by the Drafting Committee” under Article 31.

PROF. CASSIN (France) observed that the French translation of the draft report appeared defective in some minor respects. He must therefore make some reservation as to his acceptance of it in its present form.

[3]

MR. WU (China) had no amendments to offer to the draft report, but pointed out that his own draft on the Declaration, which was quite different, had not been discussed at all. He would like to have it included in the report.

THE CHAIRMAN said that the Chinese draft would go at the end of the report. She had been under the impression that its inclusion had already been decided. Speaking as representative of the United States, she expressed her delegation's great interest in the Chinese draft.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) remarked that he had understood that twenty-four hours would be allowed for presentation of amendments to a document. He had only just received the present document, and was not yet sure to what extent it reflected the Drafting Committee's work. He must therefore reserve his opinion upon it.

At first glance, he could not see his own views recorded in the report, nor all of the various rights which had been mentioned in the course of the discussions. He thought that they should have been included and that the USSR amendments should have been noted. The most substantial of those amendments concerned freedom of assembly and association, on which subject he had proposed that Fascist gatherings and associations should be forbidden.

He had understood that Article 15 was to be omitted altogether, but the original text remained in the draft report. There should be added to it an explanation that the right of nationality was to be defined according to the laws of the respective countries. With regard to the right of asylum, defined in Article 11, he had proposed that that right should be granted to persons persecuted because of their progressive viewpoint, but not to Fascist groups and individuals. That proposal should be stated.

Article 7 in the draft was a pale reflection of the original text, which should have been included as an alternative. The USSR delegation had made observations on that subject which were not recorded in the report.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) Rapporteur, pointed out that the USSR representative had raised two different questions. Alternative texts had been included in the draft report when delegations had expressed a wish that they should be so included. If the USSR representative had specific alternative texts, which he wished to have included, and would submit them to the Rapporteur, they would be included.

With regard to views expressed in the course of debate, those were embodied in the Summary Records of the meetings, as was stated in paragraph 9, page 4, of the draft report. That was the same procedure as had been followed at Geneva.

In reply to an inquiry from THE CHAIRMAN, MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that he would submit specific alternative texts.

After some discussion as to whether the draft report included in full the compromise article proposed in substitution of Articles 6–8 (formerly of 5–7), Mr. Pavlov (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) repeated his observation that he had not had sufficient time to study the document and must therefore reserve his right to return to the subject.

THE CHAIRMAN explained that at the morning meeting, at which the Soviet representative had not been present, the Committee had agreed to complete work on the report at the afternoon meeting in order to enable the Secretariat to have the report ready for distribution to the Commission on Human Rights at the opening of its session on 24 May.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) Rapporteur, pointed out that even after distribution of the report it would be possible for any representative to submit corrigenda and addenda.

PROF. CASSIN (France) stated that in order to facilitate the work of the Secretariat he would not request inclusion in the report of the French amendments to Articles 11, 12 and 15 but he reserved the right to bring the subject up for discussion in the Commission on Human Rights.

After some discussion of the revised text of paragraph 5 of the report of the Drafting Committee proposed by the representatives of Chile and China, it was agreed that the final drafting should be left to the Rapporteur.

Referring to the question of the designation of alternates raised in paragraph 5, MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) commented that, although he was listed in the report as an alternate, the Soviet Government had actually designated him as its representative at the forthcoming session of the Commission on Human Rights.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) Rapporteur explained that the rules of procedure of the Economic and Social Council provided that an alternate could not be considered as a representative without confirmation by the Council.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) observed that discussion of Article 3 of the Covenant which had been postponed until the question of implementation was considered had never actually taken place.

If Article 3 were considered by the Committee, the Soviet delegation would favour deletion of the text.

[6]

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) Rapporteur, explained that the opinion of the Soviet delegation would be noted in the summary record. The report was reserved for the inclusion of texts proposed as alternate drafts.

All articles which had not been discussed by the Drafting Committee would be listed.

After MR. MALIK (Lebanon) had expressed the Committee's appreciation of the Chairman's excellent direction of the work of the Drafting Committee, the second session was declared closed.

The meeting rose at 4 p.m.

Report of the Drafting Committee to the Commission on Human Rights

1. The second session of the Drafting Committee of the Commission on Human Rights opened on Monday, 3 May 1948, at the Interim Headquarters of the United Nations, Lake Success, New York. The Drafting Committee held twenty-five plenary meetings and terminated its work on Friday, 21 May 1948.

2. The following Representatives from Member Nations on the Drafting Committee attended: Chairman: Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt (United States of America) Representative. Vice-chairman and Rapporteur: Dr. Charles Malik (Lebanon) Representative. Members: Mr. E. J. R. Heyward (Australia) Alternate; Mr. H. Santa Cruz (Chile) Representative; Dr. T. Y. Wu (China) Alternate; Prof. René Cassin (France) Representative; Mr. A. P. Pavlov (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) Alternate; Mr. Geoffrey Wilson (United Kingdom) Alternate.

3. The following representatives of Specialized Agencies were also present at the session: Mr. Pierre Lebar, United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization; Mr. Oliver Stone, International Refugee Organization; Mr. Wilfred Jenks and Mr. R. W. Cox, International Labour Organization.

4. The following consultants from non-governmental organizations were also present: Category A: Miss Toni Sender, American Federation of Labor; Mr. J. Botten, International Federation of Christian Trade Unions; Mr. Clark M. Eichelberger, World Federation of United Nations Associations. Category B: Dr. O. Frederick Nolde and Mr. S. Prentice, Jr., International Commission of the Churches on International Affairs; Mr. M. Moskowitz, Consultative Council of Jewish Organizations; Mr. A. Liverhant, Co-ordinating Board of Jewish Organizations for Consultation with the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations; Mrs. Frieda S. Lidicker, International Alliance of Women – Equal Rights, Equal Responsibilities; Prof. V. V. Pella, International Association of Penal Law and International Bureau for the Unification of Penal Law; Miss M. Strahler, International Committee of the Red Cross; Miss M. Burgess, International Federation of Business and Professional Women; Dr. Janet Robb, International Federation of University Women; Miss C. Schafer, International Union of Catholic Women's Leagues; Mrs. Lois Jessup, International Voluntary Service for Peace; Mrs. F. C. Sawyer, Liaison Committee of Women's International Organizations and Associated Countrywomen of the World; Mr. S. D. Wolkowicz and Dr. F. R. Bienenfeld, World Jewish Congress.

5. Having received communications from the Governments of France and Australia designating Mr. Ordonneau and Mr. Heyward as alternates for the [3] second session for Professor Cassin and Mr. Hood respectively, the Drafting Committee decided that in accordance with the Rules of Procedure of Functional Commissions of the Economic and Social Council Mr. Ordonneau and Mr. Heyward had the right to vote. Owing to the fact that Professor Cassin arrived on 10 May, before the termination of the session, he took his place in the Drafting Committee and voted. The Drafting Committee decided that this could not be considered as setting a precedent, and recommended that the Commission on Human Rights request the Economic and Social Council to reconsider the voting procedure established in the Rules of Procedure in regard to the voting rights of alternates.

Dr. Azkoul (Lebanon) attended diverse meetings of the Drafting Committee, but did not vote, as alternate for Dr. Charles Malik. Mr. James P. Hendrick participated without vote in one meeting of the Drafting Committee as alternate for Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt.

6. Professor John P. Humphrey, Director of the Division of Human Rights, represented the Secretary-General. Mr. John Male and Mr. Edward Lawson acted as Secretaries of the Committee.

7. The Drafting Committee adopted the Provisional Agenda (E/CN.4/AC.1/16) as its Agenda. The Committee discussed the Draft International Covenant on Human Rights first and then the Draft International Declaration on Human Rights, but it did not have the time to discuss the question of implementation.

8. The Drafting Committee took into account, in the course of its work, (a) the observations, suggestions, and proposals of governments on the draft of an International Declaration on Human Rights and the draft of an International Covenant on Human Rights prepared by the Commission on Human Rights at its second session (documents E/CN.4/82/Rev.1 and E/CN.4/82/Add.1 to 10); (b) the opinion of the United Nations Conference on Freedom of Information on Articles 17 and 18 of the Draft International Declaration on Human Rights and Article 17 of the Draft International Covenant on Human Rights (document E/CN.4/84); and (c) the suggestions made by the Commission on the Status of Women regarding the Draft International Declaration on Human Rights (document E/CN.4/81); but did not have the time to consider the instructions of the Economic and Social Council regarding implementation (Resolution 116(VI)F).

9. The expression of the views of the members of the Drafting Committee is embodied in the summary records of meetings of the Committee (E/CN.4/AC.1/SR.20 to 44).

[4]

10. On the basis of its deliberations, as recorded in the summary records, the Drafting Committee prepared and forwarded to the Commission on Human Rights a redraft of the Draft International Declaration on Human Rights, appended to this Report as Annex A; and a redraft of the Draft International Covenant on Human Rights, appended to this Report as Annex B.

[5]

Annex A

Draft International Declaration on Human Rights

Article 1

(The Drafting Committee did not have the time to consider this Article)

All men are born free and equal in dignity and rights. They are endowed by nature with reason and conscience, and should act towards one another like brothers.

Article 2

(The Drafting Committee did not have time to consider this Article)

In the exercise of his rights everyone is limited by the rights of others and by the just requirements of the democratic State. The individual owes duties to society through which he is enabled to develop his spirit, mind and body in wider freedom.

Article 3

(The Drafting Committee did not have time to consider this Article)

1. Everyone is entitled to all the rights and freedoms set forth in this Declaration, without distinction of any kind, such as race (which includes colour), sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, property status, or national or social origin.

2. All are equal before the law regardless of office or status and entitled to equal protection of the law against any arbitrary discrimination or against any incitement to such discrimination, in violation of this Declaration.

Article 4

Everyone has the right to life, to liberty and security of person.

Article 5 (formerly Article 8)

Slavery is prohibited in all its forms.

Article 6 (formerly Article 5)

(Geneva text)

No one shall be deprived of his personal liberty or kept in custody except in cases prescribed by law and after due process. Everyone placed under arrest or detention, shall have the right to immediate judicial determination of the legality of any detention to which he may be subject and to trial within a reasonable time or to release.

Article 7 (formerly Article 6)

(Geneva text)

Everyone shall have access to independent and impartial tribunals in the determination of any criminal charge against him, and of his rights and obligations. He shall be entitled to a fair hearing of his case and to have the aid of a qualified representative of his own choice, and if he appears in person to have the procedure explained to him in a manner in which he can understand it and to use a language which he can speak.

[6]

Article 8 (formerly Article 7)

(Geneva text)

1. Any person is presumed to be innocent until proved guilty. No one shall be convicted or punished for crime or other offence except after fair public trial at which he has been given all guarantees necessary for his defence. No person shall be held guilty of any offence on account of any act or omission which did not constitute such an offence at the time when it was committed, nor shall he be liable to any greater punishment than that prescribed for such offence by the law in force at the time when the offence was committed.

2. Nothing in this Article shall prejudice the trial and punishment of any person for the commission of any act which, at the time it was committed, was criminal according to the general principles of law recognized by civilized nations.

3. No one shall be subjected to torture, or to cruel or inhuman punishment or indignity.

(Note 1: The Drafting Committee drafted the following article, in substitution of Articles 6, 7 and 8 above, and although it was rejected by a vote of 2 for, 3 against and 2 abstentions by the members of the Committee, it was decided to forward it nevertheless to the full Commission. The text of this alternative article reads as follows:

1. No one may be arbitrarily deprived of his liberty. Arrest, detention or imprisonment may be allowed only according to pre-existing law and in accordance with due process.
2. Everyone who has been deprived of his liberty has the right to be promptly informed of the reasons for his detention. Everyone placed under arrest, detention or imprisonment shall have the right to immediate judicial determination of the legality of any detention to which he may be subject and to trial within a reasonable time or to release.
3. No one shall be imprisoned merely on the grounds of inability to meet a contractual obligation.
4. Everyone has the right to compensation in respect of any unlawful arrest or deprivation of liberty.
5. The rights and obligations of each person and the criminal accusations against him must be determined or judged by independent and impartial tribunals, before which tribunals all persons are equal.
6. Everyone accused of an offence must be judged within a reasonable time by courts established beforehand and in accordance with pre-existing laws in a public trial. The foregoing provision shall not prejudice the trial and punishment of any person for the commission of any act which, at the time it was committed, was criminal according to the general principles of law recognized by civilized nations.

[7]

During the trial, everyone is entitled to:

- (a) the right to a fair hearing;
- (b) the right, in all criminal cases, to be presumed innocent until proved guilty; and
- (c) the right of defence. When any person who does not know the national language is prosecuted, he shall be assured full knowledge of all the material in the case through an interpreter and shall also have the right to address the court in his native language.)

(Separate Article)

(No one shall be subjected to torture, or to cruel or inhuman punishment or indignity.)

(Note 2: The representative of the Soviet Union proposed the addition of the following to the second sentence of the first paragraph of Article 8, after the word "trial" (unofficial translation):

"subject to exceptions prescribed by law in order to guarantee to the accused person the right of defence.")

Article 9

Everyone is entitled to protection under the law from unreasonable interference with reputation, family, home or correspondence.

Article 10

1. Everyone is entitled to freedom of movement and residence within the borders of each State.
2. Everyone has the right to leave any country, including his own.

Article 11

1. Everyone has the right to seek and may be granted, in other countries, asylum from persecution.
2. Prosecutions genuinely arising from non-political crimes or from acts contrary to the purposes and principles of the United Nations do not constitute persecution.

(Note: The representative of the Soviet Union proposed that the following text be substituted for the above text of Article 11 (unofficial translation):

“The right of asylum shall be granted to everyone persecuted because of his activity in defence of democratic interests, because of his activity in the field of science, or because of his participation in the struggle for national liberty.”)

Article 12

Everyone has everywhere the right to recognition as a person before the law.
[8]

Article 13

1. Men and women shall have equal rights as to marriage in accordance with the law. Marriage may not be contracted without the full consent of both intending spouses and before the age of puberty.
2. Marriage and the family shall be protected by the State and Society.

Article 14

Everyone has the right to own such property as meets the essential needs of decent living, that helps to maintain the dignity of the individual and of the home, and shall not be arbitrarily deprived of it.

Article 15

Everyone has the right to a nationality.

(Note: The representative of the Soviet Union proposed the addition of the following text after the first sentence of Article 15 (unofficial translation):

“The cases and the procedure of depriving a person of his nationality must be determined by national legislation.”)

Article 16

1. Individual freedom of thought and conscience, to hold and change beliefs, is an absolute and sacred right.

2. Every person has the right, either alone or in community with other persons of like mind and in public or private, to manifest his beliefs in teaching, practice, worship and observance.

(Note: The representative of the Soviet Union proposed to replace Article 16 by the following text (unofficial translation):

“Every person shall have the right to freedom of thought and freedom to practise religious observances in accordance with the laws of the country and the dictates of public morality”.)

Articles 17 and 18

I. Text submitted by the United Nations Conference on Freedom of Information

Everyone shall have the right to freedom of thought and expression; this right shall include freedom to hold opinions without interference and to seek, receive and impart information and ideas by any means and regardless of frontiers.

II. Text submitted by the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics

1. In accordance with the principles of democracy and in the interests of strengthening international co-operation and world peace, every person shall be guaranteed by law the right to the free expression of his opinions and, in particular, to freedom of speech and of the press, freedom of assembly and freedom of artistic representation. The use of freedom of speech and of the press for the purposes of propagating Fascism and aggression or of inciting to war between nations shall not be tolerated.

[9]

2. In order to ensure the right of the free expression of opinion for large sections of the peoples and for their organizations, State assistance and co-operation shall be given in providing the material resources (premises, printing presses, paper, and the like) necessary for the publication of democratic organs of the press.

