Explaining the reasons behind his amendment (A/C.3/247), Mr. Baroody pointed out that throughout history missionaries had often abused their rights by becoming the forerunners of a political intervention, and there were many instances where peoples had been drawn into murderous conflict by the missionaries' efforts to convert them. [392]

So it was that bloody and unjustifiable crusades organized in the name of religion, had had as their real economic and political purpose the acquisition of a place in the sun for the surplus populations of Europe. Religious wars between Catholics and Protestants had caused, in Europe, the death of millions of persons of both faiths which differed but little from each other.

Mr. Baroody felt that religion was essentially a manifestation of an emotion. He did not feel he should analyse in detail the complex psychological elements which characterized religion, but he wished to point out that even at that time when, according to some, tolerance prevailed, the dangerous weapon of propaganda was being used in all parts of the world to stir up peoples' religious or other beliefs. Every section of mankind could, if it so desired, make clever use of such an aim to appeal to the religious beliefs of some other section which for a given material reason might not be able to fall in with the plan proposed or which might simply want to avoid any recourse to such an aim. A man often considered himself to be superior to his neighbour merely because he was richer. Similarly, certain groups of people had claimed throughout history to be God's chosen people or to belong to a superior religion, merely because they were more powerful than their neighbours of a different faith. Those who believed in God should admit that all human beings, regardless of their religion, were equal before Him. As to those who did not believe in God, they should understand that in playing upon the religious beliefs of others they might draw the world into a new murderous crusade. For the Arab world, a good religion was one which advocated a reciprocal spirit of kindness and tolerance among mankind.

For those reasons Mr. Baroodi wished the Committee to make the declaration as clear as possible and omit any provisions apt to serve as an easy pretext for exciting hatred and encouraging dangerous differences of opinion.

The delegation of Saudi Arabia would even be ready to accept article 16 provided the words "freedom to change his religion or belief, and" were omitted.

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) fully supported the text of article 16. She recalled that that article had been adopted by the Commission on Human Rights only after lengthy debate and as a result of consultation with representatives of different religious organizations.

She observed that the Peruvian amendment (A/C.3/225) might be interpreted as prohibiting the teaching of religion.

The Cuban amendment (A/C.3/232) only mentioned the freedom to profess a religious or philosophical belief, which would exclude the cultural, scientific and political aspect of that freedom provided for in article 16.

The delegation of the United States would vote against the USSR amendment, which subjected freedom of thought, conscience and religion to national laws.

Mrs. Roosevelt felt that the amendment of Sweden was unnecessary in view of the fact that article 27 of the declaration expressly covered the points of that amendment.

Noting that the right to change one's belief was one of the essential elements of freedom of religion, she could not accept the deletion proposed by the representative of Saudi Arabia.

She stressed that freedom of thought gave everyone the right to believe as well as not to believe, which should satisfy the representative of the USSR. On the other hand, it would be useless to mention in article 16 the requirements of public morality, all guarantees in that respect being provided in article 27 of the declaration.

She felt that the progress of civilization and the development of education would put an end to the barbaric practices to which the USSR representative had referred.

In conclusion, Mrs. Roosevelt, being convinced that the basic text of article 16 was satisfactory, pressed for its adoption.

MRS. CORBET (United Kingdom), while supporting the views expressed by the United States representative, stated that her delegation would have preferred a simpler text. But article 16, which had been discussed at length before being adopted by the Commission on Human Rights, was an excellent compromise text uniting the different views expressed. The delegation of the United Kingdom would, therefore, support that article.

As to the amendment of Peru, Mrs. Corbet regretted its failure to deal with freedom of thought.

On the other hand, she could not agree that freedom of thought, conscience and religion should be limited by national law, and in view of the fact that her country attached great importance to the freedom of religion in teaching, practice, worship and observance, she would vote against the amendment proposed by the USSR delegation.

While appreciating the purpose of the amendment of Saudi Arabia, she felt, however, that article 16 should include the right to change one's religion. She could not, therefore, accept that amendment.

In conclusion, she felt that the Swedish amendment was useless as the safeguards provided in it were already included in article 27.

MR. CONTOUMAS (Greece), sharing the points of view expressed by the representatives of the United States and the United Kingdom, accepted the whole of article 16 as adopted by the Commission on Human Rights which he, too, felt to be a compromise text.

He wondered, however, whether the phrase "freedom. . . to manifest his religion or belief" might not lead to unfair practices of proselytizing. He mentioned, in that connexion, that he had had occasion to observe real religious competition in a country where all religions were represented. In fact, free lodgings, material assistance and a number of other advantages were offered to persons who agreed to belong to one religion or another.

Mr. Contoumas understood that the representative of Sweden shared his apprehensions to a certain extent, But he felt that the danger of such [394] unfair practices was a threat, not only to the minority groups of a given country, as Mrs. Lindström had indicated, but also to the religious majority. While, admittedly, every person should be free to accept or reject the religious propaganda to which he was subjected, he felt that an end should be put to such unfair competition in the sphere of religion.

Without making a formal proposal on the matter, the delegation of Greece would be ready to submit a proposal on that problem if it was considered useful by the Committee.

Mr. Contoumas objected to the USSR amendment which subjected freedom of thought, conscience and religion to the laws of the different countries and to the requirements of public morality. Care must be taken not to encroach upon the field of action of the national legislatures, and on the other hand the declaration of human rights should embody guiding principles for the use of the various Governments. As regards the limitations imposed by the requirements of public morality, they were covered by article 27.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) said that his delegation would confine itself to a few remarks on the different amendments to article 16.

The amendment presented by the USSR delegation might, in a sense, appear to be wider in scope than the text adopted by the Commission on Human Rights; that was brought out particularly in Mr. Pavlov's statements. Upon careful comparison of the two texts, however, it became apparent that the basic text had, in fact, a much wider scope than the USSR text, which did not mention the concepts of freedom of conscience and freedom of religion. Moreover, the Soviet Union amendment included a reference to the laws of the country concerned which could lead to the opposite of what the USSR delegation wished to attain, as it might permit the maintenance of certain religious practices which, from a humanitarian point of view, it would be better to ban. The delegation of Belgium was, therefore, unable to support that amendment.

The amendment submitted by the delegation of Peru was also of a restrictive nature, inasmuch as it limited freedom of conscience to the profession of a religious faith and left out the wider idea of freedom of conscience as applied to philosophical and scientific concepts. Consequently the delegation of Belgium was equally unable to accept the text proposed by Peru.

The amendment of Cuba gave rise to a number of objections, one of which was an objection of form, for, strictly speaking, there was no such thing as "philosophical belief". If the Cuban delegation maintained its amendment, it should at least rectify that erroneous expression.

Mr. Dehousse agreed with the remarks made by the representative of Saudi Arabia in criticism of intolerance and showing to what extremes fanaticism and sectarianism in the religious and other fields could lead. But the delegation of Belgium could not agree with the proposal of the delegation of Saudi Arabia to delete an entire [395] section of the text dealing with external manifestations of freedom of conscience.

It would be unnecessary to proclaim that freedom if it were never to be given outward expression; if it were intended, so to speak, only for the use of the inner man. It was necessary, however, to stress the external manifestations of creeds by which expression was given to beliefs. In that sense, the Saudi Arabian amendment was also restrictive.

Mr. Dehousse then expressed his desire to know the exact implication of the amendment presented by the delegation of Sweden. The proposal had apparently been inspired by praiseworthy intentions, but it seemed vague both in conception and in form. What, precisely, was, in the field of religion, the meaning of the phrase “interfere unduly with the personal liberty of anybody else”? In professing or propagating a faith one could, to a certain extent, interfere with the freedom of others by seeking to impose an unfamiliar idea upon them. But proselytism was not limited to any one faith or religious group. If it was an evil, it was essentially an evil from which all sides had to suffer. Consequently the delegation of Belgium could not accept the Swedish amendment as long as its exact intentions were not clear.

In conclusion, Mr. Dehousse stated that he would vote for the text of article 16 proposed by the Commission on Human Rights.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) reminded the meeting that all the ideas contained in the different amendments to article 16 had been discussed at length in the Commission on Human Rights.

Recalling also the part played by Mr. Malik, the Chairman of the Third Committee, in the drafting of article 16, Mr. Santa Cruz announced that his delegation would vote in favour of that text and would oppose all amendments, for the reasons put forward by the representatives of the United States, the United Kingdom and Belgium, with whose views he entirely agreed.

MR. AQUINO (Philippines) stressed that while men agreed in general as to what they considered as their essential freedoms, they frequently differed in the profession of their opinions and faiths. Nothing could show that more clearly than the statement by the representative of Saudi Arabia. For him, religion was the manifestation of an emotion; for others – including Mr. Aquino – it was the expression of faith. It was, therefore, inevitable that the definition of freedom of religion should give rise to differences of opinion. Article 16 was the result of a compromise based on the spirit of conciliation and tolerance shown by the Commission on Human Rights. For that reason the delegation of the Philippines would vote for it.

His delegation would vote against the amendment presented by the delegation of Peru, because it retained only one form of freedom of thought: freedom of religious thought.

Furthermore, it considered that the amendment of the delegation of Cuba also was negative and restrictive in character.

His delegation shared the anxiety of the Swedish delegation to ensure effective protection for the individual from the manifestations of religious fanaticism. It was obvious that so long as attempts at religious proselytism remained within the limits of public order, freedom of thought was not threatened: quite on the contrary, the free exchange of religious ideas was one of the healthiest signs of freedom and democracy. But when religious action left the realm of pure thought, it might constitute a threat from which human society must be protected. His delegation thought, however, that the basic text contained all the guarantees desirable.

Analysing next the amendment submitted by the USSR, he wished to reaffirm from the beginning that he had not the slightest doubt as to the intentions which had inspired that amendment. But the noblest intention was not sufficient to justify a text which went in a direction diametrically opposed to the aim sought. What the declaration on human rights should attempt to do, was to express a common philosophy for all nations and thus further the advancement of the human race. But the USSR amendment, if adopted, would result in maintaining the status quo in the world; it was, therefore, clearly reactionary in character.

Finally, he pointed out to the representative of Saudi Arabia that the precedents of the Crusades and the wars of religion he had evoked, far from militating against the adoption of article 16, clearly demonstrated the utility of provisions designed to prevent a repetition of such conflicts.

THE CHAIRMAN announced that the delegation of Saudi Arabia had withdrawn its first amendment, and that it formally proposed that article 16 should be amended by the deletion of the following words: "to change his religion or belief, and freedom" (A/C.3/247/Rev.1).

MR. CASSIN (France) said his delegation would vote in favour of the text of article 16 as drafted by the Commission on Human Rights. The substance of that text had not been contested in the Commission, and the only objections made to it had been general objections on wording.

The amendments before the Committee were inspired by various considerations. Certain amendments – such as those of the USSR and Sweden – called for a legal check on excessive manifestations of religious proselytism. But a text proclaiming human rights and freedoms could not contain any limitations, even legitimate ones. The French delegation was the first to condemn barbarous manifestations of every kind; it had admitted that moral requirements and public security might inspire certain perfectly admissible limitations of the external manifestations of religion. It found, however, all the guarantees necessary in that respect in the general provisions of article 27.

His delegation feared that the text proposed by the USSR delegation might go beyond its aim, [397] for it might, if the case arose, result in limiting freedom of thought itself. For that reason his delegation could not vote in favour of it.

He recognized that it was a delicate matter for the holders of certain religious beliefs to see it proclaimed that all men had the right to change their beliefs. He admitted that a certain lowering of respect for those religions might result from the adoption of that clause. But the Committee must place itself on the broader plane of humanity as a whole. Not content with proclaiming freedom of thought, it must adopt all the consequences of that proclamation; and one of the most important corollaries of freedom of thought was the freedom of the individual to change his opinion.

In that connexion, he pointed out that the wording of the French text of article 16 was less satisfactory than that of the English. The French text used the term croyance which had an essentially religious flavour, whereas the English text used the wider term "belief".

He therefore proposed to improve the French text by replacing croyance by conviction; in suggesting that purely formal alteration, he wanted it to be understood that he did not wish in any way to change the meaning or the wording of the English text, nor the intention of the authors of the article.

MR. BEAUFORT (Netherlands) emphasized the fact that freedom of thought was one of the essential rights of man and that, that being so, the declaration owed it to itself to recognize and protect that freedom unreservedly.

The amendments proposed, in particular those of the USSR, Peru and Saudi Arabia, were unfortunately of a kind to restrict freedom of conscience and religious freedom in such a way that they were no longer guaranteed, in the full meaning of the term. The USSR amendment, in particular, gave the State the possibility of interfering in the religious life of its nationals, which made it unacceptable in the eyes of his delegation.

He admitted that man was free, if he so desired, to change his beliefs, but he thought that that right was implicitly included in freedom of conscience. However, the text established by the Commission on Human Rights was simple and clear, and his delegation would, therefore, vote in its favour.

MR. KURAL (Turkey) was also in favour of the original text of article 16 for the same reasons as the numerous speakers who had preceded him.

MR. CHANG (China) declared that in discussing article 16, the Committee was dealing with one of the most important principles in the declaration. From the eighteenth century, when the idea of human rights was born in Western Europe, freedom of thought had figured among the essential human freedoms and had covered the idea of religious freedom. He felt, moreover, that freedom of thought included freedom of conscience as well as religious freedom, but, as the declaration was destined for the vast mass of the world's population, it should never be criticized for being too explicit.

He declared that 1869, the date of the publication of Darwin's treatises, really marked the beginning of the so-called conflict of religion and science. The effects, already eighty years old, of that manifestation of the human spirit could not be sufficiently deplored, and its influence could be felt in the Committee itself. For that reason he stressed the necessity of studying the problem of religious expression in its true perspective.

In order to throw more light on the question, he wished first of all to explain to the Committee how the Chinese approached the religious problem. Chinese philosophy was based essentially on a firm belief in a unitarian cause, expressed on the human plane by a pluralistic tolerance. That philosophy considered that man's actions were more important than metaphysics, that the art of living should be placed above knowledge of the causes of life, and that the best way for man to testify to the greatness of the Divinity was to give proof of an exemplary attitude in this world. In the eyes of Chinese philosophers, it was pluralistic tolerance, manifesting itself in every sphere of thought, conscience and religion, which should inspire men if they wished to base their relations on benevolence and justice.

Returning to article 16, Mr. Chang said he had heard with sympathy and respect the objections raised by the representative of Saudi Arabia. For the countries of the Far East, the nineteenth century, with its expansion of Western industrialism, had not always been very kind and he admitted that missionaries had not always limited themselves to their religious mission.

He expressed the opinion, however, that freedom of thought was well protected by the text proposed by the Commission on Human Rights. During the discussions in the latter, it had been agreed that freedom of belief was an integral part of freedom of thought and conscience, and if special emphasis was laid on the necessity of protecting it, that was to ensure the inviolability of that profound part of thought and conscience which, being largely emotional, was apt to lead mankind into unreasoned conflict.

MR. ENCINAS (Peru) explained that his delegation, feeling that the freedoms of thought, conscience and religion, although closely connected, should be treated in three separate articles, had retained for article 16 only the idea of religious freedom, momentarily setting aside the other two rights, in the interests of a better drafting. He could not, therefore, be accused of wishing to restrict one or other of those freedoms.

Several representatives, including some members of the Commission on Human Rights, had, however, pointed out in their speeches that the basic text of article 16 was the result of a compromise between divergent views. The Peruvian delegation fully appreciated how difficult it was to arrive at a compromise of that sort and, therefore, wished to withdraw its amendment (A/C.3/225) and support the original draft.

MRS. IKRAMULLAH (Pakistan) noted that once again the USSR delegation was proposing an amendment which limited the scope of the right proclaimed by subjecting it to the special provisions of national legislation. The aim of the declaration was to define the principles which should regulate a civilized society. The USSR amendment ran counter to that aim for it could not be said that every national body of laws had reached the same level in the social field.

Her delegation understood the difficulties peculiar to each country, but thought that they were met by the general reservations of article 27.

In conclusion, she wished to stress the necessity of not adopting any article which might shock the religious sentiments of the different peoples.

MR. SAINT-LOT (Haiti) wished, in the name of the great mass of free-thinkers, to make a reservation concerning the text of article 16. That text, contrary to the method generally adopted by the Commission on Human Rights, was not drawn up in broad general terms. An attempt had been made in it to proclaim not only freedom of belief, but also the right of the individual to change his belief. There was, therefore, ground for astonishment that its authors had not thought of making it still clearer by affirming the right not to believe.

As to the French text, the French delegation had proposed to replace the term croyance by the broader term conviction. That was a judicious alteration, with which his delegation was glad to associate itself.

It would, therefore, vote for the original text amended in the sense suggested by Mr. Cassin.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) stated that his delegation attached the greatest importance to article 16; the Lebanese delegation would not be able to give the same enthusiastic support to the declaration if it did not embody article 16. Even if the list of social, economic, political and juridical rights of man were complete and adequate, it would count for nothing if man were denied freedom of thought and belief. Those were essential freedoms which made life richer and constituted the supreme goal of all aspirations.

As it stood, article 16 met the main wishes of the Lebanese delegation, for it condemned all interference, not only in the outward manifestations of man's daily life, but also in the development of his inner being. As the Chinese representative had said, religious freedom, the freedom of thought and of conscience, ensured the integrity of inward beliefs and the possibility for each individual to determine his own destiny. That was the reason for the special mention in article 16 of the freedom for an individual to change his belief, as such a change might be at the root of a new spiritual impulse.

Studied in the light of such considerations, the proposed amendments tended to suppress the essential elements of article 16 and should, therefore, be rejected.

Mr. Azkoul regretted that he was obliged to confirm the opinion of the representative of the Philippines on the USSR amendment. Hitherto the Lebanese delegation had welcomed the initiative taken by the USSR in the field of social progress, even when the proposals made were difficult to realize at the current stage of human development. Consequently, it was with regret that it had to recognize the reactionary character of the USSR amendment, not only because of its refusal to ensure the individual's right to change his belief, but on account of the fact that it did not even agree to explicit recognition of religious freedom. The Lebanese delegation could not accept a draft which might have as one result the obstruction of religious teaching.

His delegation would also have to oppose the other amendments submitted, since in one way or another they would have a restrictive effect on article 16.

MR. ANZE MATIENZO (Bolivia) stressed the fact that article 16 was concerned with a great problem of the human spirit, namely, religious belief and mutual tolerance. That was why the Bolivian delegation felt obliged to give expression to the anxiety it felt on account of the wording of that article, which was more of a sophism than a proclamation of principles. In their desire to keep in line with realities its authors had failed to give it a sufficiently lofty design.

The Bolivian delegation would have liked a brief and eloquent article regarding freedom of thought and belief; that condition would have been fulfilled if only the first phrase of the draft had been retained.

However, while using the right to express its opinion in the name of the freedom of thought which it intended to defend, the Bolivian delegation also intended to show a spirit of tolerance, and would therefore accept article 16 with all that it was meant to imply.

MR. PLAZA (Venezuela) considered that the second part of article 16, as drafted by the Commission on Human Rights, did no more than develop the principle proclaimed in the first part, by enumerating different freedoms. But, like all enumerations, that second part was necessarily restrictive. The Venezuelan representative therefore preferred that only the first phrase of article 16 should be retained. Article 3 confined itself to proclaiming the right to life, so why could the same simplicity not be observed in connexion with freedom of thought and religion, which was also one of the most important rights of the declaration?

The Venezuelan representative thought the amendment submitted by the USSR delegation was worded in very broad terms which did not imply any restriction. In fact, as the USSR representative had pointed out, freedom of thought implied freedom of conscience and religion. That amendment therefore included the same aim as the basic text.

On the other hand, it mentioned "the laws of the country"; in view of the fact that the terms of the amendment submitted by the USSR coincided with those of his country's Constitution, [401] the delegation of Venezuela would not hesitate in voting in its favour. If the USSR amendment were not adopted, it would vote in favour of the basic text with reservations concerning its application in Venezuela.

MISS BERNARDINO (Dominican Republic) pointed out that the representatives of the United States and of the United Kingdom had explained that the drafting of the text of article 16 was the result of detailed study and that religious personalities of the whole world had been consulted on the subject. The article, as it stood, deserved the consideration of the Committee, and the delegation of the Dominican Republic would vote in its favour.

MR. DE ATHAYDE (Brazil) stressed the fact that article 16 was the most important article in the entire declaration of human rights. Men had, in fact, always struggled and suffered to secure the right to freedom of thought and conscience.

The Brazilian representative considered that the basic text of the article was complete and that the detailed enumeration which followed the declaration of the principle constituted the essence itself of the philosophy which should be at the basis of that article. He considered that the restrictions or limitations to which religious manifestations or practices should be subject in the common interest, were provided for in article 27.

The delegation of Brazil would give its entire support to article 16.

MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) said that he wished to make two observations concerning article 16. First, he thought that it laid too much stress on religious freedom; actually, and especially at that very time, freedom of thought should be extended particularly to the realms of politics and science. Secondly, article 16 had proclaimed freedom of conscience; that concept was not provided for by law, and was, therefore, out of place in a legal document.

Mr. Jiménez de Aréchaga could not share the opinion of the Venezuelan representative concerning the USSR amendment. He considered that article 27 provided adequate means of supervising the application of the rights laid down in the declaration. His delegation would never vote in favour of a clause which permitted a country's laws to control the exercise of the right to freedom of thought.

MR. GARCÍA BAUER (Guatemala) considered that article 16, which was the outcome of age-long struggles, was the most important of all the articles in the declaration. It was only right to recognize that the Commission had studied it very carefully.

Referring to the amendments which had been presented, the representative of Guatemala pointed out that in the USSR amendment the only question raised was freedom of thought and the right of the individual to express his belief, whereas freedom of conscience was not mentioned, and religious freedom was dealt with in a questionable manner. Moreover, he could not accept a clause which subordinated the application of a right to the provisions of national legislation. As the representative of Belgium had already pointed out, to arrive at a positive result, it was necessary for the Governments to adjust their legislation to [402] the principles consecrated by the United Nations; they should not try, contrariwise, to make those principles subject to the laws of their respective countries.

The clause contained in the USSR amendment also subordinated the application of article 16 to the requirements of public morals. Mr. García Bauer considered article 27 covered that question sufficiently. Consequently he would not support the Soviet Union amendment.

As to the amendment submitted by the Cuban delegation, he considered that, as at present drafted, it was less broad in scope than the basic text of article 16.

The Swedish amendment which was intended to complete article 16 was superfluous for the reasons he had already stated in connexion with the USSR amendment. In his opinion, article 27 gave all the necessary guarantees in that respect.

In conclusion, Mr. García Bauer stated that his delegation would have preferred an article drafted in a more concise manner and more forceful, but he was prepared to vote in favour of article 16 as it stood, as proof of his willingness to compromise.

MR. ABADI (Iraq) said he would have preferred to see article 16 divided into three parts, each of which would have been accompanied by an explanatory clause. The first would have dealt with freedom of expression, which would have extended to freedom to express scientific opinions as well as religious or philosophical convictions. The second part would have dealt with religious freedom as such, namely, the relationship between human beings and God; and the third part would have dealt with freedom of worship, namely the relationship of man with society.

Mr. Abadi thought such a proposal might have given rise to a very useful discussion but as he did not wish to submit a formal amendment at that stage of the discussion, he supported the amendment submitted by Saudi Arabia in its new form.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) did not understand why certain representatives had objected to the amendment submitted by his delegation, unless there was some misunderstanding. The fundamental point of the USSR amendment was inspired by a rule which had always been followed by his Government, namely, not to be content to affirm a right but to guarantee it.

Certain representatives had objected to the USSR amendment because it mentioned only freedom of thought and omitted freedom of conscience. The delegation of the Soviet Union considered that the expression "freedom of thought" was sufficiently broad in scope and included scientific and philosophic thought as well as thought in its religious forms. The USSR delegation considered that it was necessary to respect all forms of thought.

Mr. Pavlov stated once more that it might be essential, in certain cases, to restrain the free manifestation of religious beliefs, as for instance in the case of death ritual.

He therefore maintained the USSR amendment because he considered that [403] it was not contrary to the principles set forth in the declaration of human rights.

He felt that article 16 was unbalanced and that it discriminated in favour of religious freedom. He also thought that the detailed enumeration figuring in that article was not a very happy one.

MR. KAYALY (Syria) argued that the principle of freedom of thought was really laid down in three articles of the draft declaration: article 16 which dealt with freedom of thought and religion; article 17 which dealt with freedom of opinion, and with freedom to express that opinion, and article 18 which dealt with freedom of assembly and association.

In order to understand article 16 fully, it was essential to know the reasons which had led its authors to include ideas with a controversial background. The discussion of those ideas had shown that there were various trends of thought and practically all the representatives had expressed their fear of seeing the different forms of freedom of thought restricted in any way.

Mr. Kayaly wondered whether, in order to obviate all controversy, doubts and apprehensions, it would not be wise merely to state the principle in article 16, without going into details which would be more suitably inserted in the covenant or in the measures of implementation. He thought it might be preferable simply, in a short article, to define all that was required by contemporary civilization: freedom of thought, freedom of conscience and freedom of religion. Since the amendment submitted by Saudi Arabia, in its revised form, fulfilled those conditions, the Syrian delegation would vote for it.

Moreover, if all the nations finally decided to base their relations on tolerance and on respect for the opinions of others, it would be unnecessary to include controversial clauses in the declaration; it would be enough to state general principles.

MRS. LINDSTRÖM (Sweden) remarked that a number of representatives had maintained that in view of the existence of article 27, the clause which she wished to add to article 16 was redundant.

She pointed out that similar observations had been made by members of the Committee in connexion with other articles and that, in some cases, it had been decided that it was necessary to reiterate principles which had already been stated.

It had frequently been said in the Committee that the declaration of human rights was meant for the man in the street. It could hardly be hoped, however, that the latter would know the declaration by heart and would always be able to find the relevant article. Mrs. Lindström quoted practical examples to show that some repetition in the text of the declaration was desirable. Hence she considered that she had good reason for maintaining her amendment.

MR. BAROODY (Saudi Arabia) urged that the reference to the individual's right to change his religion should not be retained in article 16. He asked the French representative whether his Government had consulted the Moslem peoples of North Africa and other French territories before accepting that text, or whether it intended to im-[404]pose it on them arbitrarily. He also asked the other colonial Powers, notably the United Kingdom, Belgium and the Netherlands, whether they were not afraid of offending the religious beliefs of their Moslem subjects by imposing that article on them.

He reminded the representative of Lebanon that 40 per cent of the Lebanese population was Moslem, and asked him whether the whole of that population had authorized him to approve article 16 in toto. Mr. Baroody asked those questions because mention had been made of the fact that the Commission on Human Rights had consulted various religious bodies.

Mr. Baroody analysed the revised version of his amendment and pointed out that to mention the individual's right to change religion was superfluous, as that particular freedom was implied in the principle of freedom of belief.

In connexion with the remarks of the representative of China, Mr. Baroody stated that Mr. Chang was over-optimistic in believing that missionaries should be given a chance not to repeat past mistakes. Mr. Baroody did not question the high personal integrity of most missionaries, but he feared that many would still be used for the ends of certain alien political forces.

He hoped there would be no opposition to his revised text, in view of the fact that it retained all the essential ideas contained in the basic text of article 16.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) observed that, as a believer, he wished to speak in the name of all men – for all, whether they knew it or not, had some kind of faith even those who had no religious belief – and all could attain the same moral elevation. He therefore considered that no distinction should be made between the different faiths, which were all worthy of respect. That was why the Cuban delegation had submitted its amendment (A/C.3/232), which took into consideration the two essential aspects of human belief: the philosophical aspect and the religious aspect.

In his opinion, article 16 was among those which had been least well drafted by the Commission on Human Rights. It began with a phrase which meant nothing, as it stated a right which was evident, which existed a priori and which need not be defended. The rights which did need defending were, for example, freedom of information and freedom of expression.

The second part of the article was unsatisfactory; it placed too much emphasis on the individual's right to change his religion, and thus weakened the absolute value of freedom of thought, conscience and religion proclaimed in the first phrase. The scale of values was thus not observed.

Nevertheless, in a spirit of conciliation, the Cuban delegation was prepared to accept the second part of article 16, but it requested that its amendment should be put to a vote and that in any case the parts of the basic text of article 16 should be voted on separately.

The Cuban delegation, for its part, would not be able to vote for the first phrase.

THE CHAIRMAN announced that the general debate on article 16 had been concluded.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) requested that his amendment (E/800, page 33) be put to the vote in four parts.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the words: "Everyone must be guaranteed freedom of thought".

Those words were rejected by 23 votes to 9, with 8 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the words: "and freedom to perform religious services".

Those words were rejected by 24 votes to 9, with 8 abstentions.

As a result of those two votes, The Chairman stated that the rest of the USSR amendment was automatically rejected.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) pointed out that his amendment (A/C.3/232) should read as follows: "Every person has the right freely to profess a belief or conviction on any subject. This right includes. . ."

THE CHAIRMAN put that amendment to the vote.

THE CHAIRMAN put the Saudi Arabian amendment (A/C.3/247/Rev.1) to the vote.

That amendment was rejected by 22 votes to 12, with 8 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put the Swedish amendment (A/C.3/252) to the vote.

That amendment was rejected by 27 votes to 10, with 7 abstentions.

As no objections were expressed to the French representative's suggestion (127th meeting) to substitute the word conviction for croyance in the French text, the Chairman considered it adopted by the Committee.

He then called for a vote on the first phrase of the basic text of article 16.

That phrase was adopted by 44 votes to none, with 1 abstention.

At the request of the representative of Saudi Arabia, the Chairman put the words "this right includes freedom to change his religion" to the vote by roll-call.

A vote was taken by roll-call, as follows:

In favour: Australia, Belgium, Bolivia, Brazil, Canada, Chile, China, Costa Rica, Domini-[406]can Republic, Ethiopia, France, Greece, Haiti, Honduras, India, Lebanon, Mexico, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Panama, Philippines, Sweden, Turkey, United Kingdom, United States of America, Venezuela.

Against: Afghanistan, Iraq, Pakistan, Saudi Arabia, Syria.

Abstaining: Argentina, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Iran, Paraguay, Poland, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Uruguay, Yugoslavia.

Those words were adopted by 27 votes to 5, with 12 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put the remainder of article 16 to the vote.

The remainder of the article was adopted by 34 votes to 1, with 10 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put article 16, as a whole, to the vote.

Article 16, as modified in respect of the French text, was adopted by 38 votes to 3, with 3 abstentions.

MR. CASSIN (France) said he had been unable to accept the Saudi Arabian amendment and had voted for the original text, because his country, by tradition, respected the rights to freedom of thought and to religion. In reply to a question asked by the representative of Saudi Arabia at the 127th meeting, he stated that his Government would never take any action which would impair the attachment of the Moslems of the French Union to the latter.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) said he had abstained in the vote on the first phrase of article 16 because, in his opinion, it could be interpreted as a meaningless statement. He had also abstained on the second phrase of the article, because it was already covered by the provisions of the first phrase. He had, however, voted in favour of the article as a whole.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said he had voted for the article as a whole, even though the USSR amendment, designed to improve the text, had been rejected. The USSR Constitution contained a fuller and clearer definition of freedom of thought and religion than was contained in the draft declaration. The functions of State and Church were separated and the right to both religious and anti-religious propaganda was permitted. Other countries, however, were not as progressive as his own and therefore, it would have been too much to expect them to subscribe to the same guarantees as the USSR. He had voted for article 16, because the right to freedom of thought was included and, therefore, the position of science was guaranteed.

MR. CONTOUMAS (Greece) said he had voted for article 16, on the understanding that it did not authorize unfair practices of proselytism.

MR. CAMPOS ORTIZ (Mexico) stated that in voting in favour of article 16 of the international declaration of human rights, the Mexican delega-[407]tion had done so on the understanding that the part "freedom. . . to manifest his religion or belief in teaching. . ." referred to the freedom of man to instruct others in his beliefs or religion within those necessary limitations, in order to ensure recognition and respect for the rights of others requirements of morality, public order and the general welfare, as stated in article 27 of the draft declaration.

MRS. BEGRUP (Denmark) said she had abstained on the Saudi Arabian amendment and on article 16 as a whole, because, in her opinion, the first phrase of the article would have been sufficient. The adoption of the second phrase would mean that the representatives of some 300 million Mohammedans would be unable to support the draft declaration.

Furthermore, from the discussion it could be seen that the various delegations would interpret the provisions of the declaration in different ways, and therefore it would have been advisable to have as wide and as general, but as short, a text as possible.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) said he had voted for the original text of article 16, as neither the Swedish nor the USSR amendment seemed to improve it. He again called the USSR representative's attention to the fact that there was no need to refer to national laws in the declaration, as it would not be a legally binding document.

The Saudi Arabian representative had claimed that the Belgian Government was carrying out a reactionary policy with respect to the Mohammedan population of the Congo and Ruanda Urundi. In the first place, the Mohammedan population of those districts was very small and further, his Government had never had, nor would it have in the future, the intention of compelling that population to change its religion. Further, under the United Nations Charter, his Government was under no obligation to consult those peoples.

MR. HABIB (India) drew attention to article 19 of the new Indian Constitution, guaranteeing the right to freedom of religion, which included the right to convert or be converted; that applied to the 40 million Moslems of India as well as to all others. The adoption of the Saudi Arabian proposal would have been a tragedy.

MR. PLAZA (Venezuela) had voted for article 16, on the understanding that the State would be able to carry out investigations of the kind he had described at the previous meeting.

MR. KAYALY (Syria) had abstained in the vote on article 16, although the Syrian Constitution guaranteed the right to freedom of religion. As it stood, the article seemed to violate the spirit of the other articles of the declaration. Secondly, certain countries which had supported it still refused to teach the Darwinian theory in their schools.

The article would have an unfortunate effect on many people in many parts of the world and there did not, actually, seem to be any need for such an insertion. The Syrian people remembered the oppressive policy carried out by the French Government during the period when their country was under French mandate and were convinced that the same oppressive policy was being carried out in North Africa.

MRS. CORBET (United Kingdom) drew the Committee's attention to the fact that her Government had consulted the British colonies on the whole of the draft declaration.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) said he had voted for article 16 because its provisions were not in contradiction with the Lebanese Constitution.

Mr. Aziz (Afghanistan) had voted against the second phrase of article 16 because the reasons put forward by the Saudi Arabian representative were in conformity with the religious beliefs and social principles of his country. Afghanistan reserved the right to conform to Moslem laws with regard to the question.

MR. CAÑAS (Costa Rica) said he had voted for the basic text of article 16.

Article 17<sup>1</sup>

THE CHAIRMAN noted that the amendments to article 17 were recapitulated in document A/C.3/294/Rev.1.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) felt that a bloc of votes existed within the Committee which would prevent any amendment from being accepted.

He could recognize the excellence of the basic text, but considered that the Cuban amendment (A/C.3/232) would improve article 17. It was briefer than the original draft and set forth the relevant ideas in a logical and chronological order. Before the right to freedom of opinion, the right to freedom of investigation had to be presupposed. The right to freedom of expression should follow, and afterwards, the right to disseminate thought through any media and regardless of frontiers. He had not included the right to the protection of the individual's ideas, but that was implicit in the amendment.

MR. GRUMBACH (France) said the purpose of the French amendment (A/C.3/244/Rev.1) was to emphasize the fact that rights could not be separated from duties. In regard to article 17, he was referring to the dangers of false information, slander and so on.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said, with reference to the USSR amendment (E/800, pages 33 and 34), that freedom of speech could not be permitted for the propagation of aggression. The United States Press and also their European imitators had been advocating a policy of aggression for some time, in disregard of General Assembly resolution 110(II). A war psychosis was being encouraged by the reactionary Press with the twofold aim of crushing the democratic forces at home and of frightening the countries with whom negotiations were being carried out. As far as the USSR was concerned, that policy had been remarkably unsuccessful. It was obvious, of course, that not all of the United States Press was guilty and that the policy of aggression did not reflect the views of the American people.

The purpose of the second part of the first amendment was to determine how freedom of speech and of the Press could be implemented. At the current time, freedom of the Press was for the very few, and large masses were deprived of their right to express their opinions. The reactionary Press reflected the views of the big newspaper trusts, but not the views of the ordinary people. In that regard, he drew attention to the fact that the majority of the Press had opposed the election of Roosevelt in 1932 and again, on the occasion of the contest between Roosevelt and Dewey,<sup>94</sup> 95 per cent of the Press in the large cities had supported Dewey. An American statesman, Mr. Harold Ickes, had said that a large part of the United States newspapers did not reflect public opinion because they were controlled by big business concerns.<sup>95</sup>

<sup>95</sup> Harold LeClair Ickes (1874–1952) served as Franklin D. Roosevelt's Minister of the Interior and was largely responsible for implementation of the social security legislation known as the New Deal.

United States trade unions, women's organizations and youth organizations should be given more of an opportunity to express their points of view, so that the Press would more consistently reflect democratic ideas and the desire for peace. The object of freedom of speech and of the Press, protected by the law, should be to prevent the spread of fascism and war propaganda.

MR. DE LEÓN (Panama) said his amendment (A/C.3/280) presented no real change to the basic text; it merely separated the ideas contained therein. In his opinion, too little emphasis had been given to the right to freedom of expression in the basic draft, when, actually, the extent to which that right had been exercised was the key to modern world conditions.

MR. AQUINO (Philippines) said that article 17 recognized the right to hold opinions without interference and the right to seek, receive and impart information through any media, regardless of frontiers. By implication, the words "regardless of frontiers" implied ideological barriers as well as physical frontiers. In some countries, that sacred freedom was at the basis of the common free way of life, while in others, it was a beautiful but an empty abstraction. It was essential, therefore, to adopt article 17.

Referring to the USSR representative's statement, he emphasized that the fundamental freedoms were not conferred by the State; its purpose was to guarantee them and it could not infringe them. The USSR representative, however, wanted to amend article 17 so as to make the State responsible for ensuring freedom of opinion and expression. The effect of the USSR amendment would be to create a controlled Press such as existed in all totalitarian countries.

The United States Press was bad in many ways. In his opinion, however, the fact that the Press had supported Dewey and yet had allowed a sufficient flow of information so that he had been defeated, proved that the Press was still a free one.

He felt that the French amendment was already covered by the provisions of article 27. The Cuban and Panamanian amendments seemed to him to be only duplications of the basic text.

The Philippine delegation, therefore, would give its support to the original draft of article 17.

MRS. NEWLANDS (New Zealand) stressed that her delegation considered the declaration as the document in which general principles should be proclaimed. The draft covenant and the suggestions for implementation formed, with the declaration, the three essential elements of the proposed bill of human rights and all parts of the bill should be adopted at the same time.

In view of the character of the declaration, therefore, the straightforward statement of principle as given in the basic text of article 17 should be retained. That draft was substantially the same as a text that had been adopted by the Conference on Freedom of Information held at Geneva in the spring of 1948.<sup>1</sup> At the same time, the Conference had prepared three conventions designed to amplify and give legal substance to some of the ideas contained in article 17. That the amplification of the text of article 17, which was proposed in paragraphs 1 and 2 of the first USSR amendment, would be entirely inadequate to ensure freedom of opinion and expression and the free flow of ideas was particularly apparent when it was studied in connexion with the three draft conventions prepared by the Conference.

She was also opposed to the USSR proposal (E/800, page 34) that freedom of thought and expression should be limited by the interests of national security. The limitations provided in article 27, paragraph 2, of the declaration were quite sufficient to protect the public interest and they were set forth in that article in such a way as to show that only unusual circumstances would justify restrictions on fundamental human rights.

The Cuban, French and Panamanian amendments would in no way improve the basic text and the New Zealand delegation could not, therefore, support them.

MRS. CORBET (United Kingdom) favoured the basic text of article 17, which had been adopted by a large majority after it had been fully discussed at the Conference on Freedom of Information.<sup>2</sup> The text took into account the different opinions on the subject and was a compromise draft which the Committee should not change unless there were compelling reasons for doing so. The United Kingdom delegation did not oppose the principles contained in the French, Cuban and Panamanian amendments. The French point, however, was better covered by the provisions of article 27; and the separation of freedom of opinion and freedom of expression, suggested by Panama, seemed unwise as the two ideas were inalterably linked.

Referring to the USSR amendments she noted that the words “in accordance with the principles of democracy” might be restrictive. The word “democracy” was interpreted differently by different representatives. Whereas the USSR Government felt that the State was the best judge in matters of information, her own Government considered that full freedom to criticize was one of the most important safeguards of democracy. The definition of the word “fascism” which was used in the USSR amendment, was another point on which the two delegations would not agree.

Paragraph 2 of the first USSR amendment contained an interesting idea. Experience in the United Kingdom, however, had proved that the people could make their will felt regardless of the political opinions most frequently advanced in the Press – a fact which was true also of the United States, as a recent election in that country had proved. In countries where so many different shades of opinion were allowed, the problem of furnishing material resources for expressing their opinions to all who might wish such assistance would be complicated indeed. The problem would naturally be greatly simplified if only one opinion were to be expressed.

MR. HOFFMEISTER (Czechoslovakia), pointing out the difficulties involved in an article such as the one under discussion, observed that the Third Committee had itself violated the article when it decided to limit freedom of expression by restricting the time allotted to each speaker.

Article 17 attempted to summarize the results of the Conference on Freedom of Information, but it did not take sufficient account of all the views that had been expressed at that Conference. It did not, for example, refer in any way to the letter or spirit of resolution No. 2<sup>1</sup> drafted by Mr. Dehousse, the representative of Belgium on the Third Committee, and adopted unanimously by the Conference, which contained a statement against propaganda or any information that was contrary to the purposes of the United Nations, and which specifically mentioned the necessity of preventing a renewal of fascism and aggression. The basic draft of article 17 was weak in that it did not include that idea. Mr. Hoffmeister asked that the text of resolution No. 2 should be distributed to members of the Committee so that they could consider it in connexion with article 17.

The Czechoslovak delegation supported all of the USSR amendments as they gave concrete expression to the purposes of the Geneva resolution and the United Nations Charter. Just as the Committee had, at the 88th meeting, agreed to restrictive measures on narcotic drugs, so it should take action to prevent the spread of dangerous germs of fascism and nazism and of all propaganda designed to provoke hatred between nations. Moreover, the USSR amendments would ensure that freedom of the Press was a reality for, as Lenin had said in 1919, as long as the Press was dominated by capitalist interests there was no truth to the claim that freedom of the Press existed.

MR. DE ATHAYDE (Brazil) said that although no true democracy was possible without the freedoms outlined in article 17, those freedoms were still endangered. Freedom of opinion and freedom of expression were in fact always the first freedoms to be attacked when democracy was being threatened. Brazil therefore attached great importance to article 17.

The French amendment was correct in recognizing that responsibilities and rights could not be separated, but the idea of responsibility should be included elsewhere.

The Brazilian delegation approved the basic text of article 17.

MR. KAYALY (Syria) pointed out that the basic text of article 17 outlined principles contained in the Constitution and laws of his country and he would therefore support it.

The draft amendments would add nothing of value to the text. The opening sentences of paragraphs 1 and 2 of the first USSR amendment, for example, were more in the nature of statements to be contained in a preamble and would be inappropriate in the article itself.

The idea of responsibility, found in the French draft amendment, was a good one but it too should not be placed in an article which proclaimed a principle.

When the declaration was ratified, people everywhere would find that article 17 made clear the rights to freedom of opinion and expression to which they were entitled. Those rights should be applied to all peoples, of all races, whatever their situation, whether they were free, under mandate, or in a colonial status. Any nation that called itself democratic could not but feel the deepest shame if it failed to grant the freedoms outlined in the article.

MR. GARCÍA BAUER (Guatemala) thought that since the first sentence of paragraph 1 of the first USSR amendment was primarily concerned with guaranteeing the enjoyment of the rights set forth in article 17, it should be included in the part of the draft bill of human rights which would deal with implementation, rather than in the declaration. Moreover the words "in accordance with the principles of democracy" were unnecessary, as article 27 covered that basic idea.

Paragraph 2 of the first USSR amendment described a duty of the State towards its citizens and therefore had no place in the draft declaration.

The second USSR amendment mentioned the right to "freedom of thought". Since that right had already been stated in article 16, there was no need to repeat it in article 17.

The other amendments proposed would not improve the basic text of article 17, which he hoped would be adopted.

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) felt that as no human rights were more fundamental than freedom of opinion and expression, it was essential that those rights should be set forth unequivocally. Since the basic text of article 17 achieved that purpose, she supported that draft. She recalled, moreover, that the text was substantially the same as that adopted by the Conference on Freedom of Information and it had consequently already been approved by a large number of Governments.

The wording of the USSR amendments, especially in regard to the interests of national security, might be interpreted to justify repression of the right to freedom of opinion and expression. It was dangerous to try to set forth the purposes for which those rights should be used, for the list could not be complete and the result might be that the basic rights would thereby be undermined. Furthermore, the first sentence of paragraph 1 of the first USSR amendment, while it might have relevance to the document as a whole, was undoubtedly restrictive if used in a particular article. Paragraph 2 of that amendment was plausible at first sight, but in reality it described a method for subjecting the Press to control by the State.

She also opposed the French amendment, which would weaken article 17 by making its meaning less clear.

The Cuban and Panamanian amendments would not improve a text which had already received the most careful consideration of the Sub-Commission on Freedom of Information and the Press, the Conference on Freedom of Information and the Commission on Human Rights.

In reply to the remarks of the USSR representative regarding the Press in the United States, she pointed out that although she did not always approve of all that the Press of her country did, the opinions of the owners of most of the large newspapers could be found on the editorial page only, for such papers were rarely guilty of bias in reporting the actual news. Furthermore, there were many small and completely independent newspapers throughout the country. People in the United States had proved that they could read the news and make up their own minds regardless of the editorial policies of the papers they read. In the final analysis, people in her country controlled the Government and controlled the Press.

Referring to the USSR suggestion that the people should be given the material means for expressing their opinions, she recalled that the presidential election held a short time previously in the United States had been clearly influenced by the labouring classes who were free and able to publish newspapers of their own without help from the Government or any other agency. Those newspapers truly represented the views of the trade unions and of the working man.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium), in reviewing the various amendments, said he did not see the usefulness of either the Cuban or Panamanian amendments.

The French amendment stated a principle with which he agreed but which should be discussed [414] later, in connexion with a general convention on the subject of freedom of information, as it concerned freedom of the Press more particularly than freedom of opinion in general.

The Soviet Union proposal to limit the freedom of opinion and expression by the requirements of national security was an idea which had been thoroughly discussed at the Conference on Freedom of Information. If such a reservation were made, other reservations would also be needed and the article would become far too complicated. He therefore opposed that USSR proposal.

Referring to paragraph 2 of the first USSR amendment, he agreed with the argument against it advanced by the United Kingdom representative. Abuses of the Press resulting from Government control were far more to be feared than abuses resulting from private control.

The second sentence of paragraph 1 of that amendment contained three distinct ideas, as it mentioned fascism, aggression, and hatred as between nations. The latter two were in accordance with the principles of the Charter and were acceptable to the Belgian delegation; but fascism, which he hated as intensely as did the USSR representative, could not be used in a legal document in which it was not clearly defined. That sentence of the USSR amendment should therefore be voted on in parts.

The Belgian delegation approved the basic text of article 17 but thought it would be useful to add a sentence such as the second sentence of paragraph 1 of the first USSR amendment, without, however, the word "fascism".

He agreed with the representative of Czechoslovakia that article 17 should have followed resolution No. 2 of the United Nations Conference on Freedom of Information and have referred to the purposes and principles of the United Nations. He hoped it was not too late for the Czechoslovak representative to present an amendment to that effect.

MR. KAMINSKY (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) supported the USSR amendments; they provided guarantees for freedom of opinion and expression and thus gave the widest interpretation to those freedoms, the development of which would strengthen international collaboration and world peace. Article 17 would be meaningless unless it pointed the way towards the implementation of the rights it proclaimed.

The basic text emphasized the rights of small groups of people, such as newspapermen, rather than the rights of the wider masses. Moreover it did not prevent a renewal of fascism and aggression but gave every opportunity to those who wished to carry on fascist propaganda that would lead to war. In view of the serious weaknesses of the basic article, the USSR amendments which were democratic in substance, were necessary. All delegations who wanted peace, friendship among nations and real freedom would undoubtedly support those amendments.

MR. PLAZA (Venezuela) thought paragraph 1 of the first USSR amendment, by giving details not appropriate in a general declaration of principle, would restrict rather than broaden the scope of article 17. All necessary limitations to the freedom laid down in that article were covered by draft article 27.

Paragraph 2 of that amendment was good in substance but it should not be included in a declaration which set forth the rights of the individual, rather than the obligations of the State.

The French amendment was unnecessary and might lead to a misinterpretation of the original text.

The Venezuelan delegation therefore supported the basic text of article 17.

Summary Record of the Hundred and Twenty-Ninth Meeting
[of the Third Committee]

Held at the Palais de Chaillot, Paris, on Wednesday,
 10 November 1948, at 10:30 a.m.

President: MR. CHARLES MALIK (Lebanon).

MR. GRUMBACH (France) pointed out that, as the representative of the United States had stated at the previous meeting, the Committee was faced with one of the fundamental principles to be set forth in the declaration.

Article 17 had already been the subject of thorough consideration in the course of debates at the United Nations Conference on Freedom of Information, at Geneva,<sup>1</sup> and in the Commission on Human Rights. It was the first time that the article was being discussed by the Third Committee and it would also probably be debated upon at a plenary session of the General Assembly. That should not give rise to astonishment or complaints, as it was certain that the article would bring the Committee face to face with very real difficulties. Representatives were, indeed, more than ever exposed to the danger of using expressions to which different interpretations might be given. It would be a very serious matter to agree on words, only to realize later that those words were being interpreted as meaning the contrary of what the article was supposed to express. Members of the Third Committee had a heavy responsibility and it would be unworthy of them to try to evade explanations.

He agreed that, of all the amendments proposed, the double amendment submitted by the USSR delegation (E/800, pages 33 and 34) was the most important. The USSR delegation should not see any expression of hostility in the attitude of the other delegations towards its amendment, for it was only natural that representatives should raise queries when it was a question of defining such an important right as that of freedom of opinion and expression.

He particularly wished to ask the USSR delegation what it understood by the word "fascism". The Press of certain countries had, in fact, not long previously dubbed as fascists certain persons who did not deserve that epithet. That was a most serious accusation and he was afraid that the second part of the first paragraph of the USSR amendment might give rise to some measure of confusion if it were accepted.

Speaking next on the freedom of the Press, he pointed out that there had always been general agreement that it should have certain limits. The discussion which had taken place in Geneva in April 1948, however, as was shown in a striking manner by the record of the meeting held on 7 April 1948 by the Conference on Freedom of Information,<sup>1</sup> had proved to what extent one and the same idea could be differently interpreted by various delegations.

It was for that reason that his delegation, though it agreed that the USSR amendment contained ideas which were perfectly acceptable, could not give its support to a text the drafting of which was insufficiently clear and might in the future give rise to confusion.

MR. CONTOUMAS (Greece) associated himself with the objections which had been made previously against some of the amendments to article 17 and particularly against the amendment submitted by the USSR.

He then pointed out that in his opinion the French text of article 17, contained a drafting error. The words par quelque moyen d'expression que ce soit referred in fact to the rights to seek (chercher), receive (recevoir) and impart (faire connaître) information, whereas logically they could only refer to the right to impart (faire connaître) information.

The English text more correctly employed the term "media" which could be applied to all three ideas.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) stated that the various criticisms made in the course of the previous meeting and during the current meeting had sufficiently convinced him that it would be preferable to accept the basic text of article 17.

He wished, however, to call the Committee's attention to a danger to which the first USSR amendment might give rise, were it adopted. That danger had not yet been mentioned. It was, nevertheless, a very real one as it might affect the very principle of the right to freedom of thought and of expression. In effect, according to the first sentence of the USSR amendment, the backing of the law would not be guaranteed for the various media of freedom of expression unless those media had as their aim to serve the cause of international co-operation and peace. To accept that text would be to accept making an inalienable right of the individual dependent on ends which should themselves be dependent on that right, for the primary aim of international co-operation and peace should be to guarantee that all men enjoyed their inalienable rights.

MR. WATT (Australia) said that he would limit his remarks to certain fundamental questions.

He reminded the meeting that, at the time of the Conference on Freedom of Information at Geneva, two schools of thought had existed: one maintained the need for absolute freedom while the other put the stress on responsibility and tended to strengthen measures of control. The latter argument, while recognizing the right to freedom of information, desired a stipulation that it should serve definite ends, and considered that, apart from the pursuit of democratic aims, full freedom should not be allowed and that it was desirable to take measures against any abuse. Generally speaking, delegations were ready to agree to certain restrictions; in one of its proposals, the United States had itself suggested certain restrictions, on obscene publications, for instance. Unfortunately, delegations had not been able to reach agreement, except on the question of warmongers.

In that connexion, he recalled that the USSR delegation was not alone in considering that question which, by virtue of Article 1 of the Charter, was of primary importance in the United Nations, which had already condemned incitement to war and stressed the need to continue to combat warmongers in resolution 110(II) of the General Assembly, as well as in resolution No. 2 of the United Nations Conference on Freedom of Information.

Although, however, Members of the United Nations had more than once expressed their unanimity in condemning incitement to war, they had not been able to reach agreement on the way to settle that problem. His delegation, for its part, did not think that to establish censorship was all that was needed to remedy that evil. In its view, the most effective method of combating warmongering propaganda was to facilitate the propagation of truthful news.

Analysing the amendment submitted by the USSR delegation (E/800, page 34), he stated that his delegation could not accept the change which the USSR proposed to make in article 17 if its first amendment were not accepted by the Committee. The text which the USSR proposed to substitute contained, in effect, a limiting clause which, by making freedom of information dependent on interests of national security, did, in point of fact, give Governments the possibility of establishing extensive censorship.

Neither could his delegation accept the first paragraph of the first USSR amendment (E/800, page 33) which contained some terms, the definition of which had in no way been agreed upon.

His delegation thought that such an important right as that which article 17 was to proclaim should be stated with the maximum of brevity and simplicity and should not be weakened by an enumeration of its limitations and the exceptions to it.

His delegation would, therefore, vote in favour of the text drawn up by the Commission on Human Rights and approved by the fifty-four nations which had met at Geneva for the Conference on Freedom of Information.

MR. DEMCHENKO (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) agreed that article 17 was of very great importance in the declaration since it proclaimed freedom of thought and of expression.

Referring to the basic text of that article he was of opinion that not only did that text not safeguard freedom of the Press but it did not even mention it. Certain delegations considered that text a satisfactory compromise because it had been approved by the Conference on Freedom of Information and adopted by the Human Rights Commission.

His delegation, however, thought that article 17, in its basic form, was meaningless and even contrary to the spirit of the Charter since it did not take into account the principle of national sovereignty. Indeed, the expression "through any media" could be interpreted as meaning that any methods could be resorted to, including dishonest practices such as blackmail, calumny and intimidation, in order to receive and impart information and ideas. It was for that reason that, in his delegation's view, it was essential that methods for seeking and imparting information and ideas should be compatible with the requirements of national security. The expression "through any media" went too far and laid a false interpretation on the real meaning of freedom of thought and expression.

Moreover, he was afraid that the text of article 17 might be too confused and incomprehensible to the average man for whom the declaration was intended.

Emphasizing the fact that only the law could guarantee for every individual the benefit of freedom of thought and expression, he added that it should not be possible for that freedom to be used for fascist propaganda and aggressive aims or to incite hatred among nations. The Committee should, therefore, adopt the USSR amendment worded to that effect.

He expressed his astonishment at the stand taken by the United States representative who blamed the USSR amendment for being restrictive. He pointed out that the only restrictions which could be found in that amendment were related to the propagation of fascism, acts of aggression and hatred between nations.

Replying to the Belgian representative who, while expressing his hatred of fascism, was not aware of any legal definition of the term, he enjoined the Committee not to be content with words or half-measures. The declaration should specifically abolish the danger of fascism.

As to the imparting of ideas and information, his delegation was convinced that opinions could not be freely expressed in a Press entirely dominated by private ownership and trusts. Only the participation of the Government in the activities of the Press could guarantee absolute freedom of expression. In that connexion, the representative of the Philippines seemed to have a better opinion of the United States Press than Mrs. Roosevelt herself, who had admitted in effect that certain articles in the United States Press, and leading articles in particular, put forward the views of the paper's owner. Assuming that another part of those articles was reserved for trusts, monopolies and capitalist enterprises in general, [419] he wondered what place the opinion of the working classes and the poor had in the United States Press.

In conclusion, his delegation unreservedly supported the amendment submitted by the USSR delegation.

MR. COROMINAS (Argentina) emphasized the fact that article 17 was perhaps the most important of the whole declaration, for without it the individual would be deprived of freedom of expression, which was his most effective weapon for defending democratic institutions and the very principles on which the declaration was based.

The amendment submitted by the Cuban delegation (A/C.3/232) was, in his delegation's view, an admirable synthesis of the freedoms which article 17 would protect: freedom to seek and to impart information, making for the intellectual, spiritual and professional development of the individual; and freedom of opinion and expression, which was essential for the free exchange of ideas, itself a sign of progress.

Nothing could affect the right to freedom of thought, which would always exist even if a stranglehold were kept on it by some external force. The expression of that thought could, however, be checked and that had to be prevented. He was afraid that the amendments proposed to article 17 might limit freedom of expression in one way or another. The recognition of that right would, on the contrary, be strengthened if the Committee agreed to the Cuban amendment.

MISS KALINOWSKA (Poland) stressed the fact that all the resolutions adopted by the United Nations in connexion with incitement to war and the propagation of tendentious news had, as their primary aim, the establishment of responsibility.

If the amendment submitted by the USSR delegation emphasized that aspect of the problem, it was because of its importance with relation to freedom of information, especially if abuses committed in the name of that liberty were to be avoided. The question had already been discussed at length and the need to go into the subject again was to be deplored. Those who were fighting against incitement to hatred and who were fighting for peace would not abandon their efforts, however, and they could not be blamed for that.

The USSR amendment (E/800, page 33) aimed at ensuring the exercise of the right of freedom of expression, in accordance with democratic principles and in the interests of world peace. It also aimed at preventing the propagation of fascism, aggression and hatred.

In Nazi Germany, monstrous crimes had indeed been committed without a definition existing in the world of what it had been decided to call “genocide” and in spite of the fact that that type of crime had not been legally recognized. In the same way, it seemed of little use to define what was meant by “fascism” each time that word was mentioned. During the war waged against fascism, the Allies knew very well what that word meant.

The second paragraph of the USSR amendment dealt with the principle of equality. The Press, the radio and the cinema were powerful means of propaganda, and it was a well known fact that in [420] capitalist countries, they were subsidized by large commercial enterprises. Calling to account the freedom of the American Press, in defence of which the United States representative had spoken at the 128th meeting, she said that the newspapers of the workers’ Press were not widely on sale, whereas copies of Time and Life<sup>97</sup> were to be found in the smallest towns.

It had been admitted at the Conference on Freedom of Information that the remedy to such a state of affairs lay in granting State aid to the various groups of society. Replying to the United States representative, who had expressed doubts as to the way in which such aid would be carried out and as to the control thus exercised by the State, she explained that such an organization existed in her own country where the State did not control, but did offer constructive assistance to, various groups: trade unions, women’s organizations, professional associations, artistic groups etc. In the United Kingdom itself, the example of the BBC could be cited to prove that radio benefited through not being a private enterprise.

The material aid provided for in paragraph 2 was also aimed at improving the status of artists, writers, musicians and painters who suffered from the commercial regime under which they existed in most countries.

Her delegation would therefore give its wholehearted support to the amendment submitted by the USSR delegation.

<sup>97</sup> Life was a weekly newsmagazine published by Henry Luce from 1936 until 1972, and then sporadically afterwards. It had a circulation that exceeded 10 million copies.

MR. RADEVANOVIC (Yugoslavia) drew the Committee's attention to an important omission in article 17; it would be filled by the USSR amendment.

Pointing out that the declaration was not a document with force of law, which would be applied as such by the States, he claimed that the general ideas contained in it should be their guide. There was even some truth in the view, voiced by some representatives, that the declaration was a profession of faith, a common philosophy of human rights.

The Committee was at work after a frightful war, the causes and aims of which were well known. The declaration should not pass over in silence the danger to international peace and civilization which propagating fascism and aggression and provoking hatred as between the nations constituted, nor should it fail to condemn such propaganda and such provocation.

The Yugoslav delegation saw no restriction of the freedom of the Press in a condemnation of that kind. Freedom of opinion and expression was not merely an individual human right; it contributed to moulding public opinion, and thus affected the common weal and the peace of society. The whole world, understanding as it did the extreme peril of certain ideas and activities which constituted a threat to peace and international co-operation, demanded that the declaration should make no parallel between such activities and the exercise of a legitimate human right.

The Yugoslav delegation rejected any idea that the individual should be granted the right to sow hatred as between the nations and to instigate [421] aggression and war. The question before the Committee was not one of mere detail which could be left to national law to decide, but of a statement of principle. It was true that national law would have to put those principles into effect in each country, but the declaration must lay down principles of international scope. To condemn fascism was certainly not anti-democratic; but it would be anti-democratic to tolerate fascism and encourage its spread.

Paragraph 2 of the USSR amendment aimed at abolishing the abuses of the commercial Press which had become a monopoly controlled by high finance, and at granting material assistance to the democratic Press; it thus completed the text of article 17.

The Yugoslav delegation would, therefore, vote for that amendment.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) regretted that he had so little time to reply to the remarks made by several representatives about the USSR amendment.

The views of the Belgian and French representatives had surprised him; they had rejected the mention of fascism in article 17 under the pretext that there existed no legal definition of that term. Countries which had suffered occupation by the Axis forces had no need for a legalistic definition to tell them the nature of the horrors of fascism. Mr. Grumbach had been only too well aware of it during the years when the Red Army was fighting fiercely against that ghastly ideology. Only three and a half years after the end of the war he seemed to have forgotten.

Describing fascism as the bloody dictatorship of the most reactionary section of capitalism and monopolies, Mr. Pavlov pointed out that the Yalta and Potsdam Conferences had defined the meaning of the word. He could not credit the sincerity of the arguments which had attempted to justify the refusal to write a condemnation of fascism into article 17. To fight fascism in the Press was not enough; other and stronger methods were needed.

Replying to the representative of the United States, who had stated that the Press in the USSR was subject to governmental control and censorship, Mr. Pavlov pointed out that newspapers in his country had a printing run totalling 27 million copies and that most of them were exempt from any kind of State control.

THE CHAIRMAN said that in accordance with the Committee's decision to restrict the length of interventions (108th meeting), he must cut the representative of the USSR short.

He declared the list of speakers closed and called upon the Committee to vote on article 17.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) asked the representative of the USSR whether he would accept the following sentence in substitution for the second part of paragraph 1 in his amendment:

“No one shall abuse these freedoms by instigating aggression or hatred as between the nations or by opposing the aims and principles of the United Nations.”

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that he was sorry that he could not accept the Belgian representative's suggestion, because he believed that his own amendment answered a definite purpose. If his amendment were not adopted, however, he would be prepared to vote for the text which the representative of Belgium had read, if he formally proposed that it should be adopted.

Mr. Pavlov asked that his amendment should be put to the vote in parts. He requested that each of the sentences which made up paragraph 1 should be voted upon separately, by roll-call.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) recalled that at the previous meeting his delegation had expressed the wish that the vote on the second sentence of paragraph 1 of the USSR amendment should be taken separately on each of the three ideas contained in it.

MR. KAMINSKY (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) requested that each of those three votes should be taken by roll-call.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the first sentence of paragraph 1 of the USSR amendment (E/800, page 33).

The vote was taken by roll-call, as follows:

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote paragraph 2 of the USSR amendment.

Paragraph 2 was rejected by 34 votes to 8, with 4 abstentions.

MR. SAINT-LOT (Haiti) reminded the Committee that his delegation had always fought in the United Nations for the uncompromising application of the principle of non-discrimination. To his regret, he had not, therefore, been able to vote for the adoption of that part of paragraph 1 of the USSR amendment which read to the effect that freedom of speech and the Press should not be used “for purposes of propagating fascism”; adoption of a clause of that sort would have permitted the United Nations to set up a form of discrimination so vaguely defined that it might be feared that it would open the way to all other forms of discrimination proscribed by Article 2 of the United Nations Charter.

The Haitian delegation had voted, however, for all other parts of paragraph 1 because their [424] intention had been to eliminate every source of international discord – and that was fully in accordance with the aims of the United Nations.

His delegation had also voted for paragraph 2 of the USSR amendment because it coincided in all points with the Haitian idea of democracy and of the State’s duties towards the underprivileged.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) explained that, for general reasons, his delegation had voted against the USSR amendment on the principle that it was not appropriate in the declaration to balance the statement of a right with that of the duties incumbent on the State.

Moreover, his delegation had been led particularly to vote against the second part of the first paragraph because of the incomplete and consequently unacceptable enumeration it contained; his delegation considered in fact that in addition to fascism there existed Nazism and other political theories equally dangerous to human dignity.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) said that his delegation was opposed to the adoption of the second part of the first paragraph of the USSR amendment for the reasons which had already been stated by several delegations. It had, however, abstained from taking part in the three separate votes occasioned by that sentence since it thought it could not pronounce itself against each of the ideas when expressed separately. It was in respect of the restrictive character of the whole clause that his delegation would have wished to mark its disapprobation.

Moreover, article 28 of the draft declaration stipulated that “Nothing in this Declaration shall imply the recognition of the right of any State or person to engage in any activity aimed at the destruction of any of the rights and freedoms prescribed herein.” Since all totalitarian regimes tended to promote the establishment of conditions contrary to the provisions of article 28, the fact that the USSR amendment only mentioned the necessity of combating fascism constituted a grave omission, which his delegation could not accept.

MRS. CORBET (United Kingdom) said her delegation had voted against the second part of the first paragraph of the USSR amendment, not because it did not approve its principle – on the contrary – but because it considered that its place was not in article 17. The general provisions of article 27 and the very spirit of the Charter of the United Nations were, moreover, sufficient to ensure for the individual the guarantees which the USSR delegation had felt obliged to state in its amendment.

MR. APPADORAI (India) said his delegation had voted against the first paragraph of the USSR amendment for the reasons which the United Kingdom representative had just given.

MR. CONTOUMAS (Greece) said also that while agreeing on the substance of the USSR amendment, his delegation had been led to reject it mainly in order to preserve so far as possible the [425] text submitted by the Commission on Human Rights. Nor was that the only reason.

The text proposed by the USSR delegation contained terms on the definition of which the delegations – as shown by the general discussion – were not in agreement: thus, for some, the term fascist applied to the majority of regimes excluding the so-called popular democracies, while for others, it extended to communist dictatorships.

MR. WATT (Australia) pointed out that his delegation had already urged that the second sentence of the first paragraph of the USSR amendment should not figure in article 17.

The vote in parts had placed the majority of the delegations in a difficult position by submitting for their decision ideas acceptable in themselves but which they could not approve when placed in their true setting. His delegation had, therefore, abstained from voting, considering that the question which the Committee should really have been called upon to settle was whether restrictions of the kind proposed by the USSR delegation should or should not be introduced in that paragraph.

MR. CARRERA ANDRADE (Ecuador) stated that his delegation had voted in favour of the USSR amendment, because, apart from its value in itself, that amendment condemned any propaganda for fascism, or propaganda which would provoke hatred as between nations and above all, because it contained an explicit condemnation of fascism.

In voting in favour of the amendment, the delegation of Ecuador had only expressed the heartfelt sentiments of the people of Ecuador.

MR. BAROODY (Saudi Arabia) stressed the fact that he had voted for the prohibition to use the freedom of the Press in order to provoke hatred as between nations, because he esteemed that any negative attitude concerning that essential principle was criminal, whatever the reasons which might be invoked to justify such an attitude.

He had, on the other hand, abstained in connexion with the prohibition to use the Press for purposes of propagating fascism because he considered that the term "fascism", like that of democracy, was too liable to different interpretations to be used in a legal document.

MR. GRUMBACH (France) stated that his delegation had abstained when the USSR amendment was voted upon, although it was in agreement with all the ideas on which the Committee had been asked to state its opinion.

His attitude had been prompted by the fact that he could not accept the explanations given by the USSR representative, particularly his definition of fascism. To that definition, the French delegation wished to oppose the following: "A totalitarian, one-party regime which excludes any participation of the opposition in the Government, all real freedom of opposition, and which employs censorship in time of peace".

Mr. Grumbach pointed out to the USSR representative that he did not think that he had forgotten [426] what exactly was meant by fascism; his definition, on the contrary, appeared to him to have undergone less change than Mr. Pavlov's had done.

MR. KURAL (Turkey) explained that his delegation had voted against the USSR amendment because it considered that it was out of place in article 17, although it had no objection to the ideas which it contained.

The word "fascism", as had been seen, was difficult to define and subject to various interpretations. As to questions concerning aggression and incitement of hatred, Mr. Kural did not think they were in their proper place in the article under discussion, although naturally he approved the principles.

In that connexion he wished to remind the meeting that the incitement of aggression and hatred had been expressly condemned in several texts of the United Nations, in the adoption of which the Turkish delegation had always taken part.

MR. CHOUDHARY (Pakistan) fully endorsed the observations made by the representative of Saudi Arabia concerning the USSR amendment.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that the USSR delegation, having fought for the adoption of its amendment, wished to point out that it was easier to explain the reasons for its rejection than to justify them.

He regretted, in particular, that the Committee had not seen fit to maintain the mention of incitement to hatred, although there had been 19 votes in its favour and 19 against. Public opinion would certainly appraise correctly the attitude of certain delegations. Those who had voted against the truly democratic idea contained in that phrase had thereby recorded their unwillingness to oppose propaganda the purpose of which was to provoke hatred as between nations.

In reply to THE CHAIRMAN, who requested him to confine his remarks to an explanation of his vote, MR. PAVLOV asked at least to be permitted to say to the French representative that the USSR had deviated less than any other nation from the true concept of democracy as interpreted by the Allies during the war.

MR. CAÑAS (Costa Rica) explained the reasons which had moved his delegation to vote against the USSR amendment.

It had voted against the first sentence of paragraph 1 because it considered the wording less satisfactory than that of the original text and because the sentence contained a legal provision implying that the exercise of the right granted would depend on the will of the State.

His delegation had voted against the second sentence of paragraph 1 although it fully shared the ideas expressed – because the term “fascism” was not satisfactorily defined, a fact which robbed the condemnation of all force.

MR. CAÑAS pointed out that he knew of no Government at that time which did not lay claim to [427] being a democratic Government; the term “fascist” could consequently be applied to all those who opposed the authorities in power: it was easy to foresee the possible consequences of such a definition in the field of information and the Press.

It was in order to prevent that situation from arising that the Costa Rican delegation had voted against paragraph 1 of the USSR amendment.

It had voted against the mention of incitement to hatred because that mention served no useful purpose. Obviously, a Government which had decided upon a course of aggression would take no measures to prevent the organs of the Press from provoking hatred and inciting to war; quite on the contrary. The Costa Rican delegation had, therefore, been unable to support a statement which it could not but consider purely platonic.

The same remarks applied to paragraph 2 of the USSR amendment; any Government which wished to favour the newspapers that supported its policy to the detriment of the opposition Press could always claim that the latter was fascist.

MR. INSFRAN (Paraguay) explained that his delegation had voted against the USSR amendment although the ideas it contained, voted separately, were in no way objectionable. The delegation of Paraguay had been unable to support the separate elements of a proposal which was unacceptable as a whole because it was contrary to the purpose of article 17.

MR. DE LA OSSA (Panama) felt it was necessary to separate the references to freedom of opinion and expression, but as the majority of the Committee was opposed to his amendment (A/C.3/280), he withdrew it.

THE CHAIRMAN put the Cuban amendment (A/C.3/232) to the vote.

That amendment was rejected by 25 votes to 5, with 5 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN then put to the vote the following part of the second USSR amendment (E/800, page 34): “wherein is included freedom of conviction and freedom of access to sources of information and means of communication for the transmission of information in the territory of his own country and also in other countries”.

That part was rejected by 20 votes to 6, with 10 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN then put to the vote the following part of the second USSR amendment: “within limits corresponding to the interests of national security”.

That part was rejected by 22 votes to 9, with 5 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put the French amendment (A/C.3/244/Rev.1) to the vote.

That amendment was rejected by 18 votes to 8, with 9 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put article 17 as a whole to the vote.

Article 17 was adopted by 36 votes to 6.

MR. ORIBE (Uruguay) said he had voted for article 17, on the understanding that it did not authorize censorship, or any form of State interference, in peacetime.

Experience had shown that the State, by supplying newsprint and other material resources, could manoeuvre itself into the position of being the sole source of information.

MR. CONTOUMAS (Greece) had voted for article 17 on the basis of the English text, in the hope that the drafting sub-committee would delete the word d'expression after moyen in the French text.

MR. GRUMBACH (France) had voted for article 17, but had also voted for the French amendment which was in conformity with article 11 of the French Declaration of the Rights of Man and of the Citizen. He realized that other representatives had not been able to accept the French amendment because of the fear that it would be abused.

MR. RADEVANOVIC (Yugoslavia) had voted against article 17 because it contained no safeguards against warmongering and the growth of fascism.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) explained why he had voted against article 17. His delegation had submitted a substitute text (E/800, page 33) which would have insured that freedom of opinion and expression, and of the Press, would not be used to promote fascism and hatred between nations. Those freedoms, in other words, would have been subordinated to democratic principles.

The USSR amendment had also proposed that the masses should be allowed freely to express their views and to that end, should be given the necessary material resources. Finally, it had suggested an additional clause with a view to abolishing warmongering and pornography.

As it read, article 17 would be interpreted as a direct encouragement to the development of fascism and the propagation of aggression. It would permit Press agents to carry out harmful activities in the countries in which they were located and instead of strengthening international goodwill, would be used as a cover for war propaganda.

MR. DEMCHENKO (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist, Republic) had voted against article 17 because, instead of guaranteeing the basic rights of free-[429]dom of opinion and expression, it was inadequately drafted and would allow fascists and warmongers to continue their propaganda. That propaganda was being encouraged by certain Governments and the article, as it read, would permit interference in the internal affairs of sovereign States.

MR. KAMINSKY (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) said he had voted against article 17 for the reasons he had given previously and for those put forward by the USSR representative.

Article 18<sup>1</sup>

THE CHAIRMAN noted that the basic text of article 18 and the amendments to it were recapitulated in document A/C.3/295/Rev.1.

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) said her amendment (A/C.3/223) would make no substantial change in the article and merely stressed the desirability of the group defence of rights. On further consideration, her delegation had decided to withdraw the amendment and to support the terse and compact original text.

Three of the amendments to article 18, if adopted, would destroy its succinct character and, as she had pointed out before, it was easy to distort the basic rights of the declaration by stressing either the affirmative purposes or the negative limitations of those rights.

In regard to the USSR amendment (E/800, page 34), she said that it did not seem possible that phrases such as “in the interests of democracy” or “fascist or anti-democratic nature” could be used to justify the repression of free assembly and free association. Further, as the amendment was drafted, it was more an expression of the State’s obligation than a declaration of an individual right.

In her opinion, the Cuban (A/C.3/232) and Panamanian (A/C.3/280) amendments were too detailed and the Uruguayan amendment (A/C.3/268) seemed to be covered by the provisions of article 27.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) considered his amendment (A/C.3/232) more logical than the basic text because it separated the two rights contained therein, in the manner followed by most of the constitutions of Member States. One of those rights was permanent, while the other was exercised from time to time.

The right to hold an informal gathering was stressed, as was also the existence of a “common interest of any nature”.

In his opinion, it was necessary also to state the right of workers to associate together to protect their legitimate interests, as that right was not recognized in many countries.

He supported the Uruguayan amendment, the first part of which was in accordance with the

Cuban amendment and the second part of which was implicit in the terms of article 16.

The Panamanian amendment was acceptable, but to his mind, was less clear than the Cuban amendment.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that article 18 should include more than a general declaration of rights, and in conformity with the position always taken by his delegation, proposed means by which those rights could be guaranteed. Further, the right to freedom of assembly had to be broadened and it had to be used to protect the democratic way of life. All gatherings of an anti-democratic nature should be forbidden by law.

The text submitted to the Commission by the Drafting Committee<sup>1</sup> had more closely resembled the USSR amendment than the basic text before the Committee, but it had been emasculated by the adoption of an amendment from the Chinese delegation.<sup>2</sup> It was evident that there was a tendency to reduce to a minimum any reference to democratic rights and freedoms and to exclude any provision designed to prevent the development of fascism, which was endangering world peace and security.

Three and a half years had passed since major and smaller Powers alike had been united in the struggle against Nazism and fascism; a number of documents bore witness to that unity of purpose. The USSR, unlike so many of her allies, was still faithful to the objectives of those documents and to the United Nations Charter, in particular.

He drew attention to the situation in Western Germany, where the military potential was being developed and fascist organizations were making their appearance. Those facts had to be faced and steps taken to ensure that the monster of fascism did not arise again. With that end in view, any incipient fascist activities had to be curbed from the very start. The right to freedom of assembly must not be allowed to be abused by the fascist elements which existed in almost every European country, except those with a people's democracy, which guarded against them by law.

The purpose of the USSR amendment was to guarantee the right to freedom of assembly to democratic forces and to exclude the possibility of the abuse of that right by fascist elements.

MR. DE LA OSSA (Panama) did not believe that the conciseness of the basic text was sufficient reason for ignoring worthwhile amendments.

He withdrew the Panamanian amendment (A/C.3/280) in favour of the amendment put forward by the Cuban delegation.

MR. ORIBE (Uruguay) recognized the need to have legal texts drafted as concisely as possible, but felt that that did not exclude the possibility of broadening the article by the addition of an adjective. It was true that article 27 referred to the requirements of public order, but to complete the meaning of article 18, so that it would be understandable to the ordinary man, he felt it was necessary to insert the word "peaceful" before "assembly".

The Uruguayan amendment (A/C.3/268) might be covered to a certain extent by the provisions of article 27, but he did not consider it redundant to state that everyone was free to belong to an association or free not to. Recent history had shown that even in highly developed countries that particular right was not always respected. It was useful, therefore, for article 18 to state it expressly.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) considered the freedoms set forth in article 18 the most sympathetic of all those for which men had fought and died. The rights to freedom of assembly and association were an essential part of the life of the State and society.

From the point of view of constitutional law, article 18 was undoubtedly too concise. It did not state whether the individual had the right to freedom of peaceful, or of armed, assembly; or whether such assembly must be public or could be private. The Belgian Constitution contained a much clearer definition of that particular right. The right to freedom of association, likewise, was not clearly defined. For those reasons it seemed obvious that every delegation would be able to accept article 18; he therefore supported it.

He could not accept the USSR amendment. It contained a reference to national legislation which was inappropriate in an international declaration, as he had stated many times before. Nor could he accept the reference to fascism, for the reasons he had given at the 128th meeting. The USSR representative's statement on his amendment had contained some good and true points, in particular with respect to conditions in Western Germany. His amendment, however, did not correspond to those remarks.

The Cuban amendment contained certain irrelevancies. It was not necessary to refer to "common interest" and the word "legitimate" would have no clear meaning unless defined.

From the point of view of democratic processes and especially as regarded trade union rights, he supported the Uruguayan amendment. He suggested, however, that the word pacifiques, in the French text, should be substituted for paisibles, and that in the French text the proposed addition to paragraph 2 should read as follows: "Nul ne peut être obligé de faire partie d'une association."

MR. ORIBE (Uruguay) explained that the Belgian representative's drafting suggestions were incorporated in the original Spanish text of the Uruguayan amendment.

MR. SAINT-LOT (Haiti) pointed out that the declaration, when finally adopted, would be regarded as a kind of super-constitutional document. How then would the terms of article 18 be recon-[432]ciled with the penal codes of the various Member States, the larger concept of an international declaration of human rights with the requirements of public order?

In every country, there were associations of evil-doers and what would happen when they justified their activities under the terms of article 18? It was unfortunate that the Panamanian representative had withdrawn his amendment, for as the article then read, organizations such as the Ku Klux Klan<sup>99</sup> could find in the declaration a legitimate reason for their existence. What would be the use of national laws, if there was a higher authority to which such organizations could appeal?

He regretted that the United States representative had withdrawn her amendment. Had she not done so, he would have begged her to delete the word "especially". In that way, such organizations would not have been able to make use of the provisions of article 18. As he was not permitted to submit a new amendment at that time, he would raise the question in the General Assembly.

In reply to a point raised by the representative of Haiti, the Chairman recalled that the draft declaration had been submitted to all Member States of the United Nations and the comments of governments had been solicited. During the previous two years, States not members of the Commission on Human Rights had therefore had the opportunity – of which many had taken full advantage – of making clear their position on the various articles. That fact justified limiting the current debate on the document.

THE CHAIRMAN also drew the Haitian representative's attention to article 28 of the draft declaration, which, if read in connexion with article 18, would perhaps dissipate some of his fears regarding the latter. The declaration must be read as a whole; only thus could it be correctly understood.

MR. SAINT-LOT (Haiti), after thanking the Chairman for his explanations, pointed out that if the meaning of each article could not be understood without reference to other parts of the declaration, the document would not be simple enough to be understood by all peoples throughout the world.

MR. COROMINAS (Argentina) thought the basic text of article 18 was not sufficiently precise; it was schematic, as the Belgian representative had pointed out. The result was that it had no real meaning.

Nothing was said of the purpose for which persons might assemble or form associations; yet a specific statement of that nature was necessary. It was important to specify, for example, that every person had the right to associate with others to promote or protect such legitimate interests as trade union interests, especially since that right was at that time denied by certain Governments.

The Argentine delegation supported the Cuban draft amendment, which clarified the great concepts of freedom of assembly and association. The amendment was based on a similar article in the [433] Bogotá Declaration and would undoubtedly receive the support of the American States which had adopted that Declaration.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) pointed out that article 18 was intended to cover both the right to freedom of assembly and association and the right of the individual freely to participate in a meeting or belong to an association. The English and French drafts of the article did not make both of those rights clear; each text stressed, in fact, only one of the rights. The French text set forth the right of the individual to participate in meetings or associations, but there was no guarantee that the assembly or association would itself be allowed. Moreover, the individual's freedom as regards membership in an association was not specified. The English text, on the other hand, guaranteed freedom of assembly and association but did not cover the right of the individual to take part in, or belong to, the assembly or association.

The Lebanese delegation did not favour the basic text, yet it was not in a position to present a substitute draft.

The Cuban and Panamanian amendments were designed to correct the defects of the Commission's text. Although certain improvements might be made in the Cuban amendment, it was generally acceptable, for it stated clearly both the rights with which the article was concerned.

Referring to the USSR amendment, he said that it would be contrary to the spirit of the declaration to say that the inherent right of freedom of assembly and association should be dependent on "the interests of democracy". That phrase would be acceptable only if the word "democracy" could be interpreted to mean respect for human rights; but if the phrase had that meaning it was obviously unnecessary.

He was glad that the Chairman had drawn attention to draft article 28 which should be considered in connexion with the objections to article 18 raised by the USSR and Haitian representatives. Those objections would be even more fully met if a draft article 29 as proposed by the Lebanese delegation (A/C.3/262) were adopted.

MR. GRUMBACH (France) agreed with the criticisms of article 18 made by the Lebanese representative. That draft did not clearly affirm the rights to freedom of assembly and association, and his delegation would therefore favour some amendments to it.

Speaking of the first part of the Cuban amendment, he thought that both formal public meetings and informal private gatherings should be mentioned, but did not think the phrase "in connexion with matters of common interest of any nature" should be included. As the Belgian representative had said, meetings might be held in connexion with matters which were not necessarily of common interest.

In the second part of the Cuban amendment the word "legitimate" was ill-chosen, for the reasons explained by the Belgian representative. The enumeration of the interests for the protection of which associations might be formed was perhaps somewhat dangerous, as all enumerations were, but it did in fact seem to cover all the essential points.

The second part of the Uruguayan amendment presented a valuable addition to the text, which should be adopted.

MR. BARODY (Saudi Arabia) asked that a member of the Commission should explain to the Committee why the Commission had decided not to elaborate the rights set forth in article 18. In other articles of the draft declaration comparable or equally important rights had been explained in greater detail, as for example the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion mentioned in article 16.

He observed that amendments designed to bring the various articles into closer conformity with cultures other than the Western should not be rejected merely on the grounds that the text should be as succinct and concise as possible. If that reasoning held there, it should have been applied in the consideration of article 16.

MR. MENCEL (Poland) considered the basic draft of article 18 abstract and inadequate. In his own country the important rights of assembly and association were not only recognized but also guaranteed by law. Article 18 would represent a step backward if it made no provisions for guaranteeing the rights it set forth.

A text should be adopted that would lead to laws guaranteeing the rights to assembly and association in all countries, and in Non-Self-Governing and Trust Territories as well. It should moreover be one that would prevent the persecution of individuals for belonging to cultural or intellectual groups, such as that carried on by the Committee on Un-American Activities in the United States. Furthermore, it should contain specific provisions against organizations of a fascist or anti-democratic nature.

Since the USSR amendment provided in concrete terms for the necessary legal guarantees of the freedom of assembly and association as well as for guarantees against abuses of that freedom, the Polish delegation would support it.

MR. PLAZA (Venezuela) was in favour of the Cuban amendment to article 18. There was a difference between freedom of assembly and freedom of association; the latter contained an idea of permanence that was not to be found in the former. The Bogotá declaration took that difference into account by adopting two separate articles for the two separate rights. The Cuban amendment followed the same principle; yet it included nothing that was contrary to the ideas in the basic text of article 18.

He also supported the Uruguayan proposal that no one should be compelled to belong to an association.

He did not agree with the USSR draft amendment; the words “fascism” and “anti-democratic” should not be used in a legal document since they had not been defined. They might even be interpreted in such a way as to lead to a violation of the rights proclaimed.

MR. ANZE MATIENZO (Bolivia) thought the concise form of article 18, far from constituting a reason for criticism, was in fact highly commendable. The Bolivian delegation therefore supported the basic text, but with the addition of the Uruguayan amendments which were needed to complete the article.

Speaking of the USSR amendment, he was opposed to any restriction on the right of freedom of assembly and association. His country had felt the effects of Nazism and fascism, but it believed that the surest way to cure those evils was to ensure basic freedom. Free human beings always tended towards good and repudiated evil. Moreover, the word “fascism” was difficult to define and its inclusion in article 18 might lead to abuses.

MR. DEMCHENKO (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) stressed the fact that the freedoms laid down in article 18 were still not universally recognized. The struggles to obtain them had gone on for centuries and were still continuing. In a memorandum of the World Federation of Trade Unions to the Economic and Social Council at its seventh session, it had been shown that eleven countries, Members of the United Nations, violated the basic right of association of trade unions.<sup>1</sup>

Further, in many countries leaders of organizations interested in the cultural development of the working classes had been persecuted and the members dispersed.

The basic text of article 18 would not lead to changes in the deplorable conditions still existing in some countries. The USSR amendment, however, was designed legally to guarantee the right to the elementary freedom of assembly and association. Moreover, whereas the basic text would actually make possible associations that were anti-democratic in character, the USSR amendment would forbid such associations. In that respect, it would satisfy the point raised by the Haitian representative. Finally, the USSR amendment would clarify the meaning of the whole article and would state the purpose for which the rights were to be used.

The Ukrainian delegation would therefore support the USSR amendment.

MRS. CORBET (United Kingdom) thought that article 18 was one of the simplest and most direct articles of the declaration and that there was no need to attempt to improve it.

It had been asked why article 16 elaborated the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion, while article 18 did not explain the rights laid down therein. The rights in article 16 had not been so well defined in history as the rights in article 18 and it therefore seemed necessary to be more explicit in proclaiming the former.

Speaking of the first part of the Cuban amendment she saw no advantage in trying to separate the right to assembly from the right to association; not only were the two very closely connected, but no more would be achieved by separating them than would be achieved by the original text. The mention of formal public meetings or informal gatherings in the Cuban text also seemed unnecessary, for both kinds of meetings were implicit in the words used in the basic text of article 18. Further, the phrase "in connexion with matters of common interest" was not advisable, for sometimes matters not of that nature might be involved. Such a phrase therefore would seem to restrict rather than broaden the text of article 18. Finally the use of the word "peaceably" in the Cuban amendment was unnecessary since that idea was adequately covered by article 27.

The second part of the Cuban proposal attempted to give in detail the kinds of interest in the promotion or protection of which associations could be formed. In order not to omit some point, the words "or other nature" had been added. Thus no purpose was served by the enumeration. The basic text seemed simpler and better.

The USSR amendment was unacceptable to the United Kingdom delegation since it would frustrate the very purpose of article 18. In the USSR it was the practice of the Government to suppress any society or association that was opposed to or criticized the Communist Party. The purpose of the USSR amendment seemed to be to ensure that such a situation could continue. A further objection to the USSR amendment arose from the fact that the word “anti-democratic” was unquestionably interpreted very differently by the USSR and United Kingdom Governments.

Turning to consideration of the Uruguayan amendment, she thought it raised a new and controversial idea. The notion of compulsion was not clear. Did it refer to compulsion by the State or by non-official bodies? Moreover, what was meant by association? If, for example, association could mean a trade union, the Uruguayan amendment could be interpreted to prohibit the closed shop; yet the Committee would probably agree that such a prohibition should not be included in the declaration. She could not therefore support the Uruguayan amendment.

MR. KAMINSKY (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) pointed out that justifiable criticism had been directed against the basic text of article 18. It had many defects of substance, particularly its failure even to mention such organizations as the trade unions, with their millions of members. He thought that the United Nations and Governments should not give the same protection to bankers' associations and monopolies as to trade unions.

The basic text of article 18 reflected the policy of the International Labour Organization, which made no distinction between employers and employed and accorded to associations of employers rights not possessed by the trade unions. An attempt was being made to lessen, or even to destroy, whatever influence the unions might have on international and national political life. If the unions were not protected by the Declaration of Human Rights, they would not obtain protection from any other document. The Committee should therefore adopt the USSR amendment (E/800, page 34).

The representative of the United Kingdom appeared to suspect the intentions of the delegation of the Soviet Union and to believe that its amendment was communist in aim.<sup>1</sup> Such an approach was contrary to the spirit of the United Nations and to the interests of the common man, for whom, basically, the declaration should be drafted.

MRS. NEWLANDS (New Zealand) said the study of the amendments to article 18 confirmed her opinion that her delegation had been right to hold that the declaration should not go beyond a general statement of principles and should not include measures for implementation.

The New Zealand delegation fully accepted the principle of the right of freedom of assembly and association, but was aware that the circumstances in which that right might be exercised might vary in so many ways and cases that it would need a long convention to list every such detail. It would have to be at least as compendious as the Convention on Freedom of Association and Protection of the Right to Organize,<sup>101</sup> which included a preamble and twenty-one articles. In her view, the amendments submitted by the USSR and by Cuba (A/C.3/232) added nothing of substance to the basic text. The USSR amendment, moreover, by providing that national law should forbid certain types of association, raised difficult problems, which had already been mentioned, as to interpretation and application.

The Uruguayan amendment (A/C.3/268) stating that no one might be compelled to belong to an association raised certain special difficulties. The representative of the United Kingdom had already pointed out (130th meeting) that the meaning of the word “compelled” might give rise to doubt and certain cases might be conceived in which legal recognition of the right not to belong to an association might introduce an element of constraint. It was sometimes essential, in the interests of a particular group of individuals, to impose conditions for belonging to an association, and it was sometimes even necessary to demand that all members of the group concerned should belong to the association. An example was that of professional associations responsible for supervising the conduct of those carrying on some special profession. In New Zealand that was the case with the bar associations.

She was uneasy, too, about the question of the membership of trade unions. She would raise the matter again when the Committee examined article 21, paragraph 3, of the declaration but she would point out right then that, in accordance with the law of New Zealand, a person had to be a member of his trade or professional union if he wished to enjoy all the advantages provided by the law. That introduced an element of constraint which made it difficult for her Government to accept the Uruguayan amendment. Protected as it was against abuses, the New Zealand trade union organization could hardly be considered as not conforming to the general principles of freedom of assembly and association.

That question, moreover, was on the agenda of the Conference of the International Labour Organization to be held at Geneva in June 1949. The Third Committee should therefore adopt an article couched in fairly general terms so as not to [439] make it difficult, if not impossible, for the competent specialized agency seized of that question to reach the best possible solution.

The New Zealand delegation therefore asked the Committee to adopt the basic text of the article.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) pointed out that the representative of the United Kingdom had said that the advantage of the basic text of article 18 lay in its brevity. Other things being equal, it was obvious that brevity was a decisive argument; but it should be taken into account that the majority of the members of the Committee had criticized the text of article 18 on the grounds that there was almost nothing in it. The USSR amendment would give it a meaning since it included a legal guarantee. It did not confine itself to stating the right to freedom of assembly and association, but guaranteed that freedom.

Such a guarantee was not superfluous because, although it existed in the USSR, there were some conservative democracies in which, even when that right was recognized in theory, certain categories of people were prevented from taking advantage of it in practice; trade unions, for example, were refused the use of halls or the authorization to hold meetings.

Mr. Pavlov wished to see article 18 directed against organizations of a fascist nature. The existence of such organizations affected the whole world and they should therefore be prohibited in the International Declaration of Human Rights. It was essential to prevent the spread of an organization such as the Ku Klux Klan, for example.

MR. WATT (Australia) pointed out that article 18 had been criticized on the ground that it was too short to contain enough ideas. It would not necessarily be better if it were expanded. The basic text of article 18 was couched in very general terms. It would certainly be useful to define its meaning in certain cases, but its general character should be retained in any case.

The representative of Cuba had not replied to the arguments against his amendment (A/C.3/232); the Australian delegation would therefore be satisfied with the basic text.

The Uruguayan amendment (A/C.3/268) was important and deserved considerable study. From the philosophic point of view, it was certainly very attractive, but from the practical point of view it was dangerous because it was drafted in a negative form. The representatives of New Zealand and the United Kingdom had adduced examples to show how difficult it might be to eliminate the kind of constraint for which that amendment provided. It was hard, therefore, to set up such a general principle. If the Uruguayan amendment were rejected, it would not mean that anyone might be compelled to belong to any association whatever; the question would remain pending and would be studied at a later stage.

Mr. Watt was opposed to the USSR amendment.

Finally, he had no objection to the Belgian amendment (A/C.3/328), but preferred the basic [440] text of article 18, which he believed to be perfectly acceptable.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the Polish amendment (A/C.3/331), in his opinion, related to the substance of the question. If any member of the Committee, therefore, raised an objection, that amendment could not be considered acceptable.

MR. MENCEL (Poland) asked that his compromise text (A/C.3/331) should be adopted unanimously. He supported the principle of the USSR amendment, but he was submitting the new text because reservations had been made on that amendment.

Some members of the Committee apparently were dubious as to whether the words "fascist or anti-democratic" used in the USSR amendment were clear enough; he himself had no doubts. In any case, the Polish amendment should not give rise to discussion since it referred purely and simply to the Charter.

MR. CONTOUMAS (Greece) warmly supported the Polish amendment. He would merely request its sponsor to express his idea more logically, for it was possible to conceive of associations with purposes and principles other than those expressed in the Charter of the United Nations but yet of some value.

He therefore proposed the following wording: "... of which the activity is not contrary to the aims ..."

MR. MENCEL (Poland) accepted the alteration proposed by the representative of Greece.

MR. SAINT-LOT (Haiti) pointed out that the word "activity" could hardly refer to both "association" and "assembly". He suggested that the word "nature" should be substituted for the word "activity".

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) thought that the word "activity" should be retained, since freedom of assembly and association should be restricted only when its abuse had inadmissible results. It was, therefore, not so much to the nature of an assembly as to its activity that reference should be made.

MRS. CORBET (United Kingdom) did not think that it was possible to speak of the aims and activity of an assembly or an association. Moreover, loyalty to the principles of the Charter was the governing idea of the declaration.

She suggested that the words "of which the activity is" should be deleted from the text proposed by Poland.

MR. WATT (Australia) recalled the terms of the preamble, and pointed out that the words which the Polish representative proposed to add to article 18 would be better placed in the preamble of the declaration.

MR. CASSIN (France) proposed the following wording: “. . . of which the character or activity is not contrary . . .”

MR. MENCEL (Poland) accepted the French representative's suggestion.

He pointed out to the Australian representative that a reference to the United Nations Charter [441] already existed in article 12 of the declaration, and that thus articles 12 and 18 constituted precedents for the preamble.

MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) pointed out that the Polish amendment envisaged that the rights laid down in article 18 could only be exercised within the framework of the aims and principles of the Charter. The latter was therefore a criterion for distinguishing between the use and the abuse of those rights. It would be for Governments to ensure that associations and their members conformed to those principles.

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) expressed her agreement with the representatives of Australia and Uruguay. If a restriction, such as the one envisaged in the Polish amendment, were included in article 18, it should also be included in other articles.

She would support the basic text of the article.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) pointed out that the Polish amendment added nothing to article 18, since the Charter had already been accepted by the United Nations, of which it was the common law. Moreover, he considered it dangerous that the executive powers could suspend the right of assembly and association according to their interpretation of the aims and principles of the Charter.

He suggested that the words “the character or” should be deleted from the Polish text as amended by the representative of France.

MR. CHANG (China) expressed his agreement with the representatives of Australia and Uruguay. It had so often been mentioned in the organs of the United Nations that the Charter could not be interpreted in any way which could justify interference in the internal affairs of Member States, that he feared that, if the Polish amendment were accepted, the right to freedom of assembly and association might be interpreted as either restricting national legislation, or as being capable of exercise in defiance of the laws of the various States.

MR. ANZE MATIENZO (Bolivia) regretted that he could not take part in the debate. He did not think that it was necessary to invoke the United Nations Charter on every occasion and for every article.

He would abstain from voting on the Polish amendment.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) considered that the Polish amendment was a slight, but nevertheless valuable, improvement to the basic text, and that it endowed article 18 with more substance and with greater significance.

That, however, could in no way lead him to withdraw his own amendment. If, on the other hand, certain delegations thought that the latter went too far, the Polish amendment could serve as a compromise solution, although Mr. Pavlov only regarded it as a makeshift.

A reference to the Charter was not necessarily always advisable, as for example in the case of the right to work, to leisure and to rest. In the article under discussion, it did not harm the text; it was, on the contrary, entirely appropriate. Without that reference the text might equally well cover associations of criminals, or societies such as the Ku Klux Klan, which were condemned by the Charter.

MR. KAYALY (Syria) thought that the Polish amendment was prompted by the fear that the right of assembly and association might be abused; similar fears, however, could be entertained concerning all the rights already studied. Article 18 should confine itself to generalities.

Mr. Kayaly was disposed to adopt the basic text but without the modification introduced by the Polish amendment.

MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) wished to know whether the Polish representative would accept the following addition to the text of the article:

“Nobody shall exercise that right contrary to the purposes and principles of the United Nations.”

The wording of the Polish proposal seemed to him vague and left the door open for arbitrary interpretation. It would be possible for Governments to prohibit demonstrations a priori, and that would be a direct infringement of the freedom of assembly and association. The Uruguayan notification would insure that judgment could only be made a posteriori. In that wording, the text appeared to him less dangerous than that of the Polish amendment.

MR. ABADI (Iraq) expressed his entire agreement with the speakers who had opposed the Polish amendment. The latter had a restrictive meaning, and its adoption in its existing form would be a step backward.

MR. AQUINO (Philippines) thought that it was doubtful whether the Polish amendment was acceptable.

He agreed with the remarks of the Bolivian representative that it would be undesirable to single out the article under discussion and make it the only one which included a reference to the Charter. The Polish amendment supposed a previous authorization for what, in his country, was a constitutional right. It had clearly a restrictive meaning.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) stated that the Polish amendment was superfluous, if not dangerous. The USSR representative had said that all the articles might require a reference to the Charter. That was true; a certain number of articles would, in fact, demand it. There was, therefore, no reason why such a reference should be made in article 18 and not in the preceding articles.

Article 28 should be adequate to dispel the Polish fears.

MR. SAINT-LOT (Haiti) wished to make some explanatory remarks and to draw the attention of jurists to a special aspect of the problem.

He was referring to the restriction which certain representatives saw in the control of the right of assembly and association. So far the Committee had studied the exercise of individual freedoms recognized in the majority of countries; the restrictions of those rights were generally considered to be natural. That was not the case in the [443] question under consideration; even in the most liberal constitutions the right of assembly and association was still in its early stage. The cases in which that right was expressly granted were for the most part exceptional. It therefore appeared dangerous to him to formulate the right to that freedom without restriction.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the Soviet Union amendment (E/800, page 34), which would replace the basic text of article 18.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) asked that his amendment be voted upon in parts.

The vote should be taken first on the part: "In the interests of . . . and unions"; then on the second part: "All societies . . . under pain of punishment".

THE CHAIRMAN put the first part of the USSR amendment to the vote.

A vote was taken by roll-call, as follows:

In favour: Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Czechoslovakia, Poland, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Yugoslavia.

Against: Afghanistan, Australia, Belgium, Bolivia, Brazil, Canada, Chile, China, Denmark, France, Greece, Guatemala, Honduras, India, Iraq, Lebanon, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Pakistan, Panama, Peru, Philippines, Sweden, Syria, Turkey, United Kingdom, United States of America, Uruguay.

Abstaining: Argentina, Burma, Colombia, Costa Rica, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Haiti, Iran, Mexico, Saudi Arabia, Venezuela, Yemen.

That text was rejected by 29 votes to 6, with 12 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put the second part of the USSR amendment to the vote.

A vote was then taken by roll-call, as follows:

In favour: Burma, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Czechoslovakia, Poland, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Yugoslavia.

Against: Afghanistan, Australia, Brazil, Canada, Chile, China, Costa Rica, Denmark, Greece, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, India, Iraq, Lebanon, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Pakistan, Panama, Philippines, Sweden, Syria, Turkey, United Kingdom, United States of America, Uruguay, Venezuela,

Abstaining: Argentina, Belgium, Bolivia, Colombia, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, France, Iran, Mexico, Peru, Saudi Arabia, Yemen.

The text was rejected by 28 votes to 7, with 12 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN suggested that the Belgian amendment (A/C.3/328), which shortened the Cuban proposal, should be considered.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) asked that a separate vote be taken on the term “peaceably” contained in the Cuban amendment.

MR. CASSIN (France) said that there was some uneasiness among the French-speaking delegations due, in his opinion, to a defective translation of the English text. For that reason he suggested that the following translation: Toute personne a droit à la liberté de réunion et d'association should replace the sentence: Toute personne a le droit de participer librement à des réunions et de faire partie d'associations.

THE CHAIRMAN did not see any objection to that modification.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) wished to draw attention to the point raised by the Lebanese representative. The terms “peaceably” and “peaceful” were found in the Cuban and the Uruguayan amendments respectively; the same expression also figured in the texts of three other amendments.

He wondered whether it would not be preferable to take the text proposed by the delegation of Uruguay.

THE CHAIRMAN reminded the Committee that it was asked to state its attitude regarding the word “peaceably”.

MR. CHANG (China) pointed out that the amendment furthest removed from the Cuban amendment was the nearest to the basic text.

He asked whether the Belgian amendment, if adopted, should replace the basic text. He thought that the two texts should be compared.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) recognized that, according to the rules of procedure, the vote by parts was a recognized right; if, therefore the Lebanese representative insisted on a separate vote on the word “peaceably” his request should be granted. He wished, however, to draw his attention to the results which the deletion of the word “peaceably” might have. He wondered whether there was any country which would authorize armed gatherings.

He asked the Lebanese representative to withdraw his proposal.

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) pointed out the shade of difference between the expressions “freedom of association” and “to associate freely with others”.

THE CHAIRMAN thought that it would be preferable to connect the Belgian amendment with the basic text, rather than with the Cuban amendment.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) suggested that a vote be taken first on the Polish amendment, since it was the furthest removed from the original text. If it were adopted a great many difficulties would disappear.

THE CHAIRMAN did not agree on that. The Polish text was an addition to the basic text; the Polish amendment would be considered when its turn came.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) said that, as a result of the modification proposed by the French representative, he no longer insisted on a separate vote.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) pointed out that he did not submit his amendment as an amendment to the Cuban text, but as an amendment to the basic text of article 18.

THE CHAIRMAN considered that the translation proposed by the representative of France did not change the English text and that it appeared acceptable to the French-speaking members of the Committee.

MR. CASSIN (France) stated that he had only wished to clarify the text without submitting an amendment.

THE CHAIRMAN announced that the amendment previously proposed by France (A/C.3/330) to the Cuban amendment had been withdrawn.

He put the Cuban amendment (A/C.3/232) to the vote.

The amendment was rejected by 28 votes to 7, with 11 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the Belgian representative's proposal to delete the words "the character or" in the amendment proposed by Poland (A/C.3/331), as amended by the representative of France.

The proposal was adopted by 2 votes to none, with 41 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the Polish amendment (A/C.3/331), as amended.

The amendment, as amended, was rejected by 23 votes to 14, with 9 abstentions.

MR. SAINT-LOT (Haiti) considered that the word "pacific" would be preferable to "peaceful" in the amendment proposed by the delegation of Uruguay (A/C.3/268).

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) asked what exactly was meant by "peaceful assembly". Some assemblies, even of armed men, might very well in fact pass off peaceably. In his opinion, "peaceful" should be interpreted in the sense of "serving peace".

MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) explained that he had not wanted to speak of "pacifist" meetings but purely and simply of assemblies which passed off without uproar, disturbance or the use of arms.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the Uruguayan amendment to insert the word "peaceful" before the word "assembly" in the basic text as modified in respect of the French text.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the second Uruguayan amendment (A/C.3/268) to add to article 18 the sentence: "No one may be compelled to belong to an association."

That amendment was adopted by 20 votes to 14, with 9 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the whole of article 18, as amended.

Article 18, as amended, was adopted by 36 votes to 3, with 7 abstentions.

MR. GARCÍA BAUER (Guatemala) explained that his delegation had voted against the amendment proposed by the Soviet Union because it considered that the declaration was not the place for the first part of that amendment; and that, moreover, the legal guarantee provided for by that amendment was already assured by legislation of various countries.

While agreeing in substance with the second part of the USSR amendment, the Guatemalan delegation had felt unable to vote for it, because the prohibition referred to therein likewise did not seem to be in keeping with the structure of the declaration, and should be mentioned elsewhere.

MR. SAINT-LOT (Haiti) expressed his complete satisfaction with the new form in which the French representative had proposed that the French text of article 18 should be drafted. He readily supported the new wording.

MR. CASSIN (France) had not voted for the amendment which had been proposed, but he expressed his appreciation of the Polish amendment; he had had to abstain from voting on it, however, because the principle it set forth, while quite correct, was a general one which did not apply to article 18 alone.

He would be very glad if the principle in the Polish amendment were brought up again when article 27, defining certain restrictions on the various rights and freedoms set forth in the declaration, was considered.

MR. CHANG (China) expressed his satisfaction at the adoption of the Uruguayan amendment, which established an important principle. But he was not too happy about the wording of article 18, because he considered the English text to be ambiguous on account of the fact that it was not certain whether the adjective "peaceful" was applicable only to the word "assembly", or to the two words "assembly" and "association".

MR. CAÑAS (Costa Rica) had voted against the USSR and Polish amendments for reasons which he had already stated during the discussion.

While he warmly agreed with the ideas in the first part of the USSR amendment, he felt they were measures for implementation rather than the recognition of a right.

MR. CONTOUMAS (Greece) had voted against the amendments which had been proposed, with the exception of that of the Polish delegation which was the only one linked to the text proposed by the Commission on Human Rights.

He had not been able to support the USSR amendment because of the use of certain terms which were too vague, such as "democracy" and "fascism".

He expressed his agreement with the French representative regarding the contents of article 27 of the declaration, and hoped that the idea in the Polish amendment would be brought up again at the appropriate time.

MRS. CORBET (United Kingdom) felt that the idea expressed in the paragraph added by the Uruguayan amendment could never be effectively [447] implemented. She had therefore not voted for the second part of the amendment.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) had voted for the text submitted by the Commission on Human Rights and against all the amendments.

He had already explained his attitude towards the USSR amendment. As regards the two parts of the Uruguayan amendment, they had seemed to him to be superfluous, as the restriction in meaning introduced by the word "peaceful" was already contained in article 27 of the declaration and the basic text seemed to him to express sufficiently clearly all the designs of its authors.

In conclusion, the representative of Lebanon supported the observations of the Chinese representative regarding the faulty drafting of article 18, as it had been adopted by the Third Committee.

MR. PLAZA (Venezuela) had voted for the Uruguayan amendment on the understanding that by "peaceful assembly" was meant assemblies at which national laws were not broken.

MR. WATT (Australia) had voted against the second part of the Uruguayan amendment and had abstained from voting on the article as a whole for the same reasons as the United Kingdom delegation.

His delegation reserved the right to raise the question again at a plenary meeting.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) considered that the two parts of the Uruguayan amendment considerably improved the text of article 18. Accordingly he had voted for that amendment, which however did not fully satisfy him.

He would have liked the meaning of the word "peaceful" to be made clear, because some assemblies of an anti-democratic or fascist nature could very well pass off without disturbances, and were not on that account less dangerous to peace. He also regretted that the Committee had not considered it necessary to embody in article 18 the idea of legal guarantees for the freedom of assembly.

He recalled that he had laid great stress on the importance which his delegation attached to the voluntary nature which associations and assemblies should present, and that explained why he had voted for the second part of the Uruguayan amendment.

He regretted that an amendment proposed by the USSR delegation had once more been rejected, as had also the Polish amendment, which might, however, have obtained the concurrence of the majority of the Committee. He stressed the fact that he would have voted against the original text if the Uruguayan amendment, making a concession to some extent to the ideas of the USSR delegation, had not been adopted.

Mr. Pavlov regretfully noted as a sign of the times that some delegations did not wish to be reminded too often of the principles of the United Nations Charter which no longer appeared to them to be as essential as in the past.

MR. LUNDE (Norway) had voted against the text adopted by the Third Committee because he thought the basic text was clearer and simpler; [448] moreover, it exactly corresponded to the law of his country.

The addition of the word “peaceful” seemed to him superfluous, and he had associated himself with the remarks made by the Australian and United Kingdom representatives with regard to the second part of the Uruguayan amendment.

MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) thanked the Chinese representative for his wise and apposite remarks on the text of the article adopted by the Committee, but regretted that he was unable to change its terms.

MR. MENCEL (Poland) had abstained from voting on the final text, which he did not consider precise enough.

He regretted that the Committee had not seen fit to approve the reference to the principles of the Charter, and affirmed that his delegation would see that those principles were mentioned in other articles of the declaration, as well as in the preamble.

MR. AIKMAN (New Zealand) said his delegation had voted against the second part of the Uruguayan amendment and the final text for the reasons given in the statement of the New Zealand representative.

He reserved the right to reopen the question when a draft declaration was submitted to the General Assembly.

THE CHAIRMAN announced that, on 13 November, the Committee would consider the report of its Sub-Committee 2.

THE CHAIRMAN noted that the basic text of article 19 and the amendments submitted thereto were recapitulated in document A/C.3/296/Rev.1.

He announced that the Yugoslav amendment (A/C.3/233) would not be considered during the discussion of article 19. The Yugoslav delegation had withdrawn its amendment but would submit its proposal later, as additional articles to the declaration.

MRS. LINDSTRÖM (Sweden), pointing out that article 19 laid down a fundamental right without which there could be no democratic Government, thought it was desirable that the article should make clear how the will of the people should find expression in order to ensure that it was the real basis of the Government.

For that reason the Swedish delegation proposed (A/C.3/252) the addition to paragraph 3 of the words “manifested in general and free elections or in equivalent, free voting procedures”. The phrase, “in equivalent, free voting procedures” had been included to take into account the fact that some primitive people were not accustomed to elections such as were held by more civilized peoples.

MR. CAÑAS (Costa Rica), explaining the joint amendment submitted by Colombia and Costa Rica (A/C.3/248), said that the right of everyone to take part in the government should be completed by a statement of the right to oppose the government and to promote its replacement by legal means. If the latter right were lost, all human rights could be lost. The Nazi and fascist governments – like all tyrannical regimes – had been able to deprive the people of all fundamental human rights precisely because they had first deprived them of the basic right to oppose the Government. States that had shown such an interest in preventing a renewal of fascism should realize that the amendment would serve that purpose, for the right it laid down was in itself a negation of fascism.

That joint amendment should therefore be adopted, for it would provide the best possible guarantee that the rights proclaimed in other articles of the declaration would be respected.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) pointed out that his delegation’s amendment (E/800, page 34) specified that election should be held periodically by secret ballot, and should be universal, and equal. The amendments proposed by other delegations would restrict democratic election procedures since they failed, in one way or another, to cover all the points mentioned in the USSR amendment. The Cuban amendment (A/C.3/232) was unsatisfactory because it did not contain the ideas of universal and equal elections; the French amendment (A/C.4/244/Rev.1) said nothing of the secret ballot or of equal and universal elections; the Swedish amendment was more nearly adequate, but it still failed to describe fully the correct election procedures.

Speaking of the joint Colombian and Costa Rican amendment, he recalled that it was because Hitler and Mussolini had been allowed to oppose their respective Governments that they had eventually been able to come to power. The USSR delegation therefore hesitated to accept the amendment, for it might provide the possibility for fascist elements to overthrow the Government.

He asked for an explanation of the meaning of the amendment proposed by the Egyptian delegation (A/C.3/264). If that amendment meant that no government should be a tool of another Government, he was prepared to accept it.

MR. CASSIN (France) found the first two paragraphs of the basic text of article 19 acceptable.

He proposed an amendment (A/C.3/244/Rev.1) to paragraph 3, however, because, as it stood, it was not comprehensible to minds trained in the tradition of Roman law. It could not logically be stated as an individual right, that the government should conform to the will of the people; such a right was a collective right on the part of the people as a whole. The French amendment was not designed to change the substance of paragraph 3, but merely to clarify it. The paragraph should first make plain that the will of the people was the source of authority and should then speak of how that will should be expressed.

The French delegation did not oppose the Swedish amendment, nor would it object to the USSR suggestion to specify that elections should also be universal, equal and by secret ballot. Since, however, even among very democratic peoples, election procedures differed – in certain cantons of democratic Switzerland, for example, elections were not held by secret ballot – the important point was that the elections should be sincere. A general statement of principle that could cover all sincere systems of election therefore seemed preferable.

MR. COROMINAS (Argentina) thought article 19 should be clarified and simplified in order to achieve a text which would hold good for future generations.

In paragraphs 1 and 2 the word “everyone” was too general. Did the word mean, in paragraph 1, everyone legally empowered to take part in the Government; and in paragraph 2, did it mean everyone with the capacity required for public employment? As regards paragraph 3, the text as a whole was confusing, as the French representative had already pointed out.

The Cuban and USSR amendments contained valuable suggestions for clarifying the meaning. He thought that the words “having legal capacity”, which appeared in the Cuban amendment, should be used to qualify “everyone” in paragraphs 1 and 2 and that mention of periodic, universal, equal and secret elections should be included. Furthermore the article should be simplified by combining the three paragraphs into one.

MR. SAINT-LOT (Haiti) opposed the inclusion of the idea of a secret ballot, which was found in the USSR and Cuban draft amendments. A secret ballot could be carried out only if the voters were able to read and write. Illiterate people would thus be excluded from voting and the suffrage would no longer be universal. The USSR amendment, which spoke of a universal election by secret ballot, would therefore be self-contradictory.

He recalled that hundreds of thousands of inhabitants of his country who had been unable to read and write had still had the courage to fight for their independence. Moreover, illiteracy was [451] usually the result of oppression of the masses by the minority in control and was no reason to deprive human beings of civil rights.

He thought the words “sincere and free” would best qualify the elections that the Committee wished to describe.

MRS. CORBET (United Kingdom) supported the basic draft of article 19, which set forth the three basic ideas of a democratic government. Those ideas might be elaborated in the proposed covenant on human rights, but there was no need for further details in the declaration.

The USSR amendment contained a dangerous idea in that it stated, “The State shall consider the will of the people . . .” It would seem from those words that the State might disregard the people’s will if it so desired; yet in a democratic society the State must be bound by the will of the people.

The USSR, Cuban, French and Swedish amendments all included mention of elections. The United Kingdom did not object to the substance proposed but it realized, especially since its recent experience in preparing a bill on electoral rights, how complex the subject was. It would be impossible to set forth in the declaration all the detailed provisions needed to ensure free elections, and the United Kingdom delegation thought it entirely sufficient to affirm that Governments must be freely chosen and must conform to the will of the people. If, however, the Committee should decide to include the matter of elections in article 19, the Swedish amendment seemed to offer the best draft and, moreover, it would meet the important point raised by the Haitian representative.

The United Kingdom attached the greatest importance to the right to oppose the Government, for without that right there could be no real democracy. That right seemed implicit, however, in paragraph 3 of article 19 and was further protected by the right to freedom of opinion and expression set forth in article 17.

Speaking of the Egyptian amendment, she thought the addition suggested in it was unnecessary, since a Government that conformed to the changing will of the people must act freely to give expression to that will.

The first point raised in the Uruguayan amendment was apposite. It might be well to adopt some general clause explaining that “everyone” did not refer to prisoners, children, lunatics etc. Thus the meaning of “everyone” would be plain throughout all the articles of the declaration.

The second part of the Uruguayan statement was not altogether clear; she hoped the Uruguayan representative would explain it further.

MRS. KALINOWSKA (Poland) drew attention to a mistake in the English translation of the USSR amendment. The English word “consider” was [452] inaccurate; the Russian word meant “to take into account and to be bound thereby”.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) asked that the USSR amendment be translated into English by “The State shall conform to the will of the people . . .”

MR. SANDIFER (United States of America) was prepared to support the basic text of article 19. He was not opposed, however, to the inclusion of periodic, free, universal and secret elections – an idea which, although it was implicit in the words “freely chosen representatives”, was so fundamental to a truly democratic Government that to include it would not overburden the declaration with details.

Of all the amendments submitted, the Cuban seemed the most desirable. He suggested, however, the deletion of the words “having legal capacity”, as there was a danger that the right might become meaningless if it were to be dependent on national legal considerations. If the Cuban amendment meant that a person must fulfil certain reasonable requirements in order to participate in the Government, that point was sufficiently covered by the general limitation clause contained in draft article 27. If the Cuban delegation would be willing to accept the suggested deletion, the United States would support the amendment.

Referring to the inclusion of the idea of a secret ballot, he said that experience in his country had shown that a secret ballot was necessary if the election was to be fair and impartial.

He opposed the USSR and the French amendments for the reason that both seemed to emphasize the obligations of the State. The declaration, however, was concerned with the rights of the individual.

As regards the joint Colombian and Costa Rican amendment, he agreed completely with the views of the United Kingdom representative.

In reply to the second point raised in the Uruguayan amendment, he pointed out that the words “his country” made plain that the rights proclaimed belonged only to citizens of a State and not to aliens.

The United States delegation wished to explain that it interpreted paragraph 2 to mean that all had the same opportunity for public employment. Public employment should be based on free and equal competition without any discrimination whatsoever. That did not mean, however, that no regard should be paid to loyalty to the country or other reasonable factors. As the United States representative had said earlier in the debate, the United States Government thought the right to public employment was subject to limitations in the interest of public order and welfare. Exclusion of persons with subversive political views or of those not loyal to the laws and constitution of the country was not considered to be a violation of the principle contained in the draft declaration. Article 27 of the declaration covered that point. [453]

MR. LUNDE (Norway) thought the basic text of article 19 was satisfactory and that it implied the idea of free elections.

He would be willing, however, to support the Cuban amendment as amended by the United States.

Nor had he any objection to the French or Swedish proposals. The second part of the Swedish proposal was particularly valuable and should be included in whatever text was finally adopted.

The USSR and other proposals introducing further details seemed unwise. In that connexion, he drew attention to the fact that his country could not accept the notion of equal elections, for, because of the geographical distribution of the population, the votes of some people, in sparsely populated areas, were given greater weight in order to ensure protection of their particular interests.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) said the Uruguayan proposal was not, strictly speaking, an amendment; it was rather a piece of advice, and contained two sensible observations. The word "everyone" obviously did not apply to foreigners, children, the aged, lunatics and so on. Secondly, some of the rights implicit in article 19 could not be exercised on foreign territory.

He agreed with the French representative that any trained mind would object to article 19 and considered his amendment the most acceptable that had been put forward. He disagreed with him, however, concerning the importance of the secret ballot. It was still the best method that had been devised for ensuring free elections. The exceptions he had referred to were unimportant because they applied to small communities with a long tradition behind them. In the opinion of the Belgian representative it was also necessary to specify that there should be several lists of candidates and therefore, he requested the French representative to accept the following addition to his amendment: ". . . held by secret ballot and with several lists".

He agreed with the substance of the USSR amendment, except that it did not refer to the need for several lists of candidates and introduced a reference to the State.

He supported the first part of the joint Colombian and Costa Rican amendment, but was not sure of the meaning of the words "equality of electoral opportunities and of access to the means of propaganda". It would be unrealistic to expect too much of the Government.

MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) felt that article 19 was one of the most perplexing in the whole declaration. The preceding articles were concerned with the rights of man, while article 19 dealt with the rights of the citizen. It would not, however, be sufficient to insert the word "citizen"; [454] the Commission had attempted to include too many ideas in the one article.

Elections could be held in accordance with the provisions of the USSR amendment without being free. It was impossible to eliminate evil practices by including a provision such as that in paragraph 3 of article 19 which referred to the "will of the people". Who was to be allowed to vote and under what conditions could a list of candidates be submitted? It was all very well to state that elections were to be held by secret ballot after a free campaign in which all political parties were to be allowed to take part. In the nineteenth century, public opinion had sometimes been misled by violence; in the current period, election results were being falsified and the right to freedom of expression forbidden.

The Committee obviously agreed that the will of the people should be freely expressed. Any such general formula as had been put forward, however, could produce the very opposite result.

The Cuban amendment was more forceful than the one put forward by the Colombian and Costa Rican representatives, but should be changed to read as follows: "Every person who is legally entitled, may participate in the government of his country . . ."

The second Uruguayan observation was designed to avoid situations such as the one that had existed in Uruguay during the war. At that time, German citizens living in Uruguay had tried to carry on, as a group and in Uruguayan territory, activities implying participation in the political life of their country of origin, such as voting in the plebiscites organized by Hitler; that had not been allowed by the Government of Uruguay.

In reply to the Belgian representative, he said that he had, unfortunately, been unable to draft an article which seemed to him more constructive than the basic text.

MR. CONTOUMAS (Greece) said that for more than a century, his country had respected the principles set forth in article 19 and therefore he had no objections to the substance of the various proposed amendments. He did, however, feel that the questions raised in those amendments more rightly belonged in a declaration of people's rights than in the document under discussion.

He agreed that the word "everyone" was not satisfactory but thought that the same confusion would exist if the words "every citizen" were substituted for it.

It was the people and not the individual who freely chose their representatives and therefore he suggested the deletion of the word "his" in paragraph 1.

The French amendment, as amended by the Belgian representative, appeared to be the most acceptable.

The Swedish amendment also should be taken into consideration.

MR. GARCÍA BAUER (Guatemala) agreed with the Uruguayan representative that the word [455] "everyone" was not sufficiently clear. As in the case of article 14, it would have to be determined who, legally, could or could not take part in the government of his country. He also considered that the second observation put forward by the Uruguayan representative should be incorporated in the text.

The USSR and Cuban representatives had emphasized the necessity for elections by secret ballot. During the drafting of the 1945 Guatemalan Constitution, careful attention had been given to that question and owing to the fact that a certain proportion of the population was illiterate, provision had been made for both a secret and an open vote. As the Haitian representative had pointed out, illiterate people could only participate in an open vote. To take into consideration the situation which existed in countries, a proportion of whose population was illiterate, a similar provision should be included in article 19.

The words “having legal capacity”, in the Cuban amendment, were not sufficiently clear. He agreed with the substance of the French amendment but did not consider the declaration the appropriate place for it.

The joint Colombian and Costa Rican amendment was acceptable, but its provisions were already implicitly covered in article 17 and in the Commission’s draft of article 19.

The Swedish amendment would be a useful addition to article 19 and deserved special attention.

The Egyptian amendment was not sufficiently clear.

MR. ABADI (Iraq) did not feel that it was the Government which mattered, but the State, in other words, the legal framework which was at the service of men who might be fallible. He therefore proposed that paragraph 1 should read as follows (A/C.3/332): “Every citizen has the right to take part in the affairs of his State, directly or . . .”

Paragraph 2 appeared to him to be superfluous and paragraph 3 inadequately drafted. The concept of the will of the people had bothered political scientists for some time and therefore, he suggested the following re-wording of paragraph 3: “Everyone has the right to a Government which conforms to the consent of the people, exercised through occasional elections, referenda or plebiscites.”

The USSR amendment emphasized the problem of elections, and on the other hand, stressed the active will of the people, behind the law.

Subject to the acceptance of the changes he had suggested, he would support the basic text of article 19.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) recognized the imperfections of the basic text, but after careful consideration, had come to the conclusion that the various amendments would not improve it sufficiently to warrant their adoption.

The Cuban representative had attempted to qualify the word “everyone”. It had to be remembered, however, that the adoption of such a quali-[456]fication would involve the Committee in the reconsideration of articles 5 and 11. Further, the word had to be interpreted in the light of the provisions of article 27. The amendment also made no reference to the provision contained in paragraph 2 of article 19 and for both those reasons, he would be unable to support it.

He agreed with the principle of the Egyptian amendment to the effect that every country should be free from foreign influence, but felt that it was covered sufficiently by the provisions of paragraphs 1 and 3.

The joint Colombian and Costa Rican amendment was also covered by the provisions of paragraphs 1 and 3 and besides, its adoption would introduce the question of implementation.

The fact that elections would be held periodically and by secret ballot would not ensure that they would be free. Further, there were many other aspects, such as the desirability of having several lists of candidates – a point raised by the Belgian representative – that could be introduced with respect to the rights set forth in article 19. There was no reference to referenda or plebiscites or to the right to equality of electoral opportunities and of access to the means of propaganda, raised by the Colombian and Costa Rican representatives.

MR. CAÑAS (Costa Rica) said it would not be necessary for him to explain to the Belgian representative the meaning of the final part of his amendment, as that explanation had already been given by the Uruguayan representative. There were electoral frauds before and during elections and, on occasions, the activities of political parties were curtailed either by the Government, the police or the army.

The idea that the Press should be forbidden to publish opposition propaganda or that radio stations should be forbidden to broadcast it, was repugnant to his delegation. The Government in power must recognize the rights of the opposition, for unless the majority accepted the minority's right to become the majority, democracy could not exist.

He drew the Committee's attention to the fact that the English text of the joint Colombian and Costa Rican amendment should begin with the words, "Every person . . ."

Summary Record of the Hundred and Thirty-Third Meeting
[of the Third Committee]

Held at the Palais de Chaillot, Paris, on Friday,
12 November 1948, at 10:55 a.m.

Chairman: MR. CHARLES MALIK (Lebanon).

MR. DE ATHAYDE (Brazil) said that the right of everyone to take part in the government of his [457] was at the very root of the organization of a democratic state. If the ideal of government of the people, by the people and for the people were to be achieved, it was essential to establish the three fundamental principles set forth in the three paragraphs of the text proposed by the Human Rights Commission, namely the right to elect and to be elected, the right of access to public appointments and the right to require the Government to conform to the will of the people.

His delegation felt, however, that the text would be more complete if, as suggested in the USSR amendment (E/800, page 34), it specified that the will of the people should be expressed by means of universal suffrage on a basis of equality and by secret ballot. He pointed out in that connexion that the secrecy of elections did not imply that illiterates would be automatically barred from the polls.

Hence his delegation would vote in favour of the original text of article 19 and the last part of the USSR amendment, which it proposed should be added to the third paragraph of the text.

MR. CASSIN (France) appreciated that the general discussion on article 19 had been highly instructive for everybody, but he still adhered to the principle of the amendment submitted by his delegation at the 132nd meeting.

Hence he would vote in favour of the first two paragraphs of article 19 as drafted by the Human Rights Commission. As regards the third paragraph, however, he thought that in order to be more acceptable to the broad mass of the peoples, it should clearly state the principle that "the authority of any Government is founded on the will of the people".

At the same time his delegation was prepared to incorporate in the amendment it had submitted the previous day (A/C.3/244/Rev.1) the most important passages of the amendments submitted by the USSR and Swedish delegations. To that end it proposed the following wording for paragraph 3 (A/C.3/244/Rev.2):

“The authority of any Government is founded on the will of the people as expressed in elections which shall be conducted periodically and must be universal and equal and be held by secret ballot or by an equivalent procedure ensuring a free vote.”

He had felt unable to support the Belgian delegation's proposal concerning several lists of candidates. The last clause of the redraft proposed by him met the objections, expressed by some delegations, to the secret ballot. Moreover, as it was to be clearly established that the authority of the Government was “founded on the will of the people”, his delegation had considered it unnecessary to keep the original wording of paragraph 3 which said that “Everyone has the right to a Government which conforms to the will of the people.”

MR. PLAZA (Venezuela) regarded article 19 as drafted by the Human Rights Commission as a happy and concise definition of a complex right from which none of the essentials were omitted.

His delegation, however, viewed favourably the amendments submitted by the delegations of the [458] USSR, Cuba, France and Sweden, which all proceeded from the idea that article 19 should, in addition, contain a reference to the principle of universal, free and secret elections, which were the best guarantee of democracy and marked one of the greatest advances in modern times.

The choice between the various amendments was a difficult one. Whilst the USSR amendment stated the principle in concrete terms, it approached the problem from the point of view of the obligations of the State: for that reason his delegation could not support it. The disadvantage of the Cuban amendment (A/C.3/232) was that it applied to the first paragraph which the Venezuelan delegation would like to stand in its original form. The French amendment (A/C.3/244/Rev.2) would have been an improvement if it had stated the right in a more direct and concrete manner. Yet it seemed the most satisfactory, and his delegation would vote for it, subject to the addition of the text proposed by the Belgian delegation at the 132nd meeting.

If the Committee did not adopt the French amendment, his delegation would vote in favour of the Swedish amendment (A/C.3/252) which it regarded as less explicit than the French text but more satisfactory than the original text.

His delegation would also support the amendment submitted by the Columbian and Costa Rican delegations (A/C.3/248) which stated a progressive principle which Venezuela had already incorporated in its legislation.

MR. WATT (Australia) said the general discussion had shown what a difficult task it was to draft a declaration of the type of the human rights declaration. The amendments to the original text had elicited just as much criticism as the text itself.

He realized that article 19 was not the best one prepared by the Human Rights Commission, but its general structure was understandable if the many difficulties brought to light in the course of the discussions were borne in mind.

Dismissing the objections one after the other, he pointed out first of all that it was an implied term of the word "everyone" that it did not extend to minors, lunatics, and other persons under a legal disability. Those exceptional cases were fully covered by the general provisions of article 27 and did not have to be taken into consideration.

It had also been suggested that the word "everyone" should be replaced by the words "every citizen", on account of the delicate problem of alien residents. That was also an invalid objection since the text specified that everyone had the right to take part in the government of his country. No ambiguity was possible. There was ambiguity, however, in the expression "having legal capacity" proposed by the Cuban delegation; those words could not possibly be admitted unless they were accompanied by a particularized definition which would be out of place in the body of the article.

Paragraph 2 of article 19 had been criticized for its reference to public employment to which everyone would have the right of access, but those were public appointments and hence of importance for the whole community. The point of the paragraph was to enable any citizen not only to take [459] a passive part in the government of his country but also to take an active or executive part therein.

He then analysed the various amendments submitted. The most important point they raised was that of the secret ballot. The importance of the secret ballot was not in the secrecy surrounding the vote, but in the fact that the secrecy was intended to make the vote a free one. The primary object was to ensure the free and independent expression of the will of the people; that principle should be established, but it was not one of the purposes of the declaration to go into the particulars of the application of the principle.

Therefore, his delegation would not object to the omission of the word "secret" if that was the Committee's desire.

The joint Colombian and Costa Rican amendment dealt with questions of detail. In Australia, for example, broadcasting facilities were placed at the disposal of the leaders of the principal political parties at election times; but a declaration was not a suitable vehicle for expressing those details.

Whilst appreciating the doubts which had prompted the Iraqi delegation to submit its amendment (A/C.3/332) he felt unable to agree to several points in it. For example, in preference to the rather vague phrase "affairs of his state" he would prefer the more specific expression "government of his country"; he also preferred the version whereby the Government was expected to take the "will" of the people into account to the more passive version whereby a Government was to conform to the "consent" of the people.

On the whole his delegation agreed that paragraph 3 of article 19 should be redrafted and hoped that the Committee would be able to prepare a satisfactory text on the basis of the amendments submitted by the delegations of the USSR, Sweden and particularly France.

Should such drafting prove difficult in plenary committee, a drafting sub-committee might be instructed to prepare a generally acceptable text.

MR. PANDO MACHADO (Cuba) said that article 19 had given rise to more differences of opinion than any other, as was evidenced by the number of amendments it had provoked.

He introduced his delegation's amendment (A/C.3/232) by saying that it was not an original text but one which had been discussed at the Pan-American conference at Bogotá. The amendment had the advantage of expressing in concrete, precise and short form all the essential elements necessary to ensure to the individual the right to take part in the government of his country.

His delegation had noted with pleasure the favourable comments on its proposal by many delegations including that of the USSR, though the last-named had criticized it for failing to specify that elections should be universal and periodic. But the Cuban delegation did not consider that those two epithets would add anything to the text, for they did not correspond to facts as [460] encountered in the practice of States. Actually there was hardly any country in which all citizens without any exception took part in elections.

The United States delegation had agreed to the Cuban wording subject to the omission of the words "having legal capacity". His delegation's reason for inserting those words was to allow no margin for error in the text, for there were several categories of citizens who did not enjoy the franchise, such as lunatics, minors and, in some countries, even women.

The Australian representative had, however, said very pertinently that exceptional cases were covered by the provisions of article 27.

If it was agreed that that was so, his delegation would not insist on the retention of the words "having legal capacity".

MRS. NEWLANDS (New Zealand) said she regarded article 19, which dealt with one of the fundamental and essential elements of democracy – everyone's right to take part in the government of his country – as one of the most important in the declaration.

Some of the amendments, including those submitted by the USSR and Cuba, raised questions previously discussed by the Human Rights Commission. That Commission had declined to allow the expression "will of the people" (which occurred in its text) to be qualified by the words "as expressed in elections, which shall be conducted periodically and must be universal and equal and be held by secret ballot"<sup>1</sup> (which were restated in the form of an amendment by the USSR) on the grounds that such terms referred to matters of detail which were out of place in the general declaration of principle.

There was no need to repeat that in New Zealand elections were conducted on those lines; but her delegation appreciated nevertheless that cases might occur where the secret ballot, for example, might be inappropriate or inadvisable.

With regard to the French amendment, without wishing to start a philosophical discussion she would say that the statement that the authority of government was founded on the will of the people as expressed by free elections was open to challenge. In some countries that authority was actually based on written constitutions which could not be amended save in certain predetermined conditions.

Hence her delegation could not support the French amendment.

On the other hand, she thought that the Swedish amendment contained some interesting passages such as for example its references to the method of enabling the will of the people to be expressed while at the same time avoiding the difficulties inherent in the secret ballot.

The joint Colombian and Costa Rican amendment restated the general principle already contained in the first paragraph of article 19 and in article 17, and therefore seemed redundant.

She concluded by saying that her delegation would not fail to take note of the useful suggestions put forward during the discussion, particularly the wording proposed by the French delegation.

For the time being, however, her delegation was concentrating on the text proposed by the Human Rights Commission.

MR. DEMCHENKO (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) thought the wording adopted by the Human Rights Commission for article 19 was satisfactory on the whole but would be improved by the addition of the USSR amendment.

Some delegations had said that that article was not sufficiently clear and might even be deleted: his answer was that, on the contrary, article 19 was very important and ought to appear in a declaration of human rights.

The declaration should clearly establish everyone's right to elect his representatives and to be elected as representative, and he regretted that the application of that right, which appeared in nearly all national constitutions, was subject to limitations in some countries where very many people were unable to take part in the government of the country on the grounds of race, colour, sex, political opinion, property or birth. Out of the 547 million subjects in the British Empire, 499 million were not represented in the House of Lords or in the House of Commons. Millions of inhabitants of colonial territories were still unable to use their vote to voice their objections to government measures which were frequently directed against the interests of the majority.

He countered the French representative's description of Switzerland as a model democratic State by pointing out that in Switzerland women did not enjoy the franchise.

Furthermore, the very principles on which his country's Government was based were opposed to the theory that the common people could not aspire to public office. In the Ukrainian SSR power was entirely in the hands of the soviets of the towns and villages. Of the 415 deputies including 112 women elected in 1947, for example, 177 were workers, 126 were farmers and agricultural workers and 112 were intellectuals and employees.

His delegation supported article 19 paragraph 2 whereby everyone was given the right of access to public employment in his country regardless of considerations of birth or property. It regretted that in some countries that right was denied to persons holding truly democratic views on the pretext of humiliating "loyalty" tests or on the grounds that they belonged to a left-wing party. By that denial a large part of the population was being kept away from public office and the will of the people was disregarded.

His delegation felt that paragraph 3 of article 19 was inadequate as it stood and should be supplemented by the USSR amendment which emphasized that the will of the people could only be expressed in elections to be conducted periodically and which had to be universal and equal and held by secret ballot. The principal objection to that amendment was that its requirement of a secret ballot would deprive a part of the population, particularly illiterates, of their voting rights. But universal suffrage could easily be guaranteed by constitutional provisions. The criticisms levelled at the USSR amendment were unjustified.

His delegation would therefore support that amendment.

MR. CHANG (China) said that he had listened very carefully to comments by the different delegations on article 19 of the declaration and proposed a new version of that article based on the suggestions of various delegations (A/C.3/333).

Dealing first with paragraph 3, he said that the declaration should proclaim human rights and not stress the authority of Government, as the French delegation's amendment did. For that reason his delegation in paragraph 3 of its amendment proposed that "the will of the people" should become the subject of the first clause. The paragraph would read as follows:

"3. The will of the people is the source of the authority of government; this will shall be expressed in elections, universal, equal, periodic and by secret ballot, or manifested in equivalent free voting procedures."

In the first paragraph of article 19 his delegation proposed adding the words "as a citizen" immediately after the word "everyone". That addition took account of the amendments proposed by the delegations of Cuba and Uruguay. Moreover, the Human Rights Commission had adopted a similar wording in article 20, which began with the words “Everyone, as a member of society”. The French text of this paragraph might be simplified by the omission of the words “qu’elle a”.

In his country the civil service had been in existence for a long time and he emphasized the importance of the idea, not yet realized in the Western world, that civil servants should be recruited by the competitive method to make sure that only qualified persons took a direct part in the public service of their country. Hence he proposed paragraph 2 of article 19 should be amended to read as follows:

“2. Everyone has the right of free and equal access to public service in his country.”

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile), in reply to the representative of Argentina, explained that the Human Rights Commission had split article 19 into three paragraphs so as to indicate more clearly that it dealt with three distinct ideas, all of them essential to the establishment of a democratic State.

Regarding the criticisms directed against the first two paragraphs of that article, his delegation agreed with the Australian representative and proposed the retention of the text adopted by the Human Rights Commission. On the other hand it agreed to any amendments likely to improve the wording of paragraph 3.

Whilst the amendments submitted by France and China provided a perfect synthesis of constructive comments made by the various delegations, he proposed nevertheless that those amendments should state that elections should be genuine and authentic.

He would answer the Ukrainian SSR representative’s criticisms of certain countries by saying that the fact that one and the same Government had remained in office for years was not particularly strong evidence that it represented the will of the people. Furthermore, he did not regard single lists containing virtually only one name as consistent with the definition of universal suffrage.

For those reasons he proposed adding a word such as “genuine” or “authentic” before the word “elections” in the French and Chinese amendments.

MRS. CORBET (United Kingdom) was pleased to note that the Committee had apparently reached agreement on the substance of article 19 of the declaration.

Her delegation thought it desirable, however, to propose an amendment (A/C.3/334) introducing some drafting changes in the second sentence of paragraph 3 as contained in the Chinese amendment.

Moreover, it agreed to the addition of the word “genuine” or “authentic” in paragraph 3, as proposed by the Chilean representative.

She thought it would be preferable not to have set up the drafting sub-committee of which the Australian representative had spoken.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) also noted that the Committee seemed largely to have reached agreement on the substance of article 19 of the declaration.

In reply to the representative of Haiti (132nd meeting) who had mentioned the illiteracy in his country and in many other countries, he said that the declaration could not be based on the conditions prevailing in countries where illiterates were in the majority. It was to be hoped that educational endeavours would make their influence felt in those countries and generally reduce the number of illiterates.

The USSR had found itself in a similar position after the revolution and used to possess a large number of illiterates. To meet that difficulty those illiterates, as well as deaf and blind persons, had been granted the right to be assisted by a friend, neighbour or relative in filling in their voting slips and whilst that was a slight deviation from the principle of the secret ballot it did ensure universal suffrage.

Hence he was unable to see what danger the guarantee of the secret ballot could give rise to.

His delegation regretted to note that in some countries large sections of the population were barred from voting on the grounds of race, prop-[465]erty, sex, birth or political opinion. In the United States, for example, where every elector was required to satisfy a minimum property qualification and to be a taxpayer, less than 50 per cent of the 90 million electors had voted in the recent elections. Those figures might be compared with those of the recent elections in the Soviet Union, where out of 101,717,000 electors 101,450,000 (or 99.7 per cent) had voted.

His delegation preferred the wording of paragraph 3 as given in the French amendment to that of the Chinese amendment because the latter expressed a hope rather than a necessity.

It should be categorically stated that the authority of the Government was founded on the will of the people. In the Soviet Union for example, 1,400,000 representatives of the will of the people were taking a direct part in government.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) said he had little to add to the statement he had made at the previous meeting. Of the amendments submitted since he had spoken, his delegation would not support that of the Iraqi delegation which mentioned referenda and plebiscites as a means of expressing the will of the people: those were methods to be resorted to only in certain carefully defined circumstances which in other cases met with very distinct political objections.

It was difficult to say whether the French or Chinese was the better of the two amendments submitted by the respective delegations. He personally preferred Mr. Cassin's text, possibly because Mr. Chang's version had not yet appeared in French. However that might be, both those amendments had the advantage of taking account of the secret ballot which was the best guarantee of free and genuine elections. There was no real basis for the objection of illiteracy; where it existed it should be removed and the citizen should be raised to the status of an elector fully conscious of his responsibilities. As illiteracy still existed in the world, however, it must be taken into account, and that could be done by means of the amendment submitted by the Chinese and French delegations, the wording of which was sufficiently elastic.

He felt bound, however, to refer to the observation he had made (132nd meeting) about the need for several lists of candidates because the very essence of the democratic system was the electoral competition between different political parties. In the absence of a guarantee of a competition based on the existence of several lists of candidates, the whole democratic character of free, equal, periodical and secret elections might be distorted.

Hence, his delegation felt bound to abide by the amendment which it had submitted at the previous meeting and which it re-submitted as an amendment to both the French and Chinese texts.

MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) said the Committee's discussion had shown that there was a possibility of reaching a generally acceptable solution.

Speaking on the French and Chinese proposals, he mentioned that in his country the authority of [465] Government was founded not on popular elections but on the Constitution. That was his reason for suggesting that paragraph 3 of article 19 should be replaced by the following text (A/C.3/335):

“Everyone has the right to require that the Government of his country should conform to the constitutional system which has been freely established by the will of the people.”

That had the advantage of laying down the principle of the constitutionality of governmental authority. The popular character of the government would be guaranteed by the provisions of the first paragraph.

Furthermore, his delegation would like it to be clearly established that when the Committee came to vote on article 19, adoption of that article would imply acceptance of the following principles:

1. Absolute equality of the political rights of men and women;
2. A ban on any discrimination in the grant and exercise of political rights on the grounds of race, colour, sex, language or property;
3. A ban on any discrimination in the granting and exercise of political rights on the grounds of political opinion.

His delegation would have liked to see the general reservations concerning non-discrimination mentioned in article 2 restated in article 19. In any case his delegation urged that it should be fully understood that the interpretation of article 19 would have to be indissolubly linked with the interpretation of article 2.

MR. ANZE MATIENZO (Bolivia) said he would not press the draft amendment he had submitted; it introduced no more fresh factors than the draft submitted by the Chinese delegation.

The first paragraph of his text had differed from the Chinese text in so far as it claimed the right of citizenship for any person not under a legal disability, whilst the Chinese text merely spoke of “everyone, as a citizen”.

The second paragraph had been worded as follows: “everyone not disqualified on moral or intellectual grounds has the right of access to public employment”. He was surprised that this text had been criticized as being too restrictive. Surely public office involved responsibilities towards the community and it was natural, therefore, that public office should not be entrusted to anybody disqualified on moral or intellectual grounds.

His third paragraph had been based on the various drafts submitted by Costa Rica and Colombia, France and the USSR.

That amendment had expressed his delegation’s view on the subject. As, however, it had not been deemed acceptable, he would support the new French text, subject to the addition of the Belgian amendment.

MR. SAINT-LOT (Haiti) regarded article 19 as one of the most important in the declaration since it established the right to vote and since, by [466] that very right, the peoples would be enabled to confirm the rights and freedoms proclaimed in the declaration of human rights. The free exercise of the franchise was the means whereby the peoples could express or withdraw their confidence in their Governments.

For those reasons he felt that the Third Committee should do its utmost to establish that right in the strongest possible terms. No representative had protested against the limitation introduced by the mention of the secret ballot, and yet that was precisely the pretext which might be used by any Government which was not truly democratic to justify such restrictions as they might be induced to introduce to limit universal suffrage. Such Governments might, for example, require the elector to draw up his own voting slip and thus disfranchise a section of the working masses.

He reminded the members of the Committee that they were drafting a declaration which was not addressed solely to the Western hemisphere, but to the entire world; and according to figures supplied by UNESCO, illiteracy was still very common, 85 per cent of the population of the world being illiterate.

He urged the French representative, whose nation had done so much in the fight for universal suffrage, and the Chinese representative, in whose country there were still so many illiterates, to drop the words “secret ballot” from their amendments.

He was surprised that the Cuban delegation by introducing the words “having legal capacity” should continue to advocate a formula which was also capable of lending itself to restrictive practices.

Universal suffrage was one of the latest of man’s conquests and had not yet been sufficiently consolidated, for electoral fraud was extremely difficult to prevent. Accordingly, he thought it preferable not to place a further weapon in the hands of people desirous of “rigging” elections; it would be better merely to mention universal suffrage, while emphasizing that it should be genuine and authentic, without referring to the secret ballot.

MR. GARCÍA BAUER (Guatemala) noted that the Committee had heard several divergent views which deserved very careful consideration.

He therefore proposed the appointment of a drafting sub-committee with instructions to study those points and to prepare a combined text incorporating all the points of view.

MRS. LINDSTRÖM (Sweden) considered that the new proposal submitted by the Chinese delegation took the different points of view into account and might be regarded as an acceptable compromise solution. Accordingly she would withdraw her own amendment and considered it unnecessary to employ the services of a drafting sub-committee.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) said he was all the less inclined to support the idea of appointing a drafting sub-committee on article 19 since it [467] would be necessary before long to establish a sub-committee to co-ordinate the text of the declaration as a whole.

MR. ABADI (Iraq), MR. CONTOUMAS (Greece) and MR. CHANG (China) also expressed themselves against the idea of appointing a drafting sub-committee to deal with article 19.

MR. COROMINAS (Argentina), MR. SAINT-LOT (Haiti) and MR. CAÑAS (Costa Rica) supported the Guatemalan representative’s proposal on account of the many amendments to which article 19 had given rise.

MRS. BEGRUP (Denmark), seconded by MRS. CORBET (United Kingdom) and MRS. NEWLANDS (New Zealand), proposed that the authors of the various amendments should meet unofficially to prepare a joint text.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics), seconded by MR. KAMINSKY (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic), made a formal proposal to adjourn the discussion on article 19 until 4.30 p.m., when it should be resumed, on the understanding that the authors of the various amendments would use the intervening time to draft a joint text.

MR. GARCÍA BAUER (Guatemala) withdraw his proposal in favour of the one submitted by the representative of the USSR.

THE CHAIRMAN asked for a vote on the motion for the adjournment.

He made it clear that the authors of the various amendments would remain at liberty to consult with one another with a view to drafting a joint text.

The motion was adopted unanimously.

The meeting rose at 1:20 p.m.

Summary Record of the Hundred and Thirty-Fourth Meeting
[of the Third Committee]

Held at the Palais de Chaillot, Paris, on Friday,
12 November 1948, at 4.30 p.m.

Chairman: Mr. CHARLES MALIK (Lebanon).

THE CHAIRMAN reminded the Committee that the discussion on article 19 of the draft international declaration of human rights was closed.

Agreement had been reached on the deletion of the words “as a citizen” from the first line of paragraph 1 of the compromise text proposed by China (A/C.3/333).

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) was ready to accept paragraph 1 of the Chinese compromise proposal, but reserved his decision on paragraphs 2 and 3.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the proposal of the representative of Greece (132nd meeting) to delete the word “his” before the words “freely chosen representatives” in paragraph 1 of the text of article 19 as adopted by the Commission on Human Rights.

The proposal was adopted by 30 votes to 2, with 1 abstention.

Paragraph 1, as amended, was adopted by 37 votes to 1, with 2 abstentions.

MR. ABADI (Iraq) made it clear that, in the opinion of his Government, it was understood that the word “Government” in the English text could in no case be applied to a clique which had seized power, but that it referred essentially to the entire structure of the Government and the State.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the proposal to add the words “and equal” after the words “Everyone has the right of free” in paragraph 2.

*The proposal was adopted by 41 votes to none, with 1 abstention.
It was decided, by 27 votes to none, with 15 abstentions, to substitute the word “service” for the word “employment” in the English text.*

THE CHAIRMAN put paragraph 2, as amended, to the vote.

Paragraph 2, as amended, was adopted by 43 votes to none, with 3 abstentions.

MR. CHANG (China) suggested a few changes in the compromise text which he had proposed for paragraph 3 (A/C.3/333). The paragraph would read as follows:

“The will of the people is the basis of the authority of government; this will shall be expressed in periodic elections, which shall be universal, genuine, equal, and held by secret ballot, or manifested in equivalent free voting procedures.”

MRS. CORBET (United Kingdom) withdrew the proposal which had been made by her delegation concerning paragraph 3 (A/C.3/334), in view of the improvements made by the representative of China in his compromise text.

MR. CASSIN (France) thought the formula he had presented (A/C.3/244/Rev.2) was preferable, but that the compromise text of the representative of China, as then worded, would fit better into the declaration as a whole.

In those circumstances, he withdrew his amendment.

MR. SAINT-LOT (Haiti) requested that the text proposed by China for paragraph 3 should be put to the vote in parts and that the vote should be taken by roll-call on the words “by secret ballot”.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) withdrew his amendment (A/C.3/232).

MR. COROMINAS (Argentina) declared he would vote in favour of article 19 as a whole but he pointed out that paragraph 3 of that article as drafted in the text proposed by the representative of China constituted rather a statement of fact and did not establish a right.

Furthermore, he thought that while the balloting should be secret, the counting of the votes should be public.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) wondered whether the last phrase of the French text of paragraph 3 (A/C.3/333) referred to the elections or to the will of the people. According to the English text, it would seem that the proposal referred to the will of the people: in that case, the French text would have to be improved.

He asked the representative of Haiti to accept the term “secret ballot”.

MR. SAINT-LOT (Haiti) feared that, in an attempt to obtain absolute secrecy, the universal character of the secret ballot might be affected.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) suggested the following wording: “The will of the people shall be the basis of the power. . .”

MRS. CORBET (United Kingdom) preferred the word “authority” to “power”.

MR. AQUINO (Philippines) preferred “the will of the people is the source of the authority” to “the will of the people shall be the basis of the authority”. This was a recognition of a fact.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) requested that the words “secret ballot” should be replaced by the words “secret vote”. The remark made by the representative of Argentina on that point had been quite correct.

MR. BARODY (Saudi Arabia) wished to explain, before the vote was taken, why he would vote in favour of the Egyptian amendment (A/C.3/294) and why he would abstain from voting on most of the other amendments.

He thought the Egyptian amendment admirably concise, yet comprehensive, but it could perhaps be made still clearer by the addition of the words “at the same time” after the words “freely and”.

With respect to the various other amendments, he thought they went into too much detail as regards electoral and other procedures.

THE CHAIRMAN made it clear that the term “secret ballot” should not be understood to mean the counting of the ballot-papers, which should be public, but the casting of the ballot-paper in the electoral box, an act which should be performed in private.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) stated that to show a spirit of conciliation, he was ready to withdraw his amendment if the representative of China would accept the following wording for the beginning of paragraph 3: “The will of the people shall be the basis of the authority of the Government.”

He asked the representative of Belgium whether he would agree to withdraw his amendment, which he thought took into account too many details which were not applicable in all countries. If the Committee adopted the Belgian amendment, the text of article 19 would be in contradiction with the electoral procedures of the USSR, for example, which differed in certain aspects from those of other countries. He thought that might even be considered as a kind of intervention in the domestic affairs of his country, and he insisted that each country should be willing to respect the [470] customs and practices of other countries. It would be sufficient if article 19 noted the necessity for free elections and equal suffrage for all.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) shared the view of the USSR representative with respect to the substitution of “shall be” for “is”, but he strongly regretted that a proposal had been made to substitute “basis” for “source”. He asked the representative of China whether he would insist upon that word.

He would also like the words “according to the party system” to be inserted after the word “periodic”; that would permit the introduction into article 19 of the idea of duality or plurality of parties, which was essential to the efficient functioning of the democratic system.

He asked that a roll-call vote should be taken on the Chinese amendment.

He was quite satisfied with the last part of paragraph 3, “or by equivalent free voting procedures”. However, he thought “secret vote” preferable to “secret ballot” because, as the Chairman had pointed out, the word “ballot” referred either to the electoral procedure as a whole, or to the counting of ballots. It was quite obvious that while the secrecy of the vote must be assured, balloting should take place in public.

He did not think it necessary to add the words “and universal suffrage” after the words “free voting procedures” as the representative of Haiti had suggested. Such an addition would, he considered, make the whole of paragraph 3 quite unreadable.

MR. CASSIN (France) thought the expression “the will of the people is the source of the authority. . .” was much stronger than “the will of the people shall be the basis of the authority”, since it stated a principle. That was, in his opinion, a point of fundamental importance.

Referring to the remark of the Cuban representative, he admitted it was better to speak of “vote” than “ballot”, in order to avoid confusion between the vote, which must be secret, and the counting of the vote, which must take place in public.

As regards the amendments made by the Chinese representative to his compromise text, he pointed out that the word “genuine” should immediately precede “periodic elections”; obviously the whole of the election proceedings, not just the actual vote, should be genuine.

He approved the Belgian amendment in principle, but noted that it was scarcely in accordance with French law: in France there were several voting procedures, and it would be difficult, in some cases, to have several lists.

MR. CHANG (China) thought the expression “the will of the people is the source of the authority. . .” was a positive statement of fact; “shall be the basis”, on the contrary, would indicate that such was not always the case in certain countries. It was for that reason that he preferred “shall be the basis”, it being generally understood that the will of the people should in all cases be the basis of the authority of the Government.

That wording should also satisfy the Argentine representative, since it was no longer a simple statement of fact, but the proclamation of a right.

He proposed the following wording for paragraph 3:

“The will of the people shall be the basis of the authority of government; this will shall be expressed in periodic and genuine elections, which shall be universal and equal, and shall be held by secret vote, or by equivalent free voting procedures.”

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) pointed out that, in his country, plurality of lists was synonymous with plurality of parties. The conception he wished to introduce into the text of the article was that of the plurality of parties, and he proposed to add the words “according to the party system” after “which shall be conducted periodically”.

THE CHAIRMAN stated that it would be impossible in practice to introduce that amendment into the English text.

MR. KAMINSKY (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) thought the Belgian amendment unacceptable in that it modified the substance of the article.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) agreed with Mr. Kaminsky, and recalled that, in his country, the bourgeois class had ceased to exist. There thus remained only workers and peasants, and the Communist Party by itself was capable of looking after their interests. Did they want the USSR to import a foreign bourgeois class in order to re-establish the party system? Did they want the USSR to liquidate its existing system and renounce its existing social structure? Under the prevailing system, there was no justification for the creation of other parties.

The Belgian amendment was absolutely irreconcilable with the social structure of certain Member States.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) withdrew his amendment as a conciliatory gesture.

He pointed out, however, that there existed in the USSR not only the Communist Party, but also the non-party bloc.

The representative of Haiti asked that the vote be taken by roll-call on the retention of the words “and held by secret ballot” in paragraph 3.

The vote was taken by roll-call, as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Argentina, Australia, Belgium, Brazil, Burma, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Chile, China, Colombia, Costa Rica, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Ethiopia, France, Greece, Honduras, India, Iran, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Panama, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Sweden, Syria, Turkey, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Kingdom, Uruguay, Venezuela, Yugoslavia.

Against: Guatemala, Haiti.

Abstaining: Bolivia, Canada, Ecuador, Lebanon, Mexico, Saudi Arabia, United States of America.

[472]

By 38 votes to 2, with 7 abstentions, the words were retained.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the last text proposed by the Chinese representative for paragraph 3.

That text was adopted by 39 votes to 3, with 3 abstentions.

MR. GARCÍA BAUER (Guatemala) said he had voted against the text proposed by the Chinese representative because he thought it out of place in the declaration.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) requested that the vote on the amendment proposed by Colombia and Costa Rica (A/C.3/248) be taken in parts, the first going as far as the words “by legal means”.

THE CHAIRMAN put that first part of the amendment to the vote.

That part was rejected by 18 votes to 14, with 9 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN declared that the amendment as a whole was rejected. He put article 19 as a whole, as amended, to the vote.

Article 19, as amended, was adopted by 39 votes to 1, with 1 abstention.

MR. SAINT-LOT (Haiti) stated that he had voted against the text of article 19 in its final form.

He protested against the “secret” nature of the vote. That term might be used as a pretext for any restrictions the non-democratic countries might wish to impose.

MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) had voted against paragraph 3 of article 19. It contained expressions of a philosophical kind which he considered out of place there.

MR. CASSIN (France) had thought the words “equal access” had been replaced by the words “free and equal access” in the second clause. He had voted for paragraph 3, and for the text as a whole.

A declaration of rights should express collective rights as well as individual rights.

He regretted that the word “is” had been replaced by the words “shall be”; that substitution reduced the scope of text. Nevertheless, the adoption by the Committee of a formula of that kind was in itself an achievement.

MR. CARRERA ANDRADE (Ecuador) had abstained from voting on the Chinese amendment because, in his opinion, the Commission’s original text was more complete.

Paragraph 3 of the Chinese amendment contained concepts which were doubtless on an exalted philosophical plane, but which were out of place in article 19.

MR. SANDIFER (United States of America) had abstained from voting on paragraph 3. He thought, in fact, that the first part of that paragraph proclaimed a political principle rather than a human right, a theoretical concept rather than a human concept.

As regards paragraph 2, he agreed with the substance, the principle of free periodic elections; [473] but considered the details of the text unsatisfactory.

MR. PLAZA (Venezuela) had voted in favour of article 19 in its amended form.

He regretted the withdrawal of the Belgian amendment and the rejection of the Colombian and Costa Rican amendments, which would have completed the text admirably.

MISS BERNARDINO (Dominican Republic) was glad that it had been agreed to delete the word “citizen” in the original Chinese amendment (A/C.3/333). That word would have been contradictory to article 2 of the declaration, according to which all the rights and freedoms proclaimed in the declaration were recognized as applying to any persons, without distinction as to race, colour, sex, etc.

The representative of the Dominican Republic regretted that there still existed constitutions which granted the status or condition of citizenship only to male nationals, openly denying those rights to women.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) had voted in favour of the compromise which had finally been adopted, and which had been arrived at as a result of sincere collaboration between many delegations. It was one of the all too rare cases when the Committee had adopted progressive ideas. The conciliatory spirit manifested on that occasion was very encouraging, and gave grounds for unbounded hope in the future of the United Nations. That new spirit of co-operation had just led to concrete and positive results.

The USSR delegation was particularly pleased to see that its wishes on a number of points had been taken into account; gaps in the text had been filled, and a statement of the principle of freedom of elections had been inserted into the text.

Summary Record of the Hundred and Thirty-Seventh Meeting
[of the Third Committee]

Held at the Palais de Chaillot, Paris, on Monday,
15 November 1948, at 11.30 a.m.

Chairman: MR. CHARLES MALIK (Lebanon).

62. Draft international declaration of human rights

THE CHAIRMAN announced that the General Committee had requested the various Committees to take measures to avoid unnecessary discussion. At the end of the following meeting he would ask the Committee to decide on a time limit for the submission of amendments to the preamble of the declaration.

On the request of the representative of Chile, it was agreed that the time limit to be set for the submission of amendments to the preamble would also apply to the amendments affecting articles 27 and 28.

THE CHAIRMAN announced that the first seventeen articles had already appeared in four of the official languages and that the Chinese text would be ready by the end of the month.

MR. AIKMAN (New Zealand) pointed out that the New Zealand amendment to article 20

(A/C.3/267) was consequential to the New Zealand amendment to article 22 and, in view of this, wondered what would be the best procedure to follow.

MR. ALVARADO (Peru), supported by MR. CASSIN (France) and MR. SAGUÉS (Chile), considered that the New Zealand amendment to article 20 was based on an erroneous interpretation of the expression “social security”. As it was used in article 20, it meant social justice in the broad sense and not the protection of the individual from want in the narrow technical sense.

On the understanding that he would be able to reintroduce his amendment to article 20 if the New Zealand delegation’s amendment to article 22 were adopted, MR. AIKMAN (New Zealand) withdrew his amendment.

In order to speed up the work of the Committee, and because the Argentine amendment (A/C.3/251/Corr.I) was substantially the same as article 22, MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) requested the Argentine representative to withdraw it, and submit it in connexion with article 22.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba), supported by MR. ALVARADO (Peru), considered it most important that the Committee should hear an explanation of the exact meaning of the expression “social security” in article 20 from a member of the Commission on Human Rights.

MR. COROMINAS (Argentina) pointed out that the words “as a member of society” in the present text were superfluous since everyone was automatically a member of society. The declaration should not try to obligate States to recognize rights, as they might not be able to implement them fully. The last phrase of the basic text of the article was open to objection because it referred to later articles which had not yet been drafted in final form and would have to be read before article 20 became fully intelligible. That might weaken the effect of article 20 at that stage of the debate. Moreover, article 20 should be able to stand by itself.

Social security, in his view, meant the right of the individual to be protected against the consequences of a reduction, suspension or loss of the ability to earn a livelihood. Governments should make the effort to protect the individual against certain unforeseen eventualities which might result in loss or lack of livelihood.

Social security was not in itself a new kind of right; it was the culmination of an aspiration which had reached fulfilment in some national legislations as the result of struggles throughout the past century. It was, however, a right which differed from and was independent of all other rights; and it should be stated as such in the declaration. It should not be made dependent upon other rights. The defect of the basic text was that it suggested that social security was dependent. That the USSR amendment (E/800, page 34) itself implied that social security was an independent right was shown by the words “in particular” in its second sentence. The last phrase of the USSR amendment coincided with the basic views of the Argentine delegation, which agreed [498] that implementation must be conditioned by the social and economic resources of each State.

Article 20 referred to social security in its broad sense. He agreed with the representative of France that it would be generally understood in that sense.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) said that the Cuban amendment (A/C.3/232) would meet part of the Argentine representative’s objection to the basic text. To refer to later articles weakened article 20; the article should stand by itself. The form of words proposed in his amendment had been used several times previously in the declaration. An alternative might be to substitute for the words “set out below” the words “as defined by the present declaration”. A statement of social rights was one of the most important points in the declaration; it should not be weak or vague.

MR. DE LA OSSA (Panama) said that the basic text was acceptable, but it failed to specify that social security should be guaranteed throughout the individual’s existence. His amendment (A/C.3/280), therefore, proposed insertion of the phrase made famous by Lord Beveridge, a recognized authority on the subject.<sup>108</sup> Protection should be afforded, for instance, to the posthumous child. Mr. de la Ossa would vote for the basic text with the Panamanian amendment.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) recalled that, in the Commission on Human Rights, the French and Lebanese representatives had proposed the insertion in the declaration of article 20 to serve as a preamble to articles 21 to 26, in order to emphasize the importance of the economic and social rights stated therein.<sup>1</sup> Those rights had not appeared in any of the previous declarations of the rights of man; their inclusion was a result of the social progress achieved in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries.

The USSR amendment to that article (E/800, page 34) comprised two parts. The first stressed the need to ensure for every individual a real opportunity to enjoy all the rights mentioned in the declaration. It should be noted in passing that the Argentine representative had entirely failed to take that first part into account in his observations.

The second part of the USSR amendment laid emphasis on the special importance of economic, social and cultural rights, which were mentioned separately, and further singled out the right to social security. It then indicated what measures might be taken to ensure those rights, with the qualification that due regard should be paid to the organization and resources of each State.

Mr. Pavlov drew attention to the fact that the words "social security", as used in his amendment, were broader in meaning than the concept of social insurance, which was covered in article 22, and referred to social welfare in general. Such matters as disability, unemployment and old age were dealt with concretely in article 22; for that reason, the Argentine amendment (A/C.3/

251/Corr.1), which also made specific mention of them, should be considered in connexion with that article. Article 20 did not attempt to give a definition of social security, but merely stressed its importance.

The text of article 20 as adopted by the Commission on Human Rights was inadequate and couched in too general terms. The USSR amendment, on the other hand, was clear and concrete, and contained not only the idea that the State and society must ensure to the individual the realization of social, economic and cultural rights, but also the idea that they must give him a real opportunity to enjoy all the other rights set forth in the declaration.

Mr. Pavlov agreed that article 20 should apply to the whole life span of the individual. He therefore supported the principle of the Panamanian amendment.

MR. CASSIN (France) remarked that the USSR representative had correctly traced the history of article 20. The Commission had had before it five articles dealing with social rights,<sup>1</sup> which were different in character from any rights outlined in earlier declarations of the rights of man. They all had in common the fact that national effort and international co-operation were needed for their realization. In order to avoid repetition of some such statement in every article, the Lebanese and French delegations had proposed the text of article 20, to serve as an introduction to the subsequent articles. It was not intended as a statement of any right but as an "umbrella" article. Amendments dealing with specific social rights should therefore be considered in connexion with articles 21, 22 and 23.

The French delegation had wished the words "social security" to appear in article 22. When, however, the Commission had decided to delete them from that article,<sup>2</sup> the French delegation, thinking it inconceivable that an international declaration of human rights drafted at the present moment in history should not contain a single mention of them, proposed their insertion, in a broadly humanitarian rather than in a technical sense, in article 20, where they were then to be found.

If the Committee agreed with the New Zealand representative that the words “social security” in their technical sense should be used in article 22, some phrase of a general nature, such as “protection against social insecurity” or “social justice” should be used in article 20, in order to prevent confusion. The words “social security” must, however, appear somewhere in the declaration. If they were not inserted in article 22, Mr. Cassin reserved the right to bring the matter up again with respect to article 20.

He pointed out that the only controversial parts of the article appeared to be the phrase “social security” and the final words, “set out below”. He thought the article as a whole should be retained, but agreed with the Cuban representative that the final words should be replaced either by the phrase proposed by the latter, or by some other form of words which would make the statement contained in article 20 an independent one. The rights “set out below” were only some of the rights to which the broad general statement should apply; that statement should not be bounded by the limited attainments of contemporary society.

Mr. Cassin was not opposed to the substance of the USSR amendment. He did not think, however, that a special guarantee should be made of the economic and social rights, important as they were. It would be preferable, at the end of the declaration to add an article urging States to do their utmost to guarantee the rights granted in the document and to alter their laws, if necessary, for that purpose.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) agreed with the USSR and French representatives that article 20 had been intended as a preamble to articles dealing with economic and social rights.

He too thought the Argentine amendment should be reintroduced in connexion with article 22, as it dealt with social security as protection of the individual in any circumstances which made it impossible for him to earn his living. Social security was used in a much broader sense in article 20. It referred also to the protection of the right to subsistence, the right to work, the right to medical services not only of those who, through some circumstance, lost their capacity to work but of all human beings in all circumstances.

In order to avoid confusion with respect to the meaning of the words “social security” in article 20, he thought the article might be redrafted to begin as follows:

“Everyone, as a member of society, has the right to be protected, biologically and economically, against insecurity.”

He supported the Cuban amendment for the reasons given by the Cuban and French representatives.

He found the USSR amendment too long. He did not, however, have any quarrel with the ideas it contained, in particular, the guarantee of economic, social and cultural rights by the State and society. As those rights differed from all other rights in that they required positive action by the State before they could be enjoyed, it was quite proper to impose a definite obligation on the State in that regard.

Summary Record of the Hundred and Thirty-Eighth Meeting
[of the Third Committee]

Held at the Palais de Chaillot, Paris, on Monday,
15 November 1948, at 3:15 p.m.

Chairman: MR. CHARLES MALIK (Lebanon).

MR. MAYBANK (Canada) defined his delegation's attitude towards article 20 and the three [501] following articles and said that after careful consideration the Canadian delegation had decided to abstain in the vote. However, he wished to emphasize that his abstention should not be interpreted as opposition to the principles set forth in those four articles.

Whatever obligations might arise under the Declaration of Human Rights, the Canadian Federal Government would not invade the field of Canadian provincial jurisdiction in such matters as education. For that reason the Canadian delegation would abstain. By the legislative measures it had adopted, the Canadian people had shown its support of the principles stated in the articles mentioned above and would continue to respect them in the future as it had respected them in the past.

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) emphasized that the essential elements of article 20 were the two phrases "through national effort and international co-operation" and "in accordance with the organization and resources of each State". By the use of those phrases in article 20, the Commission on Human Rights had intended the article as something of an introduction to the subsequent articles. It had therefore effected a compromise between the views of certain Governments, which were anxious that the State should give special recognition to the economic, social and cultural rights of the individual and the views of Governments, such as the United States Government, which considered that the obligations of the State should not be specified. The Commission hoped that the text it had drafted would be adopted without amendments or important modifications.

She went on to consider the various amendments made to article 20 (A/C.3/297/Rev.1). The USSR amendment (E/800, page 34) stressed the obligations devolving on the State and attached special importance to economic, social and cultural rights. But the declaration should enunciate the rights of man and not the obligations of the State. Furthermore, economic, social and cultural rights, though important, were not more important than political rights.

The amendment proposed by the Argentine delegation (A/C.3/251/Corr.1) modified the logical structure of the part of the declaration to which it referred. It was because article 20 had been conceived as an introduction to subsequent articles that it referred to economic, social and cultural rights, as well as to social security. It would perhaps have been preferable to use a term other than "social security", and a suggestion to that effect had been made. The text proposed by Argentina, which retained only social security would thus have a restrictive sense. Mrs. Roosevelt hoped that the Argentine delegation would not press its amendment.

To the representative of the United States, the amendment of Panama (A/C.3/280) had a too familiar ring.

The delegation of New Zealand had suggested (A/C.3/267) that the reference to social security should be deleted from article 20 and inserted in [502] article 22. That proposal was not devoid of logic, but, again, it should not be forgotten that article 20 was intended to serve as an introduction to article 22.

The representative of the United States thought that the Cuban amendment (A/C.3/232) should not be retained. She emphasized that the initial text of article 20 was the result of a compromise, which it would be preferable not to question again. She suggested, however, that the words "set out below" should be replaced by the words "defined in the present declaration".

MR. COROMINAS (Argentina) observed that the text of article 20 was the result of a compromise between the members of the Commission on Human Rights, but not between the members of the Assembly. The Third Committee must achieve a compromise in its turn. Reference had been made to the history of article 20 and to the large number of drafts which had been taken into account. One of those drafts,<sup>1</sup> stated that "everyone had the right to social security" and added that the State had a duty to maintain or ensure the maintenance of measures for the protection of the individual against the consequences of illness, disability, etc. and all other loss of livelihood for reasons beyond his control. Motherhood and children should be granted special protection. Thus the article clearly emphasized social security. Later social security seemed to have been relegated to the background and the vague text at present before the Committee agreed upon.

He considered it important to distinguish between the social security resulting from a certain way of life, and social insurance, which was an administrative function, private or public. The Argentine amendment aimed at securing recognition of the principle of social security, which should be clearly established in the declaration.

The Panamanian amendment referred to the protection of man from the cradle to the grave. Man, however, existed even before he reached the cradle and for that reason measures had been envisaged for the protection of pregnant women.

MR. CAMPOS ORTIZ (Mexico) thought it necessary, as did the representative of the United States, to retain article 20 as an introduction to the articles which followed. But the article should be improved.

The USSR amendment was of the very greatest importance, stressing as it did the duty of the State to take the necessary measures to ensure for every individual a real opportunity to enjoy the rights enumerated in the declaration. But the representative of Mexico thought it would be preferable to define the obligations of the State in a separate article.

While expressing his agreement with the Argentine amendment, he regarded it as more readily applicable to article 22.

The Mexican representative considered that the first part of the article (“Everyone, as a member of society, has the right to social security”) was neither sufficiently precise nor sufficiently general. The article would acquire greater precision by the addition of the words: “from the cradle to the grave” as proposed in the Panamanian amendment, thus introducing an idea recognized by recent legislation in the United Kingdom. The second part of the article would be improved by the Cuban amendment, which would make the article what the Commission had obviously intended.

MR. CARRERA ANDRADE (Ecuador) proposed the deletion of the last three words “set out below” and that article 20 should read as follows:

“Everyone, as a member of society, has the right to social security as well as to the realization of the economic, social and cultural rights set forth in articles 21, 22, 23, 24, 25 and 26 of the present declaration, through national effort and international co-operation and in accordance with the organization and resources of each State.”

The representative of Ecuador pressed for the retention of the phrase “social security”. A principle was involved which was recognized by the majority of Latin American States and which should not be confused with social insurance, by which was understood the solution adopted by Great Britain in regard to the problem of social security.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) was of the opinion that, if the Committee envisaged any reference to social security in the article under discussion, it would perhaps be better to use different terms, which would not be ambiguous. Nothing in the text of the article made it possible to distinguish between social security in the broad sense and social insurance. The Lebanese representative also thought that social security was dependent upon the implementation of economic, social and cultural rights and should not be considered on the same level as those rights.

In order to give the concept of social security its full meaning, Mr. Azkoul proposed the deletion from the first part of the article of the words: "social security as well as" and the addition of the words "to social security" in the Cuban amendment after the word "essential". The Cuban amendment would thus read as follows: "essential for his social security, his dignity and the free development of his personality".

The Lebanese delegation was all the more ready to support the Cuban amendment in view of the request it had put forward during discussion of article 3, that the idea of the free development of personality should be introduced in that article; the majority of representatives had then proposed the inclusion of the idea in article 20.

The Lebanese delegation, on the other hand, was unable to accept the USSR amendment. That amendment, which gave almost undue importance to economic, social and cultural rights, nevertheless merely stated that "it is considered desirable that they be implemented". A mere expression of a desire seemed somewhat ineffective in connexion with rights which had been described as of such great importance. The Lebanese representative thought that the principle contained in the USSR amendment would more properly fit in the preamble.

He thought it would be more appropriate to consider the Argentine amendment when the Committee proceeded to discuss article 22.

Finally, he regarded the Panamanian amendment as entirely unnecessary, since it went without saying that a man had the right to social security from birth to death.

MR. KAYALY (Syria) proposed that the phrase "social security" should be replaced by the phrase "social justice", which would express a broader concept. It would provide a means of reconciling all the points of view which had been expressed. On the other hand, he proposed that there should be no reference to economic, social and cultural rights in article 20, since those rights were the subject of later articles. Article 20 would thus be drafted as follows:

"Everyone, as a member of society, has the right to social justice and is entitled to the realization of that right, through national effort and international co-operation, and in accordance with the organization and resources of each State."

MRS. CORBET (United Kingdom) thought that article 20 should be regarded as an introduction to the succeeding articles, in keeping with the intentions of the Commission on Human Rights.

The words "social security" seemed to give rise to confusion. She pointed out that in Great Britain they had a precise technical meaning. It was not a question of social insurance. Great Britain had a system of family allowances, which had no connexion with insurance, but which formed part of the social security programme.