Article 19

Everyone has the right to freedom of peaceful assembly and to participate in local, national, international and trade union associations for the promotion, defence and protection of purposes and interests not inconsistent with this Declaration.

(Note: The representative of the Soviet Union proposed that the following be substituted for the text of Article 19 (unofficial translation):

“In the interest of democracy the freedom of assembly of public demonstration, of procession and of organization, of voluntary associations and unions and other organizations having a Nazi, fascist or anti-democratic character, as well as their activity in whatever form shall be forbidden under penalty of the law.”)

Article 20

(Note: The Drafting Committee decided not to consider the following Geneva text until articles on implementation had been drafted: Everyone has the right, either individually, or in association with others, to petition or to communicate with the public authorities of the State of which he is a national or in which he resides, or with the United Nations.)

Articles 21 and 22

(Geneva Text)

1. Everyone without discrimination on grounds of race, sex, languages, religious belief or social origin and not under any legal disability has the right to take an effective part in the Government of his country. The State shall conform to the will of the people as manifested by elections which shall be periodic, free, fair and by secret ballot.
2. Everyone shall have equal opportunity to engage in public employment and to hold public office in the State of which he is a citizen or a national.
3. Access to public employment shall not be a matter of privilege or favour.

Alternative text suggested by the United States

Everyone is entitled to:

- (a) the right to take an effective part in the government of the State of which he is a national, including the right to participate in free and fair elections held periodically by secret ballot, and including opportunity to hold office and to engage in public employment; and

- (b) the right to a government which conforms to the will of the people, [10] with full freedom for minority opinion to persist and, if such is the people's will, to become the effective majority.

(Note: The Drafting Committee, not having had time to consider the following articles – 23 to 33 inclusive – in detail, decided to transmit them to the Commission on Human Rights in the form as drafted by the Commission in Geneva, together with such alternative tests as members of the Drafting Committee expressly proposed for this purpose).

Article 23

(Geneva text)

1. Everyone has the right to work.
2. The State has a duty to take such measures as may be within its power to ensure that all persons ordinarily resident in its territory have an opportunity for useful work.
3. The State is bound to take all necessary steps to prevent unemployment.

Alternative text suggested by France

Everyone has the right to work.

States are bound to take such measures as may be within their power to prevent unemployment and to ensure that all persons ordinarily resident in its territory have an opportunity for useful work.

Every worker has the right to receive pay which shall be commensurate with his ability and skill and which shall secure for himself and his family a full, decent and dignified life. He also has the right to fair and satisfactory working conditions. He shall be free to join trade unions for the protection of his interests.

Women shall work with the same advantages as men and receive equal pay for equal work.

Alternative text suggested by the United Kingdom

Everyone has the right to work or maintenance.

Alternative text suggested by the United States for Articles 23 and 24

Everyone is entitled to the right to work under fair and just conditions, to choose a vocation freely, and to join trade unions of his own choice for the protection of his interests in securing a fair standard of living for himself and his family.

Article 24

(Geneva text)

1. Everyone has the right to receive pay commensurate with his ability and skill, to work under just and favourable conditions and to join trade unions for the protection of his interests in securing a decent standard of living for himself and his family.

2. Women shall work with the same advantages as men and receive equal pay for equal work.

(Note: see alternative texts suggested for Article 23 above.)

[11]

Article 25

(Geneva text)

Everyone without distinction as to economic and social conditions has the right to the preservation of his health through the highest standard of food, clothing, housing and medical care which the resources of the State or community can provide. The responsibility of the State and community for the health and safety of its people can be fulfilled only by provision of adequate health and social measures.

Alternative text suggested by France

Everyone has a right to social security.

The State has a duty to maintain or ensure the maintenance of comprehensive measures for the security of the individual against various social risks. In particular, the individual shall be guaranteed against the consequences of unemployment, disability, old age, and the loss of livelihood in circumstances beyond his control.

Mothers and children shall be granted special care and assistance.

Everyone without distinction as to economic or social conditions has the right to protection of his health by all the appropriate means relating to food, clothing, housing and medical care to as great an extent as the resources of the State or community permit.

It is the duty of the State and the community to take all adequate health and social measures to meet the responsibilities incumbent upon them.

Alternative text suggested by the United States for Articles 25 and 26

Everyone has the right to a standard of living necessary for health and general wellbeing, including social security and the opportunity to obtain adequate food, clothing, housing and medical care.

Article 26

(Geneva text)

1. Everyone has the right to social security. The State has a duty to maintain or ensure the maintenance of comprehensive measures for the security of the individual against the consequence of unemployment, disability, old age and all other loss of livelihood for reasons beyond his control.

2. Motherhood shall be granted special care and assistance. Children are similarly entitled to special care and assistance.

(Note: See alternative texts suggested for Article 25 above.)

Article 27

(Geneva text)

Everyone has the right to education. Fundamental education shall be free and compulsory. There shall be equal access for higher education as can be provided by the State or community on the basis of merit and without distinction [12] as to race, sex, language, religion, social standing, financial means or political affiliation.

Alternative text submitted by France

Everyone has a right to education. Fundamental education shall be free and compulsory. Everyone shall have equal access to higher education so far as it can be provided by the State or community on the basis of merit and without distinction as to race, sex, language, religion, social standing, financial means or political affiliation.

Alternative text submitted by the United States

Everyone is entitled to the right to free fundamental education and to equal access on the basis of merit to higher education.

Article 28

(Geneva text)

Education will be directed to the full physical, intellectual, moral and spiritual development of the human personality, to the strengthening of respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms and to the combating of the spirit of intolerance and hatred against other nations or racial or religious groups everywhere.

Alternative text submitted by France

Education will be directed to the full physical, intellectual and moral development of the human personality, to the strengthening of respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms. It shall combat the spirit of intolerance and hatred against other nations or racial or religious groups everywhere.

Article 29

(Geneva text)

1. Everyone has the right to rest and leisure.
2. Rest and leisure should be ensured to everyone by laws or contracts providing in particular for reasonable limitations on working hours and for periodic vacations with pay.

Alternative text submitted by France

Everyone has a right to rest and leisure.

Rest and leisure should be ensured to everyone by laws or contracts providing in particular for reasonable limitations on working hours and for periodic vacations with pay.

Everyone has the right to participate in the cultural life of the community, to enjoy the arts and to share in the benefits that result from scientific discoveries.

[13]

Article 30

(Geneva text)

Everyone has the right to participate in the cultural life of the community, to enjoy the arts and to share in the benefits that result from scientific discoveries.

Alternative text submitted by France

Authors of creative works and inventors shall retain, apart from financial rights, a moral right over their work or discovery, which shall remain extant after the financial rights have expired.

Article 31Text proposed by the Drafting Committee (first session)*

In States inhabited by a substantial number of persons of a race, language or religion other than those of the majority of the population, persons belonging to such ethnic, linguistic or religious minorities shall have the right, as far as compatible with public order, to establish and maintain schools and cultural or religious institutions, and to use their own language in the press, in public assembly and before the courts and other authorities of the State.

Text proposed by the Sub-Commission on the Prevention of Discrimination and the Protection of Minorities

In States inhabited by well-defined ethnic, linguistic or religious groups which are clearly distinguished from the rest of the population, and which want to be accorded differential treatment, persons belonging to such groups shall have the right, as far as is compatible with public order and security, to establish and maintain their schools and cultural or religious institutions, and to use their own language and script in the press, in public assembly and before the courts and other authorities of the State, if they so choose.

Alternative text submitted by France

In States inhabited by well-defined ethnic, linguistic or religious groups which are distinguished from the rest of the population, and which want to be accorded differential treatment, persons belonging to such groups shall have the right, as far as is compatible with public order and security, and in conformity with the degree of legislative unity in the State, to establish and maintain their schools and cultural or religious institutions and to use their own language and script.

Alternative text submitted by the United Kingdom

Minorities shall be entitled to preserve their culture, religion and language.

Alternative text submitted by the United States
(In lieu of Articles 29 and 30, and also of Article 31)

[14]

Everyone is entitled to obtain rest and leisure, to participate in the customs and the cultural life of the community and of groups in the community, to enjoy the arts, and to share in the benefits that result from scientific discoveries.

(Additional Article submitted by France)

It is the duty of every State to establish an efficient judicial and administrative system to prevent, punish and remedy any violation of the principles stated in the present Declaration.

The United Nations, recognizing the necessity for establishing an international court of appeal, recommends the adoption of all the international conventions aimed at the full implementation of the provisions of the Charter and of the present Declaration and, with the assistance of Member States, will take all the necessary measures to safeguard these rights and freedoms throughout the world.

Article 32

(Geneva text)

All laws in any State shall be in conformity with the purposes and principles of the United Nations as embodied in the Charter, insofar as they deal with human rights.

Alternative text submitted by France

In all States no laws on human rights shall be considered equitable unless they are in conformity with the purposes and principles laid down in the Charter.

Article 33

(Geneva text)

Nothing in this Declaration shall be considered to recognize the right of any State or person to engage in any activity aimed to the destruction of any of the rights and freedoms prescribed herein.

Alternative text submitted by France

Nothing in this Declaration shall imply the recognition of the right of any State or person to engage in any activity aimed at the destruction of any of the rights and freedoms prescribed herein.

(Note: The Drafting Committee decided to transmit to the Commission on Human Rights the Draft International Declaration on Human Rights, submitted by the representative of China, which follows:

Article I

Every person has the right to life.

Article II

Every person has the right to freedom of conscience and belief, to freedom of assembly and of association, and to freedom of information, speech and expression.

[15]

Article III

Every person has the right to a decent living; to work and leisure, to health, education, economic and social security.

Election of Officers

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) proposed the re-election of the representatives who had served as officers of the Commission during the first year. He suggested that the office of Second Vice-Chairman might be created.

MR. WU (China) proposed the election of Professor Cassin (France) as Second Vice-Chairman.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) seconded Mr. Wu's proposal.

Mrs. Roosevelt (United States of America) was re-elected Chairman by ten votes to none, with no abstentions.

Mr. Wu (China) was re-elected First Vice-Chairman by nine votes to none, with no abstentions.

Professor Cassin (France) was elected Second Vice-Chairman by nine votes to none, with no abstentions.

Mr. Malik (Lebanon) was re-elected Rapporteur by nine votes to none, with no abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN read a telegram which had been received from the President of a Conference of a hundred international non-governmental organizations being held in Geneva, wishing the Commission success in its work, and requested the Secretariat to send a message of thanks on behalf of the Commission.

She pointed out that the Commission had only one more month in which to finish the initial stage of its work – the preparation of an International Bill of Human Rights. It had been decided that both a Declaration and a Covenant should be drafted, and it was hoped that agreement would be reached on the question of implementation. The Commission had a mandate from the Economic and Social [4] Council which it could, and should, carry out. Good progress had been made at the second session of the Commission at Geneva. Some of the articles of the Declaration and the Covenant had been criticized as too long, but they might be compared to architects' drawings from which the building could be constructed.

With regard to the method of work, she did not advocate the system which had been successfully followed at Geneva of splitting into three working groups. She thought it would be preferable to discuss the Declaration, Covenant and implementation in plenary meeting, in whatever order the Commission might decide, and suggested allotting one week to each subject. She warned the Commission that that procedure would allow little time for the discussion of each individual article, and expressed the view that there should be full discussion of the question of implementation, which had hitherto been somewhat neglected. If necessary, small sub-committees could be appointed to consider individual articles, but that had not proved very successful in the Drafting Committee. She asked the members of the Commission to submit in writing before the end of the day any amendments to the first ten articles of whichever part of the Bill of Rights it was decided to discuss first.

She suggested that, as the Commission would not have time to consider drafting points in detail, a small committee should be established, consisting of Professor Cassin (France), who would have responsibility for the French text, and Mr. Wilson (United Kingdom) who would have responsibility for the English.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) wished to make a special statement before the Commission discussed its method of work. The Governments of the Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic and the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic had [5] requested him to inform the Commission on Human Rights that on 8 May 1948, the United States Embassy in Moscow had notified the Government of the USSR of its refusal to issue visas for entry into the United States to the representatives of these Governments on the Commission, unless they completed a special type of questionnaire. This questionnaire was discriminatory in character, as it was required only of nationals of the USSR, the Ukrainian SSR, the Byelorussian SSR and certain countries of Eastern Europe. The action of the United States Embassy violated articles 11, 12 and 13 of the agreement between the United Nations and the United States Government. The provisions of that agreement applied irrespective of the relations existing between the United States of America and other States Members of the United Nations. The regulations concerning the entry of foreigners into the United States should not apply to representatives attending United Nations meetings.

Only two days before the beginning of the session, after repeated requests by the USSR Ministry of Foreign Affairs and a protest from the Secretary-General of the United Nations, the United States Embassy in Moscow had stated that visas would be issued to the two representatives, as an exception. That qualification presumably meant that the Embassy reserved the right to continue such discriminatory practices in the future.

The Governments of the Byelorussian SSR and the Ukrainian SSR had instructed him to make a formal protest to the Commission on Human Rights against the violation by the United States Government of its treaty obligations towards the United Nations. The Government of the USSR associated itself with that protest and called the attention of the Commission on Human Rights to the situation.

In view of the fact that the two representatives could not reach New York before Wednesday, 26 May at the earliest, he proposed that the Commission should postpone its work until their arrival.

THE CHAIRMAN, speaking as representative of the United States of America, expressed regret that the two representatives had been delayed and said that arrangements had been made that United Nations officials would receive visas without delay. She explained that United States officials in the USSR were required to fill up forms discriminatory in character and requesting information concerning their political affiliations and various other matters. This had caused considerable delay in granting visas. Accordingly the United States Embassy in Moscow had applied the same treatment to persons entering the United States. The State Department had however informed the Embassy that United Nations representatives were in a special category, and the visas had then been issued immediately.

She suggested that the Commission should not begin its work by consideration of the Report of the Drafting Committee, but should take up other items on its Agenda.

MR. VILFAN (Yugoslavia) associated himself with the remarks of the USSR representative. He added that a Yugoslav representative had been asked to follow the same procedure; a protest had been addressed to the Secretary-General and he had promised that such an incident would not occur again.

The point at issue was not the relations between the United States and the USSR, but the relations between the United States [7] and the United Nations. It would be highly detrimental to the work of the United Nations if a representative could be prevented from attending a meeting merely because he was persona non grata with the United States Government. He supported the proposal that the meeting should be adjourned until the arrival of the Byelorussian and Ukrainian representatives.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) took note of the statement of the United States representative that such incidents would not be repeated in the future. He objected categorically to any attempt to put the matter on a basis of retaliation. Had the persons involved been Embassy officials, the action of the United States Embassy in Moscow would have been correct, but discrimination against the Byelorussian and Ukrainian representatives to the Commission was contrary to the principles of the United Nations.

Questions of a technical nature concerning questionnaires etc. need not be discussed; on the other hand, the Commission should consider what action should be taken when United Nations representatives were prevented from attending a session of a United Nations organ owing to arbitrary action by the United States authorities. The fundamental consideration was the need to promote respect for the United Nations throughout the world.

THE CHAIRMAN agreed with the USSR and Yugoslav representatives that United Nations representatives should never be delayed in attending sessions of United Nations organs. Her remarks had merely been an attempt to explain how the situation had come about. The incident was regrettable and she hoped it would never recur.

[8]

MR. LEBEAU (Belgium) asked in what way the Commission's work would be affected by a few days' delay.

THE CHAIRMAN stated that MR. CASSIN (France) would be obliged to leave on 14 June; she hoped to accomplish as much as possible before that date in order to have the benefit of his valuable knowledge and experience.

MR. CASSIN (France) had understood the USSR representative's proposal to be that the Commission should postpone consideration of the most important questions on its agenda, not that it should suspend the session entirely. He hoped there would be no objection to discussing, for example, the general plan of work, while awaiting the arrival of the Byelorussian and Ukrainian representatives.