She could not support the Syrian amendment to the effect that the words "social security" should be replaced by the words "social justice", which derived from a more complex idea. She considered, however, that the reference to social security might be deleted from article 20 and inserted in article 22. She therefore requested the Argentine representative to withdraw his amendment and submit it again during discussion of article 22.

The United Kingdom delegation supported the Cuban amendment as modified by Lebanon.

The Panamanian amendment no longer had any raison d'être if, as the Lebanese amendment proposed, the reference to social security were deleted from the first part of article 20. Moreover, social security began before the cradle.

With regard to the USSR amendment, Mrs. Corbet considered that article 20 should guarantee the fundamental rights of the individual. It would be more appropriate for the duties of society and the State to be set out in the covenant.

MRS. NEWLANDS (New Zealand) emphasized that in article 20, the Committee was dealing with the most important part of the declaration, namely, the part which recognized the economic, social and cultural rights of the individual. There seemed to be no difference of opinion in the Committee on that point. It was only on matters of form that agreement had not yet been reached.

The New Zealand delegation had submitted an amendment which was also only a matter of drafting. It suggested that mention should be made in article 22 of "social security", because there those words would have an exact technical meaning [505] which was preferable to the more general meaning they would have in the framework of article 20. The New Zealand delegation had withdrawn its amendment because it attached such great importance to the words "social security" that it did not wish to see them deleted from article 20 without being sure that they would be inserted in article 22. Mrs. Newlands recalled that the Commission on Human Rights had included the idea of social security in the text of article 20 of the draft only because it had been left out of the original draft of article 22.

In connexion with the amendment submitted by the USSR delegation, the New Zealand delegation wished to state that its Government would accept the statement of the State's duties contained therein, including all that it implied in the way of obligations. But it seemed that it would be better if such a statement were inserted in the covenant rather than in the declaration. For that reason the New Zealand delegation could not support the USSR amendment, although recognizing that the type of rights enumerated in articles 20 to 26 stressed the question of responsibility of the community towards the individual even more definitely than had the rights so far set forth. It was, however, glad to note that the text of article 20 brought out that aspect of the problem by emphasizing the necessity not only for national effort but for international co-operation in order to achieve the social security of the individual.

The New Zealand delegation would therefore vote for the basic text of article 20. In addition it was ready to support any proposal which expressed the idea of social security in any other satisfactory way.

MR. NOSEK (Czechoslovakia) was also of the opinion that article 20 was the introduction to one of the most important parts of the declaration. The idea of social security in article 20 covered all the economic, social and cultural freedoms stated in articles 21 to 26 of the draft declaration.

But it would be wrong to understand by "social security" only the measures designed to protect the social and economic freedoms of men. In the opinion of the Czechoslovak delegation social security represented all economic and, therefore, social conditions which ensured man a decent standard of living. It was therefore not sufficient to state the right to social security. The right to enjoy it must be guaranteed if it was not to be limited to a mere statement of a theoretical right and if all idea of charity was to disappear. It was for the State and society to guarantee the implementation of that right.

It had been argued that the duties of States should not be proclaimed in a declaration of human rights. That objection was the less justified because article 20 touched upon an entirely new type of rights. A purely legal and formal instrument would suffice to ensure implementation of the rights proclaimed in the preceding articles. But, in order to render the right to social security effective it had to have a proper basis – an economic basis without which there could be no social security properly so called.

It was because it viewed the problem on that basis that the Czechoslovak delegation could not accept the amendment proposed by the Argentine delegation.

On the other hand, the USSR amendment set forth the problem in an accurate and clear manner, and the Czechoslovak delegation would vote for it.

MR. ALVARADO (Peru) observed that at the previous meeting, his delegation had suggested that the phrase "to be protected against social and economic risks" should be substituted for the words "social security", because it had felt that the defective drafting of article 20 would give rise to a protracted discussion. In the view of the Peruvian delegation, the fact that the expression "social security" also appeared in article 22, where it had its real technical meaning, made that clarification indispensable.

As the various speakers who had taken part in the general discussion had emphasized, there was a very distinct difference between social security, in the broad sense of the term, and technical measures such as social assistance, aid to mothers and children, etc., which formed part of the social security programme of most countries.

On the other hand, the concept of social justice included, as a matter of fact, all those aspects of social security mentioned by the representatives of Chile, Ecuador and Mexico, among others. However, as some representatives had expressed the fear that that wording might be wrongly interpreted, the Peruvian delegation maintained its original proposal which expressed in a more accurate way what the authors of the draft declaration had wished to indicate by the term "social security".

At the same time it supported the Cuban delegation's amendment, which also improved the text of article 20. The Peruvian delegation could not support the other amendments for the reasons already expressed by many speakers.

MR. CONTOUMAS (Greece) thanked Mr. Cassin for having summed up the history of article 20 in such a clear way at the previous meeting. The Greek delegation felt that the Committee should not diverge from the general plan proposed by the Commission on Human Rights and that it should retain the general character of article 20 as a preface to the articles which followed.

The main difficulty arising from the text proposed by the Commission on Human Rights was caused by the fact that the expression "social security" had two meanings, a definitely limited technical meaning and a general meaning. It was the latter which the Commission had wished to give it. Mr. Contoumas considered that the Lebanese delegation, in suggesting that those words should be transposed, had found a very happy way of solving the difficulty. Nevertheless in order to define still more accurately the general meaning which should be given to the expression "social security" in the body of article 20, the Greek delegation suggested that, in addition to adopting the Lebanese proposal, the Cuban delegation's amendment should be altered as follows: "essential for his dignity, to the free development of his personality and his social security in [507] general". The addition of the words "in general" would clear up any misunderstanding regarding the interpretation to be given to the words "social security".

On the other hand, he agreed to the deletion of the words "set out below", which might have a restrictive effect on the realization of rights in the social field which could be expected from such international organizations as the International Labour Organization.

The Greek delegation approved the idea expressed in the USSR amendment, as it was convinced that the State should take upon itself the duty of seeing that the rights proclaimed in the declaration were implemented. Nevertheless, that idea did not apply only to the right proclaimed in article 20, and should be placed in a separate article, which should be added at the end of the draft declaration. Such an article would have the support of the Greek delegation.

Further, the Greek delegation supported the amendment submitted by the Cuban delegation. It could not, however, accept the Argentine delegation's amendment which gave the expression "social security" its narrow meaning. That restricted idea of social security should be expressed in article 22.

In conclusion, he associated himself with the remarks made by various delegations in opposition to the proposal of the Panamanian delegation.

MR. BEAUFORT (Netherlands) wished to submit two drafting amendments on behalf of his delegation, with a view to smoothing out the difficulties which still existed in spite of the clarifications furnished at the previous meeting by the French representative.

He pointed out, first, that the expression "social security" was construed in a very broad sense which included all the social and economic freedoms necessary to ensure the individual's wellbeing. Consequently, article 20 should be drafted as follows:

"Everyone, as a member of society, has the right to social security and, in consequence, to the realization. . . of the economic, social and cultural rights set out below. . ."

On the other hand, while it understood the objections to which the words "set out below" gave rise, the Netherlands delegation felt that it was necessary to maintain the prefatory character of article 20. It suggested therefore that the clause which had been criticized should be replaced by the following phrase: ". . . of which the essential aspects are set out below".

MR. COROMINAS (Argentina) regretted that he was unable to respond to the appeal made by the United Kingdom representative. There was involved a question of principle to which his delegation attached great importance. All national legislations guaranteed the essential rights set forth in the preceding articles of the draft declaration, such as the individual's right to life and to work. But when that same individual suffered a decline in his physical strength, due to illness or old age, society had no right to lose interest in his fate and to leave him to destitution. The aid given to those in need should not be considered as an act of charity on the part of society, but as a right which it owed to the individual.

The Argentine delegation therefore felt that the right to social security was a principle which should be clearly set forth, independently of the other economic and social rights. The idea of social security was now universal. Social security was both a doctrine and the realization of that doctrine in practice. Even before that idea had become as widespread as it was at present, it had been expressed in the form of human solidarity among the peoples of the world. The way in which social solidarity had been converted into social security constituted a triumph of the proletariat in the struggle against poverty. In the opinion of the Argentine delegation it would be an unpardonable mistake if the right to social security were not guaranteed in the declaration of human rights. To guarantee it while making it dependent on other economic, social or cultural factors would be to diminish it.

For those reasons the Argentine delegation could not agree to withdraw its amendment.

MR. PLAZA (Venezuela) said that his delegation would vote in favour of the original draft of article 20, with the addition proposed by the Cuban delegation and approved by the French delegation. It was better to retain the broad notion of social security, as opposed to measures of social insurance, which were the only means of implementing the principle set forth in article 20.

He understood the reasons which had prompted the Panamanian delegation to submit its amendment, but he feared that the idea was expressed in a manner which was more likely to be satisfactory from the literary than from the legal point of view. Even under Roman law protection of the individual's security had been extended to include the antenatal period. In order to include that widely recognized principle, he suggested that the Panamanian representative might alter his amendment to read: "from conception to death". The Venezuelan delegation would be able to accept that wording but it would be obliged to vote against the amendment submitted by the Panamanian representative in its present form.

MR. WATT (Australia) emphasized the special importance of the articles concerning social, economic and cultural rights. When article 3 of the draft declaration had been discussed, it had been quite rightly pointed out that those rights had been recognized in theory for a long time, and that it was those rights above all that everybody in the world would expect to find embodied in the declaration. That was why it seemed justifiable to include an introductory article before the proclamation of those rights. The article placed the problem in its true light by emphasizing the need for international co-operation as well as for national action, in accordance with Article 56 of the United Nations Charter.

The many criticisms made of article 20 had been concerned with the form rather than with the substance. It had been said in particular that the term "social security" was ambiguous. But the Committee was faced with a dilemma because, if it agreed to delete those words from article 20, there was nothing to guarantee that they would be included in article 22. As the representative of New Zealand had pointed out, it could not be [509] denied that those words should be included in the declaration. It was for that reason that the Australian delegation would accept the suggestion made by the Greek delegation that the term "social security" should be retained with a clear indication that it was used in a general sense.

There had been many comments made on the other amendments. He, for his part, did not think that the words "set out below" were very appropriate. He would prefer, either the words “in this declaration”, or the wording submitted by the Cuban delegation, which was a little wide in scope but had the advantage of recalling the reference to man’s dignity and to the free development of his personality which appeared in the other articles of the draft declaration.

On the whole, the question was really only one of drafting. In the opinion of the Australian delegation, the essential point was to ensure that the idea of social security was retained in the declaration.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) thanked Mr. Cassin for explaining so clearly why article 20 had been drafted in its present form and why the idea of social security should be retained in that article. From that point of view, he thought that the proposal submitted by the Lebanese delegation was very satisfactory.

He also approved the proposal submitted by the Panamanian delegation which gave a good popular flavour to article 20. The declaration, intended as it was for the ordinary man, should not go into the technical details of antenatal protection, especially as that was already guaranteed by the inclusion of the protection of pregnant women.

He thanked the many delegations which had supported his amendment. Adoption of the amendment was all the more necessary because it was impossible at the moment to foresee what would be the declaration’s final form. The Cuban delegation was firmly resolved to impress the need for giving priority to the articles guaranteeing man’s social rights upon the members of the sub-committee to be set up to arrange the articles. Thus, the wishes of the great majority of people would be satisfied. So long as that was not assured and so long as the document retained its present form, the Cuban amendment seemed logical and necessary.

MR. GRUMBACH (France) said that the French delegation thought that the retention of article 20 if possible in an improved form was essential as an introduction to the other articles concerning social and economic rights.

The discussion on the term “social security” had shown that the members of the Committee were in complete agreement on the substance of the question, but differed in the way in which they wished to express that common idea. The French delegation was ready to accept the term “social security” because it agreed with the New Zealand delegation that it would be better to include the term twice in the declaration than to see it disappear. It would, however, prefer the words “social justice”. That term was included in the Constitution of the International Labour Office and it was the most general term, because there [510] could be no social justice without social security, just as there could be no social security without social insurance.

He emphasized that the legal system of France guaranteed social justice to the individual “from the cradle to the grave”, to use the wording submitted by the Panamanian delegation. He did not think, however, that that wording should be kept in the declaration. He was also opposed to the USSR amendment because it proclaimed the duties of the State, contrary to the rule adopted by the Committee.

In conclusion, the French delegation would accept the amendment submitted by the Cuban delegation.

MR. DEMCHENKO (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) emphasized the important position occupied by article 20 in the declaration. The preceding articles dealt with political rights while those which followed article 20 dealt with economic, social and cultural rights. Article 20, therefore, provided the link between those two aspects of the declaration.

Because of its special position, and consequently, because of its special nature, the article was the best place in the whole declaration to ensure the practical application of the rights set forth. It was with that end in view that the USSR delegation had submitted its amendment.

If the declaration were to have any real meaning and yield practical results, it was essential that article 20 should mention the duty of States to guarantee the rights of individuals in the social field. In order to understand that, it was sufficient simply to see what went on in countries whose economy was based on the system of private enterprise. In such countries the only concern of those who controlled the economy was to make big profits. The condition of the workers was not taken into account and no attempt was made to guarantee their security. Manufacturers knew that they could always find labour and they did not therefore see any reason to consider the welfare of the workers. Their chief concern was to obtain the maximum output from each worker. That was the state of affairs in many countries and, under those circumstances, who was to defend the rights of the workers? It was obvious that only the Government could do so effectively.

It was for that reason that the Ukrainian delegation had attempted, throughout the debates on the declaration, to obtain recognition of the absolute necessity to include therein a specific mention of the duties of States. It had often been said that, however just that principle might be, it would be out of place in the declaration and should be included in the covenant, which the Committee would prepare later. He thought, on the contrary, that the declaration itself should include a reference to the duty of States to put its principles into practice. In that way, the covenant would follow quite naturally from the declaration. The declaration should set forth a principle and the covenant should provide the various ways of implementing that principle.

In considering the objections that had been raised to the USSR amendment, he pointed out that by that amendment each State was given full latitude to take any measures compatible with its resources or its own legislation.

Some delegations had contemplated the deletion of the words "social security" from article 20, asserting that security was a vague concept. He was not of that opinion and he stressed the fact that that concept was clearly set out in article 22.

Finally, the Lebanese representative had levelled at the USSR amendment criticisms which had no bearing on its substance, and should not therefore be taken into account.

His delegation would vote for the USSR amendment, which would make it possible effectively to implement the Declaration of Human Rights.

MR. DE ATHAYDE (Brazil) observed that social security, the fundamental idea in article 20, was one of the aims the democracies had set themselves. Furthermore, he saw in that idea the contribution of the present generation to the social progress of mankind. The basic text of article 20 expressed that idea very clearly. No real improvement would be made in the article by any of the amendments submitted, with the exception of that of the Cuban delegation.

For that reason, he would vote for article 20, as amended by the Cuban delegation.

MR. KAMINSKY (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) expressed himself in favour of the USSR amendment. It was very clear and gave reality to the declaration as a whole. It aimed at ensuring respect of the individual's rights by government measures. The USSR delegation had always upheld that view in the desire to give the declaration a real value. That was especially important, when it was realized that some countries had written into their constitutions theoretical rights, which, in fact, were never implemented.

As regards the criticisms levelled at the USSR amendment, he considered that there was no substance in those made by the Lebanese representative.

Lastly, he thought that the Chilean amendment (A/C.3/340) was too confused. The idea of "biological protection" which it introduced would certainly not be understood by the masses of the people to whom the declaration should also be addressed.

COUNT CARTON DE WIART (Belgium) observed that all delegations were agreed in desiring to preserve the introductory nature of article 20. That article introduced new ideas, while the preceding articles revived ideas expressed in the Declaration of the Rights of Man and of the Citizen of 1789 and in the American Bill of Rights.

In his opinion, the words "social security" should be retained; but they should not be used in the narrow sense, because, as used currently in [512] French-speaking countries, they had a very special meaning.

For that reason, he again brought up the suggestion which had been made by some delegations, that the meaning of the term should be widened by adding the words "social justice" to it.

The phrase "set out below", at the end of article 20, was not apt, and for that reason he favoured the amendment submitted by the Cuban delegation. He hoped, moreover, that the proposed drafting committee would prepare a better draft of article 20.

He then considered the various amendments to article 20. The USSR amendment introduced the idea of duty on the part of the State, and, as had been pointed out, that idea was out of place in the declaration. Moreover, the State was not alone in having duties. Individuals, professional groups also had duties to fulfil in that sphere. Consequently, the USSR amendment introduced a restrictive element, as it provided that the social guarantees, guarantees that all delegations desired to see realized, should depend solely on the intervention of the law.

The Panamanian delegation's amendment was likewise too limited. Man, in fact, had rights before his birth and even after his death: he had the right to respect for his remains, for example, as well as for his memory and reputation.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) moved that the debate should be closed.

The motion was adopted by 16 votes to 15, with 6 abstentions.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) expressed his regret to the USSR delegation for having misinterpreted the USSR amendment. After reading the English text of the USSR amendment, he had realized that the word "desirable" did not apply to the achievement of social security, as he had previously understood, but to the measures to be taken by governments. While admitting that there was no basis for that particular criticism, he maintained his other objections to the amendment.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the USSR amendment (E/800, page 34).

The amendment was rejected by 27 votes to 8, with 8 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the Argentine amendment (A/C.3/251/Corr.1).

The amendment was rejected by 19 votes to 2, with 19 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN announced that the Syrian amendment would next be voted upon. That amendment comprised three points. It proposed that:

The words "social security" should be replaced by "social justice";

The words "of that right" should be inserted after "realization";

The words at the end of article 20 after "of each State" should be deleted.

MR. GRUMBACH (France) requested that each part should be voted upon separately.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the proposal to substitute the words "social justice" for the words "social security".

The proposal was rejected by 26 votes to 8, with 8 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the proposal to delete the end of article 20 after "of each State".

The proposal was rejected by 34 votes to one, with 6 abstentions.

On the request of the delegations of Australia, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Chile, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic that the texts of the respective amendments should be reproduced for the consideration of the Committee at its following meeting in a single document, THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the question whether the Committee would take a decision on article 20 and the amendments to it at the present meeting.

It was so decided by 18 votes to 13, with 7 abstentions.

MR. KAMINSKY (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) objected to a vote being taken on some of the amendments and, in particular, on that of Chile, which altered the substance of article 20 and which had only been submitted to the Committee at the present meeting.

THE CHAIRMAN ruled that none of the amendments altered the substance of article 20.

MR. KAMINSKY (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) having contested the Chairman's ruling, it was put to the vote.

The Chairman's ruling was upheld by 18 votes to 7, with 13 abstentions.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) pointed out that, although he accepted the amendment submitted to his delegation's amendment by the Lebanese representative, he was unable to accept that submitted by the Greek delegation. He therefore requested that the Committee take a separate vote on the Greek amendment.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the Greek delegation's amendment, proposing the addition of the words "and his social security in general" after the words "and the free development of his personality", in the Cuban amendment.

The amendment was rejected by 21 votes to 4, with 12 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the Lebanese amendment, proposing the insertion of the words "his social security" after the words "essential to", in the Cuban amendment.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) pointed out that the English translation of his amendment was not quite accurate. The word "essential" did not convey the idea of the word indispensable in French. It would therefore be advisable to substitute the [514] word "indispensable" for the word "essential" in the English text of the Cuban amendment.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the Cuban amendment (A/C.3/232), proposing to delete from article 20 the words "set out below", and to replace them by the following text: "indispensable for his dignity and the free development of his personality".

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the amendment of Ecuador proposing to replace the words “set out below” by the words “set out in the present declaration” served no purpose since the adoption of the Cuban amendment, and MR. CARRERA ANDRADE (Ecuador) withdrew the amendment.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the Chilean amendment (A/C.3/340).

The amendment was rejected by 25 votes to one, with 10 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the Peruvian proposal to replace the words “social security” by the words “protection against social and economic risks”.

The amendment was rejected by 26 votes to 3, with 8 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the Belgian proposal that the words “social security” should be replaced by the words “social security and social justice”.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the Panamanian amendment (A/C.3/280).

The amendment was rejected by 21 votes to 5, with 12 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN asked the Committee to decide on article 20, as amended by the Cuban delegation.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) requested that the vote should be taken paragraph by paragraph.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the first part of article 20, reading as follows: “Everyone, as a member of society, has the right to social security. . .”

The first part of article 20 was adopted by 38 votes to one.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the second part of article 20, reading as follows: “. . . and is entitled to the realization, through national effort and international co-operation, and in accordance with the organization and resources of each State of the economic, social and cultural rights indispensable for his dignity and the free development of his personality”.

The second part of article 20 was adopted by 31 votes, with 7 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote article 20 as a whole, as amended.

Article 20, as amended, was adopted by 36 votes to one, with 3 abstentions.

The meeting rose at 6:45 p.m.

Summary Record of the Hundred and Thirty-Ninth Meeting [of the Third Committee]

Held at the Palais de Chaillot, Paris, on Tuesday,
16 November 1948, at 10:55 a.m.

Chairman: MR. CHARLES MALIK (Lebanon).

MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) drew attention to the fact that he had suggested the inclusion of a reference to social security in article 3. In that way, the declaration would have been made more forceful and more topical. He had voted for article 20 as amended by the Cuban representative (A/C.3/232), in the hope that the position of the article would eventually be changed. He did not feel there was any danger that the expression "social security" would be interpreted to mean "social insurance".

MR. BARODY (Saudi Arabia) said he had voted for the Syrian amendment (138th meeting) because it conformed to Islamic law, under the terms of which "social justice" had a broader and more comprehensive meaning than "social security". In Saudi Arabia, the institution of zaka, a voluntary tax levied for the purpose of assisting the poor and unemployed, was one of the five pillars of Islam. Social security was a recent historical development in Western society, while zaka had been an article of faith in actual operation in Moslem communities for almost fourteen centuries.

Furthermore, in Saudi Arabia, as in all Moslem countries, there was the institution of wagf, a system whereby the income from property placed in trust was frequently used for the relief of the poor or the unemployed. There also existed other institutions for the same purpose. Those Islamic institutions were not only the equivalent of a social security system, their machinery was simpler, their administration less costly and their effectiveness had stood the test of fourteen centuries. For that reason, he had abstained in the vote on article 20.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) had voted against article 20 because, in his opinion, social security, separated from the various economic and social rights, had no meaning. The article could have been improved by indicating that social security included the realization of those rights instead of referring separately to "social security", on the one hand, and on the other to "the realization. . . of the rights. . . set out below".

MRS. NEWLANDS (New Zealand) had voted for the retention of the words "social security" in article 20, so as to be sure that they would appear in the declaration. In accordance with the decision taken at the 137th meeting, however, she reserved the right to return to article 20 if the New Zealand amendment (A/C.3/267) to article 22 were adopted. She had voted against the Argentine amendment (A/C.3/251/Corr.1) because its provisions were outside the framework of article 20.

MR. PLAZA (Venezuela) had voted for article 20 as amended by the Cuban representative and not for the other proposed amendments, for the reasons he had given during the discussion. It was obvious from the confused manner in which the discussion was proceeding that the Committee had not understood the importance of the points he had raised.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) had voted for article 20. He pointed out, however, that it was the only article which referred to the realization of the rights contained in it and therefore might be interpreted as weakening the preceding articles. Article 20 could be regarded as a preamble to a new part of the declaration and it should have been stated that, while the later articles were of particular importance, those preceding it would also have to be implemented.

He had wanted to amend the article in order to emphasize the important role of the State with respect to social security. However, the customary objections to the inclusion of such a reference had been raised.

As his delegation's point of view had been met in regard to article 18, MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) withdrew his amendment to article 21 (A/C.3/268).

MR. SUNDFELDT (Sweden) said that the object of the Swedish amendment (A/C.3/252) was to make clear that the right to form and join a trade union was valueless unless the trade union concerned was allowed to protect its members' interests in every way compatible with the provisions of article 27, paragraph 2. Trade union rights were respected in Sweden, unlike certain other parts of the world. In that connexion, he drew attention to the position of trade unions in Nazi Germany and Fascist Italy. They were allowed to continue to exist but did not have the right to strike and, without that right, the liberty of a trade union was an illusion.

After further consideration, the Swedish delegation had decided that this whole question needed further elaboration and that the International Labour Organization was the appropriate body to carry out that work. It therefore withdrew its amendment to article 21.

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) said the purpose of the United States amendment (A/C.3/223) had been to clarify paragraph 2. It had been suggested, however, that it could be interpreted as excluding discrimination on grounds of race or nationality and she would therefore withdraw it.

In the United States, equal pay for equal work was understood to mean equal pay for workers living in the same area and working under the same conditions. She had withdrawn her amendment also because she felt there was a danger of drafting an article that would be unsatisfactory to the whole Committee and she consequently requested the authors of the other amendments to withdraw theirs as well.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) pointed out that unemployment was one of the greatest misfortunes of the working class. Between 20 and 30 million people, not counting the countries of the East, were permanently unemployed, and even in a country as wealthy as the United States, official figures put the number of unemployed at over two million. With the advent of economic crises, unemployment would increase in the capitalistic countries, and his delegation felt compelled to emphasize the State's responsibility in the matter. The wording of the first USSR amendment (E/800, page 34) was based on a reference in the United Nations Charter.

The USSR amendment would also oblige the State to take measures to prevent unemployment. However, it was worded in a manner which would take into account the fact that unemployment was the inevitable result of a capitalist economy. Unemployment was impossible in the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, owing to the socialist economy, and the absence of private property and of exploitation. In fact, there was an acute shortage of manpower. The right to gainful employment was laid down in the USSR Constitution.

He understood that employment could not be guaranteed in all countries, but felt strongly that the declaration should state more than generalities and that some provision should be included which would help the unemployed.

In some countries, women were paid much less than men, and for that reason his delegation had submitted a proposed supplementary clause to article 21.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) submitted certain amendments to article 21 (A/C.3/232/Corr.1). The USSR amendment to paragraph 2 was clearer than the original and he would consequently vote for it. He supported the Lebanese amendment concerning the individual's right to a free choice of work and his mode of life.

MR. COROMINAS (Argentina) said that the Argentine amendment (A/C.3/251/Corr.1) would not alter the basic concepts of article 21 but would set them out in a more orderly fashion. In his opinion, it was necessary to introduce the idea of fair remuneration in regard to the principle of equal pay for equal work. Paragraph 3 was already covered by the provisions of article 18 and if the Committee agreed with that view, he would withdraw the relevant Argentine amendment. In regard to the other amendments he had put forward, he would be prepared to meet with the authors of similar amendments with a view to preparing a compromise text.

THE CHAIRMAN said that paragraph 3 was undoubtedly covered by the more general terms of article 18, but that it had been thought wise to specify the right in question because of the particular importance of trade union activities in modern economic life.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) expressed the view that the Lebanese amendment (A/C.3/260) concerning the right to a free choice of work covered by implication both the Swedish and Argentine amendments. The concept of the right to a free choice of a mode of life was designed to protect persons like scientists and artists. It had not seemed necessary to refer to the limitations on the right set forth in article 21 because of the provisions of article 27.

MR. THORN (New Zealand) said that, as the article now read, it implied that the individual was free to join or not to join a trade union. The New Zealand Government would be unable to accept any text which left any doubt about the power to compel workers to join unions.

New Zealand had been known for its enlightened labour legislation for over fifty years. The Industrial Conciliation and Arbitration Act had worked successfully for over fifty years and had been a great help to unskilled workers, young working people and women workers. In 1936, a law had been passed making it illegal for employers covered by the Act to employ non-union members. It was obvious, therefore, that his Government would be unable to accept the principle of allowing individuals to choose whether or not they would join a trade union.

The New Zealand amendment (A/C.3/267) took into consideration the fact that there was an infinite variety of systems of trade unions and, actually, under its terms the individual would be free not to join a trade union. However, he insisted that the declaration contain nothing incompatible with compulsory trade union membership. He congratulated the Uruguayan representative on having withdrawn his amendment, as it would have been unacceptable to millions of trade unionists.

He reminded the Committee that President Truman had pledged himself to abolish the Taft-Hartley Act which did away with the "closed shop". That step would join the thirteen or fourteen millions of trade unionists in the United States with the tens of millions who existed elsewhere.

The subject had been discussed at a recent Conference of the International Labour Organization and a draft convention had been adopted providing that the right to organize and the right not to organize could not be placed on the same level. The Committee would appear ridiculous if, after accepting the Uruguayan amendments to article 18 (A/C.3/268), it made the same mistake in an even more obvious form.

MR. ANZE MATIENZO (Bolivia) said his delegation considered the basic text of article 21 acceptable in principle as it embodied the basic concepts that the article was designed to set forth. The various amendments offered nothing new, but rather tended to stress some particular aspect of the right mentioned, and reflected views based on [519] the laws of the country making the proposal.

Speaking of paragraph 2 of article 21, Mr. Anze Matienzo pointed out that the general idea of that paragraph was not new but was to be found in the Treaty of Versailles and in subsequent international documents. Present world conditions, however, made an addition to the paragraph desirable: the word "real" should be added before "pay". Inflation and the unstable monetary situation in most countries made it important to specify that remuneration for work should have certain purchasing power in relation to certain standards of living. If pay received were thought of merely in terms of money, the result might be that the standard of living, which it was hoped to raise, would in fact be lowered. It was therefore important to make the addition he suggested.

MRS. MENON (India) supported the basic text of article 21, with the USSR draft amendment to paragraph 2. That paragraph needed further clarification. Even in countries said to be advanced socially – for example, the United States and the United Kingdom – the principle of equal pay for men and women was not fully accepted. In many countries women were still carrying on a vain fight against inequality and injustice. Moreover, in various parts of Asia and in countries elsewhere, as well as in Trust Territories and Non-Self-Governing Territories, there was still discrimination for reasons not only of sex, but of race and colour. India was opposed to discrimination which compelled women and certain coloured races to accept a lower standard of living than other groups and thought the declaration should clearly condemn that practice.

The Indian delegation could not, however, accept the USSR proposal for a supplementary clause to article 21. It wished to ask the USSR representative to withdraw that proposal.

Mrs. Menon also found the Lebanese draft amendment unsatisfactory as it would place a simple economic right on too general a plane.

MISS BERNARDINO (Dominican Republic) pointed out that although the principle of equal pay for equal work of men and women was widely accepted in national legislation and in international documents, in practice that principle was not applied. Men generally received more favourable treatment and pay than women and the economic welfare of women was thereby jeopardized.

Article 21 would meet the requirements of social justice only if it were drafted in such a way as to protect women specifically against discrimination. The United States draft amendment would have offered a satisfactory text; but since that proposal had been withdrawn, Miss Bernardino would vote for the USSR draft amendment to paragraph 2. Miss Bernardino asked the USSR representative to explain his proposal for a supplementary clause to article 21.

MR. CONTOUMAS (Greece) stated that his delegation would vote for the basic text of article 21. He thought it important, however, to include in the article the idea of the right freely to choose one's work, which was contained in the Cuban, Argentine and Lebanese amendments. In the Cuban and Argentine amendments, the right to choose one's work was limited by the phrase "in so far as existing conditions of employment permit", whereas in the Lebanese amendment no limit on that right was mentioned. Mr. Contoumas recalled that the right to free choice of work was set forth in the Declaration of Philadelphia of the International Labour Organization and in that document the limitations of personal ability and knowledge as well of the general welfare were stated. Article 21 of the draft declaration should express the right to free choice of work in accordance with one's ability and knowledge; the public welfare was already sufficiently protected by draft article 27 and there was, therefore, no need to mention that point in the present article.

MR. DE ATHAYDE (Brazil) thought the three paragraphs of article 21 stated in a satisfactory manner the essential principles involved in the right to work. He drew particular attention to the importance of mentioning equal pay for equal work and of setting forth the freedom to form and to join trade unions, which was the best possible way of ensuring the right to work.

He also favoured the idea of free choice of work which was to be found in the Cuban, Argentine and Lebanese amendments. An individual's work, however, should conform to his aptitudes and should be productive.

Mr. de Athayde had hoped that the article would mention work not only as a right but as a social duty; but in view of the fact that the document being drafted was a declaration of rights, he would not press that point.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile), after observing that the rights with which article 21 dealt were included in the Constitution of his country, said that adoption of the Cuban amendment would greatly improve the present draft. The Cuban proposal that paragraph 2 should speak of remuneration that would ensure the worker a suitable standard of living was especially valuable. Mr. Santa Cruz hoped, however, that the Cuban delegation would agree to the words "a decent standard of living" to replace "a standard of living suitable for himself and his family".

Referring to the USSR draft amendment, he did not think it necessary to introduce into the text the idea of the obligation of the State and society to guarantee the right to work. Any obligation of that sort seemed adequately covered by article 20 which was a general statement of the duty of the national and international community in connection with the social rights of the individual.

Mr. Santa Cruz supported the USSR amendment to paragraph 2. Although the principle of non-discrimination for reasons of race, nationality [521] and sex was in fact implicit in the basic text, it might well be stated explicitly.

The USSR proposal for a supplementary clause to article 21 to protect the rights of women seemed unnecessary if that delegation's amendment to paragraph 2 were adopted. Mr. Santa Cruz had, however, no serious objections to that proposal.

Mr. Santa Cruz thought the ideas contained in the Argentine amendment were important but were more appropriately included in article 20, which was a general statement, than in article 21. Moreover paragraph 3 was confusing, since it mentioned the right to associate with others not only for trade union purposes but for other purposes not directly connected with the right to work with which article 21 was concerned.

The right to protection against unemployment should be explicitly stated, but the Committee might avoid repetition if it decided to refer to that right in article 22 only.

MR. ALTMAN (Poland) thought that omission of the mention of the obligation of the State and society in connexion with the right to work and protection against unemployment would make article 21 meaningless and abstract. It had been argued that article 22 covered the point, but article 22 spoke of security in the event of unemployment and was not concerned with measures to prevent unemployment. If the declaration was to go beyond the ideas proclaimed in the eighteenth century, it must lay down clearly the obligations of the State and society to prevent unemployment. That was particularly necessary because in countries with no planned economy the masses of people had to suffer from recurrent periods of financial crisis. The example of his own country, from which great numbers of citizens had been forced to emigrate, but to which many were returning now that work was available to all, should surely prove the value of an economy planned by the State.

Furthermore, the State must ensure the "just and favourable conditions of work" mentioned in paragraph 1 of the present text. In many colonial and semi-colonial areas the conditions of the worker were as deplorable as they had been a hundred years ago in England. Even in the most developed countries, the number of victims of accidents caused by bad working conditions was appalling. In corroboration of that statement, Mr. Altman cited statistics prepared by the International Labour Organization on accidents in the United States, the United Kingdom and France.

Since the USSR amendment to paragraph 1 would adequately state the obligations of the State and society, the Polish delegation supported it.

Mr. Altman preferred the basic text of paragraph 3 to the text proposed by New Zealand. The principle of compulsory membership in a trade union was not included in the laws of his country and was therefore unacceptable to him. [522] He joined the New Zealand representative, however, in welcoming the withdrawal of the Uruguayan amendment which would have deprived the workers of the possibility of defending their rights through trade unions. The solidarity of the workers would have been broken and employers would have been able to impose arbitrary conditions of work. The Taft-Hartley Act, in force in the United States, but recently condemned by the President of that country, was evidence of what might happen if an amendment such as had originally been proposed by Uruguay were adopted.

Mr. Altman regretted the withdrawal of the Swedish amendment. In accordance with rule 111 of the rules of procedure, he wished to put forward that amendment again, in the name of the Polish delegation. The right to strike was of major importance and although the study of that right might be entrusted to the International Labour Organization as a specialized agency, the right itself should be proclaimed in the declaration.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) was glad to find that the draft declaration included economic and social rights. The Committee was in fact going beyond the eighteenth century concepts by adding those rights to the classic ideas of political rights.

The basic text of article 21 of the draft declaration was satisfactory in general but certain drafting changes were needed. Mr. Dehousse urged that every attempt should be made to achieve as polished a style as possible.

Referring to the USSR amendment to paragraph 1, Mr. Dehousse pointed out that the French text was poorly drafted. He agreed that some statement should be made regarding who would protect the individual against unemployment, but he thought that idea could be stated more simply than was done in the USSR proposal. He therefore suggested that instead of the whole second sentence of the USSR amendment the words "by a full employment policy" should be added to the first sentence. The responsibility of the State to take preventive measures against unemployment was implicit in that phrase and there was the added advantage that the words "full employment" were the same as those used in Article 55 of the United Nations Charter. Mr. Dehousse hoped the USSR representative would adopt his suggestion, for in that case he would be able to support the amendment.

Turning to the consideration of the USSR draft amendment to paragraph 2, Mr. Dehousse recalled that article 2 of the draft declaration enumerated the grounds on which discrimination could not be practised. The partial enumeration in article 21 was inadvisable as it might be legally interpreted to preclude the application of the broader enumeration of article 2. In any case, there was no need to repeat what had been said in article 2.

The USSR proposal for a supplementary clause to article 21 was not clear, and Mr. Dehousse hoped the USSR representative would explain its meaning.

Speaking of the Cuban and Argentine amendments, Mr. Dehousse thought the intention behind the proposals was good, but they were not clearly drafted and might therefore give rise to some confusion. He supported the idea of free choice of work, laid down also in the Lebanese draft amendment, but thought it unnecessary to add the obvious limitations caused by existing conditions of employment.

MR. THORN (New Zealand) was surprised that the Polish representative had stated he did not believe in the principle of compulsory trade union membership, yet had later said that he agreed with the idea of the closed shop. Those two statements seemed contradictory and the former would certainly seem very out of date to trade unionists in New Zealand.

The Bolivian representative had said that the amendments would add nothing new to the basic text. Such was not the case, however. Mr. Thorn referred to the meeting of the Commission on Human Rights at which the text of paragraph 3 had been accepted<sup>1</sup> and recalled that the Commission had interpreted the words

“Everyone is free to . . . join trade unions” as meaning that an individual was also free not to join. Thus interpreted, article 21 contained the same principle as that to be found in the Uruguayan amendment. He wondered whether the Uruguayan representative had in fact withdrawn his amendment for that very reason. Article 21 would therefore be very unsatisfactory to millions of trade unionists and to several progressive Governments. Mr. Thorn urged the adoption of the New Zealand amendment.

His delegation, however, would be willing to support paragraph 2 of the basic draft if no better text could be found.

He wondered whether as a drafting point the words “and to protection against unemployment” should not be deleted from paragraph 1. They were unnecessary, for the point was adequately covered by article 22.

MR. DEMCHENKO (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) emphasized the special importance of the rights set out in article 21. The right to work was unquestionably essential; but, as many delegations had already noted, the basic text of article [524] 21 did not state that right in a satisfactory manner. It was important, however, that it should be expressed with all the clearness and vigour required, particularly as in many countries, where the economy was based on private enterprise, unemployment was widespread and the life of the workers was particularly hard as a result. Even countries of considerable industrial importance, such as the United States of America and the United Kingdom, were not immune from that scourge.

The Ukrainian delegation had always considered that the State was better able than any other authority to protect the workers in that respect, and he believed that if the idea of the responsibility of States was included in the declaration, the Committee would have made a great step forward in achieving concrete results and would have shown that it intended to find realistic solutions to the most acute problems of the present time. The amendment to paragraph 1 of article 21 proposed by the USSR delegation (E/800, page 34) was excellent from that point of view, for it showed plainly that the State and society must protect workers against unemployment.

With regard to the USSR amendment to paragraph 2 of article 21, he considered it was essential to state explicitly in the text of article 21 that every individual had the right to equal pay for equal work, without discrimination of race, nationality or sex, because that discrimination was still being practised in some countries. In the Union of South Africa, for example, the average wages of a white worker were about twelve times those of a coloured worker. Even more striking examples of such discrimination were to be found in the colonies. There, the wages of a white worker were often as much as fifty times higher than those of a coloured worker. It was therefore of the highest importance that the USSR amendment should be inserted in article 21. There should be no fear of repeating that all discrimination of race, nationality and sex was to be prohibited so that, when those responsible for such injustices read the declaration, they might perhaps wish to put an end to them.

Similarly, it was important once again to emphasize the principle of equal pay for men and women when they were doing equal work. In a great many civilized countries which considered themselves democratic, women were paid wages fifty per cent lower than those of men. Some delegations, that of Chile for example, had said that the USSR amendment to paragraph 2 of article 21 restated principles contained in paragraph 1. In his opinion that was not quite correct: the USSR amendment to paragraph 2 was not only concerned with the principle of equal pay for equal work, but also mentioned that women should enjoy equal advantages with men, that is to say that, if in certain professions, special advantages in kind were afforded to men, equivalent advantages should also be afforded to women.

Finally, article 21 laid down the principle of the freedom to form and join trade unions. Some delegations would prefer that that principle should not be mentioned in article 21 because, in their opinion, it had already been included in article 18, which dealt with the right of association. That principle was very important for workers, because it was their only means of defending themselves. At the present time, many Governments were taking steps to limit the rights of trade unions or the scope of their action. Such was the case, for instance, in the United States where trade union leaders with progressive political opinions were even prosecuted. Similar examples could be mentioned in other countries. For that reason the principle of the freedom to form and join trade unions should be retained in the declaration.

MRS. CORBET (United Kingdom) felt that the text of article 21 as drafted by the Commission on Human Rights was a clear statement of the objectives to be aimed at in the field of employment. For that reason, she hoped the text would be adopted by a very large majority.

In referring to the various amendments submitted to each of the paragraphs of article 21 she expressed the view that the USSR amendment did not conform to the essential character of the declaration, as it would oblige States to guarantee the right to work. Such a guarantee was so all-embracing that it would be difficult to implement it. In her opinion, it was the duty of the State to take such measures as were desirable and practicable to ensure that work was available for all who wished to work. Furthermore by accepting Article 56 of the Charter, all States Members had undertaken to take the necessary steps to realize the objectives set forth in Article 55, which mentioned, in particular, "higher standards of living" and "full employment". It was clear, therefore, that the USSR amendment added nothing to the provisions of the Charter.

She emphasized that her delegation had no objections to the principle that States should take steps to guarantee a stable and high level of employment. She drew attention to the United Kingdom Government's declaration of May 1944 in which it accepted the maintenance of a high and stable level of employment as a primary aim. The present Government of the United Kingdom respected that principle and was taking all the necessary steps to fulfil its obligations under Articles 55 and 56 of the Charter.

The Cuban and Argentine amendments (A/C.3/232/Corr.1 and A/C.3/251) were based on the principle that the individual had the right to engage in any work for which he considered himself fitted. The amendments were far too detailed, however, and if an attempt were made to set forth all the details contained in a simple principle, there was a risk that that list would be incomplete.

The Lebanese amendment (A/C.3/260), which dealt with the right to a free choice of work, also added nothing important to the present text of article 21, which clearly implied that every individual had the right to choose the employment he wanted if that employment was available and if the individual concerned was qualified to do the work. The same amendment proposed the addition of the right to choose "his mode of life". In her opinion, that idea went beyond the scope of article 21, which bore only upon questions of employment.

The Swedish amendment (A/C.3/252) recognized the right to strike and on that point was in accordance with the position of the United Kingdom. Nevertheless there, as no doubt also in certain other countries, that right would have to be qualified by considerations of public security; in certain cases that right might even have to be suspended until arbitration had taken place. It would be difficult, therefore, to elaborate a text that took all those points into consideration. Furthermore the United Kingdom delegation felt that the declaration should confine itself to stating positive rights. Article 21 proclaimed the right to work and if the individual's freedom not to exercise that right was also included, there might be a danger of creating confusion. For that reason, Mrs. Corbet approved the fact that the Swedish delegation had withdrawn its amendment and if it was to be reintroduced by the Polish delegation, the United Kingdom delegation would vote against it.

With regard to the USSR amendments to paragraph 2, those which laid down the principle of equal pay for equal work, without distinction of race, nationality or sex, had no raison d'être, in view of article 2 of the declaration.

The USSR delegation had also submitted an amendment (E/800, page 34), stating that women should enjoy equal advantages with men in their work. The concept of "advantages" was not very clear. If it referred to the wellbeing and protection of women, it should be remembered that the legislation of many countries contained special provisions concerning the work of women. The USSR amendment sought to give women advantages which did not exceed those afforded to men. For that reason and because, on the other hand, the amendment imposed certain obligations on governments, the United Kingdom delegation did not find it acceptable. It would vote for the original text of article 21 as a statement of ideals to be aimed at, on the understanding that it did not imply any commitment on the part of governments to take steps to promote the application of the principle outside the sphere of State employment, where direct negotiation between the trade unions and employers was the practice. As regards the public services, the position of the United Kingdom Government had been publicly stated as being in favour of the principle of equal pay for work of equal value, although it was not felt in present economic circumstances to be the right time to put it into effect.

In regard to paragraph 3 of article 21 Mrs. Corbet felt it contained an explicit statement of the right to form and to join trade unions. It was desirable that that article should be limited to the consideration of that aspect of the problem and not, as suggested in the Argentine amendment, embrace the right of association in other fields, [527] which had been examined in connexion with article 18. The New Zealand amendment (A/C.3/267) was more restrictive than the basic text of paragraph 3, for it could be interpreted to mean that the interests of workers could not be protected unless they belonged to a trade union. That was not the case in many countries, in particular the United Kingdom, where labour conditions established as a result of negotiations between the trade unions and the employers applied to all workers, whether they belonged to a trade union or not.

On the other hand, it would be undesirable for the declaration to state the principle that the individual was free not to exercise his right to join a trade union, as was suggested in the Uruguayan amendment, and she was happy that it had been withdrawn. Otherwise her delegation would have been obliged to vote against the amendment. Not only would there have been obvious difficulties in applying it, but it would also have had the effect of eliminating the principle of compulsory membership of a trade union of a particular profession and the closed shop. She did not want to take a position on the merits of the closed shop, which had been the subject of controversy for a long time, but she did not consider its prohibition to be a fundamental human right and, consequently, it should not be included in the declaration. The chief purpose of paragraph 3 of article 21 was to state the fundamental right to form and to join a trade union. The basic text of article 21 expressed that right perfectly clearly.

All those remarks showed that the text of article 21 as drafted by the Commission on Human Rights was entirely satisfactory. The United Kingdom delegation, therefore, would vote for that text and hoped that it would be approved by the great majority of the Committee.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) stressed the fact that the essential aim of his delegation's amendment was to provide the workers with a real guarantee against unemployment. That was a principle of vital importance. The USSR amendment expressed it very clearly, and pointed out, moreover, by what measures it could be achieved. The USSR delegation wanted the right to work to be a reality. That right could only be guaranteed effectively in countries with an economy possessing certain special features, such as the USSR. In that country, the workers did not labour in order to provide an individual or a private enterprise with large profits. They worked for themselves, for their families and for their country. In those circumstances, work was no longer only a struggle against hunger and poverty. That aspect of the economic life of the USSR explained why, unlike many other countries, it did not know the terrible consequences of unemployment. Twenty years ago the country had had 10,800,000 workers and employees. It now had 33 million. Those figures spoke for themselves and clearly showed that the economic system of the country provided the most effective weapon against unemployment. The same situation, however, did not prevail in every country, and it was for that reason that the workers of [528] those countries should be protected against unemployment.

He was surprised that the United Kingdom representative had not felt obliged to approve the principle that women should receive the same pay as men for equal work, at a time when a commission of the British Parliament was considering that question. The terms of the USSR amendment transformed that principle into reality, and he could see no reason for any opposition to it.

MR. NOSEK (Czechoslovakia) stressed the fact that the fundamental economic and social rights laid down in article 21 were already contained in his country's Constitution. In fact, the Constitution of Czechoslovakia guaranteed the right to work, since the organization of labour was directed by the State on the principles of a planned economy. Moreover, all the workers had the right to a fair wage and that right was guaranteed by the wage policy pursued by the Government in agreement with the trade unions, a policy which was bringing about the gradual rise in the workers' standard of living.

The Czechoslovak Constitution attached special importance to the working conditions of women and young people. A series of special measures regulated the working conditions of women, providing for their care during pregnancy and motherhood. In the same way, the working conditions for young people took into account the requirements for their physical and intellectual development. It was therefore clear that the Czechoslovak delegation could not fail to support the statement of rights contained in article 21.

Mr. Nosek pointed out that article 21 mentioned a right which was not explicitly laid down in the Czechoslovak Constitution, namely the right to protection against unemployment. The Czechoslovak Constitution had not mentioned that right because the country's economy was planned and directed so as to ensure the increasing improvement of the quality and quantity of production, thus permitting a gradual rise in the standard of living of the population. The threat of unemployment was thus removed. During the debate on article 20 the Czechoslovak delegation had already pointed out that social conditions were an integral part, and at the same time the logical result, of economic conditions. Social conditions were dependent particularly on the policy of full employment, mentioned in Article 55 of the Charter, in article 2 of the Final Act of the United Nations Conference on Trade and Employment as well as in other United Nations documents. Moreover, article 21, as worded, did not express that principle of full employment which all progressive modern economies had already recognized as a weapon against economic crises and consequently, against unemployment. The right to protection against unemployment, as laid down in paragraph 1 of article 21, meant only the right to protection against the consequences of unemployment. No mention was made of the duty of the State to prevent unemployment. Protection against its consequences was a sort of charity conferred upon the workers. It was therefore somewhat humiliating to them; moreover, it did not permit an effective struggle to be waged against unemployment.

The USSR amendment likewise mentioned protection against unemployment, but it went further than the text of article 21, since it aimed at imposing on the State and on society the obligation to prevent unemployment. For that reason the Czechoslovak delegation supported the USSR amendment, which would make it possible to apply successfully the principle of the right to life laid down in article 3 of the declaration. The Czechoslovak delegation hoped, therefore, that the USSR amendment would be unanimously adopted by the Committee.

MR. HABIB (India) stated that his delegation had carefully studied the amendment submitted by New Zealand and that it wished to support it. In his country, in fact, capitalism was making rapid progress, and entailing all the consequences of an industrialization which was proceeding more rapidly than the organization of labour. The Indian Government might have to take measures to remedy that state of affairs. With that aim in view, it had studied the labour legislation of New Zealand and other countries, and it might have to resort to compulsory trade union membership in order to ensure the organization and the protection of labour.

The Indian delegation considered that the wording of the New Zealand amendment was entirely satisfactory for it granted labour the right to be protected by a trade union. Such protection could not be effectively ensured while rival trade unions were competing for members and causing confusion in the working class. The Indian delegation considered that labour should be organized on a national basis.

The original text of paragraph 3 of article 21 seemed to have been prompted by the concepts of the nineteenth rather than the twentieth century. The day when any agreement between workers concerning their rightful claims was considered a conspiracy had long passed.

MR. WATT (Australia) considered that paragraph 3, as drafted by the Commission on Human Rights, was not satisfactory. He regretted that it stated that "Everyone is free to form... trade unions" instead of "Everyone has the right..."

Moreover, to say that everyone was free to form trade unions would be contrary to the legislation of certain countries. In New Zealand and in Australia, for example, it was inconceivable that a small number of persons should form themselves into a trade union which would appeal to arbitration boards and oppose powerful trade unions with thousands of members. It was obvious that there should be freedom to form trade unions in those countries where they did not already exist, but that was not clearly thought out in the text, while the New Zealand amendment, without limiting the right to form a trade union, [530] stressed the right to belong to one. The amendment was therefore in no way restrictive.

He thought he should at that stage make certain points concerning the trade union legislation existing in his country. Without going as far as New Zealand, where trade unionism was compulsory, Australia had had for fifty years trade unions to which the majority of workers belonged. The right to strike existed but all disputes were compulsorily subject to arbitration. The individual, on the other hand, was protected against any oppression by the trade unions. The latter were registered and were liable to dissolution if they imposed on their members unduly restrictive qualifications for admission, or if they were too arbitrary in their activities. A minimum wage had been fixed, with a scale of increase in proportion to the index of the cost of living, special wages for specially skilled workers, etc. Membership of a trade union, far from restricting the freedom of the individual, was the expression itself of that freedom.

It was not the aim of the New Zealand amendment to have the Third Committee adopt the principle of compulsory trade unionism; while each country would still be free to act as it wished, it did, however, permit it to make a step forward. Although the wording of the amendment could be improved, the Australian delegation accepted the principle of it and would support it.

MR. BEAUFORT (Netherlands) thought article 21 dealt with the most important human rights. It was very understandable that many delegations had considered it necessary to submit amendments to that article. In order to define his delegation's position on those amendments, he reviewed the stages of social development since the last century. In the nineteenth century, certain classes of society did not enjoy normal rights in the economic and social fields. Working conditions in many countries were such that it could be said without exaggeration that the situation of the workers did not appreciably differ from that of the slaves of antiquity. At the end of the nineteenth century the right of association had been recognized, powerful trade unions had been formed and a new social legislation had come into being. Originally, those trade unions were, and could only be, the instruments of class struggle. Social and economic conditions had, however, developed, and in certain countries, including the Netherlands, the associations of employers and employees had changed in character and had become instruments of social and economic co-operation. Those associations were striving to create a new social order, grouping workers on the basis of their crafts, in which there would be no place for any political or economic dictatorship.

It was in the light of that economic and social development that article 21, the subsequent articles and the amendments proposed should be considered.

The Netherlands representative first examined the amendment submitted and subsequently withdrawn by Sweden, and then reintroduced by Poland, that the following should be added to the end of paragraph 1: "Everyone has the right to [531] cease to work, when finding it impossible to work on the economic terms existing or offered." He wished to point out that he had no objection to the right to cease working when working conditions were unjust, and if it could be reasonably expected that only a strike could obtain an improvement. Having regard to the point of view he had expressed concerning collaboration between employers and employees, however, he considered that the right to strike was out of place in the declaration, and that the latter should not confine itself to corroborating what already existed but, as its preamble already stated, it should represent “the common standard of achievement for all peoples and all nations”.

Mr. Beaufort then turned to the USSR amendment which he did not consider acceptable because, in his opinion, the rights of the State should not be laid down in the declaration. Moreover, as the second paragraph of that amendment repeated part of article 2, it weakened that article. In conclusion he confessed he did not understand the additional clause proposed by the USSR delegation, since that clause was a repetition of paragraph 2 of article 21.

Whilst supporting the principles underlying the Cuban and Argentine amendments, the representative of the Netherlands considered that they contained too many points of detail, which both limited their scope and might lay them open to regrettable misinterpretation.

The right to follow one’s vocation freely, mentioned in the Cuban amendment, was also proclaimed in the first part of the Lebanese amendment. He preferred the latter and would support it. On the other hand, he thought that the proclamation of the right of the individual to choose his mode of life, referred to in the second part of the Lebanese amendment, would be more in place in one of the first three articles of the declaration.

In conclusion, he accorded his support to the New Zealand amendment, which he thought sensible. The right to freedom of association was already guaranteed by article 18; the provisions of article 18 would be completed if article 21 proclaimed the right to join trade unions.

MR. CASSIN (France) said that he would vote in favour of article 21 as drafted by the Commission on Human Rights. He was glad that the right to work appeared at the beginning of that article: it was the outcome of a process of evolution which had begun at the time of the French Revolution with the declaration of 1789, and continued with the Revolution of 1848, and had finally been crowned by the Constitution of 1946.

The text of that article was short. Experience had shown that the shorter a text the more effective it was. For that reason, Mr. Cassin was unable to associate himself with the Cuban amendment; that amendment was interesting, but it alluded to standard of living, a point already dealt with in article 22, so that there was no need to encumber article 21 with it.

He wished to explain that the words “protection against unemployment” did not signify remedy against existing unemployment. Provisions for that were contained in article 22. The meaning of “protection against unemployment” in that case was: measures against the possibility of unemployment. That part of the first paragraph thus corresponded to the wishes of the USSR delegation.

The French representative could not vote in favour of the USSR amendment to paragraph 1 because, in his opinion, the guarantees and responsibilities of the State should be covered by special conventions. Further, article 21 arose from article 20, which had been adopted by the Committee the day before (138th meeting), and which contained the words: “national effort and international co-operation”. That covered the measures that could be taken on the international level by an organization such as the International Labour Organization, for instance.

He then proceeded to examine the amendments proposed by Cuba and the Argentine on the freedom to follow a vocation, and feared that they would favour State control. The Lebanese amendment, on the other hand, left too much scope. That amendment, in fact, when it said that everyone had the right to “a free choice of work and of his mode of life” was failing to take account of social conditions and existing possibilities.

It was important neither to encourage paid idleness nor to turn the right to work into the right to forced labour. Moderation must be observed. For that reason the French representative suggested adding to paragraph 1 of article 21 after the words: “Everyone has the right to work” the words: “best suited to his aptitudes and his vocation”.

Mr. Cassin then proceeded to consider the amendment proposed by the Soviet Union to paragraph 2. He did not approve that amendment for he thought it dangerous to make enumerations; there was always a risk of forgetting some category, which might subsequently have serious consequences. Moreover, it was scarcely necessary to stress that the right to equal pay for equal work presupposed equal economic conditions.

He recalled that the text of paragraph 3 had been drawn up as the result of a compromise reached during the discussion in the Commission on Human Rights. He thought that its principle was good, but that the drafting of the French text should be modified. He proposed that the third paragraph should read as follows: “Quiconque travaille est libre de fonder, avec d'autres, des syndicats, et de s'y affilier pour la défense de ses intérêts”.

He regarded the New Zealand amendment with sympathy, as he was convinced that the New Zealand delegation, in proposing that amendment, had not sought to impose its own legislation of other countries; but he considered the amendment unnecessary. The draft proposed by the Commission on Human Rights did not conflict with the New Zealand amendment. It would moreover be possible to reconcile article 27 with paragraph 3 in the form in which it had been voted by the Commission on Human Rights.

Referring next to the amendment moved by Poland, the French representative pointed out that the right to strike was recognized by the constitutions of many countries, including France; he stressed, however, that the declaration of human rights must be common to all countries. As there [533] were countries where the right to strike was not recognized, it would be better to leave the text of paragraph 3 in the flexible form proposed by the Commission on Human Rights.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) wished to reply to the objection raised by the United Kingdom representative to the Lebanese amendment, which she had reproached for adding nothing to article 21 as drafted by the Commission on Human Rights. He wondered whether the English translation of his text might not have given rise to a wrong interpretation. The right to work, proclaimed in the first paragraph of article 21, did not imply the right to “a free choice of work” required by the Lebanese amendment. In fact, a State could provide its citizens with work without taking into account their aptitudes and preferences.

The United Kingdom representative had also objected that the second part of the Lebanese amendment, concerning the choice of mode of life, did not come within the scope of article 21, which should deal mainly with economic conditions. He thought it would be dangerous to interpret article 21 solely from the economic point of view, ignoring the social angle. Besides, the Commission on Human Rights in using the words “just and favourable conditions of work” had certainly had social conditions in mind, because further on, when referring to economic conditions, it had used the word “remuneration”.

He admitted that the “right to free choice of work” and the right to the choice of “mode of life” in his amendment were two distinct and perhaps widely different things, but thought the compromise proposal made by the French representative might reconcile all points of view.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the French representative had not proposed an amendment; he had simply suggested a different wording for paragraph 1.

The Chairman requested the Committee to proceed to a vote, taking first the amendments submitted to paragraph 1 of article 21.

MR. CONTOUMAS (Greece), recalling that he had been the first to stress the importance of every person’s right freely to follow his vocation, stated that his delegation wished on its own behalf to reintroduce the suggestion put forward by Mr. Cassin. It therefore formally moved that in the first paragraph of article 21, the words: “to the best of his ability and his vocation” be inserted after the words: “to just and favourable conditions of work and remuneration”.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the text submitted by the Argentine delegation to replace paragraph 1 of article 21 (A/C.3/251).

The amendment was rejected by 19 votes to 3, with 16 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the USSR proposal to insert after the word “pay” the following words: “and the right to protection against unemployment. The State and society shall guarantee [534] this right by measures calculated to provide everyone with the broadest opportunities for useful work, and to prevent unemployment”.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the proposal made by the Greek delegation to insert the words “to the best of his ability and his vocation” after the word “pay” in the first paragraph of article 21.

The amendment was rejected by 14 votes to 6, with 17 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the amendment submitted by the Lebanese delegation to insert in the first paragraph of article 21 the words “and to a free choice of work and of his mode of life” after the words “Everyone has the right to work”.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) requested that the amendment be put to the vote in two parts.

In view of that negative vote, the Chairman ruled that there was no reason for retaining the last part of the Lebanese amendment.

She then put to the vote the proposal of the Polish delegation to add the following sentence at the end of the first paragraph of article 21: “Everyone has the right to cease to work, when finding it impossible to work on the economic terms existing or offered.”

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) requested that the vote be taken by roll-call.

A vote was taken by roll-call as follows:

In favour: Argentina, Belgium, Burma, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Haiti, Mexico, Poland, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Uruguay, Yugoslavia.

Against: Afghanistan, Bolivia, China, Greece, Honduras, India, Netherlands, New Zealand, Pakistan, Panama, Paraguay, Philippines, Syria, United Kingdom, United States of America.

Abstaining: Australia, Brazil, Canada, Chile, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Ethiopia, France, Lebanon, Norway, Peru, Sweden, Venezuela.

The amendment was rejected by 15 votes to 13, with 13 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN requested the Committee to consider the amendments submitted to paragraph 2 of article 21.

She first put to the vote the amendment of the Argentine delegation to substitute the following text for paragraph 2: “Every person has a right to a fair remuneration for the work which he performs on the basis of equal pay for equal work.”

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the proposal submitted by the USSR delegation to substitute the following text for paragraph 2: “Everyone, without distinction as to race, nationality or sex, has the right to equal pay for equal work.”

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) requested that the vote be taken by roll-call.

A vote was taken by roll-call, as follows:

In favour: Argentina, Burma, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Chile, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Ethiopia, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, India, Mexico, Norway, Pakistan, Poland, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Venezuela, Yugoslavia.

Against: Australia, Belgium, France, Greece, Lebanon, Netherlands, New Zealand, Paraguay, Philippines, Sweden, Syria, United Kingdom, United States of America, Uruguay.

Abstaining: Afghanistan, Bolivia, Brazil, Canada, China, Panama, Peru.

The proposal was adopted by 21 votes to 14, with 7 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the proposal submitted by the delegation of Cuba to add to paragraph 2 as amended, the following text: “Every person who works has the right to receive such remuneration as will, in proportion with his capacity and skill, assure him a standard of living suitable for himself and his family.”

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) requested that the vote be taken by roll-call.

A vote was taken by roll-call, as follows:

In favour: Argentina, Brazil, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Chile, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Dominican Republic, Ethiopia, Haiti, Mexico, Panama, Peru, Poland, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Uruguay, Venezuela, Yugoslavia.

Against: Australia, Belgium, Bolivia, China, Denmark, France, Greece, India, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Pakistan, Philippines, Sweden, Syria, United Kingdom, United States of America.

Abstaining: Afghanistan, Burma, Canada, Guatemala, Honduras, Lebanon, Paraguay.

The amendment was adopted by 18 votes to 17, with 7 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the proposal of the Bolivian delegation to insert the word “real” between the words “pay” and “equal” in the first part of paragraph 2 as amended.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the proposal submitted by the Cuban delegation to delete the words “and pay” in the first paragraph of article 21.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) pointed out that the amendment was one of form only; the adoption [536] of the Cuban proposal on paragraph 2 made the retention of those words in paragraph 1 unnecessary.

The amendment was rejected by 15 votes to 14, with 10 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the proposal of the USSR delegation to add the following sentence to paragraph 2: “Women shall enjoy equal advantages in their work with men and shall receive equal pay for equal work.”

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) emphasized that the purpose of the amendment was to guarantee to women all the advantages enjoyed by men without affecting such special advantages as were due to them for physiological reasons.

MR. SAINT-LOT (Haiti), MISS BERNARDINO (Dominican Republic), MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium), MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) and MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America), having pointed out that that sentence reiterated the principle of “equal pay for equal work” already adopted by the Committee, MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) agreed that the amendment should be put to the vote in two parts, the first part being voted on first.

The first part of the USSR amendment was rejected by 23 votes to 11, with 7 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN considered that the second part of the amendment could not be put to the vote separately.

She then put before the Committee the proposal of the New Zealand delegation to redraft paragraph 3 of article 21 as follows: “Everyone has the right to the protection of his interests through membership of trade unions.”

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) asked the representative of New Zealand if she would not accept the wording: “Everyone has the right to join trade unions for the protection of his interests”; it expressed the same idea more satisfactorily without giving the impression that membership of trade unions was considered as being the sole means of defence to which the individual had a right to resort.

MRS. NEWLANDS (New Zealand) wished to abide by her original text which exactly conveyed the intentions of her delegation.

MR. COROMINAS (Argentina) reiterated the objections raised at the preceding meeting by his delegation with regard to a reference to trade unions in article 21. In the opinion of the Argentine delegation, freedom of association, established by article 18, necessarily included the right to belong to a trade union.

MR. WATT (Australia) said that, owing to the statement made on the matter by the Chairman at [537] the preceding meeting, he was obliged to oppose that point of view, which was in any case not shared by all members of the Committee.

MR. CASSIN (France) reserved his position with regard to the drafting of paragraph 3 of the basic text of article 21 and recalled that he had suggested a draft which seemed to him preferable to the text of the Commission on Human Rights.

THE CHAIRMAN placed before the Committee the following text submitted by the Cuban delegation as an additional paragraph to article 21: "Every person has the right to follow his vocation freely, in so far as existing conditions of employment permit."

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) proposed the deletion of the second part of that text beginning with the words "in so far as . . .".

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) requested that the vote on that proposal be taken by roll-call.

A vote was taken by roll-call as follows:

In favour: Belgium, Canada, France, Greece, Lebanon, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Syria.

Against: Afghanistan, Argentina, Bolivia, Cuba, Ethiopia, Haiti, India, Mexico, United Kingdom, United States of America.

Abstaining: Australia, Brazil, Burma, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Chile, China, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Guatemala, Honduras, Pakistan, Panama, Paraguay, Philippines, Poland, Sweden, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Uruguay, Venezuela, Yugoslavia.

The proposal was rejected by 10 votes to 9, with 22 abstentions.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) requested that a roll-call vote should be taken on the whole of the text submitted by him as paragraph 4 of article 21.

A vote was taken by roll-call, as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Chile, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Dominican Republic, Ethiopia, Haiti, Honduras, Mexico, Panama, Paraguay, Philippines, Poland, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Uruguay, Venezuela, Yugoslavia.

Against: Australia, Belgium, Canada, China, Denmark, France, Guatemala, India, Lebanon, New Zealand, Norway, Pakistan, Sweden, Syria, United Kingdom, United States of America.

Abstaining: Burma, Greece, Netherlands.

The amendment was adopted by 22 votes to 16, with 3 abstentions.

The meeting rose at 6:30 p.m.

A/C.3/SR.141<sup>112</sup>

16 November 1948

Summary Record of the Hundred and Forty-First Meeting
[of the Third Committee]

*Held at the Palais de Chaillot, Paris, on Tuesday,
16 November 1948, at 8.30 p.m.*

Chairman: MR. CHARLES MALIK (Lebanon).

THE CHAIRMAN stated that article 21, as amended during the previous meeting, would be first voted paragraph by paragraph and then as a whole.

The representatives of Argentina, Haiti and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics declared that paragraphs 1, 2 and 3 of article 21 had been adopted at the previous meeting, and that consequently they should not be put to the vote a second time.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) stated that paragraph 2, in particular, had been already adopted by the Committee in its entirety.

THE CHAIRMAN replied that no paragraph had been voted on in its entirety, with the exception of paragraph 4 (140th meeting). The vote would therefore be taken on the first three paragraphs separately, and then on the whole article.

Paragraph 1 was adopted unanimously.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) requested that the vote on paragraph 2 as amended be taken by roll-call.

The vote was taken by roll-call, as follows:

The Philippines, having been drawn by lot by the Chairman, was called upon to vote first.

In favour: Poland, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Venezuela, Yugoslavia, Argentina, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Chile, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Ethiopia, Haiti, Honduras, India, Mexico.

Against: Sweden, Turkey, United States of America, Australia, Belgium, Brazil, Canada, China, France, Greece, Lebanon, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Paraguay.

Abstaining: Saudi Arabia, Uruguay, Burma, Guatemala, Pakistan.

Paragraph 2 was adopted by 17 votes to 16, with 5 abstentions.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) pointed out that paragraph 2 was composed of two sentences each of which had been adopted separately at the previous meeting. Had those sentences been numbered, as separate paragraphs, as they should have been, the vote just taken by the Committee would have been unnecessary.

MR. CASSIN (France) called attention to a discrepancy between the French and English texts of paragraph 3: for Quiconque travaille the English text gave merely "Everyone".

Paragraph 3 was adopted by 32 votes to 1, with 3 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN stated that, as paragraph 4 had been adopted at the previous meeting, the article would be put to the vote as a whole.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) requested a roll-call vote on article 21 as a whole, as amended.

A vote was taken by roll-call, as follows:

Liberia, having been drawn by lot by the Chairman, was called upon to vote first.

In favour: Mexico, Poland, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Uruguay, Venezuela, Yugoslavia, Argentina, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Chile, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Ethiopia, Haiti, Honduras.

Against: Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Pakistan, Paraguay, Sweden, Turkey, United Kingdom, United States of America, Australia, Belgium, Brazil, China, France, Greece, India, Lebanon.

Abstaining: Peru, Saudi Arabia, Afghanistan, Burma, Canada, Guatemala.

Article 21 as amended, was not adopted, 17 votes being cast in favour and 17 against, with 6 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN called on speakers who wished to explain their vote.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) deplored the vote taken by the Committee, of which half the members had refused to recognize a fundamental right which it was essential to include in the declaration, merely because they had not been satisfied with some of the provisions of article 21.

MRS. BEGTRUP (Denmark) stated that she had voted in favour of the article, even though she had considered the drafting imperfect, precisely in an effort to avoid the ridiculous situation in which the Committee found itself, having accepted each part of the article separately and rejected the whole. She hoped it would be possible to reconsider the subject matter of that article.

THE CHAIRMAN remarked that under rule 112 of the rules of procedure the Committee could decide by a two-thirds majority to reconsider the substance of the article.

MR. COROMINAS (Argentina) expressed profound regret that a number of members were absent, and that half of those present had seen fit to vote down a text, the parts of which had been approved by the majority at two separate meetings, thereby excluding from the declaration a vital human right. The various representatives would be hard put to it to explain that action to the workers of their respective countries.

MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) said, with respect to paragraph 2, that he had unreservedly supported the sentence proposed by Cuba (A/C.3/232/Corr.1) and had been just as unreservedly opposed to the sentence proposed by the USSR (E/800, page 34) in the fear that it might be interpreted as permitting discrimination for reasons other than those given. In spite of that attitude, he had voted in favour of the article [540] as a whole, as a negative vote would have meant omission of a right which it was essential to state in the declaration.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) had voted against article 21 because in its amended form it was a monstrosity. Some parts of it conflicted with others. Moreover, when the words “without distinction as to race, nationality or sex” were seen in conjunction with article 2, it became obvious that they could be interpreted as restrictive, inasmuch as they listed only three of the eight kinds of discrimination given in that article. He wished to make it clear that those who had voted against article 21 had done so not in a reactionary frame of mind but because they did not wish to limit in any way the generous sentiments expressed in article 2 and because they were anxious to draft a document worthy of the United Nations.

MR. CONTOUMAS (Greece) agreed with the Belgian representative. He too had voted against article 21 because the phrase dealing with discrimination was a grave mistake, and also because he had found some parts of the article repetitious and paragraph 4 superfluous.

MR. WATT (Australia) had voted against article 21 for much the same reasons as the Belgian representative.

MR. ALVARADO (Peru) thought that the Committee undoubtedly wanted to include in the declaration an article dealing with the right to work, a right already recognized in numerous conventions. Such an article should, however, be brief, simple and not open to misinterpretation.

Invoking rule 112 of the rules of procedure, he made a motion to reconsider article 21.

In the course of a procedural debate, the Chairman held that rule 117 of the rules of procedure left to the Chairman’s discretion to permit or not explanations of their votes by members, while the representatives of the Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Cuba, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and Uruguay thought that the Chairman could exercise discretion only as regards permitting the explanation of votes before or permitting it after the vote was taken. The representatives of China, France and Belgium interpreted rule 117 to mean that a motion to reconsider did not take precedence over the explanation of votes and that therefore the explanations should continue.

MR. ALVARADO (Peru) postponed his motion until all representatives who wished to explain their votes had had an opportunity to do so.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that the USSR delegation had voted in favour of all the parts of article 21 and of the article as a whole. An article dealing with the right to work – one of the most important rights in the declaration – could not be excluded under any pretext whatever. To do so would be to flout the hopes of workers, who represented the overwhelming majority of mankind. The disgraceful situation in which the Committee found itself as a result of its final vote must somehow be remedied.

The USSR delegation had voted for article 21 because that article recognized the right to work and the right to equal pay for equal work “without distinction as to race, nationality or sex”. The objection that the phrase was restrictive was unjustified: since the word “race” included colour, all the forms of discrimination relevant to employment had been listed. Moreover, had there been a real desire to improve the article, the delegations which had voted against it on the ground that not all forms of discrimination were included could have suggested the addition of other forms. They had not done so. The article had, in fact, been defeated because colonial Powers did not wish to see in the declaration an article forbidding discrimination as to race, nationality or sex in connexion with work.

Article 21 had embodied progressive ideas. Those ideas would have to be introduced into the declaration. Otherwise it would be rejected by the peoples of the world for whom it was intended.

Mr. Pavlov pointed out that the fact that one of his amendments had been rejected had not prevented him from voting for the whole article. He hoped that other representatives would not definitely reject progressive and fundamental concepts merely because they objected to details which could be taken care of by drafting amendments, and that they would agree to reconsider article 21 and insert it in the declaration.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) said that he had voted for article 21 although he recognized that it contained defects in drafting; but its positive qualities outweighed its defects. Those defects were due to the absence of the drafting subcommittee which had been proposed repeatedly by his delegation, to the excessive time limitation on speeches and to deadlines for the submission of amendments, all of which had not been duly considered. Those disadvantages, however, must be accepted since they arose from a procedure adopted by decision of the majority of the Committee.

He regretted that the Committee had rejected an article which had been eagerly awaited by public opinion. He regretted too that the Committee had failed to adopt that part of the Cuban amendment which had embodied the principle that each worker should receive remuneration according to his needs – a principle accepted by the most progressive legislation. He was glad that the Committee had accepted the Cuban proposal that every person had the right to follow his vocation freely, because that implied the free development of the human personality.

The rights laid down in article 21 had already been incorporated in national legislation and in conventions drafted by the International Labour Organization; the General Assembly should not appear less progressive, but should approve the principle of the dignity of human labour. In order to remedy the situation, the Committee should adopt the Peruvian motion.

MR. CASSIN (France) said that it was unthinkable that the declaration should omit a statement of the right to work. The French delegation had taken the initiative in including that right and did not fear to repeat its belief that it was essential.

He would have voted for article 21 as amended had he not felt that as it stood it presented the same lack of concision as had been experienced in the case of previous articles. He had objected to paragraph 2 on the grounds that the cases of discrimination mentioned therein were too limitative, not because his delegation had the slightest intention of maintaining discrimination of any kind. He had been greatly attracted by the Cuban amendment, which had covered much of the ground which the French delegation had thought of inserting into one of the earlier drafts of the article; but he felt that greater concision would make the declaration a more useful document.

Mr. Cassin welcomed the roll-call vote as an opportunity of placing on record the fact that the French delegation preferred practical realities to specious promises. He supported the Peruvian motion because he was sure that the requisite majority would welcome the opportunity to give the matter fuller consideration.

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) said that she agreed with other representatives, particularly with those of Australia, France and the USSR, that it would be unthinkable that article 21 should not appear in the declaration. She believed, however, that her vote had been entirely consistent.

She had voted in favour of paragraphs 1 and 3 because they were identical with the text submitted by the Commission on Human Rights. She had voted against paragraph 2. That had implied voting against the USSR amendment. Her conception of the Committee's task differed from that held by the delegation of the Soviet Union. Paragraph 1 of the USSR amendment introduced measures for implementation which should not be included in what, in her view, was intended to be purely a declaration of principles, and also introduced the idea of State responsibility. Paragraph 2 of that amendment restricted the prohibition against discrimination more narrowly than article 2. Her delegation had no intention of approving discrimination in respect of equal pay on the basis of religion or political opinion; her adverse vote had been dictated solely by the desire that the article, included as it was in an international document, should not be restrictive. She had voted against paragraph 4 because it appeared unnecessary. She had thought it preferable to vote against the whole article so that the Committee would be able to return to the basic text of the article, which contained principles upon which all delegations were in agreement.

She was not in any way opposed to equal pay for equal work; the motive for her opposition to the USSR amendment and to the amended article as a whole should not be impugned, for she was sure that no member of the Committee was acting in bad faith. There might, however, be said to exist basic differences in outlook between certain delegations.

MR. KAMINSKY (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) said that he had voted for the USSR amendment, for certain others, for the parts of the article as amended and for the whole. His delegation's sense of responsibility had always led it to vote in favour of amendments which it considered progressive. Throughout the discussion it had championed the rights of the workers. The Committee itself, by adopting the paragraphs of article 21 had shown that it, too, favoured that principle.

By voting for the whole, the Byelorussian delegation had avoided contributing to the present situation, which, in his view, could only be called outrageous. He agreed, however, with the representative of Belgium that even the present situation did show that the Committee wished to include in the declaration some statement along the lines of article 21. He regretted that certain Powers had unfortunately influenced a number of delegations to find the amended article unacceptable, perhaps because it now included USSR and Cuban amendments.

MISS BERNARDINO (Dominican Republic) said that she would have voted for the United States amendment, but, since it had been withdrawn she had voted for the USSR amendment to paragraph 2 because she was convinced of the importance of the right of women to equal pay. Many countries still discriminated against women in regard to pay. That was an injustice to the working woman. She had voted for the final paragraph of the Cuban amendment which implied equality for women. In many cases the family was supported exclusively by the woman.

MRS. NEWLANDS (New Zealand) said that she had voted against the article because paragraph 3 was not acceptable. She had voted against the USSR amendment and against the Cuban amendments to paragraphs 2 and 4, not because she was opposed to them in principle but because she wished to see the article contain only a statement of rights. She regretted that the USSR amendment had been accepted. Her delegation was thoroughly opposed to discrimination but mention of discrimination in article 21 would weaken the force of article 2. Mrs. Newlands would support any attempt to reopen discussion of article 21 in the hope that a better text might emerge. The final text of the declaration should be couched in clear, concise and dignified language.

MR. CHANG (China) thought that the adverse vote on the whole article did not indicate that the Committee had no intention of including an article guaranteeing the rights of labour, but might provide an opportunity for drafting some equivalent article to replace it. The unanimous vote in favour of paragraph 1 and the almost unanimous vote for paragraph 3 showed that it could not be said that the Committee wished to exclude article 21 altogether from the declaration. The amended text, in any case, had certain drafting defects due as the representative of Cuba had suggested to lack of mature consideration. The words "and pay" appeared to be redundant in paragraph 1 in view of the text of paragraph 2; they might be deleted. [544] The narrow majority obtained in the vote on certain paragraphs suggested that the Committee had not been wholly satisfied with them. Article 22, which dealt with the right to a standard of living, was closely connected with the question of pay; it might be possible to merge the two. He supported the Peruvian motion, but believed it might be better to take up article 22 while the Committee meditated an improved draft for article 21.

MR. PLAZA (Venezuela) said that he had voted for the USSR amendment to paragraph 2 and the Cuban amendments because they improved and completed the article by including in it principles which were already embodied in the Constitution of his country. He had abstained from voting on the remainder of the amendments, not because he disagreed with their substance but because he had been dissatisfied with their drafting. He had voted for the whole article because to act otherwise would have been to repudiate a principle to which his country was firmly wedded. He thought that representatives who had been dissatisfied with the article as amended should not have voted against it but should have expressed their reservations before the General Assembly. He supported the Peruvian motion because he considered article 21 as one of the most important in the declaration.

MRS. CORBET (United Kingdom) said that she had voted against the article with the greatest reluctance and with no ulterior motive. An article on that subject should undoubtedly be included in the declaration. Inclusion of the article in its present form, however, would have meant repetition. Paragraph 2 of the proposed text was unsatisfactory because it restricted the principle which had already been laid down in article 2. If the Peruvian motion were accepted, it might be preferable for representatives to submit complete redrafts of the article rather than amendments; they would be more likely to obtain general acceptance.

MR. BAROODY (Saudi Arabia) said that he had abstained from voting because there had been a number of conflicting amendments, the discussion had shown a lack of compromise, and therefore it had seemed unlikely that general agreement would be reflected in the article as was desirable. Moreover, his country had a legal system which ensured most of the rights enumerated in the article in a different form.

Summary Record of the Hundred and Forty-Second Meeting
[of the Third Committee]

Held at the Palais de Chaillot, Paris, on Wednesday, 17 November 1948, at 10:10 a.m.

Chairman: MR. CHARLES MALIK (Lebanon).

THE CHAIRMAN invited those members of the Committee who wished to explain why they had [545] voted for or against article 21 at the previous meeting to speak.

MISS KLOMPÉ (Netherlands) said her delegation had voted against article 21 as a whole because it could not accept the first sentence of paragraph 2, as given in document A/C.3/342. That sentence, which was a partial repetition of the idea contained in article 2 of the draft declaration, seemed dangerous, as the Belgian representative had pointed out at the 141st meeting, and somewhat contradictory. Moreover, article 21 as a whole was unnecessarily repetitious.

The Netherlands delegation was, however, very anxious that the article should be reconsidered and that it should explicitly state the right of equal pay for equal work. It supported the United Kingdom suggestion that members of the Committee should be allowed two days in which to present new proposals.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) had voted against article 21 as a whole because he considered that the amendments to it had produced an ill-balanced text, both as regards the relationship of the various parts to each other and as regards the relationship of the article to the other articles of the draft declaration. For example, the second sentence of paragraph 2 of the final draft of article 21 (A/C.3/342) spoke of remuneration to ensure a decent standard of living; yet that sentence was quite inappropriate in view of the word "pay" in paragraph 1 and in view of the fact that article 22 covered the idea of a decent standard of living.

Furthermore, the amendments to the article placed limitations upon the rights proclaimed therein. In the first sentence of paragraph 2 of the final text, discrimination on grounds of race, nationality or sex was specifically prohibited. Such a text would weaken rather than strengthen the article, for discrimination on religious or any other grounds not mentioned might thus be held to be permissible.

Speaking of paragraph 4 of the final text, he said the words "in so far as existing conditions of employment permit" were unnecessary because draft article 27 provided for all the requisite limitations; they were also dangerous because they would give the State an opportunity to interfere and limit unjustly the right to follow one's vocation freely.

The declaration should certainly not fail explicitly to mention the right to work. He therefore hoped the Committee would reconsider the article. Even if the Committee did not adopt that procedure, however, his delegation would not regret having voted against the final text presented to the Committee, for it was better not to set forth the right at all than to proclaim what would be an injustice.

MR. DEMCHENKO (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) said he had voted for the article even though some very good draft amendments to it had been rejected. He felt that certain delegations led by the United Kingdom and the United States, had shown disloyalty towards the work of the Committee in causing the defeat of the article as a whole on account of one amendment of which they did not approve.

The final text of article 21 expressed rights that were basic to human life and a declaration that failed to mention those rights would have no foundation; the articles subsequent to article 21 would be particularly meaningless. Only those who were enemies of the common man and who did not wish to see the principle of equality prevail could have voted against article 21. The representatives of France and of the United States had both spoken of their special efforts in defence of the rights set forth in the article, yet they had both voted against it. History would remember those who supported the article as well as those who had acted insincerely. He felt that the vote that had taken place should be condemned before the whole world.

MR. CAMPOS ORTIZ (Mexico) had found the final draft of article 21 satisfactory; he had therefore voted for it. He did not agree that the incomplete enumeration of the grounds on which discrimination should not be practised might imply that discrimination on other grounds was permissible. The majority of the Committee had twice voted in favour of including such an enumeration in article 21 and therefore felt it more important to repeat the points contained therein than to omit the enumeration for technical reasons.

The Mexican delegation hoped to be able to suggest a new draft of article 21 which would set forth the principle of non-discrimination in a way which would be generally acceptable to members of the Committee.

MR. KURAL (Turkey) had voted against the final draft of article 21 as a whole in the hope that its rejection would lead to reconsideration of the article by the Committee and thus to a more satisfactory text.

The Turkish delegation approved paragraphs 1 and 3 of the text that had been put to the vote, but objected to the phrase "without distinction as to race, nationality or sex" in paragraph 2, as well as to paragraph 4, for reasons already stated by other delegations.

MR. INFRAN (Paraguay), stressing his delegation's interest in ensuring that the declaration should be drafted in the best possible form, said he had voted against the final text of article 21 as a whole because he considered the original and briefer draft clearer than some of the paragraphs as amended. He had voted solely in accordance with his own conscience and judgment and had not been influenced by any outside factors. He had supported the Cuban amendments to paragraphs 1 and 3 of the original text (A/C.3/232/Corr.1) but had abstained on the amendment to paragraph 2.

He urged that article 21 should be reconsidered and to that end he supported the proposal made at the previous meeting by the representative of Peru.

MR. HABIB (India) was certain that no members of the Committee wished to see the substance of article 21 omitted from the draft declaration. He therefore appealed to the Committee to reconsider the article and he urged the adoption of the original text.

MR. DE ATHAYDE (Brazil) had approved certain parts of the final text of article 21, but had voted against the article as a whole. A whole was satisfactory not only because of the value of each of its component parts but because it achieved unity and harmony. Those qualities, however, were not to be found in the text of article 21 on which a vote had been taken.

The Brazilian delegation supported the Peruvian motion for reconsideration of the article for it attached great importance to an explicit statement in the draft declaration concerning the right to work.

MRS. IKRAMULLAH (Pakistan) supported the appeal made by the United Kingdom representative at the 140th meeting, that the original text of article 21 should be adopted.

MR. LUNDE (Norway) felt it necessary to explain his delegation's vote because of the remarks that had been made by the USSR, Byelorussian and Ukrainian representatives.

The Norwegian delegation had favoured paragraph 1 of the final text of article 21 as well as the first sentence of paragraph 2, though it had had some doubts about the wisdom of repeating in that sentence wording that had already been used in a previous article. The second sentence of paragraph 2, however, was unnecessary, as the point it contained was fully covered by article 22; Norway had therefore opposed that sentence. He had supported the New Zealand amendment to paragraph 3, but after the rejection of that amendment, had accepted the original text. Paragraph 4, on the other hand, was not only unnecessary but meaningless and Norway had voted against it. Since two sentences which the Norwegian delegation found entirely unsatisfactory were included in the final draft, that text seemed unworkable and badly drafted and it had consequently voted against the article as a whole. Any suggestions that the Norwegian delegation had been prompted by any motives other than those he had stated were entirely out of order.

He expressed the desire that the Committee should reconsider article 21.

THE CHAIRMAN drew the Committee's attention to the Peruvian proposal that article 21 should be reconsidered and to the United Kingdom suggestion that new drafting amendments to the article could be received until the evening of 18 November. It had also been suggested that the Committee should postpone reconsideration of the article until some later point in its discussion of the draft declaration.

MR. ENCINAS (Peru) would not object to postponing reconsideration of the article.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) emphasized that the various parts of the text of document A/C.3/342 had already been adopted and could not therefore be reconsidered. Consequently he proposed that any subsequent consideration of article 21 should be confined to possible additions to the parts adopted and to adoption of the article as a whole.

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) pointed out that it had always been the practice to consider rejection of a whole text to mean rejection of the various parts of that text even though they had been adopted separately. Any of the parts could, of course, be reintroduced and thus reconsidered.

She hoped the Chairman would rule on whether the original text submitted by the Commission on Human Rights could be considered again.

In reply to a point raised by MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba), THE CHAIRMAN explained that adoption of the Peruvian motion would mean that the original text of the article and all the amendments submitted to it were again before the Committee.

MR. CASSIN (France) thought the Committee would not be legally bound by any decisions it had taken regarding the parts of article 21 if it voted by a two-thirds majority to reconsider the article. The Committee had the sovereign right to decide to change the article in any way it wished.

MR. ENCINAS (Peru) was opposed to the USSR representative's proposal.

MR. CHANG (China) urged that the Peruvian proposal should be put to the vote on the understanding that no particular text would be used as a basis for discussion but that any suggestion might be made which would lead to a satisfactory and generally acceptable text.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the Committee would be faced with serious difficulties if it decided to receive new substantive amendments. New drafting amendments, however, could be made.

MR. WATT (Australia) thought the USSR view was incorrect for two reasons. Firstly, if a text as a whole was rejected, all its parts were automatically rejected. Secondly, rule 112 of the rules of procedure would apply whether a text were rejected or adopted; the Committee could therefore decide to reconsider the parts it had already adopted.

He agreed with the Chairman that any new amendments of substance would be out of order and he interpreted the Peruvian proposal to mean that the original text of article 21 and all amendments to it should again be considered.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium), urging the Committee not to prolong its debate on procedure, agreed with the French representative that if the Committee voted to reconsider the article in accordance with rule 112 of the rules of procedure, [549] it would be entirely free to change the text as it saw fit.

He suggested that the disagreement over article 21 had arisen largely from a misunderstanding. A simple drafting change in paragraph 2, namely, changing the clause "without distinction as to race, nationality or sex" to "without any distinction", might make the article acceptable.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) asked the Chairman to rule whether adoption of the Peruvian proposal would mean that the original text was the basic text before the Committee. He did not agree that such was the case, but thought, like the French, Belgian and Chinese representatives, that the Peruvian proposal for reconsideration would not imply examination of any particular text.

If, however, some particular text was to be re-examined, the only one possible under rule 112 of the rules of procedure would be the final text which had been rejected by the Committee.

MR. ENCINAS (Peru) explained that his proposal plainly meant that the whole of article 21 as originally presented to the Committee by the Commission on Human Rights would be reconsidered.

MR. CHANG (China) said that the adoption of the Peruvian proposal would mean reconsideration of all the previous drafts of article 21. The amendments set forth in document A/C.3/298/Rev.1, as well as those put forward at the previous meeting, could be reintroduced and new changes of a purely drafting character could be suggested. The USSR proposal, on the other hand, would limit the Committee to reconsidering the separate parts of the article which had been adopted at the previous meeting, to which only additions could be suggested.

MR. WATT (Australia) felt that the USSR proposal was covered by the one put forward by the Peruvian representative and that no special status should be given to any particular text. In his view the Committee should take a decision on a motion somewhat along the following lines: "What should be the text of article 21, taking into consideration all the proposals that were made during the discussion as well as the text of article 21 as it appeared in document E/800?"

MR. AQUINO (Philippines) supported the Peruvian proposal, while MR. CARRERA ANDRADE (Ecuador) supported the suggestion of the USSR representative.

MR. KAMINSKY (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) said that if the amended text of article 21 had been adopted at the previous meeting, there would have been no question of what text should be reconsidered by the Committee. It had been rejected because of the absence of several representatives. The provisions of rule 112 were perfectly clear, however, and applied equally to proposals that had been adopted or rejected. He therefore supported the point of view of the USSR and Cuban representatives.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that owing to the lack of clarity in rule 112, both the Peruvian and USSR proposals were in conformity with its terms.

MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) supported the Chinese representative's interpretation of the purpose of the Peruvian proposal and the proposal itself. It was the customary procedure to vote on a text as a whole after having voted it in parts. If the text as a whole was rejected, the various component parts must also be considered as rejected.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) proposed that the Committee should accept the following wording: "The Committee decides, in accordance with rule 112 of the rules of procedure, to reconsider the proposal embodied in document A/C.3/342, which was rejected at a 141st meeting." In his opinion, the Peruvian proposal was not acceptable, owing to the fact that article 21 had been amended and therefore had disappeared. According to the provisions of rule 112, the Committee could only reopen discussion on a question on which a vote had been taken.

THE CHAIRMAN was unable to accept the Cuban representative's interpretation of rule 112. Rejection of the text of article 21 at the previous meeting had been the final stage of the discussion.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) felt that the Committee was competent to decide whether to reconsider article 21 as drafted when the Chairman had submitted it for discussion, or simply in the form in which it appeared in document A/C.3/342. He appealed to the USSR and Cuban representatives, however, not to insist on their proposals as neither would obtain the support of a two-thirds majority of the Committee. Further, it would be unfortunate if such an important article were to be adopted by a narrow majority. Many representatives had voted against the amended text of article 21 only because they had felt that the wording was inadequate.

He therefore requested that a certain amount of time should be allowed for the submission of new amendments to the text set forth in document A/C.3/342.

THE CHAIRMAN supported the remarks of the Chilean representative.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) agreed that the greatest difficulty which faced the Committee arose from the need for a two-thirds majority vote. Should the proposal to reconsider article 21 be rejected, it would mean that the right to work would not be included in the declaration and that the acceptance of the declaration would be endangered.

He agreed with the Chairman that rule 112 provided for the reconsideration of both adopted and rejected proposals. From the explanations that had been made concerning the vote on the text contained in document A/C.3/342, it could be seen that certain additions should be made to that text. In his opinion, however, it would not be sensible to reopen the whole general discussion [551] on the text of article 21 contained in document E/800. There would be a danger, for example, that representatives would reintroduce the whole series of amendments set forth in document A/C.3/298/Rev.1.

He therefore urged the Committee to reopen the discussion on the basis of document A/C.3/342.

MR. CASSIN (France) supported the remarks of the Chilean and USSR representatives concerning the desirability of drafting an article on the right to work. He could not accept the point of view that adopted texts were sacrosanct. The words "adopted or rejected", in rule 112, made it clear that adopted texts could be changed.

From the legal point of view, he could not accept the USSR or Cuban proposals. After that matter had been clarified the Committee could turn its attention to the practical issues involved. In that regard, he expressed the view that no representative would attempt to hinder the Committee's work by reintroducing an amendment that had already been withdrawn or rejected. He was convinced that agreement could be reached by the introduction of very few changes in the text contained in document A/C.3/342.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) said he agreed with the French representative from the legal point of view, and felt it necessary to find a practical solution to the Committee's difficulties. He pointed out that even if the articles of the declaration were adopted separately, if the vote on the declaration as a whole was a negative one, the declaration would not exist.

As the Committee seemed to be in agreement concerning the need to include the right to work in the declaration, he suggested that the principle of reconsideration should be put to the vote, and once agreement had been reached on the principle, a small drafting group, which would include the authors of the various amendments to article 21, should be set up to prepare an agreed text.

The representatives of China, Peru and Cuba supported the Belgian proposal on the understanding that the group referred to by the Belgian representative would be an official drafting sub-committee.

MR. CARRERA ANDRADE (Ecuador) pointed out that there was no rule of procedure which forbade a second vote on the same question. In his opinion, the Committee was competent to overrule the technicality contained in rule 112 and to decide to vote again on the text contained in document A/C.3/342.

In reply to a query from the USSR representative, THE CHAIRMAN said there was nothing in the rules of procedure which provided for two successive votes on the same proposal.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said he would accept the Belgian proposal, on the understanding that the body referred to would be a formal drafting sub-committee and that document A/C.3/342 would be taken as a basis for its discussion.

MR. SAINT-LOT (Haiti) moved the adjournment of the meeting.

The motion for adjournment was rejected by 20 votes to 11, with 9 abstentions.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) said he had suggested an informal drafting group, because its terms of reference would be more flexible. He was, however, prepared to accept the suggestion for an official drafting sub-committee with broad terms of reference.

In reply to the representative of Ecuador, THE CHAIRMAN said he would regard a proposal to take a second vote on the text contained in document A/C.3/342 as an amendment to the rules of procedure, which required a two-thirds majority vote. It would be impossible for him to rule that a second vote could be taken on the same subject, as the rules of procedure now read.

The Chairman put to the vote the following proposal: "The Committee decides, in accordance with rule 112, to reconsider article 21."

*The result of the vote was 39 in favour, none against and 1 abstention.
The proposal was adopted, having obtained the required two-thirds majority.*

MR. KAMINSKY (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) proposed that a vote should be taken immediately, and without further discussion, on the text contained in document A/C.3/342.

THE CHAIRMAN said he could not comply with the Byelorussian representative's request, because it was not in conformity with the rules of procedure.

MR. LUNDE (Norway) moved the adjournment of the meeting.

The motion was adopted by 26 votes to 4, with 3 abstentions.

The meeting rose at 1:30 p.m.

Summary Record of the Hundred and Forty-Third Meeting
[of the Third Committee]

Held at the Palais de Chaillot, Paris, on Wednesday,
17 November 1948, at 3:30 p.m.

THE CHAIRMAN reminded the Committee that it had decided at its previous meeting to re-examine the text of article 21. That decision had been reached by a two-thirds majority in accordance with the rules of procedure.

There were two courses open to the Committee: it could either proceed to the consideration of that article immediately, or it could postpone it until the drafting committee which it had been proposed to establish had finished its work.

MR. CHANG (China) thought that the decision taken by the Committee at its previous meeting could not lend itself to more than one interpretation. The Belgian representative's suggestion had been accepted on the clear understanding that the Committee would immediately set up a drafting committee.

MR. KAMINSKY (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) pointed out that the Chairman had not mentioned all possible courses open to the Committee. He thought there was a third course, namely, to vote again on the text of article 21 as it appeared in document A/C.3/342, without any preliminary discussion.

His proposal was not a formal one, but was made principally in order to have the opinion of members of the Committee on whether the text of article 21 should be voted upon again.

MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) asked the Chairman to call for an immediate vote on the proposal for setting up a drafting sub-committee, for a second vote could not be taken on article 21 without re-examining it. In his view, that proposal had priority over the one just made by the representative of the Byelorussian SSR.

MR. ENCINAS (Peru) agreed with the representative of Uruguay. He recalled that, during the previous meeting, the Committee had begun a discussion on procedure which had not been exhausted. Moreover, there was no longer any text which could be used as a basis for discussion.

MR. CONTOUMAS (Greece) and MR. GRUMBACH (France) thought that the essential point of the Belgian delegation's proposal had been to set up a drafting sub-committee. Since that proposal had been adopted, the time had come to put it into operation.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) and MR. DEMCHENKO (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) were not of that opinion. In their view, the main point of the decision taken by the Committee had been the reconsideration of the text of article 21. That reconsideration should therefore be begun immediately.

MR. DEMCHENKO (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) requested, further, that the general discussion on article 21 should be reopened.

THE CHAIRMAN, replying to the representative of the Ukrainian SSR, pointed out that as no formal proposal had been made to that effect, the Committee was not in any way called upon to consider article 21, as set out in document A/C.3/342.

With regard to the proposal made by the representative of the Byelorussian SSR, the Chairman ruled that it was not in accordance with the rules of procedure. In the first place, article 21 could not be put to the vote without previous general discussion.

Moreover, the text of article 21 had already been the subject of a decision taken by the Committee. The Committee had rejected that text. It [554] could not therefore be voted upon again unless the Committee so decided by a two-thirds majority. The procedural aspect under which the Byelorussian SSR proposal was submitted would, however, if that proposal was accepted, result in a second vote on article 21 by the decision of a simple majority, which was contrary to the express provisions of the rules of procedure.

MR. CHANG (China) asked that the discussion on the Uruguayan representative's proposal should be closed, and MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) asked for closure of the general debate.

The motion for closure was adopted by 26 votes to 7, with 3 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the question of setting up a drafting committee.

It was decided to set up a drafting sub-committee by 27 votes to 2, with 6 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN read out the list of members of the drafting committee, which would consist of representatives of the following countries: Argentina, Belgium, Cuba, Ecuador, France, Greece, Lebanon, New Zealand, Poland, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Kingdom and United States of America.

He defined the terms of reference of the drafting sub-committee as follows. The drafting committee was instructed to prepare a draft text of article 21, taking into account all amendments submitted to the original text and all suggestions made in connexion with that text.

Article 22<sup>1</sup>

MISS BERNARDINO (Dominican Republic) stated that, in submitting its amendment to article 22 (A/C.3/217/Corr.2), her delegation had wished to make the meaning of paragraph 2 quite clear.

Generally speaking, there was agreement on the need for granting special protection and assistance to women during pregnancy and in the nursing period. That was an indisputable principle, recognized in the legislation of most States, and one which her delegation wished to see set forth in article 22.

As it stood, however, the second paragraph of article 22 did not refer to expectant and nursing mothers only, but to all women who, having passed through those two phases, were classed generally as mothers. They did not enjoy any special advantages under existing laws; society did not afford them particular protection as mothers, even when they had to struggle under difficult conditions for a livelihood. Generally speaking, the law merely recognized the weakness of women without giving them the necessary weapons to protect that weakness.

For those reasons the delegation of the Dominican Republic wished to establish a clear distinction between the idea of special protection for expectant and nursing mothers and the protection which it would like to have recognized for other mothers as women.

In order that the inalienable right of women to request care and assistance during pregnancy – a right which was included in most legislations – should be established in a just and equitable manner, it was important to define that right clearly and to specify the exact period to which it applied. That was the intention of the amendment presented by the delegation of the Dominican Republic.

MR. PLEIC (Yugoslavia) did not consider that the amendment presented by his delegation needed detailed explanation because its provisions were clear in themselves.

Like discrimination on grounds of race, nationality or religion which affected entire social groups, discrimination against illegitimate children in certain countries, although it involved individuals only, was nevertheless a serious infringement of human rights and as such should not be tolerated.

Although he did not wish to discuss the reasons which even at the present time explained the inequality of treatment of children born out of wedlock in certain countries, Mr. Pleic noted that such children were deprived in varying degrees and in varying forms of family rights, property rights and inheritance rights; positions in certain departments and certain public offices were sometimes barred to them. Thus, from birth, numerous human beings suffered injury to their personal dignity and were deprived of fundamental rights.

In certain capitalist countries, the percentage of children born out of wedlock was as high as 30 per cent of the total number of children born. That meant that thousands of citizens were held responsible for a state of affairs that was completely beyond their control.

The Yugoslav delegation was of the opinion that the declaration could not ignore that form of inequality. It therefore requested the insertion of a provision to proclaim the equality of illegitimate and legitimate children and to guarantee children born out of wedlock the same social protection as that granted to other children. It was only in that way that the principle of the equality of all men in rights, proclaimed in article 1 of the declaration, would be fully implemented.

Mr. Pleic hoped that no one would raise the objection that article 1 was adequate to deal with the particular problem raised by his delegation. If that reasoning were followed to its logical conclusion, it could be stated that it would be sufficient for the declaration to contain only two articles: article 1, which would guarantee all human rights, and article 27, which would guarantee protection against any possible infringement of those rights. Nevertheless, the very aim of the declaration was to clarify the principle of the equality of individuals proclaimed in article 1, to emphasize the fundamental rights which were most frequently violated and to ensure the implementation and the enjoyment of those rights.

The fact that the fundamental rights of illegitimate children were constantly violated was proved by the existence, in the majority of contemporary positive legislations, of exceptional provisions for [556] the legitimation of illegitimate children, i.e. provisions enabling them, on an individual and exceptional basis, to enjoy complete equality of rights with other citizens. Those provisions thus gave an official character to the violation of the principle of the equality of all men. On the contrary, that equality should be sanctioned by the declaration of human rights, and should no longer depend on individual action.

Mr. Pleic also hoped that no one would protest that the Yugoslav amendment would result in encouraging an increase in the number of illegitimate children. Essentially, the amendment was designed to abolish discrimination against certain children because of the circumstances of their birth. That discrimination did not exist in Yugoslavia where, by a series of highly important legislative acts, the State had prescribed measures guaranteeing children born out of wedlock absolute equality with legitimate children.

The Yugoslav amendment was based on the principle of social justice. The Yugoslav delegation therefore urged the Committee to include that principle in the declaration of human rights.

MR. COROMINAS (Argentina) stated that after listening to the explanation given by the representative of the Dominican Republic, he would vote for the text presented by the delegation for paragraph 2 of article 22 and that he would accordingly withdraw his own amendment to that paragraph (A/C.3/251).

Nevertheless, the Argentine delegation maintained its amendment to the first paragraph of article 22. The draft proposed by the Commission on Human Rights proclaimed the right of the individual and his family to health and wellbeing without retaining the broader idea of social security about which the Argentine delegation had expressed its views during the discussion of article 20 of the draft declaration.

Mr. Corominas stressed the difference between the Spanish idea of seguros and seguridad social. Social insurance was a benefit which society could enjoy if it so desired. That was only one of the methods which might contribute to guaranteeing the social security which the individual had the right to demand of society.

Mr. Corominas pointed out that it was impossible to speak of the right to a standard of living: the expression was incorrect and, indeed, incapable of definition. What should be ensured was the right to existence as well as the right to health and wellbeing. The right to existence could be defined within the framework of article 22 as the sum total of all economic, social and cultural factors which enabled men to live in the most desirable conditions which it was possible for the resources of the State and the community to offer him. It was therefore the necessity for a policy of social security that the Argentine amendment wished particularly to stress.

Moreover, Mr. Corominas stated that he was in favour of the amendment proposed by the Yugoslav delegation. He hoped that the Committee would be unanimous in recognizing the importance of the principle it embodied and in inserting it in the draft declaration.

MR. LUNDE (Norway) expressed the view that the drafting of the first paragraph of article 22, as proposed by the Commission on Human Rights, was satisfactory as a whole. The Norwegian delegation was prepared to vote for it.

Paragraph 2 also summarized in very concise form the principal ideas which it was important to retain in order to ensure protection of motherhood and childhood. It did not, however, express as clearly as might be desired the principle of the social equality of legitimate and illegitimate children, a principle which the representative of Yugoslavia would like explicitly included in the declaration. While the amendment proposed by the delegation of the Dominican Republic had the advantage of implicitly including that principle by stating "Expectant and nursing mothers and all children", it was unsatisfactory in that it excluded mothers of large families, for example, from the special protection which it was desired to grant them by law.

Mr. Lunde was not certain that the wording suggested by the representative of Yugoslavia was completely satisfactory. He pointed out particularly that the equality of legitimate and illegitimate children was not an automatic consequence of the other rights proclaimed in the declaration, but would be based upon a right which must be guaranteed in article 22. Moreover, the term "illegitimate" was inappropriate legally. Mr. Lunde suggested that it should be replaced by "children whose parents have not contracted marriage", or "children born out of wedlock". If the representative of Yugoslavia accepted the modification which Mr. Lunde suggested, the Norwegian delegation would vote for the Yugoslav amendment.

Otherwise, the Norwegian delegation would vote for the text of the Commission on Human Rights with the reservation that it be drafted as follows: "All mothers and all children have the right to special care and assistance". That text would actually take into account implicitly the principle of the absolute equality of the right of all children whether or not they were born out of wedlock, a principle which, since 1915, had been guaranteed by Norwegian law with a single reservation regarding certain inheritance rights in connexion with landed property.

As for the other amendments, the Norwegian delegation would not favour the proposals of the USSR (E/800, page 35), Argentina and New Zealand (A/C.3/267), which did not improve the original text, or the Egyptian amendment (A/C.3/264), which was covered by the provisions of paragraph 1. On the other hand, it approved the Lebanese amendment (A/C.3/260) and agreed that the provisions of paragraph 2 should form a new paragraph in article 14, especially if the Yugoslav proposal were adopted.

MR. DE ATHAYDE (Brazil) considered article 22, which guaranteed the rights of the individual to material wellbeing, as one of the most important articles in the declaration. Food, clothing, housing and medical care were vital necessities not only for the individual but for society and for the State. Neither society nor the State could continue to exist unless the individual enjoyed the minimum standard of living which that article aimed to guarantee. Protection of the family, security in case of unemployment, sickness, disability old age, etc. were rights which were important to society as a whole.

Protection of motherhood and childhood was a matter of public interest. In places where mother and child received the care to which they were entitled, human life developed harmoniously. Brazil had made great efforts in that field. To do so, difficulties arising from extensiveness of its territory and the low density of population had had to be overcome. Much good work had been done in that field so that mother and child could enjoy complete protection, as proclaimed in article 22 of the declaration.

After consideration of the amendments which had been proposed to that article, the representative of Brazil was of the opinion that they added nothing to the draft submitted by the Commission on Human Rights. Article 22 was entirely satisfactory and should be approved in the form in which it stood.

MISS ZULOAGA (Venezuela) was also of the opinion that the original text of article 22 was better than most of the amendments which had been submitted, and that it laid down the exact scope of the right to be established. That was especially true of paragraph 2 which, by the term "mother", provided special aid and assistance to all mothers without any exception.

The Venezuelan delegation supported, however, the amendment submitted by the delegation of Egypt.

It would also vote for the inclusion of the principle of the equality of legitimate and illegitimate children in the declaration of human rights, a principle which was in conformity with its country's Constitution.

MR. CONTOUMAS (Greece) stated that his delegation would once more give its unreserved support to the text of article 22 prepared by the Commission on Human Rights.

The amendment submitted by the delegation of the Dominican Republic did not in any way modify the substance of paragraph 2, since the word "mother" comprised both expectant and nursing mothers.

The USSR amendment once again introduced the idea of the duty of the State; the Greek delegation was anxious to reaffirm that it supported the principle that it was, in the first place, the duty of the State to make the rights laid down in the declaration of human rights a reality; but it was opposed to the inclusion of a reference to that principle in every article; it would see no objection to the addition of a special article to that effect at the end of the declaration. The USSR amendment contained, moreover, a new element in that it laid the responsibility for social insurance on the State and the employer, while in certain countries at least part of that responsibility fell to the insured person; moreover, details concerning forms of insurance, which varied from country to country, could not be included in the body of the declaration of human rights.

Mr. Contoumas could not support the proposal of the Yugoslav delegation either; it rested on a fundamental error in that it considered the legal position of the child, while the declaration was concerned with the individual, be it man or child, as a member of society; as a human being, the illegitimate child had all the rights laid down in [559] the declaration without any consideration of his legal status. There was therefore no reason to suggest that the original text of article 22 sanctioned discrimination against illegitimate children.

The Lebanese amendment was not justified either, for article 14 dealt with the rights of the family as the nucleus of society, while article 22 dealt with the rights of mother and child as individual members of society.

The Greek delegation thought highly of the Egyptian proposal on the protection to be given to old age, and would vote for it.

Nevertheless, it preferred the original text to the Argentine amendment, which was not clear, and, everything considered, to that of New Zealand.

Mr. Contoumas wished however to draw the Committee's attention to the French wording of article 22; it was not, he thought, an exact translation of the English text, which he preferred. In the French text, the notions of the standard of living and social services were not separated, as they were in the English text; moreover, the adverb notamment did not have quite the same meaning as the term "including" in the English text.

MRS. NEWLANDS (New Zealand) recalled that her delegation had asked that the words "social security" in article 20 be deleted (A/C.3/267). It had withdrawn its amendment to that article with the intention of returning to that point when article 22 was discussed, since the latter dealt especially with social security.

The New Zealand delegation was aware of what that principle meant for millions of human beings, and for that reason it had considered it advisable to put the emphasis on social security in article 22. That was the purpose of its amendment.

Moreover, Mrs. Newlands did not find the wording of the basic article satisfactory.

The clause: "Everyone has the right to a standard of living" seemed to her devoid of any meaning. She wondered what standard of living would have to be guaranteed, whether it was to be that of the poorest peasant or that of the richest prince. It could be argued that "standard of living" was explained by the words "adequate for the health and wellbeing of himself and his family", but the wording of that first paragraph should nevertheless be improved. Moreover, the present text wrongly implied that "social services" were not part of the standard of living.

Moreover the article stated that an individual "has the right to social services adequate for the health and wellbeing of himself and his family"; the family itself, therefore, enjoyed that right only through the head of the family. Consequently, that last clause was restrictive.

Mrs. Newlands read out the amendment submitted by her delegation and stressed the fact that it had given a first place to social security since all other benefits derived from it.

For the sake of conciseness, the reference to mother and child, which made up a second paragraph in the original text, had been included in the single paragraph. That did not mean that the [560] rights of mother and child were of secondary importance. In any case, if the Committee supported the amendment of the Dominican Republic, the New Zealand delegation would endorse that amendment and would delete the words referring to mother and child in its own text.

In conclusion, she stressed the importance in her country and in other countries of social security, through which the community assumed responsibility for each one of its members.

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) thought that all members of the Committee were agreed that article 22 proclaimed one of the fundamental rights of the individual: the right to social security.

The Commission on Human Rights had drafted that article with the greatest possible care. Paragraph 1 was based on a proposal made by the International Labour Organization,<sup>1</sup> and paragraph 2 had been adopted following a recommendation of the Commission on the Status of Women.

She then referred to the following passage of the amendment submitted by the Cuban delegation to article 21: "Every person who works had a right to receive such remuneration as will, in proportion to his capacity and skill, assure him a standard of living suitable for himself and his family." She regretted she had not fully understood the meaning of that amendment the previous day. She had in fact not realized that it was a question of taking the wage-earner's family responsibilities into account when considering wages. She thought the principle underlying the amendment was a very fair one and should be stated in the first paragraph of article 22. She proposed therefore that, after the words "standard of living", the words "which shall take into account the needs of his family" should be inserted (A/C.3/343). By accepting that suggestion, the Committee would be helping social welfare workers and all those interested in the question of family welfare.

Mrs. Roosevelt considered the USSR amendment contained too much detail. Moreover, by emphasizing the State's obligations, it went beyond the scope of the declaration and altered its legal form. The declaration should be a statement of principles. The State's obligations would be laid down in the covenant.

As for the Yugoslav amendment, she thought it concerned social policy and legislation, and was out of place in the declaration. In any case, paragraph 2 of article 22 provided for the protection of all children, without any discrimination. There was therefore no need to state specifically that illegitimate children should enjoy the same protection as other children.

She could not support the Argentine amendment; she considered it merely another version of the basic text, which did nothing to improve it.

She then replied to the objections raised by the representative of New Zealand concerning the drafting of the article. She thought that the term “standard of living” was very well defined in paragraph 1. Moreover, the amendment she herself had just proposed should give that paragraph greater clarity.

She was not opposed to the amendment presented by New Zealand, but she thought that the basic text, which had been supported by the International Labour Organization and the Commission on the Status of Women, should obtain the approval of the Committee.

MR. LUNDE (Norway) was quite prepared to support the amendment proposed by the United States, but thought it would be preferable to say: “which shall take into account not only his own needs, but also those of his family”.

He thought that that amendment would render even more necessary the deletion of the last eight words in French or the last five words in English of paragraph 1.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) thanked the United States delegation for having taken up again, in its amendment to article 22, the idea which inspired the Cuban amendment to article 21.

His delegation had considered it necessary to stress the fact that pay should not merely be based on the work done. The remuneration of the work should also take into account the workers’ responsibilities.

He explained that, if the amendment proposed by the United States were adopted, his delegation would withdraw its amendment to article 21. Otherwise, it would maintain it.

He thought that article 22 satisfied the aspirations of many of the Latin American countries and reflected the principles stated in the texts adopted at Bogotá.

He then examined the various amendments to article 22.

The text proposed by the Dominican Republic for paragraph 2 seemed to him better than the original text.

He supported the amendment proposed by Yugoslavia, and regretted that only one delegation had pronounced itself in favour of that amendment. It stressed a principle which had been recognized by the most recent Constitution of Cuba. His delegation attached much importance to it and asked that, when the amendment was put to the vote that vote should be by roll-call.

MR. GRUMBACH (France) thought article 22 was satisfactory in principle. An effort should nevertheless be made to improve its drafting. For that reason he suggested the following wording for paragraph 1:

“Everyone has the right to a standard of living that will provide for the wellbeing of himself and his family, including food, clothing, housing, medical care and the necessary social services for safeguarding his health and affording security in case of unemployment, sickness, disability, widowhood, old age or other loss of livelihood.”

Mr. Grumbach hoped that, as now worded, the amendment would meet the objections of the representative of Greece.

He pointed out that he had drawn upon the New Zealand amendment when taking into account the disabilities caused by widowhood. He trusted that the Committee would approve of the addition of the word “widowhood”.

Mr. Grumbach thought it would be advisable to substitute for paragraph 2 the draft proposed by the Dominican Republic, which was clearer and more concise.

He recognized that the Yugoslav amendment was well founded. It was just that illegitimate children should be assured the same rights as legitimate children, but that problem should not arise in connexion with article 22. In questions of social protection, legal status should not give rise to discrimination. The child should be protected according to its needs, and it was rather its social level that should be taken into account.

The representative of France shared the view of the representative of the United States regarding the Argentine amendment; it only changed the form of article 22, and it therefore served no purpose to substitute it for the original text.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) approved the new draft proposed by the representative of France, and asked that it should be distributed in the form of a document, so that the members of the Committee could study it.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) wished to draw attention to the great importance of the problems dealt with in article 22. The various questions regarding standard of living, social security, social insurance, protection for mothers and children, were vital, especially for the working classes. It was unfortunately manifest that the years which had followed the last war had been marked by a progressive lowering of the standard of living in many capitalist countries, even in countries which had considerable resources. It was to be noted that the expenditure necessitated by the switch-over from a war to a peacetime economy and by the economic revival of those countries had a direct effect on the workers' standard of living. A few examples would suffice to illustrate that fact. In the United States of America, where production had reached 80 per cent of its pre-war level, the profits of the monopolies and private industries had increased; from 24 thousand million dollars in 1939, they had risen to 30 thousand million after the Second World War. Similarly, in France the real wages of the workers were now half what they had been before the war, although the profits of the French capitalists represented 43 per cent of the national income. Those examples would be enough to give a fair idea of the particularly difficult living conditions with which the workers were faced in those countries.

In the Soviet Union, on the contrary, the rise in the standard of living and the guarantee of social security for the workers had been the constant care of the Government. Salaries had risen to double what they were in 1940, and a general plan was being carried out for the improvement of the workers' standard of living, involving the [563] building of schools and hospitals, for instance. Moreover, the USSR Government was endeavouring to eliminate the underlying causes of hard living conditions for the workers. It combated unemployment for instance, and was striving to forestall economic crises, and it gave the workers real and effectual aid.

That sketch of the workers' living conditions in the Soviet Union explained the position of the USSR delegation in respect of the principles set forth in article 22. Those principles were in accordance with those expressed in the USSR Constitution, and for that reason Mr. Pavlov supported them warmly. The amendments proposed by his delegation to that article were meant to extend to the workers of the whole world the benefits already enjoyed by the workers of the USSR.

Mr. Pavlov emphasized the importance of the principle that workers should be covered by social insurance at the expense of the State or the employer, according to the special conditions prevailing in each country. The principle of social insurance could be interpreted in very different ways. In the United Kingdom, for instance, the workers themselves paid the contributions, and not their employers or the Government. In short, the workers did not receive the help in that field because it was they, in fact, who contributed the financial reserves on which they would draw in case of need, in the form of social insurance. The reason behind such a system was not far to seek. The capitalist bourgeoisie realized that the present degree of social evolution of the world demanded a system of social insurance, if only to cope with serious social unrest, but it did not wish to bear the expense. It had therefore thought of making the working classes alone bear the whole cost of that insurance. As might well be imagined, that was not the USSR Government's point of view. That Government wished the working classes to be the real beneficiaries of social insurance, and therefore took upon itself all expenses in connexion therewith. In the USSR the allocations for social welfare services had doubled since the war; for 1950 they would amount to about 61,600 million roubles. In that country, the workers' social insurance benefits were guaranteed by the State, and Mr. Pavlov hoped that the workers of other countries might have the same guarantee. That was the reason for his amendment.

Similarly, with regard to free medical attention, Mr. Pavlov recalled that in the USSR, medical care was not a commercial enterprise, but was considered solely from the humanitarian point of view; that was the only admissible point of view. In that connexion, Mr. Pavlov approved highly of the first amendment submitted by the Argentine delegation, which mentioned measures to be taken in the field of medical treatment; he was prepared to accept it if that delegation, in its turn, would accept the second part of the USSR amendment.

Finally, the last clause of the USSR amendment referred to the necessity for providing de-[564]cent housing. Mr. Pavlov considered that point very important.

In conclusion, he would point out that various objections raised, alleging that the inclusion of the USSR amendment to article 22 would alter the juridical character of the declaration, were unfounded.

MR. CHANG (China) proposed the following wording for the first paragraph of article 22:

“Everyone has the right to a standard of living adequate for the needs of his family and himself, including food, clothing, housing, medical care and social services, and to security in the event of unemployment, sickness, disability, widowhood, old age or other loss of livelihood owing to circumstances beyond his control.”

Summary Record of the Hundred and Forty-Fourth Meeting [of the Third Committee]

Held at the Palais de Chaillot, Paris, on Thursday,
18 November 1948, at 10:30 a.m.

Chairman: MR. CHARLES MALIK (Lebanon).

MR. LUNDE (Norway) moved that speeches made on points of order and in explanation of votes should be limited in duration to two minutes each.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) proposed that the limit should be fixed at five minutes.

The Chilean proposal was adopted by 23 votes to 5, with 7 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN reopened the general debate on article 22 and the amendments to it.

MR. LUNDE (Norway) supported the first paragraph of the Chinese amendment (A/C.3/347) with the exception of the final phrase, “in circumstances beyond his control”, which in his opinion restricted unduly the very guarantees which the article was intended to provide. He urged strongly that the phrase should be deleted.

MR. WATT (Australia) stated that, in view of progressive social security measures adopted in his country, his delegation felt a particular interest in article 22.

Most of the amendments submitted to that article reflected no basic difference in substance with the original text, which, it should be remembered, had been drafted with the assistance of representatives of the International Labour Organization and the Commission on the Status of Women. That text might, of course, bear improvements of [565] style; it was, however, satisfactory in the main and should not be amended more than absolutely necessary.

He was rather dubious about the United States amendment (A/C.3/343). In the original text, the phrase “adequate for the health and wellbeing of himself and his family” plainly referred to a standard of living and, incidentally, met the point raised by the Cuban representative which the United States amendment was intended to satisfy. The United States amendment appeared to mean that, as regards a standard of living, the needs of the family should be merely taken into account and that the more satisfactory phrase quoted above applied exclusively to health and wellbeing.

Although the New Zealand amendment (A/C.3/267) was attractively simple and clear and brought in the question of widowhood, it omitted the vital reference to a standard of living adequate for the individual and his family. Moreover, the words “social security” should not be repeated in article 22, since they were used in a different sense in article 20.

He consequently preferred paragraph 1 of the Chinese amendment, but agreed with the Norwegian representative that the phrase “in circumstances beyond his control” should be deleted: no one would argue, for example, that an alcoholic should be denied assistance, even though he himself was responsible for his plight.

Paragraph 2 of the Chinese amendment covered the intention of the Dominican amendment (A/C.3/217/Corr.2), the actual text of which failed to make any provision for mothers of children past infancy.

With respect to the Yugoslav amendment (A/C.3/233), he observed that, while no one could quarrel with the principle that the same social protection should be extended to both legitimate and illegitimate children, it would hardly be feasible to proclaim that they were equal in civil rights, in view of laws existing in most countries with respect to inheritance and succession.

In order to meet the intentions of both the Dominican amendment and the portion of the Yugoslav amendment which appeared generally acceptable, Mr. Watt suggested that paragraph 2 should be redrafted to read as follows (A/C.3/348):

“All mothers, including expectant and nursing mothers, and all children, including illegitimate children, are entitled to special care and assistance.”

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) thought that article 22 was one of the most important in the declaration inasmuch as it laid special emphasis on the right of the individual to an adequate standard of living for himself and his family and guaranteed his social security.

He was opposed to the USSR amendment (E/800, page 35) dealing with social insurance, inasmuch as that concept was narrower than that [566] of social security, which could be ensured not only by State action but by other means as well.

He supported both paragraphs of the Chinese amendment, on the understanding that paragraph 2 included any children, legitimate and illegitimate, and thus met the point of the Yugoslav representative. He thought, however, that the words “and wellbeing” should be inserted after the word “needs” in paragraph 1 of the Chinese amendment.

MR. COROMINAS (Argentina) withdrew his amendment to article 22 (A/C.3/251).

MR. CARRERA ANDRADE (Ecuador) remarked that article 22 fulfilled some of the promises made in earlier articles of the declaration by attempting, in a practical way, to guarantee an adequate standard of living. It should be noted, however, that its provisions fell short of actual achievements in the field of social security attained in Ecuador and in a number of other Latin American countries and did not represent any progress in implementing the principle of freedom from want proclaimed in the Atlantic Charter. There was, furthermore, a reference to better standards of life in the preamble to the declaration itself; it was regrettable that article 22 failed to call for further improvements.

He supported the original text of paragraph 1 with the addition of the United States amendment and of the word “decent” before the word “housing”.

He suggested the following wording for paragraph 2, combining the ideas contained in the Dominican and Yugoslav amendments (A/C.3/349): “Expectant and nursing mothers and all children, illegitimate as well as legitimate, have the right to special care and assistance.”

MR. KAYALY (Syria) supported paragraph 1 of the Chinese amendment and paragraph 2 of the basic text.

He was opposed to the USSR amendment for the following reasons: paragraph 1 imposed a responsibility on States, whereas the declaration should confine itself to proclaiming the rights of individuals; the idea of paragraph 2 was included in the original text; and paragraph 3 was covered in article 20.

He was equally opposed to the Yugoslav amendment. While he fully agreed that legitimate and illegitimate children were entitled to the same social protection, to grant equal civil rights to illegitimate children might serve to discourage legal matrimony and would conflict with the principle, already stated in the declaration, that the family was the fundamental group unit of society.

The Lebanese amendment (A/C.3/260) did not appear well founded; special care for mothers and children should be mentioned in an article dealing with social rights, as did article 22.

MRS. BEGRUP (Denmark) supported paragraph 1 of the Chinese amendment, although she [567] would prefer its final phrase to be deleted. She was pleased to see that both in paragraph 2 of that amendment and in the corresponding paragraph of the original text it was considered that mothers and children had the right to special care and assistance and that a matter of social justice rather than charity was involved.

She thought the Yugoslav amendment most appropriate. It was necessary to include in the declaration a statement that illegitimate children should enjoy the same legal rights and social protection as legitimate children. She thought the best drafting of that idea was to be found in the second alternative of the Norwegian amendment (A/C.3/344) to the Yugoslav amendment.

Although the adoption of various amendments might result in a clumsy text, it should be remembered that the Committee was voting on ideas, some of them new and worthwhile, ideas submitted by representatives of the forty countries which had not collaborated in drafting the text submitted by the Commission on Human Rights, and not on the actual wording, which could be improved by a drafting sub-committee.

It had been frequently said that the declaration would not be a legally binding document. As a statement of general principles, it was expected to exercise a moral influence on the people of the world. Since the living conditions and security of illegitimate children were determined by public opinion even more than by law, it was essential to include an appeal in favour of those children in the declaration.

MR. PLEIC (Yugoslavia) stressed the fact that to proclaim the need of equal social protection for illegitimate children without at the same time proclaiming their legal equality would mean to sanction legal inequality. He was consequently unable to agree to the deletion of the first part of his amendment. He was glad to see that a number of representatives supported his amendment and that no serious objection had been raised to it. The United States representative had failed to explain the reasons for her opposition.

In reply to the French representative, he said that he had presented his amendment precisely because different social systems existed; had the Socialist system been universal, the provision would not have been needed.

He felt that article 22, which dealt with the question of social protection, was the proper place for his amendment. If the amendment were accepted in principle, however, its position in the declaration could be determined later.

He accepted the second alternative of the Norwegian amendment to his own, and pointed out that the French equivalent of "are equal in rights" should be sont les égaux en droits.

MRS. CORBET (United Kingdom) said that she had originally intended to support the original text because she was not in favour of altering the clear and concise statements submitted by the Commission on Human Rights. She had also thought of supporting the United States amend-[568]ment because it met the aims of the Cuban amendment to article 21 (A/C.3/232/Corr.1). The Chinese amendment, however, had now become the best draft; it was clearer, briefer and took into account the best parts of all the other amendments.

Her objection to the Norwegian amendment was that it failed to take into account cases where a deliberately idle individual might lay claim to protection unjustifiably. The Dominican amendment was – probably unintentionally – restrictive: the mother's need for protection extended beyond the period of nursing.

The Chinese amendment fully covered the substance of both the Dominican and the Yugoslav amendments. She agreed with the Yugoslav representative that no distinction should be made between legitimate and illegitimate children in the field of social security; indeed, in her country, no such distinction was made. Other countries did permit such discrimination; but discrimination as such was prohibited by the declaration as a whole. The word “childhood” in the Chinese amendment covered both legitimate and illegitimate children. If that were not accepted, the Australian amendment would be preferable to the Yugoslav, because the proposal made in the latter that equal rights should be granted to illegitimate and legitimate children went too far and might cause legal difficulties in such cases as inheritance. She hoped that the Yugoslav representative would not insist that his proposal should be retained.

There was some logic in the Lebanese amendment, but a proper distinction should be made between the idea of protection for women and children as set out in article 22 and of the family as the fundamental group unit of society as defined in article 14.

She opposed the New Zealand amendment – interesting though it was – because it omitted to mention the right to an adequate standard of living. The Chinese amendment, in any case, covered the ground more fully. That amendment, too, covered the ground of paragraphs 2 and 3 of the USSR amendment; the differences were merely a matter of wording. She could not, however, support paragraph 1 of the USSR amendment. It would be inappropriate to introduce the idea of social insurance. In her own and other countries social insurance implied payment of premiums by the workers; if no premiums were paid, the system would be more correctly known as social security. That part of the USSR amendment, therefore, was confusing.

MRS. NEWLANDS (New Zealand) said that she still felt that her delegation’s amendment was the best; there had been no cogent argument against it. She pointed out that the original text had not been approved by the International Labour Organization, the representative of which had informed the Commission on Human Rights that [569] social security was the correct term for the subject it had in mind.<sup>1</sup> The Commission, however, could not agree to use those words in the present context. The representative of the United States had argued that the Commission’s text was well balanced; but her own amendment destroyed that balance. The Chinese amendment had met some of the objections on drafting points. She would not insist on the New Zealand amendment if the Chinese representative would consent to the insertion of the word “social” before the word “security”, where it would cover the other rights contained in the paragraph. She would consent, too, to a separate statement of motherhood’s right to protection in a second paragraph.

MR. CASSIN (France) said that he would have supported the English version of the present text. The French version, however, had defects. He would not insist upon the French amendment (A/C.3/346) and saw no objection to using the Chinese amendment as a basis for the discussion. The words “health and well-being” should be substituted for the word “needs” in that amendment, restoring the very important idea of health from the Commission’s text. He disagreed with the Chinese drafting where it appeared to place social services on the same level as food, clothing, housing, etc. It was through social services that an adequate standard of living could be obtained; social services should furnish food, clothing and housing. He proposed, therefore, that the distinction should be expressed by the substitution of the words “and has also the right to” for the words “and to” before the word “security” in the Chinese amendment, thus virtually restoring the basic text.

He could not support the New Zealand amendment. All too few countries had a system of social security as broad as that of New Zealand. To insert the idea of social security in that sense might create serious differences of opinion. He also disagreed with paragraph 1 of the USSR amendment. France, like the USSR, had a system of social insurance, but many countries had not. The more general term was therefore preferable.

He accepted paragraph 2 of the Chinese amendment. It covered the substance of the Dominican and Yugoslav amendments, and the use of the generic terms “motherhood” and “childhood” were adapted to the French text of the Commission’s article. With regard to the Yugoslav amendment, equality of rights as between illegitimate and legitimate children should be included – if at all – in article 14. The declaration, however, could not state their equality before the law, because that went too far beyond a statement of general principles.

MISS KLOMPÉ (Netherlands) said she agreed with the Yugoslav representative in principle that illegitimate children should not have to bear the responsibility for the defects of society, but she could not support his amendment because it went too far by claiming equal rights in general for legitimate and illegitimate children. Not only was that impossible in accordance with the law in many countries, but it would mean a denial of the importance of the marriage bond and of the principle that the family was the fundamental group unit of society. She feared that the Yugoslav amendment would harm rather than benefit children by constituting an inducement to beget and bear children out of wedlock. She requested a roll-call vote on the Yugoslav amendment.

She supported the Chinese amendment, because it was preferable to the basic text and included the substance of the Australian (A/C.3/348) and the United States amendments (A/C.3/343). Paragraph 2 of that amendment was preferable to that submitted by the Dominican representative; the latter was too restricted. The word “motherhood” included all mothers in any condition.

MR. DEMCHENKO (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) pointed out that most of the rights mentioned in article 22 had long been in force in his country and their scope was being progressively extended. There were bonus and pension schemes for gainfully employed persons and special care was provided for mothers and children. The basic text of the article was inadequate to reflect and extend such progress. He would, therefore, support the USSR, Yugoslav and Dominican amendments. It was essential to include a provision for the right to social insurance, since he believed that was prohibited in some countries. It was equally important to state explicitly the right to medical care and decent housing and that the State and society should be required to ensure a real opportunity of enjoying those rights.

Arguments had been voiced that the Yugoslav amendment was inopportune. It was, on the contrary, essential to state explicitly that no discrimination should be permitted against illegitimate children, because discriminatory laws against illegitimacy existed in some countries.

MISS BERNARDINO (Dominican Republic) thanked the Argentine and Cuban representatives for withdrawing their amendments in favour of hers, and the representatives of France, Ecuador and the Ukrainian SSR, who had agreed that her amendment contained a universally accepted idea. She would, however, gladly accept the Chinese amendment in the interests of harmony. She thought that the Yugoslav amendment should find its place in national legislation rather than in the declaration. She could not, however, bring herself to vote against it after she had struggled for the rights of illegitimate children for so many years.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) stated that his delegation attached special importance to the inclusion of the right to social insurance. He could not agree that there were only differences of drafting between his amendment and the other texts. The USSR amendment went much deeper than the others: the right to social insurance must be guaranteed to anyone who was gainfully employed, and that guarantee must be implemented. Such social insurance must not be provided at the expense of the worker, as it was in certain countries. The USSR system – by which the State assumed full responsibility for the workers' provident funds – could perhaps not be extended in its entirety to all other countries, but he believed the principle should be explicitly stated; it would not be redundant to do so.

Medical assistance was not merely an item in an adequate standard of living but a specific right. The sanitary measures mentioned in the Cuban (A/C.3/232) and Argentine (A/C.3/251) amendments were quite as important as medical care. Great progress had been made in the USSR in the eradication of disease and in the provision of free medical care, in contrast to conditions elsewhere, where poverty often prevented access to proper medical assistance and thereby undermined the health of the nation. The right to medical assistance, even if not completely free, should, therefore, be stated.

He agreed with the representatives of Norway and Australia that the Yugoslav amendment would be improved by certain drafting changes; but, with that exception, it should be accepted.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) regretted that the United States amendment did not satisfy him and hoped that it would be withdrawn. He would have supported it, but in the context of article 21, not of article 22. He would submit a compromise amendment but reserved his right to insist upon retaining the substance of his amendment in the drafting sub-committee.

MR. CHANG (China) said that he could accept certain drafting changes to his amendment. He agreed with the French and Chilean representatives that the words "health and wellbeing" should be restored; they should be substituted for the word "needs". He could not, however, wholly agree with the representative of France; social services certainly implied a support for an adequate standard of living, but they were not on the same level. It would, however, be possible to give emphasis to social services by inserting the word "necessary" before those words; it would refer to food, clothing, housing, etc. The word "and" would then be substituted for the comma after the word "housing".

He did not agree with the New Zealand proposal to insert the word "social" before the word "security". Social security had been mentioned in article 20, which had been intended to cover the subsequent articles. To repeat the words again in the present context would narrow their meaning. [572] He agreed with the representative of Uruguay that the word seguridad was a more accurate translation of the word "security" than the word seguros, which implied insurance.

He did not object to the Norwegian proposal that the phrase "in circumstances beyond his control" should be voted separately. It might be well to include the words, however, because they would tend to encourage self-reliance.

The Australian alteration of paragraph 2 might be acceptable. His own abstract terms "motherhood" and "childhood" could not be used with the words "have the right"; the words "are entitled" should therefore be substituted in the English text.

Replying to the representative of the Dominican Republic, he pointed out that the word "childhood" covered all children born in or out of wedlock. He was glad to note that the USSR representative believed that the Yugoslav amendment needed drafting changes. That amendment would be voted on by roll-call, but he suggested that a vote should first be taken on its principle and, if that were accepted, the drafting changes could then be made. He agreed with the representatives of the Dominican Republic and France that the Yugoslav amendment in its present form was inappropriate to article 22 and belonged rather in some article dealing with the protection of social status.

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) withdrew her amendment (A/C.3/343) in favour of the Chinese amendment.

MISS BERNARDINO (Dominican Republic) disagreed with the representative of China: the words “have the right” should be retained in the English text of paragraph 2. If the Chinese text were put to the vote, she would make an amendment to substitute those words for the words “are entitled”.

Summary Record of the Hundred and Forty-Fifth Meeting
[of the Third Committee]

Held at the Palais de Chaillot, Paris, on Thursday,
18 November 1948, at 3:15 p.m.

Chairman: MR. CHARLES MALIK (Lebanon).

THE CHAIRMAN reminded the Committee that the general discussion of article 22 was closed, and asked the Committee to vote on the various amendments which had been submitted.

MR. CHANG (China), with a view to avoiding procedural difficulties, withdrew the proposal he had made at the preceding meeting, in order to [573] enable a vote to be taken on the principle of including the idea of the absolute equality of legitimate and illegitimate children.

MR. WATT (Australia), noting that the amendment proposed by his delegation (A/C.3/348) as a compromise had not achieved its aim, withdrew the amendment. He would vote in favour of either the original text or the text submitted by the Chinese delegation (A/C.3/347/Rev.1). Those two texts implicitly guaranteed illegitimate children the same protection as was accorded to legitimate children.

MR. LUNDE (Norway) reserved the right to reintroduce as his own the proposal which the Australian delegation had just withdrawn, in case the amendment presented by Yugoslavia (A/C.3/233) was not adopted.

MRS. NEWLANDS (New Zealand) indicated that her delegation withdrew the text it had proposed for article 22 (A/C.3/267).

THE CHAIRMAN first submitted to the Committee the amendments to the first paragraph of article 22.

He called for a vote on the USSR amendment (E/800, page 35) to add to paragraph 1, after the words “in circumstances beyond his control” the following text: “and also (if he is gainfully employed) to social insurance at the expense of the State or of his employers, in accordance with the legislation of each country”.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) requested a vote by roll-call.

A vote was taken by roll-call as follows:

In favour: Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Czechoslovakia, Poland, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Yugoslavia.
Against: Afghanistan, Australia, Belgium, Brazil, Canada, Chile, China, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Ethiopia, France, Greece, Honduras, India, Luxembourg, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Panama, Paraguay, Philippines, Sweden, Syria, Turkey, United Kingdom, United States of America, Uruguay.

Abstaining: Burma, Colombia, Cuba, Guatemala, Iran, Mexico, Venezuela.

The amendment was rejected by 27 votes to 6, with 7 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the amendment presented by the Norwegian delegation (A/C.3/344), to delete the words: “in circumstances beyond his control” at the end of the first paragraph.

The amendment was rejected by 20 votes to 6, with 11 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the USSR amendment (E/800, page 35) to add the following sentence to paragraph 1: “Everyone has the right to medical care and assistance in case of illness.”

The amendment was rejected by 21 votes to 7, with 10 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the USSR amendment (E/800, page 35) to add the following sentence to paragraph 1:

[574]

“Everyone has the right to decent housing.”

The amendment was rejected by 20 votes to 7, with 10 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the USSR amendment (E/800, page 35) to add the following sentence to paragraph 1: “It is the duty of the State and society to take all necessary steps, including legislation, to ensure that everyone has a real opportunity of enjoying all these rights.”

The amendment was rejected by 27 votes to 9, with 4 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the amendment presented by the delegation of Ecuador (A/C.3/349) to insert the word: “decent” before the word “housing”.

THE CHAIRMAN submitted to the Committee the new draft of article 22, paragraph 1, proposed by the French delegation (A/C.3/350).

MR. DE FOLIN (France) pointed out that the essential object of the French amendment was to give prominence to the idea of social welfare services. The French delegation did not think that the amendment could affect the substance of the questions under discussion.

Moreover, the word “personal” should be deleted because it added no clarity to the text.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) stated that if the text submitted by the French delegation were adopted, the amendment to article 21 proposed by the Cuban delegation (A/C.3/232/Corr.1), on which no decision had yet been reached, would become unnecessary. In the contrary case, the Cuban delegation would be compelled to maintain that amendment.

MR. CONTOUMAS (Greece) expressed the preference of his delegation for the text presented by the French delegation. That text was very clear and had the advantage of drawing a distinction between the ideas of a standard of living and of social welfare services. The French text rightly emphasized that social welfare services were not one of the elements constituting the standard of living, but rather one of the means of improving the standard of living.

MR. CHANG (China) observed that the text presented by the French delegation differed in substance from the text submitted by his delegation. It contained three new ideas: individual resources, the need to supplement those resources by social services, and the guarantee to the individual of wellbeing and health for himself and his family.

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America), MRS. CORBET (United Kingdom) and MR. WATT (Australia) agreed with what had been said by the representative of China and drew attention to certain defects in the English translation of the French amendment.

MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) and MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) pointed out that the word “resources” was inappropriate within the framework of article 22, which referred only to wage-earners.

MR. DE FOLIN (France) explained that the word “resources” was taken in its broadest sense and obviously meant resources obtained through work, supplemented where necessary by social services. Nevertheless he acknowledged that the English translation left much to be desired. The French delegation would not press its proposal.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the text proposed by the Chinese delegation for article 22, paragraph 1 (A/C.3/347/Rev.1).

MR. LUNDE (Norway) requested that the text he voted upon in parts and that the words “in circumstances beyond his control” be voted upon separately from the remainder of the paragraph.

The first part of the text, up to and including the word “livelihood”, was adopted by 40 votes to none, with 3 abstentions.

The last part of the text, containing the words “in circumstances beyond his control”, was adopted by 29 votes to 3, with 6 abstentions.

The text proposed by the Chinese delegation was adopted as paragraph 1 of article 22, by 41 votes to none, with 3 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN requested the Committee to decide on the Yugoslav proposal regarding the principle of the equality of illegitimate children before considering the amendments to paragraph 2. That procedure seemed necessary in order to enable the representative of Norway – as he had reserved the right to do at the beginning of the meeting – to reintroduce the Australian proposal on behalf of his own delegation, in case the Yugoslav amendment was rejected.

As objections had been raised, the Chairman requested the Committee to take a vote on the point.

The Committee decided, by 22 votes to 14, with 10 abstentions, to consider the amendments to paragraph 2 first.

MR. CARRERA ANDRADE (Ecuador) withdrew the amendment to paragraph 2 presented by his delegation (A/C.3/349) in favour of the Norwegian amendment, which was based on the same principles.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the amendment presented by the Norwegian delegation – formerly the Australian amendment (A/C.3/348) – to replace paragraph 2 by the following text: “All mothers, including expectant and nursing mothers, and all children, including illegitimate children, are entitled to special care and assistance.”

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the amendment submitted by the Egyptian delegation (A/C.3/264) to replace the words “mother and child” by the words “mothers, children and old persons”.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the text proposed by the Chinese delegation for paragraph 2 (A/C.3/347/Rev.1).

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) pointed out that the text was poorly worded; abstract ideas such as “motherhood and childhood” could not be legal entities.

MR. BAROODY (Saudi Arabia) supported that view; he could not vote in favour of the text because of its drafting.

The text was adopted by 25 votes to 7, with 12 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN then submitted to the Committee the proposal of the Yugoslav delegation to add to article 22 a third paragraph explicitly expressing the principle of the absolute equality of illegitimate and legitimate children.

MR. PLEIC (Yugoslavia) withdrew his proposed draft in favour of the second alternative proposed by the Norwegian delegation (A/C.3/344), with the reservation that the French text should read as follows: “Les enfants nés hors du mariage sont les égaux en droit des enfants nés dans le mariage . . .”

MR. LUNDE (Norway) requested that the second alternative for which the Yugoslav representative had just expressed support should be put to the vote.

MRS. CORBET (United Kingdom) requested that the text should be voted in parts so that the Committee could decide separately on the principle of equality before the law and the principle of equal social protection.

MRS. VERWEY-JONKER (Netherlands) requested a vote by roll-call.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the first part of the Norwegian amendment, as follows: “Children born out of wedlock are equal in rights to children born in marriage.”

A vote was taken by roll-call, as follows:

In favour: Argentina, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Colombia, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Honduras, India, Mexico, Norway, Poland, Sweden, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Venezuela, Yugoslavia.

Against: Afghanistan, Australia, Belgium, Bolivia, Brazil, Canada, China, France, Greece, Luxembourg, Netherlands, New Zealand, Paraguay, Syria, Turkey, United Kingdom, United States of America, Uruguay.

Abstaining: Burma, Chile, Ethiopia, Pakistan, Panama, Peru, Philippines, Saudi Arabia, Yemen.

That part was rejected by 18 votes to 18, with 9 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the second part of the Norwegian amendment, which after rejection of the first part would read as follows:

[577]

“Children born out of wedlock shall enjoy the same social protection as children born in marriage.”

A vote was taken by roll-call, as follows:

In favour: Argentina, Belgium, Bolivia, Brazil, Burma, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Chile, Colombia, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, France, Honduras, India, Mexico, New Zealand, Norway, Pakistan, Panama, Poland, Saudi Arabia, Sweden, Syria, Turkey, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Uruguay, Venezuela, Yemen, Yugoslavia.

Against: China, United Kingdom, United States of America.

Abstaining: Afghanistan, Australia, Canada, Ethiopia, Greece, Luxembourg, Netherlands, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines.

That part was adopted by 32 votes to 3, with 10 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote, as paragraph 3 of article 22, the text which had just been adopted.

MR. WATT (Australia) asked for a roll-call vote.

A vote was taken by roll-call, as follows:

In favour: Argentina, Australia, Belgium, Bolivia, Brazil, Burma, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Chile, Colombia, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Honduras, India, Mexico, Norway, Pakistan, Panama, Poland, Saudi Arabia, Sweden, Syria, Turkey, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Uruguay, Venezuela, Yemen, Yugoslavia.

Against: China, United States of America.

Abstaining: Canada, Ethiopia, France, Greece, Luxembourg, Netherlands, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, United Kingdom.

That text was adopted as paragraph 3 by 31 votes to 2, with 10 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put before the Committee the whole of article 22, as amended.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) expressed reservation as regards the Russian text of paragraph 2, which should be translated as follows: “Motherhood and childhood are entitled to special care and assistance.”

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) and MR. CASSIN (France) remarked that the same observations applied to the Spanish and French texts.

As there were numerous objections to the wording of the various paragraphs, MR. WATT (Australia) suggested that the Committee should adopt article 22 as a whole, subject to subsequent drafting changes by the sub-committee to be appointed.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote article 22 as a whole, as amended.

Article 22, as amended, was adopted by 40 votes to none, with 2 abstentions.

The meeting rose at 6:05 p.m.

Chairman: MR. CHARLES MALIK (Lebanon).

THE CHAIRMAN called on speakers who wished to explain their votes with respect to article 22.

MR. AQUINO (Philippines) said that, while he had not previously felt the need to explain any of his votes, he wished to make clear that in the present case he had voted against several amendments because the good intentions which had prompted them had become obscured in the course of procedural discussion, and against certain others because the Committee had not been able to couch them in a form appropriate to the declaration. He had voted in favour of the whole article because he subscribed unreservedly to the principle involved; he hoped, nevertheless, that the article would be improved from the point of view of style.

MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) had not voted in favour of the first part of the Norwegian amendment (A/C.3/344) because he held that article 2, which prohibited any distinction on grounds of birth, covered the subject more fully since it was applicable to all persons born out of wedlock, regardless of their age.

Moreover, the first part of the Norwegian amendment might be construed as conflicting with the principle of the protection of the family established in article 14.

He had voted in favour of the second part of the Norwegian amendment not because he thought it contained the best provision that could be made for the social protection of illegitimate children – the Constitution of his country provided greater protection – but because it was progressive in nature when seen in relation to conditions existing in most parts of the world.

MISS BERNARDINO (Dominican Republic) remarked that, although at the previous meeting she had accepted paragraph 2 of the Chinese amendment (A/C.3/347/Rev.1) in lieu of her own (A/C.3/217/Corr.2), she had since discovered a drafting imperfection in the English text of the former. She consequently hoped that the paragraph in question might be reconsidered by the Committee and either redrafted in the spirit of her amendment or replaced by it.

She agreed with the Chairman that the question of reconsideration might be postponed until the whole declaration had been dealt with.

MR. HABIB (India) stated that he had welcomed the Norwegian amendment and had voted in favour of both parts, in the firm conviction that the sins of the parents should not be visited upon the children. The problem of illegitimacy [579] was of minor importance in his own country and liberal legislation had been proposed. The amendment was essential: human emotions were bound to conflict, on some occasions at least, with the laws of States, however liberal.

MR. CASSIN (France) remarked that he had voted in favour of the Chinese amendment although that text did not entirely meet the views of his delegation; he hoped that the proper interpretation would be put on the words “and necessary social services”.

While he had voted in favour of according social protection to illegitimate children, he had not been able to vote for granting them equal civil rights. Since different legal systems existed in various countries, the article could do no more than indicate what the general attitude with respect to illegitimate children should be. In the form in which it had been adopted by the Committee, the article did precisely that.

MR. LUNDE (Norway) regretted that his amendment (A/C.3/344) to delete the final words of paragraph 1 had been defeated, as those words put an undue limitation on what would otherwise have been an excellent text. The part of that paragraph dealing with security, in the form in which it had been adopted, lagged far behind progressive social legislation of the present day.

MR. CHANG (China) said, in reply to the representative of the Dominican Republic, that he had not insisted and did not insist on the use, in the English text of paragraph 2, of the words “have the right”.

He pointed out that paragraph 3 – the former Norwegian amendment – was different in style from most articles in the declaration in that it began with a reference to a minority rather than to a broad general group. Moreover, it represented an enlargement of the statement in paragraph 2. He hoped that the Norwegian representative would agree to combine paragraphs 2 and 3 and to begin the latter with some such words as: "All children, including those born out of wedlock."

That suggestion might be dealt with at the same time as the suggestion of the representative of the Dominican Republic.

MR. CONTOUMAS (Greece) explained that he had voted against the portion of the Norwegian amendment dealing with social protection of illegitimate children not because he in any way objected to the idea, but because he thought the matter was sufficiently covered in articles 2 and 22.

Article 23<sup>1</sup>

MRS. NEWLANDS (New Zealand) withdrew the amendment submitted by her delegation (A/C.3/267).

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) observed that while the amendment presented by his delegation (A/C.3/261) might appear long it was essentially simple and reproduced much of the original text.

The first sentence of that text, which stated that everyone had the right to education, was of sufficient importance to stand as a separate paragraph. It appeared logical that the bare statement should be followed immediately by the definition of the aims of education contained in paragraph 2 of the original text. It had consequently become paragraph 2 of the Cuban amendment.

Paragraph 3 of that amendment contained a new and worthwhile idea, which was that the right to education should be granted in accordance with natural talents, merit, and the desire to utilize the resources that the State or the community could provide, as well as the talents of individuals. That idea was necessary in an article dealing with education.

Paragraph 4 of the Cuban amendment differed from the original text in two respects. Since some countries provided free secondary and higher education, the statement in the original text that only elementary and fundamental education should be free appeared inadequate; the Cuban amendment indicated that primary education, at least, should be free. Mr. Pérez Cisneros was glad to see that on that point his amendment coincided with the Turkish amendment (A/C.3/273/Rev.1). He had also omitted the word "compulsory", not because he was opposed to the idea of compulsory education, but because the word appeared out of place in a declaration of the rights of the individual. If the Committee wished to retain it, however, he would have no serious objection.

MR. KURAL (Turkey) recalled the statement which he had made on a previous occasion that his delegation found the declaration as drafted by the Commission on Human Rights satisfactory in the main and requiring amendment only in a few exceptional instances.

Article 23 was such an exception. Two conditions were necessary for the implementation of the statement that everyone had the right to education. The first was that primary education must be compulsory and that secondary and higher education must be open to all who were able to profit by it. The second was that primary education must be free – otherwise it could not be made compulsory – and also that secondary and higher education must be free or it could not be said, as stated in article 23, that there should be equal access to it on the basis of merit.

It was at that point that article 23 became inadequate.

Mr. Kural would have liked to suggest that all education should be free, as in fact it was in a number of countries, including his own, but since he realized that such a state of affairs could not be brought about everywhere immediately, he had contented himself with proposing that at least primary education should be free (A/C.3/273/Rev.1). He hoped that his amendment, thus redrafted, would be acceptable to the Committee.

While his amendment greatly resembled paragraph 4 of the Cuban amendment, he could not associate himself with the latter as a whole because it omitted the word “compulsory” and [581] because he was not sure of the meaning of the second half of paragraph 3.

He wished to comment briefly on amendments presented by other delegations.

Although he agreed with the idea expressed in the USSR amendment (E/800, page 35) he considered the amendment unnecessary because the subject of discrimination was thoroughly covered in article 2 and because the clause introduced by the amendment might be interpreted as restrictive.

He could not support the Argentine amendment (A/C.3/251) because it omitted the concept of compulsory education.

The Mexican amendment (A/C.3/266/Corr.1) appeared acceptable; however, it contained ideas proclaimed a number of times by the United Nations and might perhaps be more appropriately included in the preamble.

The Lebanese (A/C.3/260) and Netherlands (A/C.3/263) amendments seemed equally acceptable; he wished, however, to hear the statements by the two representatives who had introduced those amendments before determining his position.

MR. COROMINAS (Argentina) stated, in explanation of his amendment (A/C.3/251), that in the view of his delegation everyone had the right to an education. While that right should be guaranteed by the State, it was a broad general right of every individual, and should be inspired, as indicated in the Argentine amendment, by liberty, ethics and human solidarity.

The Argentine amendment further indicated the purposes of that education and stated that everyone should have equal access to it in accordance with his talents, merit and the desire to utilize the resources that the State and the community were in a position to provide. Moreover, primary education should be free. The Argentine amendment did not say that it should be compulsory because, as the Cuban representative had aptly remarked, the word “compulsory” should not be used in the declaration.

He called attention to the fact that his amendment was intended as a substitution for the whole of article 23. The text of that article was deficient in certain respects. No mention was made of modern educational trends such as vocational training and the development of technical aptitudes; it should not be forgotten that industrial workers had ceased to be artisans and were becoming technicians. The free development of natural talents would form better members of society and raise the general level of culture.

Furthermore, paragraph 2 of the basic text, with its mention of combating the spirit of intolerance, itself had an intolerant and aggressive ring, even though the idea it expressed was a noble one. It would be a mistake to retain that passage in the declaration. Intolerance and hatred should be done away with by means of peaceful persuasion and education.

Finally, article 23 contained a number of phrases which appeared elsewhere in the declaration and constituted an unnecessary repetition. [582] For all those reasons, Mr. Corominas preferred his amendment to the original text.

MR. BEAUFORT (Netherlands) pointed out that it was logical that the family should be given primary responsibility for education because it was in the family that the child first learned the methods of living within the community. The family could not be replaced by any public or private institution which contributed to education. That idea might have seemed a truism had it not been for recent experience, to which reference was made in the second paragraph of the preamble to the declaration.

The rights of children were sacred because the child itself could not demand their implementation; parents were the most natural persons to do so. That was the sense of the first sentence of the Netherlands amendment (A/C.3/263). The second sentence followed logically from the first. Parents would be unable to bear that primary responsibility unless they were able to choose the kind of education their children should have. Nazi Germany, where the Hitler Youth deprived parents of control over their children, had provided an experience which should never be permitted to recur. It might be objected that such a provision restricted the child’s right to education in that it deprived it of protection against negligent or unwise parents. Such cases would be exceptions, and, in any case, the influence of teachers and educational organizations would most probably prevent any real damage. The declaration could not be based on the consideration of exceptional cases. His delegation was prepared to accept suggested improvements to the phrase “the kind of education”; it would itself suggest the words: “to determine the religious and spiritual atmosphere in which their children should be educated”. He had no wish to interfere with the State’s responsibility for the system of teaching; but parents must retain the right to select the atmosphere they considered best for the child. He had no objection to compulsory education since that system had been in force in his country for more than fifty years.

MR. CAMPOS ORTIZ (Mexico) supported the present text, with the exceptions set out in the Mexican amendment (A/C.3/266/Corr.1). No one could object to paragraph 1. In paragraph 2, however, the idea of combating the spirit of intolerance and hatred against other nations and against racial and religious groups everywhere was too negative, too pessimistic and, despite the present condition of the world, not in accordance with the deeper realities. The Mexican amendment introduced a positive idea which restored the balance – that of promoting understanding and friendship among all peoples.

Article 23 should also include positive and effective support of the activities of the United Nations for the maintenance of peace. The support of an educated public opinion was essential for the success of the United Nations. The League of Nations’ most serious defect had been [583] its lack of contact with the peoples; when it had made mistakes, there had been little informed and sympathetic public opinion to correct them. The Preamble to the Charter clearly expressed the desire of the United Nations to represent the people and not merely diplomats. It was essential to teach the people that the United Nations was the only method by which peace might be maintained. The General Assembly had adopted its resolution 137(III) recommending that the purposes and principles of the United Nations should be taught in the schools of Member States; but it did not seem to have been widely implemented. If such a provision were included in the declaration, it would obtain a far wider hearing. It might be argued that it was inappropriate to mention the United Nations in the declaration. There was, however, a precedent in its preamble. It might also be said that it was in the preamble that such a provision belonged. The preamble, however, had been designed to introduce and cover the subsequent articles so that there would be no redundancy.

The representative of Mexico explained that his amendment was not intended to modify paragraph 2 of the basic text, but, to form an additional third paragraph.

MR. WATT (Australia) said that his delegation would have preferred to accept the basic text of article 23, as it had accepted all others hitherto with some drafting suggestions, but there were serious objections to the mandatory form in which it laid down that education should be free and compulsory. He was not against the principle; in Australia elementary and secondary schooling was free and universities had a liberal system of scholarships and remission of fees. The mandatory form implied, however, that no other kind of school would be permitted. A wording should be found which would safeguard the right to choose education at a private school. He believed that certain representatives objected to compulsory education, particularly compulsory fundamental education. It would be impossible to apply compulsion to adults who had failed to obtain elementary schooling in their youth; they might not have the time or facilities to attend school. He hoped that an amendment would be submitted to remedy that defect, if the Australian amendment (A/C.3/257) were not accepted.

MRS. BEGTRUP (Denmark) pointed out that it had always been agreed that provisions to secure the general rights of minorities should be included in the declaration. The Commission on Human Rights during its first session<sup>1</sup> and the Drafting Committee set up during the second session had proposed texts to that effect,<sup>2</sup> and the Sub-Commission on Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities had presented a similar proposal.<sup>1</sup> At the third session of the Commission, however, some delegations – which had not been opposed to the substance of such an article – had objected to its inclusion on the grounds that it referred to groups rather than individuals.<sup>2</sup>

That objection would not apply to the Danish amendment (A/C.3/250) since it explicitly referred to persons belonging to minorities. Articles 2, 6, 16, 17, 18 and 19 secured to minorities a large number of rights, but such protection should be stated because the right to education was essential for the cultural life of a minority. Insertion of such an article would not, however, imply that all expenses incurred by minority schools would have to be paid out of the public funds. It was additionally important that such a paragraph should be added to article 23 because the Sixth Committee had deleted from the Convention on Genocide the article dealing with cultural genocide, apparently because delegations believed that an article dealing with that subject would be more appropriate in the declaration.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) pointed out that his delegation had submitted an amendment (E/800, page 35) proposing the addition of a separate article to the declaration, the substance of which covered and went beyond the Danish amendment. He pointed out that if the Danish amendment were discussed in connexion with article 23, the USSR amendment would have to be debated in conjunction with it. He would be grateful to the representative of Denmark, however, if both amendments could be discussed at a later stage.

THE CHAIRMAN having concurred with the USSR representative's observation, MRS. BEGTRUP (Denmark) said that she would reserve her right to bring her amendment forward again at a later stage.

MR. GARCÍA BAUER (Guatemala) pointed out a defect in the Spanish translation of the text of article 23. The word instrucción meant education in a limited intellectual sense; he thought that the word educación was more correct.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) objected to the word “compulsory” because it appeared to give the State unrestricted authority over education. The Lebanese amendment (A/C.3/260) would restore the balance by giving parents a prior right to choose the kind of education which they wished their children to receive. Undoubtedly, the State must compel negligent parents to see that their children obtained education, but parents should have the right to limit the State’s authority if it became excessive or arbitrary.

MRS. IKRAMULLAH (Pakistan) said she would have supported the Danish amendment had it not been held over. She would support the Netherlands amendment which should be taken in conjunction with the substance of the Danish. It was essential to guarantee freedom to choose education, a principle flagrantly violated by the Nazis.

Article 23, paragraph 3 should be completed by a declaration that parents must have freedom to choose their children’s education. The argument that parents might refuse to give their children education was not pertinent because the article gave them only the right to choose the kind of education they wished, but not the right to withhold education from their children.

MRS. CORBET (United Kingdom) said that she would vote for the basic text if such were the consensus of opinion in the Committee; but certain improvements were desirable. The USSR amendment was superfluous, since its substance had already been covered by article 2. She could not support the Argentine and Cuban amendments, which were not so clear as the present text and unjustifiably altered the order. While she agreed with the Argentine representative’s argument about the need for development of technical aptitudes, it did not, in her view, add anything of substance, since that kind of training was included in the concept of higher education. She opposed the Lebanese and Netherlands amendments; the basic text did not exclude parents from the right to choose their children’s education. Moreover, a specific mention of the rights and duties of the family was inappropriate in a declaration of universal rights. The Argentine, Cuban, Turkish and Australian amendments overlapped to a certain extent, but the Australian was to be preferred because it solved the difficulty which had been raised – and with which she agreed – that it was impossible to make fundamental education compulsory. She suggested, however, that the words “everyone is entitled to” were somewhat weak; she believed that the words “everyone shall be provided with” would strengthen the Australian amendment, which she would support. Although she was in favour of the principle of the revised Mexican amendment (A/C.3/266/Corr.I), it was too lengthy and threw the article out of balance.

MRS. KALINOWSKA (Poland) said that she would accept the basic text with the addition of the USSR amendment. Despite the argument that non-discrimination had been covered in article 2, it was essential to reiterate that principle in article 23, because access to schools in some countries was barred to certain categories of persons. With regard to the Danish amendment, she pointed out that her country, which had long suffered from discriminatory measures by occupying Powers, had extended full facilities to all minorities. The word “fundamental” should be retained in paragraph 1. In her country special free schools for workers existed; the workers were given leave from work and full pay during school time. Paragraph 2 was sufficiently broad to command general acceptance. She would not object to the Mexican amendment.

Meeting [of the Third Committee]

MR. CASSIN (France) supported the basic text of article 23 as a whole, and had no amendments to offer.

He would try to sift out from the amendments submitted by other delegations the principles which might lead to agreement. The right to education had been in no way contested; three points, however, had attracted the attention of the Commission on

Human Rights, namely, the fact that education should be free, that it should be compulsory, and the question of the influence of parents.

As regards the point that education should be free, he considered the Turkish (A/C.3/273) and Australian (A/C.3/257) amendments of interest and was prepared to support a statement that at least elementary education and fundamental education of adults who had not received education in their youth should be free. It could only be hoped that the other levels of education might be made free, though they could not be made compulsory.

He thought it would be advisable for elementary education to be compulsory and for its compulsory nature to be explicitly stated, so that parents would not be able to neglect their duty to their children. The same compulsion could not be established as regards higher education, but between elementary and higher education there was room for technical and vocational training, as the representatives of the United Kingdom and Argentina had pointed out (146th meeting). In that connexion, he suggested the following intermediate wording:

“Elementary education shall be compulsory; technical and professional education shall be made generally available.”

As regards the delicate problem raised in the amendments submitted by the Netherlands (A/C.3/263) and Lebanese (A/C.3/260) delegations, French legislation coincided with the point of view of those delegations and the French delegation would vote for the amendments, were it not that it feared, as did the United Kingdom representative, to impose a one-sided viewpoint upon nations which thought differently. Mr. Cassin pointed out that there was nothing in paragraph 1 that threatened the freedom and rights of parents. Moreover, the United Nations was at present engaged in a study of educational matters as a whole, and of the rights of parents and of the State in such matters. There was therefore no necessity to mention that aspect of the problem in article 23.

He considered paragraph 2 satisfactory in the main. It would be sufficient to insert a part of the Mexican amendment (A/C.3/266/Corr.1) in an abridged form. The following words, for instance, might be added: “and shall develop and strengthen understanding and friendship between peoples” after the words “fundamental freedoms”.

Furthermore, the words “combating the spirit of intolerance and hatred . . .” should be retained; that spirit unfortunately did exist and would not be eradicated by being passed over in silence.

Turning to the Danish (A/C.3/250) and USSR (E/800, page 35) amendments, the French representative said that in the Commission on Human Rights the French delegation had suggested the inclusion of a general text on the rights of minorities, which had not been accepted. The French delegation had not pressed the point, as it understood that the problem of minorities could no longer be expressed in the same terms as in 1919 and 1939, but should today be considered from a practical angle. The Charter had shifted the centre of gravity by putting the emphasis on the universal aspect of human rights, and that had to be taken into consideration.

The French delegation had supported the USSR amendment on the use of national languages in courts of law. It was now ready to support the Danish amendment (A/C.3/250) to the effect that teaching should be allowed in minority languages, but it considered article 2 of the declaration a secure basis for ensuring the rights of minorities. If there was any doubt concerning the rights of minorities to education and justice, it would be preferable to include the necessary additions and definitions in article 2, rather than to introduce reservations and exceptions into other articles, where they would be out of place.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) supported the views expressed by the French representative. His delegation attached great importance to the basic principle stated in article 23 that elementary education should be free and compulsory.

For that reason, he supported all the amendments which laid special emphasis on that point of view. He would similarly support amendments recommending that higher and even university education should be free; in his own country such education was already free.

Commenting on the various draft amendments submitted to article 23, he said that the Mexican amendment formed a most satisfactory complement to the second paragraph of article 23. It gave positive expression to the principles embodied in article 23 besides mentioning the objectives of the United Nations. The General Assembly had adopted resolutions on the same lines; Mr. Santa Cruz therefore thought that the Mexican amendment improved the text of article 23 of the draft declaration, and his delegation would therefore support it.

The USSR amendment might prove acceptable; in any case Mr. Santa Cruz strongly supported its [588] basic principles. Nevertheless, that amendment appeared to him to repeat the provisions of article 2, which stated clearly that everyone without distinction was entitled to the rights and freedoms set forth in the declaration. He considered, therefore, that it was somewhat superfluous.

He felt that it might not be altogether wise to adopt the Danish amendment. Many countries, and particularly Chile, had a mixed population. The Government of Chile had always tried to unify its heterogeneous population. By giving minorities the right to establish their own schools, such work of unification, which had been carried out so successfully by some Governments, notably in the Americas, might be imperilled. For those reasons, he could not support the Danish amendment.

The Cuban amendment (A/C.3/261) contained the basic ideas of article 23, but worded them differently. Mr. Santa Cruz did not object to that wording, but pointed out that some members of the Committee had made reservations regarding the amendment with a view to ensuring a logical and harmonious structure for the declaration. However, he would vote for either the Cuban text or the original text of article 23, since the two were fundamentally very much the same.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that his delegation had always followed the same general principle throughout the debates on the various articles of the declaration. It had constantly opposed discrimination in any form whatsoever. He wished to emphasize that principle yet again, because the right to education was, in point of fact, limited in a great many countries. The coloured population of the United States and the indigenous population of Eastern countries were mainly illiterate. He believed that that situation arose from a policy of discrimination based upon race or personal wealth. It was clear that in a country where the cost of education was very high, only a small minority could really enjoy the right to education.

In the USSR education was open to all, as both elementary and secondary education was free. Moreover, Mr. Pavlov indicated that his Government intended to carry that policy still further and quoted figures showing the importance which his Government attached to education and the progress achieved since the Revolution of 1917. In the USSR, there were at present 47,402,000 schoolchildren and more than a million students – a figure greater than the total number for all European countries together. Furthermore the great majority of those schoolchildren and students were of very humble origin, statistics for the year 1933 showing that 51 per cent of the students were from workers' families and 16 per cent from peasant stock. The real importance of these figures stood out when they were compared with like statistics for Germany where, in 1933, only about 3 per cent of university students came from working class families and 2 per cent from peasant families. He pointed out that those [589] figures were clear proof that the objection often made that children from peasant and workers' families would not have the necessary capacity for higher education was unfounded.

Before the 1917 Revolution, Russia had 230,000 teachers and professors, whereas the USSR now had 1,200,000; during the same period the number of higher educational establishments had increased from 91 to 800. Similarly, various minorities, which, prior to the revolution, had not even a written language of their own, now had schools where instruction was given in their own language, and had been able to create their own national literature.

The USSR might therefore justifiably be proud of what it had accomplished in the educational field. Its efforts in that field and the success it had attained gave it every right to express a firm opinion; moreover, its experience might usefully serve other countries. Clearly, his delegation could not but approve the principles underlying article 23; but it considered those principles incomplete and had therefore submitted an amendment.

He noted that some delegations had opposed the inclusion of the word “compulsory” in the text of article 23; he could see no reason to omit that word. A child had an absolute right to education, and independently of the wishes of its parents. Education should be compulsory because a child could not itself claim the right, as it had no strength to defend it. The word “compulsory” was therefore necessary in the body of article 23.

MR. CARRERA ANDRADE (Ecuador), in an analysis of article 23, said that it contained the essential principles on which the right to education should be based. Commenting on the various amendments, he said that his delegation would support the Mexican amendment, which offered the prospect of a new age in human evolution. When the youth of the whole world proclaimed its faith in the guiding principles of the United Nations, the future could be contemplated with greater hope by all nations.

The amendment submitted by the Netherlands delegation, however, appeared to him to be ill advised; its principle was applicable not to the present age but to the time when the father was really the head of the family. Such was no longer the case, and he asked the Netherlands delegation to withdraw its amendment and support the amendment submitted by Lebanon.

The amendments suggested by the USSR and Denmark against discrimination contained, in his opinion, a most valuable idea which should be embodied in a separate paragraph of article 23.

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) feared that if attempts were made to incorporate in article 23 all the amendments proposed to it, the final text would not be satisfactory. In point of fact the basic text would gain by greater conciseness.

The amendment of the Australian delegation contained an extremely important idea and did not involve any vital change in the text of article 23. The wording of the amendment was not very fortunate, however, and for that reason, Mrs. Roosevelt suggested the following version to the Australian delegation (A/C.3/352):

“Everyone has the right to education, including free elementary and fundamental education. Elementary education shall be compulsory and there shall be equal access on the basis of merit to higher education.”

That text in no way opposed the existence of independent or private schools; moreover it brought in the word “compulsory”, which it was essential to include in article 23.

The Mexican amendment gave positive expression to the negative provisions of paragraph 2 of article 23. The United States delegation would therefore vote for it on the understanding that it would be substituted for the last part of paragraph 2.

A number of delegations were anxious that the right of parents to govern the education of their children should be explicitly mentioned. That was, undoubtedly, a well-founded principle which was taken into account by most educational systems. It would, however, be difficult to find a satisfactory statement of that principle, since it was also necessary to take the interests of the children and of the State into account. The amendments suggested were designed to avert a situation such as prevailed in the Nazi countries, where education, which was entirely under State control, tended to atrophy children's intellectual faculties. No object could be of more legitimate concern, but the provisions of article 23 were drafted with a precision which left no opening for misunderstanding. Moreover, if article 23 made specific reference to the right of parents to control the education of their children, it might be interpreted as giving them the right to supervise school curricula which clearly might have undesirable consequences.

On that ground, the United States delegation would vote against the amendments submitted by Lebanon and the Netherlands.

If the USSR amendment were adopted, it would have the effect of restricting the scope of article 23. The basic text of article 23 should be interpreted in terms of article 2 of the declaration. That article clearly stated that all human beings without distinction of any kind were entitled to all the rights set forth in the declaration. The USSR amendment was only a repetition, and an incomplete repetition, of the provisions of article 2.

MR. CONTOUMAS (Greece) stated that his delegation was in favour of the original text of article 23. The Argentine (A/C.3/251) and Cuban (A/C.3/261) amendments were redraftings of that text, but did not noticeably improve it. The [591] basic text was the result of the most meticulous work and represented a compromise. For that reason, Mr. Contoumas thought it preferable to retain it, although he admitted that some of the amendments submitted contained important ideas.

As the representative of Turkey had pointed out, it would be desirable to find a version which would not embarrass those countries in which higher education was already free should article 23 restrict the principle of free education to elementary education only.

The Mexican amendment also put forward an excellent idea, particularly as regards the promotion of international understanding. However, as the representative of France had pointed out, it would be better for the idea to be incorporated in the text of paragraph 2 and not to be embodied in a separate paragraph.

On the other hand, the Lebanese and Netherlands amendments were not so felicitous. In fact the evolution of modern society had reached a stage, which made it impossible for parents to be granted the exclusive right to choose the kind of education to be given to their children. It was preferable not to raise the question.

Finally, the USSR amendment repeated an idea which had already been expressed in article 2 of the declaration. Mr. Contoumas thought no useful purpose was served by the repetition in each article of a general idea clearly stated in an earlier article.

MR. KAMINSKY (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) stressed the special importance of the principles stated in article 23. The culture and intellectual development of all peoples were in fact based on education. The right to education should not therefore be subject to any restrictions.

In the Byelorussian SSR that right existed for all. The State and society guaranteed it to all citizens, and it had not become the object of commerce as in certain countries where it was only accessible to those able to meet the cost of study. The situation in the Byelorussian SSR was due to the Revolution of 1917, which had opened the doors of schools and universities to the young people of the working classes. Byelorussia, which before the revolution had been a mere colony of Tsarist Russia and did not possess a single university, now had several. Fifty-seven per cent of the entire population had been illiterate, and 80 per cent of the peasant population. From the early days of the revolution, new principles of education had been proclaimed, based on equality without distinction on grounds of sex or income, and energetic and concrete measures had been taken to combat adult illiteracy and to evolve an extensive plan of popular education. The number of elementary schools had doubled and that of secondary schools and of institutions of higher education had shown a very large increase. The Government of the Byelorussian SSR attached particular importance to education, and the new five-year plan provided for the expenditure of 243,000,000 roubles or 13 per cent of the national revenue, for that purpose. In the United States expenditure on education represented only 1½ per cent of the national revenue and only 3 per cent in the case of the United Kingdom. In Byelorussia, elementary and secondary education was free and access to universities and to institutions of higher education was facilitated by a large number of scholarships.

Those facts made it obvious that the delegation of the Byelorussian SSR could not fail to approve the principle underlying article 23. It considered, however, that the article was incomplete and should be supplemented by the USSR amendment. That text was of great importance, since it would permit everyone without distinction really to enjoy the right to education.

MISS ZULOAGA (Venezuela) said that article 23 had engaged the special attention of her delegation, since education was the fundamental element in progress, which was the pledge of a just and lasting peace.

In that connexion, the definition of education adopted by UNESCO at its conference in Mexico in 1947, should be retained. The Venezuelan delegation had adopted that definition, since it was wholly in keeping with the spirit of the United Nations Charter. For that reason it hoped that the Third Committee would decide unanimously in favour of free and compulsory education, that being the sole means of ending the illiteracy which was still widespread in the world.

Miss Zuloaga pointed out that a number of the amendments proposed to article 23 did not retain the compulsory character which must be given to elementary education. That idea of compulsion was contained in the Constitution of Venezuela, which proclaimed the principle that primary education should be free and compulsory for all without any restrictions.

The Venezuelan delegation would the more willingly support the second paragraph of the text proposed by the Commission on Human Rights, because its provisions were similar to those of the Venezuelan Constitution. It would also vote for the Mexican amendment to that paragraph.

As regards the first paragraph, the Venezuelan delegation would accept the substitute text proposed by the United States delegation, if the Committee agreed that it was better than the original text.

MR. AQUINO (Philippines) recalled that it was his delegation, together with that of Panama, which had had the honour of submitting the original text of the article on the right to education. In proposing that article, the Philippine delegation had drawn upon the experience acquired by the Philippine people in the matter of popular education during the past forty years. The Republic of the Philippines attached considerable importance to the education of the masses. In its view, the events of recent years had shown that an enlightened and well-informed public constituted the best defence of democracy and progress.

In article 23 the United Nations should state its position unequivocally not only on certain immediate objectives on the subject of which there could be no disagreement, but also on questions of principle which went beyond the question of education pure and simple and touched upon the ideological, where there was conflict between the [593] concepts of totalitarianism and of democracy and between the principles of authority and of liberty.