MR. WU (China) did not consider that it was for the Commission to decide to postpone the session until the two representatives arrived. He would, however, suggest that the next meeting should not be held until the afternoon of 26 May, on the grounds that members would thus have ample time to examine the various documents.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics), replying to the French proposal, stressed that it was not within the power of the Commission to deprive the representatives of any States of the possibility of participating in any decisions taken. While, therefore, he agreed that the Commission could begin the discussion of items of secondary importance on the agenda, he would consider any decision taken in the absence of the two representatives illegal. It would be preferable to follow the suggestion of the Chinese representative, and adjourn until the afternoon of 26 May.

Furthermore, he wished to emphasize that the Commission could not pass over his protest in silence, but was morally obliged to express an opinion on the matter.
[9]

MRS. MEHTA (India) thought that the important issue raised by the USSR representative should be decided forthwith, so that there would be no reason to reopen the discussion at the next meeting.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) suggested that the representatives of the Ukrainian and the Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republics should be temporarily replaced by alternates, with the right to vote, so that the Commission could proceed with its work on 26 May, even if the representatives had not arrived.

MR. HUMPHREY (Secretariat) pointed out that rule 11 of the rules of procedure of functional commissions of the Economic and Social Council allowed an alternate to serve in place of a member throughout any given session, with the right to vote. There was no rule which would apply to a provisional alternate. According to rule 61, however, the rules of procedure could be temporarily suspended by the Commission provided it was not inconsistent with any applicable decisions of the Economic and Social Council.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) thought the Chinese proposal should be adopted by the Commission, on the understanding that if the two representatives had still not arrived on the afternoon of 26 May, their alternates would, by virtue of rule 61, be allowed to vote.

There being no objection, THE CHAIRMAN put the Chinese proposal to the vote on that understanding.

The Commission adopted the Chinese proposal by ten votes to one, with one abstention.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) drew attention to the fact that the adoption of the Chinese proposal did not dispose of the request he had made for an expression of opinion by the Commission with regard to his protest. So far only the United States representative had spoken on the subject, and he must urge other members to give their views.

[10]

MR. HOOD (Australia) stated that he had not spoken on the substance of the USSR protest, as he had considered that, in view of the circumstances and of the explanation given by the United States representative, there would be no advantage in having a debate on the subject in the Commission. There were two aspects to the matter: the actual circumstances by which the representatives had been delayed, and the reason for those circumstances. While the Commission could not and should not concern itself with the question of differences between two Member States represented on the Commission, it should concern itself with the reasons for the non-arrival of two of its members. He had thought, therefore, that in supporting the proposal to postpone its work, the Commission was expressing a de facto opinion on the circumstances of the case. He himself had voted for the proposal in that sense.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) expressed full agreement with the representative of Australia. The matter had been brought unexpectedly to the notice of the Commission which had had no opportunity to ascertain the full facts of the case. The Commission had only to decide on the conduct of its own work; if a discussion of the USSR protest was necessary there were other channels through which it could be more appropriately carried out.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) urged that the question was one of principle, and was not confined to the one concrete case to which he had drawn attention. If representatives of United Nations organs were to be refused admission to the United States because of differences between their Governments, and the United States Government, such a case might recur again and again. He would therefore like the Commission to state that it was postponing the meeting, not for any technical reasons, but because certain representatives had been prevented from attending, and that it considered that the refusal to grant visas to those representatives constituted a violation of the agreement between the United States and the United Nations.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that it was usual, when members of a Commission arrived late, to consider that a quorum was sufficient to start work. The fact, therefore, that it had been decided by a vote to postpone meeting until the members in question arrived was enough to show the opinion of the Commission. Members had all agreed that representatives of United Nations organs should not be delayed in any way; that fact was understood and accepted.

MR. VILFAN (Yugoslavia) could not agree with the Chairman that the question was already settled. He had voted against the Chinese proposal, as he considered an important question of principle was involved. Only two months previously the Yugoslav representative on the Social Commission had had similar treatment from the United States authorities, and it had then been stated that such a thing would not happen again. Members were already in possession of all the facts concerning the case in question, and it was essential that the Commission should state its views by a special vote.

The matter could not be regarded as a simple case of retaliation; it was a question of the treatment given to Members of the United Nations, and there was a danger that that organization was being considered as a dependent of the United States. He therefore wholeheartedly supported the proposal of the USSR representative, and urged that the Commission must face the question.

MR. LEBEAU (Belgium) associated himself with the statements of the Chairman and the representatives of the United Kingdom and Australia. The practical question of procedure had been settled by the decision to postpone meeting until 26 May, when, the alternates would be allowed to vote if the absent members had not arrived. The question of the implementation of certain agreements was not within the terms of reference of the Commission.

At the same time, he agreed that the facts were serious, as they indicated that the statutes of the United Nations were not being fully applied. Such cases might recur. He would suggest, therefore, that, if the USSR representative agreed, the Chairman might act as spokesman of the Commission in drawing the attention of the United States authorities to the incident, and suggesting that specific instructions should be sent to United States embassies with regard to the right of entry of United Nations representatives.

MR. CASSIN (France) declared that the question of principle had been clearly settled by the vote, since postponement would not have been decided upon had it not been agreed that the two representatives had been delayed by abnormal circumstances.

He agreed to a certain extent with the suggestion of the Belgian representative, but he did not think the Commission had any right to ask the Chairman to make representations to the United States Government. The Chairman should discuss the matter with the Secretary-General of the United Nations, who could approach the right authorities in the name of the United Nations.

MRS. MEHTA (India), while deploring the unfortunate incident, thought that in view of the explanation and assurances given by the Chairman there was no need to discuss it further. If the USSR representative was not satisfied, he should raise the question in the General Assembly rather than the Commission.

THE CHAIRMAN expressed her willingness that the Secretary-General should be informed of the sense of the meeting and the substance of the discussion.

MR. MORA (Uruguay) wished to associate his delegation with the expressions of regret that the two representatives had been delayed. He considered, however, that in referring the matter to the Secretary-General, the Commission should not limit itself to the case of representatives proceeding to the United Nations; the Secretary-General should be asked to consider the question of all Governments which placed obstacles in the way of the free movement of people all over the world. That involved the question of human rights, and as such was the task of the Commission.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) proposed as a compromise the adoption of the following proposal:

“The Commission on Human Rights asks the Chairman to draw the attention of the Secretary-General of the United Nations to the fact that the representatives of the Ukrainian and Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republics could not arrive in time for the third session of the Commission on Human Rights, for reasons independent of their will and in violation of the agreement adopted by the General Assembly on 31 October 1947<sup>85</sup> and calls the attention of the Secretary-General to the necessity of taking measures to prevent a repetition of such incidents in the future.”

Such a formula could have a general meaning, as it would be applicable in whatever State a session might take place.

THE CHAIRMAN stated that she would gladly convey the sense of the meeting to the Director of the Division of Human Rights, and ask him to refer the matter to the Secretary-General. She asked whether the USSR representative would draft his proposal in that sense, since it would be better if the case were reported by a person who had no immediate interest in the matter.

<sup>85</sup> General Assembly Resolution 99(I) of 14 December 1946 authorized the Secretary-General to negotiate a headquarters agreement with the United States. The Agreement Between the United Nations and the United States of America regarding the Headquarters of the United Nations was reached on 26 June 1947. By Resolution 169(II) of 31 October 1947, the General Assembly approved the Agreement and authorized the Secretary-General to bring it into force.

[14]

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) agreed to amend his proposal so that it began: "The Commission draws the attention of the Secretary-General . . . ."

In the absence of any objections, the Chairman declared the USSR proposal adopted as amended.

THE CHAIRMAN proposed that the Commission should define its working procedure.

MR. CASSIN (France) thought the Commission should begin by dealing with the Declaration which was the first document on which agreement could be reached: the drafting of that document was moreover, the first task assigned to the Commission by the Economic and Social Council. The Commission should then examine the implementation of the Covenant for the twofold reason that only the broad aspects of that matter had been discussed at the Geneva session, and because the Economic and Social Council had stressed the need for drafting precise texts on that subject. To gain time, a drafting sub-committee could be asked to do the preliminary work while a plenary session of the Commission discussed the Covenant which had already been carefully examined by the Drafting Committee.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) thought the Commission should first of all discuss in detail the general questions connected with the contents of the Declaration and of the Covenant, and the relationship between the two. In order to simplify the work, the [3] Commission should then proceed to make a simultaneous study of the articles that were to be found in both the Declaration and the Covenant. To expedite matters, the Secretariat could prepare a table of those articles. Thirdly, the Commission would discuss the remaining articles in both documents and would then, following the French representative's proposal, finish the examination of the articles of the Declaration before proceeding to an examination of the Covenant.

Consequently, it was essential to begin by a general discussion on the contents of the Declaration and Covenant, then to consider the general principles embodied in those documents and finally to study the question of their implementation.

THE CHAIRMAN supported the USSR representative's proposal to ask the Secretariat to draw up an analytical report showing the articles to be found in both the Declaration and the Covenant, as well as the views of the various delegations on those articles. She pointed out that any general discussion should be short and reminded the Commission that, whatever the method of work adopted, it was necessary to reserve a considerable place for the problem of implementation.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) supported the proposal of the French representative. The USSR proposal was tempting but gave rise to difficulties. The Commission had always examined the two documents separately, and changing methods at the session might lead to confusion. Moreover, the aims of the Declaration and of the Covenant were different, and each of those two documents was a unit that had to be examined as a whole. He hoped the Commission would avoid useless general discussion as the views of various delegations were already known. One question, however, did call for a general discussion: The aims of the Declaration and of the Covenant, and, consequently, the final drafting of those [4] documents.

MR. CASSIN (France) thought the USSR proposal had logical advantages, but it was necessary to remember that the question of implementation had already been delayed. The USSR proposal could, however, be taken into account during the examination of the articles of the Declaration. Some of those were also to be found in the Covenant, and the Commission would be called upon to display method and self-restraint in drafting such articles more briefly and, perhaps, in deciding not to draft them in their final form.

MR. LOPEZ (Philippines) did not see how the Commission could examine the question of implementation before completing the examination of the Covenant. He thought such a method was illogical.

MR. CASSIN (France) said that the draft prepared by the Drafting Committee would give the Commission a sufficiently clear idea of the Covenant to enable it to study its implementation.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) stressed the need for a preliminary exchange of views on the Declaration and the Covenant in order to clarify the relationship between the two. That work had not been done yet. No logical reasons had yet been put forward to explain why certain articles were to be found in the Declaration and not in the Covenant. The Commission should then discuss the articles dealing with the same subject in the Declaration and in the Covenant. The Commission would thus gain valuable time. Thirdly, it could discuss separately those parts of the Declaration and Covenant which were different. Such a discussion would not take much time because the articles in question were mainly formal. As regards implementation, he agreed with the Philippines representative. It was necessary to decide first what was to [5] be implemented and then only to discuss implementation itself. Implementation, therefore, came fourth.

THE CHAIRMAN proposed putting to the vote the proposal of the French representative and then the proposal of the USSR representative.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) asked that the Commission should not vote on the matter because of the absence of the Byelorussian and Ukrainian representatives. He recalled that it had been decided at a previous meeting not to settle important questions before the arrival of those representatives.

MR. VILFAN (Yugoslavia) supported the USSR representative and pointed out that it was not merely a question of the formal participation of those representatives in the vote but also of their participation in the discussion. The Commission could not estimate in advance the value of the contribution they might make to the debate.

THE CHAIRMAN said the Commission might consider giving those representatives the right to register their vote with the Secretariat on their arrival. Personally, she felt that the decision in question, which concerned the Commission's method of work, was of secondary importance, and that since the necessary quorum existed a vote could be taken in the absence of those representatives.

MR. LEBEAU (Belgium) stressed that the decision the Commission had adopted at its previous meeting related only to essential questions, that is to say, to the examination of the texts of the Declaration and the Covenant. He thought that the question in hand was of secondary importance and could be settled immediately. He was in favour of the French proposal as supported by the representative of the United Kingdom.

MR. LOUTFI (Egypt) supported the proposal of the Belgian [6] representative.

MRS. MEHTA (India) felt that the Declaration should be discussed first and the implementation later; she supported the French proposal for setting up a sub-committee to do the preliminary work on that question. There already existed a draft of the Covenant and the Commission would be able to judge approximately which provisions would have to be implemented. She did not think the question of the method of work was sufficiently important to be postponed until the arrival of the two absent representatives.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the question of whether the Commission wished to vote immediately on the method of work.

The Commission decided to proceed to a vote by eight votes to two, with one abstention.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the working procedure proposed by the French representative.

That procedure was adopted by nine votes to two.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) suggested making it possible for the representatives of the Byelorussian SSR and the Ukrainian SSR to register their votes upon their arrival.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the proposal of the USSR representative.

The USSR proposal was adopted by four votes to two, with five abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that that decision would also apply to representatives of delegations which were represented at the meeting only by alternates without a vote.

Examination of item 9 of the agenda concerning the role of the information [7] groups and the local human rights committees.

THE CHAIRMAN observed that there were two resolutions on the subject: one adopted by the Economic and Social Council and the other by the last session of the Commission.

The United States maintained contact with two hundred such groups to which it communicated all the relevant United Nations documents. Regular meetings were organized with those groups, and the latest had been held on 4 March 1948. The discussion had dealt with civil rights, economic rights, the Covenant and freedom of information.

MR. CASSIN (France) said France had not yet set up an official information group on human rights and was waiting for the outcome of the present exchange of views. France had, however, set up a temporary group, the Consultative Committee on Human Rights, which included representatives of the League for the Rights of Man, professors, writers, outstanding persons in parliament circles and other persons with the requisite specialized knowledge. The French Government wanted to hear the views of other delegations on two or three important points. In particular, France would like to know whether the groups should be organized as private organizations with Government support, or as official or semi-official organization. Both courses presented certain advantages: private groups would enjoy greater freedom of expression, while semi-official offices would be entitled not only to receive information from the Commission on Human Rights but also to inform the Commission on trends of public opinion in various countries and even on how human rights were being respected.

The French representative would appreciate more detailed information regarding the activities of such groups in Turkey, the Dominican Republic, Haiti, the Netherlands or El Salvador.

MR. HOOD (Australia) said that question should be examined at the end of the session when the final draft of the Covenant would already be before the Commission. In the meantime, the Secretariat could prepare a working paper on information groups and their functions to be used at a later stage.

THE CHAIRMAN accepted that proposal.

MISS SENDER (American Federation of Labor) said that the setting up of such groups had been recommended by the Economic and Social Council not only in connexion with the implementation but also with the drawing up of the Covenant. She regretted more countries had not set up such groups to express the views of public opinion on human rights.

Following upon a proposal by the Chairman, the Commission decided that amendments of substance to the first ten articles should be submitted in writing to the Secretariat as soon as possible, so that they could be distributed before the discussion on the Declaration.

The Commission also decided to set up a small drafting sub-committee, composed of the representatives of France and the United Kingdom to supervise the incorporation of the necessary changes of style in the Declaration and the Covenant in the two working languages. The same task would be entrusted to Russian, Spanish and Chinese speaking representatives in respect of the translations of the two documents into their own languages.

The meeting rose at 4:30 p.m.

Summary Record of the Forty-Eighth Meeting
[of the Commission on Human Rights]

Lake Success, New York on Wednesday,
26 May 1948, at 2:45 p.m.

Chairman: Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt, United States of America. Vice-Chairman: Mr. R. Cassin, France. Rapporteur: Mr. Azkoul, Lebanon. Members: Mr. Hood, Australia; Mr. Lebeau, Belgium; Mr. A. Stepanenko, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic; Mr. P.C. Chang, China; Mr. Loutfi, Egypt; Mrs. Mehta, India; Mr. de J. Quijano, Panama; Mr. Lopez, Philippines; Mr. Klekovkin, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic; Mr. Pavlov, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics; Mr. Wilson, United Kingdom; Mr. Mora, Uruguay; Mr. Vilfan, Yugoslavia. Representatives of Specialized Agencies: Mr. Lebar, United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization; Mr. Howell, World Health Organization. Consultants from Non-Governmental Organizations: Miss Toni Sender, American Federation of Labor; Mr. van Istendael, International Federation of Christian Trade Unions; Miss Stuart, World Federation of United Nations Associations; Mr. Goldsmith, Agudas Israel World Organization Co-ordinating Board of Jewish Organizations; Mr. Brotman, Co-ordinating Board of Jewish Organizations; Miss Strahler, International Committee of the Red Cross; Miss Burgess, International Federation of Business and Professional Women; Miss Robb, Liaison Committee of Women's International Organizations; Mr. Bienenfeld, World Jewish Congress. [2] Observers representing an inter-Governmental Organization: Mr. Stone, Preparatory Commission of the International Refugee Organization (IRO). Secretariat: Mr. Humphrey, Director, Human Rights Division; Mr. Lawson, Secretary of the Commission

THE CHAIRMAN welcomed the representatives of the Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic and of the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic and again expressed her regret for the circumstances which had delayed them.

She then announced that General Romulo, the representative of the Philippines, had been obliged to return to his country owing to the death of his mother. Doubtless, the members of the Commission would wish to join her in expressing their sympathy to General Romulo in his bereavement.

The Commission asked Mr. Humphrey (Secretariat) to send a telegram of condolence to General Romulo on its behalf.

THE CHAIRMAN was happy to welcome Mr. Lopez, who had been appointed by the Philippines Government to take the place of General Romulo on the Commission.

<sup>87</sup> This is the date of the meeting. The document was issued on 4 June 1948.

MR. KLEKOVKIN (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) said that he had learned that day of the letter sent by the Secretary-General to the permanent delegate of the Ukrainian SSR to the United Nations informing him that the Commission on Human Rights had decided not to embark upon the decisive stage of its work before the arrival of himself and Mr. Stepanenko.

Mr. Klekovkin saw evidence in that decision of the desire of the members of the Commission to stand by their Byelorussian and Ukrainian colleagues when an attempt had been made to subject them to discrimination and he thanked them for their effective and justified gesture.

MR. STEPANENKO (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) associated himself wholeheartedly with the remarks of the representative of the Ukrainian SSR, especially with regard to the conclusion to be drawn from the Secretary-General's statement.

[3]

THE CHAIRMAN recalled that at its previous meeting the Commission had decided to reserve the right of the representatives of China, the Ukrainian SSR and the Byelorussian SSR, all three of whom were absent, to vote on the method of work suggested by the French representative. It had been made clear at that time that the Commission would take a second vote if the three representatives' votes should change the result.

THE CHAIRMAN stressed that the Economic and Social Council had instructed the Commission on Human Rights to submit to it, in final form, a draft International Declaration, a draft Covenant and provisions for their implementation, and asked the members of the Commission whether they thought they would be able to fulfil the task imposed upon them by the Council at the present session.

The Commission decided that it would fulfil that task.

THE CHAIRMAN then asked for the views of members of the Commission on the basic objective at which the proposed Declaration should aim. Such an expression of views could only serve to facilitate the actual drafting.

MR. KLEKOVKIN (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) said that it would be difficult for him to take part in the discussion of the report of the Drafting Committee, which contained the texts of the draft Declaration and the Draft Covenant, as the Russian translation of that document had not yet been distributed.

Moreover, he wished to repeat what he had often said in the course of the second session of the Commission on Human Rights: in his opinion, the actual drafting should be preceded by a general discussion which would define the Commission's aims and enable it to settle points of [4] secondary importance without delay, while important matters of principle would be given the place due to them.

Consideration of the Report of the Drafting Committee (document E/CN.4/95)

THE CHAIRMAN observed that the preliminary texts, which had been drafted at the Commission's second session, had already been transmitted to the Governments concerned. At the sixth session, the Economic and Social Council had asked the Commission on Human Rights to revise those texts in the light of the comments submitted by Governments and, especially, to draft the provisions for their implementation in proper form. Therefore, the Commission should complete the drafting work which had been begun, keeping in mind the directives it had received from the Economic and Social Council.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon), Rapporteur, explained that the French translation of the Drafting Committee's report was not ready on time owing to certain technical difficulties.

On the other hand, the Rapporteur and the Secretariat had done their best to include certain suggestions made by the USSR representative in the report. Unfortunately, it had not been possible to include all of them as they had not all been drawn up in one or other of the working languages.

Mr. Azkoul then indicated a few minor changes which should be made in the document:

On page 9, articles 21 and 22, deletion of the words "Geneva text", as the words "without discrimination on grounds of race, sex, languages, religious belief or social origin" had been added to the original text;

On page 14, the word "Note" to be centred so as to indicate that the note concerned the whole of the draft Declaration submitted by the [5] representative of China, and not article 33;

Finally, on page 21, deletion of the last two paragraphs as well as of the explanatory note, as they already appeared in article 9 of the draft Covenant.

Mr. Azkoul announced that the Russian translation of the Drafting Committee report would be ready shortly.

MR. STEPANENKO (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) pointed out that the Russian language delegations were constantly hampered in their work because of failure to observe the rules of procedure relating to the translation of documents into the five official languages.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the Commission had not yet reached the stage of detailed discussion of the Drafting Committee's report. She hoped that it would be possible to distribute the different texts before the general discussion on the basic aim of the Declaration on Human Rights was concluded.

Speaking as the representative of the United States of America, the Chairman stated that in the opinion of her delegation the Declaration should serve two purposes:

1. To establish basic standards which would guide the United Nations in the realization, within the meaning of the Charter, of international co-operation in promoting and encouraging respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms for all;
2. To serve as a guide and inspiration to individuals and groups throughout the world in their efforts to promote respect for human rights. The Declaration should not be in any sense a legislative document. The General Assembly was not a legislative body. The manner in which the United Nations could and would wish to undertake the task of promoting [6] and encouraging respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms remained in large measure to be determined. Further, it was clear that the Declaration, as envisaged, did not create legal remedies or procedures to ensure respect for the rights and freedoms it proposed to the world; that ideal would have to be achieved by further steps taken in accordance with international and domestic law. The Declaration would have moral, not mandatory, force.

It was quite otherwise with the Covenant, which bound the parties loyally. The Covenant was therefore the document which should contain measures of implementation.

The United States representative stated in conclusion that she could not better express her delegation's view of the nature and purpose of the Declaration than by quoting the words of Abraham Lincoln on the United States Declaration of Independence, and especially the following:-

“They (the authors of the Declaration) did not mean to assert the obvious untruth that all men were then actually enjoying that equality, or yet that they were about to confer it immediately upon them. In fact, they had no power to confer such a boon. They meant simply to declare the right, so that the enforcement of it might follow as soon as circumstances should permit.”

MR. CASSIN (France) shared the view of the United States delegation that the Declaration should be drafted on broad lines. It was quite clear that the Declaration should bear above all an explanatory character. Human rights had existed before the United Nations Charter and did not exist any less since. It would therefore be useful for the Commission to list those rights which it considered to be the most essential attributes of every human being without distinction.

The Declaration should, further, fulfil the functions of a guide. Some of these rights had grown out of national constitutions and belonged to the traditions of peoples. Others had grown only within the last fifty years. Finally, some rights had not yet been recognized at the international level, and it was especially with regard to them that the Declaration should act as a guide.

In its examination of fundamental human rights, the Commission should: 1) state the right in question, i.e. provide a concise definition of it; 2) name those to whom that right was due; 3) assure its enforcement, and 4) go on to the limitations upon it. A list of rights and the designation of those to whom they were due was properly a part of the Declaration. Definition of the scope of those rights, however, must be incorporated in the Covenant, a separate document which would have to fulfil a much more detailed and precise legal function.

Among traditional rights were those connected with the ideas of freedom, physical freedom, freedom of opinion and of association. A preliminary instrument might define their scope and specify the means by which they could be applied. It was not certain, however, that certain economic and social rights, which ought to be mentioned in the proposed International Covenant, could be included in that preliminary instrument. Such rights would require longer study, being more difficult to define by their very nature. Moreover, certain specialized agencies might have to be consulted with regard to them. Decisions of a legal nature, which were more easily taken on the national plane, might cause difficulties on the international plane. That was all the more true when the recognized possessor of a right was a collective body such as the United Nations.

There were two conflicting views about the legal force of the Declaration. Some saw the Declaration purely as a document interpreting [8] the Charter and therefore vested with the same mandatory force as the Charter itself. Others saw it as a purely formal document, giving expression to a hope of a rather limited moral influence, and of no legal value until its principles had been embodied in one or several covenants.

The French delegation did not share either of those too strict and simple views. The French Government believed that the Declaration, which would in a sense be an explanation of human rights in existence before the Charter, rights which it was incumbent upon the Members of the United Nations to protect in accordance with the Charter, should to a certain extent bear an assertive character. Even in the absence of any Covenant, therefore, the principal organs of the United Nations would, in the opinion of the French delegation, be entitled to take cognizance of the fact if any State violated human rights. Moreover, there was legal precedent to support that opinion, as appeared when the General Assembly decided that the Indian complaint against the Union of South Africa was within its competence.

The Declaration should not, however, be of a purely assertive character. It should be a guide and, by that function, introduce new conceptions. In so far as it assumed the role of a guide, it would be required to make a distinction between those obligations which applied to the United Nations as a whole and those which applied to each particular nation.

The United Nations Organization was subject to the obligations imposed by the General Assembly's resolutions. In respect of the United Nations as a whole, therefore, the mandatory force of the proposed Declaration would derive from the resolution the General Assembly might adopt on it.

In respect of individual States, the new concepts which the Declaration would contain, such as the right of nationality or the right of asylum, would have only the value of a recommendation like the resolutions of the General Assembly.

The French delegation, then, envisaged the Declaration as a document shorter than the Covenant, without the legal value of a convention, but which would have the function of keeping the fullest possible list of human rights in everybody's mind. That list would have to contain not only those rights presently recognized, but also those which the Commission thought should be recognized. The Declaration would specify those to whom such rights were due and would refrain from setting strict limits to the scope and application of those rights. It would be left to the Covenant more precisely to define the scope and the methods of application of human rights, both on the national and on the international plane.

By expressing the general opinion of the Members of the United Nations on the protection of human rights in the Declaration, the Commission would create a framework for the provisions of the Covenant designed to defend those rights and to ensure that future generations would enjoy them.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon), Rapporteur, stated that it was necessary to consider the difference between the Declaration and the Covenant in order to give those two documents their final shape. The Declaration would proclaim and list those rights which human reason at the present stage of development of society considered inseparable from the conception of the human person. The Covenant, on the other hand, was the product of the will of States, and its provisions would be determined less by reason than by practical considerations.

[10]

An essential difference between the two documents became apparent when the obligations involved were considered. In that respect, Mr. Azkoul supported Mr. Cassin's analysis of the mandatory force of the Declaration.

The Declaration, which summarized the rights considered essential to ensure the dignity of the human person, would thus merely indicate the general principles by which those rights were determined. In the case of certain new rights, which had not yet become traditional, however, the Declaration should specify those to whom such rights were due, and the Commission would have to exercise care not to frame it in the form of a convention.

The Covenant, on the other hand, would contain only those principles expressed in the Declaration which the Commission considered the signatory States to be willing to apply, and would be binding upon those States.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) agreed with the representatives of the United States, France and Lebanon. The United Kingdom delegation was of the opinion that the draft Declaration and draft Covenant should be submitted to the General Assembly accompanied by a resolution proposing its adoption and summing up the opinions of its authors.

Mr. Wilson submitted the following resolution to the Commission:

“The Commission on Human Rights

Recommends that the General Assembly adopt, in the form of a Declaration, a statement of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms which States should do their utmost to realize through teaching and education and measures for the progressive development of the social and economic wellbeing of mankind.”

THE CHAIRMAN stated that the United Kingdom draft resolution would be discussed as soon as it was distributed to the members of the Commission.

[11]

She then asked for the views of the Commission on the manner in which it would consider the Declaration. If the Commission decided to leave the preamble until later, it could first go on to a general discussion of the articles and entrust a drafting sub-committee with the working out of the final text of those articles.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) agreed that consideration of the preamble of the Declaration should be postponed. He considered that the Commission should begin by examining the articles in numerical order.

With regard to the proposal that the articles should be referred to a drafting sub-committee, he did not think that that was a very practical solution. It was difficult to agree on a precise text, even when there was agreement on the principles which the articles should contain.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) pointed out that the general discussion on the relationship between the Declaration and the Covenant – which he had requested at the previous meeting and in which the Commission had refused to engage before considering the Declaration and the Covenant themselves – had actually been opened during the present meeting. That discussion had developed on the question of the form of those two documents. Mr. Pavlov considered that it was very difficult to separate the questions of substance from those of mere form.

He therefore reserved the right, after receiving the Russian translation of the Drafting Committee's report, to explain the USSR delegation's point of view on questions of form as well as of substance which went beyond the framework of the discussion of specific articles. He then recalled that at its previous meeting the Commission had decided to permit the representative of the Ukrainian SSR and of the [12] Byelorussian SSR to record their votes on the Commission's method of work. He considered that those representatives should be invited to state their views on the question; the discussion which would follow might induce the Commission to modify the decision it had taken (see document E/CN.4/SR.47).

THE CHAIRMAN said that there could be no question of the whole Commission considering the working procedure anew. She invited the representatives of the Ukrainian SSR and of the Byelorussian SSR to express their views on the proposal made by the representative of France at the preceding meeting.

MR. STEPANENKO (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) said that like the USSR representative he considered a general discussion of the Declaration and of the Covenant, as well as of the relationship between them, to be absolutely necessary. The Commission should then examine the Declaration article by article, discussing at the same time those which were contained in both the Declaration and the Covenant.

Mr. Stepanenko stressed that such a procedure would have the advantage of saving the Commission's time and of facilitating the determination of the relationship between the Declaration and the Covenant.

MR. KLEKOVKIN (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) stated that his delegation's point of view had not changed since the Commission's second session. Now, as then, his delegation considered that the Commission should concentrate its efforts on the Declaration and decide questions of principle of tremendous importance for the progress of mankind, which had suffered too much from the effects of fascism and was thirsting for peace.

Like the representative of Lebanon, Mr. Klekovkin thought that the Declaration constituted the basis on which the principles to be included [13] in the Covenant could be developed. The Covenant should contain such of the rights included in the Declaration as, in the Commission's judgment, should be vested with legal force. The articles which would appear in both the Declaration and the Covenant should be considered simultaneously. With regard to the implementation of the Declaration and of the Covenant, it was obvious that the Commission could only consider the question after establishing what should be implemented and after determining the binding force of each of the two documents.

As to the way in which the Commission should consider the Declaration, the representative of the Ukrainian SSR felt that it would be premature to decide that the preamble would be considered at the end or that the articles would be examined one by one in numerical order. Discussion of the preamble could lead to the solution of several questions which certain articles raised; moreover, it might prove useful to group some articles of substance under one heading.

Mr. Klekovkin said that he had made these few observations without having studied the documents prepared by the Drafting Committee. He could only express an opinion after having examined them. He drew the Commission's attention to the fact that it had arrived at the final drafting stage of the Declaration and of the Covenant and that therefore it should not proceed too hastily.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) requested that representatives who had not been present at the meeting of 24 May should be informed about the proposal which he himself had made during that meeting.

At the invitation of the Chairman, Mr. Pavlov gave an outline of his proposal (see document E/CN.4/SR.47), according to which the Commission should at first have a general discussion; then discuss the articles contained in both the Declaration and the Covenant; then discuss separately, [14] the articles contained in one or other of the two documents; and finally consider the question of implementation. He pointed out that his proposal did not seriously differ from the French proposal.