In that respect, the original text of article 23, and particularly its second paragraph, was entirely compatible not only with the spirit of the Charter, but also with the Constitution of UNESCO. Article 23, as drafted, thus provided the indispensable basis for the development of popular education and, for that reason, deserved to be retained in its entirety.

The Philippine delegation would support the amendment proposed by the Mexican delegation on condition that it was inserted in the second paragraph.

It would also support the new drafting proposed by the United States delegation for the Australian amendment.

Finally, it would vote for the Lebanese amendment which, without giving excessive authority to parents, gave them the right to decide the type of education which they wished their children to receive. That provision would provide protection against the risk of undue intervention by the State in the sphere of education.

MR. WATT (Australia) recalled that the essential aims of his amendment were, on the one hand, to permit the maintenance of private schools which the original text seemed implicitly to set aside in favour of public schools and, on the other hand, not to give a compulsory character to fundamental education in so far as that education was intended for adults.

In view of the fact that the new wording proposed by the delegation of the United States was entirely in accordance with its point of view, while preserving the strength of expression of the original text, the Australian delegation was quite willing to accept it in place of its own amendment.

The Australian delegation understood the Turkish proposal and it would support any felicitous wording which would continue to make it possible for some countries to extend free education beyond the primary grades, if they were able to.

On the other hand, it could not accept the USSR amendment, which only repeated the provisions of article 2 in narrower terms. Mr. Watt regretted having to oppose the USSR amendment all the more because in the course of a year's stay in that country, he had been able to note the remarkable efforts which had been made there to abolish illiteracy and the results which had been obtained in the field of education.

The Australian delegation could likewise not accept the Cuban delegation's amendment, which expressed an excellent idea in a form which did not fit within the framework of the draft declaration as a whole. The same observation applied to the Argentine amendment. Moreover, those two proposals omitted the idea of compulsory education, although that idea was indispensable at least with regard to children.

The Netherlands and Lebanese amendments touched on a delicate question. Mr. Watt feared that it would be extremely difficult to express the idea contained in those amendments in a way which would be acceptable to everyone. It should not be forgotten that fundamentally the person [594] affected by the right which the Committee wished to establish was the child and that it was above all the child who should be protected.

In conclusion, the Australian delegation supported the Mexican delegation's amendment. It would however prefer a direct reference to the "purposes and principles of the United Nations", according to the accepted formula, because the "maintenance of peace" mentioned in the Mexican amendment (A/C.3/266/Corr.1) was not the only aspect of the activities of the United Nations.

Mr. Malik (Lebanon) took the Chair.

COUNT CARTON DE WIART (Belgium) pointed out that the basic text of article 23 was not faultless.

With regard to paragraph 1, the Australian amendment in the new wording proposed by the delegation of the United States was entirely satisfactory to the Belgian delegation. It was true that with that text the Committee departed from the principle that the declaration of human rights should not set forth the obligations of the State, which were to be the subject of a future convention. It must be recognized, however, that it would be extremely difficult not to write an idea of compulsion into that article; and if the idea of compulsory education was retained, the idea of free education, which was its corollary, also had to be retained.

Count Carton de Wiart therefore agreed to the new text proposed for paragraph 1, with the following reservation as regards the wording: instead of the term “elementary” which in French at least connoted a limitation, he would prefer the word “primary”, which had a broader meaning and was in conformity with the terminology in use in French-speaking countries.

The Belgian representative emphasized that the concept of higher education and the need to make it accessible to all on individual merit need not be understood to refer to universities. In that respect, the remarks made by the Argentine representative at the previous meeting on technical careers and professional training met with his entire approval.

In the opinion of the Belgian delegation, the amendments of the Lebanese and Netherlands delegations as well as the Danish amendment, which dealt with the same point, contained a very interesting idea. In effect, the family had prior rights over the State, which it would be useful to recognize in one way or another in a statement of principle such as article 23. The Netherlands representative had expressed the horror which the Nazi-occupied countries still felt at the thought that the State could compel children to be informed morally and intellectually by the doctrine of the party in power. In Belgium, the idea of freedom of education was considered fundamental: that concept was not based solely on tradition, but was prescribed by the Constitution. For that reason, the Belgian delegation considered that the Lebanese amendment, perhaps in another form, could very usefully be introduced into paragraph 2 of article 23. It would in fact be an error not to retain the rights of the family in an [595] article of such importance, especially as it could not be assumed that the rights and duties of the State in the field of education had been disregarded by so doing.

Count Carton de Wiart supported the Mexican and Argentine amendments inasmuch as they altered the negative character of the last part of paragraph 2.

MR. COROMINAS (Argentina) stated that teaching and learning were two terms which appeared with equal stress in the Constitution of his country. The Argentine delegation's amendment was inspired by the same thought. The right to education should not only be proclaimed, but it should be made certain that that education would be of such a nature as to contribute to raising the cultural level of the whole population.

In that regard Mr. Corominas emphasized that certain representatives seemed not to have remembered his remarks on the distinction, a fundamental one in the view of the Argentine delegation, which should be drawn between higher education and professional training. In Argentina, secondary education and university training as well as primary education were open to all free of charge. In addition to those levels of education, Argentina paid very particular attention to the professional training of the average man. For that reason the Argentine delegation would like professional training to be included among the other types of education considered in article 23. If that principle, which constituted the central idea of the Argentine amendment, was adopted in a compromise text, the Argentine delegation would be prepared to vote for such a text.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics), analysing the new text proposed by the delegation of the United States in place of the Australian amendment, stated that he only agreed with one point: the need to institute free and compulsory primary education. For the rest, the USSR delegation did not think it could accept the text, which did not eliminate the possibility of discrimination of the type which was frequently practised in certain countries. Taking the example of the United States of America, Mr. Pavlov based his remarks on certain statements by officials of that country and on articles from its newspapers showing that the level of education left much to be desired. It was obvious that an uneducated population was more credulous and, consequently, more tractable.

The text proposed by the United States representative was not designed to rectify that state of affairs. Mr. Pavlov did not believe that Mrs. Roosevelt had worded it in that way purposely, and he asked her to be kind enough to enlighten him on that point.

MR. KURAL (Turkey), taking into account the remarks which had been made by various representatives with regard to his delegation's amendment (A/C.3/273), proposed a compromise which would consist of rewording the first phrase of the [596] Australian-United States amendment (A/C.3/352) as follows:

“Everyone has the right at least to free primary and fundamental education.”

That wording had the advantage of not limiting free education in the countries which wished to extend it beyond primary education, while ensuring that elementary and fundamental education in general would be both free and compulsory.

MRS. CORBET (United Kingdom) expressed her approval of the new wording of the Australian amendment suggested by the United States delegation.

With regard to paragraph 2, the United Kingdom delegation also was submitting a new draft to the Committee (A/C.3/354) which took the Mexican delegation's amendment into account. It was expressed in a positive form for it included the word “tolerance”, and while it did not mention the United Nations, at least it implicitly referred to the purposes and principles of the Organization.

MR. KAYALY (Syria) explained that in Syria elementary education was free and compulsory in all the State schools, which were open to all without distinction. Furthermore, the State provided the necessary school supplies and books gratuitously to the poor. Institutions for secondary education were also open to all at small cost. The schools maintained by the various communities, were moreover free to teach in the language of the community and the only obligation imposed on them was to comply with the regulations concerning public education.

That was the level which had been reached by Syria in the field of education. It was undeniable, however, that in such a broad field, methods and systems varied in each country and there were numerous systems. The Committee should therefore strive to express the right to education in a concise and complete formula which would be acceptable to all.

The text drawn up by the Commission on Human Rights had the virtue of stating the right in a general way, although it also stated certain directives intended to indicate the path to be followed. Its objective was achieved by the two paragraphs of the original text, the first of which ensured the compulsory and free nature of elementary and fundamental education and the second of which provided for “the full development of the human personality”.

The Syrian delegation feared that any modification in a text so compact and carefully worked out might limit its scope and obscure its meaning.

In reply to the remark of the United States representative on the subject of the Mexican amendment (A/C.3/266/Corr.1), MR. CAMPOS ORTIZ (Mexico) explained that the aim of his delegation was to substitute that amendment for the second part of paragraph 2 of the article; it had been incorporated in the joint Mexican and United States amendment (A/C.3/356).

Replying to the Australian representative who had asked why the amendment did not mention the “purposes and principles” of the United Na-[597]tions, Mr. Campos Ortiz emphasized that his delegation had thought it better to speak of “the activities of the United Nations for the maintenance of peace” since that was the chief goal of the United Nations. Further, his delegation had thought that the use of the word “tolerance” made it unnecessary to mention racial and religious groups separately.

MR. DE ATHAYDE (Brazil) thought that questions concerning education were the most serious questions of the era. All those who worked in that sphere knew that in solving those problems, they were faced with difficulties arising from the moral and economic disorder of the world today. It would be dangerous to take account only of material conditions in solving them. The right of all to education was indisputable. The right to share in the heritage of mankind formed the basis of our civilization, and could not be denied to anyone. Without education, the individual could not develop his personality, which was the aim of human life and the most solid foundation of society. Education was the first prerequisite for progress. That was the reason for article 23 which proclaimed that education must be free and compulsory, and that there must be equal access to higher education with no restriction other than individual merit.

But article 23, in defining the character of education, which should be directed to strengthening respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms and to combating the spirit of intolerance and hatred, took on special significance.

Article 23 as a whole appeared satisfactory. But Mr. de Athayde thought certain of the amendments submitted contained ideas worthy of consideration. For instance, there was the principle proclaimed in the Lebanese and Netherlands amendments concerning the right of parents to determine the kind of education and instruction their children should have. The Mexican amendment gave paragraph 2 a positive character by speaking of understanding and friendship among all peoples; for that reason, the Brazilian representative would prefer the text of that amendment to be substituted for paragraph 2 of the original text.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) desired to correct an erroneous interpretation given by the Australian representative regarding the amendment moved by the Cuban delegation. That delegation was not opposed to the principle of compulsory education, elementary education being in fact compulsory in Cuba. The Cuban amendment did not mention the compulsory character of education because the Cuban delegation felt obliged to adhere to the generally accepted rule, which was that the declaration should deal only with human rights, and not with duties or obligations.

As a gesture of co-operation, the Cuban representative stated that he would withdraw his amendment, since the Turkish amendment expressed the same idea as paragraph 4 of the Cuban amendment.

He hoped that the drafting sub-committee would take note of the Cuban suggestion to di-[598]vide article 23 into a number of paragraphs, each containing a separate idea.

In conclusion, the Cuban representative stated that his delegation would support the Mexican amendment, as amended (A/C.3/356).

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) wished to reply to certain objections which had been raised against the amendment moved by his delegation. It had been said that it was unnecessary to mention the rights of parents in article 23. Mr. Azkoul thought, on the contrary, that it was important to proclaim that right. By stating that education was compulsory, the State would be authorized to force parents to send their children to school. Were the parents not entitled, on the other hand, to select the school to which they would send their children, and the type of education they intended to give them? The Lebanese amendment was intended simply to assert that right.

The Lebanese representative hoped account would be taken of the ideas expressed by the Cuban and Turkish delegations in their amendments. By stating that “at least elementary education” should be free, certain States would be left free to provide free higher education if they desired and were able to do so.

Mr. Azkoul hoped also that the phrase “against racial and national groups” would be inserted in the second paragraph of article 23 which proclaimed that education should combat “the spirit of intolerance and hatred against other nations and against racial and religious groups . . .”

He supported the joint Mexican and United States amendment (A/C.3/356), but wanted to retain the idea expressed in the earlier Mexican amendment (A/C.3/266/Corr.1), i.e. “an effective support of the activities of the United Nations for the maintenance of peace”. That idea was to have appeared in an additional third paragraph of article 23.

As regards the other amendments which had been moved, Mr. Azkoul declared that his delegation would either vote against them or abstain from voting.

MR. BEAUFORT (Netherlands) could not accept the suggestion made to him to amalgamate the Danish amendment on minorities and his own delegation’s amendment (A/C.3/300) into a single amendment. The latter was much more general in character.

He was somewhat surprised at the objection to the Netherlands text raised by the United Kingdom representative (146th meeting). He could not see why that text should be criticized for defending the rights of families instead of the rights of individuals. It stated specifically: “Parents have the right to determine the kind of education their children should have.” Surely, parents were individuals. The United Kingdom representative had emphasized the fact that nothing in the original text precluded the right of parents. To say that that right was not precluded, however, did not mean that it was implicitly included. The right of parents should have a place [599] in the declaration. During the last war it had been violated, with dreadful consequences.

The Netherlands delegation’s amendment was not in any way aimed at enabling parents to intervene in drawing up school syllabi. The Netherlands delegation maintained the principle of compulsory education and did not wish to diminish the State’s responsibility in any way. It wished merely to stress the inalienable rights of parents who should be in a position to choose what type of education, religious, vocational or otherwise, should be given their children. Children had a right to education; the use of that right belonged to their parents, who were their natural guardians.

Mr. Beaufort hoped that he had dispelled all misunderstandings, and stated that, since several delegations had shown a preference for the amendment submitted by the Lebanese delegation, he would withdraw his own amendment in its favour.

MR. DEMCHENKO (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) stressed the fundamental importance of the right to education. In his own country, that right was guaranteed by the Constitution. He wished to point out the progress his country had accomplished in that domain despite the onerous legacy left by the Government of Tsarist Russia: over half the population had been completely illiterate before the Revolution of 1917. The Government of the Ukrainian SSR could therefore be proud of the immense work it had accomplished. It would be gratifying if all countries had such vast achievements to their credit. That was unfortunately not the case. He thought that the unsatisfactory situation prevailing in the field of education in certain countries, particularly in the United States with regard to the coloured population and in the colonies belonging to the United Kingdom, was the result of the systematic policy of the Governments concerned.

The United Kingdom and United States delegations, in particular, had criticized the USSR amendment for being restrictive because it did not contain a complete list of the causes of discrimination. Those delegations had, however, made no attempt to complete the list.

The USSR amendment, if adopted, would give those peoples who did not yet fully enjoy the right to education the hope that the ignorance in which they were being kept would soon be dispelled. The delegation of the Ukrainian SSR would therefore vote for the basic text as amended by the USSR. It also approved the Mexican amendment as an addition to article 23.

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) asked the Chairman for an opportunity to reply in the course of the next meeting to certain questions put to her by the representative of the USSR.

MR. CASSIN (France) proposed a new wording for the text of article 23 (A/C.3/355). Without introducing any new ideas, he had retained the essential points of the various amendments and established a distinction between elementary, fundamental, professional and higher [600] education. Moreover, he had incorporated the Mexican amendment in paragraph 2 in order to give a positive aspect to the text while specifically condemning intolerance and hatred.

The only principle which he had not taken into account was that upon which the Netherlands and Lebanese amendments were based. That did not mean that he attributed no importance to it. He had, however, been struck by the fact that countries such as France, the United States and the United Kingdom, which recognized that parents had the right freely to choose the kind of education they wished their children to have, had not proposed that that principle should be inserted in article 23. The matter was indeed a very delicate one which could not be decided hastily. It would be preferable not to raise it in the declaration, thus leaving every country free to maintain its traditions. When the United Nations came to consider the question of the rights of the child, a resolution could be drawn up taking into account all aspects of the matter.

Summary Record of the Hundred and Forty-Eighth Meeting
[of the Third Committee]

Held at the Palais de Chaillot, Paris, on Friday,
19 November 1948, at 8.30 p.m.

Chairman: MR. CHARLES MALIK (Lebanon).

THE CHAIRMAN opened the discussion on article 23, paragraph 1, and the amendments to that paragraph submitted by the delegations of Argentina (A/C.3/251), Australia and the United States of America jointly (A/C.3/352), the USSR (A/C.3/353), France (A/C.3/355) and Turkey (A/C.3/273/Rev. 1).

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America), in reply to a question raised by the USSR representative at the previous meeting, explained that the text of the joint Australian and United States amendment merely reproduced the text adopted by the Commission on Human Rights with the terms slightly rearranged. Its object was to limit the compulsory education clause to elementary education. Fundamental education for adults required the consent of the latter.

The representative of the USSR had suggested that the amendment proposed by the United States delegation would deny coloured people equal rights to education and restrict their right to fundamental education. In the opinion of the Australian delegation and the United States delegation, it was clear that the word “everyone” included coloured people. In any case, the age-limit for which education was free in the United States varied from state to state.

The United States delegation considered, moreover, that an incomplete list of the categories against whom there was to be no discrimination in article 23 would only weaken the effect of article 2 of the declaration.

MR. COROMINAS (Argentina) said that his delegation was withdrawing its amendment (A/C.3/251) in favour of the amendment to the first paragraph proposed by France, which contained the same idea, namely, that technical and professional education should be made generally available.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote first the amendment submitted by the USSR delegation (A/C.3/353), as being furthest removed from the original text. The effect of the amendment would be to add to the end of the first sentence of article 23 the following: "and access to such education must be open to all without any distinction as to race, sex, language, material status or political affiliation".

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics), in reply to Mrs. Roosevelt's statement, said he was willing to add the word "etc." to the end of the list, to show that it was not limitative.

A vote was taken by roll-call, as follows:

Poland, having been drawn by lot by the Chairman, voted first.

In favour: Poland, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Yugoslavia, Burma, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Czechoslovakia.

Against: Sweden, Turkey, United Kingdom, United States of America, Uruguay, Argentina, Australia, Belgium, Brazil, Canada, Chile, China, Denmark, France, Honduras, India, Lebanon, Luxembourg, Netherlands, New Zealand, Paraguay, Peru.

Abstaining: Venezuela, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Mexico.

THE CHAIRMAN asked for comments on the French amendment (A/C.3/355). That amendment called for the replacement of the words "Elementary and fundamental education shall be free and compulsory" by the following: "... which shall be free at least in so far as elementary and fundamental education are concerned. Elementary education shall be compulsory. Technical and professional education shall be made generally available".

MR. WATT (Australia) pointed out that the text proposed by the French representative would considerably change the meaning of the first paragraph, since fundamental education would no longer be made compulsory, and that it would in fact substitute an entirely new text for the whole paragraph.

He suggested that the Committee should vote on the whole of paragraph 1 proposed by the French delegation.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) requested that each sentence of the French amendment should be put to the vote separately.

Following comments by MISS KLOMPÉ (Netherlands), MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay), MR. CARRERA ANDRADE (Ecuador) and MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) on the divergences between the English and French versions of the first two sentences of the French amendment, MR. CASSIN (France) said that some delegations had expressed the fear that his amendment might be interpreted as barring private education. In order to remove that objection, and to bring the French and English texts into agreement, he made a formal proposal for the adoption, as the French text for the beginning of article 23, of the wording suggested by the Turkish delegation in its amendment (A/C.3/273/Rev.1), namely: “Toute personne a droit a l’éducation gratuite, au moins en ce qui concerne l’instruction primaire.”

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the first sentence of the French amendment, as modified; the English text was to remain as in document A/C.3/355.

The text was adopted by 17 votes to 11, with 5 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put the second sentence of the first paragraph of the French amendment to the vote, as follows: “Elementary education shall be compulsory.”

That text was adopted by 28 votes to none, with one abstention.

THE CHAIRMAN put the third sentence to the vote as follows: “Technical and professional education shall be made generally available.”

That text was adopted by 25 votes to 2, with 6 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote all of paragraph 1 as proposed by the French delegation, including the amendments to the French version.

Paragraph 1 was adopted by 30 votes to none, with 4 abstentions.

MR. KURAL (Turkey) thanked the French representative for his compromise proposal, as it had made possible the inclusion of the Turkish delegation’s amendment, to which he attached great importance.

THE CHAIRMAN then turned to the amendments to article 23, paragraph 2. Three had been proposed, by the delegations of France (A/C.3/355), the United Kingdom (A/C.3/354) and Mexico and the United States (A/C.3/356). The joint Mexican and United States amendment was put to the vote first, as it was furthest removed from the original text.

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) made certain minor drafting corrections in the English text of that amendment.

MR. CASSIN (France) pointed out that the word “promotion” in the third line should be translated by progrès and not by the word développement. The line should therefore read: “. . . au progrès de la compréhension, de la tolérance et de la amitié entre tous les peuples, etc.”

[603]

THE CHAIRMAN said that those corrections would be noted.

MR. ENCINAS (Peru) asked whether the Mexican representative would accept the Australian representative’s proposal to include a reference to the purposes and principles of the United Nations.

MR. CAMPOS ORTIZ (Mexico) said that the expression “the activities of the United Nations for the maintenance of peace” covered that idea, since the principles of the United Nations were designed primarily to maintain peace.

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) accepted the explanation given by the Mexican representative.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) suggested that the words “all peoples” in the fourth line should be replaced by words used in the original draft, namely: “all nations, and racial and religious groups”.

MR. CASSIN (France) said that he would withdraw his amendment in favour of the joint Mexican and United States text, if the latter were accepted by the Committee.

MR. CARRERA ANDRADE (Ecuador) requested a roll-call vote on the additional amendment proposed by Lebanon.

A vote was taken by roll-call as follows:

New Zealand, having been drawn by lot by the Chairman, was called upon to vote first.

In favour: Peru, Philippines, Poland, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Yugoslavia, Belgium, Brazil, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Canada, Colombia, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, France, Honduras, India, Lebanon, Luxembourg, Mexico.

Against: New Zealand, Pakistan, Sweden, United Kingdom, United States of America, Uruguay, Afghanistan.

Abstaining: Paraguay, Turkey, Venezuela, Argentina, Australia, Burma, Chile, China, Netherlands.

The additional amendment was adopted by 22 votes to 7, with 9 abstentions.

MRS. CORBET (United Kingdom) requested a separate vote on the last phrase of the joint United States and Mexican amendment (A/C.3/356).

THE CHAIRMAN said that the joint Mexican-United States amendment, with the Lebanese additional amendment, would replace the last part of paragraph 2 of the original text of article 23 after the words “fundamental freedoms”, and would read as follows: “. . . and to the promotion of understanding, tolerance and friendship among all nations and racial and religious groups, as well as the activities of the United Nations for the maintenance of peace”.

The United Kingdom amendment (A/C.3/354) differed from the foregoing only in omit-[604]ting the last phrase beginning with the words: “as well as the activities . . .”

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the first phrase of the sentence, namely: “. . . and to the promotion of understanding, tolerance and friendship among all nations and racial and religious groups . . .”

That phrase was adopted by 35 votes to none, with one abstention.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the last phrase of the sentence, namely: “. . . as well as the activities of the United Nations for the maintenance of peace”.

That phrase was adopted by 34 votes to 2, with one abstention.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the joint Mexican and United States amendment as a whole.

The amendment was adopted by 35 votes to none, with one abstention.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the second paragraph as a whole as amended.

Paragraph 2, as amended, was adopted by 36 votes to none, with 2 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that as the joint Mexican and United States amendment (A/C.3/356) had been adopted, there was no longer any need to vote on the United Kingdom amendment (A/C.3/354). Furthermore, as the Lebanese additional amendment had been adopted, the French amendment (A/C.3/355) had been withdrawn.

THE CHAIRMAN then drew attention to the Lebanese amendment (A/C.3/260), adding a third paragraph to article 23, as follows: “Parents have a priority right to choose the kind of education that shall be given to their children.”

COUNT CARTON DE WIART (Belgium) requested a roll-call vote on the amendment.

THE CHAIRMAN asked for a vote by roll-call on the Lebanese amendment (A/C.3/260).

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) observed that it should be specified that the children referred to were young children; otherwise the Lebanese amendment would mean that parents could choose the education to be given to their children even when they were of age.

MR. LITAUER (Poland) asked whether the Lebanese representative was prepared to accept the USSR amendment.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) said he could not give an immediate reply, because he had not had time to study the effect of the amendment.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) having asked for his amendment to be put to the vote, the Chairman replied that the rules of procedure did not allow a proposal to be put to the vote once the voting had begun.

MR. KAMINSKY (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) supported the USSR representative, and MR. LITAUER (Poland) said he thought it [605] was necessary to understand the meaning of a text before voting upon it.

MRS. CORBET (United Kingdom) said that she did not understand what was meant by the words "priority right" in the English text.

THE CHAIRMAN, citing rule 117 of the rules of procedure, decided that the amendment submitted by the USSR could not be put to the vote.

MR. LITAUER (Poland) requested that the debate should be adjourned.

The motion for adjournment was rejected by 30 votes to 5, with 1 abstention.

THE CHAIRMAN asked the Committee to proceed to the vote on the Lebanese amendment (A/C.3/260).

A vote was taken by roll-call as follows:

In favour: Argentina, Australia, Belgium, Brazil, Chile, Colombia, Cuba, Denmark, India, Lebanon, Luxembourg, Netherlands, Pakistan, New Zealand, Paraguay, Philippines, Sweden.

Against: Afghanistan, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Ecuador, France, Mexico, Poland, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Kingdom, United States of America, Uruguay, Venezuela, Yugoslavia.

Abstaining: Canada, China, Czechoslovakia, Dominican Republic, Honduras, Peru, Turkey.

The amendment was adopted by 17 votes to 13, with 7 abstentions.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics), speaking on a point of order, challenged the Chairman's decision not to put the USSR amendment to the vote. He proposed that the Committee should vote on it forthwith.

MR. KAMINSKY (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic), and MR. LITAUER (Poland) supported the proposal.

THE CHAIRMAN stated that his decision had been made without any ulterior motive, and recalled the terms of rule 117 of the rules of procedure. The proposal that a vote should be taken immediately on the USSR amendment could be considered only if, under rule 112 of the rules of procedure, the Committee, by a two-thirds majority of the members present and voting, decided to reopen the debate on article 23 of the declaration.

MR. LITAUER (Poland) having formally proposed that that procedure should be adopted, MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) asked that a vote on the reopening of the debate should be taken at the following meeting.

THE CHAIRMAN having agreed, MR. LITAUER (Poland) suggested that the vote should not be taken on article 23 as a whole until it had been decided whether the debate should be reopened.

MR. WATT (Australia) saw no objection to deferring the vote on article 23 as a whole until the following meeting.

MR. AQUINO (Philippines) asked that the vote should be taken on the article as a whole. That [606] would not prevent the Committee from voting later on the question whether the debate should be reopened.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote article 23 as a whole as amended.

Article 23, as amended, was adopted by 34 votes to none, with 2 abstentions.

MR. CARRERA ANDRADE (Ecuador) said he had abstained from voting on article 23 as a whole because he considered that the provisions of paragraph 3, proposed by the Lebanese delegation, were contrary to the system established in certain countries, especially Ecuador, where the State enjoyed certain prerogatives in the field of education. His delegation intended to request that article 23 should be amended.

MR. WATT (Australia) felt that the full text of the French amendment met the objectives upon which the Argentine and Australian amendments had been based. At the same time it corrected the error in the original text regarding the compulsory nature of fundamental education.

He had voted against the first paragraph of the French amendment because that text did not wholly remove ambiguity; however as Mr. Cassin had explained that his amendment was not intended to abolish private schools, and as no one had raised any objection, Mr. Watt had been able to vote for article 23 as a whole thus amended.

He was sorry that the French delegation had withdrawn the second part of its amendment, as he would have liked to suggest an amendment to that text. The Australian delegation had voted for paragraph 3, but was opposed to consideration of the belated USSR amendment; a hasty decision should not be taken on a matter which called for thorough study.

MRS. CORBET (United Kingdom) had voted against the French amendment because she felt that it was unnecessary to make special mention of technical and professional education. The United Kingdom delegation had also voted against the Lebanese amendment to the joint amendment of Mexico and the United States of America, as it felt that the word "peoples" had a wider meaning. She had voted against the addition of paragraph 3 not because she had any objection in principle, but because the English text did not seem sufficiently clear. She would have preferred the expression “prior right” to that of “priority right”, which appeared in the present English text.

The United Kingdom delegation had voted for article 23 as a whole because it fully endorsed the principles set forth therein. She felt, nevertheless, that certain questions of detail should not have been included in the text. A great many other questions of at least equal importance were not mentioned. The United Kingdom delegation had, however, deliberately refrained from discussing them because they should properly be included in the covenant on human rights.

MR. CAMPOS ORTIZ (Mexico) stated on behalf of his delegation that he had voted for article [607] 23 of the draft international declaration of human rights on the understanding that paragraph 3, as drafted in accordance with the Lebanese amendment, would be subject to “such limitations as are necessary to secure due recognition and respect for the rights of others and the requirements of morality, public order and general welfare in a democratic society”, as provided in article 27 of the draft declaration.

MR. KURAL (Turkey), referring to the observations of the Australian representative, stated that he had voted for paragraph 1 because he considered that it did not prohibit private education.

COUNT CARTON DE WIART (Belgium) was glad that paragraph 3 had been adopted. Recognition of the rights of the family was not a question of secondary importance. The child belonged to the family before belonging to the State.

The addition which the USSR representative had proposed called for prior discussion. During the debate the words used by Mr. Pavlov had been translated in two different ways, i.e. “children of tender years” and “minors”. If the question concerned minors, it might be advantageous to reopen the debate.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) stated that he had voted for article 23 as a whole as it was based on principles conducive to human progress. The article was not wholly satisfactory, however. According to Mr. Pavlov, the final paragraph tended to thwart the aspirations of young people. Naturally, parents should decide upon the type of education to be given to a child of twelve years of age, but the position was not the same when a child was fourteen years old or more. In many cases that was the time when a child’s vocational aptitudes became apparent and in that connexion parents were too often lacking in understanding. He hoped that the Committee would return to that matter in order to remove any tendency towards retrogression.

It was unfortunate, too, that the Committee should have rejected the USSR amendment providing for the right to education without any distinction as to material status. It had taken a decision prejudicial to the poorer classes of society.

Summary Record of the Hundred and Forty-Ninth meeting [of the Third Committee]

Held at the Palais de Chaillot, Paris, on Saturday,
20 November 1948, at 11 a.m.

Chairman: MR. CHARLES MALIK (Lebanon).

Article 24<sup>1</sup>

MR. COROMINAS (Argentina) said his amendment to article 24 (A/C.3/251) was more or less similar to several others that had been put forward. It was based on a provision of the Bogotá declaration and, in his opinion, might well be substituted for the concise basic text. Many countries, among them Argentina, guaranteed periodic holidays with pay for workers and the whole question of the right to rest and leisure was undoubtedly of great interest to them.

In a spirit of compromise, he was prepared to accept sub-amendments to his amendment, but hoped that it would be used as a basis for discussion.

MR. HAMDI (Egypt) said his amendment (A/C.3/264) was not substantially different from the one put forward by the Argentine delegation, but he thought it more clearly drafted than the latter.

MR. AQUINO (Philippines) said that the Philippine delegation had been closely connected with the incorporation of article 24 in the draft declaration. The suggestion that it could be interpreted as a right to laziness, however, had stimulated his delegation to put forward its amendment (A/C.3/239). The concept of the right to health implied an obligation on the part of each Government to take all the necessary measures for protecting the health of its citizens. Even the infirm would benefit from such a provision, because it would mean no further deterioration in their state of health.

There was a difference in meaning between rest and leisure; rest meant the actual cessation of activity, while leisure was simply a period of unengaged time. A period of rest gave the individual an opportunity to recover his lost strength; during his leisure time he was able to look after his cultural development.

He felt it was appropriate to include a provision ensuring to all the benefits of physical wellbeing, and reserved his right to modify the wording of his amendment.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) said his amendment (A/C.3/261) would simply add certain social concepts to the right to rest in order to avoid any possibility of its being interpreted as the right to laziness. The Argentine and the Egyptian amendments were very similar, while the Philippine amendment was covered by the words “physical benefit”, at the end of the Cuban proposal.

The reference to the duties of the State in respect of the right to rest, as set forth in the USSR amendments (E/800, page 35), was acceptable to him. It was the only possible way in which the right could be guaranteed and such obligations were incorporated in the legislation of many countries. A precedent concerning the mention of the State’s obligations had already been established in regard to compulsory schooling and the provisions of article 22.

He proposed, therefore, that the USSR amendment should be added as a second paragraph to the Cuban amendment.

MRS. CORBET (United Kingdom) did not think that any of the proposed amendments would improve the original text. The USSR amendment was concerned with the implementation of the [609] right to rest and leisure, and while the substance of it was acceptable, it was not appropriate for inclusion in a declaration of individual rights. In regard to the Philippine amendment, she pointed out that good health was a privilege and not a right and that the concept was already covered in article 22. The Argentine, Cuban, Egyptian and Panamanian amendments all repeated the provisions of article 25. The last (A/C.3/280), by coupling the idea of wellbeing with that of leisure, could even be regarded as restrictive.

MR. KAYALY (Syria) pointed out that the right to rest and leisure, as defined in the USSR amendment, had been introduced into Syrian law two years previously. It was a right that was of fundamental importance; however, the manner in which the individual utilized his rest and leisure time should not be laid down in the declaration.

He agreed with the United Kingdom representative that the Philippine amendment was covered by the provisions of article 22. Of the four other similar amendments, he preferred that of the Argentine delegation and suggested that any changes of wording deemed necessary should be made in that particular text.

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) considered that the great merit of article 24 was its concise simplicity which would appeal to all ordinary individuals. As had been pointed out before, the declaration was not intended for philosophers and jurists but for the ordinary people. None of the amendments added anything new to the text; they merely stated the same right in unnecessary detail. She opposed the USSR amendment for the often repeated reason that the declaration was a statement of individual rights and not of States’ obligations.

United States legislation regulated hours of work, guaranteed holidays with pay and provided for contractual agreements between unions and employers. The standards set by the various trade unions were increasingly applicable to all workers, whether members or not.

The Philippine amendment was covered by the provisions of article 22. She did not object to the language that had been proposed from the text of the Bogotá declaration, but preferred the simplicity of the original text. The Egyptian amendment was too detailed. The words “working man or woman”, contained in the Panamanian amendment, had a specific meaning which would exclude certain categories of people who worked from the right to rest and leisure.

The rather complicated additions that had been suggested did nothing to clarify the right; therefore she hoped that the concise original text would be maintained.

MR. CONTOUMAS (Greece) felt that the text should make clear that it was all workers, or all who worked, who had the right to rest and leisure.

MR. DE LA OSSA (Panama) said his amendment was designed to make clear who should receive the benefits of the right to rest and leisure. It was not necessary to state that doctors and other professional workers had the right to rest and leisure, because such categories of persons were able to earn that right. It was the workers, therefore, to whom article 24 was particularly directed.

MR. NOSEK (Czechoslovakia) said that one of the most important aspects of article 22 was that it defined the meaning of the right to a standard of living. It was unfortunate that the Committee had not accepted the USSR amendment to that article concerning social insurance. With that addition, the article would have been more comprehensive and progressive and would have more clearly reflected the spirit of Article 55 of the United Nations Charter.

It had to be recognized that article 24 was complementary to article 22. In that connexion, he drew attention to certain documents of the International Labour Organization which defined a standard of living as being made up of the consumption level, social services, education, recreation and health facilities and, finally, rest and leisure.

As was set forth in the Czechoslovak Constitution, the right to rest and leisure would have to be guaranteed through holidays with pay and regulated working hours. For that reason he supported the USSR amendment.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that it was not enough merely to declare rights; it was essential to guarantee them to those who should enjoy them. The USSR amendment mentioned such guarantees in a way which showed that they were specifically designed for workers. That would meet objections that the article might be interpreted as protecting the idle. Rest could be guaranteed only by the reasonable limitation of working hours. Neither rest nor leisure was possible to the man compelled – as he might be in colonial countries – to work fifteen hours a day. The limitation must, of course, not be enforced in such a way as to reduce earning power, for the starving man could obviously not enjoy leisure. He had heard of workers in Bombay under United Kingdom rule, for example, who had received less food than the prisoners in jail; such workers could not enjoy leisure. Without a provision to limit working hours, article 24 would be hollow.

In his country, rest had been guaranteed by weekly and yearly paid holidays. Unless pay continued during such holidays, there was no possibility of rest and leisure. It was essential to write such a guarantee into the declaration. He deplored the argument repeatedly advanced by the representatives of the United Kingdom and the United States that such guarantees were inappropriate in the declaration. It almost seemed as if those representatives failed to take sufficient interest in the rights of working people. Inclusion of such guarantees would not overload the article.

He wondered why the Philippine amendment had been introduced – with apparent irrelevance – at the present stage. It should have been moved in connexion with the USSR amendment to article 22 (E/800, page 35) which dealt with health. The Philippine amendment was perhaps some-<sup>[611]</sup>what ironical; it would be hard to tell a sufferer from tuberculosis that he had the right to good health.

MR. CASSIN (France) said that the basic text was admirably concise, but it was too broad in meaning. He therefore submitted an amendment (A/C.3/357) restricting its scope to an equitable share of rest and leisure. He believed that the greatest care must be used to draft a good article; otherwise it might be open to ridicule. Amendments intended only in the interests of the industrial workers were restrictive and should be rejected. The USSR amendment was superfluous because article 20 had already introduced the idea of State responsibility. The declaration could not define the uses to which leisure must be put. All the amendments which attempted to do so should be rejected.

COUNT CARTON DE WIART (Belgium) said that he could not support the Cuban, Argentine and Egyptian amendments because it was impossible to enumerate satisfactorily the possible uses of leisure; it might also be used for sport, travel or other purposes. He was equally opposed to the USSR amendment because there, too, the enumeration of guarantees was restrictive; there might be many more ways of guaranteeing the right to rest and leisure. He was not, however, opposed to the principle. His own country had enjoyed legal limitation of working hours and paid holidays for fifty years. The succinct language of the basic text was excellent.

The French amendment, however, was an improvement: it said precisely what was meant. He would therefore support it.

MR. HAMDY (Egypt) said that he had never intended his amendment to be interpreted as an attempt to dictate the use to which leisure should be put. He had merely tried to complete the present text. He did not think that the case of doctors, housewives and similar persons could come under the guarantee by contractual agreements inasmuch as such persons were self-employed.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) pointed out that it was essential to distinguish a modern declaration of rights from those of the previous centuries. The latter had spoken of man as the citizen; today, such a declaration should stress man as a worker. That was the basic thought underlying the Cuban amendment. No one disputed man's right to rest and leisure; but leisure might be abused. To stipulate the right might be insufficient unless it were also stated that it should be used for mental, cultural and physical development – the development of the human personality. The community must be obliged to create the opportunity for such development.

Although the Cuban and Egyptian amendments were very similar, the Egyptian was rather too detailed. However, he supported the Egyptian and Argentine amendments no less than his own.

MR. KAMINSKY (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) explained that his main object was to [612] indicate the prerequisites for implementation of the right to rest and leisure. The Byelorussian Constitution guaranteed the eight-hour day, annual holidays with pay, and medical assistance. That resulted from the fact that the workers owned the means of production. Socialism was the basis upon which the right to enjoy rest and leisure rested. Before the Revolution of 1917, when the economy of Byelorussia was based on private property, there had been no opportunity for such enjoyment. His country had now been largely industrialized; and on that basis the right to leisure and rest had been extended. That was the prerequisite for enjoyment of that right.

He supported the USSR amendment because the article would be inadequate without the addition of the guarantees contained therein. Such an addition would render the article more generally intelligible. The right might be guaranteed by law, as it was in his country, or by contractual agreements.

MR. AQUINO (Philippines), replying to the representative of the USSR, said that he had not supported the USSR amendment to article 22 precisely because he had believed that the appropriate place for a provision dealing with health was article 24. The French proposal raised difficulties of interpretation: who would decide what was an equitable share of rest? The words "due rest" would be preferable because "due" clearly implied that rest had been merited. It was also essential to state for what purposes leisure should be used.

He had reached a compromise text after discussion with the Cuban, Argentine, Egyptian and Panamanian delegations, using the Argentine amendment as a basis. Accordingly he submitted a joint Philippine-Argentine amendment (A/C.3/358) incorporating both those points.

MRS. NEWLANDS (New Zealand) said that she had been interested by the USSR amendment because her country's law contained the guarantees mentioned in it. She agreed, however, that it was inappropriate to include them in the declaration in that form. She therefore submitted a new amendment (A/C.3/359) incorporating the substance of the USSR amendment.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) asked the representative of Cuba to explain why the right to rest had been eliminated in the English version of his amendment. He feared, too, that that amendment tended to interfere with freedom of choice of occupation during free time. There seemed no clear difference between spiritual and cultural development. If those points were clarified, however, he might support the Cuban amendment. He might also support the Egyptian and Argentine amendments, which were similar to the Cuban. He did not understand the word "maintenance" in the Panamanian amendment, but that might be due to the Russian translation. The need for the Philippine amendment had disappeared since article 22 had been adopted. He did not understand the Philippine representative's argument, however: the USSR delegation had introduced no amendment to article 24 which [613] mentioned health, so that it was not clear how the Philippine representative could support it.

MRS. CORBET (United Kingdom) regretted that the representative of the USSR had appeared to insinuate that her delegation opposed limitation of working hours and paid holidays. The United Kingdom Government had always made a special effort to secure such conditions. She had opposed the USSR amendment simply because she, like the representative of the United States, wished the text of the declaration to be concise; details should be left for the covenant. The covenant would undoubtedly use certain of the ideas suggested by the USSR and other delegations; it was inopportune to attempt to anticipate that document. She agreed that the right would be hollow unless paid holidays and similar facilities for enjoying rest and leisure were guaranteed; but that guarantee had no place in the declaration.

Replying to the USSR representative with regard to the example he had mentioned, Mrs. Corbet pointed out that the United Kingdom Government had controlled the Bombay prisons, and prisoners had been relatively well fed. It had not, however, exercised control over the conditions of Bombay workers. She asked the USSR representative whether workers in compulsory labour camps in his country enjoyed paid holidays. She regretted that propaganda element had been introduced into the debate.

The Philippine proposal was restrictive. The individual should have a free choice in the matter of using his leisure. With regard to the Panamanian amendment, she pointed out that her Government had been attempting to abolish the distinction between manual labourers and other types of workers. She therefore preferred a phrase such as "all who work" to anything suggesting "the working man". She assured the Egyptian representative that the distinction between rest and idleness was quite clear; rest meant relaxation from work. She welcomed the New Zealand amendment, particularly for its clear drafting.

MR. CHANG (China) said he supported the basic text in preference to any of the amendments.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) withdrew his amendment (A/C.3/261) in favour of the New Zealand amendment (A/C.3/359). He would abstain from voting on the other amendments.

MR. DE LA OSSA (Panama), submitting a revised text of his amendment (A/C.3/280/Corr.1), said that he had taken all other amendments into account. In reply to the representative of the USSR, he explained that the word “maintenance” had been designed to cover those in poor health who could not, for that reason, be said to need rest since they had not been working. That provision filled a gap in the basic text.

Summary Record of the Hundred and Fiftieth Meeting
[of the Third Committee]

Held at the Palais de Chaillot, Paris, on Saturday,
 20 November 1948, at 3:15 p.m.

Chairman: MR. CHARLES MALIK (Lebanon).

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the USSR amendment to article 24 (E/800, page 35), which consisted of an addition to the original text.

The amendment was rejected by 20 votes to 5, with 12 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN asked the members of the Committee to consider the alternative text of article 24 proposed by the New Zealand delegation (A/C.3/359).

MR. CHANG (China) proposed a new version of the amendment, as follows:

“Everyone has the right to rest and leisure, including such provisions as reasonable limitation of working hours and periodical holidays with pay.”

AS MRS. NEWLANDS (New Zealand) did not accept the revision submitted by the Chinese representative, the Chairman asked the Committee to vote on the New Zealand amendment as it appeared in document A/C.3/359.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) asked for a vote by roll-call.

A vote was taken by roll-call.

In favour: Afghanistan, Argentina, Australia, Burma, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Chile, Costa Rica, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Ethiopia, India, Mexico, New Zealand, Norway, Paraguay, Peru, Poland, Sweden, Turkey, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Venezuela, Yugoslavia.

Against: Belgium, China, Netherlands, United Kingdom.

Abstaining: Brazil, Canada, Egypt, France, Greece, Lebanon, Panama, Philippines, United States of America, Yemen.

The amendment was adopted by 25 votes to 4, with 10 abstentions.

MR. WATT (Australia) stated that his delegation had voted in favour of the amendment, although the wording was not entirely satisfactory, because it considered that the principle on which the amendment was based should be stated in the declaration. He expressed some doubt, however, as to where it should be inserted. In his opinion, the expression of that principle should immediately follow the article dealing with the standard of living and precede that concerning education. He hoped that the drafting sub-committee would take his remarks into account.

[615]

MR. CHANG (China) had voted against the amendment on account of its wording, although his delegation had no objection to the principle on which it was based. The right to leisure was an abstract idea, the limitation of working hours was an abstract idea relating to a concrete reality and holidays with pay were a concrete matter. For that reason, he considered that the wording of the New Zealand amendment, in giving equal importance to ideas of a very different nature and in expressing them without establishing any logical relation between them, was somewhat inadequate.

He appealed to the New Zealand delegation to consent to change the wording of its amendment.

COUNT CARTON DE WIART (Belgium) had voted against the amendment because he considered that the text might give rise to misunderstanding. In particular, it did not explicitly specify the categories of persons entitled to holidays with pay. It might be interpreted as meaning that even persons with substantial private incomes or, for instance, housewives not engaged in any work outside their homes were also entitled to holidays with pay. The question would then arise who would have to bear the expense in such cases.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) pointed out that the USSR delegation had voted for the New Zealand text although it had some doubts about the wording. It had done so because it considered that the principle of the amendment was a basic one which should be mentioned in the declaration. The New Zealand text was certainly not perfect; the USSR text was better. The text as adopted, however, could not give rise to any misunderstanding. It was proposed to grant holidays with pay to workers and to no one else. The idea of leisure was bound up with the idea of work; moreover, the fact that the New Zealand amendment mentioned the limitation of working hours clearly showed that its provisions concerned workers only.

MRS. CORBET (United Kingdom) stated that her delegation had voted against the amendment, but not because it opposed its underlying principles. It was not only desirable, but essential to put those principles into practice. But, as the representatives of Belgium and China had pointed out, the wording of the text was far from satisfactory.

MR. HAMDY (Egypt) had abstained, not because he did not fully support the principle of the New Zealand amendment, but because he considered it no improvement upon the precise terms of article 24. That article spoke of the right to rest and to leisure. The idea of the limitation of working hours was only a repetition of that right, and the right to holidays with pay was a detail which it would be more appropriate to mention in the covenant.

MRS. VERWEY-JONKER (Netherlands) had felt bound to vote against the amendment for the reasons given by the Chinese representative, whose text she would have been able to accept.

Her delegation had voted against the USSR amendment because it considered that the words "by law or by contractual agreements" were not adequate to ensure that the right to leisure would be enjoyed by all.

MRS. NEWLANDS (New Zealand) said that her delegation was fully aware of the imperfections of the text it had submitted. She was therefore ready to accept any change which would improve it or any new text likely to satisfy the majority of the Committee. She had carefully considered the amendments and suggestions made, but either they were not satisfactory or they would not have obtained the votes of the majority of the Committee.

MR. CAMPOS ORTIZ (Mexico) pointed out that article 25 was the last of the articles in the draft declaration which dealt with individual human rights. The Committee had already recognized the rights of the wage earner, the family, the mother and the child; if it did not wish there to be a serious omission in the text it was drawing up it must now proclaim the rights of the individual as an intellectual worker, scientist, or writer; in other words, the rights of all those who contributed to the progress and wellbeing of humanity. The Mexican delegation thought the time had come to recognize that without the contribution of that form of human activity no social progress would be possible.

No article in the draft declaration dealt specifically with the rights of the intellectual worker. The same omission had existed in the original version of the draft American declaration of the rights and duties of man. The Mexican delegation had had the honour, at Bogotá, of proposing the article on the protection of intellectual and artistic work which had been unanimously adopted, and was submitting to the Third Committee an amendment (A/C.3/266) based on the text adopted at Bogotá. World opinion had unanimously recognized that the Bogotá declaration owed its progressive and advanced nature in part to the introduction of the idea of the protection of intellectual work; similarly, the Third Committee ought unanimously to recognize the necessity of introducing that new idea in a declaration which would have a still wider scope than the Bogotá declaration, since it was to be a universal declaration of human rights.

He recognized that certain objections might be raised, but considered they would not seriously affect the merit of his proposal. It might be argued, for instance, that the Mexican amendment dealt with the rights of one particular category of persons only; but was that not also true of property rights or the rights of the wage-earner? It might be said, further, that the general provisions concerning labour adequately protected intellectual workers; that, however, would only be true of a small number of salaried intellectual workers, and was certainly not true of all men of learning, writers, or artists, pursuing independent research. It might be said that national legislation, or international legislation itself by a system of conventions of which everyone was aware, safeguarded the rights of authors and inventors' patents: but the effectiveness of such protection, particularly in the international field, was at best relative and often non-existent.

If the United Nations decided to include such a provision in the Declaration of Human Rights, it would be proclaiming to the world, with all the weight of its moral authority, its consciousness of the necessity of protecting all forms of work, manual as well as intellectual, and of safeguarding intellectual production on an equal basis with material property.

Mr. Campos Ortiz was glad that his delegation held the same views on the question as the delegations of France and Cuba, both of which were playing such a distinguished part in the drafting of the declaration of human rights.

For technical reasons the meeting was suspended from 4.20 to 4.30 p.m.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) pointed out that the amendment to article 25 proposed by his delegation (A/C.3/261) was in two parts. The first was a mere drafting amendment to the text adopted by the Commission on Human Rights; the Cuban delegation did not consider that everyone was sufficiently gifted to play a part in scientific advancement, and thought that the idea of the authors of the article would be better expressed by the following:

“Every person has the right . . . to participate in the benefits that result from scientific advancement.”

He considered the second part of the Cuban amendment to be the more important. It was in the same spirit as the amendments submitted by the Mexican and French delegations. Moreover, the Cuban delegation was proposing a text of which the Mexican delegation could justly claim to be the originators, as the Mexican Government had been the first at Bogotá to raise the question of the protection of the rights of the intellectual worker, artist and scientist. The Cuban delegation therefore had no pride of authorship and was prepared to withdraw its text in favour of that proposed by the French representative (A/C.3/244/Rev.1) – which was exactly similar in substance to that of the Mexican delegation, but phrased with admirable perfection of style.

Supporting the remarks just made by Mr. Campos Ortiz, he expressed his conviction that the idea of intellectual protection was a new and important one which should rightly be included at the point the Committee had reached in the draft declaration.

MR. CARRERA ANDRADE (Ecuador) thought that article 25, as worded in the draft declaration, was one of the most confused and contradictory that the Committee had so far had to examine.

The text in question established rights which had always existed. The point which it was important to establish was the State's obligation to render works of art and intellectual creations accessible to the people by granting admission without charge to all museums and libraries and, above all, by extending public education. That was actually the right the Committee had recognized in proclaiming the right to education and freedom of thought.

In his analysis of the proposed amendments to article 25, Mr. Carrera Andrade stated that the Mexican, Cuban and French amendments introduced a new element concerning literary property [619] and the rights of the inventor. The delegation of Ecuador did not think it right, in a general declaration of human rights, to make special mention of the rights of writers and inventors, who formed only a small proportion of society. The question of literary or scientific property belonged under the general chapter on property rights. Speaking as an independent writer from a free American country, he expressed his conviction that artistic and literary work was part of mankind's heritage; it should serve the cause of humanity and be accessible to all without restriction.

The delegation of Ecuador thought it preferable, in the interest of a good draft declaration, to delete article 25 entirely.

MR. ENCINAS (Peru) said that his delegation fully concurred in the spirit of the amendments submitted by the delegations of Mexico, Cuba and France designed to safeguard the rights of authors and inventors' patents. His delegation doubted whether the wording of the texts was entirely satisfactory but was convinced that the idea should be retained in article 25.

The Peruvian delegation was prepared to accept the text proposed by the Commission on Human Rights, with one reservation. In its opinion, not only must the right of every person to take part in the cultural, artistic and scientific life of the community be recognized, but also the right to do so in that complete freedom without which there could be no creation worthy of man. An earlier article of the declaration had dealt with freedom of thought; it seemed pertinent now to recognize the freedom of creative thought, in order to protect it from harmful pressures which were only too frequent in recent history.

The Peruvian delegation therefore formally proposed an amendment to the text of article 25, as follows:

“Every person has the right freely to take part in the cultural life. . .”

MR. CASSIN (France) stated that he was quite satisfied with the wording proposed by the Cuban delegation for the single paragraph of article 25 adopted by the Commission on Human Rights. He recalled that the question had been debated at length by the Commission on Human Rights, where several delegations had maintained that even if all persons could not play an equal part in scientific progress, they should indisputably be able to participate in the benefits derived from it. The French delegation fully supported that view.

The French delegation was also happy to agree with the delegations of Mexico and Cuba concerning a principle proclaimed in the Bogotá Declaration which it would like to see included in the international declaration of human rights.

The latter mentioned more than one productive human activity. It spoke of the right to own property and the right to work. It would have seemed [620] somewhat strange if no similar mention had been made of the rights of those who contributed eminently to the progress of science and civilization.

It would doubtless be argued that the number of learned men and artists was small. Such an assertion would not be entirely justified. Many inventions, for instance, owed their origin to men who followed some other profession in everyday life and who therefore made a considerable contribution to the life of the community over and above their daily activities. It could also be argued that royalties and patents were sufficient to protect such persons. He did not think so. His proposal not only took into account the material aspect of the question, but was also designed to protect the moral interests of artists and inventors. Very many scientists attached greater importance to the spiritual side of their work than to the profits that they could gain from it; they only asked that their work should be recognized by future generations. That recognition, which they claimed, should be granted to them, lest injustice should be done in the future. Similarly, it often happened that a literary or artistic work was reproduced in a distorted and travestied form although it suffered no financial loss. In those cases too the artist or the author should be afforded the right to protect his work, for it was in the interest of humanity as a whole to prevent works which ennobled the human race from becoming a mockery.

It would redound to the honour of the United Nations General Assembly if for the first time on an international plane, and without prejudice to existing conventions, it proclaimed among the fundamental rights of man the moral and material rights of every person who contributed to the intellectual, artistic and scientific progress of man.

In conclusion, Mr. Cassin declared that the world, which had so many reasons for not forgetting the names of those who were bent on destroying it, must also honour the names of those who laboured for the common good.

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) stated that once again her delegation would vote for the text prepared by the Commission on Human Rights, which she thought was well worded, and which, together with the verbal amendment of the delegation of Peru, gave an excellent definition of the right to culture which it was intended to affirm.

The United States delegation opposed the adoption of the USSR amendment (E/800, page 35) for reasons both of form and of substance. She emphasized inter alia that the words "progress" and "democracy" applied to abstract ideas for which no uniform interpretation existed. It seemed dangerous to adopt a text which could be interpreted as a pretext for the enslavement of science. The United States delegation would under no circumstances agree that science should be placed at the service or politics. Yet that might be the practical effect of the USSR amendment.

With regard to the amendments submitted by the French, Cuban and Mexican delegations, she held that they reproduced almost word for word the article in the Bogotá Declaration dealing with patents and copyright. While it accepted the principle which they expressed, the United States delegation thought that they would be out of place in the declaration, more especially since they dealt with a specific aspect of the rights of property already covered by article 15.

The United States delegation appealed to the Committee to adopt the text of article 25 without alteration.

MR. DE ATHAYDE (Brazil) thought that article 25 established a principle of non-discrimination and the right of everyone to participate in the life of the spirit. An earlier article had recognized the right of the individual to education; he could not be denied the right to participate in the cultural life of the community.

The Brazilian delegation was in favour of article 25 as adopted by the Commission on Human Rights, and it supported the French amendment, to add a second paragraph dealing with the protection of the moral and material interests of men of science, inventors and persons engaged in artistic pursuits. This latter idea was also to be found in the amendments of Cuba and Mexico, which showed the great interest it had aroused.

MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) regretted he could not accept the amendment proposed by the USSR delegation. In his opinion, the development of science should not depend on political considerations. Science could not serve an ideology; it obeyed a process of independent evolution, and very often politics, on the contrary, were influenced by science.

The delegation of Uruguay supported the first paragraph of the Cuban amendment, which was to replace the existing text of article 25. His delegation preferred that it should read: "Everyone has the right. . . to participate in the benefits that result from scientific advancement", rather than ". . . share in scientific advancement", for it was only when a scientific discovery was put into practice that people could enjoy its benefits.

He noted with satisfaction that the amendments submitted by France, Cuba and Mexico were based on a principle adopted by the Government of Uruguay after the Bogotá conference. In refutation of the objections to those amendments, he said that the right to artistic property should not be regarded as coming under the general right of property. Artistic property was covered by special laws in most countries. It was, therefore, difficult to admit that article 15, which dealt with the right to own property, was sufficient to protect the authors of literary, scientific and artistic creations. The three amendments differed only in their wording. He feared, however, that in the text submitted by the French delegation the expression: "that he may acquire" would have a restrictive affect; he, therefore, preferred either of the other two amendments.

To sum up, the delegation of Uruguay would vote for the first paragraph of the Cuban amend-[622]ment as amended by Peru, and would support either the Cuban or the Mexican proposal for paragraph 2 depending on the decision that would be taken, for the authors of those last two proposals might agree on a single proposal.

COUNT CARTON DE WIART (Belgium) thought that the basic text of article 25 was satisfactory. It proclaimed a principle which could not but be approved, namely: the right of everyone to participate in the cultural, artistic and scientific life of the community.

In the USSR amendment he saw an attempt to assign to science a political mission. While he wanted science to serve the cause of peace and co-operation among nations, he thought it was not for the declaration of human rights to define its role. In any case, if it had to be done, it would have been better to say that the aim of science was to search for truth. He did not therefore feel he could vote for the USSR amendment.

With regard to the three amendments submitted by France, Cuba and Mexico dealing with the right to artistic or scientific property, he thought that the arguments supporting them put forward by several representatives, and particularly by the representative of France, deserved to be noted. Just as at Bogotá, it was natural to set forth in the present declaration of human rights that new conception of authors' rights, which were not only material but moral and which everyone could demand in connexion with the products of his invention or creation. The representative of Uruguay had already correctly refuted the objection raised by the United States representative. The article under discussion dealt with an intellectual right, not the right to own property covered in article 15. Lawyers generally agreed that an author's right was a special conception.

He announced his support of the French amendment but suggested a slight improvement in style and asked that the words en raison should be substituted for à raison.

MR. CASSIN (France) agreed to the change.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) withdrew the second paragraph of his amendment in favour of the text submitted by France.

MR. CASSIN (France) stated that he would withdraw his amendment in favour of the second paragraph of the amendment submitted by the Cuban delegation.

MR. CAMPOS ORTIZ (Mexico) also withdrew his amendment in order to support the second paragraph of the Cuban text.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) thought that the French text of paragraph 2 of article 25 was better from the literary point of view than the text submitted by his delegation. He therefore thought that it would be preferable to retain the French amendment with the slight change suggested by the Belgian representative and accepted by Mr. Cassin.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) warmly supported the principle on which the original article 25 was based, namely, that everyone had the right to participate in the cultural life of the community, to enjoy the arts and to share in scientific advancement. The reason why his delegation had presented an amendment to that article was that it considered that the original text was incomplete.

The USSR amendment had met with opposition from certain delegations. That was not surprising. Indeed, where science was subservient to militarism and where intellectual forces were concentrated on producing a terrible weapon of aggression for the destruction of millions of peaceful human beings, the USSR thesis that science must be placed at the service of peace became unacceptable.

The Belgian representative had criticized the text presented by the Soviet Union which he felt restricted the scope of article 25. To say that science must be placed at the service of progress and democracy or, in short, at the service of humanity would, according to the Belgian representative, be limiting the scope of the original text. But the original text of article 25 also contained that restriction, if it was one, for it envisaged science, culture and art in relation to human beings. Therefore, the wording of the USSR amendment was imperfect in that respect, because it merely repeated the imperfections of the basic text.

The delegation of the Soviet Union thought it had the right to state that science should be placed at the service of mankind, for in the USSR that principle had been effectively put into practice.

He quoted figures showing the progress of the Academy of Sciences in the Soviet Union. As regards the literary aspect of intellectual life in the USSR, a considerable effort had also been made to bring culture and literary masterpieces within reach of the masses. The number of libraries had risen to six times what it had been under the Tsarist regime, and the number of readers to ten times what it had been. In the Soviet Union there was a library for every 2,097 inhabitants; the significance of that figure could be appreciated when it was compared with the corresponding figures for the United States and the United Kingdom, where there was one library for 20,333 and 4,300 inhabitants respectively. Apart from that, the USSR Government did not confine itself to the distribution of books by Russian authors. The great foreign classics, French, English, German and Spanish, were printed in millions of copies and distributed in the thirty different languages of the national groups in the Soviet Union. These figures showed that the USSR Government regarded the raising of the intellectual level of the masses as a vital objective. The same did not apply to many countries where privileged minorities tried to arrogate to themselves the enjoyment of the treasures of culture and science.

Mr. Pavlov emphasized that his delegation was especially attached to the principle that science should serve the interests of progress, democracy and peace since it could not but be aware of the atmosphere of terror which prevailed throughout [624] the world owing to the application of scientific discoveries for destructive purposes. According to the Press of certain countries, scientists were at present engaged in perfecting a bacteriological weapon which would destroy 180 million human beings at one blow.

For those reasons it was necessary to state emphatically that culture and science should above all be used to ensure the wellbeing and the intellectual development of the masses of the people and to promote conditions of general peace.

MR. CARRERA ANDRADE (Ecuador) recalled that of late years various South American Republics had taken successful measures to protect artistic and literary ownership. The rights of authors were defined in a very flexible manner which did not restrict cultural development.

He was in favour of the French amendment but thought that it was necessary to protect not only the authors of a discovery or a work of art but also their beneficiaries. Therefore, he proposed to add after the words "of which he is the author" in the French delegation's text the words "or heirs".

MRS. CORBET (United Kingdom) accepted the Peruvian representative's suggestion to add the word "freely" after the words "to take part" in the first paragraph of the amendment submitted by the Cuban delegation. She thought it useful to emphasize that participation in the cultural life of a community must be free.

She was in favour of the first paragraph of the Cuban amendment with the above addition and suggested that it should read "share in the benefits that result from scientific advancement" instead of "participate in the benefits. . ." Such a change was dictated by logic.

She would have preferred not to add a second paragraph to article 25. The French amendment dealing with the rights of authors proclaimed a new principle which the United Kingdom delegation could not accept. The representative of France had spoken on the one hand of the recognition due to the author of an invention – a very legitimate claim – and on the other, of protecting the right of ownership attaching to an invention. Those were very different conceptions. In her view, the proprietary rights attaching to an invention constituted but one aspect of the right of ownership. She did not think it wise to state that principle in an article dealing with the right of an individual to participate in the intellectual life of the community. Copyright was dealt with by special legislation and in international conventions; it was not a basic human right. The declaration of human rights should be universal in nature and only recognize general principles that were valid for all men. The United Kingdom delegation would therefore not support the French amendment.

The United Kingdom representative had listened with the greatest interest and pleasure to [625] Mr. Pavlov's statement. In the cultural field the Soviet Union had achieved tremendous progress on which it was to be congratulated. It had made great efforts to draw the greatest possible number of individuals into participation in the intellectual life. Nevertheless, and for reasons already stated by the United States representative, the United Kingdom delegation could not accept the USSR amendment. She would not wish the USSR delegation to think that she was opposed to the principles underlying the amendment. The United Kingdom delegation also considered that everyone should participate in the cultural and scientific life of the community and that the development of science must serve the interests of progress and democracy and the cause of peace and international co-operation. Unfortunately, the conception of democracy and of progress did not seem to be the same everywhere. The word “democracy” could be interpreted in many ways.

She thought that science should not be placed at the service of an ideology. It must not be forgotten that Dr. Rosenberg<sup>122</sup> had been the propagandist of a doctrine which bestowed racial superiority upon Germany. That was why it was necessary to take care in the declaration of human rights not to state a principle which might be misinterpreted and might be used for purposes prejudicial to the rights of the individual.

MR. COROMINAS (Argentina) noted with pleasure that the principle set forth in article 25 did not give rise to controversy. He was also glad that by a happy coincidence three delegations, namely, those of France, Cuba and Mexico, had joined in proposing an amendment calculated to protect the moral and material interests of authors of inventions or works of literature. The rights of authors would thus be mentioned in a second paragraph which was particularly welcome. Thus completed, article 25 would be entirely satisfactory.

With regard to the amendment introduced by the USSR representative, he would be prepared to support it in a spirit of understanding. He would, however, like the amendment to make no mention of democracy and to be worded as follows:

“The development of science must serve the interests of progress, the cause of peace and co-operation between the peoples.”

That would avoid the misunderstandings that might arise from the different interpretations to which the word “democracy” lent itself. At the same time it would satisfy the unanimous wish of the Committee by declaring that science must serve the interests of progress and the cause of peace. As stated in the United Nations Charter, that cause concerned humanity as a whole. The scientists whose discoveries had proved of benefit to everyone had not wished to serve only the interests of their own countries; their work had been designed to strengthen brotherhood and solidarity.

Those were the considerations underlying the USSR amendment, and with the above modification it would be perfectly acceptable.

Report of Sub-Committee 3 of the Third Committee submitted by Dr. Guy Pérez Cisneros (Cuba), Rapporteur

I. Preamble

1. Recapitulation of events

In the course of its study of the text of article 21 of the Draft International Declaration of Human Rights prepared by this Commission on Human Rights of the United Nations, the Third Committee of the General Assembly adopted two amendments to the paragraphs of the basic text and a third amendment proposing the introduction of an additional paragraph.

The text of article 21 proposed by the Commission on Human Rights reads as follows:

“1. Everyone has the right to work, to just and favourable conditions of work and pay and to protection against unemployment.

“2. Everyone has the right to equal pay for equal work.

“3. Everyone is free to form and to join trade unions for the protection of his interests.”

The amendments to this text adopted by the Third Committee were the following:

(a) Soviet amendment worded as follows:

“Everyone, without distinction as to race, nationality or sex has the right to equal pay for equal work.”

which was adopted by 21 votes to 14, with 7 abstentions; 16 members were absent.

The following delegations voted in favour:

Argentina, Burma, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Chile, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Ethiopia, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, India, Mexico, Norway, Pakistan, Poland, [2] Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Venezuela, Yugoslavia.

The following delegations voted against:

Australia, Belgium, France, Greece, Lebanon, Netherlands, New Zealand, Paraguay, Philippines, Sweden, Syria, United Kingdom, United States of America, Uruguay.

The following delegations abstained:

Afghanistan, Bolivia, Brazil, Canada, China, Panama, Peru.

(b) Cuban amendment worded as follows:

“Every person who works has the right to receive such remuneration as will, in proportion to his capacity and skill, assure him a standard of living suitable for himself and his family.”

which was adopted by 18 votes to 17, with 7 abstentions; 16 members were absent.

The following delegations voted in favour:

Argentina, Brazil, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Chile, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Dominican Republic, Ethiopia, Haiti, Mexico, Panama, Peru, Poland, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Uruguay, Venezuela, Yugoslavia.

The following delegations voted against:

Australia, Belgium, Bolivia, China, Denmark, France, Greece, India, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Pakistan, Philippines, Sweden, Syria, United Kingdom, United States of America.

The following delegations abstained:

Afghanistan, Burma, Canada, Guatemala, Honduras, Lebanon, Paraguay.

Observation: Amendments (a) and (b), which had been adopted constituted a new text for Article 21 paragraph 2. At its 141st meeting, the Third Committee by a vote on the paragraph as a whole adopted it by 17 votes to 16, with 5 abstentions.

(c) Second Cuban amendment worded as follows:

“4. Every person has the right to follow his vocation freely in so far as existing conditions of employment permit.”

which was adopted by 22 votes to 16, with 3 abstentions.

The following delegations voted in favour:

Afghanistan, Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Chile, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Dominican Republic, Ethiopia, Haiti, Honduras, Mexico, Panama, Paraguay, Philippines, Poland, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Uruguay, Venezuela, Yugoslavia.

[3]

The following delegations voted against:

Australia, Belgium, Canada, China, Denmark, France, Guatemala, India, Lebanon, New Zealand, Norway, Pakistan, Sweden, Syria, United Kingdom, United States of America.

The following delegations abstained:

Burma, Greece, Netherlands.

The Human Rights Commission's text of Article 21, as amended by the proposals of Cuba and the Soviet Union which had been adopted, constituted a new text (A/C.3/342), which was voted upon as a whole by the Third Committee at its 141st meeting.

This text, although adopted in all its parts, was nevertheless rejected as a whole by 17 votes to 17, with 6 abstentions.

The following delegations voted in favour:

Argentina, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Chile, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Ethiopia, Haiti, Honduras, Mexico, Poland, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Uruguay, Venezuela, Yugoslavia.

The following delegations voted against:

Australia, Belgium, Brazil, China, France, Greece, India, Lebanon, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Pakistan, Paraguay, Sweden, Turkey, United Kingdom, United States of America.

The following delegations abstained:

Afghanistan, Burma, Canada, Guatemala, Peru, Saudi Arabia.

The Third Committee then found itself in a very difficult situation for after the rejection of the amended text of Article 21 as a whole, the Declaration on Human Rights which it was now in process of drawing up would necessarily have a grave deficiency owing to the absence of an article on the rights of man as a worker.

2. Establishment and terms of reference of Sub-Committee 3

In order to find a solution for this serious problem, the representative of Peru proposed that the Committee should re-examine this article on the basis of Rule 112 of the rules of procedure. This proposal was discussed at the 142nd meeting, and the Committee decided<sup>123</sup> by 39 votes to 0 and 1 abstention, to re-examine Article 21 on the basis of Rule 112 mentioned above.

At the next meeting held on 17 November 1948, the Committee decided to set up a Drafting Sub-Committee to study the question and, if possible, prepare a text likely to meet with general approval. On the Chairman's proposal, the Committee decided that the Sub-Committee should consist of the representatives of the following 12 States Members:

Argentina, Belgium, Cuba, Ecuador, France, Greece, Lebanon, New Zealand, Poland, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Kingdom, United States of America.

This Sub-Committee's terms of reference were laid down by the Committee as follows:

"The Drafting Committee shall prepare a fresh text for Article 21, taking into account all the proposals on and amendments to this Article which have been submitted to the Committee."

II. General Discussion

At the Sub-Committee's first meeting, the Chairman, Professor René Cassin (France), reminded the delegations present of the terms of reference given them by the Third Committee. He took the view that the Sub-Committee should be concerned with three main points:

(a) the right of everyone to follow his vocation freely (question raised by one of the Cuban amendments)<sup>124</sup>;

(b) non-discrimination (question raised by the Soviet amendment);

(c) resources which the worker ought to receive (question raised by the second Cuban amendment);

The majority of the Sub-Committee agreed with the Chairman, and after some representatives, including those of Poland and Cuba, had pointed out that the discussion on these three points would be facilitated if the text to be discussed was that appearing in document A/C.3/342 (see Annex I) which contained them all, it decided to treat that document as the basic text on the clear understanding that this would not preclude the study of all the other documents referred to it by the Third Committee.

At this point in the discussion the United States delegate submitted a draft compromise text for Article 21 which read as follows:

“1. Everyone has the right to work, to free choice of employment, to just and favourable conditions of work and pay and to protection against unemployment.

2. Everyone, without discrimination, has the right to equal pay for equal work.

3. Everyone is free to form and to join trade unions for the protection of his interests.”

a. Discussion on the question of the right of everyone to follow his vocation freely

The Cuban delegate said that whilst the wording of paragraph 1 as submitted by the United States delegation was an amendment to paragraph 1 of Document A/C.3/342 involving the addition of the words “to free choice of employment”,<sup>125</sup> it expressed clearly enough the idea that everyone was entitled to follow his vocation freely. If this amendment were adopted by the Sub-Committee he would be prepared to refrain from pressing for the adoption of paragraph 4 of Document A/C.3/342, particularly as he felt that the second part of the said paragraph 4 (“in so far as existing conditions of employment permit”) expressed an idea which might be regarded as covered by Article 27 of the Declaration.

<sup>124</sup> Here the words “adopted by the Third Committee, and by a Lebanese amendment rejected by that Committee” were added by A/CN.3/363/Corr.1 of 25 November 1948.

<sup>125</sup> Here the words “(taken from an amendment submitted to the Third Committee by the Lebanese delegation)” were added by A/CN.3/363/Corr.1 of 25 November 1948.

After hearing this statement the Sub-Committee decided to adopt the first paragraph of the text proposed by the United States delegation as an amendment to the first paragraph as contained in Document A/C.3/342. As a corollary of the same decision paragraph 4 of that document was deleted.

b. Discussion on the question of non-discrimination

The delegate of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics explained why he thought that the Soviet amendment to Article 21, paragraph 2 should stand. He knew of only three kinds of discrimination as regards work: discrimination on the grounds of race, nationality and sex. In a spirit of conciliation, however, he said he would agree to broaden the reference to discrimination by changing the text of his amendment as follows:

[7]

“Without distinction as to race, nationality, sex or religion”.

He trusted that this addition would satisfy those who feared lest there might be discrimination on religious or other grounds in connection with work and wages.

The Ecuadorian representative proposed that the fresh Soviet proposal should be further emended by the addition of the word “age”.

The United States representative said that he could not regard the new Soviet amendment as a compromise. He considered the new wording as open to the same dangers as the original text of the amendment as it still contained a restrictive enumeration: it did not, for example, mention political discrimination. Wishing to compromise he proposed to add the words “without discrimination” in paragraph 2 although he thought that the paragraph was clearer without them.

The Belgian representative proposed the addition of the words, “without any discrimination”. The United States delegation accepted this amendment and withdrew its own.

Although not submitting it as a formal proposal, the Greek delegate suggested that “distinction” should be substituted for “discrimination”. He thought, however, that Article 21, paragraph 2, did not require amendment as the articles of the Declaration had to be regarded as interdependent, and that being so, Article 2 of the Declaration adequately expressed the idea that there could be no discrimination in work.

The Lebanese representative proposed any reference to discrimination should be omitted from Article 21. Article 2 of the Declaration expressed a condemnation of all discrimination which held good for all the articles. Hence, if that idea were expressly referred to in any one article, the impression might be conveyed that the other articles permitted certain discriminations.

Vote:

The Chairman proposed that the various amendments submitted should be put to the vote in the order of their remoteness from the basic text (paragraph 2 of Document A/C.3/342) i.e.: the Lebanese amendment first, then the Belgian, United States and USSR amendments.

The Lebanese amendment, i.e. to delete the words “without distinction as to race, nationality or sex”, was rejected by 5 votes to 3 with 3 abstentions.

The Belgian amendment, seconded by the United States, under which the words “without any discrimination” were to be included, was adopted by 6 votes to 4 with 1 abstention.

The following was therefore the text finally adopted by the Sub-Committee:

“Everyone, without any discrimination, has the right to equal pay for equal work”.

The USSR and Ecuadorian representatives stated that they reserved their delegations’ right to re-submit the following amendment to paragraph 2 in the Third Committee:

“Everyone, without distinction as to race, nationality, sex, age religion, etc. . . has the right to equal pay for equal work.”

c. Debate on the question of the resources to be received by a worker

The second part of Article 21, paragraph 2, which had been adopted in sections by the Third Committee but rejected as a whole, was long debated in the Sub-Committee. Some delegations, including those of the United Kingdom and the United States, were against including the text approved by the Third Committee; they said a compromise text was not absolutely necessary as Article 21, paragraph 1, and the text of Article 22 of the Declaration covered, between them, all the ideas contained in the debated clause.

Other delegations, such as the Belgian and Cuban delegations, were in favour of a text containing the idea that every worker should, as such, be guaranteed not only a just remuneration for his work, but also, where necessary for the needs of his family, other resources to assure him a decent standard of living in all circumstances, The USSR delegate maintained that the idea of a minimum salary should be expressed in the text. After a long and complex debate, during which many draft texts were submitted, the Committee adopted the following text:

“Everyone who works has the right to just and favourable remuneration supplemented if necessary by such other means of social protection as may be required to meet the needs of his family.”

The expression “of social protection” was an additional amendment proposed by Ecuador, which was adopted by 5 votes to 2 with 4 abstentions.

The above text was adopted by 6 votes to 2 with 3 abstentions. The voting was as follows: in favour: Belgium, Cuba, Ecuador, France, Poland and the Soviet Union; against: the United Kingdom and the United States of America; abstentions: Argentina, Greece and New Zealand.

Considering that the idea of just and favourable remuneration which figured in the last text adopted was a repetition of the same idea as was [9] already contained in Article 21, paragraph 1, and considering also that it was better to devote one paragraph to everything concerning pay, the Sub-Committee decided<sup>126</sup> to delete from paragraph 1 the words “and pay”, which were redundant, This deletion was agreed by 7 votes to 0 with 4 abstentions.

d. Discussion on Paragraph 3

The Sub-Committee also examined the New Zealand delegation’s observations on the wording of Article 21, paragraph 3. It was agreed, by 10 votes and 1 abstention that paragraph 3 should be worded as follows:

“Everyone has the right to form and to join trade unions for the protection of his interests.”

Document A/C.3/342 and the text adopted by the Sub-Committee are annexed to the present report (Annexes I and II).

MISS ZULOAGA (Venezuela) said she had thoroughly examined the principles stated in article 25. The Government of Venezuela regarded as one of its most important duties the development of the cultural level of the masses in order to enable every citizen to enjoy scientific, literary and artistic works. Consequently the Venezuela delegation could not fail to approve the principle of the joint amendment of Cuba, France and Mexico (A/C.3/360). It would vote in favour of the amendment, and would have all the more pleasure in doing so because the terms were identical with those of the corresponding article in the American Declaration of the Rights and Duties of Man.

MR. CHANG (China) drew the attention of the members of the Committee to the last part of article 25, particularly the words “and to share in scientific advancement”. As various delegations, in particular that of France, had already pointed out, not only must the right to share in the benefits of scientific advancement be guaranteed to everyone but also the right to participate in the work of scientific creation. In the arts, letters and sciences alike, aesthetic enjoyment had a dual aspect: a purely passive aspect when man appreciates beauty and an active aspect when he creates it. In this connexion Mr. Chang indicated that the expression “participate in” or “share in” did not express this dual aspect as precisely as it might. The text referred more clearly to creation than to passive enjoyment. He therefore proposed the addition, at the end of the first paragraph, of the words “and its benefits” (A/C.3/361).

After stating that his delegation accepted the Peruvian amendment (150th meeting) proposing insertion of the word “freely” before the word “participate” in the first paragraph, he suggested a few drafting changes in the second paragraph [628] of the joint amendment of Cuba, France and Mexico. The second paragraph would then read:

“Everyone has the right to the protection of the moral and material interests resulting from any scientific, literary or artistic production of which he is the author.”

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) thanked the Chinese delegation for having clarified and improved the original text of the joint amendment. His delegation was glad to accept those changes, together with the amendment suggested by the Peruvian representative.

He pointed out that, as the Belgian representative had already observed, intellectual works could not be placed in the same category as other forms of property. Men of learning and artists live in special conditions in which material considerations had only a limited importance. It was necessary to recognize that fact and to guarantee equitable protection for those persons.

Further, the purpose of the joint amendment was not merely to protect creative artists but to safeguard the interests of everyone, as the Chinese representative had proposed. As Paul Valéry had said, a distinction could be made in literature, art and science between producers and “consumers”. The interests of both must be considered. Therefore, literary, artistic and scientific works should be made accessible to the people directly and in their original form: this could only be done if the moral rights of the creative artist were protected.

The Cuban delegation did not consider the USSR amendment (E/800, page 35) acceptable. It expressed an idea so vague and general that it could be interpreted in very different ways. It could be interpreted as meaning that science should be made to serve objectives determined by States or Governments. But the Cuban delegation was convinced that science should remain entirely free and that the State should not interfere at any stage in scientific or literary creation. On the contrary, it was democracy which should be placed at the service of science, the latter itself the servant of truth. Those who had faith in man could not fear truth. That was the spirit underlying the declaration of human rights.

MR. BAROODY (Saudi Arabia) approved the principle underlying article 25 and was prepared to accept the wording of the original text of the draft declaration. But as certain delegations had pointed out, that text was not sufficiently clear, because the expression "participate" could lead to misunderstanding and did not clearly specify that it applied both to the enjoyment of the benefits resulting from science and the enjoyment of artistic, scientific or literary creation. The majority of human beings did not possess within themselves the power to create, but everyone had within him an aesthetic sense which he should have the opportunity of satisfying.

For those reasons Mr. Baroody proposed that the text of article 25 should be altered either by adding, after the words "in scientific advance-[629]ment" the words "and in the resulting benefits", or by adding after the word "share" the words "in the results of scientific advancement". If those suggestions were not accepted by the Committee, the delegation of Saudi Arabia would vote in favour of the Cuban delegation's text and if the latter were not approved it would support that of the Chinese delegation.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) was astonished that truly democratic countries such as Argentina could experience any difficulty in accepting the principle that science should be placed at the service of democracy. To overcome this difficulty he suggested that his delegation's amendment should be put to the vote in two parts. The Committee would vote first on that principle and then on the rest of the amendment.

He thought it insufficient to state that science should serve the interests of human beings. The real problem consisted in defining the direction to be given to scientific research. Should scientific advancement be placed at the service of peaceful world progress or should it, on the contrary, be placed at the service of the forces of destruction and war? Unfortunately, the latter tendency seemed to prevail in the present state of world affairs. If science were thus placed at the service of the forces of destruction, it was to be feared that it might completely destroy all forms of human culture.

Citing extracts from the United States Press, he pointed out that in that country scientific research was controlled by the military authorities and developed for military purposes. In 1938 the Army and Navy budget for scientific research was 40 million dollars of which 23 million were allocated directly to the various universities. In 1944 that budget amounted to 90 million dollars and in 1947 to over 96 millions. In the circumstances, Mr. Pavlov thought that there was a danger of disinterested scientific research ceasing to exist. The universities were transformed into veritable laboratories of research for military purposes. Men of learning found their personal freedom restricted. For instance, according to the New York Times, Dr. Mundt of Chicago University, who was engaged in atomic energy research, had asked the Atomic Energy Commission whether it would be possible for him to fulfil other duties without running the risk of imprisonment or of being considered a traitor to his country.

The USSR delegation protested against such methods and appealed to all delegations to support its amendment, the sole objective of which was to place science at the service of the forces of peace.

MR. BEAUFORT (Netherlands) favoured the adoption of the joint amendment submitted by the delegations of Cuba, France and Mexico. The Netherlands delegation considered that the principle stated therein was of sufficient importance to justify the addition of a paragraph to the original [630] text of article 25. The problem of safeguarding intellectual product had frequently been discussed. In that connexion he mentioned the example of Mrs. Marie Curie who had devoted her whole life to the progress of science for the good of humanity.

It was incorrect to consider the protection of the moral and material interests of the creative artist or the scientist on the same level as the general right of property; the former was more abstract and, more than any other, lent itself to infringement.

MR. WATT (Australia), on behalf of his delegation, accepted the amendment by the delegation of Peru (150th meeting). He pointed out, however, that the suggested addition of the word "freely" was not wholly indispensable in view of the fact that once the right of the individual to take part in the cultural life of the community was assured, the opportunities freely to exercise that right were implicitly guaranteed.

The Australian delegation would be unable to accept the USSR amendment which subordinated scientific research to a political principle; the sole aim of science could only be the quest for truth, as the Belgian representative had pointed out (150th meeting).

It could not accept the amendment submitted jointly by the delegations of Cuba, France and Mexico. The rights of artists and scientists must certainly be protected, but the problem was to discover how and by whom. That would seem to be primarily the concern of national legislation complemented by international conventions. In a declaration such as that which the Committee was called upon to draft, the indisputable rights of the intellectual worker could not appear beside fundamental rights of a more general nature, such as freedom of thought, religious freedom or the right to work.

MR. CASSIN (France) approved the proposal of the representative of China to add the words “and its benefits” at the end of the first paragraph. Those words were preferable to the Cuban amendment since they avoided all ambiguity concerning the right to participate not only in scientific research but also in the benefits resulting from it.

With regard to paragraph 2, he reminded the representative of Australia that the provisions of article 20 dealt with the means of ensuring the protection of the rights of the intellectual worker for which the representative of the Netherlands had expressed concern. The French delegation did not think that there was need to fear that difficulties might arise on that point. In its opinion the protection of the moral and material interests of the artist and the scientist should not be dealt with in concrete terms in the declaration; however, the fact that there were so few creative geniuses did not obviate the need for a specific reference in the declaration.

The French delegation regretted that it would have to vote against the USSR amendment. It would have approved the principle embodied in it were it not for the apprehension that that principle might be invoked to justify the harnessing of science to political ends. He agreed with Mr. [631] Pavlov that science must be put at the service of progress and of peace, but believed that the problem raised by the USSR delegation fell outside the framework of the declaration of human rights.

The French delegation would vote in favour of the amendment suggested by the delegation of Peru (150th meeting).

MR. LITAUER (Poland) stated that his delegation unreservedly supported the amendment submitted by the USSR.

It was surprising that the United States delegation should consider that amendment out of place when it proclaimed that science was to serve the interests of progress and democracy, the cause of international peace and co-operation. The United States delegation seemed to think that the word “democracy” in particular lent itself to varying interpretations: there had been no divergence of views on that subject at the time when Poland had fought against Hitler in defence of democracy, when the whole world had applauded the victories of the Red Army, when President Roosevelt had proclaimed the four fundamental freedoms. Poland interpreted the word “democracy” in the same sense as it attributed to it five years earlier, in the same sense as Abraham Lincoln had in his famous definition of government as being of the people, for the people, by the people. That was why it considered that science if placed at the service of democracy, could not but promote the interests of humanity.

The example given by the representative of the Netherlands of Mrs. Curie-Sklodowska, the great Polish woman who devoted her life to the cause of science and whose research benefited the whole of humanity, was yet another argument in favour of the adoption of the USSR amendment.

In view of the doubts expressed by certain representatives on the subject of the word "democracy", he would suggest that the vote on the USSR amendment be taken phrase by phrase, the Committee voting in turn on each of the four main concepts it contained: progress, democracy, the cause of international peace and co-operation.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) recalled that his delegation had been the first to propose that the declaration should mention the right of every person to participate in the benefits of scientific advancement. That was the core of the amendment submitted by the Cuban delegation; actually it did no more than restate in broader terms the principles adopted by the Inter-American Juridical Committee. That text, with the changes suggested by the representative of China which removed all ambiguity, was perfectly in accordance with the point of view of the Chilean delegation. It would therefore vote for it.

Chile would also support the amendment suggested at the preceding meeting by the Peruvian delegation.

As for the USSR amendment, although fully in agreement with the principles that it stated, the Chilean delegation felt that in the form in which it was drafted it might in practice lead to the control of scientific research for political ends. The [632] Chilean delegation would consequently be unable to vote for it.

For the same reasons as those given by the representative of Australia, it would also be unable to accept the joint amendment of Cuba, France and Mexico. To what extent would it be possible in a country where there existed no law protecting authors' copyright and patents, to speak of the infringement of fundamental human rights in the case of a man of letters whose works were reproduced without his consent? The concept of the protection of intellectual work conflicted to a certain extent with that of freedom of access to all literary, artistic or scientific output. Since the joint amendment referred not to one of the fundamental human rights, but to rights affecting a special category of persons, the Chilean delegation considered that it should not be included in the declaration.

MR. CARTER (Canada) expressed his approval of the principle of the joint amendment submitted by Cuba, France and Mexico. Since it concerned authors' copyright and patents, he considered, however, that it should be dealt with in the covenant rather than in the declaration. To ensure the support of world public opinion for the declaration of human rights, it must be drafted in such a manner as to be simple, direct and generally applicable.

The Canadian delegation would therefore vote for the original text of article 25 as modified by the amendments of the representatives of China and Peru.

Summary Record of the Hundred and Fifty-Second Meeting
[of the Third Committee]

Held at the Palais de Chaillot, Paris, on Monday,
22 November 1948, at 3 p.m.

Chairman: MR. CHARLES MALIK (Lebanon).

MR. DEMCHENKO (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) stated that the rights stated in article 25 might be achieved if culture, science and education were made available to the masses, as in his country; when the means of production were owned by the people, the application of science to the needs of the people became possible.