At the Chairman's request MR. HUMPHREY (Secretariat) explained that under the terms of rule 31 of the rules of procedure English and French were the working languages of the Economic and Social Council. Rule 38 of the rules of procedure provided that all resolutions, recommendations and other official decisions of the Council should be communicated in the official languages. Those provisions applied to all the bodies of the Council.

Consequently, the delegations were entitled to request the translation into the official languages of the report of the Drafting Committee, since it was an "official decision" of that body. With regard to working documents, such as draft resolutions submitted by the various delegations, the Secretariat could just distribute them in English and French, but it had assured the Russian-speaking delegations that it would do its utmost to let them have those documents in Russian.

MR. MORA (Uruguay) would not insist on a Spanish translation of all the Commission's documents, but he reserved the right to ask for it in certain cases.

MR. CHANG (China) said that his delegation also reserved the right to ask for a Chinese translation of any resolution, recommendation or official decision if it considered that it needed that translation for the discussion.

He then asked whether "implementation" in the French proposal applied to the Covenant as well as to the Declaration.

[15]

THE CHAIRMAN recalled that the Commission had made certain suggestions concerning implementation at its second session. These suggestions had been submitted to the Economic and Social Council, which, by its resolution 116F(VI), had invited the Commission on Human Rights to submit final recommendations on the question so that the draft articles dealing with implementation could be submitted to the Member Governments as soon as possible. It was because of the urgency of that question that the French representative had proposed that the Commission should consider the question of implementation immediately after examining the Declaration and before considering the Covenant.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that in his opinion the expression "Declaration on Human Rights" used in resolution 116 F (VI) unquestionably meant the Declaration and the Covenant. Therefore, the question of implementation should be considered at the very end. He asked the French representative whether he insisted on the working procedure which he had proposed.

MR. CASSIN (France) gave an affirmative reply. He recalled that the Commission was far behind in its work on implementation. He pointed out that under the terms of his proposal the Commission was not called upon to take a definite decision on implementation at the beginning. It should proceed with a general discussion which would enable a sub-committee to draft the articles dealing with that question. Mr. Cassin added that if the Commission had been beginning its work, it would have been more logical to adopt the procedure suggested by the USSR representative; the Commission had in fact followed that order during its first two sessions. The Commission was now in the final stage of its work, however, and it should consider the question of implementation without delay.

[16]

MR. STEPANENKO (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) supported the procedure proposed by the USSR representative. In his opinion implementation could not be discussed before the Covenant. If the Commission adopted a different method of work, it might later find it impossible to follow it.

THE CHAIRMAN invited the representatives of China, of the Byelorussian SSR and of the Ukrainian SSR to vote on the proposal made by the French representative of the meeting of 24 May 1948.

Two representatives voted against the French proposal. The third abstained.

THE CHAIRMAN announced that the record of the vote on the French proposal taken at the meeting of 24 May 1948 would be changed to read:

The working procedure proposed by the French representative was adopted by nine votes to four, with one abstention.

She then asked the members of the Commission whether they wished to examine the Declaration article by article at the meeting to be held next afternoon.

A decision to that effect was adopted by ten votes, with four abstentions.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) explained that he had abstained from voting because he was not certain that the general discussion would necessarily be concluded during the morning meeting.

The meeting rose at 5:00 p.m.

Trade Union Rights (Freedom of Association)

Memorandum by the Secretary-General

In documents E/CN.4/23, E/CN.4/31 and E/CN.4/23/Add.1, the proceedings of the Economic and Social Council and of the General Assembly concerning the question of Trade Union Rights (Freedom of Association) have been described and an analysis of the decisions taken has been presented to the Commission on Human Rights. Detailed information on the action taken by the International Labour Organization and by Non-Government Organizations in category A (World Federation of Trade Unions and the American Federation of Labor) has also been given.

From the Economic and Social Council resolutions 52(IV) and 84(V) and from resolution 128(II) of the General Assembly, the Commission on Human Rights will note that it has been asked to devote attention to two aspects of the question, namely, to deal

1. with the substance, and
2. with the machinery.

1. Questions of Substance

In resolution 52(IV) (Annex A of E/CN.4/31) the Commission on Human Rights has been requested to “consider those aspects of the subject which might appropriately form part of the Bill or Declaration on Human Rights”.

In its resolution 84(V) (Annex B of E/CN.4/31) the Economic and Social Council has stated that it “awaits also the report which it will receive in due course from the Commission on Human Rights on those aspects of the subject which might appropriately form part of the Bill or Declaration on Human Rights”.

The Commission on Human Rights may therefore wish to decide whether to comply with these requests by either simply inserting appropriate provisions on Freedom of Association (Trade Union Rights) in the draft International Bill of Human Rights which it will in due course submit to [2] the Council, or else to present to the Council a special report on this question.

The General Assembly in its resolution 128(II) approved the two resolutions of the Council and decided to transmit the report of the International Labour Organization to the Commission on Human Rights with the same objects as those stated in resolution 52(IV) of the Economic and Social Council, namely, that the Commission on Human Rights may consider those aspects of the subject which might appropriately form part of the Bill or Declaration on Human Rights.

China: Amendments to the Draft International Declaration on Human Rights

Drafting Committee Text (E/CN.4/95)

Proposed Amendments

Whereas the peoples of the United Nations have reaffirmed their faith in fundamental human rights, in the dignity and worth of the human person, and in the equal right of men and women;

The General Assembly resolves to state in a solemn declaration the essential rights and fundamental freedoms of the human being
And adopts the following Declaration:

Article 1

All men are born free and equal in dignity and rights. They are endowed by nature with reason and conscience, and should act towards one another like brothers.

Wording to be decided by the Commission.

Article 2

In the exercise of his rights everyone is limited by the rights of others and by the just requirements of the democratic State. The individual owes duties to society through which he is enabled to develop his spirit, mind and body in wider freedom.

Substitute for Articles 2 and 3: Everyone is entitled to the human rights and fundamental freedoms set forth in this Declaration without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion. The exercise of these rights requires recognition of the rights of others and the just requirements of the community in which he resides.

[2]

Article 3

1. Everyone is entitled to all the rights and freedoms set forth in this Declaration, without distinction of any kind, such as race (which includes colour), sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, property status, or national or social origin.

2. All are equal before the law regardless of office or status and entitled to equal protection of the law against any arbitrary discrimination or against any incitement to such discrimination, in violation of this Declaration.

Article 4

Everyone has the right to life, to liberty and security of person.

Substitute: Everyone has the right to life.

Article 5

[3]

MR. PELT (Secretariat) expressed the hope that a statement regarding the documents situation would remove some of the misunderstandings which had arisen.

His department's budget was based on average workloads, spread evenly over the year. Peak loads were sometimes inevitable and provision had been made for them in two ways. If the peak load could be foreseen in good time, temporary staff was engaged. If the peak load arrived suddenly, as when a Commission requested a night meeting, there was some provision in the budget for that. The budget provided only for occasional peak loads, however, and since the middle of January peak loads had been almost routine. As a result, the mimeographing service was in permanent need of more staff, and not a single week had passed without the present staff working overtime. The translation service was in a similar situation. That was why it had been necessary some two weeks ago to cancel all meetings for a few days, and that was why the Secretariat sometimes had to ask Commissions and Committees to wait a few days for documents.

As things stood, there was a risk of the budget provision for overtime and temporary assistance being exhausted long before the end of the year. Nor was it only a question of money. There was also the health of the staff to be considered. Many categories of the staff had been doing more overtime than was good for them, and overdue leave ran into hundreds of thousands of man-hours. In fact, the Secretariat had reached the extreme limit of working capacity, and the only way to cope with the problem was to spread out the work. It would be recalled that the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions had criticized the Secretariat for not keeping the work on an even keel.

[4]

That was the general picture. As to the particular difficulties of the Commission on Human Rights, Mr. Pelt understood that complaints had been made that summary record writers were not always available. The reason was simple. The budget approved by the last General Assembly had provided for enough summary record writers to serve six meetings a day. For several weeks past there had been many more than six meetings a day and consequently some meetings had not been covered. In such cases, the Secretary-General's instructions were that the committee secretary should furnish a short, comprehensive report.

With regard to translations it was true that rule 30 of the rules of procedure said that "a translation of the whole or part of any summary record into any of the other official languages shall be furnished if requested by any member." It was difficult, however, to equate that right to translations into terms of time and money. For one thing, it was almost impossible correctly to estimate how much translation would be required. For another, the last General Assembly had been in a mood of economy. In that connexion the General Assembly had endorsed the Advisory Committee's view that, while the Secretariat should take the lead in urging economy, it could not be expected to succeed without the cooperation of delegations, who were asked to keep their demands to a minimum.

Mr. Pelt concluded by stating that he was not suggesting either an increase in the budget or a decrease in the workload. He was only asking the Commission to abide by the assumptions on which the budget had been drawn up and, especially, to reduce peak loads.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) expressed satisfaction at Mr. Pelt's statement. It was well known how the General Assembly had cut the budget, [5] and it was his opinion that serious mistakes had been made then. He had only two questions to ask Mr. Pelt. The first was whether summary records could be made as complete as possible and circulated as soon as possible. It was obvious that the fullest records possible were desirable in the drafting of an instrument like the Covenant on Human Rights.

His second question was whether the Commission could be provided with working documents in the two working languages at the time when they were needed. The Latin-American delegations rarely made use of their right to have documents translated into Spanish, but there were some of them who knew only one of the two working languages. When they came to final drafting, it was essential to have the documents in a language that could be completely understood.

MR. PELT (Secretariat) referred back to his statement that the department was staffed to provide summary record writers for only six meetings a day. That day there were thirteen. In such cases, he could only follow the Secretary-General's instructions and select the meetings to be covered. His answer to the representative of Chile must therefore be that in normal circumstances the Secretariat would provide the service required, but that in abnormal circumstances he could make no promise.

With regard to translations his answer must be similar. In normal circumstances the required service would be provided. If, however, the Security Council, for example, should suddenly require an unusually large volume of translation, he could not guarantee the required service to all the Commissions and Committees. The ultimate solution was to even [6] out the work. The staff should not be based on peak loads.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) said he had had no doubt that the Secretariat was doing its best. He only wished to have the facts. If the members of the Commission should find that in those conditions they could not properly fulfil their task, he would ask them to bear Mr. Pelt's statement in mind and perhaps induce the next Assembly to reconsider the situation.

Consideration of Report of the Drafting Committee (Document E/CN.4/95)

THE CHAIRMAN asked for general statements on the report of the Drafting Committee.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) observed that so far there had been discussion only of the formal interrelation between the Declaration and the Covenant on Human Rights. There was also a question of principle to be considered, and in that respect the Charter should be the Commission's guide. The preamble to the Charter reaffirmed faith in "fundamental human rights" and in the "equal rights of men and women" and promised "to promote social progress and better standards of life in larger freedom". Article 13 of the Charter required the General Assembly to initiate studies which would assist "in the realization of human rights and fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion.”

Mr. Pavlov recalled his own statement in the Drafting Committee on 4 May when he had listed three basic requirements which the Declaration and Covenant must fulfil. They were:

[7]

1. A guarantee of human rights without distinction of race, nationality, religion or sex and in accordance with the principles of national sovereignty and political independence.
2. Implementation of those rights with due regard to the economic, social and other peculiarities of each country.
3. A definition not only of rights but also of the obligations of citizens to their respective States.

Those three requirements were in full accord with the Charter. In the course of the discussion on the inter-relation between the Declaration and the Covenant it had been said that the Declaration should be of a general character, the question of implementation being left to the Covenant. He could not agree that the Declaration should be confined to pious wishes. If the members of the Commission were serious, they could not oppose the Declaration to the Covenant.

The representative of France had mentioned three points which every article should contain. They were:

1. A definition of the right.
2. A statement as to who gave the right and how it was to be implemented.
3. A statement of the necessary limitations in the interests of democratic government and of society as a whole.

Those principles must apply both to the Declaration and to the Covenant, although there might be some difference in the degree of elaboration in the two instruments.

The United Kingdom representative had said the day before that the Declaration's main importance would be as an educational instrument. Education was important, of course, but the Commission had not met to prepare only an educational document. The Declaration must be a [8] recommendation, eventually endorsed by the General Assembly, to all the Members of the United Nations. It should not be a mere listing of pious hopes and of educational aims for adolescents.

There was one important aspect of the Declaration and Covenant which should not be overlooked. That was that their texts should be acceptable to Members of the United Nations with differing economic systems. In illustration he would cite the two questions of the right to property and the right to work. In the draft Declaration it was stated that arbitrary deprivation of property was inadmissible. The USSR Constitution recognized the right to private property, resulting from individual labour and not from the exploitation of others. But besides private property there was another system of property, and that was socialist and collective property.

It would be possible to prove that private property had acted as a brake on progress and ensured the continuance of extremes of poverty and wealth. It would be possible also to prove the superiority of a property regime where the land belonged to the peasants and the factories to the workers. If, therefore, any statement about private property was to be put in an international document, mention must also be made of the other form of property. The Geneva draft had said correctly that property regimes were determined by the laws of the individual countries. That was an expression of the equality of the two systems. The Drafting Committee had deviated from that line, however. The Declaration should state that every man could have property, alone or collectively.

Representatives should not ask the impossible of each other. The USSR could never agree that only private property could be guaranteed. With regard to the right to work, in the USSR, this right was real and tangible, guaranteed by the Socialist system, by control of [9] production, and by the elimination of economic crises. A generation had grown up in his country which did not know what unemployment meant. To that generation a declaration of a right to work sounded like an old-fashioned manifestation of an ancient system.

It would be incorrect for him to ask the United States representative to undertake to eliminate unemployment in the United States. The economic system in the United States made that impossible. In capitalistic states, not counting the Far East, there were some twenty to thirty millions in a state of want who formed a regular army of unemployment. He could, however, ask that something concrete should be done. Instead of merely making a general statement about the right to work, the relevant article should list measures to be taken to ensure that right. The representatives of the old and of the new democracies held very different views on those two questions. But they could come to some understanding.

Mr. Pavlov pointed out that there were two further questions, democracy and fascism and Nazism, which should be considered. He regretted that every reference to democracy had been eliminated from the draft International Declaration on Human Rights. That was a serious omission; mention of the principles of democracy and of the struggle against fascism and nazism should be included in both the Declaration and the Covenant.

The Commission was bound to take a definite stand in favour of democracy and outline realistic measures against fascism. The Drafting Committee seemed to be afraid of the word democracy. The United Kingdom representative had opposed the mention of democratic fundamentals on the ground that the word democracy could be interpreted in various ways. Such an attitude must be considered erroneous. During the war there seemed to be no doubt concerning the concepts of democracy [10] and those of fascism and nazism. The United States, the United Kingdom and the USSR declaration regarding Italy made on 1 November 1943 had clearly stated that “Allied policy towards Italy must be based upon the fundamental principle that fascism and all its evil influences and emanations shall be utterly destroyed”, that “all fascist and pro-fascist elements shall be removed from the administration and from the institutions and organizations of a public character,” and that “fascist chiefs shall be arrested and handed over to justice”. The same declaration had also provided that “freedom of speech, religious worship, political belief and of the press and public meetings shall be restored in full measure to the Italian people”.<sup>89</sup> Similar terms had been used in the Yalta Declaration of 11 February 1945<sup>90</sup> which proclaimed the purpose “to destroy German militarism and nazism” and to “wipe out the Nazi Party, Nazi laws, organizations and institutions, remove all Nazi and militarist influences from public office and from the cultural and economic life of the German people”. In its section on liberated Europe, the Yalta Declaration had stressed that the last vestiges of nazism and fascism must be destroyed and that democratic institutions should be created. The Potsdam Agreement of 5 August 1945 had clearly indicated that all discrimination on grounds of race, creed or political opinion should be abolished.<sup>91</sup>

Thus it was evident that international instruments contained abundant references to democracy, and anti-democratic movements. It was difficult to understand why the Drafting Committee had not seen fit to retain them. Contrary to the opinion of some members, a definition of democracy and of fascism was not difficult. Democracy could be defined as the power of the people to participate in their government and carry out its functions, while fascism meant dictatorship, imperialistic in its [11] foreign policy and reactionary in its domestic policy. During the war no definition of those terms had been required. The USSR had offered <sup>89</sup> The “Declaration Regarding Italy” was adopted by the United States, the United Kingdom and the Soviet Union at the Moscow Conference held in October 1943. It was terminated by the Treaty of Peace with Italy of 10 February 1947.