In many countries, science and education were made to serve the cause of propaganda and to spread racial theories; articles published in the United States showed that science in that country had been placed under military control, whereas it should serve the interests of peace and progress. That was the aim of the USSR amendment (E/800, page 35), though some representatives had claimed that it constituted a limitation and placed science under political control. Some representatives apparently did not consider that science should serve the aims of peace; they believed in [633] it for military purposes and did not want to change the present state of affairs. Mr. Demchenko quoted United States publications to show that in the United States there was increasing military control in science, education and industry. The war propaganda which was being carried on in a number of countries had the support of certain representatives.

It would be a great mistake for the Committee to reject the USSR amendment; the adoption of such provisions was what humanity expected of the Committee.

MR. CHANG (China) said that the text which appeared in document A/C.3/361 had been attributed to the Chinese delegation. It was really a combined text: the insertion of the word “freely” was a Peruvian suggestion, the addition of the words “and its benefits” had been suggested by the Chinese delegation, and the second paragraph was really a joint Cuban, French and Mexican proposal. He asked that the second paragraph should be voted upon separately.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) asked that the vote on his amendment should be taken in the following manner: first, on the sentence: “The development of science must serve the interests of progress”; secondly, on the phrase: “and the cause of international peace and co-operation”; and thirdly, on the words “and democracy”. He requested a vote by roll-call, in view of the great significance the article had for the cause of peace.

A vote on the first part of the USSR amendment was taken by roll-call as follows:

The USSR, having been drawn by lot by the Chairman, was called upon to vote first. In favour: Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Yugoslavia, Argentina, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Colombia, Czechoslovakia, Ecuador, India, Iran, Poland, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic.

Against: United Kingdom, United States of America, Uruguay, Afghanistan, Australia, Belgium, Brazil, Canada, Chile, China, Denmark, France, Greece, Honduras, Lebanon, Luxembourg, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Panama, Peru, Philippines, Sweden, Syria.

Abstaining: Venezuela, Yemen, Cuba, Dominican Republic, Mexico, Pakistan, Saudi Arabia.

The first part was rejected by 24 votes to 11, with 7 abstentions.

A vote on the part of the USSR amendment reading: “(The development of science must serve the interests of) democracy” was taken by roll-call as follows:

Norway, having been drawn by lot by the Chairman, was called upon to vote first.

In favour: Poland, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Yugoslavia, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Colombia, Czechoslovakia, Ecuador, India.

[634]

Against: Norway, Panama, Peru, Philippines, Sweden, Syria, United Kingdom, United States of America, Uruguay, Afghanistan, Australia, Belgium, Brazil, Canada, Chile, China, Cuba, Denmark, Dominican Republic, France, Greece, Honduras, Lebanon, Luxembourg, Netherlands, New Zealand.

Abstaining: Pakistan, Saudi Arabia, Venezuela, Yemen, Argentina, Iran, Mexico.

That part of the amendment was rejected by 26 votes to 9, with 7 abstentions.

A vote on the part of the USSR amendment reading: “(The development of science must serve) the cause of international peace and co-operation” was taken by roll-call as follows:

India, having been drawn by lot by the Chairman, was called upon to vote first.

In favour: India, Poland, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Yugoslavia, Argentina, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Colombia, Czechoslovakia, Ecuador.

Against: Lebanon, Luxembourg, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Panama, Peru, Philippines, Sweden, Syria, United Kingdom, United States of America, Uruguay, Afghanistan, Australia, Belgium, Brazil, Canada, Chile, China, Denmark, Dominican Republic, France, Greece, Honduras.

Abstaining: Iran, Mexico, Pakistan, Saudi Arabia, Venezuela, Yemen, Cuba.

That part of the amendment was rejected by 25 votes to 10, with 7 abstentions.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba), referring to document A/C.3/361, remarked that the French text would be clearer if the words au progrès scientifique were followed by the phrase et aux bienfaits qui en résultent.

That suggestion was accepted.

The insertion of the word "freely" in the compromise text was adopted by 38 votes to none, with 2 abstentions.

The insertion of the words "and its benefits" was adopted unanimously.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) stated that, as the words just voted upon had no meaning in the Russian text, his delegation had been unable to participate in the vote.

The first paragraph of article 25, as amended, was adopted unanimously.

A vote on the second paragraph of article 25 was taken by roll-call as follows:

Panama, having been drawn by lot by the Chairman, was called upon to vote first.

In favour: Panama, Peru, Poland, Uruguay, Venezuela, Argentina, Belgium, Brazil, China, Colombia, Cuba, Dominican Republic, France, Greece, Honduras, Luxembourg, Mexico, Netherlands.

Against: Sweden, Syria, United Kingdom, United States of America, Yemen, Australia, Canada, Chile, Denmark, Ecuador, India, Norway, Pakistan.

Abstaining: Saudi Arabia, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Yugoslavia, Afghanistan, Byelorussian [635] Soviet Socialist Republic, Czechoslovakia, Lebanon, New Zealand, Philippines.

The second paragraph of article 25 was adopted by 18 votes to 13, with 10 abstentions.

The verbal amendment made by the representative of Ecuador to add the words "or the heir" to the second paragraph was rejected by 21 votes to 7, with 12 abstentions.

The whole of article 25 (A/C.3/361), as amended, was adopted by 36 votes to none, with 4 abstentions.

MR. LUNDE (Norway) stated that he had voted in favour of the first paragraph as amended because that text, thanks to the skilful drafting of the Chinese representative, was very well phrased.

He had voted against the second paragraph because he felt that the subject should be dealt with in the covenant or in special treaties rather than in the declaration.

He had voted against the USSR amendment, although his delegation was sincerely and strongly in favour of progress, democracy and the cause of international peace and co-operation; however, it also believed unconditionally in the freedom of science and was opposed to limiting that freedom on any pretext. It had been unable to accept an amendment which it considered reactionary and out of place in the declaration.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) had opposed the second paragraph of article 25; he had, nevertheless, voted in favour of the article as a whole as the principle involved in the second paragraph was not sufficiently important to warrant rejection of the entire article.

MR. CARRERA ANDRADE (Ecuador) had voted in favour of the USSR amendment in the firm conviction that science should serve the interests of life rather than death, of peace rather than war. In so doing, he had considered only the ideas, and not, as other delegations appeared to have done, political matters.

He regretted that his amendment to the second paragraph had been rejected because that paragraph now was less comprehensive than legislation existing in most countries. It would have been preferable, in general, not to include in the declaration a right to which only a small minority of mankind was entitled.

MR. PLAZA (Venezuela) had abstained from voting on the USSR amendment although he agreed with the ideas expressed in it, because words like "progress" and "democracy" unless defined in legal terms, might be misinterpreted and used to defend persecution of scientists for political reasons.

MR. KAYALY (Syria) had voted in favour of the first paragraph because he fully agreed with the ideas it contained.

He had not supported the second paragraph because he felt that its subject matter should be dealt with either in the covenant or in separate treaties.

He had opposed the USSR amendment because he considered that the ideas it expressed would be out of place in the declaration; they might well, however, form the subject matter of a resolution to be adopted either by the First Committee or by the Security Council. Should such a resolution be adopted and observed, the need for an armaments race would be obviated and true international peace and co-operation would result.

MR. GRAZIADIO (Argentina) had voted in favour of the USSR amendment in the conviction that science should indeed serve the interests of progress and international peace. His delegation was, nevertheless, satisfied with the article as adopted and particularly happy that the substance of the Cuban and Mexican amendments had been approved by the Committee. In its final form, the article should serve as a source of inspiration for States wishing to improve their legislation on the subject.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) remarked that he had defended his amendment because he was firmly convinced that it outlined the ends which modern science should serve. It was illogical to include in article 23 a definition of the purposes of education and to refuse in article 25 to lay down a similar definition of the purposes of science. It should not be forgotten that science in the modern world could and often did serve the interests of aggression and reaction and was elaborating means for massacring peaceful populations.

The foremost representatives of culture and science were, in fact, beginning to realize that the concept of the neutrality of science had become obsolete and that they were forced to choose between working for peace and working for war. It was in that spirit that thirty-two American scientists had recently protested against their work being used to further not progress but destruction.

It was the duty of the United Nations under the Charter to promote the development of science and to prevent it from becoming the handmaiden of militarism. He consequently regretted that, on various pretexts, the USSR amendment had been rejected.

MISS BERNARDINO (Dominican Republic), referring to the comment of the representative of Ecuador, said that her delegation had on a number of previous occasions, when it had been in agreement with the principles involved, voted in favour of amendments submitted by the USSR representative. At the current meeting it had voted against the USSR amendment because it did not wish to impose any restrictions on the free development of science which should serve all the interests of humanity.

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) had voted in favour of the first paragraph as amended, but against the second paragraph, holding it unwise to introduce that particular subject [637] in the declaration. She had, nevertheless, supported the whole article. She had voted against the USSR amendment because she and her delegation felt strongly that science, art and literature should be free from government control.

In reply to a remark by the Ukrainian representative, she observed that although during the war science in the United States had been placed at the service of the Government, and it might be recalled that all the Allies, including the USSR, had profited therefrom, science was no longer under any control.

She quoted a statement from a recent article in a USSR publication to the effect that all the efforts of the Academy of Sciences should be directed towards the building of Communism. The United States delegation did not agree that cultural activities such as literature, music or science should be directed.

MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) stated that he had voted against the USSR amendment. While, on the face of it, an amendment which said that science should serve the interests of progress, democracy and peace was eminently acceptable, it might be interpreted as a restriction on the freedom of thought and research. The vote cast by the Uruguayan delegation had consequently applied exclusively to the principle involved.

MR. BARODY (Saudi Arabia) had abstained from voting on the USSR amendment for three reasons. In many cases, it might take generations to determine whether a certain action had or had not been conducive to progress; since there existed two strongly divergent views as regards the meaning of the word "democracy" it would be better not to use it until the views had been reconciled; and finally, while science plainly should serve the interests of international peace and cooperation, that statement by itself would not have been sufficiently comprehensive and was superfluous.

MRS. CORBET (United Kingdom) had voted against the USSR amendment not because she disagreed with the ideas it contained, but because she did not think it fitted in with the rest of the article. Her delegation considered all amendments not as separate statements of principle, but in relation to the articles in which they were to appear and to the declaration as a whole. Her negative vote should consequently not be misconstrued as applying to the principle involved.

She had voted against the second paragraph on the same grounds. As it had been adopted by the Committee, however, she had voted in favour of the article as a whole.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) had voted against the USSR amendment because he felt it confused the true aims of science with its accidental results. It was true that those results should be put to the service of peace and progress; to say that, however, without at the same time stating that the purpose of science was to enquire into the mysteries of nature in the search for truth was to distort the meaning of science.

He had voted in favour of the first paragraph as amended, but had abstained on the second paragraph because he did not think that a right to which only a minority could be entitled should appear in a declaration of the general rights of individuals.

MRS. NEWLANDS (New Zealand) had abstained from voting on the second paragraph because she considered that its subject matter was fully covered in article 15, which referred to the right to own property, and because she thought that in an article dealing with the cultural life of the community the emphasis should be placed on the community as a whole rather than on isolated members of it. She had nevertheless voted in favour of the article as a whole.

THE CHAIRMAN, in opening the general debate on article 26, remarked that the Egyptian amendment (A/C.3/264) which called for the deletion of the article would not be put to the vote as such; those who wished to support it could vote against the article as a whole.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) stated, in introducing his amendment to article 26 (E/800, page 35), that he thought the word “good” should be deleted because, even should all the rights and freedoms set out in the declaration be fully realized, there was still no ground to conclude that the resulting social and international order would necessarily be good.

Indeed, the formal proclamation and even the formal realization of a right did not necessarily mean much in practice. The principle of equality had once been of the greatest importance; it had led to the abolition of serfdom and slavery. There existed at present a formalized concept of equality which was generally accepted. It was a far cry, however, from that equality – the equality of the rich and the poor, of capital and labour – to real social justice and a really good social order. The same might be said of a number of other rights contained in the declaration, such as the right to freedom of association; it, too, would be devoid of meaning unless proper facilities were available for its realization.

In the view of the USSR delegation, as long as society was divided into exploiters and the exploited, as long as there was private ownership of the means of production, the social order could not possibly be a good one. The USSR was not asking the Committee to approve its social order. What it did ask was that, since two conflicting views were involved, there should be no moral evaluation in the declaration of either order and that the final verdict should be left to history.

It would be preferable to avoid an ideological discussion and to delete the word “good”, because it represented an evaluation which the new democracies, in the name of millions of workers and indigenous inhabitants of colonies, in the name of posterity itself, felt bound to reject.

MR. CARRERA ANDRADE (Ecuador) supported the Egyptian amendment. It was quite impossible for any individual to lay claim in an effective manner to the right granted in article 26. It was therefore preferable to delete the article.

MR. LUNDE (Norway) supported the USSR amendment, not because he agreed with the arguments advanced by the representative of that country but in the interests of better drafting.

He would, however, prefer the deletion of article 26, as it was rather tenuous in meaning and failed to confer any specific right.

MRS. CORBET (United Kingdom) said that while she could not agree with all the arguments advanced by the USSR representative, she thought his amendment would improve the text, and was consequently prepared to vote for it. It was not necessary both to define the phrase “social and international order” and to give it a qualifying adjective.

MR. ENCINAS (Peru) agreed with the United Kingdom representative. A social and international order under which all the rights set out in the declaration were fully realizable was good by implication.

He thought that the words “and freedoms” should be deleted, since they might lead to confusion. Throughout the declaration only rights had been mentioned; to introduce the word “freedoms” at that point would merely create unnecessary ambiguity.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) drew the Committee’s attention to the fact that the first twenty-five articles of the declaration dealt with individual rights, while article 26 was concerned with general principles. It set forth the ultimate conditions necessary for the realization of those rights. For that reason he supported the original text of article 26.

During wartime, certain rights had to be curtailed for reasons of national security. It was necessary, however, to ensure that the basic rights laid down in the declaration would be guaranteed in any circumstances. That was the purpose of article 26.

He understood the expression “good social and international order” not to apply to any particular system, whether capitalist or socialist. It was possible that no good order had as yet been found, but it was appropriate to state that human beings had faith and hope in the possibility of such an order being established.

MR. CASSIN (France) agreed with the Lebanese representative’s remarks to the effect that article 26 stated a general and not an individual right. In that regard, it closely resembled the provisions of article 19, paragraph 3 of the basic text. He was not satisfied with the form of the article, but could not accept the Egyptian representative’s suggestion for its deletion.

Certain preliminary conditions had to be laid down to ensure the implementation of the rights contained in the declaration. As the Mexican representative had pointed out in regard to the earlier article, the individual had to be granted the possibility of legal action in respect of the violation of one of his fundamental rights. For that reason, he supported the point of view of the Norwegian, Peruvian and United Kingdom representatives and would vote for the USSR amendment.

MR. WATT (Australia) was not convinced of the necessity to retain article 26. In his opinion, it did not say more than that the rights set forth in the declaration should be achieved. Furthermore, the principle was already covered by the provisions of the final two paragraphs of the preamble. Unlike the representative of the Soviet Union, he had never considered article 26 as endorsing the capitalist system, but for drafting reasons he would accept the USSR amendment.

MR. MAYBANK (Canada) supported the remarks of the Norwegian, Peruvian and United Kingdom representatives concerning the Soviet Union amendment. If the vote were to be taken on the basis of the USSR representative's arguments, however, he would not be able to vote for it. Should the rights set forth in the declaration be achieved the social and international order would be good, whether it came within the framework of capitalism, communism, feudalism or any other system. On that understanding, he would vote for the USSR amendment.

Although he could not accept the USSR representative's arguments, MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) would vote for his amendment because it improved the form of the article. The article itself was necessary because it allowed the individual a voice in international affairs.

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) could accept article 26 as it now read because she considered that a good social and international order was necessary for the achievement of the rights set forth in the declaration. She had no objections to the USSR amendment, although she considered it unnecessary. Any order which permitted individuals to achieve the rights and freedoms set out in the declaration would obviously be a good one and the adoption of the USSR amendment would not mean the endorsement of any particular political or social system. If the wording of the article would be improved thereby, she was prepared to accept the Soviet Union amendment.

MR. AQUINO (Philippines) felt that the USSR amendment provided an object lesson in democracy; it implied the right to agree to disagree, and to disagree to agree. He could not accept the USSR representative's arguments for his amendment, but because such a social and international order would necessarily be a good one, he would support it.

It was true that the provisions of article 26 were already covered in the preamble, but it was necessary to state them in the body of the declaration in order to give them substantive force.

MR. BARODY (Saudi Arabia) did not consider it necessary to include article 26, because it did not state an individual right and was already covered by the provisions of the preamble. Should the Committee decide to retain it, however, he would support it as amended by the USSR representative.

MRS. NEWLANDS (New Zealand) said she understood that article 26 had been drafted as an "umbrella" article and as a compromise measure to avoid specific reference to the duties of the State. She would not raise any objections to the article, therefore, and although she did not share the reasons put forward by the USSR representative, she would support his amendment.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) understood article 26 to mean that the individual had the right to the implementation of all the articles of the declaration. However, it was clumsily drafted and perhaps should be deleted. If it were to be maintained, it would have to be in the form suggested by the USSR delegation.

The Lebanese representative had rightly referred to the aspirations of the masses for better conditions of life. Those aspirations were usually associated with the socialist order with its lack of class distinction, exploitation or slavery. The capitalist order was one of the most dangerous for the masses and the efforts of its protagonists would not be able to save it. The desire for socialism and its realization in certain countries could not be ignored and, therefore, it should be referred to in connexion with "a good social and international order". Any such suggestion, however, would give rise to an ideological discussion and he had, therefore, contented himself with suggesting the deletion of the word "good".

MR. KAYALY (Syria) did not agree that article 26 should be deleted because it was covered by the provisions of the preamble. It was an introduction to article 27 and also contained a new concept of human rights. He agreed, however, that there was no need to retain the qualifying adjective, because any such social and international order would be a good one.

MR. CHANG (China) was not at all sure that the word "social" did not include the idea of "international". Nor was he convinced that article 26 could be claimed to be a statement of a right. In his opinion, it would be wiser to postpone a decision on article 26 until the Committee had considered articles 27 and 28.

MR. DEMCHENKO (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) agreed that article 26 did give rise to certain misgivings. The Lebanese representative had suggested leaving it as it stood in the hope that a good social and international order would eventually be established. The basic text was [642] inaccurate, particularly from the point of view of certain delegations, and it actually raised an ideological issue.

There was general support for an order in which all men were equal and in which the workers had the wealth in their own hands. That could be seen from the provisions of article 21. His delegation, among others, was anxious that the declaration should not justify a mere formal equality. It did not press for a reference to its own social order; on the other hand, it did not want to be asked to express approval of any other system. Accordingly, the article could only be adopted in the form proposed by the USSR delegation. Otherwise it should be deleted.

THE CHAIRMAN put the USSR amendment to the vote.

The amendment was adopted by 34 votes to 2, with 2 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN then put to the vote the Peruvian proposal for the deletion of the words "and freedoms".

The proposal was rejected by 23 votes to 3, with 10 abstentions.

On the request of the representative of Saudi Arabia, the Chairman put to the vote article 26 reading as follows:

“Everyone is entitled to a social order in which the rights and freedoms set out in this Declaration can be fully realized.”

That part was adopted by 32 votes to 2, with 4 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN then called for a vote on the insertion of the words “and international” after the word “social”.

That suggestion was adopted by 26 votes to 2, with 9 abstentions.

Article 26 as a whole as amended was adopted by 25 votes to 3, with 8 abstentions.

The meeting rose at 6:05 p.m.

Summary Record of the Hundred and Fifty-Third Meeting [of the Third Committee]

Held at the Palais de Chaillot, Paris, on Tuesday,
23 November 1948, at 3:20 p.m.

Chairman: MR. CHARLES MALIK (Lebanon).

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) said that the purpose of his amendment (A/C.3/261) was to emphasize the relationship between rights and duties. As it read, article 27 tended to give too much importance to the individualistic side of man's character.

MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) said his amendment (A/C.3/268) attempted to introduce two clear ideas into the text of article 27. The first was that fundamental human rights could only be curtailed by law; and the second that such laws could only be passed when required on the grounds of morality, public order and general welfare in a democratic society.

The amendment would protect personal liberty, in so far as the support of public opinion would be needed to limit human rights. It would always be easier for a Government to close down one newspaper than to have a general law censoring the Press. The latter measure, which the Uruguayan amendment would make necessary, would arouse a much greater reaction among the people of the country concerned.

The basic text was not sufficiently strong. It should make clear that human rights could only be restricted for certain specific reasons, and that while it was necessary to have a police force to maintain public order, police powers could only be exercised in conformity with the laws of the country.

MR. CASSIN (France) had felt that the concise original text of paragraph 1 might give rise to certain misunderstandings and therefore had proposed a re-wording of it (A/C.3/345). There was no intention to deny the close relationship between rights and duties in either the original or the new French text.

It had also seemed to him that the provisions of paragraph 2 could, as the Uruguayan representative had already pointed out, give rise to certain arbitrary acts. The law did not always ensure the protection of human rights, however, and he, therefore, proposed the insertion of the word "legitimate" before "requirements".

The proposed addition to paragraph 2 was intended to make clear that the individual belonged to the international community as well as to his own national society and that the interests of that organized international community were the same as his own. Furthermore, in a general article dealing with the limitations on human rights and freedoms, it had seemed appropriate to include a reference to the purposes and principles of the United Nations.

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) pointed out that article 2 referred to both rights and freedoms and that therefore it was necessary to insert the words “and freedoms” in paragraph 2 of article 27. It was generally acknowledged that individual liberty had to be balanced with the liberty of other individuals and with the reasonable demands of the community. If there were no article 27, it would have been necessary to lay down specific limitations in the earlier articles of the declaration.

She could accept the New Zealand amendment (A/C.3/267), because the idea of morality and public order were included in the concept of general welfare. The USSR amendment (E/800, page 35) was unnecessary, because the requirements of the democratic State were covered by the reference to the requirements of democratic society. She did not object to the Cuban amendment which had been taken from the preamble of [644] the Bogotá Declaration, but felt that it went into too much irrelevant detail.

While possessing the merit of introducing a reference to the purposes and principles of the United Nations, the Egyptian amendment (A/C.3/264) would, in her opinion, simply create confusion. She also preferred the language that had been used by the French representative in referring to the United Nations. She could not accept the French proposal to insert the word “legitimate” because it could mean “legal” as well as “reasonable”. The language of the Uruguayan amendment was too restrictive when it was remembered that there was often a difference of opinion regarding what was strictly legal and what was just. She was sure that the Uruguayan representative had not intended to exclude the concept of moral force from article 27, but that actually would be the effect of his amendment.

Most United States laws concerning human rights had stemmed from executive or legislative action, with the addition of legal interpretations from the courts.

She could not accept the Chilean amendment (A/C.3/304/Rev.1/Add.1), as it also might unduly restrict the provisions of article 27. Furthermore, the word “solidarity” was not generally used in that sense except in the Western hemisphere. The concept of national sovereignty and solidarity also might be used to justify arbitrary acts.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) pointed out that article 27 referred to all the previous articles and that for the declaration as a whole to be properly balanced, it was necessary to draft article 27 correctly. The rights of the individual having been set forth, it was time to refer to his duties. It was impossible for the individual to be free of society, for man was a social being. The most important task therefore in promoting human progress was to find the proper balance between the interests of the individual and the interests of society.

The proper co-ordination of the interests of the individual and society was only possible under a socialist regime. All the rights laid down in the declaration would be implemented in democratic societies by the democratic States. The law was nothing without the machinery to implement it and, at the present time, that machinery was the State. It was impossible, therefore, to ignore the requirements of the democratic State.

There was, of course, the old type of democratic State, as well as the new, and also fascist States like Franco Spain. Representatives of countries such as his own, however, did not consider that the State was hostile to the individual. It represented the interests of the people, it had put an end to exploitation and it had established harmony between the workers and the peasants. In the Soviet Union, all authority rested in the hands of the masses of the workers.

It was all the more necessary to establish a proper balance between individual and collective rights in view of the sad experience of certain countries which had so easily become the victims [645] of Nazism. The requirements of the democratic State, therefore, could not be forgotten. The Supreme Council of the USSR was largely made up of workers and peasants; scientists also were represented. In the circumstances, the USSR delegation felt it was essential to protect the interests of the State.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) felt that only strictly necessary limitations should be laid down in article 27. The basic text was open to rather broad interpretations. He agreed with the Uruguayan representative as to the need to refer to the law and therefore accepted his amendment as an addition to his own. He was also able to accept the amendment put forward by the United States representative.

The reference to democracy in the text was acceptable to all delegations but was interpreted by them in many different ways. It was therefore necessary to introduce the precise concept of "national sovereignty and solidarity". The falsification of votes was the very antithesis of democracy, as were also the activities of subversive groups under the control of a foreign Power, whether fascist or communist. France and Italy were at that moment being undermined by just such subversive groups, and to avoid such a situation arising elsewhere in the world, States had to be permitted to take the necessary precautions.

MRS. NEWLANDS (New Zealand) pointed out that individuals normally lived in communities and consequently had to exercise their rights and freedoms with regard for the rights and freedoms of others. It was becoming recognized that the rights of individuals must be related to the rights of the community as a whole. In New Zealand, the Government accepted ever-increasing responsibility for the general welfare.

The Committee was concerned less with State responsibility than with the specific reasons for placing limitations on the rights and freedoms of the individual. An escape clause – for such was the nature of the article under discussion – should be as narrow as possible if the statement of rights and freedoms was to have any real meaning. The declaration did not present the same problems as the covenant and therefore required only one general limitation clause.

The draft drawn up by the Commission on Human Rights provided that limitations could only be applied for the requirements of general welfare. At the last moment, an amendment had been introduced calling for the insertion of the words “morality, public order and general welfare”.<sup>1</sup> The delegation of New Zealand wondered whether it had been wise to introduce that amendment, for it was far from clear what those three expressions were intended to mean. Did they not, in a sense, overlap; and, in the past, had not an excess of public order often led to the infringement of human rights and freedoms? It would be unfortunate if, in one of the last articles of the declaration, the general limitations clause was unnecessarily widened, thus depriving the document of some of its meaning.

She therefore suggested the deletion of the words “morality, public order and” in paragraph 2, and the deletion of the whole of paragraph 1. In her opinion, it would be preferable to leave the reference to duties to the community in paragraph 2. The insertion of the words “and freedoms”, as suggested by the United States delegation, would be a drafting improvement.

MR. KAYALY (Syria) pointed out that article 27 contained two different conceptions; paragraph 1 stated that the individual had duties to the community which enabled him to develop his personality, while paragraph 2 stated that, in the exercise of his rights, the individual should be subjected to certain limitations. The Syrian delegation would support the article as it stood, with the insertion of the words “and freedoms” in paragraph 2.

In the opinion of the Syrian delegation, “society” was a broader and more inclusive term than “State”. The Cuban amendment, although acceptable, had already been embodied in the preamble. Emphasis had been laid on the relationship between the individual and society. This could not be interpreted, however, as had been implied in the USSR representative’s statement, to mean that the State had the right to control the individual. The future would prove that the individual was the basis of society and that the State was able to exist because of that fact.

MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) could support the French representative’s proposal for the insertion of the word “legitimate” before “requirements”, but did not believe that it could be regarded as a substitute for his own amendment. Article 27, in addition to stating that limitations should be established by law, should also refer to the legitimate requirements of morality, public order and general welfare. The principle of legality, deeply rooted in the traditions of French and United States law and incorporated in all the constitutions of the Latin American countries could, he believed, be accepted by the Committee.

The United States representative seemed to consider that the Uruguayan amendment would exclude moral force as a guarantee of fundamental rights. He wished to say that the delegation of Uruguay attributed great importance to moral force. He believed that any limitations introduced by the State in defence of morality, public order and the general welfare must be justifiable on moral grounds; they must also have a legal form and be generally applicable.

MR. DE ATHAYDE (Brazil) stated that it was impossible to draw up a declaration of rights without proclaiming the duties implicit in the concept of freedom which made it possible to set up a peaceful and democratic society. Article 27 was of great importance, because without such a provision, all freedom might lead to anarchy and tyranny. Article 27 should not only provide for [647] limitations, but should also state the nature of those limitations: respect for the rights of others, and the requirements of morality, public order and the general welfare. Only through the protection of human rights could the democratic society itself be protected.

The text before the Committee would be satisfactory to the Brazilian delegation with the addition of the words “and freedoms”, proposed by the United States delegation.

Careful study of the other amendments had convinced him that they would not improve the original draft, with the exception of the French amendment regarding the United Nations, which reflected the interests of all mankind.

MRS. CORBET (United Kingdom) remarked that the purpose of article 27 was to enable some limitation to be placed on the rights and freedoms granted in the preceding articles.

She strongly supported the United States amendment (A/C.3/223), which was a real contribution to that article.

She could not accept the USSR amendment because to introduce a mention of the democratic State would restrict the article unduly. The concept of a democratic society contained in the original text was far broader, inasmuch as it encompassed the community, the State and the international order.

The Cuban amendment was not acceptable both because it was too long for the purposes of the declaration and because it introduced controversial ideas.

She hoped that the Egyptian representative would explain the first part of his amendment; the word “loyalty” was not easy to define and it was not unusual for people to have conflicting loyalties. As regards the second part of that amendment, she pointed out that the purposes and principles of the United Nations as stated in the Charter applied largely to the conduct of States and not of individuals.

While the New Zealand proposal to delete the words “public order” might be acceptable, the word “morality” should certainly remain in the text; it introduced an ethical concept which was not covered by any other part of the article.

Mrs. Corbet agreed with the United States representative that the Uruguayan amendment was too restrictive, even though it had undoubtedly been advanced with the most liberal intentions. It was dangerous to say that rights could be limited only by law; tyrannical laws had been known to exist. Moreover, perfectly justifiable limitations might be imposed on the individual by society through other means. The criterion for such limitations should be justice, which was higher than any law.

The English text of the French amendment to paragraph 1 made matters worse instead of better; it could easily be interpreted to mean that anyone who felt that he had not been allowed freely to develop his personality had no duties towards the community. As regards the second [648] French amendment, she saw no great need to qualify the word “requirements”. Should the Committee wish to do so, however, she agreed with the United States representative that the adjective “reasonable” would be preferable to “legitimate”.

She could not support the Chilean amendment, in particular the second part. The word “solidarity” had no meaning for a number of delegations; the concept, as explained by the Chilean representative, was covered by the basic text. Furthermore, it did not seem appropriate to make a reference to subversive action in the declaration.

MR. AQUINO (Philippines) supported the original text of article 27 with the addition of the United States amendment, which lent continuity to the text of the declaration.

While he thought that the Cuban amendments would be most useful as part of the political vocabulary of the United Nations and of democratic society, they did not fit into the general structure of the declaration.

The Egyptian amendments introduced highly controversial elements and could in no way be said to improve the drafting of the article.

The Uruguayan amendment, while its intention was laudable, would unduly restrict the rights and freedoms proclaimed in the declaration by permitting the passage of laws violating them. It took a narrow view of constitutional law; certain established limitations of fundamental freedoms, like the right of eminent domain, did not require a law to be binding on the individual, the State and society.

He could not support the French amendment to paragraph 1; he agreed with the interpretation of its meaning given by the United Kingdom representative. Neither was he prepared to accept the insertion of the word “legitimate” in the second paragraph, since it was open to conflicting, and indeed irreconcilable, interpretations. He was, however, in favour of the mention of the purposes and principles of the United Nations as suggested by the French representative.

When article 27 was taken in conjunction with the other provisions of the declaration it became plain that it contemplated a universal democratic society. The USSR amendment, by raising the State above that society, would destroy the intent and meaning of the article. Since the definition of the “corresponding requirements” of a State would lie with that State, it could under the terms of the USSR amendment annul all individual rights and freedoms contained in the declaration. Mr. Aquino was therefore strongly opposed to the amendment.

MR. CONTOUMAS (Greece) supported the French amendment to paragraph 1 because the French text of that amendment made it impossible for a man to deny that he had duties to his [649] community on the ground that the latter had not enabled him freely to develop his personality.

He also supported the French amendment to paragraph 2, but could not agree with most of the other amendments to that paragraph. The danger of the USSR amendment was that, by speaking of “the corresponding requirements of the democratic State”, it opened the door to abuses by the State. It should be noted that the original text spoke not of the requirements of a democratic society but of the “requirements of morality, public order and general welfare in a democratic society”. While the Cuban amendment contained a number of ideas dear to the hearts of all present, some of those ideas were controversial and the text was far too long. He wished to hear an explanation of the Egyptian amendment by its mover before he could form an opinion on it.

He could not agree with the New Zealand representative that paragraph 1 of the article should be deleted. It was essential to recognize somewhere in the declaration that the individual had duties towards the community. The second deletion proposed by the New Zealand delegation would be even more disastrous, and Mr. Contoumas was at a loss to see why the United States representative had appeared to favour it. He recalled that in a corresponding article suggested for the draft covenant the United States delegation had thought it necessary to mention not only general welfare, but public order and national security as well. The phrase “general welfare” did not fully cover the concept of public order; rather than to delete that concept, it might be wiser to add the words “national security”.

Mr. Contoumas supported the United States amendment, but suggested that, in order to avoid any possibility of contradiction, the words “and freedoms” should also be inserted between “rights” and “of others” in paragraph 2.

MR. CAMPOS ORTIZ (Mexico) thought that article 27 as drafted by the Commission on Human Rights was one of the best phrased and most complete in the declaration. Some of the amendments proposed would, however, improve it further. He therefore supported the United States amendment and the amendment to it suggested by the Greek representative; the last French amendment; and the amendments submitted by Chile. He was fully in agreement with the spirit of the Cuban amendment.

The New Zealand amendments, on the other hand, were quite unacceptable. To delete the mention of morality and public order in paragraph 2 would be to base all limitations of the rights granted in the declaration on the requirements of general welfare in a democratic society and consequently to make them subject to the interpretation of the concept of democracy, on which there was the widest possible divergence of views. The New Zealand delegation thus took the same position as the USSR delegation in that the effect of its amendment would be to permit the State to impose such limitations as it pleased upon the rights [650] and freedoms of the individual. Indeed, if any part of the original text should be deleted, it was the words "in a democratic society". The requirements of morality, public order and general welfare were recognized by the laws of all nations; it was the concept of democracy that was still inadequately defined and unknown to jurisprudence.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) was in favour of paragraph 1 as it appeared in the basic text. In the present circumstances, when a great many reforms were still needed to improve man's condition, it was appropriate to continue to stress man's rights rather than his duties. Paragraph 1 quite properly established a sort of contract between the individual and the community, involving a fair exchange of benefits.

As regards paragraph 2, the amendments proposed by the USSR, United States and Egyptian delegations were not necessary as those ideas were implied in the original text. While the Cuban amendment was eloquently and brilliantly drafted, its great weakness was that it explained the reasons for limiting rights; an article in the declaration should grant rights or impose restrictions, but should not give the reasons for them.

Mr. Dehousse was prepared to accept the Uruguayan amendment and the new paragraph suggested by the Egyptian representative. While the last French amendment contained the same idea, it would be preferable to devote a separate paragraph to the mention of "the purposes and principles of the United Nations", which incidentally was how the final phrase of the Egyptian amendment should read. Attempts had been made at various times to insert that mention in earlier articles; article 27 appeared to be the best place for it.

MR. PLAZA (Venezuela) considered it indispensable to include in paragraph 2 a statement that limitations must be prescribed by law, as suggested in the Uruguayan amendment. Representatives who had wished to introduce legal safeguards in earlier articles had frequently been told that the subject would be covered in article 27. That article had now been reached.

The objection had been raised that laws might not be just; Mr. Plaza therefore supported the French proposal to insert the word “just” – which was a better translation of the French original than “legitimate” – before the word “requirements”. There was, moreover, a further safeguard: States which voted for the declaration assumed a moral responsibility to amend any of their laws that might be unjust. Since the legislation of his own country was more advanced than many of the provisions of the declaration, Venezuela did not fear that responsibility. Unless article 27 contained a mention of the law, the declaration could not be said to be universally applicable.

MR. CHANG (China) sympathized with the purpose of the French amendment to paragraph 1, but did not think that it had been achieved. It might perhaps be preferable, in the English text, to speak of the “free development of personality” rather than use the phrase “freely to develop his [651] personality”. It was not simple to improve the drafting of paragraph 1; unless an improvement could be effected the paragraph should be permitted to stand.

It was equally difficult to re-draft paragraph 2 in such a manner as to introduce the Uruguayan amendment in its proper place. As used by the Uruguayan representative, the words “prescribed by law” applied not only to public order and general welfare, which they might properly qualify, but also to such concepts as morality and recognition and respect for the rights of others, which surely could not and should not be prescribed by law.

Mr. Chang remarked that he found the original text of article 27 satisfactory in the main, but that he might at a later meeting present amendments of a drafting nature.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) said that his delegation considered article 27 satisfactory, but was prepared to accept certain amendments to it. Thus, the United States amendment, which repeated the words used in articles 2 and 26, was a definite improvement.

The basic objection to the USSR amendment was that if the phrase “and also the corresponding requirements of the democratic State” were adopted, the impression would be created that the State was higher than morality, public order and general welfare and had absolute rights which were not conditioned by the requirements of the latter.

The Cuban amendment contained noble ideas; the proper place for them, however, was the preamble. The intention of the first Egyptian amendment was far from clear. The deletion proposed by New Zealand in paragraph 2 was only partially acceptable; the words “public order” were not essential, inasmuch as the idea might be considered as implied by the rest of the sentence, but the word “morality” should be retained since it referred to the spiritual side of life which could not be included in the materialistic concept of general welfare.

He had serious doubts as regards the Uruguayan amendment. While there was some justification for wishing to prevent suppression of individual rights by arbitrary decrees, the United Kingdom representative had been correct in saying that certain justifiable limitations might not rest on written law.

He supported the first Chilean amendment which restricted possible limitations more than did the original text; he thought, however, that the word “necessary” should be replaced by “indispensable” in the English text as it was in the French. The second Chilean amendment was not necessary. National sovereignty was not a goal in itself; it existed for the general welfare, and was therefore implicit in the basic text.

The French amendment to paragraph 1 was not acceptable, since it appeared to state that not all men had the right freely to develop their personality. The original text of that paragraph might be improved by being put in the plural. If it read: “All men have duties. . .”, it would imply that a majority which had been oppressed by the [652] community had the right to revolt against it, but not that every single individual had the right to do so on his own.

With respect to the second French amendment, Mr. Azkoul pointed out that the word “legitimate” should not be used to qualify the requirements of morality which by their very nature could not be anything else; it should apply only to the requirements of public order and general welfare.

In conclusion he remarked that the Lebanese delegation had submitted an amendment to article 28 which dealt with the purposes and principles of the United Nations and consequently covered the same ground as the second Egyptian and the third French amendments.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) observed that the second amendment submitted by his delegation had apparently taken the Committee by surprise. It introduced a new concept made necessary by modern conditions. The past decade had seen the development of internal aggression by the citizens of one country acting in their own country under the orders of another. The introduction in article 27 of the principle of solidarity would permit States to combat subversive groups which attacked them from within. Similarly, the mention of national sovereignty would help them to resist external aggression in times of war.

International co-operation and the concomitant surrender of some measure of national sovereignty were acceptable when they resulted from the free will of a people and were directed towards the general good. No State, however, should be obliged to surrender its national sovereignty as a result of subversive action by groups which embraced totalitarian principles.

It had been said that the concepts of national sovereignty and solidarity were included in the words “general welfare”. If the Committee rejected the Chilean amendment, it should be on that understanding.

Summary Record of the Hundred and Fifty-Fourth Meeting
[of the Third Committee]

Held at the Palais de Chaillot, Paris, on Wednesday,
24 November 1948, at 11 a.m.

Chairman: MR. CHARLES MALIK (Lebanon).

MR. CASSIN (France) emphasized that the general discussion of article 27 had made plain how difficult it was to alter the text prepared by the Commission on Human Rights.

He observed particularly that it would be a great mistake to follow the New Zealand delegation's suggestion (A/C.3/267) and omit the first paragraph, which established the duties of an individual towards the community.

[653]

Like the representative of Lebanon, he recognized that the French text of the paragraph might be ambiguous; to remove any ambiguity Mr. Azkoul had proposed, the previous day (153rd meeting), to draft the text of the first paragraph in the plural. The French delegation supported that suggestion; it was submitting a formal proposal to that effect, and was withdrawing the first part of its amendment to article 27 (A/C.3/345).

As regards paragraph 2, the French delegation was inclined to vote in favour of the amendment submitted by the United States delegation (A/C.3/223), which had the advantage of referring to freedoms side by side with rights.

The principal difficulty was that the paragraph listed limitations on the rights. Some delegations, such as that of New Zealand, wanted to reduce that list; others, on the contrary, such as the delegations of Egypt, Chile and the USSR, proposed to add to it. The French delegation, for its part, thought the Committee should adhere to the list proposed by the Commission on Human Rights. It was also relevant to mention that while the English expression “general welfare” was very wide, the corresponding expression in the French text, bien-être général, had a much more restricted meaning, traditionally confined to economic and social questions. The expression ordre public, on the contrary, covered anything essential to the life of a country, including, primarily, its security. It was, therefore, necessary to keep both expressions which, furthermore, were mutually complementary in both languages.

In the French delegation’s view the wording of the text of the Commission on Human Rights met the wishes of the delegations of Egypt and Chile who wanted to extend the list of limitations to cover good faith and loyalty as well as the demands of national sovereignty and national solidarity. It seemed that with the words “morality”, “public order” and “general welfare”, all the demands of the democratic State were taken into account. That was why the French delegation could not vote for the USSR amendment either.

Nor could it accept the amendment submitted by the Uruguayan delegation (A/C.3/268) notwithstanding its undeniable interest, because, as the representative of the United Kingdom had rightly said (153rd meeting), certain limitations on rights were imposed, not only by legislation but also by convention and by judgments relating to individual cases. Thus, it would be destructive of the role of convention and judges if written texts were strictly adhered to in a desire to avoid arbitrary action. The French amendment, which limited arbitrary action in introducing the element of “legitimate” requirements – in other words, the requirements based on justice which agreed with the rules of morality, were in keeping with the needs of public order, and took the general welfare into account – seemed to meet the need expressed in the Uruguayan amendment without having the same disadvantages.

As regards the reference to the purpose and principles of the United Nations, which his delegation wished to see included, he was prepared to accept the excellent wording proposed by the [654] Egyptian delegation, which had only to be completed in the sense indicated by the Belgian representative.

MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) did not think that his delegation’s amendment had a restrictive effect on the provisions of paragraph 2. It was incorrect to say that that amendment did not take into account the fact that man, in the exercise of his essential rights, was subject to other limitations than those of law. The free will of man was undeniably limited, if only by the demands of his conscience, the rules of positive morality, or standards set by social conventions. The Uruguayan amendment took those factors into account because it left all the last part of paragraph 2 as it was. The aim of article 27 was definite: it was intended to permit a State, under certain conditions, to limit the exercise of the essential rights of man. The Uruguayan amendment, in turn, was intended to establish up to what point the State could limit the free exercise of those rights.

If it was desired to guarantee faithful application of the declaration of human rights, the principle should be adopted that limitations to be set by public authorities could only be to set in accordance with pre-established standards, i.e., in accordance with provisions legally enacted. Thus, human beings would have the guarantee that they would be governed according to rules, and not according to the whim of their rulers.

MR. AIKMAN (New Zealand) said that his delegation proposed the amendment of paragraph 2 by deletion of the words "morality" and "public order". The mention of "general welfare" would thus remain. The idea of "public order" extended the limitation of human rights much further than that of "general welfare".

As regards paragraph 1, he would accept the joint amendment of Lebanon and France; his proposal had only been made in the interest of better drafting. He asked that the vote should be taken in parts as he would vote for the first part while he would vote against the French amendment to paragraph 2.

MR. KAMINSKY (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) recalled that at different stages preceding the present one in the work on the declaration of human rights, the USSR delegation had spared no effort to obtain recognition for the following principles: enjoyment of the rights set forth must be guaranteed by the State and by its laws; exercise of those rights must have as its supreme objective the improvement of man's condition and the development of friendly relations between peoples; democracy must be protected against attempts upon it on the part of fascism and war-mongers; finally, States must be protected against all interference with their national sovereignty in accordance with the terms of the United Nations Charter.

True to its attitude, the USSR delegation had presented an amendment intended mainly to defend democratic interests and, in the first instance, the interests of the workers of the whole world.

It was self-evident that the draft declaration, as adopted up to the present, had serious gaps. One [655] of the most serious was due to the fact that it did not take the development of the human personality into account, and said nothing about the responsibilities and obligations of the State in that respect. In order to complete article 27 it would be necessary on the one hand to set forth the duties of the democratic State, thus ensuring the interests of the workers, and, on the other, to emphasize that the individual whose rights the declaration proclaimed was essentially a member of the democratic society. Such were the two interdependent ideas which article 27 had to make clear.

In a well-organized democratic society the interests of the community were protected in an efficient manner because the individual was not in a position to defend his rights himself. It was for that reason that the Constitution of the Byelorussian SSR, inspired by that principle and basing itself on all the elements that ensured the defence of the peoples of Soviet countries, prohibited the exploitation of man by man, condemned all discriminatory measures, and aimed at the development of human personality.

But at the same time the democratic State must be able to have certain indispensable rights, in order to ensure the defence of its citizens, and that was exactly where article 27 came in. The USSR amendment, far from restricting the article's scope, did exactly the opposite by giving the State the necessary means for guaranteeing the enjoyment of individual rights.

The true implication of the USSR amendment seemed to have been misunderstood by the other delegations: it tended above all to emphasize the indisputable ties that existed between an individual on the one part, and the State and society on the other. He refuted the objections raised by various representatives, especially those of the Philippines and Greece (153rd meeting). He disagreed that the concepts of morality and of public order were wider than the democratic State required. The concept of morality, in particular, was subject to various interpretations; the morality of a socialist regime was certainly of a higher order than that of a capitalist regime where man was exploited by man. It was obvious that the USSR amendment could not be accepted by countries where morality and public order were not regarded as within the framework of a democratic society. For its part, the delegation of the Byelorussian SSR would unreservedly vote for it.

MR. BEAUFORT (Netherlands) noted that the debate on article 27 had shown that the rights of the individual were not absolute. It was necessary to define the restrictions demanded by respect for the rights of other individuals and of different social groups. That was the purpose of paragraph 2 of the article.

Furthermore, paragraph 1 made plain the interdependence of the rights and duties which linked an individual with the community. In choosing the word "community", it was quite rightly desired to point out that the State was not the only social group concerned.

The wording of paragraph 1 was not entirely satisfactory, however. Did "the community which enables him. . ." mean a community which effectively permitted an individual to develop his per-[656]sonality? Was it to be understood that a relation between cause and effect was established there?

He could not accept such an interpretation. It was readily admitted that an individual had natural and inalienable rights transcending any specific legislation.

But it must also be admitted that an individual had duties towards the community independent of the character of that or the other community. The fact that a State did not grant political rights to a certain category of citizens, though deplorable, was not a sufficient reason for the citizens in question refusing, for instance, to pay their taxes. For those reasons, the Netherlands representative would have preferred to omit the second part of the first paragraph.

Passing on to an analysis of the amendments to paragraph 2, he approved the Uruguayan amendment. By requiring that limitations should be prescribed by law, the amendment was intended to protect the individual against arbitrary measures which public authorities might be tempted to introduce through administrative channels. It was obvious that such a guarantee would be applicable only in democratic States. It would not be effective in an authoritarian State, where legislative power was not independent of the executive power. He was also sure that the word "law" in the Uruguayan amendment also referred to measures of a legislative nature which regional or municipal authorities might introduce. He would therefore vote for the Uruguayan amendment as well as for that of the United States, which seemed to him to be an improvement on the original text.

He would not support the USSR amendment, however, which seemed to him superfluous, nor that of Cuba (A/C.3/261), which was rather a statement of principles than the assertion of a right. The Egyptian amendment did not appear to be any more acceptable, since it introduced terms liable to be interpreted in many different ways.

Finally, if the Committee so desired, the Netherlands representative would accept the addition of a third paragraph dealing with the purposes and principles of the United Nations.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) recalled that it was especially important to defend the individual against the State. Nevertheless, the individual should also be reminded that he was a member of society, and that he must affirm his right to be deemed a human being by clearly recognizing the duties which were corollaries of his rights.

The Cuban delegation considered that the declaration ought to proclaim that idea, and that was why it had proposed that the text of its amendment should be included either in the preamble, or in article 1, article 2, or article 27. It was more surprised to see certain countries oppose the adoption of the amendment because they had accepted an almost identical text in the Bogotá declaration. That solemn declaration of social solidarity would be a safeguard against the exaggerated individualism which had done so much ill.

The Cuban representative would vote for the Uruguayan amendment and that of Chile.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that most of the objections raised to his proposal did not take its real import into account. It had, for instance, been maintained that the USSR amendment tended to ensure the supremacy of the State (153rd meeting): That was certainly not the case, since the text in question placed the democratic State on exactly the same plane as democratic society.

The USSR delegation wanted to guarantee the community against any abuse of his rights by the individual. The existence of the democratic State had not yet been mentioned in the declaration. That might lead to the belief that it was not a question of defending the rights of citizens, in the sense that the French Revolution had given to that word, but the rights of stateless persons without ties with any society organized in the form of a State.

It was imperative to safeguard the just demands of the democratic State precisely because it alone was capable of defending the individual against the encroachment of forces such as high finance or trusts. Those who refused to recognize that fact showed that they preferred oligarchy to democracy.

Moreover, it was necessary to affirm the sovereignty of the democratic State if only in order to conform to the spirit and letter of the Charter.

The USSR amendment was quite appropriate because it had always been said that it was article 27 of the declaration which would deal with the relations between the individual and the community.

The representative of the Soviet Union said that he would vote for the Uruguayan amendment relating to limitations prescribed by law.

MR. WATT (Australia) noted the general agreement on the necessity of subordinating human rights to certain restrictions and asked whether, on the one hand, the proposed limitations were justified, and, on the other hand, whether they were sufficient.

At any rate, the first paragraph of article 27 should stand. For his part, he supported the joint version of France and Lebanon, but he proposed to add the adverb "fully" to the word "freely".

With regard to paragraph 2, he observed that the conception of public order could be understood in a restrictive sense or, on the contrary, in a wider sense. That made it clear that it was necessary to set limits to the restrictions. The expression "democratic society" was intended to do precisely that. For want of a better term, it should be accepted, notwithstanding the diversity of the interpretations given to the word "democratic".

The USSR amendment used the formula "requirements of the State" while the text of the Commission on Human Rights read "the requirements of morality. . . in a society". It would be interesting to know whether that difference was [658] intended or whether it was merely caused by the translation.

The Australian representative also supported the idea that, as the delegations of the United States (A/C.3/223) and of Greece had already proposed (153rd meeting), freedoms should be mentioned whenever rights were referred to.

The Cuban amendment seemed to be a philosophical argument, the cogency of which could not be contested, but which was a little out of place in the body of an article in the declaration.

Having heard the French representative, Mr. Watt did not think that the words “morality, public order and the” should be deleted, as the New Zealand delegation had proposed; although the New Zealand delegation no doubt interpreted the phrase “general welfare” in the widest sense, other delegations had expressed the view that it was open to a somewhat narrower and materialistic interpretation.

With regard to the French amendment to paragraph 2, the Australian representative was not convinced of the necessity of the word “legitimate”, since it was inconceivable that the claims of morality should be illegitimate. On the other hand, he considered that the addition of a paragraph, mentioning the purposes and principles of the United Nations, would be most appropriate.

In the case of the Uruguayan amendment to paragraph 2, it should be made clear whether “law” comprised other regulations which had not a strictly legislative character. He also wanted to know whether the word “solely” implied that the law in question must have for its sole purpose the restrictions mentioned in the paragraph. Use of the word “solely” in this sense might be unjustified, as a law might have various collateral purposes, all of which might be justified.

While he recognized the importance of the reasons which prompted the Chilean proposal, he feared that that amendment might open the way to the most divergent interpretations of the word “sovereignty” and that it might be used in the future to evade certain provisions of the declaration.

In conclusion, the Australian delegation supported the text of the first paragraph with the improvements of detail indicated; it found paragraph 2 satisfactory; and it supported the proposal to add a third paragraph on the purposes and principles of the United Nations.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) asked that the word “essential” in the English translation of his amendment should be replaced by the word “indispensable”. He asked also that the ideas of “sovereignty” and “national solidarity” should be voted upon separately.

MR. WATT (Australia) suggested inserting the phrase “in which alone the free and full development of his personality is possible”, in paragraph 1 after the word “community”, instead of the words “which enables him freely to develop his personality”.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) considered that the text proposed by the representative of Australia contained an inaccurate statement, for while there was no doubt that society contributed to the development of the individual's personality, it was no less true that that development was conditioned by other factors.

MR. CONTOUMAS (Greece) fully agreed with the Belgian representative.

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) proposed deletion of the word "alone".

In a spirit of compromise, MR. CHANG (China) proposed that the end of the first paragraph of the Australian amendment should read as follows: "which makes possible the full development of his personality".

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) preferred the text proposed by the Chinese representative. He suggested, however, that the words "his personality" should be replaced by the term "human personality". That new wording would avoid the danger, already pointed out by some delegations, that the text might be interpreted as implying that the individual had duties to society only in so far as the latter secured the full development of his own personality.

MR. CHANG (China) considered that the word "everyone" in the first sentence of article 27 already contained the meaning of the word "human", therefore need not be repeated.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) was of the opinion that the wording of article 27 might give rise to error. It might, first, be asserted that the individual could only develop his personality within the framework of society; it was, however, only necessary to recall the famous book by Daniel Defoe, Robinson Crusoe, to find proof of the contrary. A second error might be made by so wording article 27 as to give the impression that it was the duty of society to develop the human being's personality; that principle might, perhaps, be in harmony with the philosophy of certain countries, but it might equally well run counter to that of other peoples. On that subject, he recalled that the members of the Committee had always taken care that the text they adopted should not impose the particular views of one country or group of countries on any other country. It was for that reason that the text just proposed by the Chinese representative was preferable to that proposed by Australia.

In view of the difficulties its amendment seemed to have caused, and also of the fact that the Lebanese amendment, which had been endorsed by the French delegation, was acceptable, MR. WATT (Australia) said that his delegation would not insist on its proposal.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) thought, on the contrary, that the text proposed by the Australian representative was important in that it stressed the harmonious relations which should exist between the individual and the society in which he lived. The word "alone", which had been criticized by some delegations, seemed to him excellent. It rightly stressed the fact that the individual could not fully develop his personality outside society. The example of Rob-[660]inson Crusoe, far from being convincing, had, on the contrary, shown that man could not live and develop his personality without the aid of society. Robinson had, in fact, had at his disposal the products of human industry and culture, namely, the tools and books he had found on the wreck of his ship. The Australian amendment was perfectly justified. In view of the fact that the Australian delegation had withdrawn it, he would take it up in the name of his own delegation.

With regard to the Lebanese amendment, he thought it was liable to a dangerous interpretation, as some delegations had already pointed out. It might be interpreted as meaning that the individual had no duty towards a State which did not provide him with the possibility of developing his personality fully.

MRS. CORBET (United Kingdom) shared the opinion of the USSR representative; that amendment in no way modified the substance of article 27, but eliminated the ambiguity pointed out by the USSR representative and by other delegations. Moreover the word “alone” in that text stressed the essential fact that the individual could attain the full development of his personality only within the framework of society.

MR. CASSIN (France) recognized that the new text eliminated any ambiguities; the French delegation would not insist on the French text of article 27 being drafted in the plural.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) withdrew the amendment submitted by his delegation to that effect. Nevertheless, he reserved the right to amend the French text of article 27 in the drafting subcommittee, if necessary.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the amendment formerly submitted by Australia, which had been taken up by the USSR delegation.

MR. CHANG (China) asked that the amendment should be voted upon in parts so that the word “alone” might be voted on separately.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the proposal to include the word “alone” in the text of the USSR amendment.

That proposal was adopted by 23 votes to 5, with 14 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the USSR amendment as a whole.

The amendment was adopted by 35 votes to none, with 6 abstentions.

In view of the difficulties of translation pointed out by the French delegation, MR. AIKMAN (New Zealand) withdrew his amendment (A/C.3/267) to delete the words “morality, public order and the” from the text of paragraph 2.

MR. HAMDI (Egypt) said that he would accept the French delegation’s interpretation of the idea of “morality” as including that of loyalty and good faith. His delegation would therefore not insist on the part of its amendment (A/C.3/264) to insert the words “of loyalty, good faith” in the text of article 27. Nevertheless, it would maintain [661] the part of the amendment on the purposes and principles of the United Nations.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the amendment submitted by the United States delegation (A/C.3/223) proposing the insertion of the words “and freedoms” after the words “in the exercise of his rights” in the text of paragraph 2 of article 27.

The amendment was adopted unanimously.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the Greek amendment proposing the insertion of the words “and freedoms” after the words “to secure due recognition and respect for the rights” in the text of article 27.

The amendment was adopted by 35 votes to none, with 5 abstentions.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) stated that his delegation withdrew its amendment (A/C.3/304/Rev.1/Add.1) to replace the word “necessary” by the word “essential” in favour of the Uruguayan amendment, suggesting that the same word should be replaced by the phrase “prescribed by law solely for the purpose of securing”.

THE CHAIRMAN put the Uruguayan amendment (A/C.3/268) to the vote.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) asked that the vote should be taken by roll-call.

A vote was taken by roll-call as follows:

In favour: Argentina, Belgium, Brazil, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Chile, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Honduras, Mexico, Netherlands, Panama, Paraguay, Peru, Poland, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Uruguay, Venezuela, Yugoslavia.

Against: Australia, Canada, China, Denmark, Egypt, Ethiopia, Greece, New Zealand, Norway, Pakistan, Philippines, Sweden, Syria, United Kingdom, United States of America.

Abstaining: Afghanistan, France, India, Lebanon, Liberia, Saudi Arabia, Yemen.

The amendment was adopted by 21 votes to 15, with 7 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the French amendment (A/C.3/345) to insert the words “to satisfy the legitimate” before the word “requirements” in paragraph 2.

THE CHAIRMAN asked the Committee to decide on the Chilean amendment (A/C.3/304/Rev.1/Add.1) suggesting the addition of the words “of national sovereignty and solidarity” after the words “requirements of morality”.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) proposed that the idea of “the solidarity of peoples” should be added in the amendment. The solidarity of peoples was the essential principle on which the Charter of the United Nations was based. It was, therefore, important to mention it in that article; if that were not done, the Chilean amendment would have a restrictive meaning in that it would limit solidarity to the national plane.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) considered that the USSR amendment could not constitute an addition to the text he had himself proposed. He therefore asked that the Committee should decide on that amendment by a separate vote.

Mr. Santa Cruz also asked that his delegation's amendment should be voted on in parts.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the first part of the Chilean amendment, proposing that the words "of national sovereignty" should be added after the words "requirements of morality", in paragraph 2 of article 27.

The first part of the amendment was not adopted, 17 votes being cast in favour and 17 against, with 7 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the USSR amendment proposing that the words "solidarity of peoples" should be substituted for the last part of the Chilean amendment regarding national solidarity.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) asked that the vote should be taken by roll-call.

A vote was taken by roll-call as follows:

In favour: Argentina, Belgium, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Czechoslovakia, India, Poland, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Yugoslavia.

Against: Afghanistan, Australia, Brazil, Canada, Chile, China, Cuba, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Egypt, Ethiopia, France, Greece, Honduras, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Pakistan, Paraguay, Philippines, Sweden, Syria, United Kingdom, United States of America, Uruguay.

Abstaining: Ecuador, Lebanon, Liberia, Mexico, Panama, Peru, Saudi Arabia, Venezuela, Yemen.

The amendment was rejected by 25 votes to 9, with 9 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the last part of the Chilean amendment, suggesting the addition of the words "and solidarity".

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) asked that the vote should be taken by roll-call.

A vote was taken by roll-call as follows:

In favour: Argentina, Brazil, Chile, Cuba, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Uruguay.

Against: Afghanistan, Australia, Belgium, Canada, Denmark, Ethiopia, India, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Pakistan, Philippines, Poland, Sweden, Syria, United Kingdom, United States of America.

Abstaining: Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, China, Czechoslovakia, Egypt, France, Greece, Honduras, Lebanon, Liberia, Mexico, Panama, Paraguay, Peru, Saudi Arabia, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Venezuela, Yemen, Yugoslavia.

The last part of the amendment was rejected by 17 votes to 7, with 19 abstentions.

The meeting rose at 1:20 p.m.

THE CHAIRMAN proceeded to put to the vote the remaining amendments to article 27. He asked for a vote first on the USSR amendment (E/800, page 35).

A vote was taken by roll-call, as follows:

THE CHAIRMAN then put to the vote the first sentence of the Cuban amendment (A/C.3/261) reading: “Respect for the rights of all requires that each should do his duty.”

A vote was taken by roll-call, as follows:

In favour: Afghanistan, Argentina, Colombia, Costa Rica, Cuba, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Mexico, Venezuela.

The first sentence of the amendment was rejected by 16 votes to 9, with 20 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN then put to the vote the second sentence of the Cuban amendment (A/C.3/261) reading: [664] “In all human activity, both social and political, rights and duties are indissolubly linked one with another.”

A vote was taken by roll-call, as follows:

In favour: Argentina, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Colombia, Costa Rica, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Mexico, Poland, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

Against: Afghanistan, Australia, Belgium, Brazil, Canada, China, Denmark, France, Greece, India, Lebanon, Luxembourg, Netherlands, New Zealand, Philippines, Sweden, United Kingdom, United States of America.

Abstaining: Bolivia, Burma, Chile, Egypt, Honduras, Iran, Pakistan, Panama, Paraguay, Peru, Uruguay, Venezuela, Yemen, Yugoslavia.

The second sentence of the amendment was rejected by 18 votes to 12, with 14 abstentions.

In view of the result of the first two votes, MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) withdrew the remainder of the Cuban amendment.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote a French-Egyptian amendment, forming paragraph 3 of article 27 and reading: “Those rights and freedoms can in no case be exercised contrary to the purposes and principles of the United Nations.”

The amendment was adopted by 34 votes to 2, with 6 abstentions.

Article 27 as a whole, as amended, was adopted by 41 votes to none, with one abstention.

MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) remarked that he had been one of the two representatives who had voted against the last paragraph of article 27. His country adhered loyally to the purposes and principles of the United Nations and tried sincerely to fulfil the obligations it had assumed under the Charter. It held that both its own Constitution and the Charter of the United Nations should be freely discussed and criticized. It felt, however, that article 27 imposed limitations on the rights contained in the declaration, including the right of free speech, in so far as the adoption of the last paragraph made it possible to forbid any criticism of the purposes and principles of the United Nations.

MR. WATT (Australia) had voted against the Uruguayan amendment (A/C.3/268) because the text appeared imperfect. Perhaps a drafting committee might still alter the position of the word "solely" and place it immediately after the word "prescribed".

He had abstained from voting on the last paragraph because it was not clear whether the words with which it began, "Those rights and freedoms", referred to the rights and freedoms of the individual or the rights and freedoms of others which had been mentioned in paragraph 2.

He had nevertheless voted for the article as a whole.

MR. GRUMBACH (France) stated that he, too, had voted for the article as a whole. He had voted [665] against the first sentence of the Cuban amendment because it might be misconstrued to mean that a man who failed in his duties forfeited all his rights; yet even criminals were entitled to the right of defence. He was glad that the Cuban representative had withdrawn the major part of his amendments; although he appreciated the reasons for them, he would have felt compelled to vote against them.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) stated that he had defended his amendment referring to the requirements of the democratic State, because in practice all the rights and freedoms contained in the declaration would have to be exercised within the framework of each separate State and their realization would depend on the nature of that State.

Two major types of State existed in the modern world: what might be termed the new and the old democracies. The former were a recent phenomenon; their Governments were largely composed of workers and peasants; the equivalent of such institutions as the House of Lords did not exist. They served the interests of the broad masses of their people, whereas the old democracies while retaining a parliamentary form of government, were still devoted to the interests of minorities. Nevertheless there was a kinship between the two types of democracy which had led them to fight side by side against fascist States.

He consequently regretted that the Committee had rejected his amendment, which mentioned the democratic State as distinct from a fascist State and stressed the principle of national sovereignty. He had voted in favour of that portion of the Chilean amendment (A/C.3/304/Rev.1/Add.1) which dealt with the same principle. He had also voted for the Uruguayan amendment and for the article as a whole because, since that article in its present form included a reference to law as well as to a democratic society, it also contained the concept of a democratic State.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) said that he had voted in favour of article 27, which he considered an admirable one. He had voted for his own amendments, which embodied ideas unanimously accepted at the conference of Bogotá. He still thought it was essential to indicate in the declaration that the possession of each right implied a corresponding duty; as it was, that document placed undue emphasis on individualism.

MRS. CORBET (United Kingdom) stated that she had voted against paragraph 2 of article 27 and had abstained on the whole article both because there was a danger that the new text of paragraph 2 might provide a loophole permitting passage of laws limiting basic human rights and freedoms and because there were limitations not imposed by law which were perfectly justifiable. The word “solely” in the Uruguayan amendment did not afford sufficient protection against laws limiting rights or freedoms in the interests of public order or the general welfare.

MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) stated, in introducing his amendment (A/C.3/268), that his intention had been merely to make the language of article 28 more precise to “engage in any activity” implied repeated acts; in order to ensure that even a single act aimed at the destruction of any of the rights and freedoms in the declaration should be forbidden, he wished to replace that phrase by the words “perform any acts”.

MR. GRUMBACH (France) said that his delegation considered it essential to introduce the word “group” (A/C.3/345) in article 28. Experience had shown that it was rarely States or individuals that engaged in activities aimed at the destruction of human rights; such activities in recent times had been pursued by groups, sometimes acting on the instructions or with the connivance of States.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) stated, in introducing his amendment (A/C.3/365), that his delegation attached the greatest importance to its appearing as the second paragraph of article 28.

The first reason which had led his delegation to submit that amendment was that, as then worded, the article would merely prevent States from passing new laws aimed at the destruction of human rights and freedoms; it would not force them to repeal any such laws that were already in existence.

The second reason was that the word “arbitrary” had been used repeatedly in earlier articles without being precisely defined. It had been said that laws might be arbitrary, but no criterion had been laid down for judging them. The Lebanese amendment proposed the Charter, already subscribed to by all Members of the United Nations, as such a criterion.

The third reason was of paramount importance. Article 27 laid down limitations to which all human rights and freedoms were subject. Thus, even slavery could be reintroduced on the pretext that the general welfare required it. Those limitations must be offset by the statement that no law could be contrary to the purposes and principles of the United Nations; the latter could not be subject to the limitations contained in article 27.

Unless the Lebanese amendment were accepted, all human rights and freedoms would be exposed to the very danger which the whole declaration was designed to avoid, the danger of arbitrary suppression. The reference to the purposes and principles of the United Nations would supply a much needed and generally accepted yardstick.

Mr. Azkoul pointed out that his amendment did not require States to assume any obligations to which they were not already subject. He urged the Committee to accept his amendment because it represented a basic safeguard of the rights and freedoms contained in the declaration.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) remarked that the fact that there were so few amendments to it proved that article 28, as drafted by the Commission on Human Rights, had great merits. It was essential to include that article in the declaration, first, because the rights granted in the declaration might be nullified unless there was a provision stating that no activity should be aimed at their destruction; secondly, because it should be made clear that the declaration did not grant anyone the freedom to endanger the freedom of others.

He was firmly convinced of the necessity to stop the activities of subversive groups and thus to prevent a repetition of the experience of a number of countries in the years immediately preceding the war. He would consequently vote for article 28 and the French amendment to it.

The Uruguayan amendment might be interpreted as drawing a distinction between the performance of an act and the mere intention to perform it, thus making it impossible to punish unsuccessful attempts to destroy rights and freedoms. He hoped that the Uruguayan representative would shed some light on that point.

MR. CARRERA ANDRADE (Ecuador) said the latter part of article 28 was ambiguous. It forbade activity "aimed at the destruction" of rights and freedoms; yet surely activity not so aimed but having the same result was equally undesirable. It might be preferable to replace those words by the phrase "which might destroy".

MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) said that he thought the word "acts" did not include opinions, but did include conspiracy and attempts, whether successful or not, to destroy any of the rights and freedoms prescribed in the declaration.

MR. GRUMBACH (France) said the Lebanese amendment raised a problem of fundamental importance. It was perhaps not the appropriate time in which to introduce it, however, and it could also be regarded as covered by the French-Egyptian addition to article 27.

The amendment attempted to oblige States to ensure that their laws concerning human rights and freedoms were not repugnant to the purposes and principles of the United Nations. It was an elementary principle, but sometimes the obvious had to be stated. The question of national security had to be taken into consideration, however, as well as the question whether national legislation should be considered in the light of the purposes and principles of the United Nations. That matter would surely be more appropriately considered in connexion with the Covenant of Human Rights.

There was great danger that the peoples of the world would be disillusioned if the declaration was not speedily adopted and, while sympathizing with the intention of the Lebanese representative, Mr. [668] Grumbach felt that article 6 would ensure the adequate protection of the rights set forth in the declaration.

MR. WATT (Australia) was unable to accept the Lebanese amendment. The declaration was concerned with the rights of the individual, and article 27 laid down the conditions under which those rights could be limited. The Lebanese amendment, on the other hand, referred to the duties of the State and in very comprehensive terms. For that reason, it would need to be very carefully considered.

The final paragraph of the preamble made clear the purpose of the declaration. In his opinion, the Lebanese amendment was simply a short-cut to the adoption of the covenant. Furthermore, by stating that all national laws had to conform to the purposes and principles of the United Nations, there would be a danger that the declaration might prove unacceptable to many Member States. The whole question of the implementation of the rights set forth in the declaration could only be considered in connexion with the drafting of the covenant.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) agreed with the French representative that paragraph 3 of article 27 was comprehensive and should satisfy the point of view of the Lebanese representative. There was also a danger in constantly referring to the provisions of the United Nations Charter. Article 1 of that document, for example, implied the existence of later documents on the question of what constituted human rights. It was, therefore, a vicious circle to refer to Article 1, paragraph 3 of the Charter.

The Lebanese representative felt that his amendment would prevent arbitrary action and legislation. The Charter, however, was not sufficiently explicit as regards human rights to serve as an adequate protection and it had to be borne in mind that laws could be repugnant to purposes and principles of the United Nations which did not concern human rights.

MR. CAMPOS ORTIZ (Mexico) agreed with the arguments that had been put forward against the Lebanese amendment. The question it had raised was a delicate one and could not be considered by the Assembly without a careful preliminary study by the Commission on Human Rights. In his opinion, the text was confused, vague and unnecessary. Surely when Member States signed the declaration they would be agreeing to try to adapt their legislation so as to secure the implementation of human rights and freedoms.

His Government considered that a moral obligation was just as strong as a legally binding one. Moreover, who was to judge whether a law was or was not repugnant to the purposes and principles of the United Nations? It was impossible, therefore, to improvise a text on such a delicate problem.

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) recognized, as had all previous speakers, the good intentions of the Lebanese representative, but she feared some of the results of the amendment if it [669] were adopted. As had been pointed out, in so far as there was need to refer to the purposes and principles of the United Nations, that had been done by adopting the French-Egyptian amendment to article 27.

The purpose of the Lebanese amendment appeared to be the implementation of the declaration. However, it had already been agreed that the declaration should contain no implementation clauses. By its reference to national laws the Lebanese amendment had the effect of changing the declaration into a covenant. Should it be adopted, her Government would have to reconsider its position as regards the declaration as a whole, but that fact would not be as important as the disillusionment of the peoples of the world when national laws were not immediately changed.

MR. CONTOUMAS (Greece) felt that the most important reason for the amendment submitted by the Lebanese representative had been the need to restrict the power of the State to limit rights and freedoms on the grounds of morality, public order and general welfare. Just as the constitution of a country was a safeguard against its legislation, so the Charter, which was the international constitution, served a similar purpose.

As the Belgian representative had observed, however, the purpose contemplated by the Lebanese representative would not be better attained if the Charter were mentioned; Articles 1 and 2 of the Charter dealt almost exclusively with the question of relations between nations. Moreover, the Lebanese amendment, limited as it was to the laws relating to human rights, might, if adopted, create the impression that there was nothing to prevent Governments from enacting in other fields laws contrary to the purposes and principles of the United Nations. In a more general way Mr. Contoumas considered that by repeating, in connexion with human rights, that laws could not be contrary to the Charter, the Lebanese amendment would weaken the well-established principle that international conventions took priority over national laws, so that a Government violating its international obligations incurred liability therefor.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) could not accept the Lebanese amendment for the reasons that had already been put forward by previous speakers. The preamble of the declaration recognized that the international protection of human rights should be the main guidepost in the evolution of man. It also spoke of the necessity for the State to guarantee those rights. The Lebanese amendment introduced the concept of the duties of the State. The majority of the Committee objected to the inclusion of that concept in the declaration and it would therefore be wiser to discuss it in connexion with the covenant.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) felt that many of the arguments that had been put forward against his amendment were not convincing. He disagreed with the Belgian representative that a reference to the Charter could only be regarded as a vicious circle. The principles concerning human rights set forth in the Charter were not subject to a pro-[670]vision like article 27; in other words, the State could not detract from the dignity of the human person for any reason whatsoever.

In reply to the United States representative, he expressed the view that the addition of his amendment would not change the character of the declaration; it would remain morally, but not legally, binding upon Member States.

He had been persuaded, however, by the argument of the Greek representative that there was a danger that his amendment could be interpreted as applying only to laws concerning human rights, and also by the argument that the amendment had perhaps already been covered by the provisions of article 27, paragraph 3. For those reasons, he would withdraw it. In his opinion, the discussion of his amendment had not been useless, if only because it had emphasized the need for a covenant of human rights.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) stated that his delegation would vote for the French amendment (A/C.3/345). However, he was anxious to make his interpretation of it clear.

Experience had shown how dangerous were the Nazi groups which, in certain countries of Central Europe, by constant infiltration and propaganda, had paved the way for the fascist regimes of Hitler and Mussolini. Some seemed to think that those facts belonged to a distant past; that was unfortunately not the case. Indeed not only were some countries still under the yoke of a fascist Government, but certain men prominent in the Hitler and Mussolini regimes had escaped the punishment they deserved, were still alive and, what was more, were still active. In the western occupation zones of Germany, fascist groups, the existence of which was known to the authorities, were recruiting, above all, former German army officers. No steps had, however, been taken to prohibit their activities. It might be feared that such an attitude could be interpreted as a tacit encouragement and might lead the fascists to hope that their enemies of yesterday would, tomorrow, provide them with arms for a new war. In the same way, certain organizations contained deserters and traitors who had fought on the side of the Nazis and who, fearing the just punishment which awaited them, had remained in Germany, where [671] the majority of them had found refuge in camps for displaced persons. That obviously represented a serious threat to the existence of the United Nations and to peace.

There was another and an equally serious threat. It was known that, after the First World War, high finance had supported the restoration of Germany's war potential. Today, an attempt in the same direction was being made. There was nothing surprising in the attitude of certain occupying Powers, since it was known that in their own countries there were organizations of a fascist character that differed in no respect from those which Nazi Germany had known. The Ku Klux Klan, whose activities were well known in the United States, was one example. Naturally, attempts were made to belittle the importance of those organizations on the ground that their membership was very small and their activity of little consequence. He recalled that the same attitude had formerly prevailed concerning the fascist organizations of Hitler and Mussolini. The disastrous consequences of such indifference were unfortunately all too well known. As the same causes had again arisen, there was every reason to fear the same results.

The French amendment created a barrier against those serious threats. The USSR delegation, which was aware of the existing danger, would therefore vote in favour of it.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) noted that the first twenty-six articles of the declaration which defined the fundamental rights of the individual had clearly indicated what a truly democratic society should be; such a society could exist only when its members did in actual fact enjoy the essential rights of man. It was therefore perfectly logical to end the declaration by provisions proclaiming in no uncertain terms that it would be illegal to attack those rights and thereby weaken the foundations of the democratic society. Consequently, article 28 was indispensable. That article stated expressly that neither the State nor the individual should infringe human rights. That clause was perfectly justified, since Member States had, in subscribing to Article 55 of the Charter, formally undertaken to respect those rights. That was a legal obligation for them; those who did not fulfil it were liable to the sanctions provided for in the Charter or, at any rate, to the moral censure of the world.

Although the Charter did not enumerate human rights – that was unnecessary since they had existed before the Charter and were inherent in man – it did expressly mention them. In signing the Charter, the States had agreed to limit their national sovereignty voluntarily. The Charter did not contain an enumeration of human rights; it imposed upon Member States the obligation to respect them. The object of the declaration was to lay down those rights in such a manner as to make them intelligible to the masses of the people.

Article 28 explicitly established the rights which derived from the Charter. The delegation of Chile [672] would therefore vote for that article. It would also vote for the French amendment, which was in perfect agreement with the view which the Chilean delegation had defended when it had submitted an amendment (A/C.3/304/Rev.1/Add.1) to insert in article 27 the principle of national solidarity.

MR. DEMCHENKO (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) stressed the fact that article 28 was designed to provide for the protection of the rights laid down in the declaration. The French amendment was a very important corollary thereto, especially in the light of the present world situation.

The delegation of the Ukrainian SSR had always denounced fascism, the race theories of which threatened human rights. The majority of fascist Governments had been destroyed by the allied victory, but some still existed and, moreover, in certain countries which were regarded as democratic, fascist forces were at work. Fascist elements were doing their utmost to disseminate their doctrine, in the hope of seizing power; if their efforts were crowned with success human rights would no longer exist in the countries in which those elements held sway.

It was striking that certain States, though they had taken part in the struggle against fascism, were thinking of reinstating its representatives. That tendency was most pronounced in the western occupation zones of Germany. There, magnates of high finance and industry, who were largely responsible for the advent of fascism and consequently for the war, had not only been liberated but reinstated by the occupying Powers. He mentioned in particular the cases of Krupp, Schacht and the directors of I. G. Farben.<sup>133</sup> In the same way, paramilitary organizations, under the leadership of ex-officers, were actively at work under the guise of athletic clubs. Those facts reminded one forcibly of what had happened in Germany after the allied victory in 1918. Similarly, the occupation authorities had set free certain concentration camp torturers, in particular Ilse Koch, who had acquired such an infamous reputation.<sup>134</sup> Finally, those same authorities received deserters and traitors who had fought with the Germans against their own countries.

All those facts adequately showed that fascism was far from being entirely extirpated. So long as any traces of fascism remained, human rights would be threatened. The French amendment was therefore necessary, and the delegation of the Ukrainian SSR would vote for it.

THE CHAIRMAN declared the general discussion closed and put to the vote the French amendment suggesting the addition of the word “group” after the word “State” in article 28.

The amendment was adopted by 42 votes, with 1 abstention.

MR. CHANG (China) pointed out that he had agreed with the representative of Uruguay to replace the words “perform any acts” in the English text of the amendment submitted by the latter (A/C.3/268) by the words “engage in any acts”.

[673]

MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) said he was prepared to accept the amendment proposed by the Chinese representative, and pointed out that the amendment would not affect the French text, which should retain its present wording.

<sup>133</sup> Gustav von Krupp was indicted by the International Military Tribunal but proceedings were stayed when he was found unfit to stand trial. An attempt to amend the indictment so as to include his son, Friedrich von Krupp, was dismissed by the judges. After the major Nuremberg trial, the Krupps were prosecuted before an American military tribunal sitting in Nuremberg. Most of them were convicted of crimes against humanity and sentenced to substantial prison terms. See: United States v. Krupp et al., (1950) 9 TWC 1327. In 1951, the High Commissioner of the American zone, John J. McCloy, pardoned the defendants and restored much of the property to the Krupp family. See: Kevin Jon Heller, The Nuremberg Military Tribunals and the Origins of International Criminal Law, Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2011, at pp. 354–5. Hjalmar Horace Greeley Schacht was Minister of Economics under the Third Reich, although he was later removed from power. He was one of three defendants to be acquitted by the International Military Tribunal. I. G. Farbenindustrie AG was Nazi Germany’s major chemical producer. It notoriously supplied Zyklon B gas to Nazi extermination camps. The directors of I. G. Farben were prosecuted by an American military tribunal: United States v. Krauch et al. (“The I. G. Farben Case”), (1952) 8 TWC 1081. The trial concluded in July 1948 with the conviction of thirteen of the twenty-four defendants. The convicted men benefited from early release and most resumed their careers in German industry.

<sup>134</sup> Ilse Koch, known as the “Bitch of Buchenwald”, was convicted by an American military court sitting in Dachau in 1947 for violations of the laws and customs of war. Sentenced to life imprisonment, her term was reduced to four years in June 1948 by General Lucius D. Clay, the interim military governor of the American zone. See: Joshua M. Greene, Justice at Dachau, New York: Broadway Books, 2003. Upon release, she was tried by West German courts and sentenced to life imprisonment. She committed suicide in detention in 1967.

THE CHAIRMAN recalled that, before the end of its work, the Committee would ask the representatives of the five official languages to appoint experts in order to ensure absolute agreement between the five texts established in the official languages, which would all be equally authentic.

Referring to the Uruguayan amendment amended by the Chinese amendment he stressed the difference between the word “activity” in the basic text of article 28 and the word “acts” proposed by Uruguay. He recalled that the Commission on Human Rights had preferred the word “activity”, as having a wider meaning than the word “acts”.

MR. GRUMBACH (France) agreed to the explanation given by the Chairman. He thought that it would be dangerous to replace the word “activity” by the word “acts”. In employing the former, the Human Rights Commission had wished to give a preventive sense to article 28, considering that it was preferable to prevent the final act which, in general, was the outcome of a long activity. In the case of Nazism and fascism, for example, the activity had been evident for many years. If the rights and the freedoms laid down in the declaration of human rights were really to be protected, provision should be made to prevent, at the very beginning, any activity aimed at their destruction.

The French representative asked the representative of Uruguay whether he would be prepared to accept the addition of the phrase “perform any acts” after the words “engage in any activity”.

MR. AQUINO (Philippines) pointed out that the modification proposed by the Chinese representative was not simply a drafting change. In his opinion, the expression “engage in any acts” was incorrect; he suggested the wording “perform any acts” or “engage in any activity”. In the wording of texts such as that of the declaration of human rights, expressions with a clear legal meaning should be used.

MRS. CORBET (United Kingdom) supported the Philippine representative’s observation.

She stated that she supported the proposal made by the French representative to employ the two expressions side by side, and formally asked that that proposal should be put to the vote.

MR. CHANG (China) said that, in view of the objections which his proposal had raised, he would not insist on it.

MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) said that he had hoped that the Chinese proposal would elucidate the English text of his amendment. In any case, the French text was the original; that text should therefore be strictly referred to when the English text was established.

The representative of Uruguay pointed out that, apart from the final act itself, the penal code dealt with a whole series of acts – preparatory acts, complicity etc. – which were clearly defined and punished by criminal law. Article 28 would therefore provide more effective protection if the term “acts” was used instead of the term “activity”. Such was the aim of the Uruguayan amendment.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the amendment proposed by the delegations of France and the United Kingdom suggesting to add the phrase: “or perform any acts” after the words “engage in any activity”.

The amendment was adopted by 28 votes to 4, with 11 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN stated that, since the text thus modified incorporated the Uruguayan amendment, it was no longer necessary to vote on the latter.

MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) asked that it be recorded that he had voted against that proposal.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the amendment proposed by the representative of Ecuador to replace the words “aimed at the destruction of” by the words “which might destroy”.

The amendment was rejected by 22 votes to 6, with 16 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote article 28 as a whole in its amended form..

Article 28, as amended, was adopted unanimously.

Article 21: Report of Sub-Committee 3 (A/C.3/363)

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba), Rapporteur of Sub-Committee 3, declared that he had not had time to submit his report to the Sub-Committee for its official approval. Certain points might therefore not be entirely clear, and he said that he was prepared to give consideration to any observations which representatives might have to make.

The first part of the report was a survey of the conditions in which it had been decided (143rd meeting) to entrust a sub-committee with the elaboration of a compromise text for article 21, the text of which (A/C.3/342) had been drafted by the Commission on Human Rights and later modified by the Cuban and USSR amendments, adopted in the Third Committee section by section but nevertheless rejected as a whole (141st meeting).

The second part of the report indicated that the debate had been divided into three phases. The discussion had first dealt with the question of the right of everyone to follow his vocation freely. With regard to that question, the Cuban representative stated that his delegation had been all the more ready to renounce its defence of paragraph 4 of document A/C.3/342, since article 27, adopted at a previous meeting, corresponded to the idea contained in that paragraph.

The second phase of the debate dealt with the question of non-discrimination. The USSR delegation had insisted that that idea should be retained in article 21; it had accepted the addition of discrimination as regards “religion”, as [675] well as “age”, as requested by the delegation of Ecuador. Since the compromise text adopted by the Sub-Committee had not entirely satisfied them, the representatives of the USSR and of Ecuador had reserved the right to raise the question again in the Third Committee and to submit an amendment the text of which would be found at the end of paragraph (b) of the second part of the report.

Finally, the third phase of the debate related to the question of the resources to be received by a worker.

Examining the last part of the report, he pointed out that it contained as annexes the text of the article which had been rejected as a whole by the Third Committee and the new text to which the Sub-Committee had agreed. Those texts spoke for themselves and would give the Committee an idea of how the discussion had evolved.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon), after congratulating the Rapporteur, Mr. Pérez Cisneros, on his excellent work, requested that the following two modifications might be made to the text of the report:

At the end of the first sub-paragraph a of the second part, the addition of the words “and by the Lebanese amendment” after the words “raised by one of the Cuban amendments”;

Under the heading “Discussion of the question of the right of everyone to follow his vocation freely” in the second part, the addition, between commas, after the words “to free choice of employment”, of the words “taken from the text previously submitted by the Lebanese delegation”.

MR. CHANG (China) thanked Sub-Committee 3 and its Rapporteur for having drawn up a decidedly better text than the previous one. He hoped that the Third Committee would work in the spirit of conciliation and impartiality, which had animated the members of the Sub-Committee.

Analysing the new text proposed for article 21, he expressed satisfaction at the skilful introduction of the idea of the free choice of employment in paragraph 1. The deletion of the words “and pay” in that paragraph, with a view to grouping everything connected with payment of the worker in paragraph 2, was a debatable point, but the Chinese delegation would not oppose it. With regard to the non-discrimination clause, although he found the compromise formula adopted to be useless, he nevertheless approved the idea of not enumerating the possible causes of discrimination.

The representative of China said that his delegation would prefer not to keep the second subparagraph of paragraph 2 in its present form for, if the idea of payment came within the scope of article 21, that of the social protection required to meet the needs of the worker's family belonged, on the contrary, to article 22, and it did not seem necessary to repeat it in article 21.

The Chinese delegation, whilst accepting paragraphs 1 and 3 without alteration, would have preferred paragraph 2 to be worded so as to retain merely the two following principles: the first sub-paragraph should include the principle that every working person had the right to just [676] remuneration; the second sub-paragraph should include the principle of equal pay for equal work.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) stressed that he had reserved the right, in the Sub-Committee, to refer again to the Third Committee on the amendment on non-discrimination submitted by his delegation (E/800, page 34). When the original text of article 21 had been examined, that amendment had been adopted by 21 votes to 14 (140th meeting). The new formula proposed by the Sub-Committee had only been adopted by 6 votes to 4, with one abstention; it could not be said therefore that it expressed the opinion of the majority of the members. The USSR delegation consequently considered that it was justified in insisting on the maintenance of a text approved by an indisputable majority of the members of the Third Committee, and hoped that it would be approved a second time, in view of the importance that that decision was bound to have for world public opinion.

It was true to say that article 2 of the draft declaration contained a general condemnation of discrimination; it also had to be admitted that, where work was concerned, discrimination assumed constant forms, particularly based on race, religion, nationality and sex. The delegation of Ecuador had pointed out that, in certain countries, age was also an element in discrimination. The USSR delegation, anxious to extend the scope of its amendment, had agreed to take that point of view into account. He did not believe it necessary to repeat the arguments he had already set forth in favour of the adoption of that amendment, without which article 21 would lose its truly progressive character.

MR. WATT (Australia) thanked the members of the Sub-Committee and their distinguished Rapporteur for the clear and objective character of their report.

He supported the Chinese representative's remarks regarding the second sub-paragraph of paragraph 2 of the text proposed by the Sub-Committee, as he considered that protection, not only for the individual but also for his family, was covered by article 22, which had already been adopted.