<sup>90</sup> Roosevelt, Churchill and Stalin adopted the Declaration at the close of the Yalta Conference (also known as the Crimea Conference) that took place from 4 to 11 February 1945 in the Livadia Palace.

<sup>91</sup> Truman, Churchill (followed by Clement Attlee after the British election) and Stalin met in Potsdam, on the outskirts of Berlin, in July 1945. The Agreement called for the establishment of a Council of Foreign Ministers and tasked the Council with preparing the Peace Treaties for Finland, Hungary, Romania and Bulgaria; set out the political and economic principles governing the treatment of Germany during its control by the allies; outlined the reparations claimed from Germany (but not Austria); ordered the dismantlement of the German army and transfer of territories; committed to bringing war criminals to justice; recognized the Provisional Government in Poland and permitted Poles who served in the British Army to return to Poland; called for the transfer of Germans from Czechoslovakia, Hungary and Poland to Germany; required the immediate removal of allied troops from Tehran, Iran and resolved other matters concerning post-war order. The matter of former Italian colonies was decided at the Paris Peace Conference in 1947.

assistance to the European democracies, and taken upon itself a noble liberating mission without asking for definitions. At that time all the Allies had known what they were fighting for. What had united the nations during the war might unite them also at present if there existed a genuine desire for agreement. However, the Drafting Committee had not shown such a desire.

The representative of the USSR did not find the draft Declaration satisfactory. It did not contain a reference to fascism and nazism as most odious phenomena, and made only one passing mention of democracy. No provisions were made to ensure racial and religious equality and protection against discrimination. He contrasted the situation of such minorities as the Negroes in the United States and the Indians in the Union of South Africa, with that existing in the USSR where all citizens enjoyed absolute equality, where sixty nationalities lived side by side in peace and where discriminatory propaganda was punishable by law. The Drafting Committee had excluded such items from its consideration. The same applied to a number of other articles of the draft Declaration such as those dealing with the right to use one's own language in court or in education and the equality of men and women in public life. The greatest weakness of the draft Declaration was its purely theoretical character and the lack of any reference to the steps which should be taken to implement its provisions.

The same remark might be made about the article dealing with a person's right to leave his country. That article seemed to imply that an emigrating person had no duty towards his nation; it could even be interpreted as an encouragement to anti-patriotic steps. The fact that [12] the individual had obligations was mentioned only in passing in article 2.

Mr. Pavlov considered that the Drafting Committee had improved the Geneva document only very slightly and that the present draft hardly represented a step forward. The draft Declaration would certainly have gained if the USSR proposals concerning slave traffic, illegal arrest, equality before the courts, equality of the sexes and of coloured peoples, had not been rejected. It was also regrettable that the article on freedom of expression and of the right of asylum had not been accepted in the form suggested by the USSR delegation, namely, that freedom of expression could not be used to propagate fascist theories and hostility among nations and that the right of asylum should be limited to liberals.

In conclusion Mr. Pavlov stated that the objective of the draft Declaration should be the improvement of the living conditions of millions of people, the elimination of discrimination and the safeguarding of democratic principles. In addition to proclaiming those objectives the Declaration should also state the means for their implementation. More important than the mere fact of collaboration in drafting the document was a genuine desire for cooperation in putting its principles into practice.

THE CHAIRMAN announced that three more speakers were scheduled to make statements in the general discussion. She suggested that those statements should be made at the end of the afternoon meeting.

MR. VILFAN (Yugoslavia) declared that instead of making a general statement he would limit himself to commenting in detail during the discussion of the declaration paragraph by paragraph.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) and MR. MALIK (Lebanon) said they would like to speak prior to the detailed consideration of the draft Declaration.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that if general statements were to be made at the afternoon meeting the Commission would have to vote whether it wished to rescind its decision adopted at the previous meeting, that the general statements should be confined to the morning meeting.

The Commission rescinded its decision. It was also decided that the time for the statements would not exceed one hour.

The meeting rose at 1:15 p.m.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon), on a point of order, asked whether copies of the statement made at the previous meeting by the USSR representative could be distributed.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics), after thanking the Lebanese representative for his interest, stated that he would be pleased to make the full text available for reproduction. He drew the attention of the Commission to document E/CN.4/AC.1/29, which contained the text of a statement he had made in the Drafting Committee on 4 May. Many of the arguments he had put forward in his speech at the previous meeting of the Commission were repetitions of the earlier statement.

Continuation of the General Discussion on the Purpose of the Declaration

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) commended the sound procedure of the USSR representative in taking the Charter as the point of departure for his speech.

Human rights and fundamental freedoms were mentioned seven times in the Charter. The first mention was in the Preamble, where the determination to reaffirm faith in human rights was second only to the determination to avert future wars. Article 1 declared the promotion, and encouragement of respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms to be one of the purposes of the United Nations, and placed it on an equal footing with the work of the Economic and Social Council. The structure of Article 13 should be especially noted, in that it emphasized the equal importance of the promotion of international activities in the economic and social field, and assistance in the realization of human rights and fundamental freedoms. Article 55, which dealt with the conditions of wellbeing necessary for peace and security, singled out the question of human rights for mention in a separate category. Here the mandatory character of the Article should be noted. States were obliged to [4] see that human rights were not only promoted but observed. In Article 62 the promotion of human rights was mentioned as one of the possible functions of the Economic and Social Council; therein lay the point of departure for the work of the Commission on Human Rights as a subsidiary body of the Economic and Social Council. Article 68 was among the most important in the field of human rights, since it expressly ordered the establishment of a commission for the promotion of human rights. Finally, Chapter XII gave as one of the objectives of the trusteeship system the encouragement of respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms for all.

Four conclusions could be drawn from a study of the Charter: first, that the promotion of respect for human rights was second only to the maintenance of peace and security. The violation of human rights was one of the causes of war, and, if the first aim of the United Nations was to be attained, the observance of human rights must be guaranteed. Secondly, the Commission on Human Rights was in the unique position of being the only Commission mentioned by name in the Charter. Thirdly, the function of the Commission was the promotion of human rights, and since it could not promote what was still vague and undefined, the first task of the Commission must be a precise definition of those rights. It could be said that the Commission was called upon to finish the work initiated by the Charter, in giving content and meaning to the phrase "the dignity and worth of the human person". In the fourth place, since it had been decided at San Francisco that an elaboration of human rights, which had been urged by many delegations, was too large a task to be attempted at that time, the Commission was virtually a prolongation of the San Francisco Conference and its work a completion of the Charter itself. Those facts should be borne in mind, since the Commission was apt to be regarded as just another organ of the United Nations, it was, in fact, more fundamental than any other body of the Economic and Social Council, and almost as fundamental as any of the principal organs of the United Nations.

[5]

Mr. Malik urged the Commission to bear those facts in mind when preparing the Declaration and the Covenant of Human Rights. The Commission should moreover consider whether the resolution of the General Assembly giving effect to the Declaration and Covenant could be given greater weight and importance than ordinary General Assembly resolutions. The Bill of Rights might become a supplement to the Charter at the first international conference where the question of the revision of the Charter was considered. The Declaration was not a simple resolution of the General Assembly; but a continuation of the Charter and must have the dignity of the Charter.

Mr. Malik declared that he would not go into details on the substance of the draft Declaration, but would speak on various points as they arose in discussions at future meetings. He had, however, a few comments to make on the statement by the USSR representative at the previous meeting.

A study of Russian literature had shown him that the USSR had two positive messages for the world: hatred of inequality and discrimination on any ground whatever, and insistence on the importance of social and economic factors in human life. Although those two great challenges were real, and appreciated by the rest of the world, the Commission should take a more comprehensive outlook and should try to harmonize those ideas with some of the older elements in human culture. It was easy to fall into the error of over-simplification, and to consider that such things as non-discrimination and universal employment, guaranteed by the State, represented the most important factors in human life. For his part, Mr. Malik thought that the most fundamental human rights and freedoms were spiritual, intellectual and moral; he would not be satisfied with mere social security and lack of discrimination except as means to a higher end, namely, the freedom of spirit. The various contributions in the field of human rights made by the diverse cultures in the world must [6] be taken into account, and the crucial part of the Commission's task would be the determination of the hierarchy of values.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) said that, with regard to the draft Declaration, the Chilean delegation had made certain reservations from time to time in the Drafting Committee, and would recall them as the items in question arose.

He shared the opinion of various delegations that the Declaration should as far as possible be brief, so as to be easily understandable to the common man. However, since the draft Covenant did not cover all phases of human rights, it was necessary to draw up a more comprehensive Declaration.

Mr. Santa Cruz urged that the Preamble must be studied before the concrete provisions could be considered. It was essential to define the relations of the individual to the State, for the conception of human rights was not the same in all States, and without such a definition misunderstandings were bound to occur.

The delegation of Chile believed that both the Declaration and the Covenant must be inspired by the principles of the Charter. It had been recognized at San Francisco, when the horrors of war and totalitarianism were still fresh in the memory of the world, that if the causes of war were to be eliminated the sovereignty of States must be limited by considerations of international solidarity and co-operation, and the economic level of the peoples of the world must be raised. The Chilean delegation had made it clear in the Drafting Committee that it could not support a Declaration that did not embody those principles. Economic and social rights must find their place in the Declaration; the right to work, the right to an equitable salary, the right to health, education and social security, and to the benefits of culture and scientific progress must not be omitted. Mr. Santa Cruz urged the importance of taking into account the ideals which had inspired the French revolution.

[7]

Another point that had been upheld by the delegation of Chile was that the preservation of democracy was a fundamental duty in the organization of a peaceful world. Human rights and fundamental freedoms must be so defined as to make the rights of the individual compatible with the idea of democracy. Mr. Santa Cruz hoped that the Declaration would embody a conception of democracy based on respect for human rights and the dignity and worth of the human person, and that there would be provisions against the abuse of such rights.

Consideration of Draft International Declaration on Human Rights, Submitted by the Drafting Committee
(Annex A of document E/CN.4/95)

THE CHAIRMAN, speaking as the representative of the United States of America, stated that her delegation had examined the various amendments to the draft Declaration. The draft submitted jointly by the Indian and United Kingdom delegations (document E/CN.4/99) appeared to condense effectively the articles of the draft declaration while retaining the basic principles of the text adopted at the second session of the Commission. The United States delegation, therefore, associated itself with that draft, and recommended it for the consideration of other delegations. Speaking as Chairman, she asked members to submit any amendments to articles 1 to 15 by the end of the day, and to the remainder of the articles not later than 1 June.

MR. CHANG (China) drew attention to the shorter draft Declaration submitted by his delegation, and contained in Annex A of the report of the Drafting Committee. The Commission was dealing with one of the most serious questions before the United Nations and the whole world. The principal aim of the Declaration was to call the attention of the world to certain fundamental human rights, with a view to educational advancement. The term "education" was here used in the broad sense of how to improve the quality of life. The Declaration should be as simple as possible and in a form [8] which was easy to grasp. He urged those members of the Commission who had not served on the Drafting Committee to examine carefully the Chinese Draft.

MRS. MEHTA (India), introducing the draft Declaration submitted jointly by her delegation and that of the United Kingdom (document E/CN.4/99), explained that the draft Declaration of the Drafting Committee had been criticized as being too long, and containing several irrelevant matters. The Declaration, which laid down general principles, must be as precise as possible if it was to be understood by the common man.

It had been decided at the second session of the Commission to draft both a Declaration and a Covenant. The Declaration was not a legal document, but one which would be effective through its moral force and the support of world opinion. If the Declaration was to reach and be understood by every member of the public, the shortcomings of the draft Declaration before the Commission, its length and its inclusion of various unnecessary details must be removed. The clauses of implementation would be more appropriate in the Covenant. The Declaration aimed at defining the rights of individuals, not the rights of States. It must have human appeal, and should not be too condensed or too terse. She thought the Chinese draft was too terse. The French draft, on the other hand, while having a human appeal, went into too many details.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) associated himself wholeheartedly with the statement of the Indian representative. If the Declaration was to reach the greatest possible number of people, it was essential for it to be expressed in the simplest terms.

The members of the Drafting Committee had impressed him as being in substantial agreement on the general principles of the Declaration. The Chinese draft had had a good effect on the work of the Committee, by illustrating how concisely it was possible to enumerate principles upon which all were in fundamental agreement.

[9]

Mr. Wilson now asked the Commission to consider the draft submitted by the Indian and United Kingdom delegations as an attempt to find the middle road between the text adopted at the second session of the Commission and the very concise Chinese draft.

Article 1

MRS. LEDON (Vice-Chairman of the Commission on the Status of Women) stated that at its session in January 1948, the Commission on the Status of Women had decided unanimously to request the Economic and Social Council to refer to the Commission on Human Rights the following amendments to Article 1 of the draft Declaration:

The words "all people" should be substituted for "all men", and "in a spirit of brotherhood" for "like brothers".

While her Commission realized that the term "all men" had a general sense, there was a certain ambiguity in it and it would be better to use the more precise term, which, moreover, figured in the Charter.

THE CHAIRMAN speaking as the representative of the United States of America, supported the retention of the text as adopted at the second session of the Commission with the minor drafting changes in the India-United Kingdom text, namely "all people, men and women" in place of "all men", and "in the spirit of brotherhood" in place of "like brothers". In supporting those drafting changes, the United Kingdom delegation was expressing the principle of equality for men and women, and its conviction that discrimination against women had no place in the laws of any State. She wished to make it clear, however, that equality did not mean identical treatment for men and women in all matters; there were certain cases, as for example the case of maternity benefits, where differential treatment was essential.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) supported the suggestion made by the representative of the Commission on the Status of Women.

[10]

He questioned the correctness of the conclusion drawn in Article 1, that men should act towards one another in a spirit of brotherhood because they were endowed by nature with reason and conscience, and thought the statement was open to controversy.

MR. CASSIN (France) said that the French delegation had been conscious of the criticism which might be levelled at the words "all men" and had therefore used the expression "all members of the human family" in its draft of Article 1. That expression was all-inclusive and had the further advantage of stressing the inherent equality of human beings, a concept which had recently been attacked by Hitler and his ideological disciples.

The idea of the solidarity of men should be made explicit in the Article to convince the peoples of the world that the United Nations firmly believed in their essential brotherhood.

Although he could support the text prepared by the representatives of India and the United Kingdom which was, in his opinion, an improvement over the draft of Article 1 adopted at the second session of the Commission, he wished to have the French text of Article 1 put to the vote.

MR. LEBEAU (Belgium) supported the French draft of Article 1, which, for reasons of common language and common juridical experience and tradition reflected his delegation's views better than either the Drafting Committee's text or that submitted by the United Kingdom and Indian representatives. Without wishing to minimize the effort expended in drafting them, he felt that those texts presented various difficulties; the expression "all people, men and women" used in the Indian-United Kingdom text would sound absurd if translated into French ("tous les hommes, hommes et femmes"); furthermore, he felt that in trying to stress the idea of equality, the result was quite the opposite and created the impression of discrimination. The words "all men" used in the Drafting Committee's text were preferable in his opinion, for that formula had been used in countless declarations in the [11] past. In the Charter, "human" rights, not rights of "men and women", was used. He thought that a compromise could be reached if Article 1 were to start with the words "all human beings".

MRS. MEHTA (India) pointed out that the text as presented by her delegation and that of the United Kingdom was essentially the same as that transmitted by the Economic and Social Council. She wished, however, to hear the opinion of the representative of the Commission on the Status of Women.

MRS. LEDON (Vice-Chairman of the Commission on the Status of Women) thought that the terminology suggested by the Belgian representative covered the idea which the Commission on the Status of Women was anxious to see expressed in Article 1 of the Declaration.

MR. LOUTFI (Egypt) said that he would support the French text of Article 1, but wondered whether the French representative would agree to the deletion of the sentence "They remain so by virtue of the laws".

MR. CASSIN (France) agreed to this deletion.

MR. CHANG (China) amended the text submitted by the representatives of the United Kingdom and India by deleting the full stop after the first sentence and the words "They are endowed by nature with reason and conscience".

The import of that sentence was controversial and its deletion would clarify and shorten the text.

MRS. MEHTA (India) and MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) agreed to the deletion proposed by the Chinese representative.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) said that he favoured the text proposed by the French representative. It omitted the controversial statements to which he had expressed objection, it appealed to the [12] more concrete principle of the brotherhood of men, and it fulfilled the wishes of the Commission on the Status of Women, with which he fully sympathized. Should the French text be rejected, he would then vote for the text as amended by the Chinese representative, but he pointed out that Professor Cassin himself had originally drafted Article 1, and since he had deemed it necessary to improve upon that draft, he should receive the support of the Commission.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) expressed surprise at the proposal to delete "nature, conscience and reason". He deplored the tendency to disregard such important concepts, which had originally appeared in both the French and United Kingdom texts.

The first Article of the Declaration on Human Rights should state those characteristics of human beings which distinguished them from animals, that is, reason and conscience. Without reason, the very work they were engaged in would be impossible; what, then, more "reasonable" than the explicit mention of the factor which constituted the basis of their work, in the very first article? He would plead with the members of the Commission to reconsider the matter, and, if necessary, he would even propose the postponement of the consideration of this all-important article until such time as their respective Governments had sent fresh instructions.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) agreed that men were endowed by nature with reason and conscience, but thought that it was self-evident. Nevertheless, some people seemed to doubt the truth of that statement and, since in his opinion it was not a matter that could be decided by a vote, he was prepared to accept its deletion.

MR. LEBEAU (Belgium) stated, in reply to the representative of Lebanon, that a Declaration on Human Rights need not begin with a definition of what constituted human beings.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) denied ever having doubted the fact that human beings were endowed with reason and conscience, but thought that the feeling of brotherhood was not necessarily connected with either.

MRS. MEHTA (India) declared that she had agreed to the deletion proposed by the representative of China for the same reasons as the United Kingdom representative and agreed with the representative of Belgium that the statement was not really essential in a document such as the Declaration.

MR. MALIK (Lebanon) said that he respected the points of view of the representatives of the United Kingdom, India and Belgium who did not object to the deletion of the statement because, in their opinion, its truth was so self-evident that it did not need to be emphasized.

However, he felt that the Commission should mention somewhere in the Declaration, perhaps in the Preamble, the qualities which essentially characterized man, since man and his rights were the Commission's main concern.

The representatives of France, the United Kingdom, the United States of America and China agreed with the suggestion of Mr. Malik concerning the inclusion of those concepts in the Preamble. The representative of Belgium stated that he agreed in principle, but would wish to be able to see the text before giving his final opinion.

MR. LOPEZ (Philippines) was strongly opposed to the deletion of the sentence "They are endowed by nature with reason and conscience" from the text submitted by the representatives of India and the United Kingdom, and proposed that the text originally drafted should be put to the vote.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that there would be difficulties in translating the expression "all people, men and women" into Russian, as in that language women were automatically included in the notion of "people".

[14]

Regarding the concern felt by the representative of Lebanon lest the Declaration remain without "reason" and without "a conscience", he thought that a solution could be found in the formula "They are endowed with reason and conscience", without mentioning the agent, with respect to which legitimate doubts had been expressed.

However, viewed in the light of present realities, the text of Article 1 appeared wholly misleading. Events happening every day served to convince one that there were people who had neither conscience nor reason, and who were acting towards one another not in a human fashion, let alone in a spirit of brotherhood.

He did not object to general statements, but he thought they were deceptive and could only cause false illusions; the ideal of brotherhood was very praiseworthy, but it was not a legal concept, and no one would ever be liable to prosecution for failure to act “in a spirit of brotherhood.”

The French text, in his opinion, contained even more faults and he would find himself obliged to abstain from voting on Article 1.

The French text for Article 1, as amended by the Egyptian representative, was rejected by seven votes to five, with three abstentions.

After a brief procedural discussion it was decided to put the Chinese representative’s amendment of the text submitted by the delegations of India and the United Kingdom to the vote in separate parts.

The first sentence was adopted by eleven votes to none, with four abstentions.

[15]

The deletion of the first full stop and of the subsequent words up to and including the word “conscience” was rejected by six votes to five, with six abstentions.

The last sentence was adopted by thirteen votes to none, with three abstentions.

The article as a whole was adopted by eleven votes to none, with six abstentions.

[16]

Article 2

THE CHAIRMAN, speaking on behalf of the United States delegation, expressed support for the draft submitted by the United Kingdom and India in preference to the draft adopted at the Second Session of the Commission. It was not desirable, in her opinion, to refer to duties which man owed to society if those duties were left undefined, and it would be more precise to mention restrictions arising from the necessity of achieving the welfare and security of all. She objected to the French text on the same grounds.

MR. CASSIN (France) suggested reversing the order of the two sentences in the text presented by the Drafting Committee. He urged the retention of the words “Just laws” in preference to “just requirements” and thought that the reference to the democratic State was also of great importance.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) thought both the Drafting Committee's text and that of France were unacceptable because of the difficulty of determining exactly what were the just laws or just requirements of a democratic State. He recalled the remarks he had made previously concerning the necessity of defining the relations between the individual and the State, and the worth of the former in relationship to the latter. Until a definition on which all could agree could be arrived at, it was dangerous to use words which meant completely different things to the representatives present, and which could lead to the severest restrictions on the rights of the individual on the part of some States.

He supported the text submitted by the United Kingdom and Indian representatives because it defined the restrictions of the rights of the individual in terms of the welfare and security of all. It also avoided the philosophic consideration which claimed that society enabled the individual to develop his spirit, mind and body in wider freedom; this, in his view, was a highly controversial statement.

MR. CHANG (China) drew the Commission's attention to the Chinese draft of Article 2, which condensed Articles 2 and 3 of the Drafting Committee's text in one paragraph. If the Commission desired to arrive at a brief text for the Declaration, he would suggest using the second sentence of that paragraph for Article 2. However, in his opinion, it would be preferable to place the Article on the restrictions of the rights of the individual at the very end of the Declaration, for it was not logical to proclaim the restrictions before the rights themselves had not been stated.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) agreed with the representative of Chile and with the Chinese representative's plea for brevity. However, the Chinese draft had the disadvantage of being insufficiently specific and he would prefer the phrase "restrictions necessary to secure due regard, etc." to "recognition of the rights of others".

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) requested further time to enable members of the Commission to give due consideration to all the drafts submitted to them. He also felt in sympathy with the French representative's wish to see a reference to the "democratic State" in the article.

MR. CHANG (China) once more stressed the fact that the Declaration which the Commission was drafting was intended to be read and understood by large masses of people, and should therefore be as brief and intelligible as possible. He urged the members of the Commission to give consideration to the draft submitted by his delegation, appearing on pages 14 and 15 of document E/CN.4/95.

MRS. LEDON (Commission on the Status of Women) thanked the Commission for the amendment it had adopted to Article 1, which, although slightly different from the one proposed by the Commission on the Status of Women, was in conformity with its wishes.

Consideration of Article 2 of the Declaration
(documents E/CN.4/95, E/CN.4/99, E/CN.4/102, E/600)

MR. STEPANENKO (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) thought that a comparison of the Geneva text of Article 2 of the Declaration with the amendments to it proposed by the Chinese delegation and by the Indian and United Kingdom delegations would reveal that the amendments not only failed to improve the text, but were actually inferior to it.

In spite of some rather serious deficiencies, Article 2 as given in the report of the second session of the Commission on Human Rights preserved the idea of the just requirements of the democratic State. Those words were left out of the Chinese amendment and of the Indian and United Kingdom amendment. He wondered what the reasons for their deletion might be. The representative of Chile had stated during the previous meeting that the word “democracy” ought to be eliminated because it had not been clearly defined. The Commission would be running counter to the purposes for which it had been set up if it deleted all mention of democracy in the Declaration. He would vote against any amendment deleting the word.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) denied having said that the concept of democracy had not been clearly defined. He had defined what he personally meant by the word; but different ideas of democracy had been expressed in the Commission. If the meaning of the word were not defined, Article 2 might lead to abuses. The notion of the just requirements of the democratic State varied from country to country. For example, Marxism aimed at the creation of a classless society in which the State as such no longer existed. This definition of its aims showed that its highest stage had not yet been achieved in countries like the USSR, where a powerful State existed. According to the Marxist theory, the USSR was [3] in the intermediate stage of the dictatorship of the proletariat. The organs of information, culture and the arts were controlled by the Party because the revolutionary conscience was the sole source of law. The USSR Government considered that even in that intermediate stage, it represented a democratic State. But he, for his part, could not imagine that dictatorship, even if temporary, could exist side by side with democracy. The Commission was faced with two different concepts of human rights, as had been clearly demonstrated in connexion with the question of the right of emigration. It was therefore only logical to define the notion of democracy.

MR. LEBEAU (Belgium) explained that in his country the word “democracy” was rarely used except in the expression “democratic freedoms.” Those freedoms were so deeply rooted in the Belgian national conscience that there was no need to speak of them except when they were endangered as, for example, by foreign occupation. Consequently he thought such a formula would not serve any useful purpose, since democracy was one of the fundamental institutions of his people and since it had, during recent decades, come to have different meanings in different countries. Mr. Lebeau would vote for the French amendment which he preferred to the Drafting Committee’s text, because it spoke firstly of man’s duties towards society and secondly of the free development of his personality.

MRS. MEHTA (India) considered the Indian and United Kingdom amendment accurate and concise. The words “democratic State” had been avoided as they covered different concepts. Moreover, there seemed no need to say that man had duties towards society since a declaration of rights, not duties, was being drafted.

MR. VILFAN (Yugoslavia) pointed to a contradiction in the arguments advanced by those who favoured the Indian and United Kingdom amendment. Article 2 was intended to define the limitations to human rights. Those who supported the amendment feared that the limitations might be interpreted differently and that the word “democracy” might lead to abuses. He felt on the contrary that the wording suggested in the amendment was far more restrictive than the former article 2. According to the amendment, each State would be entitled to limit human rights to the extent to which it considered them contrary to the interests of society and the State. Such a wording would leave the door open for independent decisions.

Referring to the observations made by the Belgian representative, he stressed that democratic freedoms were at present still threatened by the remnants of fascism. It was therefore important to mention them; and the Belgian representative’s argument could be turned against him.

The Drafting Committee’s text was preferable to the French draft amendment. The Declaration dealt with human rights, not duties. He would therefore vote against both the French amendment and the Indian and United Kingdom amendment.

MR. MORA (Uruguay) supported the Indian and United Kingdom amendment. There were certain dangers in the text suggested by the Drafting Committee and by the French amendment, for it involved three categories of limitations: the rights of others, the rights of the State, and the rights of society. A distinction between the State and society might lead to abuses since the State acted only in the name of society; it was better to delete all mention of intervention by the State.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) observed that the first three articles of the Declaration laid the foundation for the rights subsequently enumerated; for that reason it was permissible to mention in them the duties of the individual. In the first article, the Commission had stated the basis for human rights; the second article should include the bases for the limitation of those rights. He therefore accepted the first part of the French amendment.

In the second part of the amendment the word “State” was open to question. All countries did not consider the State as a desirable entity in itself, with rights that might conflict with the rights of the individual. Whatever opinion the various members of the Commission might hold on the subject the word “State” should be deleted, since it stood for an idea on which all did not agree. On the other hand the words “the welfare and security of all” were acceptable to everybody. He agreed with the representative of Chile that the word “democracy” should not be used. He would be willing to speak of the rights of a democratic State if those rights had been previously defined by an international instrument, but that had not been done.

He therefore proposed that the first part of the French amendment should be combined with the second part of the Indian and United Kingdom amendment beginning with the words “subject only . . .”

MR. CHANG (China) suggested that his amendment should be changed to read as follows: “The exercise of these rights requires recognition of the rights of others and the welfare of all.” Welfare included the idea of security: and recognition of the rights of all included the idea of democracy. He stressed the value of the voluntary element in the word “recognition”. Emphasis should be placed not on restraining people, but on educating them. The purpose of all social and political [6] education was the voluntary recognition of the rights of others. The Commission’s ideal should not be the imposition of restrictions but rather the voluntary recognition by all of the rights of others. That was the ideal which the Declaration should express.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) remarked that while the Chinese representative’s proposal was in many ways a generous one it did contain some dangers too. The limitations provided for in the Indian and United Kingdom amendment included those voluntarily accepted, but in any form of human society it was imperative that the State should impose certain limitations in the interest of all. The word “recognition” merely expressed an ideal and was inadequate to ensure the fulfilment of the Commission’s task.

MR. HOOD (Australia) observed that the purpose of article 2 was to emphasize the fact that every right carried with it obligations. That idea was expressed in the text prepared at the second session at Geneva and, more specifically, in the French amendment, but it was not clearly expressed in the Indian and United Kingdom amendment. If there should in fact be very definite limitations on the exercise of human rights, a clear statement to that effect should be made. He favoured the text prepared at the second session at Geneva and the French draft, and the two might be combined and improved to read as follows: “In the exercise of his rights everyone is limited by the rights of others and by his duties to the democratic society which enables him freely to develop his spirit.” He was opposed to the words “democratic State” but preferred to keep the word “democratic” in connexion with “society”. [7]

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) began by remarking that the notions of the State and of democratic society were embodied in the documents signed during the war. No difficulties had then appeared, because the conception of democracy provided a common basis for every interpretation; there was thus no reason for rejecting it today.

The idea contained in the United Kingdom proposal erred in being too vague. Who was to define the “security” and the “welfare” of all? If the Commission were to consider such difficulties of definition, many other articles of the Convention would have to be dismissed.

He had been challenged to speak of democracy, and he accepted the challenge. In his view, a democracy was a State in which all citizens had an equal right to participate in the activities of the Government. That principle was common to all democracies. Other features common to all democratic States and institutions were the fact that officials were elected and could be superseded, the opportunity given to the masses to participate in government, the obligation for a minority to submit to the majority of the people, and accessibility to all offices of State.

The idea of democracy was linked even by its etymology with that of the people and the power of the people. It had been conceived in antiquity; but the Greeks had not placed power effectively in the hands of the people, whom they regarded as consisting of none but free-born Greek citizens. Hence the majority of the population, being composed of foreigners living in Greece or else of slaves, had no powers. By "free people" the Greeks meant the aristocracy, and their "democratic" State was governed by slave-owners.

In a modern democracy, the State was not a power imposed on society by force. It was a product of the society which had given it birth. The State had unfortunately in certain cases detached itself from the society from which it had sprung, and had come to dominate and oppress that society; the police State, in fact, came into being, and was supported by the class which controlled its economy.