The formula employed in article 22 was broader than that proposed by the Sub-Committee for article 21. Indeed, the first part of the second sub-paragraph of paragraph 2 might be interpreted as giving everyone the right to receive just remuneration for work done, independently of the needs of his family. That interpretation would not be in accordance with the labour regulations in force in Australia, where, by means of a system of minimum wages supplemented by a scale of allowances, the personal needs of the worker and those of his family were both taken into account. The second part of the sub-paragraph provided that, if necessary, the remuneration would be supplemented by other means of social protection: in Australia, for example, family allowances were paid direct to all mothers, regardless of the situation of the fathers.

The Australian delegation, realizing the very satisfactory character of the system in force in [677] its country, could obviously not accept a provision to give the worker wages which would be just only in relation to his personal needs.

Mr. Watt emphasized that he had wished to draw the Committee's attention to the possibility of the second sub-paragraph of paragraph 2 being interpreted in that manner. He did not think that that was what the authors of the text had really intended, and would be glad to have an explanation on the subject.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) also expressed his appreciation of the excellence of the report submitted by Mr. Pérez Cisneros. However, in the same spirit of fairness as that which had inspired the Lebanese representative's intervention he desired that mention be made in paragraph 2 of the first part of the report that the proposal to set up a drafting sub-committee had come from the Belgian delegation.

The Belgian delegation was especially glad that it had made that suggestion since, in its opinion, the Sub-Committee's text was a considerable improvement on that first text submitted to the full Committee.

The Belgian delegation would only make one remark on a point of substance concerning the new text; it related to paragraph 2 and, more precisely to the first sub-paragraph of that paragraph, which had given rise to discussion in the Sub-Committee on account of the clause relating to non-discrimination. He regretted that fact, and especially deplored the misunderstanding which seemed to exist on that subject. Some delegations appeared to consider that it would be more satisfactory to enumerate a number of aspects of discrimination rather than to give a general formula similar to that submitted to the Sub-Committee by the Belgian delegation. Nevertheless, the formula "without any discrimination", which was short and complete, was the only one which corresponded entirely to the principle set forth in article 2 of the draft declaration, as it covered all possible cases of discrimination. Any enumeration ran the risk of excluding what it did not include. For instance, the causes of discrimination which might prevent a worker from obtaining employment were legion; it was impossible to enumerate them; for example, the draft submitted by the USSR delegation did not cover discrimination based on colour – as distinct from the idea of race, as clearly established by the Commission on Human Rights – nor did it cover political opinions. He was surprised to find that an enumeration could be preferred to a declaration of principle. In his view, the only progressive conception was that which excluded nothing and embraced all the possible causes of discrimination. He hoped that the delegations would recognize the facts and unanimously support a text such as that of the first sub-paragraph of paragraph 2.

MR. CASSIN (France) declared that, as former Chairman of the Sub-Committee, he was particularly well placed to commend the excellent understanding which had prevailed in that group, the members of which had manifested in the highest degree a spirit of conciliation and compromise. The text submitted was therefore a compromise text and must be considered as such.

In the same spirit, the French delegation would vote for the new paragraph 1 of article 21, which realized in regard to the idea of a free choice of employment, a much more satisfactory compromise than the text adopted previously.

It would also vote for the first sub-paragraph of paragraph 2, although it feared that the allusion to non-discrimination contained therein might give the impression that discrimination was permissible in the case of the other rights in regard to which the general principle of article 2 had not been repeated.

As to the second sub-paragraph of paragraph 2, the French delegation had at first shared the reservations expressed by certain delegations. It had also considered it preferable that the question of family allowances should appear in article 22 rather than in article 21. However, as the Committee had not seen fit to retain its amendment to article 22 on that subject, and as it was better to enunciate an important principle in a less suitable place than not to enunciate it at all, the French delegations would agree to the compromise suggested by the Sub-Committee in sub-paragraph 2 of paragraph 2.

Nevertheless, the French delegation wished to state explicitly that nothing in that text could authorize a lowering of the standard of living of the wage earners. The wage level must remain satisfactory in order to ensure the maintenance not only of the worker, but also of his family. The French delegation would never agree to consider sub-paragraph 2 of paragraph 2 of article 21 as a means of lowering the standard of living of the wage earners.

Again, the French delegation would accept paragraph 3, although it considered that the right to join a trade union was rather connected with the idea of freedom of association, a much broader principle, which had been embodied in article 18.

Finally, he stated that, as drafted by the Sub-Committee, article 21 while worthy of respect was not excellent and did not reach the high level of other articles dealing with labour. France would have been glad if, over and above wages and trade unions, the worker could have been brought to realize the dignity of his labour by indicating the possibility of his taking part in the management of the undertaking to which he belonged. However, the French delegation would not insist on those cherished opinions and would vote for article 21 in its entirety, desiring thereby to give an example of good discipline.

MR. BAROODY (Saudi Arabia) pointed out that the original text stated that everyone had the right to “just and favourable conditions of work and pay”. The presence of the term “just” was accounted for by that of the term “pay”. As the latter had been deleted, it would seem sufficient to speak of “favourable” conditions of work.

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) expressed her delegation’s deep gratitude for the remarkable work done by the Sub-Committee. The United States delegation fully appreciated the spirit of conciliation shown by the members of the Sub-Committee and she found their compromise text acceptable, except as regards the second subparagraph of paragraph 2. Certain countries, [679] including the United States, had learned from experience that the scale of wages should be fixed by assessing the work done, and not on the basis of considerations foreign to the idea of labour proper. The minimum wage was, moreover, calculated not only for the worker but also for his family. Social protection for the family was covered by article 22 and it was therefore unnecessary to repeat it in article 21.

The United States delegation would ask, when the time came for voting, that the second subparagraph of paragraph 2 should be put to the vote in parts; she would vote for only the first part of that sub-paragraph.

Furthermore she considered the wording of paragraph 1 excellent and would vote for it.

However, with regret, she would vote for only the first sub-paragraph of paragraph 2 owing to the presence of the non-discrimination clause which could only weaken article 2. In any case, she hoped that the Committee would choose the compromise formula accepted by the Sub-Committee in that connexion.

In conclusion, she congratulated the New Zealand delegation on the conciliatory spirit it had shown in accepting the expression “is free to form” instead of “has the right to form” in paragraph 3 of the Sub-Committee’s text.

MR. CARRERA ANDRADE (Ecuador) pointed out that, where labour was not organized, the free worker who was not a member of a trade union suffered from discriminatory action for reason of age; that discrimination affected elderly men in particular.

The problem might not exist in highly industrialized countries like the United States, the United Kingdom and the USSR but it was a very real problem in under-developed countries where trade unionism had not yet taken root, where social protection was not organized and where elderly workers who did not enjoy the benefits of social insurance were obliged to accept wages below the general level.

Hence, if the Committee favoured the enumeration of the principal causes of discrimination which might adversely affect the wage-earners’ rights, age should appear among those causes.

The delegation of Ecuador considered that the principle of non-discrimination should be stated again in article 21. In order to strengthen that principle, it should be proclaimed as precisely as possible. In that connexion, he pointed out that such a procedure had been accepted in the case of other articles of the draft declaration.

Further, the delegation of Ecuador would prefer to have the second subparagraph of paragraph 2 deleted, as it appeared to be contrary to the conception of a minimum basic wage; if, however, that part were retained, he considered that it was indispensable also to retain the idea of social protection, which had been introduced as the result of an amendment proposed in the Sub-Committee by the delegation of Ecuador.

Summary Record of the Hundred and Fifty-Seventh meeting
[of the Third Committee]

Held at the Palais de Chaillot, Paris, on Thursday,
25 November 1948, at 3 p.m.

Chairman: MR. CHARLES MALIK (Lebanon).

Article 21: Report of Sub-Committee 3 (A/C.3/363) (continued)

MR. HAMDI (Egypt) stated that the declaration was such an important document that considerable thought should be given to the final form. It had been decided that it should contain statements of a general character; to introduce unnecessary detail into any one article would impair the balance of the whole.

It should also be remembered that the declaration was intended for the future as well as for the present and should be general enough to be adapted to changing conditions. It already contained a whole article dealing with the principle of non-discrimination, which there was no need to reiterate.

The version of the second sub-paragraph of paragraph 2 submitted by the Sub-Committee in its report also introduced unnecessary detail by referring to means of social protection. Mr. Hamdi preferred the original text of that subparagraph.

MRS. CORBET (United Kingdom) paid a warm tribute to the Rapporteur and the Chairman of the Sub-Committee. While it had not been possible to achieve unanimity, agreement had been reached on a number of points. The United Kingdom delegation was prepared to support the new text with the exception of the part of the second sub-paragraph of paragraph 2, following the word “remuneration”. The proper place for the statement of that idea was article 22; if it were retained in article 21, it might prejudice the free discussion of wages between trade unions and employers. While she agreed that the needs of the family must be provided for, she thought that article 22 already did that.

She consequently requested that the clause in question should be put to the vote separately.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) remarked that the Sub-Committee had submitted a brilliant report which could not be praised too highly.

He could not, however, accept either the new text of the first sub-paragraph of paragraph 2 or the USSR-Ecuadorian amendment to it (A/C.3/363), part II, paragraph (b). The objection which applied to both was that a mention of non-discrimination in that one passage might be interpreted to mean that discrimination was not forbidden as regards other articles in the declaration and even the remaining parts of the same article.

Article 2 listed examples of certain forms of discrimination in the manner of examples; it applied equally to all the articles in the declaration. In order not to weaken that article it was necessary either to omit all further references to discrimination or to repeat the language of article [681] 2 in every one of the succeeding articles, lest the impression should arise that where discrimination was not expressly forbidden, it was permitted.

The phrase used by the Sub-Committee, "without any discrimination", was further objectionable in that the word "discrimination" was not in itself derogatory: perfectly justifiable and indeed laudable forms of discrimination existed. In the field of employment, for example, employees with greater length of service were frequently paid higher wages for the same work.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) said that he had no difficulty in accepting paragraph 1 of the text prepared by the Sub-Committee.

With respect to the first sub-paragraph of paragraph 2, he recalled that, during the vote taken by the Third Committee when it had first dealt with article 21, he had supported the USSR amendment which enumerated various forms of discrimination.<sup>1</sup> He had since come to the conclusion that the list was not complete and had consequently proposed the addition, at the end of the USSR-Ecuadorian amendment, of the words "political opinion or of any other nature" to replace "etc." He would prefer a complete enumeration of that kind to the phrase "without any discrimination", although it was also acceptable. The paragraph dealing with equal pay for equal work seemed the most appropriate place for a mention of non-discrimination, as there was frequently discrimination between men and women in that respect.

The second sub-paragraph of paragraph 2 was very similar to the Cuban amendment (A/C.3/232/Corr.1) which had once been accepted by the Third Committee.<sup>1</sup> He could not agree that the ground was already covered by article 22. That article dealt with social security for those who for various reasons were unable to work; article 21 spoke of remuneration adequate to the needs of those who did work and of their families. Thus, it protected the dignity of the working man, who should not be dependent on philanthropy. It was not correct to say that the passage might prejudice the question of wages; minimum wages were clearly covered in the article with respect to families of a normal size. Some provision had to be made, however, for those who had to support people too old to work, invalids, or numerous children. It was the duty of society to make sure that such families, too, could lead a life compatible with human dignity; insufficient calories made poor citizens.

The question of birth control would not arise in a society which enabled a man to raise and educate a large family.

He hoped that the Committee would find no difficulty in accepting paragraph 3 and thanked the New Zealand representative for the spirit of compromise shown when it had been drafted.

Because of the fundamental importance of the second sub-paragraph of paragraph 2, he requested that it be voted upon by roll-call.

MRS. MENON (India) wished to join other delegations in congratulating the Rapporteur of the Sub-Committee on his splendid work. Although she generally refrained from arguing on controversial issues, she felt constrained on that occasion to point out to the Committee that it was not entirely consistent. It had rejected certain amendments in the interests of brevity, yet on other occasions it had adopted lengthy articles; it had accepted repetitions at certain times and rejected them at others without a rational basis. Especially in so far as the USSR-Ecuadorian amendment was concerned, it had invoked arguments which clouded the issue and concealed its true motives.

What was the real reason for refusing to repeat a clause dealing with non-discrimination in article 21? The argument had been given that such a repetition would weaken the declaration. Yet the Charter itself repeated its non-discrimination clause four distinct times: in Articles 1, 13, 55 and 76. By that criterion, no document could be weaker than the Charter. Since the declaration, however, was intended to be merely a development of principles contained in the Charter, it could not in any case be stronger than the latter. A new argument would have to be found to defeat the USSR-Ecuadorian amendment.

It was no doubt difficult for Powers accustomed to regarding some races as inferior to understand and share the feelings of those who for centuries had suffered from discrimination. The Indian delegation would warmly support the amendment, as it had done on a previous occasion.

Mrs. Menon would vote against the second subparagraph of paragraph 2. She could not agree with the United States representative's remark that the word “everyone” meant every human being; in many countries it would still be understood as applying only to men; in others, as only to white men and women.

She would vote in favour of paragraph 3.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) observed, in reply to the Lebanese representative, that it was not logical to say that the clause on non-discrimination should be inserted in all articles or in none: it was needed in some articles, but not in others. The repetition of that clause in the first sub-paragraph of paragraph 2 would, far from weakening other articles, strengthen that particular provision, which most required it. Indeed, there was no field in which there was more discrimination as to race and sex than that of employment; no right had greater need of being safeguarded against discrimination than that of equal pay for equal work. Abuses in that field were so great that it was necessary to call attention to them and thus to give a concrete application to the principle of non-discrimination.

In conclusion, he pointed out that while the USSR-Ecuadorian amendment listed the forms of discrimination most relevant to the subject at hand, the list was not exhaustive, since it ended with the word “etc.”, and he was quite willing to add to it the word “colour”.

MISS BERNARDINO (Dominican Republic) said that her delegation was prepared to vote once more in favour of the USSR-Ecuadorian amendment in the firm conviction that the right of equal pay for equal work should apply to all without any distinction. It was a principle for which she had fought for many years.

She was not entirely satisfied with the word “everyone” as used in article 21. While it should, of course, embrace all human beings, the fact was that such a meaning was given to it only in advanced States where legislation did not discriminate against women. In many countries, however, women still did not have the right of citizenship and many other vital rights. It was for the benefit of those women that the articles of the declaration should state as explicitly as possible that no distinction as to sex was permissible with respect to the rights granted in them.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) expressed the hope that the Committee would accept the phrase “without any discrimination” in the first sub-paragraph of paragraph 2; it was preferable to the USSR-Ecuadorian amendment which enumerating as it did certain forms of discrimination might be construed as permitting forms not expressly mentioned.

The phrase “supplemented, if necessary, by such other means of social protection as may be required to meet the needs of his family” should be retained in article 21, which dealt with the rights of the worker and with the question of wages. It should not, as had been suggested, be considered in connexion with article 22, which dealt with the rights of the unemployed and with social security. Wages should be based not only on a person’s productive capacity but also on his own and his family’s needs. Twenty-five years' experience in his country had shown that family allowances amounted to only 6 per cent of the total sum paid out in wages. It could not be claimed, therefore, that the burden was too great to assume; moreover, the declaration should proclaim the principle but refrain from going into technical detail. He warmly supported the second subparagraph of paragraph 2.

MR. CONTOUMAS (Greece) said that he would vote in favour of paragraph 1. For reasons stated earlier, he was unable to vote in favour of either the first subparagraph of paragraph 2 or the [684] USSR-Ecuadorian amendment to it; having endeavoured in the Sub-Committee to find a suitable compromise and failed to do so, he would abstain from voting on that text. He was opposed, not to the principle of equal pay for equal work, but to the mention of non-discrimination in connexion with that principle.

He agreed with the Australian representative that the idea contained in the latter portion of the second sub-paragraph of paragraph 2 was already fully covered in article 22. If that sub-paragraph were put to the vote in two parts, he would vote in favour of the first and abstain from voting on the second.

He supported paragraph 3 of the article.

MR. CARRERA ANDRADE (Ecuador) expressed dissatisfaction with the word "discrimination" in paragraph 2 of article 21. The proper meaning of that word was "discernment"; he suggested that it might be replaced by the word "distinction".

MR. CHANG (China) indicated that article 21 might more accurately reflect the real feelings of the Committee if it stated that everyone, without discrimination, was entitled to work. Of what use was it to forbid discrimination with respect to equal pay if people were not hired for discriminatory reasons?

He thought that the phrase beginning "supplemented by" in the second subparagraph of paragraph 2 should be in article 22 rather than article 21.

MRS. NEWLANDS (New Zealand) congratulated the Rapporteur of the Sub-Committee on his excellent work and stated that her delegation would support the present text of paragraph 1. With regard to the first subparagraph of paragraph 2, she felt that specific reference to non-discrimination in particular articles weakened article 2; nevertheless, she would be prepared to accept the Sub-Committee's text because it avoided the difficulties raised by the USSR amendment. Cogent objections had been raised to the latter part of the second sub-paragraph of paragraph 2; it would be more appropriate in article 22. Consequently, the New Zealand delegation would abstain from voting upon that part, feeling that it should support to that extent the Sub-Committee's efforts at compromise.

She noted that the Sub-Committee had changed the words "Everyone is free to form" to "Everyone has the right to form" in paragraph 3, in order to make the language conform to the rest of the declaration. She would support that paragraph with a reservation which she would explain at a later stage.

MR. KURAL (Turkey) congratulated the Sub-Committee and its Rapporteur on the work done, and stated that he considered the text of article 21 to be an improvement on the previous draft, [685] although not yet perfect. He would support the deletion of the words "without any discrimination" in the first sub-paragraph of paragraph 2.

Regarding the second sub-paragraph he agreed with the Lebanese representative that higher wages might depend on length of service. Further, this clause would be in contradiction with the provisions which grant salaries proportional to the size of the workers' family. He would support its deletion in view of the fact that its provisions were already adequately covered by article 22.

The rest of the article met with his approval and he would vote for it.

MR. KAMINSKY (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) wished to introduce an amendment (A/C.3/366) to the second sub-paragraph of paragraph 2 of the Sub-Committee's draft of article 21. The text after the word "remuneration" would read as follows: "ensuring for his family and himself a decent existence, and supplemented, if necessary, by means of social protection".

He submitted the amendment in a spirit of compromise to meet the views of the Australian representative and others.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) agreed that the reference to the principle of non-discrimination repeated the idea contained in article 2, but felt that, far from being superfluous, that repetition would strengthen article 21. Several representatives were now suggesting that their inclusion of those words would necessitate their being inserted in all the articles of the declaration. That attitude was hypocritical and designed to conceal the fact that they did not want a provision which would protect workers from discrimination; had they been sincere in their suggestion, they would have raised it earlier in connexion with the other articles of the declaration. By raising the question at this particular stage in the discussion, they were simply attempting to confuse the issue.

The Byelorussian representative's proposal deserved the attention of the Committee, as it went partway to meet the views of the Australian and other representatives.

MR. COROMINAS (Argentina) congratulated the Rapporteur on the Sub-Committee's excellent report and said he would vote for the text it had put forward without reservation.

In a free and democratic manner, the Argentine Government was engaged in modernizing its labour legislation. The selfish role of capital had been minimized and the country had gained its economic independence. The Argentine Constitution reflected the wishes of the people as it had never done before in the history of the country.

After the struggle for and the achievement of the independence of countries like his own, they had concentrated on increasing their wealth and productivity.

Argentina was now straining its [686] efforts to establish a new political era in which social legislation played a principal role. For many years, economic and political concepts had been governed by the theory of liberalism. In an attempt to preserve the rights of the individual, the rights of society had been relegated to a subordinate position. However, the weakness of the belief that the central power should only exist to preserve law and order had long been recognized. The policy of liberalism had resulted in capitalistic monopolies and the conversion of labour into merchandise without value. The Argentine Government had dedicated itself to the protection of labour and the President was regarded as the first among the workers. Given the choice between the individualism and collectivism, Argentina preferred the concept of the individual in his proper relation to society.

The decision as to whether the workers would be a democratic force in the development of civilization would be decided by the result of the vote on article 21.

MR. CAMPOS ORTIZ (Mexico) recognized the fact that some representatives regarded the inclusion of a reference to the principle of non-discrimination as unnecessary and even dangerous. The majority of the Committee, however, appeared to be of the opinion that the repetition of that principle was one of the most important elements of article 21. The formal and technical arguments to the effect that such a repetition was undesirable were not relevant to a document such as the Declaration of Human Rights. Where discrimination existed, it existed particularly in regard to labour; repetition of the principle of non-discrimination would only strengthen the article on the right to work.

THE CHAIRMAN called for a vote on paragraph 1 of the text of article 21, submitted by the Sub-Committee.

Paragraph 1 was adopted by 44 votes to none, with one abstention.

THE CHAIRMAN then drew the Committee's attention to the USSR-Ecuadorian amendment to the first sub-paragraph of paragraph 2 altering the phrase "without discrimination" to read "without distinction as to race, nationality, sex, age or religion, etc."

On the request of the representative of Ecuador, the word "age" was voted on separately.

It was rejected by 26 votes to 18, with 4 abstentions.

On request of the representative of the Dominican Republic, the word "sex" was voted on separately.

It was rejected by 22 votes to 22, with 5 abstentions.

As a result of the outcome of the two preceding votes, MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) withdrew his sub-amendment for the insertion in the USSR-Ecuadorean amendment of the words “political opinion or of any other nature”.

[687]

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the USSR-Ecuadorian amendment as a whole.

A vote was taken by roll-call, as follows:

Poland, having been drawn by lot by the Chairman, was called upon to vote first.

In favour: Poland, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Yugoslavia, Argentina, Burma, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Colombia, Costa Rica, Czechoslovakia, Ecuador, Haiti, India, Mexico, Pakistan.

Against: Siam, Sweden, Syria, Turkey, United Kingdom, United States, Uruguay, Yemen, Australia, Belgium, Bolivia, Brazil, Canada, China, France, Greece, Guatemala, Honduras, Lebanon, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Panama, Paraguay, Philippines.

Abstaining: Venezuela, Chile, Cuba, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Egypt, Iran, Iraq, Liberia, Peru.

The amendment was rejected by 25 votes to 15, with 10 abstentions.

Upon the proposal of the representative of Ecuador, the Chairman called for a vote on the substitution of the word “distinction” for “discrimination” in paragraph 2.

The proposal was rejected by 25 votes to 7, with 13 abstentions.

At the request of the representative of Guatemala, the Chairman asked for a roll-call vote on the phrase “without any discrimination”.

A vote was taken by roll-call, as follows:

Haiti, having been drawn by lot by the Chairman, was called upon to vote first.

In favour: Haiti, Honduras, India, Iran, Liberia, Mexico, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Panama, Paraguay, Peru, Poland, Siam, Sweden, Syria, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Kingdom, United States, Uruguay, Venezuela, Yugoslavia, Argentina, Australia, Belgium, Bolivia, Brazil, Burma, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Canada, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Egypt, France, Guatemala.

Against: Lebanon, Yemen, China.

Abstaining: Iraq, Philippines, Turkey, Greece, Ecuador.

The phrase was retained by 41 votes to 3, with 5 abstentions.

The first sub-paragraph of paragraph 2 was adopted by 47 votes to none, with 1 abstention.

THE CHAIRMAN drew attention to the Egyptian and Byelorussian amendments to the second subparagraph of paragraph 2. The former called for the insertion of the words “in order to satisfy the needs of his family and himself”, after the word “remuneration”.

MR. WATT (Australia) asked the Byelorussian representative whether his amendment (A/C.688]3/666) intended that the worker’s remuneration should meet the needs of his family, regardless of its size. He had pointed out that in Australia the worker’s basic wage was designed to meet the needs of man, wife, and two children, but had stated that he only wanted to ensure that the Australian point of view would not be excluded under the terms of article 21. As the Byelorussian amendment now appeared to him to read, it might raise difficulties for some delegations.

MR. KAMINSKY (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) explained that the purpose of his amendment was to improve the text of paragraph 2 which had emerged from the Sub-Committee. As the text now read, the needs of the family were left almost exclusively to “other means of social protection”. His amendment would have the effect of ensuring a decent existence for the worker.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) moved the closure of the debate on the Egyptian and Byelorussian amendments.

The motion was adopted by 26 votes to 5, with 10 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the Egyptian proposal.

The amendment was rejected by 24 votes to none, with 15 abstentions.

The representative of the Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic having accepted a proposal by the representative of Belgium for the insertion, in his amendment, of the word “other” before “means of social protection”, the Chairman put the proposal to the vote.

A vote was taken by roll-call, as follows:

Yugoslavia, having been drawn by lot by the Chairman, was called upon to vote first. In favour: Yugoslavia, Belgium, Bolivia, Brazil, Burma, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Chile, Costa Rica, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, France, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, India, Iraq, Liberia, Netherlands, Panama, Peru, Poland, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Uruguay.

Against: Canada, China, New Zealand, Syria, United Kingdom, United States.

Abstaining: Argentina, Australia, Greece, Norway, Paraguay, Philippines, Sweden, Turkey, Venezuela, Yemen.

The amendment was adopted by 27 votes to 6, with 10 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN announced that the Chinese and United Kingdom proposal for the deletion of the second part of the second sub-paragraph of paragraph 2 was thereby automatically rejected.

On the request of the representative of the United States of America, the Chairman put the first part of the second sub-paragraph of paragraph 2, i.e., the words “Everyone who works has [689] the right to just and favourable remuneration”, to the vote.

That part was adopted by 42 votes to none, with 1 abstention.

THE CHAIRMAN put the second sub-paragraph of paragraph 2, as amended, to the vote by a show of hands. The representative of Cuba, having reminded the Chairman that he had previously requested a roll-call vote on that sub-paragraph, the Chairman complied with his request.

A vote was taken by roll-call, as follows:

France, having been drawn by lot by the Chairman, was called upon to vote first.

In favour: France, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, India, Iraq, Liberia, Netherlands, New Zealand, Panama, Peru, Poland, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Uruguay, Yugoslavia, Argentina, Australia, Belgium, Bolivia, Brazil, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Chile, Costa Rica, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Ecuador.

Against: Norway, Sweden, Syria, United Kingdom, United States of America, Canada.

Abstaining: Greece, Paraguay, Philippines, Turkey, Venezuela, Yemen, China.

That sub-paragraph was adopted by 29 votes to 6, with 7 abstentions.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) reserved his position concerning the voting procedure. The fact that a roll-call vote had been taken after a vote by show of hands on the same subject could not be regarded as a precedent.

THE CHAIRMAN assured the Belgian representative that it would not be regarded as a precedent. As the Cuban representative had reminded him of his request for a roll-call vote after the vote by show of hands had been taken, he had felt compelled to comply with that request.

He put paragraph 3 to the vote.

Paragraph 3 was adopted by 41 votes to none.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote article 21 as a whole.

A vote was taken by roll-call, as follows:

Belgium, having been drawn by lot by the Chairman, was called upon to vote first.

In favour: Belgium, Bolivia, Brazil, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Chile, Costa Rica, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, France, Greece, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, India, Iraq, Liberia, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Panama, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Sweden, Syria, Turkey, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Kingdom, Uruguay, Venezuela, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Argentina, Australia.

Against: United States of America.

Abstaining: Canada, China.

Article 21 was adopted by 39 votes to 1, with 2 abstentions.

The meeting rose at 6:30 p.m.

Summary Record of the Hundred and Fifty-Eighth Meeting
[of the Third Committee]

Held at the Palais de Chaillot, Paris, on Thursday,

Article 21: Report of the Sub-Committee 3 (A/C.3/363) (continued)

THE CHAIRMAN invited any members who wished to explain their vote on article 21 to speak.

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) stated that her delegation had voted against article 21 as a whole. Although it was in agreement with paragraphs 1 and 3, it could not accept the second sentence of paragraph 2. In the first place, it would be a matter for long and difficult discussion to decide exactly what was meant by “a decent existence”. Secondly, the principle of the supplementation of wages would prove extremely difficult of implementation. Different countries had different methods of giving social protection to the worker who needed more than he was able to earn. To assess a worker’s wages by his needs rather than by the work he performed was, in her opinion, a false principle. She had therefore voted against article 21, although she fully understood the feelings of the Committee and regretted that she had been unable to support the majority.

MR. DAVIES (United Kingdom) had voted in favour of the article, although his delegation shared many of the United States representative’s views on the subject. As a statement of ideals, which, although somewhat vaguely expressed, contained many valuable concepts which were endorsed by the United Kingdom, the article could not but claim the support of his delegation. The United Kingdom delegation was, however, opposed to that part of the article which contained the principle of the supplementation of wages, since the subject of social protection had already been adequately covered in article 22. Moreover, in accepting the principle of equal pay for equal work, the United Kingdom Government was not accepting any obligation to promote that principle outside its official services.

It was subject to those two explanations that the United Kingdom had accepted article 21.

MR. LUNDE (Norway) had found it possible to vote in favour of the article as a whole, although he did not altogether approve of the drafting.

He had voted in favour of paragraph 1, and the first sentence of paragraph 2, which he considered a better and clearer text than the USSR text. With regard to the second sentence of paragraph 2, he was in strong agreement with the United Kingdom representative; the question of social protection was well covered by article 22. He had therefore voted against that part of the article.

MR. WATT (Australia) had voted for the inclusion of the phrase “without any discrimination”, although he had opposed it in earlier discussions. He had supported it in the present context as a recognition of the co-operative spirit of those members of the Committee who had agreed to reopen the whole discussion of the article.

With regard to the Byelorussian amendment (A/C.3/366), he had abstained in the first vote on it, as closure of the debate had been moved soon after the text had been introduced (157th meeting). That procedure had, he considered, been incorrect, since members had been given no opportunity to discuss the amendment. In the final vote, however, he had been able to support the sentence, since the Byelorussian representative had explained that it was not intended to interfere with the particular system which might be in use in any country. It would not bind any State to supplement a person's needs in the form of wages, since part could be in the form of social protection.

While agreeing that the subject of social protection was adequately covered in article 22, he had voted for the article as a whole out of respect for the co-operative spirit of the other members of the Committee.

THE CHAIRMAN explained that when the Byelorussian amendment had been submitted he had informed the Committee that he would allow it to be discussed before it was put to the vote. The discussion had, indeed, continued until a member had moved the closure of the debate, which had been supported by an overwhelming majority, the Chinese representative having been the only member to speak against the closure. He wished to point out to the Australian representative, therefore, that the procedure with regard to the Byelorussian amendment had been perfectly in order.

MRS. NEWLANDS (New Zealand) stated that her delegation had urged throughout the discussion that the declaration of human rights should be a statement of general principles which would not impose legal obligations. The New Zealand delegation had therefore endeavoured to support articles as concise as possible, suggesting that more detailed terms should be left to the covenant. The work the Commission on Human Rights had already done had shown the necessity of taking into account the national legislation of Member States; just as their historical backgrounds and economic and social structures differed, so would there be differences in the way in which particular rights and freedoms could be realized in their territories. The declaration should therefore confine itself to general principles, leaving to the covenant the adjustment of those principles to the requirements of individual Members.

The New Zealand amendment to paragraph 3 (A/C.3/267), which had been proposed as a compromise text to cover the different forms of trade union organizations in the different States, had been rejected, but the Committee had agreed, in a spirit of conciliation much appreciated by the New Zealand delegation, to change the wording of the original draft from "everyone is free to form..." [692] to "everyone has the right to form...". The New Zealand delegation could accept that text, since it might be interpreted as consistent with the industrial conciliation and arbitration system which functioned in New Zealand and which was best calculated to ensure the protection of both worker and employer in the special conditions of that country.

During the discussion of article 18, when the Uruguayan amendment (A/C.3/268) to the effect that no one should be compelled to belong to an association had been considered and accepted by the Committee (131st meeting), reference had been made to the position of trade unions. The New Zealand delegation, however, did not interpret article 18 as affecting the right to form and join trade unions; with all due respect to the contrary view expressed by the French representative, it took the view that that right was governed by the particular provisions of paragraph 3 of article 21 and not by the general provisions of article 18.

It was in the light of the above interpretations that the New Zealand delegation had voted for the final text of article 21 (157th meeting). It had voted against the Byelorussian amendment, on the ground that the question of social security was more appropriately dealt with in article 22, but had supported paragraph 2 as a whole.

MR. KAMINSKY (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) had voted for the article as a whole, as he considered it perfectly logical. The Byelorussian amendment had pointed out that the level of remuneration should be sufficiently high to allow workers a decent standard of living, and he failed to see what members could find to object to in that.

MR. CHANG (China) stated that he had objected to the closure of the debate when the Byelorussian amendment had been under discussion as he had wanted more time in which to examine it. The introduction of that amendment had made article 21 more of a duplication of article 22 than before, and the Chinese delegation had abstained from voting on the second sentence of paragraph 2. Paragraph 3 of the new text was a definite improvement.

In the final vote on the article as a whole, the Chinese delegation had abstained, although it felt that the new text was certainly an improvement on the earlier text against which it had voted originally (141st meeting).

MRS. KALINOWSKA (Poland) had voted in favour of article 21 as a whole. With regard to the first sentence of paragraph 2, she considered the question of non-discrimination in the question of salaries of great importance, and in that connexion she wished to pay a tribute to the representative of India, who had touched upon the crux of the problem at the preceding meeting. The best proof of the importance of that matter lay in the vote itself. While she regretted that the USSR text had not been accepted (157th meeting), she had voted for the final text submitted by the Sub-Committee.

With regard to the Byelorussian amendment, she stated that in Poland not only men but women [693] received family allowances if they were responsible for a family. Article 21 merely safeguarded that equality.

MR. KURAL (Turkey) had already explained that he could not vote for paragraph 2 of the article, as its provisions were a repetition of articles 2 and 22 and some of them could lend themselves to misinterpretation. He had therefore abstained in the vote on that paragraph.

He had, however, voted in favour of the article as a whole, as it contained provisions which were already applied in Turkey and because, despite its inadequacy, it included ideas which would be to the advantage of all people.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) had voted in favour of the article, which he regarded as the cornerstone of the whole system which was being established for the defence of human rights and human dignity, which were all too often endangered by material conditions.

The question of remuneration, which was of fundamental importance, had two different aspects: the relative aspect, of equal pay for equal work, and the absolute aspect, according to which a worker should receive complete protection through his salary. That concept must be broadened to include protection of the worker's family when the support of his family could not be ensured by the worker's earning powers. Such a provision would eliminate many social dangers, and was essential in the declaration.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) pointed out that every article of the declaration must perforce be a compromise, and reminded those members who wished their own ideology, whether religious or political, to prevail that such a desire was incompatible with international collaboration. It was only by compromise that any understanding could be reached in the present-day world. It was with those facts in mind that the article in question should be considered.

The Belgian delegation was not completely satisfied with the final text. Remembering, however, the long discussion that had taken place before that text could be established, and in a desire to show a spirit of conciliation, it had voted in favour of each separate paragraph and finally for the article as a whole.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that his delegation had voted for the article as a whole. The right to work was very important. He wished to point out that the USSR delegation had made great efforts to contribute to the drafting of a satisfactory article. His delegation had always worked for inclusion of the principles contained in the article as re-drafted by the Sub-Committee, with the inclusion of the Byelorussian amendment, and he was glad that the Committee had adopted them. He was not, however, completely satisfied because he had wished for the inclusion of a provision which would have forbidden discrimination of all kinds. He reminded the Committee that he had found some support in the Sub-Committee for the proposal that no discrimination with regard to work should be made [694] as between men and women. The elimination of that provision had undoubtedly weakened the article. It was important to recall that the vote had been close; he regretted that the supporters of the provision prohibiting discrimination as to sex had not been more consistent in their effort to persuade the Committee. Despite the article's shortcomings, however, his delegation had been able to vote for it. Those who had opposed the provision against discrimination might find it hard to allay suspicions that they had done so because they did not wish to see such a right applied in colonial countries.

MR. CASSIN (France) said that those who had voted against the inclusion of a specific prohibition against discrimination had not done so because they favoured the practice. He did not think that it was wise to mention "age" because it might interfere, for example, with the ability of a State to support the right of seniority in certain wage agreements.

The greatest caution should be exercised about making excessively detailed statements in what was intended to be a general declaration of rights. The declaration, however, should not be regarded as a substitute for international conventions regulating such matters as labour.

He had been very glad to vote for the Byelorussian amendment, which was a great improvement on the compromise text. There might be some danger that it might appear to go too far; but French legislation, like the Belgian, had long had a system of family allowances which were paid without regard to the rate of wages, so that there could be no fear that the provision would infringe upon national sovereignty. He had voted for the whole article as amended.

Proposed Article on Measures of Implementation (E/800, page 12)

THE CHAIRMAN said that the article on measures of implementation would not have been placed before the Committee had not the French and Cuban delegations submitted amendments (A/C.3/306, A/C.3/306/Corr.1). Those amendments indicated that the delegations concerned sought agreement on a new text. He therefore called for general debate on those amendments.

MR. CASSIN (France) recalled that the article on the right of petition had been accepted at the second session of the Commission on Human Rights.<sup>1</sup> The French delegation had, however, found that the text was too lengthy and had accepted the view that it should not be inserted in the draft international declaration of human rights.

At the third session his delegation had come to believe that that right could not be accepted before the measures of implementation had been studied; but it had never held the view that the right of petition was in itself to be considered as a measure of implementation.

The Commission had not

thought it possible to present a full statement of rights without including the right to petition.

It was even questionable whether the declaration could be considered complete without the statement of such a right. That right had been recognized throughout history because it permitted an appeal to the justice meted out by the authorities. The right had been mentioned in all historical declarations of the rights of man; it had always been the equivalent of the right to justice itself. It would, therefore, be impossible to refuse to recognize the right to petition the public authorities of the State of which a person was a national or in which he resided. Admittedly, the right to petition on the international level was a much more delicate matter. It was, however, consonant with the spirit of the Charter where several Articles referred to the protection of human rights.

The United Nations, moreover, had frequently received petitions, not only from its subsidiary organs but from individual Member States. Many of those petitions had not yielded any results, but that was no valid reason for rejecting the principle. He did not fail to see the difficulties which recognition of this right on an international level might cause. The United Nations should follow the precedent of the League of Nations, which had received petitions from mandated territories; but it was open to question whether such right of petition should be confined to Trust Territories.

Certainly there might be many practical difficulties; there was the danger of infringing on sovereignty and the risk of being flooded by petitions. In the present state of the world, however, it was essential that men should know that their petitions would receive a hearing. An article to safeguard that right was needed in the declaration.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) said that the arguments of the representative of France applied to a large degree to the substance of the Cuban amendment. He agreed that the right to petition was a right in itself, not merely a measure of implementation. That right had already been recognized in the positive and constitutional law of many countries. It should, therefore, appear in the declaration. The Cuban amendment did not go so far as the French; it did not include the right to appeal to the United Nations. To declare such a right at the present time would undoubtedly raise difficulties in the international field. That part of the French amendment was unfortunately premature. The more general formulation in the Cuban amendment was more appropriate to the critical times through which the world was passing. The competent authority to which the Cuban amendment referred could be defined as any authority now recognized and all those authorities which might be recognized in the future by conventions between the United Nations and international bodies. The Cuban amendment was thus more restricted than the French, but it was more practical.

Objections might be raised to the declaration of a right to obtain prompt action on petitions. He [696] would be prepared to withdraw that phrase, but he felt bound to point out that if action were not prompt, there might be a danger that the whole purpose of the article might be frustrated. He would, however, accept any compromise which might be suggested.

MR. CAMPOS ORTIZ (Mexico) appealed for the greatest caution in considering the proposed article. The limitation on the time for debate might lead the Committee to take a hasty decision on an article which had not been considered by the Commission on Human Rights. No objection could be raised to the argument of the representative of France in so far as he had referred to national authorities. Nearly all constitutions contained the right of petition.

The right to petition the United Nations, however, was a very different matter. In the present stage of the international community its inclusion in the declaration might not yet be opportune, particularly because it might appear to set a form of international jurisdiction above the sovereign jurisdiction of States. The United Nations, moreover, had no machinery to deal with petitions from States which were not Members. The Secretariat would have to create such machinery because it would be unthinkable that petitions should remain completely unheeded, and this would imply implementation. The creation of a supranational body would become necessary; but that was contrary to Article 2 of the Charter. The whole conception, indeed, was not in accordance with the Charter, which referred only to the promotion of respect for human rights but nowhere made their protection obligatory. In present circumstances, that protection could only be a matter for national legislation.

If, as the representative of France had argued, the right of petition was not a measure of implementation but a right, the United Nations would have to take action on that right; and that in itself would call for measures of implementation. The greatest caution should therefore be exercised about entrusting the United Nations with the international protection of such a right.

THE CHAIRMAN reminded the representative of Mexico that Article 56 of the Charter referred explicitly to the pledge by all Members to take joint and separate action in co-operation with the United Nations and Article 55, paragraph c referred to the promotion by the United Nations of universal respect for, and observance of human rights. Those phrases were repeated in the preamble to the declaration.

MR. CAMPOS ORTIZ (Mexico) pointed out that the Article quoted mentioned “respect for human rights”; it did not mention “protection” of human rights. The two ideas were entirely different.

MR. DAVIES (United Kingdom), while appreciating the eloquent arguments advanced by the representatives of France and Cuba, asked [697] whether it was not premature to consider the article. The whole question of the right of petition was intimately bound up with that of implementation and he would remind the Committee that at the third session of the Commission on Human Rights the consideration of that article had been deferred until the Commission came to deal with the measures of implementation. The Committee should abide by that decision, the more so as the question of the right of petition involved a number of difficulties.

If the fundamental and general right were referred to in the amendments submitted, then that right was covered by article 17 of the declaration, but the article as drafted by the French and Cuban representatives went further than a general statement, and touched directly upon the question of implementation. The latter had, as the representative of Mexico had pointed out, two aspects: the right to petition a national public authority and the right to petition the United Nations. The later presupposed the existence of machinery to deal with petitions and raised the cognate problem of the petitioner’s immunity from penalties and liabilities. The right of petition was fully established and freely used in the United Kingdom. It was subject to no restriction. The French amendment, however, restricted the right of an individual to petition the competent organs of the United Nations to matters relating to human rights.

However, as the subject had been discussed by the Commission on Human Rights and would be considered again in connexion with the draft covenant, it would not perhaps be opportune for the Committee to prejudge the Commission’s findings by adopting one or other of the amendments. If the French amendment were adopted, then the competent organs to which it referred would have to be set up.

The Cuban amendment was broader in concept than the French, since it referred to “a competent authority” and allowed the individual to address a petition on any subject whatsoever. In the opinion of the United Kingdom delegation, that amendment was unnecessary, since the substance of the matter was fully covered by article 17.

The further question of prompt action raised by the Cuban amendment was also fraught with difficulty. It was not always possible or desirable to take prompt action on petitions presented by individuals or groups lacking a sense of responsibility. Many examples of such petitions could be gleaned from the experience of the United Nations; if the subject were pursued further in the Committee, he feared that it would lead to considerable controversy and he believed that it would be preferable for the Commission on Human Rights to consider the question of appropriate machinery in connexion with the draft covenant and the measures for its implementation.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) expressed the opinion that the arguments put [698] forward by the representatives of Mexico and the United Kingdom were convincing and that it was untimely for the Committee to interrupt its consideration of the declaration in order to deal with a specific question which referred to measures of implementation and did not concern the text of the declaration. He agreed that it would be preferable for the Commission on Human Rights to consider the matter further before it was submitted to the General Assembly. The right of petition could hardly be considered as a fundamental right; it was closely bound up with the aspect of implementation, and should not figure in the declaration itself.

The amendment touched upon two different questions: the right to petition a national authority and the right to petition the United Nations. It would seem that the first provision constituted an infringement of national competence and touched upon the question of national sovereignty. The right of petition was fully established in the USSR, where machinery to deal with petitioners and complaints existed on a national scale, but that was a question of national law, and there was no place for such a provision in the declaration.

As for the right to petition the United Nations, the French amendment envisaged the possibility of a State being accused by one of its own citizens and being obliged to answer an indictment as though before a court of law. There was nothing in the Charter to warrant such a procedure, which encroached upon the dignity of States and gave rise to very serious considerations.

He agreed that the first part of the French amendment was fully covered by article 17 and was therefore unnecessary; the second part was also wholly unnecessary, and should be referred to the Commission on Human Rights for consideration. As the representative of the United Kingdom had said, the Commission should be able to examine the matter without being bound by any decisions taken or opinions expressed by the Committee.

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) pointed out that, at its third session, the Commission on Human Rights had not examined the text dealing with the right of petition. It had submitted the question to the Sub-Commission on the Prevention of Discrimination and the Protection of Minorities, whose report had not been wholly satisfactory and had led the Committee to postpone its own examination of the matter. Although she did not consider that the right of petition constituted implementation, it certainly required implementation. It was for that reason that the Commission had decided to consider the question when it considered measures of implementation. The Commission constantly received petitions and acknowledged them, but was unable to do more until a decision had been taken on implementation.

She supported the proposal made by the representatives of Mexico, the United Kingdom, and the USSR to refer the question back to the Commission, although she fully understood the feelings of the French and Cuban representatives.

MR. CARRERA ANDRADE (Ecuador) believed that it was essential for the advancement of the cause of the United Nations to give recognition to a right which was an essential corollary of human rights. If the right of petition were not respected and no competent organs were set up, the declaration would merely become an ideological manifesto. It was essential to raise to an international plane a right which was an integral part of democratic faith. It certainly had a place in the declaration. He was surprised that apprehensions should have been expressed on the subject and that arguments, tinged by feelings of narrow nationalism, should have been advanced. All States Members of the United Nations had entered into an association and had accepted a common flag for the sake of peace. For the Committee to reject that article was tantamount to rendering the declaration ineffective; it must be a tool in the hands of the man in the street and not a mere ornament of international law.

He failed to understand the attitude taken by the representative of the United Kingdom, particularly in view of the fact that the right of petition was so firmly established in that country. Why should that concept not be acceptable in the new charter for which mankind had paid the price of two wars?

He must remind the representatives of the United States and the USSR that their countries had abandoned the concept of narrow local sovereignties in order to build up vast federations. Considerations of sovereignty were out of place, and he would urge the Committee to vote for the article.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) agreed that the amendments submitted by the representatives of France and Cuba were of the greatest importance for the future of human rights. He fully endorsed the reasons given for their amendments by those two representatives and would stress the point that the United Nations did receive petitions even if they were not called by that name. Those communications were dealt with in a restrictive sense, but, none the less, showed the need that men felt to address themselves to an international organization.

The representative of France had clearly stated the paradox by which the inhabitants of Territories included in the Trusteeship System had the right to petition the Trusteeship Council, whereas the citizens of the administering countries did not possess that right.

The Committee would shortly have to examine a Yugoslav proposal that the declaration should be extended to Trust Territories and Non-Self-Governing Territories. His delegation would take a positive attitude in the matter; it approved of the right of petition as established under the Trusteeship System and considered as necessary and desirable its extension to all persons.

The objections relating to the competence of the United Nations in the matter were unfounded, [700] and he could not but agree with the reference made by the Chairman to Article 56 of the Charter.

Moreover paragraph (c) of Article 55 explicitly referred to “universal respect for, and observance of, human rights and fundamental freedoms. . .” The point raised in regard to national sovereignty was always raised in international law by those who took a reactionary attitude. He would hazard the prophecy that if that objection were raised at every stage of its work, the United Nations would in due course be destroyed.

He agreed, however, with those representatives who had proposed that the question should be referred back to the Commission on Human Rights. He believed that the right of petition should be dealt with in the covenant, since the declaration was not legally binding. The United Nations was not yet equipped to deal with petitions. The best way of settling the matter was, as the Belgian delegation had always maintained, by means of an international convention.

MR. INSFRAN (Paraguay) agreed with the views expressed at the previous meeting by the Mexican representative. His delegation fully supported the principle of the right of petition at the national level, for that right was a provision of the Constitution of Paraguay. To establish the right of petition at an international level, however, by affirming the right of individuals to petition the United Nations would constitute an interference in the sovereignty of States, and his delegation could not accept that. Even if, as the representative of Ecuador had stated, the abolition of national frontiers was a legitimate and noble aspiration, it was not one that could be realized as things were at present, and any measures that did not respect the national sovereignty of States would be out of place.

MR. COROMINAS (Argentina) stated that at the Bogotá Conference his delegation had approved the drafting of an article on the right of petition, worded as follows:

“Everyone has the right, either individually or in association with others, to submit petitions or communications to any competent authority, for [701] reasons of either general or private interest, and the right to obtain prompt action thereon.”

That right was also inscribed in the Constitution of Argentina. His delegation therefore supported the Cuban amendment (A/C.3/261), which was based on the Declaration of Bogotá, because he thought the right of petition should be exercised within the limits of national frontiers.

The world situation was not sufficiently advanced to permit of the abolition of the principle of national sovereignty, as recognized by the Charter. The Argentine delegation, in accordance with the principles of the legal sovereignty of States and of non-intervention, thought that each country should remain free to govern its own destinies.

Mr. Corominas drew the Committee's attention to the provisions of Article 2, paragraph 7 of the Charter, concerning matters which were essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of a State. In his opinion petitions were essentially within that jurisdiction; the Committee should therefore attempt to find a formula which would take those provisions into account by specifying that the presentation of petitions to the United Nations should be subject to the approval of Governments.

The French amendment (A/C.3/244/Rev.1/Corr.1) was actuated by a lofty ideal. An international system for the protection of human rights should certainly be established. The delegation of Argentina was not opposed to the question being studied thoroughly, but it did not think it advisable at that stage of the discussion for the Committee to undertake such a study. It proposed that the question should be referred back to the Commission on Human Rights for study. If the Cuban amendment (A/C.3/261) were adopted, the bill of human rights could later be completed by specifying which should be the competent international organs.

MR. WATT (Australia) observed that the objections raised to the article under discussion were of two kinds.

There were practical objections: certain delegations pointed out that there were no organs competent to deal with petitions and, moreover, thought it preferable to insert the article, not in the declaration, but in the covenant. He supported to a certain extent those practical objections.

The other objections were of a theoretical character. On that point the Australian delegation wholeheartedly supported the observations of the Belgian representative (158th meeting), but thought it might be advisable to answer certain arguments which had been put forward after Mr. Dehousse's statement. He emphasized that article 56 of the Charter, which stated that "All Members pledge themselves to take joint and separate action. . . for the achievement of the purposes set forth in Article 55", provided for international action. Article 55 of the Charter also stated that "The United Nations shall promote. . .". There was therefore not the least doubt concerning the competence and even the obligation of the United [702] Nations to undertake international action in some form or other. The only debatable question was that of the methods and the time.

It had been stated that on the subject of human rights, the principle of national sovereignty was inviolable. That theory would lead to an anomalous situation in which the inhabitants of Trust Territories would be able to submit petitions to the Trusteeship Council and hence to the United Nations while the inhabitants of metropolitan countries would be precluded from doing so.

The Australian delegation was far from ignoring the importance of the provisions of Article 2, paragraph 7 of the Charter, which Australia had helped to draft, but it considered that the sphere of international jurisdiction was not irrevocably established. Certain matters of domestic jurisdiction could be transferred to international jurisdiction. That would not constitute a violation, but rather an exercise, of sovereignty. A country would always be free to demand guarantees against irresponsible petitions.

If the Committee considered that for practical reasons the article should be referred back to the Commission on Human Rights, the Australian delegation would insist, when measures of implementation were considered, on the necessity of efficacious measures and, in particular, on the establishment of an international court of human rights.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) stated that, at the national level, the rights of petition of a citizen could not be denied. In that respect the text of the article and of the two amendments presented by France and Cuba seemed to him equally acceptable. He urged that the formula "and to obtain prompt action thereon" which was in the Cuban amendment should be retained.

Mr. Santa Cruz also favoured recognizing the right of individuals to present petitions to the United Nations, for the same reasons that his delegation had advanced in support of article 28 of the declaration. By subscribing to the Charter, States had accepted the incorporation of human rights into international law and had voluntarily abandoned part of their sovereignty. He thought therefore that there should be an international authority to consider petitions relating to human rights. The matter had, moreover, already been considered by the Commission on Human Rights. The Chilean delegation would support the text proposed by France.

MR. AQUINO (Philippines) stated that his delegation would very much like to see the establishment by the United Nations of a competent organ which would examine petitions sent to the United Nations by individuals. None of the proposed texts, however, provided for the establishment of such an organ. The article contained in the original text of the draft declaration had not even been considered by the Committee. The amendment proposed by France did not specify either the manner in which petitions should be presented or what organs of the United Nations would be qualified to deal with them. There was not even agreement concerning the establishment of an international court of human rights. So long as there was no such body in existence, the inclusion of the right of petition in the declaration would be simply misleading, since its implementation could not be guaranteed. The amendment proposed by Cuba was even more vague.

In view of the fact that the question concerned measures of implementation which were out of place in the declaration and which required thorough study, the Philippine delegation proposed that the question should be referred back to the Commission on Human Rights.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) pointed out that the amendment submitted by his delegation merely recognized an existing fact. The right of petition was sanctioned by the Constitutions of many countries. His delegation would favour the setting up of an international system for the protection of human rights when the appropriate time arrived, but he thought that such a system could not be contemplated at the present stage of the Committee's work. The Cuban amendment, by its intentionally vague wording, allowed for the possibility of a subsequent revision of the definition of "competent authority" when an international system of protection was established.

Mr. Pérez Cisneros asked to have his delegation's amendment voted on in parts, and for a roll-call vote to be taken on the first part of the sentence, which was the essential part, namely:

"Every person has the right, either individually or in association with others, to petition or to communicate with any competent authority".

The end of the sentence, which was less important, could then be voted on. His delegation was even prepared by way of compromise to accept the deletion of the second part of his amendment.

MR. CASSIN (France), while recognizing that the right of petition had lost some of its importance since the recognition of the freedom of the Press and freedom of association, nevertheless maintained that those two freedoms could not replace the right of petition, which permitted the presentation of demands, to a national or international authority. If the right of petition were not incorporated in the Declaration of Human Rights, it would constitute a step backwards in the sphere of positive international law, since the right of petition had been recognized at many international conferences, including the 1932 Conference for the Reduction and Limitation of Armaments,<sup>138</sup> and at various sessions of the International Labour Organization.

To omit that right would also be to fall short of the objective that the democratic States had set themselves at the beginning of the last war. The United Nations could not tolerate that, as in 1933, one could remain passive before open violations of the spirit of the Charter. Positive measures must therefore be taken to ensure the right of petition at the national and international level.

Mr. Cassin feared, however, that the advocates of the right of petition might be at variance owing to their divergent views on the guarantee which would have to operate in that sphere. He therefore proposed to withdraw for the time being the draft amendment submitted by his delegation on [704] the formal condition that the Third Committee should instruct the Commission on Human Rights through the Economic and Social Council to undertake a new examination of the problem and to submit a positive report to the following session of the General Assembly, it being well understood that the latter would discuss the question.

<sup>138</sup> The Conference for the Reduction and Limitation of Armaments, generally known as the World Disarmament Conference, was held in Geneva from 1932 to 1934. The Women's International League for Peace and Freedom collected six million signatures on a petition that was presented to the Conference.

He emphasized that the above condition was irrespective of whether the amendment submitted by the delegation of Cuba, which was based on the Declaration of Bogotá, was adopted or rejected. That text was acceptable if, as its author had suggested, the words following the words “competent authority” were deleted.

MRS. NEWLANDS (New Zealand) stated that she had followed the general discussion with interest, and particularly the arguments presented by those who maintained that the Declaration of Human Rights should not contain any article mentioning the right of petition. Those who argued in favour of such an omission could be divided into two categories: those who simply did not wish to see that right included in the declaration, and those who considered that it should be included only after the methods of implementation had been decided upon.

The New Zealand Government had made its view on the question known to the Commission on Human Rights in June 1948. It had proposed that everyone, either individually or in association with others, should have the right to petition or communicate with the Government of the State of which he was a national or in which he resided, and should have the same right in respect of the United Nations.<sup>1</sup> That position was in complete conformity with the text contained in document E/800.

The New Zealand Government recognized the importance of the exercise of the right of petition. It maintained its original position and was prepared to support the inclusion of the right of petition in the declaration of human rights.

Mrs. Newlands recognized, as did Mr. Cassin, that it was a fundamental right and that it should find a place among the general principles outlined in the declaration. It had been pointed out during the discussion that the declaration constituted a general statement of principles and did not entail any legal obligations. The lack of an organ which would have the authority to deal with petitions addressed to the United Nations was therefore not a valid argument for the exclusion from the declaration of that general principle.

Moreover, the Economic and Social Council at its fifth session had adopted resolution 75(V) relating to communications concerning human rights, before each session of the Commission; with a brief indication of the substance of each. It was true that the resolution did not provide for measures to be taken in that connexion but the Commission on Human Rights was asked to appoint at each session an ad hoc committee to meet shortly before its following session for the purpose of reviewing the confidential list of communications prepared by the Secretary-General. That Ad Hoc Committee, composed of the representatives of Chile, France, Lebanon, the USSR and the United States, had duly met shortly before the beginning of the third session of the Commission on Human Rights. Mrs. Newlands thought, therefore, that to mention the right of petition in the declaration of human rights would only be recognizing the existing situation.

The criticisms made by certain representatives to the effect that nationals of metropolitan territories would not enjoy the right of petition which was granted to inhabitants of Trust Territories proved once more the necessity of affirming the right of petition.

As regards the wording of the article, the New Zealand delegation would have supported the French amendment had it not been withdrawn. It would be advisable to confine the right of petition, as that amendment had done, to matters relating to human rights.

Until a definite procedure was established concerning the exercise of the right of petition, Mrs. Newlands emphasized that it was fully understood that the Commission on Human Rights was entitled to exercise the limited action authorized by resolution 75(V) of the Economic and Social Council.

MR. KAYALY (Syria) fully agreed that in the national field the right of petition was a fundamental right which all democratic States had recognized in their constitutions. On the other hand, to allow individuals to submit petitions or communications to the United Nations would be a violation of the very principles of the United Nations, for the Charter based international relations upon respect for the rights of Member States. That principle would be violated if the sovereignty of States was repudiated by the recognition of the right of individuals to submit petitions to the United Nations.

Mr. Kayaly also pointed out that the right of petition should not appear in the declaration, but rather in the covenant or in the measures of implementation.

He concluded by recommending that the questions should be referred to the Commission on Human Rights for fuller study.

MR. CAMPOS ORTIZ (Mexico) said that the extension of the right of petition to the international field represented an ideal which could not be attained at present.

Apart from the fact that it was not the time to start a discussion on that question, which had not been adequately studied; it would be dangerous to set up an international jurisdiction which would be higher than that of Member States.

Taking the concrete example of a foreigner who might complain of the disregard of human rights in the country in which he happened to be, Mr. Campos Ortiz asked what should be the attitude of the United Nations in such a case? That might well lead to conflict between the United Nations and a Member State.

The question of the implementation of the right of petition at the national level should be thoroughly studied by the appropriate organs.

In conclusion, he announced his delegation's intention of voting in favour of the Cuban amendment, which was based on the Bogotá Declaration.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) first apologized to the Latin American countries for having omitted on the previous day to quote the Bogotá Declaration, which provided for the right of petition. That was yet another proof that Pan-Americanism was ahead of other countries in international development.

He wished to answer the Mexican representative, who had stated that in any given country the extension of the right of petition to foreigners would upset the current conceptions of the law. If the Mexican argument were pursued to its conclusion, its fallacy would be revealed, for foreigners did in fact already enjoy diplomatic protection which gave them an advantage over nationals, just as the inhabitants of Trust Territories possessed an advantage over the inhabitants of metropolitan territories.

Taking up the question of procedure, he asked the Cuban representative if the latter still wished his amendment to be put to the vote immediately, or if he supported the United Kingdom draft resolution (A/C.3/370), suggesting that no action should be taken on the matter during the current session.

Mr. Dehousse fully supported the latter point of view: the question should be reconsidered and thought out by the Commission on Human Rights and should be studied again at the following session of the General Assembly.

Finally, he recalled that though the question of implementation had not been examined at the third session of the Commission on Human Rights, the Commission had considered the problem very carefully at its second session in Geneva in December 1947, and had made appreciable progress.<sup>1</sup>

MR. KAMINSKY (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) pointed out that the Committee needed time to study the proposals before pronouncing an opinion upon them.

It was immediately apparent, however, that the proposals did not respect the principle of the sovereignty of States. In recommending international co-operation, the Charter took respect for the sovereignty of the State as its very basis. The United Nations was not a world Government; each Member participated of its own free will in the work of the organization which made international co-operation possible. It had sometimes been maintained that since decisions were taken by a majority vote, each State was bound to conform to the decision of the majority. But the delegation of the Byelorussian SSR did not consider that fact to be in any way prejudicial to national sovereignty, for it was fully understood that decisions were only valid in the fields in which

United Nations jurisdiction was recognized. They could not be binding upon States if they concerned questions exclusively within their domestic jurisdiction. The Cuban proposal concerned a matter which was, precisely, one of domestic jurisdiction of States. Hence, neither the Assembly nor the Third Committee could approve it.

It had been stated by certain representatives that respect for national sovereignty hampered the work of international co-operation. His delegation maintained, on the contrary, that, far from being a retrograde idea, respect for national sovereignty was, as the Charter indicated, a necessary condition of all progress. Thus at the present time half the peoples of the world – those of the colonies – were striving to obtain self-government or independence, in other words, to affirm their sovereign rights.

In view of those considerations the delegation of the Byelorussian SSR was opposed to the inclusion of an article on the right of petition in the declaration of human rights at that stage in the debate. The United Kingdom proposal, which allowed for a study of the question, was the only acceptable one in present circumstances.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) regretted that the Third Committee had interrupted its consideration of the draft declaration of human rights. To maintain that petitions from citizens of various States would have anything to gain from examination by an international organ was tantamount to questioning the desire of each State to impose respect for human rights. It could also be interpreted as an admission of national incompetence.

To say that inhabitants of metropolitan territories should have at least the same rights as inhabitants of the colonies, who enjoyed the right to present petitions to the United Nations, was certainly not a valid argument. The United Nations examined petitions from Trust Territories precisely because those Territories were not governed in conformity with the sovereign will of the inhabitants. In examining those petitions the United Nations was compensating for the lack of representative institutions.

It had to be recognized that if the proposed article were included in the declaration, it would not give it any practical significance. Thus, for instance, no unemployed person could obtain work by presenting a petition to the United Nations.

Referring next to international co-operation, Mr. Pavlov pointed out that the real evil from which such co-operation suffered did not arise from the affirmation of the sovereign rights of States, but, on the contrary, from the attempts made to superimpose upon the authority of States an oligarchy serving the interests of the capitalist Powers. Furthermore it was absolutely incorrect to say that Article 56 of the Charter authorized the United Nations to examine questions within the domestic jurisdiction of a State.

Mr. Pavlov thought that the Commission should resume its examination of the draft declaration of human rights as drafted by the Commission on Human Rights.

MR. DAVIES (United Kingdom) thought that, apart from all considerations of national sovereignty, members of the Committee in general thought it preferable that a thorough study of the article on the right of petition should be made.

He did not object to the Declaration of Human Rights including the right of petition both at the national and the international level, but he thought it difficult to settle the question without raising considerations on the measures of implementation. For practical reasons, he advocated referring the article back to the Commission on Human Rights for its opinion and for subsequent re-submission to the Third Committee at the following session of the General Assembly. He pointed out that the text of the draft resolution submitted by the United Kingdom did not specify that the article on petitions should be included in the human rights declaration or in the covenant; it left the decision to the Commission on Human Rights; indeed, that was the first point which the Commission would have to decide.

He did not think it possible to include the Cuban proposal, as it stood, in the Declaration of Human Rights. However, nothing would be lost by postponing the adoption of an article on the right of petition, first, because article 17 already made provision for it without explicitly mentioning it, and, secondly, because the Cuban draft resolution would benefit by being revised after a full discussion on the matter.

He therefore requested that the United Kingdom draft resolution should be put to the vote.

THE CHAIRMAN announced the close of the general discussion.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) urged that the Cuban proposal be put to the vote, adding that it would only be necessary to examine the United Kingdom draft resolution if the Cuban proposal were rejected.

He pointed out that the Committee had been instructed to study the draft declaration of human rights; proposals concerning the declaration must therefore be put to the vote first.

THE CHAIRMAN announced that he would be obliged to put the United Kingdom draft resolution to the vote first because it was the furthest removed from the original proposal. It was true that the Third Committee's task was to examine the declaration of human rights, but any member had and would continue to have the right to request that any article should be referred to another organ of the United Nations for examination.

MR. CASSIN (France) stated that he wished to submit an amendment to the United Kingdom draft resolution.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics), pointed out that the United Kingdom draft resolution had been distributed and that the [709] French amendment had not. In the circumstances, it would be better to allow representatives time to study the two texts. He therefore proposed that the Committee should wait until the French amendment had been distributed and that the vote should be postponed until the beginning of the afternoon session.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) asked the United Kingdom representative if he would not be prepared to withdraw his draft resolution in order to enable the Committee to decide first whether it wished to adopt one of the two texts relating to the substance of the question. If neither of those two texts was adopted, the United Kingdom representative could resubmit his draft resolution.

MR. DAVIES (United Kingdom) was not prepared to withdraw his draft resolution, which he believed expressed the wishes of the majority of the Committee members.

Having taken cognizance of the French amendment (A/C.3/371) which had just been circulated, the United Kingdom representative said that he could not accept it in its present form, as it stated that the article on the right of petition should be incorporated in the Declaration of Human Rights, whereas one of the advantages of the United Kingdom draft resolution was precisely that the Commission on Human Rights would be left to decide whether the article should be incorporated in the declaration or in the covenant.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) stated that he wished to present an amendment to the United Kingdom draft resolution (A/C.3/370).

He proposed that the meeting be adjourned.

The proposal was adopted by 21 votes to 8, with 4 abstentions.

The meeting rose at 12:55 p.m.

Summary Record of the Hundred and Sixtieth Meeting [of the Third Committee]

Held at the Palais de Chaillot, Paris, on Friday,
26 November 1948, at 3.30. p.m.

Chairman: MR. C. MALIK (Lebanon). Rapporteur: Mr. EMILE SAINT-LOT (Haiti).

Draft International Declaration of Human Rights: Item Proposed by the Economic and Social Council

United Kingdom draft resolution on the additional article on measures of implementation and French and Cuban amendments thereto (E/632, E/800, A/C.3/370, A/C.3/371, A/C.3/372, A/C.3/W.1<sup>139</sup>)

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) felt that the Chairman would be right to put the United Kingdom draft resolution (A/C.3/370) to the vote first. Should it be adopted, the Cuban proposal would automatically fall. According to the rules of procedure, the United Kingdom draft, being farthest removed, must be voted on first. However, in regard to the third paragraph of the United Kingdom draft resolution, the French amendment (A/C.3/371) to that paragraph would have to be voted on first.

Addressing himself to the representative of France, Mr. Dehousse expressed scruples as to the legal correctness of including the problem of petitions in a declaration which would not legally bind its signatories. He would vote in favour of the French amendment, however, because it attempted to avoid postponing that very important question for a year, but he would like to see it so worded that the Assembly would complete the declaration at its next regular session. Should the amendments not be accepted, he would still be grateful if the French representative would make a statement for the record, to the effect that the General Assembly was absolutely free to decide whether or not it would insert in the declaration anything concerning the system of petitions.

MR. CASSIN (France) stated that, in submitting his amendment, he had been guided by the idea that as the question of the right of petition had not been sufficiently studied to warrant its being inserted in the declaration, he had deemed it advisable to suggest that the question should be studied during the interim period, so that a decision could be taken at the next regular session of the General Assembly. It was the right and duty of the Assembly to request its subordinate organs to submit a text on which to base a decision, though the Assembly was not bound to act upon any such recommendation.

The right of petition could be included as a complementary provision of the declaration, but the ultimate decision would rest with the General Assembly.

MR. DAVIES (United Kingdom) declared that adoption of the French amendment would mean that the declaration would not be completed at the present session of the General Assembly but would be postponed until the next regular session. That would be most regrettable after [3] all the hard work that had been done in regard to the declaration. There would be the danger that the whole matter would be re-opened and undoubtedly the prestige of the United Nations would suffer. He urged that the door might be left open with regard to including the right of petition in the declaration or covenant. A straight vote on the United Kingdom draft resolution would show whether the Committee wanted the question to be dealt with in regard to the declaration or preferred it to be included in the covenant, that is to say, whether it wanted the declaration to be completed at the present session of the Assembly or not.

MR. PEREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) pointed out that the United Kingdom draft had been submitted only a few hours previously and therefore, in his opinion, could not be considered by the Committee. That draft mentioned the covenant, whereas the Committee was now discussing the declaration which, it had been decided, should be completed before the covenant was discussed. If, as he believed, the right to petition was an essential human right, it should be included in the declaration; if on the other hand, it was no more than a measure of implementation, the United Kingdom point of view was correct.

The Committee would first have to take a decision as to whether the right of petition was an essential right or not.

He further requested, on the strength of rule 109 of the rules of procedure, that the vote on the United Kingdom draft resolution (A/C.3/370) should be postponed until the following day, to give the members of the Committee time to study the relevant documents and to consult their delegation and, if need be, their Governments.

MR. CASSIN (France) pointed out that the word "complete" in the English translation of his amendment to the United Kingdom draft resolution should be replaced by "supplement". There had been no intention on his part to postpone the adoption of the declaration by the General Assembly.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) agreed with the French representative that, while the French amendment would make it possible for the General Assembly to deal with the question of the right of petition at its following session, the General Assembly would be entirely free to decide whether or not it wished to include in the declaration an article dealing with that right.

He called the attention of the Cuban representative to the fact that in the past various bodies of the United Nations had frequently voted on amendments which had not even been circulated in writing. Moreover, the United Kingdom proposal was a resolution, so that the part of rule 109 dealing with amendments did not apply to it. He thought it could be put to the vote at once; nevertheless, in view of the Cuban representative's objection, the matter was for the Committee to decide.

MR. WATT (Australia) remarked that the Committee was divided in its views: some representatives wished to decide at the present session that there should be no article on the right of petition in the declaration, others wanted the contrary, while a third group preferred a compromise solution, which was to avoid prejudging whether the right of petition should be exercised on the national plane alone or on the international as well.

In a spirit of compromise and with the intention of permitting further debate on the whole question, he proposed the following amendment in place of the French amendment, incorporating a drafting change suggested by the United Kingdom representative: "to consider what further action, if any, should be taken at its next regular session regarding the problem of petitions".

MR. DAVIES (United Kingdom) accepted the Australian amendment, which thereupon became part of the United Kingdom resolution.

MR. CASSIN (France) said that he was not prepared to withdraw his own amendment in favour of the Australian amendment. The former met the wishes of those who considered the right of petition to be a basic human right and at the same time permitted the question to be carefully studied, as a number of other delegations thought it should be. The French amendment would merely "enable", it would not oblige the General Assembly at its next session to add to the declaration an article dealing with that right. By its phrasing it did, however, express the hope that the General Assembly would do so; that nuance was lost in the Australian amendment.

MR. PEREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) interpreted rule 109 of the rules of procedure to mean that the Chairman could authorize immediate discussion and study of a new proposal, but not a vote on it. Representatives were not being granted sufficient time to draft amendments to the United Kingdom proposal.

He nevertheless submitted the following amendments: the insertion, as the first paragraph in the United Kingdom resolution, of the following: "Whereas the right of petition is an essential human right as is recognized in the Constitution of a great number of countries;" and the deletion of the paragraph beginning with the word "Decides", since that paragraph was in contradiction with the one which he wished to have inserted.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) pointed out that there were two questions before the Committee, one of procedure and one of substance.

The United Kingdom resolution dealt entirely with procedure; it was therefore possible, under rule 109, to vote upon it at the present meeting.

The Cuban amendment, on the other hand, raised an important and highly controversial question of substance; it and any other amendment of like nature could be put to the vote only after at least a day had passed.

Considering the Cuban amendment on its merits, Mr. Pavlov could not agree that the right of petition was a basic human right like the right to work, to vote or to education. The right of petition by itself meant very little; it was, in fact, pointless to permit men to complain unless alleged wrongs could be redressed, which was generally done within the framework of each State. It would be to show disrespect of national sovereignty to permit individuals to petition the United Nations; moreover, it was surely premature to include in the declaration an article based on the assumption that the rest of the rights contained in it would be violated. The USSR could not accept the Cuban amendment.

THE CHAIRMAN ruled that the United Kingdom resolution and the French and the Cuban amendments were equally receivable.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) moved the closure of the debate, and asked that a vote might be taken on the question whether or not the Committee should postpone the vote on the texts before it.

MR. PEREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) opposed the motion for closure. He wished to have the opportunity to defend his amendment, which had not been generally discussed but had been subjected to criticism.

The motion for closure was adopted by 21 votes to 7, with 8 abstentions.

The motion to postpone decision on the United Kingdom resolution was rejected by 16 votes to 6, with 11 abstentions.

The meeting was suspended at 4.20 p.m. and resumed at 4.45 p.m.

THE CHAIRMAN stated that the Cuban amendment to insert a paragraph would be put to the vote first.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) thought that it would be contrary to the first part of rule 109 of the rules of procedure to vote on a substantive amendment which had not been circulated a day previously.

The vote taken by the Committee to close the debate could not apply to the Cuban amendment, since the debate on it had never been opened and had, in fact, not taken place at all. He consequently protested against the Chairman's action.

MR. KAMINSKY (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) supported the USSR representative's remarks. He did not think the Committee's decision could apply to the Cuban amendment, which had not been debated; it had been taken solely with respect to the procedural question raised in the United Kingdom resolution.

THE CHAIRMAN said he was unable to accept the interpretation of Committee's [sic] decision put forward by the Byelorussian SSR and the USSR representatives.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) supported the Chairman's point of view. The Cuban amendment had been submitted before the closure of the debate and therefore, the closure applied to it as well as to the United Kingdom draft resolution.

On the request of the Cuban representative, a vote was taken by roll-call as follows:

Burma, having been drawn by lot by the Chairman, was called upon to vote first.

In favour: Chile, Colombia, Cuba, Denmark, Dominican Republic, France, Haiti, Honduras, India, Iran, Lebanon, Mexico, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Uruguay, Afghanistan, Argentina, Belgium.

[7]

Against: Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Canada, China, Czechoslovakia, Poland, Sweden, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Kingdom, United States of America, Yugoslavia.

Abstaining: Burma, Pakistan, Saudi Arabia, Turkey, Venezuela, Yemen, Australia, Brazil.

The first part of the Cuban amendment was adopted by 22 votes to 11, with 8 abstentions.

The remainder of the Cuban amendment was adopted by 16 votes to 11, with 12 abstentions.

The Cuban amendment as a whole was adopted by 17 votes to 16, with 7 abstentions.

The second paragraph of the amendment set forth in document A/C.3/W.1 was adopted as read.

MR. PEREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) moved the deletion of the third paragraph.

The motion was rejected by 22 votes to 9, with 9 abstentions.

MR. CASSIN (France) proposed the substitution of the first alternative addition to the draft resolution for the second.

The motion was rejected by 17 votes to 13, with 8 abstentions.

On the request of the United Kingdom representative, a vote was taken separately on the first part of the last paragraph of the resolution, down to the words “measures of implementation. . .”

The first part of the last paragraph was adopted by 28 votes to none, with 11 abstentions.

The second part of the last paragraph, including the second alternative text set forth in document A/C.3/W.1<sup>141</sup> was adopted by 24 votes to none, with 16 abstentions.

The last paragraph as a whole was adopted by 24 votes to none, with 16 abstentions.

The resolution as a whole was adopted by 34 votes to 6, with 5 abstentions.

[8]

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said he had voted against the resolution because it was both unsatisfactory and contradictory. The first paragraph stated that the right of petition was an essential human right, while the third paragraph stated that no action would be taken on the matter at the present session. The Committee had been wrong to adopt the Cuban amendment to the first paragraph, as the right of petition was valueless unless the Government concerned was responsible for rectifying the violation of rights.

As the resolution now read, it was contrary to the provisions of Article 2 of the Charter and would undermine the principle of national sovereignty. There was no basis for stating that the right of petition was a fundamental right. It would create illusions in the minds of the peoples of the world and despite the good motives that had prompted it, it could only be regarded as a mockery. It would have the further effect of weakening the declaration by giving the impression that the rights set forth in that document would be violated.

The resolution was particularly unacceptable to his delegation because it encroached upon the sphere of national sovereignty. Petitions had to be regarded as the responsibility of the Government concerned before they were transmitted to the United Nations. The votes he had cast in favour of the first two paragraphs of the original United Kingdom draft resolution (A/C.3/370), could not be considered as binding either the USSR delegation, the General Assembly, or any other organ of the United Nations.

MR. PEREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) realized that, viewed as a whole, the resolution could not be considered satisfactory. It did not really recognize the essential right of petition and here, once again, the text of the Bogotá Agreement would be superior to that of the declaration. The Cuban amendment had attempted no more than to state that the right of petition had to be respected within national boundaries. It was to be hoped that owing to United Nations action, it would be respected internationally as well as nationally. It had been argued that the veto was undesirable in regard to petitions from nations, it was surely equally undesirable that it should be applied to petitions from individuals. The resolution had not been adopted unanimously, but the Cuban delegation was satisfied that a large majority of the Committee had approved the insertion of the right of petition.

MR. DE ATHAYDE (Brazil) pointed out that the Brazilian Constitution, like others, recognized the right of petition, whether on the part of Brazilian citizens or of other people and therefore, he had no difficulty in supporting the Cuban amendment. He also agreed, however, with those representatives who had stated that the question of the right of petition should be considered in connexion with the covenant rather than in connexion with the declaration. The original French proposal set forth in A/C.3/306 had expressed a splendid ideal, but because the international atmosphere was not propitious for the adoption of such an article, he had voted for the United Kingdom resolution.

MR. CASSIN (France) had voted for the resolution although he was not completely satisfied with the text that had been adopted. He assured the Committee that France would devote all her efforts to ensuring the right of petition, within the limits allowed by the present international atmosphere.

MRS. NEWLANDS (New Zealand) said her delegation would have been prepared to accept an article along the lines of the one originally submitted by the French delegation. As both the French and Cuban articles had been withdrawn, she had supported the French amendment to the United Kingdom resolution. She had also supported the United Kingdom resolution itself and the first part of the Cuban amendment to it. She had voted against the second part of the first Cuban amendment, because it implied that individuals could only petition their national authorities and not the United Nations.

MR. DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) drew attention to the fact that his delegation had made great efforts to have the right of petition accepted at the Bogotá Conference. They had maintained a similar attitude during the discussions in the Third Committee and hoped that, at a later date, it would be possible to get agreement on an even more acceptable text.

MR. WATT (Australia) said he had abstained on the first Cuban and French amendments, because it had seemed fairer to leave open the question of whether the right of petition should be dealt with in connexion with the declaration or with regard to the covenant. Because of the principle involved, it had not been possible for him not to support the resolution as a whole. In his opinion, the adoption of the Cuban amendment would mean [10] that petitions could be addressed either to national authorities, international authorities, or to both.<sup>142</sup>

THE CHAIRMAN suggested that the USSR proposal, the Danish proposal and the second paragraph of section A and section B of the Yugoslav proposal should be considered together. The Cuban, Lebanese, Egyptian and first paragraph of section A and section C of the Yugoslav proposal would be considered separately.

MR. PLEIC (Yugoslavia) pointed out that the second paragraph of section A did not deal with the question of minorities, while section B referred to the protection of collective minority rights and not to the rights of individual members of minorities.

THE CHAIRMAN agreed that the second paragraph of section A of the Yugoslav proposal could be considered separately, but ruled that section B of that proposal would be considered together with the USSR and Danish proposals.

MR. PEREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) withdrew his first proposed article because its substance had already been adopted in the form of a Mexican amendment. In reply to the Chairman, he said he would press for the adoption of his second proposed article on the grounds that since the substance of it was included in the preamble of the declaration and, therefore, it should form the subject of a specific article.

MR. KURAL (Turkey) moved the adjournment of the meeting.

The motion was carried by 22 votes to 9, with 1 abstention.

The meeting rose at 6 p.m.

Summary Record of the Hundred and Sixty-First Meeting [of the Third Committee]

Held at the Palais de Chaillot, Paris, on Saturday,

27 November 1948, at 11 a.m.

Chairman: Mr. EMILE SAINT-LOT (Haiti); later, MR. C. MALIK (Lebanon).

In the absence of the Chairman, and also of the Vice-Chairman, Mrs. Begtrup (Denmark), for reasons of health, Mr. Saint-Lot (Haiti) took the Chair.

THE CHAIRMAN drew the attention of the Committee to three proposals relating to the protection of minorities, submitted by the delegations of the USSR (A/C.3/307/Rev.2/Corr.2), Yugoslavia (A/C.3/307/Rev.1/Add.1), and Denmark (A/C.3/307/Rev.1/Add.2), respectively.

MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) requested The Chairman first to consult the Committee on whether it wished the declaration to contain articles which were not included in the draft prepared by the Commission on Human Rights. He pointed out that each of the other articles had been the object of a very thorough examination and formed a harmonious whole. The inclusion of new articles which had not received such careful study as the others might, in practice, have unexpected results.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) considered that the proposal submitted by the Uruguayan representative was not in order, at least in so far as it related to the proposal submitted by the USSR delegation. The latter proposal confined itself to resubmitting the text of article 31 of the Geneva draft,<sup>1</sup> which had been submitted to Governments a year previously; it appeared again in document E/800, distributed to Governments at least six months previously. Everyone had therefore had time to study the implications of the USSR proposal. The procedure to be followed for examining additional articles had already been decided, and Mr. Pavlov could only regard the Uruguayan proposal as an attempt to prevent the adoption of an article which gave to each ethnical group the right to develop its own culture.

If the additional article proposed by the USSR were adopted, his delegation would wish it to be inserted after article 6 of the declaration.

He asked that the USSR proposal should be put to the vote.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) supported the proposal submitted by the representative of Uruguay. He pointed out that the same procedure had been followed (160th meeting) in connexion with the article relating to the right of petition, which had also been examined at great length before it had been submitted to the Third Committee. It had been found, however, that it would be better to give it further study. The same was true of the texts which had been proposed with regard to the protection of the rights of minorities.

MR. RADEVANOVIC (Yugoslavia) pointed out that the Third Committee was perfectly free to consider other articles besides those proposed in the draft declaration of human rights prepared by the Commission on Human Rights.

The Committee had already decided that question when it had fixed the date up to which delegations had the right to propose additional articles. The proposals before the Third Committee had been submitted two months previously and had been duly distributed to the members. The question of the protection of minorities was closely connected with fundamental human rights.

The adoption of the motion submitted by Uruguay would prevent the Third Committee from giving the minorities the protection they should have.

MR. CONTOUMAS (Greece) stated that the Economic and Social Council had set up under the Commission on Human Rights the Sub-Commission on the Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities, which was dealing with the question of minorities, and had asked the Secretary-General to define the various forms in which discriminatory measures appeared, and to study the question as to whether and to what extent the treaties and declarations relating to the protection of minorities and dating from the time of the League of Nations were still in force, at any rate in respect of those of their clauses which did not provide for a League of Nations guarantee.<sup>1</sup>

To take up the question of minorities without awaiting the results of that study would be a very unwise course, for it would entail the risk of adopting a solution which had reference only to a single aspect of the question (the protection of the language) and perhaps might not square with the conclusions of the Sub-Commission and the Secretary-General.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) gave three reasons why he considered that the proposal submitted by the representative of Uruguay could not be retained. Firstly, the texts submitted were in order, as they had been presented within the time fixed by the Committee itself; secondly, some of those texts had already been the object of prolonged examination, although the Commission on Human Rights had not been able to make a decision in their regard; thirdly, it could not be argued that additional articles would disturb the balance of the declaration, since it was understood that a drafting committee would be formed to harmonize the various articles of the declaration. Mr. Dehousse asked that the texts submitted should be considered without delay.

Mr. Malik (Lebanon) took the Chair.

After a brief procedural debate, the CHAIRMAN decided that the Uruguayan proposal could not be put to the vote.

The representative of Uruguay stated that there was nothing to prevent the Committee from voting on that proposal, whereupon the Chairman explained that the proposals for additional articles were in order and that the Committee had not yet discussed them. He recalled that it was only after a discussion on the substance of the question, in which twenty-two speakers had taken part (158th, 159th and 160th meetings), that the Third Committee had considered the proposal to refer the proposed article on the right of petition to the Economic and Social Council and to the Commission on Human Rights. The situation was, therefore, not the same.

THE CHAIRMAN opened the general debate on the additional articles proposed by the USSR, Yugoslavia and Denmark, and asked the authors of those proposals to present them in turn.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) read out his draft additional article. It concerned all persons without exception, whether they belonged to a majority or a minority of the population. The use of the native language and the right of a population to develop its own national music and culture were fundamental human rights.

Since 1917, the peoples of the Soviet Union had proclaimed a voluntary alliance in a declaration of rights and had abolished all privileges and all other obstacles to the exercise of those rights; their relations were therefore based on a voluntarily accepted legal equality. The right to both cultural and political autonomy was laid down in that declaration.

The USSR representative quoted examples of the manner in which cultural autonomy was guaranteed to the sixty great peoples and the hundred or so different nationalities living in the USSR. The success of the solution adopted in that country was confirmed by the fact that there had been no serious friction between the various peoples of the Soviet Union – a state of affairs very different from that which had prevailed during the Tsarist rule. The Second World War had found those peoples fighting side by side in a spirit of brotherhood.

It had been said that the USSR proposal bordered on internationalism. In that connexion it should be made clear that internationalism could be achieved in two ways: firstly, by respecting [720] the rights, the independence and the sovereignty of all peoples, which was the method followed by the Soviet Union; secondly, by assimilating the various peoples; that method the USSR rejected.

In view of the division of the world into exploited and exploiting peoples, the Soviet Union representative understood perfectly well that the majority of countries were not yet prepared to adopt as radical a solution as the one chosen by the Soviet Union since 1917. He had, therefore, limited his draft article to the expression of ideas which could be accepted there and then; they constituted a modest declaration, to which all States which considered themselves democratic could subscribe.

MR. RADEVANOVIC (Yugoslavia) read out his proposal B. It was prompted by the solidarity which linked the individual to the community to which he belonged.

The problem of national minorities was one of protecting small national groups which were scattered like islets in the midst of the territory of a nation. Those minorities were always in danger of losing their national character. In order to ensure the protection of the individuals who formed a community, that community must first of all be recognized and protected. Thus the principle of the recognition and protection of national minorities as communities must appear in the Declaration of Human Rights, The cultural and ethnical rights of all persons belonging to a national minority, the right to develop their own ethnical culture, to establish schools, to use their native language in public administration etc. all depended upon the recognition of the minority itself as an ethnical group, if that minority was to be able to make a collective effort to create the necessary conditions for the enjoyment of those rights. Individual human rights were, in fact, dependent on the position which the community enjoyed in the State in which it lived. That position was contingent upon the solidarity and interdependence existing between the community and the individual.

The problem of minorities was one of protecting men who were bound together by a national bond and who were thus in a special situation with regard to the State.

The Yugoslav proposal aimed, therefore, first of all at the protection of the ethnical rights of national minorities. It did not touch directly upon the individual rights of persons belonging to minorities. It merely constituted a statement of principle, without any practical measures, and it would not, therefore, be sufficient to ensure the protection of individual rights; it would, however, acquire a practical value as soon as provisions concerning the rights of the individual were added to it. Those rights should be expressly recognized as deriving from the principle of the equality of men, irrespective of whether they belonged to a majority or a minority. That was the advantage of the USSR proposal and, in particular, of the Danish proposal. The Yugoslav proposal would acquire full significance when it was joined to that of the USSR.

MR. HVASS (Denmark) submitted the text which he proposed to add to article 23 of the Declaration of Human Rights. He expressed great interest in the arguments so brilliantly advanced by the representative of the USSR. He thought, however, that Mr. Pavlov's draft was too detailed, whereas a declaration which was to be completed by a covenant demanded brevity and conciseness.

MR. CAMPOS ORTIZ (Mexico) drew the Committee's attention to the fact that there was not the same problem of minorities on the American continent as in Europe or in other parts of the world. Foreigners entering America were not affected by any discriminatory measures. They had the advantage of a very generously conceived naturalization, with the result that the various legislative bodies had not needed to consider the question of the protection of minorities.