The State was not eternal; it would cease to exist as soon as class distinctions disappeared. It was necessary to preserve it for the time being in order to protect collective property and to defend the people against its external enemies (in particular foreign spies and saboteurs). Thus certain measures, such as restrictions on freedom of movement, were in the USSR only a defensive reaction of the Soviet people. The State also took charge of the organization of economic and cultural activities. If the Soviet Union had had no enemies, the State would have already ceased to exist, but she was surrounded by them and was therefore forced to take steps to defend herself.

The advantage of the Soviet conception of the State was that it was democratic in a new sense of the word. It was supported by the immense majority of the people and was bound up with the defence of fundamental human rights. That was true democracy: the right to participate in government. That right existed in theory in many States, but was not exercised in fact.

Quoting figures to show the extent to which the peoples of the Soviet Union participated in government, he said 101,717,000 electors had registered in the last national elections. Out of that number, 101,450,000 had voted, i.e. a proportion of 99.7%. The candidates on the Governmental Communist list had received 100 million votes, i.e. 99.18%. There had been 819,000 adverse votes, i.e. 0.1%. In the local elections there had been 100,630,000 voters and the opposition amounted to only 818,000 votes, i.e. 0.18%.

Soviet popular democracy was thus based on unity. The same characteristic was found in certain States of Eastern Europe. That unity had also been demonstrated by the Soviet people during the war; they had defended their system of Government when they might have abandoned it; they had stood firm when they might have deserted. The heroism and the spirit of sacrifice of the Russian people had shown how much they valued the system. It was therefore a real democracy.

It had been claimed that the Soviet system was not a hundred per cent democratic because it had only one party. Since when was the existence of a number of parties the criterion of democracy? Such a variety of parties merely signifies [9] the existence of a class war: there were landowners' parties, middle class parties, peasants' and workers' parties, the last two being often separated by divergent interests.

In the Soviet Union there was neither a middle class nor a landowning class, and the fundamental interests of the peasants and the workers were identical. Was it suggested that there should be a number of parties in the USSR? In that case a middle class and a landowning class would have to be introduced there. But the Soviet people could well dispense with such exploiting classes. They did not want them.

Thus the moral unity of society under the Soviet regime had proved itself in the test of war and had subsequently been confirmed by the elections. Millions of people participated in the activities of the central Government and the local governments. The single party adequately defended the interests of the people and the rights of man.

The Soviet Union did not repudiate the progressive elements in the bourgeois or capitalist democracies. The capitalist system was obviously an advance on the feudal system; it was obviously more tolerable than the Hitlerian State, the symbol of the totalitarian State. Under the capitalist system government was carried on not by the people, but by a minority, by the Rockefellers and the Morgans. Frequently trusts and monopolies were the masters. That was not democracy; capitalism rejected democracy and replaced it by an oligarchy.

He did not wish to criticize American democracy, since it had many features in common with Soviet democracy. The discussion had been caused by the remarks made by certain delegates. He observed that the struggle against Fascism had not been delayed until a definition of it was found, and for comparable reasons the representative of the USSR opposed the deletion of all mention of democracy in article 2.

MR. CASSIN (France) pointed out that the French text fulfilled certain requirements not covered by the United Kingdom-Indian proposal. In fact, it was a combination of three different texts:

[10]

1. The text describing society's duty towards the individual;
2. The text defining the fundamental duties of man;
3. Finally, the text according to which everyone is limited in the exercise of his rights by the rights of others.

Those three elements had reappeared during the discussion. The Indian and United Kingdom proposal, however, did not refer to the relations between man and society or to their mutual duties.

The second part of the French text was a compromise; that was why it retained the idea of the democratic State, which was much less important than that of democracy itself. The State was, in fact, a perishable product of society, but it had to be maintained, for it centralized the legislative power.

Government of the people, by the people, for the people: he could see no reason for abandoning that conception of democracy. In his view the criterion of democracy in any nation was the extent to which human rights were really respected. A State which did not respect them was not democratic, even though it claimed to be so; hence the supreme importance of the word, which must be retained.

If the text proposed by his delegation were not adopted, he would vote in favour of the text proposed by the representative of Australia.

THE CHAIRMAN appointed a drafting committee, composed of the representatives of Australia, China, France, India, Lebanon and the United Kingdom, to consider the various proposals before the Commission and submit two texts, one containing and the other omitting the notion of the democratic State. If the Committee could not reach agreement, it would at least suggest the order in which the various proposals should be put to the vote.

MR. LOPEZ (Philippines) had been deeply interested in the lengthy discussion of the Soviet Union representative, but he did not think it served any useful purpose at the present stage of the discussion. His delegation [11] had voted in favour of the Geneva text and was not afraid of the word democracy. Such fears would not exist had not the representative of the Soviet Union been given the opportunity to appear as the sole champion of democracy.

The conceptions embodied in the Draft Declaration were all abstract ones, and if one of them were to be discarded for that reason, then they would all have to be discarded. He for his part would vote in favour of the text proposed by the Australian representative.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) thought the USSR representative was confusing the sphere of action with that of thought. The members of the Commission were not on a battlefield; their sole duty was to draw up a declaration.

He agreed with Mr. Cassin's conception of democracy. If the representative of the Soviet Union insisted on drawing a distinction between capitalist and communist, majority and minority democracies, then there would be no other solution but to define in the Declaration what kind of democracy was meant.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) disclaimed any wish to criticize Soviet democracy; he had confined himself to pointing out certain differences. The speech of the USSR representative, which had criticized other forms of democracy, had merely confirmed those differences. In this connection, he would recall that twenty-one nations meeting at Bogotá had adopted a resolution condemning Communism as anti-democratic.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) considered that the discussion should cover all possible forms of democracy. Those democracies lived together and could continue to live together in peace. If that conception was maintained in the Declaration, none of those forms need be excluded. The essential point in his opinion was respect for the will of the people. That principle had been recognized in the Atlantic Charter.

The representative of the USSR concluded by appealing to all the members to cooperate, and stated that he would like to have an immediate vote on the various proposals. He would vote in favour of the text proposed by the French delegation and the Geneva text.

MR. CASSIN (France) recalled that there were three different ideas in connection with article 2:

1. To mention the democratic State;
2. To make no mention either of the State or of democracy;
3. To mention democratic society.

He thought, therefore, that the Drafting Committee should submit three texts instead of two.

Continuation of the Consideration of the Draft International Declaration on Human Rights
(Document E/CN.4/95 Annex A)

Article 2

THE CHAIRMAN remarked that the Drafting Sub-Committee wished the two paragraphs of Article 2 (of document E/CN.4/111) put to the vote separately, so only paragraph 1 had obtained unanimous support. That draft was an amendment to Article 2 in document E/CN.4/95.

MR. CASSIN (France) remarked that, if paragraph 1 as drafted by the Sub-Committee were accepted, he was prepared to withdraw his own amendment (document E/CN.4/82.Add.8).

The suggestion of MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) that paragraph 1 as drafted by the Sub-Committee should be voted in two parts was accepted. After an exchange of views, it was decided that the two paragraphs would be put to the vote in the order in which they appeared in the Subcommittee's text.

The first part of paragraph 1 reading as follows: "Everyone has duties to the community" was adopted by twelve votes to none with four abstentions.

The second part of paragraph 1 reading as follows: "which enables him freely to develop his personality" was adopted by ten votes to none, with six abstentions.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) proposed that the words "and democratic State" should be added at the end of paragraph 2. The phrase "in a democratic society" appeared too vague; it was necessary to make a reference to the respect of the law as well as public morals.

The USSR amendment was rejected by nine votes to four, with three abstentions.

[3]

MR. CASSIN (France) observed that the rejection of the USSR amendment did not mean rejection of its idea. The concept of respect of the law was included in the final phrase of paragraph 2, as general welfare was inconceivable without it.

*Paragraph 2 was adopted by twelve votes to none, with four abstentions.
The whole of article (as presented by the Sub-Committee) was adopted by twelve votes to none, with four abstentions.*

Article 3, paragraph 1

MR. CHANG (China) stated that, in view of the fact that the Commission apparently preferred to draft the Declaration in a more detailed form than the Chinese delegation had envisaged, he withdrew his amendment to the paragraph in question. (Cf. document E/CN.4/102)

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) felt that the text drafted by the Commission at its second session (document E/600) was good in that it repeated the language of Article 20 of the draft Covenant on Human Rights. The words "set forth in this Declaration" should, however, be deleted, so that the statement might be couched in an absolute form.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) supported the Chilean amendment. Mention of the Declaration would imply that discrimination was permitted with respect to rights not listed in the Declaration.

MR. CASSIN (France) stated that he was prepared to withdraw the French amendment (document E/CN.4/82/Add.8).

He called attention to the dangers inherent in the Chilean amendment; it would oblige States to give equal rights to persons of different sexes or religions, which was frequently neither possible nor desirable, and consequently work against the very ideal which it pursued. Moreover, it was unlikely that Governments would accept the paragraph thus amended. He urged [4] the Commission not to attempt too much and not to interfere with either international law or accepted distinctions among groups of human beings.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) remarked that certain limitations were contained in article 2, to which all subsequent articles were subject; the purpose of those limitations was to permit the Commission to make general statements without fear of lapsing into absurdity. It was therefore clear, without further qualifications, that complete uniformity of rights and freedoms was not expected. Certain rights might not be mentioned expressly in the Declaration, but discrimination with respect to such rights should not be permitted.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) agreed with the French representative. He feared that the Chilean amendment would generate confusion. The Commission was engaged in drawing up a Declaration of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms; its duty was to see that all those rights and freedoms should be mentioned.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) supported the remarks of the United Kingdom representative. If any fundamental human rights and freedoms had been left out of the Declaration, they should be named and discussed; if none had been, the Chilean amendment was unnecessary.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) accepted in principle a suggestion of MR. CASSIN (France) that the words “rights and freedoms set forth in this Declaration” should be replaced by “fundamental rights and freedoms recognized by the Charter”.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) and THE CHAIRMAN felt that the new amendment might lead to even greater confusion. The Commission had already, as was its duty, defined in the Declaration rights and freedoms not expressly [5] mentioned in the Charter. The proposed amendment represented a step backward.

The Chilean amendment was rejected by eleven votes to four, with one abstention.

MR. KLEKOVKIN (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) proposed the insertion of the concept “soslovie” (the approximate meaning of which is class or social status) after the words “property status”. The distinction would have validity in a number of countries.

The Commission discussed briefly the meaning of the term “soslovie” for which no exact English equivalent could be found.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) supported by the Chairman, suggested that the word “property” might be omitted, leaving the word “status”, which would then be all-inclusive.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) thought that the word “property” should remain; it was most important that rich and poor should have the same rights. The Ukrainian amendment was directed against feudal class privileges, which were generally determined by birth rather than wealth.

MR. KLEKOVKIN (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republics) accepted the suggestion of MR. CHANG (China) to insert the words “or other” between the words “property” and “status”, which would meet the point he wished to make.

The Ukrainian amendment was adopted by thirteen votes to none, with one abstention.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) proposed that the word “office” which appeared in paragraph 2 should be removed from that paragraph and inserted in paragraph 1, after the words “property or other status”.

[6]

MR. CASSIN (France) supported the proposal. He was opposed to the use of the words “regardless of office or status” in paragraph 2. All men were equal before the law; mentioning specific exceptions to be avoided merely weakened the statement.

MR. VILFAN (Yugoslavia) felt that the word “office” belonged not in paragraph 1, which contained a list of grounds on which there should be no discrimination, but in paragraph 2, which was directed against unfair privileges.

MR. CHANG (China) considered the addition of the word “office” unnecessary; the concept was covered by the words “property or other status”.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) said that, on the understanding that the Commission accepted the Chinese representative’s interpretation, he would withdraw his amendment.

Article 3, paragraph 1 as amended, was approved unanimously.

Article 3, paragraph 2

THE CHAIRMAN recalled that there was a United Kingdom and Indian amendment and a French amendment to paragraph 2 (documents E/CN.4/99 and E/CN.4/82/Add.3). All those delegations had stressed equality before the law and the need of equal protection against arbitrary discrimination; the French amendment also included protection against the incitement to such discrimination. Those three points would be put to the vote separately. Speaking as the representative of the United States, she said that her delegation preferred the simpler wording contained in document E/CN.4/95.

MR. KLEKOVKIN (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) proposed a further amendment. He thought the word “arbitrary” in the original text (document E/CN.4/95) should be deleted.

[7]

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) said that he saw no need in the United Kingdom and Indian amendment for the phrase “regardless of office or status”. It was dangerous to mention only two exceptions; the statement would be stronger if the phrase were deleted.

MR. CHANG (China) pointed out that those who wished to avoid use of that phrase could vote for the French amendment which did not contain it.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) wished to maintain the phrase in his amendment. Persons holding high office or possessed of a certain social status were apt to consider themselves above the law; it was useful to state that they were not.

MR. CASSIN (France) considered his amendment useful; he agreed with the Lebanese representative that citing only certain exceptions weakened the text.

MR. LOPEZ (Philippines) hoped that the Lebanese amendment would be accepted; that would enable him to vote for the United Kingdom and Indian amendment, which he preferred to the French proposal because the words “All are equal before the law” sounded better in English than the corresponding phrase in the French proposal.

MR. CHANG (China) supported the observations of the Philippine representative. In the interest of unanimity he was also ready to accept the deletion of the word “arbitrary”.

MR. WILSON (United Kingdom) and MRS. MEHTA (India) accepted the Lebanese amendment. The word “All” with which the sentence began was sufficiently comprehensive.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that in voting for the first sentence of the French amendment the Commission would be voting on form rather than on substance as the Lebanese amendment had eliminated the substantial [8] difference between the French and the United Kingdom and Indian amendments.

The first sentence of the French amendment reading as follows: “The equality of all men before the law is an inviolable rule” was rejected by seven votes to five with two abstentions.

The first part of the United Kingdom and Indian amendment, “all are equal before the law”, was adopted by twelve votes to none, with three abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN asked for comments on the Ukrainian suggestion to delete the word “arbitrary” from the second part of the United Kingdom and Indian amendment which was worded as follows: “and are entitled to equal protection of the law against any arbitrary discrimination”. She remarked that the United States delegation wished to maintain the word “arbitrary” because all discrimination was not necessarily invidious; thus, protection for reasons of old age would be of a useful and commendable type.

MR. LOPEZ (Philippines) wondered whether the true intention of the Article would not be better expressed by the words “without any discrimination” than by “against any discrimination”.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) did not agree with the Philippine representative. The intention of the Article was to state that it was the duty of the law to protect men against any discrimination; the last part of that sentence in the draft adopted at the Second Session of the Commission proved that assertion. The Philippine amendment would alter the main idea of the article.

He agreed that the word “arbitrary” might be deleted. To avoid any misunderstanding of the meaning of “discrimination” as used in the Article, it might be advisable to refer to the first paragraph by changing the words “any arbitrary discrimination” to “such discrimination”.

[9]

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) agreed with the Chilean representative.

MR. CHANG (China) proposed to incorporate the Philippine suggestion in the article so that the phrase would read “without and against any discrimination”. The word “discrimination” did not apply to useful distinction.

MR. LEBEAU (Belgium) hoped that the vote would be taken on the English text, as the words “are entitled” had been improperly translated in the French text.

MR. CASSIN (France) supported Mr. Lebeau’s observation. He agreed that the word “arbitrary” might be omitted. There was no desire to suppress useful and necessary distinctions, but there appeared to be agreement that the term discrimination was used to mean invidious distinctions.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) agreed with the Chinese and French representatives that there was no need for the word “arbitrary”, as the word “discrimination”, used alone, had a derogatory connotation. Discrimination which harmed men was quite different from any distinctions established to assist certain groups which required special aid. He supported the Chinese proposal, which he thought should be put to the vote first, as being furthest removed from the original text.

THE CHAIRMAN thought that the word “discrimination” required an adjective since it meant merely “distinction” and did not necessarily have invidious implications.