Before the last war, the Nazi and fascist regimes had indeed tried to introduce the idea that they had authority over various minorities throughout the American continent, but their contentions had been invalid. That, moreover, was the opinion of all the Latin-American countries. At the eighth International Conference of American States held at Lima in 1938, a resolution had been unanimously adopted, by which foreigners, enjoying as they did in the countries of the American continent the same rights and privileges as the nationals of those countries, were not entitled to demand special protection as communities.

The representative of Mexico recognized that in countries other than those of the American continent the protection of minorities might be justified; he did not therefore oppose the principle of the inclusion of an article on that subject in the Declaration of Human Rights. Since that problem did not concern America in general and his country in particular, he would abstain from voting upon it.

MR. DE ATHAYDE (Brazil) stated that he could not support the draft submitted by the USSR; if it were adopted and applied, many countries, especially those of Latin America, might find their national unity disrupted.

In Brazil, in particular, all teaching was carried out in the national language. The use of a language was one of the strongest characteristics of nationality. If foreigners were able to use their mother tongue in the schools, before the courts and in various other circumstances, immigrants would have no interest in learning Portuguese and in becoming assimilated as rapidly as possible into the Brazilian population. When he immigrated, a foreigner agreed of his own free will to comply with the laws of the country which received him. He should therefore accept the disadvantages of his situation as an immigrant, since he also had the advantages which went with it. If groups of foreigners living within a State remained too closely attached to the country of their origin, their assimilation into the country that had received them would be jeopardized. That country would be pursuing a policy of national suicide if it were to harbour groups of foreign agents who might prove to be extremely dangerous. The [722] Brazilian representative emphasized that his country, showing a broad liberal spirit and characteristic tolerance, made no distinction between its own nationals and foreigners.

The question raised by the text of the Danish draft resolution did not arise in America either; where it did arise, it should be settled by the application of liberal principles.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) recognized that the problem of the protection of minorities, with which the drafts submitted by the USSR, Yugoslavia and Denmark were concerned, did arise in many countries. It was therefore necessary to adopt proposals to remedy the situation. The United Nations had been considering that complex problem for a long time, and the Commission on Human Rights had created the Sub-Commission on the Prevention of Discrimination and the Protection of Minorities.

He could not, however, agree that the provisions proposed in those three drafts should appear in the declaration of human rights, unless such complex ideas as those of the majority and minority of populations and of ethnical and national culture had first been clearly defined.

The application of those drafts would be extremely dangerous for countries such as Chile, which had received large numbers of immigrants, many of them Europeans persecuted by dictatorial regimes. Nazi Germany had endeavoured to make use of the descendants of the refugees of 1848. Chile had been obliged to forbid any teaching which might foster national feeling among the immigrants. The same problem had arisen in Brazil, which had given the world an unprecedented example of the fusion of races, to which Mr. Santa Cruz paid tribute.

In conclusion, the Chilean representative stated that he was prepared to support any carefully considered measure which might solve the complicated problems dealt with by the three drafts in question, but could not agree to include provisions of universal scope in the declaration of human rights. He proposed that those problems should be referred to the Sub-Commission on the Prevention of Discrimination and the Protection of Minorities.

The Chilean delegation would vote against the proposals for additional articles submitted by the USSR, Yugoslavia and Denmark.

MR. CASSIN (France) declared that his delegation approached the problem of the protection of minorities with a freedom of thought which was all the greater, inasmuch as France was a country which received immigrants and at the same time had extensive responsibilities in various continents and towards numerous races.

The Versailles Treaty and other peace treaties concluded in 1919 had studied the question of minorities only in so far as Central Europe was concerned. The problem had developed considerably since then. The Third Committee, when considering the draft declaration of human rights, had already proclaimed the equality of all men everywhere. The greater part of the rights of [723] minorities was therefore covered by the terms already laid down, but there still remained some questions which had not been considered, especially the question of languages. Some of the proposals made by the representative of the USSR, one of which concerning the right to make use of an interpreter in court had been adopted, were an endeavour to solve certain aspects of that question.

The problem of minorities was greatly complicated by the different structure of the various States. Some countries, such as the USSR, were federal republics in which linguistic minorities were contained within certain specific territories corresponding to States which had previously existed.

Other States were unified; such was the case with old countries, such as France, or with the young States of America, in which new peoples had come to settle side by side with the indigenous populations. In France there were no minorities, but its colonial possessions included Mohammedan countries in which communities of Mohammedans, Jews, Christians, etc., lived side by side. There were also various ethnical groups in Non-Self-Governing Territories, where one hundred and fifty tribes lived together, each with its folk-lore and traditions.

It was therefore exceedingly difficult to find a common denominator for the problems raised by such varied populations. Either the Committee would be unable to find any common denominator other than a principle of infinitesimal scope, which would appear to be useless, or it would have to pass a resolution instructing the Sub-Commission on the Prevention of Discrimination and the Protection of Minorities to prepare, side by side with the declaration of human rights, a set of minimal rules which could be applied to cases such as those he had just described.

He was aware of the great things already accomplished by the USSR and Yugoslavia, but he could not support the drafts submitted by their delegations, which were of too general a character. If the measures advocated by the USSR were in fact applied without discernment, there would be a danger of cutting off certain communities and thereby working against the community of nations. Such measures might result in certain populations being unable to read any newspapers except those printed in their own tongue, and in their being excluded from taking part in competitive examinations for official posts or in the active life of the nation; thus, a whole category of persons, whose emancipation was being sought, would instead be cut off from their surroundings.

MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) stated that, by reason of the regime under which Uruguay was administered, his delegation opposed the granting of special rights to minorities. His country made no distinction between the status of immigrants and that of its own nationals. The law provided for absolute equality of rights for all, and granted immigrants the right to naturalization and free access to public service. The delegation of Uruguay, however, fully realized the necessity of adequate measures to guarantee individual rights in States where the problem of [724] minorities existed. Nevertheless, it could not agree to the inclusion of such provisions in a declaration which was of universal scope.

MRS. KALINOWSKA (Poland) emphasized that the declaration should include the rights of minorities, which represented the positive aspect of the principle of non-discrimination. Between the two wars, Poland had exercised a policy of discrimination with regard to minorities. At the current time, however, not only were the rights of minorities recognized by the Polish Government, but those minorities were in fact being encouraged by the Government, although Poland was neither a large State nor a federal State. Yet the members of those minorities were excellent citizens.

In her opinion, the draft of the USSR contained a more comprehensive and complete affirmation of the essential rights of minorities than did the Danish draft. National culture, which was not mentioned in the Danish text, was the very expression of the life of the national community. In Poland, the first measures taken by the Nazis had been directed against education, and also against the expression of national cultural life. They had even forbidden the performance of Polish music.

The Polish delegation favoured the statement of the rights of minorities in the declaration all the more strongly in that there were at present numbers of Poles living abroad. It was greatly to be hoped that their cultural rights and the right to use their own language would be assured to them.

MR. SAINT-LOT (Haiti) pointed out that the declaration should be a document of universal scope. The representative of France had emphasized in a general way the diversity of the solutions to the problem of minorities, and the representatives of Mexico and Brazil had pointed out that the Latin American countries could not agree to the special treatment of minorities without endangering their national unity. It was therefore impossible to establish a uniform rule for every country. Moreover, article 2 of the declaration proscribed discrimination; yet the protection of minorities would amount to an increase of discrimination.

The delegation of Haiti would vote against the three drafts, but hoped that the Committee would adopt a resolution recommending the Sub-Commission on the Prevention of Discrimination and the Protection of Minorities to study the question of a convention or of international machinery to ensure effective protection for minorities, without endangering the national unity of countries and without entailing any aggravation of discrimination.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) said that his delegation thought that it would be advisable to insert in the declaration a text concerning the protection of minorities. It was not sufficient to consider the individual separately; the individual was also a member of a community.

The Latin American countries had raised objections to the insertion of such a text. The problem of minorities, however, was distinct from that of immigration. The immigrant went to establish himself in a foreign country and it was [725] natural that he should submit to the laws of the country that received him; minorities, on the other hand, were historically constituted groups, settled in one or more determined territories. The Belgian delegation was anxious that mention should be made of that interpretation in the summary record of the meeting.

The League of Nations had to some extent failed in the question of minorities. The weakness of its system lay in the differentiation between the countries which were subject to minority protection and the others. But it had had the advantage of providing a procedure and specific guarantees for the protection of minorities.

The question could be raised whether the League of Nations treaties on minorities were still in force. Without settling that question for the moment, the fact that it was a moot point was an added reason for including the rights of minorities in the declaration.

The Belgian delegation was of the opinion that the three texts submitted were inadequate in that they limited the protection of the minority to the protection of its culture and the right to use its own language. In its opinion the protection of a minority also covered the latter's right to have special institutions with well-defined regional powers.

Nevertheless, the Belgian delegation, which wanted to have an article on minorities included in the declaration, would vote for the text proposed by the USSR; it was the most complete, it defined minorities by referring to race, national origin or religion, and in dealing with the protection of the language it specifically mentioned, not only the right to teach that language, but the right to use it in the Press, at public meetings, in the courts, and in other organs of public administration. Those provisions were in conformity with the practice established by Belgian tradition and legislation.

MR. WATT (Australia) drew attention to the complexity of the problem. The European countries were rightly concerned with guaranteeing the protection of minorities. That problem, however, was unknown in Australia and in the Latin-American countries, where the issue was one of assimilation and not of protection of minorities. The representative of Belgium had drawn a distinction between the question of immigrants and that of minorities. The problem, however, needed closer study: thus, in countries of immigration, would the descendants of immigrants who demanded the right to use their own language be considered as a minority? As for other countries, at what stage was the group recognized as a minority? The Australian delegation agreed with the conclusions of the representative of France.

The only experience Australia had had of the minorities problem was when it had been raised by German propaganda. The Australian Government had consequently been forced to take restrictive measures to guarantee national security, although such measures were not in accordance with the spirit of Australian law. In general, Australia shared the point of view of the Latin-American countries; it desired the dispersal of groups rather than the formation of minorities; similarly it desired that one language should prevail and, though it went without saying that [726] foreign languages were taught in the schools, Australia would not be able to admit as a fundamental right the use before a tribunal of any language other than the national language.

The Australian delegation held that bilateral or multilateral conventions were the appropriate instrument to deal with the question of minorities, rather than the declaration. It would support any resolution which referred the question back to the Sub-Commission on the Prevention of Discrimination and the Protection of Minorities.

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) recalled that the Commission on Human Rights had studied with close attention the possibility of including a provision concerning minorities in the declaration. During its third session the Commission had decided to delete from the declaration article 31 of the Geneva draft,<sup>1</sup> which dealt with minorities, considering that it was preferable to await the conclusions of the Sub-Commission on the Prevention of Discrimination and the Protection of Minorities before drafting the text.

Furthermore, the Commission on Human Rights had noted that the problem of minorities was not of a universal nature. The representative of Chile had shown, in connexion with article 23 of the declaration, that the problem was quite different in Europe and in America; other members had stressed the same fact during the current meeting. In America the problem was traditionally one of assimilation. That tradition had been affirmed and established at the Pan American conferences of Lima and Mexico. It was, therefore, impossible to deal in the declaration with a problem which, in actual fact, concerned only the continent of Europe. She must emphasize that, unlike the representative of Mexico, she considered that it was impossible to adopt a neutral attitude on the insertion in the declaration of a right which was not of universal significance.

It had also been argued in the Commission on Human Rights that the guarantee of the rights of the individual made any reference to the rights of minorities superfluous. The rights and freedoms enumerated in the declaration fully covered the rights of minorities, with the possible exception of the provisions of the article as drafted by Yugoslavia. That proposal, however, was of a different character since it concerned the rights of ethnic communities and thus alluded to the very special circumstances obtaining in a State composed of a group of States.

The question of Porto Rico, where Spanish was the official language and where the Governor was a Porto Rican, had been raised in connexion with the United States. Mrs. Roosevelt pointed out that the status of Porto Rico was under discussion and might perhaps be subject to modification and that it would not impede the application of the general principle of voluntary assimilation. In her opinion, the best solution of the problem of minorities was to encourage respect for human rights.

The United States delegation would consequently vote against the three texts before the Committee.

Summary Record of the Hundred and Sixty-Second Meeting
[of the Third Committee]

Held at the Palais de Chaillot, Paris, on Saturday,
27 November 1948, at 3:30 p.m.

Chairman: MR. CHARLES MALIK (Lebanon).

MR. CONTOUMAS (Greece) pointed out that the question of the protection of minorities was formally covered in Article 1, paragraph 3, and Article 55 c of the United Nations Charter. That protection was elaborated in greater detail in article 2 of the declaration. It had to be borne in mind that the protection of minorities applied to groups which, although they wished to be treated on an equal footing with the rest of the population, often required differential treatment, enabling them to retain linguistic and other characteristics which distinguished them from the majority. Equalitarian treatment, which met over 85 per cent of the wishes of the minorities, was already ensured to a great extent by the formal provisions of the Charter and of the declaration itself. Differential treatment, or the “remaining questions” mentioned by the representative of France, presented certain very delicate aspects. A minority abusing such treatment tended to become disloyal to the Government of its State and to act as a fifth column at the orders of a foreign Government.

The question was such a delicate one that it was still being studied by the Sub-Commission on the Prevention of Discrimination and the Protection of Minorities. It would therefore be advisable to await the conclusions of that body rather than to make a hasty decision at once.

Yugoslav proposal B, moreover, dealt with the question of national minorities as “ethnic communities”. Such a proposal was beyond the scope of a declaration of the rights of the individual, since it belonged more properly to the sphere of the political structure of States.

MRS. MENON (India) said she was not interested in participating in a formal debate. The principle being discussed was the right of members of minorities to education, to have their own culture and their own language. As the representative of a country that had been under foreign domination for many years, she would naturally support the USSR proposal. India faced difficulties with regard to its own minorities, the most conspicuous example being the partition of the country on religious grounds. However, it hoped to solve those difficulties on the basis of the USSR policy of political integration with cultural independence. In Bombay there were schools for the children of many different national minorities, and in her own province school examinations could be taken in four different languages.

[728]

There were dangers connected with the protection of minorities, as could be seen in regard to the Sudeten Germans in Czechoslovakia and the Jews in Palestine. Those risks, however, had to be taken. Indians were learning Indian philosophy from German writers and studying Indian culture at London University and at the British Museum.

MR. RADEVANOVIC (Yugoslavia) expressed the view that the USSR proposal was much broader in scope than the one put forward by the Danish delegation. The principle of equal rights for all, whether they belonged to a minority or to the majority of the population, was of particular importance. Each minority had its own culture, and, because a country's regime was established by the majority, it was necessary specifically to guarantee the cultural rights of minorities. Unlike the Danish proposal, the USSR proposal was designed to protect the individual member of a minority. It was therefore essential to insert it in the declaration.

MR. DAVIES (United Kingdom) moved the closure of the debate.

The motion was rejected by 14 votes to 8, with 14 abstentions.

MR. KAMINSKY (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) felt that the USSR proposal needed little clarification. It laid down the minimum protection which should be guaranteed to members of a minority and, as such, it should receive the support of the Committee. The individual's right to his own language and culture was one of the most important human rights and played a large part in the development of the race and the nation.

It was impossible to ignore the fact that, at one time, Australia had carried out a policy of forceful elimination of its aboriginal group and that the North American Indian had almost ceased to exist in the United States. In colonial territories, there were no signs that indigenous culture was being developed and encouraged, and yet the representatives of metropolitan Powers made constant references to the spread of civilization. The South African representative had actually spoken of the need to defend Western civilization against the threat of the indigenous population of South Africa. Ninety per cent of the peoples in the British colonies were illiterate, for the development of culture and the colonial yoke were mutually exclusive. It was only in the USSR that such conditions were unknown. There, peoples of many different races and nationalities developed their own cultures and lived together in friendship.

MR. WATT (Australia), speaking on a point of order, protested at the fact that the representative of the Byelorussian SSR had criticized his Government on matters which had not been dealt with by the representative of Australia during the debate. He asked the Chairman's permission for an opportunity to reply.

THE CHAIRMAN stated that he was reluctant to grant him that right since it would be apt to lead [729] to a lengthy extension of the debate. He would consider the matter and give his decision later.

MR. WATT (Australia), again on a point of order, stated that the remark of the representative of the Byelorussian SSR concerning the forceful elimination of aborigines contained a serious charge and that he should be given an opportunity to reply.

MR. KAMINSKY (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic), speaking on a point of order, stated that he had referred to the forceful elimination of aborigines and not to their extermination, adding that his remarks bore no reference to the existing Australian Government.

MR. KAYALY (Syria) pointed out that the principle of the protection of minorities had often been used as a political excuse to interfere with the domestic affairs of other nations. If it were to be incorporated in the declaration, he was afraid that some nations would again feel justified in abusing that principle.

In Africa, the indigenous populations were still prohibited from using their own languages in primary and secondary schools, and were not even allowed to establish universities. That being so it was the duty of the Committee to vote in favour of the individual's right to use his own language and have his own schools. That right should be granted, however, on the understanding that the individual would also be helped towards assimilation. There could be no question of granting the minority the right to interfere in national affairs.

MR. MAYBANK (Canada) said that, in common with certain other representatives, he found it difficult to accept any of the three proposals. It had been stated that the problem of minorities might arise in connexion with immigration or with respect to indigenous national groups. The problem, in the sense in which that word was used in the various proposals, did not exist in Canada. English and French Canadians lived side by side contentedly and, properly speaking, neither could be regarded as a minority.

There were many European and non-European immigrants in Canada. They were free to worship as they pleased and to speak their own language. The Government's policy was one of voluntary assimilation, looking forward to the day when the immigrant would regard himself as a Canadian citizen. While Canadians were free to use whatever language they wanted, the question of education remained within the jurisdiction of each province and the Federal Government neither wished nor was able to interfere in that connexion.

He felt that it was important that the articles of the declaration should have a general application to the peoples of the world. For that reason, he would vote against the Yugoslav, USSR and Danish proposals, but if the Committee so desired, he would be prepared to support the Haitian proposal (A/C.3/373) to refer the question to the Economic and Social Council for further study by two of its organs.

MR. KURAL (Turkey) said that while there were minorities in his country, no group was [730] numerically important. The members of those minorities had the right to freedom of religion and enjoyed the same civil and political rights as the members of the majority. They had the right to use their own language and they could establish schools, publish books and newspapers, etc.

Two objections had been raised to the inclusion of an article on the protection of minorities: firstly, that certain countries wanted to assimilate their minority groups, and, secondly, that the question was under consideration by the Sub-Commission on the Prevention of Discrimination and the Protection of Minorities. He was in favour of the question being studied more thoroughly, but if the Committee felt otherwise, he would suggest the simple insertion of a reference to the individual's right to teach and use freely his own language, as that was the only provision not already covered by the declaration.

The Yugoslav proposal was not concerned with the rights of the individual and, further, presupposed only the existence of the federated State. The Danish proposal did not contain a reference to the individual's right to use his own language. The USSR proposal was lengthy and confused and the last part of it would tend to transform the languages of minorities into official languages.

MRS. NEULANDS (New Zealand) said that the discussion had convinced her that it would be undesirable to include an article on the protection of minorities in the declaration. None of the proposals put forward was satisfactory to her delegation, but if it was considered necessary, she was prepared to support the Haitian proposal.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) felt that the objections which had been raised against his amendment were unfounded. In reply to the Turkish representative, he said that his proposal meant that the member of a minority would have the right to learn his own language, establish schools, be interpreted in court and so on. It had been suggested that there would be a danger in allowing a minority to retain its own language. He could understand that that view might be shared by the colonial Powers, but was surprised at the support it had received from the Latin-American countries. In his opinion, if it were granted its rights, the minority would remain loyal to the majority.

MR. CASSIN (France) recalled that many unsuccessful attempts had been made in the Commission to draft a satisfactory text concerning the protection of minorities. The proposals that were being put forward were interesting, but could not be regarded as covering the problem as a whole.

In order not to prejudice the future, he considered that the Haitian proposal would have to be adopted. If any satisfactory new proposal was put forward, he would accept it.

MR. DAVIES (United Kingdom) remarked that it was plain from the eloquent speeches of the USSR representative that he was sincerely and strongly in favour of the article proposed by [731] his delegation. His conception of the policies of the British Empire, however, was rather out of date. There had been considerable progress in the colonies towards self-determination, a fact which the USSR representative had chosen to ignore. Considerable care was also taken to preserve Native customs, although the latter sometimes retarded general cultural development. No evidence had been produced that the use of Native tongues was being restricted in any British colony.

The Commission on Human Rights, at its third session, had rejected an article dealing with minorities;<sup>1</sup> no new arguments had been advanced in the current debate to warrant the acceptance of such an article. As the United States representative had aptly remarked, it had not been possible to effect a compromise in a single article between the views of the New World which wished to assimilate immigrants and those of the Old World in which racial minorities existed.

The United Kingdom delegation took the view that the declaration already fully protected the rights of all minorities: thus, article 16 guaranteed freedom of religion, article 17 freedom of the Press and opinion, article 18 freedom of assembly, article 23 the choice of education, article 25 the right to participate in the cultural life of the community, and article 2 expressly protected all minorities. There was consequently no need for any of the three articles before the Committee; the declaration should not contain detailed statements which were not universally applicable.

Of the three articles proposed, the Danish text was the least objectionable, but was too limited in scope. The other two were quite unacceptable. The USSR amendment, in particular, was restrictive: it did not include cultural minorities and, more important still, it failed to protect political minorities.

MR. DEMCHENKO (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) stated that his country, like the other republics which composed the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, had successfully solved the problem of minorities by permitting them freely to develop their national cultures within the framework of a unified State. Numerous figures could be cited to show that under the Soviet regime all those republics had instituted schools, universities and theatres in which the Native languages were used; books and newspapers were printed in those languages. The result had been the greatest flowering of culture, science, music, and literature that the USSR had ever known. Moreover, a close friendship united the Republics, as had been shown by the common effort against the enemy during the war, and the help they were extending to each other in the great work of post-war reconstruction.

He had been somewhat surprised by some of the objections raised to the article proposed by the USSR delegation. In reply to the United Kingdom representative, he referred to a petition by Natives of Tanganyika complaining that a proposed law affecting their interests and ostensibly supported by them had not even been translated into their Native tongue and that they had not had due cognizance of it. It was true that Native customs were frequently protected in the Colonies; those were the customs which impeded the cultural development of the Natives and which the colonial Powers found profitable to maintain. It was, unfortunately, equally true that, on the whole, Natives were prevented from using their language and developing their own culture. It was enough to cite the following figures: on the Gold Coast 90,000 out of a population of 3,500,000 Natives attended schools; in Kenya, the Government spent 500 times as much on each European child as on each African child.

He opposed the Haitian draft resolution, which sought to evade a vital issue, and supported the article proposed by the delegation of the Soviet Union.

MR. HVASS (Denmark) said that it was obvious that a number of delegations were in favour of the Haitian draft resolution, to which his own delegation did not object in principle. He suggested, however, that the second, third and fourth paragraphs of that draft resolution should be deleted, and that the words in the last paragraph “ethnic and religious minorities” should be replaced by “national, religious, or linguistic minorities”.

MR. CONTOUMAS (Greece) said that he was satisfied, in the main, with the Haitian draft resolution. He himself and the United Kingdom representative pointed out, however, that the problem of the protection of minorities was to a great extent covered in the declaration and that only a few aspects of it required further consideration. He, therefore, supported the deletion of the second, third and fourth paragraphs of the Haitian draft resolution and proposed that the fifth paragraph should end as follows: “a thorough study of those aspects of the problem of minorities which are not covered by the Declaration of Human Rights and particularly by article 2”.

That last amendment was necessary to avoid giving the impression that the declaration had not dealt with the problem of minorities at all; the fact was that it covered all its aspects with the exception of the differential treatment to be accorded to minorities.

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) wished to clarify a misunderstanding. In her previous statement she had said that the Sub-Commission on the Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities was already seized of the problem of minorities; she had not been in favour of referring that particular question to it.

THE CHAIRMAN stated that the Haitian draft resolution, being of a procedural nature, would be put to the vote before any of the proposed articles. If it were adopted, no further action would be [733] taken on the articles; if it were rejected, the articles would be put to the vote, beginning with that submitted by the USSR delegation.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) stated that the USSR article and the Haitian draft resolution were not mutually exclusive, inasmuch as the latter dealt entirely with the problem of minorities while the former dealt with all persons regardless of whether they belonged to a minority or the majority of the population. Consequently, both texts should be voted on by the Committee.

MR. SAINT-LOT (Haiti) accepted the Chairman's suggestion that the last paragraph of his draft resolution should begin with the words: "Refers to the Economic and Social Council the texts submitted by the delegations of the USSR, Yugoslavia and Denmark on this subject, contained in document A/C.3/307/Rev.2 and requests the Council. . ."

THE CHAIRMAN recalled that he had previously made clear to the Committee that the three articles before it fell in the general field of minorities. The Haitian draft resolution was based on that understanding. The addition accepted by the Haitian representative made the situation perfectly clear. If the draft resolution were adopted, the texts currently before the Committee would be referred to other organs for further study.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that the Committee should not evade the issue but should have the moral courage to vote either in favour or against the USSR article, which dealt with a most important question.

As that vote was being circumvented, he formally moved that the Committee should vote whether or not it should vote on the USSR article, which had been submitted in due time and in full accordance with the rules of procedure.

He pointed out that that was a procedural motion which called for immediate action.

THE CHAIRMAN stated that the motion was not acceptable.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) felt that his proposal was as acceptable as the Haitian draft resolution.

He submitted that that was the first case on record when an article, properly presented and fully discussed, was not put to the vote. He protested, in the name of the USSR delegation, against such discrimination, and urged that his article should be either accepted or rejected.

THE CHAIRMAN replied that a precedent did exist: similar action had been taken the previous day with respect to the proposed new article dealing with the right of petition. Moreover, regardless of precedent, it was the rule in organs of the United Nations that procedural proposals with [734] respect to texts had precedence over the substance of those texts.

He ruled that the Haitian draft resolution would be put to the vote first and that if it were adopted the article dealing with minorities would not be voted upon.

MR. PAVLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) appealed from the Chairman's ruling.

That appeal was rejected by 26 votes to 1, with 2 abstentions.

MR. DEMCHENKO (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) moved the adjournment of the meeting.

That motion was rejected by 27 votes to 10, with 1 abstention.

THE CHAIRMAN put the Haitian draft resolution to the vote in parts, as indicated by various representatives.

The representative of Guatemala requested that the vote on the first paragraph be taken by roll-call.

The vote on the first paragraph was taken by roll-call, as follows:

The United Kingdom, having been drawn by lot by the Chairman, was called upon to vote first.

In favour: United Kingdom, United States of America, Uruguay, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Australia, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Canada, Chile, China, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Ethiopia, France, Greece, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, Mexico, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Panama, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Siam, Sweden, Syria, Turkey, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics.

Abstaining: Argentina, Belgium, Brazil, Denmark, India.

The first paragraph was adopted by 35 votes, with 5 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN then put to the vote the first part of the second paragraph ending with the words "in which arises".

The first part of the second paragraph was adopted by 27 votes to 9, with 2 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put the remaining part of the second paragraph to the vote.

That part was rejected by 20 votes to 13, with 5 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN called for a vote on the third paragraph.

The third paragraph was adopted by 33 votes, with 6 abstentions.

After a brief discussion, MR. SAINT-LOT (Haiti) accepted the insertion of the words “in a specific provision” after the words “to deal” in the fourth paragraph of his resolution.

THE CHAIRMAN put the fourth paragraph to the vote.

The representative of Guatemala requested that the vote on that paragraph be taken by roll-call.

The vote was taken by roll-call, as follows:

[735]

The Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, having been drawn by lot by the Chairman, was called upon to vote first.

In favour: Canada, Chile, China, Cuba, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Ethiopia, France, Greece, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, Netherlands, New Zealand, Panama, Paraguay, Philippines, Siam, United Kingdom, United States of America, Australia, Brazil.

Against: Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Czechoslovakia, India, Lebanon, Poland, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Yugoslavia, Belgium.

Abstaining: Denmark, Mexico, Norway, Peru, Sweden, Syria, Turkey, Uruguay, Yemen, Argentina.

The fourth paragraph was adopted by 22 votes to 9, with 10 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN then put to the vote the Danish proposal to delete the second, third and fourth paragraphs.

The proposal was rejected by 24 votes to 10, with 3 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the Greek amendment to the fifth paragraph.

The amendment was rejected by 20 votes to 4, with 15 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the Danish amendment to the fifth paragraph, replacing the words “ethnic and religious minorities” by “national, religious or linguistic minorities”.

THE CHAIRMAN then called for a vote on the following portion of the fifth paragraph:

“Refers to the Economic and Social Council the texts submitted by the delegations of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Yugoslavia, and Denmark on this subject, contained in document A/C.3/307/Rev.2 and requests the Council to ask the Commission on Human Rights and the Sub-Commission on the Prevention of Discrimination and Protection of Minorities to make a thorough study of the problem of minorities.”

The representative of Guatemala requested that the vote be taken by roll-call.

The vote was taken by roll-call as follows:

The Netherlands, having been drawn by lot by the Chairman, was called upon to vote first.

In favour: Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Panama, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Sweden, Syria, Turkey, United Kingdom, United States of America, Uruguay, Australia, Canada, Chile, China, Cuba, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Ethiopia, France, Greece, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, Lebanon, Mexico.

Against: Poland.

Abstaining: Siam, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Argentina, Belgium, Brazil, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, India.

That first portion of the fifth paragraph was adopted by 28 votes to 1, with 12 abstentions.

[736]

The remaining portion of the fifth paragraph, as amended, was adopted by 16 votes to 11, with 10 abstentions.

The fifth paragraph in its entirety, as amended, was adopted by 25 votes to 1, with 11 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN stated that, in accordance with the request of the Guatemalan representative, the Haitian draft resolution (A/C.3/373) as a whole, as amended, would be put to the vote by roll-call.

A vote was taken by roll-call, as follows:

Haiti, having been drawn by lot by the Chairman, was called upon to vote first.

In favour: Haiti, Honduras, Mexico, Netherlands, New Zealand, Panama, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Sweden, Syria, Turkey, United Kingdom, United States of America, Uruguay, Australia, Canada, Chile, China, Dominican Republic, Ethiopia, France, Greece, Guatemala.

Abstaining: India, Lebanon, Poland, Siam, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Yemen, Yugoslavia, Argentina, Belgium, Brazil, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Ecuador.

The draft resolution, as amended, was adopted by 24 votes, with 16 abstentions.

The meeting rose at 7 p.m.

Proposals for Additional Articles

Additional article A proposed by the Yugoslav delegation (A/C.3/307/Rev.1/Add.1)

MR. RADEVANOVIC (Yugoslavia) introduced article A which he proposed for insertion in the declaration. He pointed out that the second paragraph of that article did not deal with minorities in the accepted sense, that is to say, nationals of one State living within the confines of another, but with complete national groups forming part of the population of a State.

Every individual was entitled to have his national community safeguarded, inasmuch as his ability to exercise all the other rights granted to him in the declaration depended to a large extent on the status of the community in which he lived, and would be curtailed if that community were the victim of oppression on the part of other national groups which obstructed its free development. It was therefore essential to include in the declaration a general statement to the effect that all the national communities composing a State should enjoy equal rights.

He foresaw the objection that the proposed article would not be appropriate in a declaration [737] of the rights of the individual. Man could not, however, be regarded as isolated from his fellow human beings. In the modern world, every individual was a member of a social group, and his rights depended largely upon the status of that group. The declaration already contained article 14, which dealt with the family, and articles 19 and 26, which dealt with the State; since it had been recognized that a mention of those two groups was necessary for the full protection of individual rights, it could hardly be argued that an article dealing with national communities was unacceptable because it did not directly state an individual right. That third group, which fell between the other two, deserved express mention for the same reasons. The proposed article would complete the concept, already included in the declaration, of the individual as a member of society.

Yugoslavia's own experience gave proof of the harmful effects of the oppression of one national group by another within a State. It was at present a free union of several autonomous republics, each representing different nationalities, in a federated State. All those republics enjoyed full equality of rights, as consequently did their citizens.

Equality of individuals was impossible without the equality of the national groups to which they belonged. Consequently, the principle contained in the proposed article must be written into the declaration as a prerequisite to the enjoyment of all the other rights stated therein.

MR. CONTOUMAS (Greece) observed that the only part of the proposed article which could properly be considered in connexion with the declaration was the phrase "Any person has the right to the recognition and protection of his nationality", if the word "nationality" was used in its true sense, that of relationship of allegiance existing between individual and the State to which he belonged. If such was the case, the wording proposed by the Yugoslav representative would repeat the provisions of article 13 of the declaration, and would, consequently, be useless.

The author of the proposal, however, had been careful to indicate that by protection of nationality he meant the preservation of the ethnic characteristics of the individuals belonging to minorities. But that was a question relating to the protection of minorities, and still under study by a special United Nations sub-commission: it could not, therefore, be dealt with in the declaration.

Lastly, in so far as it dealt with national communities forming part of the population of a State, it could not be considered in connexion with the declaration, the subject of which was the rights of the individual, though it might one day deserve attention, should the United Nations ever decide to deal with the subject of federalism.

MR. KAYALY (Syria) fully agreed that the rights of man both as an individual and as a member of society should be thoroughly covered in the declaration. Article A proposed by the Yugoslav representative contained a concept that was both novel and just; it was, however, superfluous, since the declaration protected man's [738] individual rights directly and on an equal basis, regardless of whether he belonged to a national minority or not.

The only reason for extending protection to national communities could be that individuals within those communities were victims of discrimination; but the declaration proclaimed the equality of the rights of all individuals without distinction. There was consequently no need for special protection on grounds of nationality.

The proposed article might, in fact, be regarded as destructive rather than constructive, since it appeared to be based on the assumption that Governments which subscribed to the declaration would not treat all their citizens alike.

It had been previously decided to refer to the Economic and Social Council articles dealing with the problem of minorities; the proposed article raised an analogous problem and should be accorded similar treatment.

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) remarked that the general statement she had made at the 161st meeting with respect to the articles dealing with minorities applied to article A as well, with the exception of the opening phrase of that article, the subject of which had been included, after a lengthy debate, in article 13.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) said that the proposed article – and in particular its second paragraph – raised the delicate and controversial question of federalism. It appeared to imply that States with heterogeneous populations should adopt the federal system of government. While Mr. Dehousse shared that view with respect to his own country, he could not consider it universally applicable or desirable.

Article A was concerned, not with the rights of man, but, as its sponsor had aptly remarked, with the rights of national communities as distinct from national minorities. It was, in effect, a recommendation to Governments to adopt the federal system.

Since he did not wish to vote against the principle of federalism and was unable to vote in favour of a text which went beyond the limits of the declaration, he would abstain from voting on the article.

MR. CASSIN (France) thought that article A raised another aspect of the problem of nationality than that covered in article 13. The text, while extremely interesting, could not be properly included in the declaration of human rights; its place was, rather, a declaration of the rights of nations. The status of national groups within a State was an important question, but not one which could be resolved in a debate on the rights of man.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) stated that his delegation would vote in favour of article A. The thesis that the article was unacceptable because the declaration dealt with the rights of the individual was untenable. Man could no longer be [739] considered apart from the community in which he lived, whether or not he happened to belong to a national minority. There was no reason why the declaration should not guarantee the rights of that community, since by so doing it would, in a concrete and practical manner, guarantee the free exercise of individual rights.

He could not agree with the Belgian representative that the Yugoslav article was a recommendation favouring the federal system of government. It contained no mention of the principle of federalism; it merely granted equality of rights to all national groups, thereby providing special protection for minorities which stood in great need of it. The rights of the majority were protected by the declaration as a whole; it was only just to reserve one article to the rights of minorities.

MR. KAMINSKY (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) recalled that his delegation had opposed the action taken by the Committee at the previous meeting to postpone consideration of articles dealing with the rights of minorities. He still held that the right to his Native culture was a basic right of every human being.

He thought article A should be included in the declaration because it would supplement article 2 and would provide recognition of each man's right to live in a free and freely developing national community. It was a concrete and realistic statement, which applied equally to the majority and the minority and was sorely needed in the declaration.

The delegation of the Byelorussian SSR would consequently support it.

MR. WATT (Australia) had no desire to minimize the importance of the problems raised in the Yugoslav article. He could not but agree, however, that there was no place for it in the declaration. The question of minorities was no longer before the Committee. In so far as the article dealt with man's right to a nationality, it was a repetition of article 13; in so far as it dealt with the right of a nation to free development and equality, it was a repetition of Article 2, paragraph 1 of the Charter, which, being binding upon its signatories, surely did not require repetition.

He thought the second part of that article dealt not with national minorities, as some representatives had said, but with countries already organized on a federal basis. That was the structure of his country; a number of others might, however, prefer a centralized form of government.

He was unable to support the Yugoslav article.

MR. DEMCHENKO (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) pointed out that national communities in many countries were suffering from discriminatory treatment. The Yugoslav proposal was therefore useful and should be included in the declaration. The representative of Syria had argued that to demand equal rights for national communities would be destructive rather than constructive, because Governments must treat all their nationals on a footing of equality. There were, however, countries where such communities did not in fact enjoy equal rights, so that the Syrian representative's view was incorrect and the explicit statement of that right was essential. Equality of treatment between national communities was not destructive, as conditions in his own country showed; on the contrary, it made for friendship between the peoples and the wellbeing of the State. He disagreed with the representative of the United States who had argued that the Yugoslav proposal was superfluous because article 13 as amended covered the right to nationality. The Yugoslav proposal had no connexion with that article because it went much further by mentioning the free development of the nation and of national communities.

The representative of Belgium had claimed that the Yugoslav proposal went too far and implied that the General Assembly would be recommending the adoption of a federal system. Nothing in the proposal could be so construed. He pointed out to the Belgian representative that it was no valid objection to say that the proposal constituted a recommendation to Governments, because the entire declaration was intended as such. He disagreed with the Syrian representative's suggestion that the problem should be referred to the Economic and Social Council. That might appear merely an effort to exclude the proposed article from the declaration. It had been sufficiently discussed by the Third Committee.

He would therefore vote for the Yugoslav proposal.

MR. RADEVANOVIC (Yugoslavia) explained that the basic idea of his proposal had been to safeguard the rights of national communities which existed within a state community. Such communities had to have equality of national, political and social rights. The individual and the community were closely interdependent. The provision in the second paragraph should be regarded as a condition for the enjoyment of human rights. It did not imply insistence upon a federal system although his country naturally preferred that system; but that was not necessarily the sole solution of the problem. He welcomed the support given by some delegations.

THE CHAIRMAN, at the request of the representative of Iran, put the additional article A proposed by Yugoslavia to the vote in parts.

The first paragraph was rejected by 20 votes to 8, with 8 abstentions.

The second paragraph was rejected by 22 votes to 6, with 8 abstentions.

Additional article C proposed by Yugoslav delegation (A/C.3/307/Rev.1/Add.1)<sup>1</sup>

MR. RADEVANOVIC (Yugoslavia) said that the declaration should reflect the conscience of the times. The fundamental human rights therein declared should be applicable to every person, including all persons belonging to the population of Trust and Non-Self-

Governing Territories. All delegations would probably agree in principle that the human conscience had progressed so far as to find oppression of colonial peoples intolerable. The declaration could not in itself alter existing conditions, but it could and should proclaim that the principle of human dignity applied to the populations of Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories, who were in every way equal in dignity to everyone else. The article was not superfluous even in the light of article 2. The general principle of non-discrimination had been repeatedly declared, but it had not always been applied in colonial territories.

A wider statement was needed; the last lines of the preamble were too vague. Such a statement should appear in a separate article rather than in the preamble and should clearly apply to colonial peoples. The preamble was a statement of general principles and might be open to conflicting interpretations; colonial peoples should not be at the mercy of such conflict. The rights of colonial peoples should receive the same consideration as those of others if the declaration was to avoid the appearance of making discriminations.

MR. SAINT-LOT (Haiti) said that his delegation would give the fullest support to the Yugoslav proposal. He had always fought for the universal application of the declaration; without the proposed article, the document would lack universality. A colonial application clause appeared in all international conventions signed by Members of the United Nations under the pretext that signatories could not impose their will upon their colonies. That had, however, never prevented such Powers from imposing their will when they had so desired.

The mention of territories under the jurisdiction of Member States in the preamble was not sufficient; it was not binding, and there had been few precedents which gave much grounds for hope that it would be applied. It was probable that many of the delegations which had opposed the Yugoslav proposal had little idea of the feeling of exasperation and despair generated in peoples living under a colonial regime. The peoples of the Non-Self-Governing Territories above all should be assured that they had the good-will of the United Nations directed towards them.

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) pointed out that the USSR delegation had submitted an amendment (E/800, page 31) to the preamble very similar to the Yugoslav proposal. Articles 1 and 2 showed clearly that the declaration applied to all human beings. The preamble, moreover, spoke of the peoples of territories under the jurisdiction of Member States. She disagreed with the view that that was vague.

The Yugoslav proposal was therefore superfluous and repetitious, and her delegation would vote against it.

MR. CASSIN (France) agreed in principle with previous speakers but disagreed on the method suggested. There could be no doubt that the declaration was intended to apply equally to all persons. He would, indeed, submit a proposal at a later stage that the word “universal” should be substituted for the word “international” in the title of the declaration.

Mr. Cassin pointed out that the part of the preamble quoted by the United States representative was in the operative part and not in the introductory one. While he agreed in principle with the Yugoslav proposal, he thought that the proposal would fit in better in the preamble, which would then be given binding force. To introduce a separate article might give the impression of discrimination against those Members which had Trust or Non-Self-Governing Territories under their care in relation to non-member States, in whose possessions violation of human rights might be much more widespread.

He therefore opposed the Yugoslav proposal.

MR. DEHOUSSE (Belgium) agreed with the representatives of France and the United States. An additional argument against the Yugoslav proposal was provided by article 2, the scope of which was absolutely general in that it stated that the rights in the declaration could be invoked by everyone. He agreed with the representative of France that the principle of the Yugoslav proposal was excellent but that the proposal was unacceptable, because such an article would appear to be an implicit reproach against certain Member States. In the light of article 2, it would be impossible to include a provision referring implicitly to certain particular States.

Mr. Dehousse pointed out that the attitude of certain delegations appeared to be contradictory. At previous meetings they had opposed the right of petition; however they were appearing to favour the proposal under discussion. The Belgian delegation, on the other hand, had been consistent: it had voted for the first two proposals concerning minorities and had abstained on the one concerning the federal system only because it appeared to go too far. If the Yugoslav proposal were adopted, that might be interpreted as discrimination against the States to which it alluded.

MR. SAINT-LOT (Haiti) thanked the representative of France for drawing his attention to the fact that the principle of universality was included in the operative part of the preamble. The position of the Haitian delegation, however, was logical. It was surprising that countries which had had no experience of colonial conditions should attempt to lay down the law to those which had. His country, as representing a number of similar [743] States, had received many petitions asking that such an article should be included into the declaration. It was strange to find the cry for freedom taken up in the Committee by countries which had not had a good record in their dealings with Non-Self-Governing Territories.

MR. CONTOUMAS (Greece) said that the text of Article 76 c of the Charter reinforced such arguments as that of the French representative. Mention of peoples under the jurisdiction of Member States in the operative part of the preamble was of a binding character. Repetition in a separate article would merely weaken it.

MR. KAMINSKY (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) said that the Yugoslav proposal filled a gap in the declaration. The Committee had always agreed that the rights were applicable to the populations of Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories. That principle ought to be emphasized in a separate article, particularly in order to avoid confusion when it came to determining the scope of its application. Half of the human race lived under systems which continually violated human rights. The United Nations should declare that the protection of those rights applied above all to such peoples.

The Yugoslav proposal introduced no repetition and correctly defined the scope of the declaration. He had been surprised that certain delegations had raised some objections as to its form; he could not entirely credit their good faith. The peoples to whom the declaration was addressed would have little opportunity to find expressions of sympathy made towards them in the course of those debates; the declaration, therefore, must clearly state that it covered them.

He would vote for the Yugoslav proposal.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that the declaration had been described in the Press as a lofty ideal. Such statements appeared not to realize that very many progressive proposals had failed of adoption. The declaration, however, still contained a number of useful articles which might help metropolitan countries to clarify the existing situation and to progress to a point where they could create decent living conditions for all in Non-Self-Governing and Trust Territories.

The Yugoslav proposal was important because it lent emphasis to such an intention. His delegation would therefore support it.

The principle might be stated either in the preamble or in a separate article. It had been argued that the proposal might be interpreted as a reproach against the countries possessing colonies but the declaration nowhere reproached anyone, and simply stated rights. It should lay emphasis on the effort to achieve democratic progress; there was no need to fear what interpretation might be placed on any specific article. The idea contained in the Yugoslav proposal might alternatively be [744] included in the preamble though if that were done, it would not be as strong as if it were included in a separate article.

He reserved his right to raise the matter again during the discussion on the preamble.

MRS. NEWLANDS (New Zealand) said there were some difficulties in the form in which the Yugoslav proposal was presented. She agreed with the view that the substance was covered in the preamble; a separate article might weaken the effect of the reference to dependent territories. The New Zealand delegation had expressed its views on the substance of the Yugoslav proposal in the light of its own position towards Trust Territories in its draft amendment to the preamble (A/C.3/267).

MR. DAVIES (United Kingdom) agreed with the Yugoslav representative's statement that Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories should enjoy the rights set forth in the declaration. That document was a most important statement of ideals which the United Kingdom's Non-Self-Governing Territories had fully approved.

He agreed, however with the United States representative that there seemed no necessity to single out such territories for mention. Article 2 left no doubt that the declaration applied to all persons, whether in these territories or behind the "iron curtain"; there could be no question that universal application was intended. The Yugoslav proposal, therefore, was superfluous.

He felt, with the Belgian representative, that there might be some ulterior motive in making special mention of the Non-Self-Governing Territories; it might introduce an element of propaganda into a statement of ideals. It might be that such rights as those contained in articles 11 and 17 were less fully applied in the Yugoslav representative's own country or in some of its neighbours than in Non-Self-Governing Territories; if any areas were to be singled out, they should not necessarily be those territories. There was, however, no ground to single out any group or area, for that would detract from the universality of the declaration.

His country had been in constant consultation with its Non-Self-Governing Territories, which had approved of its attitude throughout the discussions.

Replying to the representative of Haiti, he pointed out that the colonial application clause was simply part of the machinery by which international conventions could become applicable to Non-Self-Governing Territories. That question might be raised again during the discussions on the covenant and the measures of implementation; it was inappropriate to mention it in the declaration. He could see no reason why the Yugoslav proposal had been submitted unless the motive had been political.

MR. SHAHI (Pakistan) said he would vote for the Yugoslav proposal because it was in entire [745] conformity with the provisions of article 2 and the principle of the universal application of the declaration. The idea contained in the proposal was of such great importance that it should be stated explicitly in the body of the declaration instead of merely being left to be interpreted from the document as a whole.

The New Zealand representative had expressed the view that it was unnecessary to insert the proposed new article, as it was already covered by the terms of the preamble. In his opinion, the purpose of the preamble was to set forth in a condensed form what was later laid down in the body of the declaration. For that reason, it was necessary to include a separate article on the rights of colonial peoples.

The Pakistan delegation believed that the greatest deprivation a people could suffer was to be denied its political independence. His delegation's attitude was based, not only on an instinctive sympathy with the lot of dependent peoples, but also on the intellectual conviction that freedom was indivisible. The rights set forth in the declaration should, therefore, be explicitly extended to the peoples of the Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories.

MR. DEMCHENKO (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) drew attention to the two different attitudes that had been expressed during the debate. On the one hand, there was the point of view of the colonial Powers, who, not surprisingly, objected to the adoption of the Yugoslav proposal. On the other hand, several representatives had demanded equal rights for all the peoples of the world, among them representatives of countries that had experienced the colonial yoke.

The declaration indicated that human rights should be enjoyed by all the peoples of the world. For some reason, the representatives of the colonial Powers had argued that the insertion of the Yugoslav proposal would weaken the declaration. The French and Belgian representatives had asked why it was necessary to include a special reference to the Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories. It was necessary, because it was in those areas of the world that people were not allowed to exercise their rights to equal pay for equal work, to education and so on.

The colonial peoples must be able to see a clear statement of fact that the rights set forth in the declaration applied equally to them as to other peoples of the world, for they might not be able to understand that that was so from the general terms of the document.

The United Kingdom representative had repeated his customary remarks about the "iron curtain" and had accused the Yugoslav representative of submitting his proposal for propaganda reasons. Was it propaganda to say that human rights should be applied in Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories or, on the other hand, was the United Kingdom representative opposed to the Yugoslav proposal because he did not want human rights to be applied in those territories? He had claimed that conditions in the Non-Self-Governing Territories were better than in the countries behind the "iron curtain". What about the right to freedom of movement in [746] Africa, the right to freedom of expression in the Gold Coast and the many other similar examples of the violation of human rights to which he could refer?

The French representative's suggestion for the substitution of the word "universal" for "international", in the title of the declaration, was not sufficient; it was necessary for the Committee to adopt the Yugoslav proposal. It had been argued that the provisions of article 2 covered the Yugoslav representative's points of view, but that was not the case; article 2 laid down general principles, while the Yugoslav text indicated concretely that the declaration would apply to those who had been specifically deprived of their rights.

The appropriate place for the Yugoslav text could be decided later, but it was essential for the Committee now to express its approval of it.

MR. SAINT-LOT (Haiti) requested a roll-call vote on the additional article C, proposed by the Yugoslav delegation.

A vote was taken by roll-call on article C proposed by Yugoslavia, as follows:

Iraq, having been drawn by lot by the Chairman, was called upon to vote first.

In favour: New Zealand, Pakistan, Peru, Poland, Saudi Arabia, Syria, the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Yemen, Yugoslavia, the Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Czechoslovakia, Ethiopia, Haiti, India, Iran.

Against: Australia, Belgium, Canada, Chile, China, Costa Rica, Dominican Republic, France, Honduras, Netherlands, Paraguay, Sweden, United Kingdom, United States of America.

Abstaining: Argentina, Brazil, Denmark, Ecuador, Greece, Uruguay, Venezuela.

The additional article C was adopted by 16 votes to 14, with 7 abstentions.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) recalled that his delegation had consistently supported all measures that would help the Non-Self-Governing Territories and lead to their complete independence. He had been unable to vote for the Yugoslav proposal, however, because there was nothing in the declaration which would leave the slightest doubt that it was not applicable to all the peoples of the world. The affirmative vote that had been cast implied that there were exceptions as regards the application of the declaration. Furthermore, the manner in which the proposal had been presented and supported had convinced him that it was an effort at propaganda.

MR. BEAUFORT (Netherlands) said he had not spoken during the general discussion of the Yugoslav proposal because his point of view had been made clear by several representatives. He wanted it to be noted, however, that his delegation considered that the declaration was applicable to all the peoples of the world.

He had, voted against the proposed additional article as he felt it would weaken the solemn statement in the preamble and article 2, to the effect [747] that the declaration was for all peoples without discrimination.

MR. JIMÉNEZ DE ARÉCHAGA (Uruguay) had abstained in the vote for the reasons he had given at the previous meeting in regard to the question of minority rights.

MR. CARRERA ANDRADE (Ecuador) drew attention to the vote that had been taken on the additional article A, proposed by the Yugoslav delegation. He had abstained on the first paragraph as he felt it would mean unjustified interference in the internal affairs of the State. Further, the free development of the nation was not a right; it was entirely dependent upon the economic development of the country concerned.

He had abstained on the second paragraph of article A because it dealt with the rights of States and not those of the individual. Further, although he agreed with the principle of equality, it was an expression of political faith that could not be applied to certain backward groups, such as were to be found in parts of Latin America.

He had voted against the proposed additional article C, as he felt it should be taken up in connexion with the covenant rather than the declaration.

MR. KAYALY (Syria) had voted against articles A and B of the Yugoslav proposal, but had voted for article C because he found it necessary to emphasize the principles of the Charter, of the preamble of the declaration and all its various articles. All Member States had proclaimed their support of those principles and yet in many States, Trust Territories and Non-Self-Governing Territories, they were being violated.

He hoped that in the future the States concerned would be sincere in their undertaking to respect the rights both of dependent territories and individuals. The declaration must emerge as a document the provisions of which would not only be read but would also be applied.

MR. THURROTT (Canada) pointed out that his delegation had consistently taken the stand that the declaration must be general in character and in application.

He had voted against the additional article C, proposed by the Yugoslav delegation, because it implied that exceptions to the application of the declaration existed and thereby weakened the effect of the declaration.

MRS. NEWLANDS (New Zealand) had voted for the proposed additional article, despite her belief that its provisions were already covered by the preamble of the declaration, because she wanted to make sure that there would be no misunderstandings about the New Zealand Government's attitude on the question.

Additional article proposed by the Cuban delegation (A/C.3/261) and draft resolution submitted by the Argentine delegation (A/C.3/377) relating thereto

In the absence of the Cuban representative, MR. COROMINAS (Argentina), supported by the representative of Uruguay, pointed out that at [748] the previous meeting, the Cuban representative had said he would withdraw his amendment if the Committee decided to refer the question to the Commission on Human Rights for further consideration. For that reason he submitted the draft resolution contained in document A/C.3/377.

The same question had been raised at the Bogotá Conference, and after considerable discussion it had been referred to the Inter-American Juridical Committee for further study. The Cuban representative had attended the Conference and had agreed to that procedure.

MR. DEMCHENKO (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) moved the adjournment of the meeting.

The motion was adopted by 32 votes to none, with 3 abstentions.

The meeting rose at 12:55 p.m.

Summary Record of the Hundred and Sixty-Fourth Meeting
[of the Third Committee]

Held at the Palais de Chaillot, Paris, on Monday,

Additional article proposed by the Cuban delegation (A/C.3/261) and draft resolution submitted by the Argentine delegation (A/C.3/377) relating thereto (continued)

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) pointed out that it was not the first time that the Committee had considered the right to resist oppression and that the French delegation, in particular, had already submitted to the Commission on Human Rights a text on the subject, contained in document E/CN.4/21. The question having already been studied by several delegations, he did not think that there would be objections to the General Assembly adopting an additional article for incorporation in the declaration, at the current session.

The right to resist oppression was a fundamental right, which was in its proper place among the other essential rights of the individual that the Third Committee had studied in detail during the current session of the Assembly.

Any truly democratic State must respect that right, for it was at the very basis of its existence. The Chilean delegation fully realized the merits of the Cuban proposal but could not accept the vague and too general wording of the text. He preferred resubmitting in his own name the text previously proposed by the French delegation, as an amendment to the Cuban proposal (A/C.3/378). It was a more acceptable text because it took into consideration any serious or systematic violation of fundamental rights and freedoms and the individual's right to appeal to the international authority which, under the Charter of the United Nations, must defend the rights of man.

Should the Cuban delegation withdraw its proposal, he hoped that it would be adopted in the form of his own amendment.

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) criticized the dangerous character of the Cuban and Chilean proposals. In her opinion, the recognition in the declaration of human rights of the right to resist acts of tyranny and oppression would be tantamount to encouraging sedition, for such a provision could be interpreted as conferring a legal character on uprisings against a Government which was in no way tyrannical. It would be better not to enter upon the dangerous subject of particular doctrines which could easily be abused. The third paragraph of the preamble mentioned the question with sufficient clearness to do away with any need to include such proposals in the body of the declaration. She would, therefore, vote against those proposals, as they might be used for evil purposes.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) said that the right to resist acts of tyranny and oppression was incorporated in the Cuban Constitution in the form in which it was laid down in his amendment (A/C.3/261). He realized, however, that the French representative had previously submitted a more concise proposal to the Commission, the text of which had just been sponsored by the Chilean delegation in its amendment to the additional article proposed by Cuba.

In reply to the objections that had been raised against the right to resist oppression, he stated that his proposed additional article was not dangerous but expressed a legitimate right which had for its object the independence and sovereignty which the free exercise of human rights should guarantee.

Referring to the history of his country, he observed that that right had been recognized in the Montecristi manifesto, drawn up by Máximo Gómez, which was the cornerstone of Cuban liberation.<sup>147</sup> The same idea had been adopted by many other American nations and was reflected, in particular, in the speeches of Jefferson, Bolivar and San Martin.

It was, nevertheless, difficult to define the right to resist in a manner that was both cautious and precise, as was shown by the work of the Bogotá Conference and then of the Inter-American Juridical Committee at Rio de Janeiro. From that point of view, he recognized the merits of the text proposed by the French representative, which was already old.

Having paid tribute to the French Resistance, he concluded by stating that his delegation did not object to the French text, presently sponsored by the Chilean delegation, but that it would vote for the Argentine draft resolution that no decision should be taken at the present session and that the Commission on Human Rights should examine the question which would come before the Committee again at the next regular session.

MR. CASSIN (France) thanked the Chilean delegation for having sponsored a text submitted [750] unsuccessfully by France to the Commission on Human Rights, in <sup>147</sup> Written by José Martí and Máximo Gómez in 1895, the Manifesto of Montecristi set out the case for Cuban independence from Spain.

1947. It was based on the noble principles of 1789 and also on the situation created by recent events.

Should the Cuban delegation maintain its additional article, he would propose that it should be amended because it contained a permission to disobey, which should not be included in the declaration. The right to resist acts of tyranny and oppression could be recognized only in the case where such acts were practised by a regime and systematically. The exercise of that right could not be guaranteed in respect of isolated acts against human rights, such as those, for example, committed by a government official.

Should the Cuban delegation withdraw its additional article, he would urge the retention of the minimum concerning that question contained in the third paragraph of the preamble, even if the Argentine draft resolution should be adopted.

In conclusion, he said his delegation was ready to help in improving the text of the additional article proposed by the Cuban delegation. Should it be rejected, he would ask for the retention of the third paragraph of the preamble, without prejudice to the adoption of the Argentine draft resolution.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said he was decidedly in favour of the additional article submitted by the Cuban delegation, which in a simple and unpretentious form repeated a noble idea of unquestioned historical significance. Indeed, the right to resist acts of tyranny and oppression had brought about in the eighteenth century in France that vast popular movement which had thrown off the yoke of tyranny. However, the 1789 Declaration of the Rights of Man and of the Citizen was today regarded by many people as partially obsolete. That right had also formed the basis of the Declaration of the Rights of the People of the Soviet Union. More recently, the Nazi oppression, under which many States Members of the United Nations had suffered, had provided a further reason for mentioning that right in the declaration of human rights.

He would vote for the additional article proposed by Cuba, which, in his opinion, should not have met with any opposition in the Third Committee.

MR. COROMINAS (Argentina) recognized the merits of the additional article proposed by the Cuban delegation. His country had always recognized that right, which was also a real social duty. He was glad to note that that point of view was shared by many delegations.

The Republic of Cuba, whose Constitution established the right to resist acts of oppression or tyranny, had repeated the same formula in its proposed additional article; in Mr. Corominas' opinion, however, the article was too short. As the work of the Inter-American Juridical Committee had shown, a detailed study would be necessary before that inalienable and indefeasible right, which was easier to exercise than to define, could be appropriately formulated in a declaration.

However, to show that he was ready to cooperate in drawing up an article on that right, he would be ready formally to withdraw his draft resolution. Should the Cuban proposal be rejected, his delegation would have no objection to its own draft resolution being put forward by another delegation, if necessary.

MR. DAVIES (United Kingdom) said he realized that all delegations agreed, in principle, to the additional article proposed by the Cuban delegation; nevertheless, many of them did not want the affirmation of that right to be incorporated in the declaration of human rights. Such a step would be inopportune and dangerous; non-revolutionary democratic methods should be sufficient to do away with tyranny and oppression. The right to resist should manifest itself openly, only when the legal regime came to the point of collapsing, as had been the case with many countries after the Nazi invasion; at such time, resistance was not only a necessity, it was a duty. The aim which the Committee should pursue, however, was to attempt to make recourse to acts of resistance against oppression useless or impossible. Although the history of England showed that in certain circumstances the British people could resort to violence, they had long since returned to the democratic practices derived from very ancient traditions.

He was, therefore, strongly opposed to the Cuban proposal to incorporate in the international declaration of human rights the right to resist. In his opinion, it was not a right, but a last resource and what was to be aimed at above all was the establishment of a system, a rule of conduct, which would ensure the abolition of oppression and tyranny. Recognition of that right would entail the risk of inciting to anarchy. Moreover, how would it be possible to determine precisely where oppression and tyranny began? It would be very difficult to establish such a criterion. He wondered therefore whether the real significance of the adoption of the Cuban additional article was understood.

He agreed with the United States representative that the question was dealt with sufficiently in the third paragraph of the preamble.

Turning to the draft resolution which Argentina had decided to withdraw, he said that he doubted whether a more thorough examination of the question by the Commission on Human Rights would be of any use, since the purely theoretical work of that body would have no influence on the actual facts.

He concluded by stating that he would vote against the Argentine draft resolution if taken up by another delegation and against the additional article proposed by the Cuban delegation, because he considered it dangerous and inopportune.

MR. WATT (Australia) felt that in adopting the Cuban proposed additional article, there would be a danger of creating more difficulties than would be solved. The Australian delegation respected those countries whose constitutions included a clause of that nature. Such a provision, however, [752] could not be reconciled with, for instance, Australian legislation, which aimed above all at preventing individuals, or groups of individuals, from taking justice into their own hands. If one accepted the case of legitimate defence, the individuals in his country had always, whether by means of civil action or the application of the rule of habeas corpus, an established legal recourse against any arbitrary measure.

The legitimization of the right to resist tyranny and oppression would necessitate a clear definition of those two expressions. Such a definition would raise very great difficulties: where did oppression and tyranny begin? The explanations given by the French representative in the text he had proposed were judicious. The provisions of Australian legislation concerning the definition of seditious acts were, however, sufficient to show how difficult it would be to find a definition that would be applicable to all countries.

It would be dangerous to include in the declaration the additional article proposed by Cuba without the necessary guarantees that it would not be used to justify anti-constitutional intrigues within a country. In his opinion, it would be preferable to deal with that subject in the preamble from the point of view expressed in the third paragraph.

The Australian delegation was opposed to the adoption of the additional article proposed by the Cuban delegation.

MR. CARRERA ANDRADE (Ecuador) emphasized the fact that resistance to tyranny and oppression was not a right, but a duty and an honour for the citizen of a democratic country. The additional article proposed by the Cuban delegation would have its place, not in a declaration of rights, but in a declaration of the rights of man and of the citizen. Furthermore, it raised problems of a delicate nature: how could resistance to oppression be made legal when it was necessarily of an illegal character?

In the name of his delegation, he said he would sponsor the draft resolution which the Argentine delegation had first submitted and later withdrawn. He considered it to be the better solution.

COUNT CARTON DE WIART (Belgium) said that the right to resist oppression should be regarded as similar to the right to act in legitimate defence. It was a natural and sacred right which was exercised whenever the security of the individual was threatened. The practice of that right, many examples of which could be found in the history of Belgium, was anchored in the tradition of the Belgian people.

However, the incorporation of that right in the declaration would appear to be incomprehensible: who would decide what constituted an act of oppression or tyranny? The democratic system was based on a freely accepted discipline. It would be inopportune, in a declaration defining the rights of man, to stress the right to resist.

The Belgian delegation was therefore opposed to the adoption of the additional article proposed by Cuba. It did, however, fully support the principle contained in the third paragraph of the pre-[753]amble to the declaration. The Belgian delegation was also opposed to the Argentine draft resolution, taken up by the delegation of Ecuador, because it did not see the use of any further study of the question by the Commission on Human Rights.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) suggested that the third paragraph of the preamble should be discussed simultaneously with the proposal submitted by his delegation. If, during the discussion of that paragraph, the Committee agreed to give it greater clarity and precision by a direct reference, acceptable to all the delegations, to the right to resist oppression, the Cuban delegation would be satisfied and would withdraw its proposal.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that it would be preferable to complete discussion of additional articles before considering the preamble.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) said that, in order to prevent a question of such importance being set aside by the Committee, he would withdraw his amendment to the additional article submitted by Cuba, provided he would be able to submit a joint amendment by the delegations of Cuba and Chile to the third paragraph of the preamble to the declaration.

MR. CARRERA ANDRADE (Ecuador) also withdrew the draft resolution submitted by his delegation.

THE CHAIRMAN accepted the proposal of the Chilean representative.

Additional article proposed by the delegation of Egypt (A/C.3/264)

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the additional article proposed by Egypt with regard to the implementation of the declaration was the last one before the Committee, as the delegation of Lebanon had withdrawn its proposal (A/C.3/262).

MR. DAVIES (United Kingdom) considered that the Egyptian proposal might involuntarily create confusion between the significance of the declaration and of the covenant. The United Kingdom delegation was of the opinion that, although the declaration was of great significance, it was a statement of principles devoid of any obligatory character. It should, therefore, be followed by the preparation of a draft covenant providing for the implementation of the rights and freedoms laid down in the declaration, which would be binding as soon as it was signed by the States. Those documents together with the measures for implementation would form the complete text of the charter on human rights. The words "if necessary" contained in the additional article proposed by Egypt, were liable to give the impression that the declaration had an obligatory character or that the draft covenant was not necessary.

The United Kingdom delegation was therefore opposed to that proposal.

MR. AQUINO (Philippines) pointed out that, although the declaration was not legally binding, it imposed a moral obligation. If the Egyptian proposal were adopted, the moral force of that document would be made to depend on the measures for implementation and on the good-will of the States.

For that reason the Philippines delegation was opposed to that proposal.
[754]

MR. CASSIN (France) stressed the fact that it could be foreseen that a subsequent single instrument would not be adequate to establish sufficient and definite guarantees of the rights laid down in the declaration. A great number of conventions would be necessary. The Egyptian proposal had the disadvantage of being restrictive from that point of view.

The French delegation could therefore not accept it.

MR. SAINT-LOT (Haiti) considered that the Egyptian proposal raised an important problem. If the declaration was a legal document, it was difficult to argue that the rights enumerated therein had no positive sanction. That would reduce it to a mere enumeration of moral abstractions devoid of any legal value.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) thought that the terms of the Egyptian proposal were too vague for it to be adopted as an article in the declaration. It was a mere explanation of the implementation of the declaration and, in its present form, it could, in no circumstances, be incorporated into the declaration.

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) endorsed the remarks made by the United Kingdom representative. The complete text of the charter of human rights would have to comprise, apart from the declaration, a covenant and measures of implementation, and that article would be out of place in the declaration, which was only a statement of principles.

MR. CONTOUMAS (Greece) pointed out that the declaration was to some extent binding, on account of its moral force. If the article proposed by Egypt were adopted, that significance of the declaration would be disregarded, and its implementation would be delayed until the adoption of a subsequent instrument.

He was, therefore, opposed to the Egyptian proposal.

THE CHAIRMAN put the additional article proposed by Egypt (A/C.3/264) to the vote.

That article was rejected by 30 votes to 1, with 6 abstentions.

Preamble

THE CHAIRMAN noted that the amendments to the preamble of the declaration of human rights were recapitulated in document A/C.3/314/Rev.1.

Since three of those amendments concerned the preamble as a whole and aimed at substituting another text in place of that submitted by the Commission on Human Rights, he opened the discussion on the preamble as a whole.

He proposed that statements of speakers submitting amendments should be limited to ten minutes though enabling them to speak again for another ten minutes in a second statement and five minutes in subsequent ones.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that speakers who had not submitted amendments would conform [755] with the decision previously taken by the Committee on the procedure to be followed during the debate on the Declaration of Human Rights. Their first statement would be limited to ten minutes, all subsequent ones to five minutes.

MR. BEAUFORT (Netherlands) submitted his delegation's amendment (A/C.3/219). He recalled the substance of the amendment submitted (92nd meeting) by the Brazilian representative (A/C.3/215). The latter had withdrawn his amendment (99th meeting) during the examination of the articles of the declaration, although reserving the right to return to the question when the amendment proposed by the Netherlands to the preamble was discussed.

The Netherlands amendment affirmed the relation existing between the Creator and man, stated the latter's origin and referred to his destiny.

It had been said that amendments of that kind could not be accepted by members who were agnostics. It would most certainly be a crime to impose ideas, since all convictions should be respected. Those, however, who wished to see their convictions respected, should also respect those of others. For those who were agnostics or atheists, the Netherlands amendment was merely devoid of any meaning, but it could not harm them or offend their conscience, since they adhered to the formula ignoramus et ignorabimus. On the other hand, if the amendment were adopted, it would give satisfaction to the majority of the world's population, which, generally speaking, still believed in the existence of a Supreme Being. The amendment proposed by the Netherlands expressed the conviction of that majority which had already keenly felt the absence of such a statement in the Charter. By incorporating the Netherlands amendment in the Declaration of Human Rights, they would be given satisfaction and a serious gap would be filled.

The Chinese representative had recently said that if the proposed provision were given a meaning in conformity with the ideas of the eighteenth century, it might be acceptable to the Committee. The Netherlands representative did not endorse that argument, since the philosophy of the eighteenth century had a one-sided and incomplete idea of man. The Chinese representative had also said that the declaration of human rights should be human. If it was to be really so, the whole nature of man should be described, and that could only be done by giving that nature a comprehensive definition. The fundamental relations existing between man and his Creator should likewise be recognized.

It had been said that the declaration of human rights should not contain statements of a metaphysical nature. It would be an illusion to think it possible to draft a declaration of human rights without referring to metaphysical data. That declaration did, in fact, already state that all human beings were free and equal in dignity and rights; that dignity and those rights derived from the nature of man and since that dignity was inherent in man, by his very nature, one could not but ask what that nature was. Moreover, that definition was required for practical reasons, [756] because the rights of man had to be protected in countries where the omnipotence of the State had precedence over the rights of individuals.

In order to fulfil his destiny, man must comply with many obligations towards his Creator, his fellow human beings, society, the State and the community of nations. It was precisely in order or enable him to fulfil his obligations that man possessed inherent and inalienable rights.

In the majority of documents, it was unnecessary to mention the relation existing between man and his Creator, but in a declaration of human rights, dealing with the whole of humanity, in a document of world significance, which, it might be hoped, would serve as a model for centuries to come, belief in the Creator should be fully expressed.

MR. DE MARCHENA Y DUJARRIC (Dominican Republic) stated that his delegation had submitted its amendment (A/C.3/217 and A/C.3/217/Corr.I) in order to harmonize the terms of the preamble to the Declaration of Human Rights with those which were used in the Charter, so as to avoid any false interpretation. The equality of rights of men and women should be formally confirmed, as had been done in the Charter.

MR. WATT (Australia) stated that his amendments (A/C.3/257) were primarily drafting amendments.

He would speak first of all on the amendment relating to the fifth paragraph. The aim of that amendment was to harmonize the terms of the preamble with those of the Charter. The English text of the preamble said “to achieve. . . the promotion”; it would be preferable to use the expression found in Article 62 of the Charter, and to say simply “to promote. . .”.

With regard to the proposed amendment to the second paragraph, it aimed, on the one hand, at the deletion of any reference to the Second World War, since, as the French representative had pointed out, the declaration of human rights ought to contain immutable principles. It was important not to give the impression that it was prompted by the particular ideas of one epoch. On the other hand, the amendment to the second paragraph aimed at stressing the fact that the fundamental freedoms should be recognized and guaranteed. The Australian representative considered that it was very important to state that the rights and freedoms of man should be guaranteed.

MR. DAVIES (United Kingdom) explained that he had submitted his amendment (A/C.3/253) because, in English, the term “regime of law” suggested the idea of laws as a whole. It should be made quite clear that it was not only a question of applying the laws in force which were easily promulgated and repealed, because that was likely to give a somewhat precarious guarantee of the enjoyment of rights and freedoms; that enjoyment should, above all, be in conformity with the sources of law and that was expressed more clearly in English by the term “rule of law”. It was well known in the United Kingdom that laws were made only because men had to live side by side, but by using the term “rule of law” it would [757] be shown more clearly that every action had to be justified and that every individual could be called upon to answer for his actions. That was of primary importance.

Summary Record of the Hundred and Sixty-Fifth Meeting
[of the Third Committee]

Held at the Palais de Chaillot, Paris, on Tuesday,
30 November 1948, at 10 a.m.

Chairman: MR. CHARLES MALIK (Lebanon).

Preamble (continued)

MR. CARRERA ANDRADE (Ecuador) was surprised that at previous meetings certain delegations had voted against the inclusion of the right of petition. That right was as old as human law and had existed before democracy itself. The declaration, however, was extremely useful and would improve world conditions because a close link existed between international and constitutional law.

The basic text of the preamble contained three main theoretical principles, the mention of a common standard of achievement and a pledge undertaken by the United Nations to secure universal and effective recognition and observance of the rights and freedoms enunciated in the declaration.

His delegation was fully in accord with those general principles but believed that that document should be presented in a way which would ensure the greatest possible attraction to the people for whom it was designed. He thought it would be undesirable to include matter which referred to conflict rather than facts of common assent. Thus the allusion to the Second World War should be deleted.

The USSR amendment could not be accepted because it enumerated rights already incorporated in the body of the declaration. Other amendments might be accepted provided the Committee did not feel that they would weaken the preamble by the introduction of controversial matter.

The Ecuadorean amendment attempted to place the recitals in their logical order, narrowing from a general statement to the particular. A statement of methods of implementation should not close the recitals, because that might tend to interfere with the sovereignty of States and would in any case be more appropriate in the covenant.

The methods for securing recognition and observance of rights set out in the basic text was restrictive; teaching, education and progressive measures might not exhaust all possibilities. Such measures should be embodied in the covenant, not in the declaration.

MRS. NEWLANDS (New Zealand) agreed that the declaration, as distinct from the covenant, [758] should be a general statement of principles in simple, brief and unambiguous language. That had been achieved, with few exceptions, in the drafting of the articles; the text of the preamble, however, had none of those qualities and was perhaps the weakest part of the text. The preamble clearly showed its origin as an amalgamation rather than a synthesis of a number of drafts. Her delegation had submitted a redraft (A/C.3/267) which made no alteration of substance.

The New Zealand amendment proposed that the first three paragraphs of the present text should be deleted as they did not contain anything essential to an international declaration of fundamental rights and freedoms. The third recital, moreover, might be interpreted incorrectly as suggesting that the declaration constituted the basis for a regime of law protecting human rights.

She believed that it was not necessary to retain more than the first phrase of the fourth recital of the basic text, which appeared to be an amalgamation of different unconnected sections of the Charter. The omission of a reference to the equal rights of men and women which immediately followed the reference in the Charter to the dignity and worth of the human person might be wrongly interpreted. Moreover, the words “to promote social progress and better standards of life in larger freedom” appeared to have been removed from their context in the Charter and were irrelevant in the fourth clause of the preamble.

With regard to the fifth paragraph of the recital, its basis – a condensation of Article 56 of the Charter – omitted the reference to separate action, although the implementation of human rights was essentially a matter for action by Governments. Such an omission might seem to pervert the interpretation of the Charter.

The New Zealand amendment shortened the proclamation paragraph by transferring it to the last recital. That, moreover, gave emphasis to the idea of progressive achievement of the standard set by the declaration. A preamble shortened in the way proposed in the New Zealand amendment would be more consistent with the general form and character which the Committee desired to give to the declaration.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that he attached great importance to the form of the preamble. It could be likened to a passport which would introduce the declaration to all peoples regardless of the jurisdiction under which they lived. That was why the USSR amendment (E/800, page 31) opened with a reference to the Charter. He believed that the reference in the first paragraph of the USSR amendment to the avoidance of discrimination was also extremely important.

The representative of the Netherlands had proposed the insertion of an assertion of man's divine origin (A/C.3/219). He would remind that representative that the dispute on the divine origin of man had been fought out in Paris as [759] long ago as 1789, when the Declaration of the Rights of Man and of the Citizen had included no reference to divine origin. The statement made then had been progressive, and the discussion should not revert to a still earlier period. The representative of the United Kingdom had advocated a return to the principles of the thirteenth century in declaring that those principles had been the only way of saving his country from totalitarianism after the revolution of the seventeenth century.

The representative of Ecuador, in opposing the USSR amendment, had said that it was undesirable to include a mention of social progress and improvement of living conditions in the preamble. Such matters, however, were the very essence, not only of the declaration, but of the thinking of the twentieth century; it was to that century that the declaration should essentially refer.

The second paragraph of the USSR amendment mentioned improved living conditions precisely because the declaration should have a practical and direct effect upon legislation, which should influence the peoples in their systems of upbringing and education. Those systems, moreover, should not be confined to metropolitan countries but should be extended to the Trust and other Non-Self-Governing Territories so that the development of backward groups might be so expedited as to enable them to reach the level of those countries which had already progressed. The declaration, therefore, should be conceived in terms of the widest possible scope and should thus become an instrument for promoting progress.

Work on the declaration had been strenuous and long drawn out; it would be justified only if the result were likely to promote progress, to be effective in improving living conditions and in promoting peace and the development of friendly relations between nations.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) explained that he had withdrawn his proposal of a separate article in order to give it the form of an amendment to the preamble; in his view it would be more effective in that form. He welcomed the support of the representative of Chile, who had associated himself with him in presenting that amendment (A/C.3/314/Rev.1/Add.1).

The word "mankind" in the basic text was too abstract; rebellion could be carried out only by individuals and peoples, thus those words, "individuals and peoples", should be substituted for the abstract term "mankind". His amendment further proposed that the place of the words “as a last resort” should be altered to reflect the meaning that rebellion would be possible only when all other methods had been exhausted. It also emphasized that rebellion, when undertaken as a last resort, was a legitimate right. That view had already been defended in the course of the debate. It corresponded to the circumstances of the present time and bore no reference to the events of past centuries. There should be no need to defend the view that a resistance movement was by no means out of date, particularly in France.

MR. CASSIN (France) welcomed the intention of all the amendments to improve the presentation of the declaration to the peoples; such presentation was of paramount importance. The [760] word “universal” in the title should replace the word “international” in order to give that emphasis. The fact that the Committee had adopted the Haitian resolution (A/C.3/373), which specifically mentioned the universal character of the declaration, constituted a strong argument in favour of the change.

The preamble should open with the words “We, the peoples of the United Nations” taken from the Charter and originally suggested by President Roosevelt. Other United Nations documents might take the form of proclamations of the General Assembly; but the declaration should follow the technique of the Charter.

With regard to amendment 2 submitted by his delegation (A/C.3/339), the representative of France explained that it was essential to have a preamble which recalled that ignorance of and contempt for human rights were one of the essential causes of human suffering and which specifically referred to the acts of barbarism which had outraged the conscience of mankind. When dealing with the body of the declaration, he had always advocated the removal of any controversial wording; but in the preamble it was absolutely essential to set down a protest against the horrors which had taken place before and during the Second World War out of which the United Nations had risen. Such a protest was the essential starting point for a declaration of human rights.

He would be prepared to accept the joint Cuban and Chilean amendment.

COUNT CARTON DE WIART (Belgium) suggested that one might question the need to have any preamble at all. It might be useless if it merely repeated what was contained in the body of the declaration. If it stated anything else, it might run the risk of being ignored.

He would, however, accept the decision of the Commission on Human Rights and the precedent of the Charter. He agreed with the representative of France that the preamble should derive from the Charter, should be general in scope, solemn in tone and as concise as possible. Some of the amendments submitted appeared likely to improve the basic text.

The Netherlands amendment (A/C.3/219) repeated an idea which had been raised by the representative of Brazil at the 92nd meeting. Count Carton de Wiart was personally inclined to favour that amendment because it provided the idea of the equality of man with perhaps the only possible ultimate argument and would thus strengthen the declaration. The representative of the USSR had argued that the French Declaration of the Rights of Man and of the Citizen had eliminated reference to the deity; but the American Declaration of Independence differed by the mention of the words "endowed by their Creator". Such an expression would reach an immense mass of people who would thereby consider that the declaration had been given solemnity. The proposal, however, raised a very delicate philo-[761]sophical problem; and in any case it would be inconceivable for the Committee to try to solve that question by a vote.

He fully supported the first amendment presented by the delegation of the Dominican Republic (A/C.3/217 and A/C.3/217/Corr.1). However, the real equality of rights as between men and women had been affirmed in the body of the declaration. He might question, therefore, whether to repeat it in the preamble might not be inappropriate.

He supported the first three paragraphs of the USSR amendment, but the wording of the fourth paragraph might give rise to ironical criticism when it stated that appropriate legislative and other measures should be adopted by Members of the United Nations at their discretion. With regard to the question of application, the basic text defined the scope better and in more general terms than did the USSR amendment.

With regard to the Australian amendment (A/C.3/257), the deletion of the mention of the Second World War was logical because quite as many barbarous acts had been committed in the First World War, so that there seemed to be no reason to speak of the former without mentioning the latter. In any case, it would be better to exclude controversial matter from the preamble. That argument also applied to the mention of Nazism and racialism proposed by the French amendment (A/C.3/339). It might also be asked why allusions to fascism and totalitarianism had been omitted.

He agreed with the French proposal, however, that the declaration should be entitled "universal" rather than "international".

MRS. KALINOWSKA (Poland) recalled that a number of pertinent amendments to various articles in the body of the declaration had been rejected on the grounds that the declaration should be clear and concise. That criterion had not, apparently, been applied to the draft preamble, which contained vague and rambling generalities. Moreover, its lengthy introduction led to a surprisingly weak operative clause. Was the work of two years by various bodies of the United Nations to result merely in urging individuals and organs of society to "strive by teaching and education to promote respect for" and to "secure . . . observance" of human rights and freedoms?

The preamble failed to make any mention of the most important subject of the development of friendly relations among nations, although Article 1, of paragraph 2 of the Charter did so; and of the principles of non-discrimination and of the equality of rights between men and women, although they were included both in the Charter and in the body of the declaration itself. The preamble in its present form was inadequate and unsatisfactory; it read more like a sermon than an introduction to so important a document as the declaration of human rights.

She wished to deal briefly with various amendments proposed to the preamble. The Netherlands amendment failed to take into account the fact that the declaration was a United Nations document which could not properly deal with metaphysical questions. The Netherlands representative's remark that his amendment could be discounted by non-believers (164th meeting) was not a valid argument; it would be most dangerous to apply that reasoning to any part of the declaration, since it could then be applied to any other part.

The text proposed by New Zealand was shorter than the original draft and included a mention of the principle of non-discrimination, but said nothing concerning the promotion of social progress and improvement of living conditions. The text proposed by Ecuador was too general.

The USSR text was the only one which covered the subject fully, since it mentioned the need of social progress and of the promotion of friendly relations between nations, the principle of non-discrimination and the fact that the provisions of the declaration extended to colonial populations. It was, moreover, the only text which recommended the declaration to Member States as a guide for their legislative measures and systems of education. It was both concise and effective, in contrast with the Commission's text, in which fine phrases were used to sugar-coat the bitter pill of substantive inadequacy.

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) called the Committee's attention to the fact that the preamble as drafted by the Commission on Human Rights represented a composite text reflecting the views of a number of Governments and that the Commission had devoted a great deal of thought to it. In the opinion of the United States delegation that text came as close as circumstances permitted to being generally acceptable and should therefore be retained without change.

She could not accept the USSR amendment because its total effect would be to weaken the preamble and to restrict the scope of application of the declaration. The basic text called upon "every individual and every organ of society" to implement the principles of the declaration, whereas under the USSR amendment the General Assembly would call upon Governments to implement it "at their discretion", a phrase which would seriously impair the moral forcefulness of the declaration as a whole. The fact that the declaration would not be legally binding upon Governments made it all the more necessary so to phrase the preamble that it would exercise upon them the greatest possible force of moral suasion. The reference to colonial populations was also to be found in the Commission's draft, where it was better worded than in the USSR text.

The United Kingdom amendment (A/C.3/253) represented a stylistic improvement and should therefore be adopted.

While she personally preferred the Australian redraft of the second paragraph, she realized that a number of delegations strongly favoured express mention of the Second World War and her delegation was prepared to support the original text.

The French proposal to begin the preamble with the words used in the Charter, "We, the peoples of the United Nations", was not acceptable. The declaration would be an act of the General Assembly; it would be misleading to give it the form of an international treaty.

The Ecuadorean amendment (A/C.3/351) contained several good phrases; yet on the whole it was less clear and less concise than the Commission's text.

It could not be said that the New Zealand amendment (A/C.3/267) lacked either clarity or precision; it did, however, omit certain points which the Commission had considered essential and achieved brevity at the expense of substance.

The concept introduced in the Cuban-Chilean amendment (A/C.3/314/Rev.1/Add.1) was adequately treated in the Commission's text. It would be unwise to legalize the right to rebellion, lest the formula should be invoked by subversive groups wishing to attack or undermine genuinely democratic Governments. Honest rebellion against tyranny was permitted by the declaration. Subversive action was quite a different matter and the United States delegation would oppose the inclusion in the declaration of any text sanctioning it.

She did not consider the Dominican Republic amendment (A/C.3/217 and A/C.3/217/Corr.1) necessary. The time had come to take for granted that such expressions as "everyone", "all persons" and "mankind" referred to both men and women.

The United States delegation attached particular importance to the operative part of the preamble, every word of which had been debated at considerable length and which, by describing the declaration as "a common standard of achievement for all peoples and all nations", accurately reflected the true character of that document. It was essential that the operative part should be maintained without amendment.

MR. WATT (Australia), speaking on a point of order, called attention to the fact that the last phrase of his amendment (A/C.3/257) to the fifth paragraph should read: ". . . universal respect and observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms".

MRS. MENON (India) said that her delegation would whole-heartedly support the amendment submitted by the Dominican Republic. She could not agree that the principle of the equality of rights between men and women would be weakened by repetition or that its general acceptance could be taken for granted. The United States representative had herself stated at a previous meeting that it was dangerous to use general terms since they might be misconstrued.

The Indian representative called attention to the fact that the fourth recital, which reproduced the language of the Preamble to the Charter, did not reproduce the phrase "the equal rights of men and women" contained in that passage of the Charter. Such an omission appeared strange in a text which was the result of long deliberations. All the objectives of the declaration should be set forth in the preamble in clear and unmistakable terms.

It was quite true that the principle of equal rights for men and women was recognized in the body of the declaration, and that it would be dealt with in the covenant. It should not be forgotten, however, that even explicit laws had been rendered inoperative by judicial interpretation; the fate of the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution was a striking example of that fact. The omission in the preamble of a statement to the effect that men and women were equal in rights could very easily be construed as permitting discriminatory measures by nations which did not believe in the equality of the sexes. Mrs. Menon consequently appealed to the Committee to adopt the amendment of the Dominican Republic.

She was prepared to support either the preamble as it stood or a compromise text acceptable to the Committee. She would, however, vote against the Netherlands amendment for reasons given on a previous occasion. India was a secular State, in which numerous creeds, ranging from animism to atheism, were practised. The declaration, which was to be universally applicable, could not make a dogmatic statement on that point. Mrs. Menon hoped that the Netherlands representative would withdraw his amendment.

She remarked that the reference to colonial populations contained in the last paragraph of the USSR amendment might no longer be needed, since the Committee had adopted a separate article dealing with that subject. The Australian redraft of the fifth recital appeared preferable to the original text. The New Zealand amendment had the advantage of brevity. It sacrificed, however, some of the ideas contained in the original text, such as the implied right of rebellion against tyranny and the reasons for the promulgation of the declaration by the General Assembly.

She was consequently unable to support it, but would, on the other hand, support the Cuban-Chilean amendment, which would give explicit recognition to the right of rebellion.

MR. KAMINSKY (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) observed that his delegation was not satisfied with the preamble as drafted by the Commission because, while it used solemn phraseology, it failed to state the objectives of the declaration clearly. Its operative part, when seen in connexion with the recital, appeared to state that the main purpose of the declaration was merely to teach men to respect human rights and freedoms. While there was a vague reference to progressive measures, it contained no recommendation that progressive laws should be passed to ensure a common standard of achievement. Not only did the preamble fail to make concrete proposals but, like the rest of the dec-[765]laration, it attempted to create an artificial cleavage between man and the society in which he lived by treating man as a sort of world citizen living outside time and space – not a creature of flesh and blood, although endowed with reason and conscience.

It was notable that the word “State” did not appear in the preamble at all, and that no mention was made of the duties either of the individual towards the State or of the State towards the individual. Yet the whole declaration was intended to protect the rights of individuals living in society and subject to the laws of different States; it could not, therefore, consider the individual save in relation to society and the State.

The second recital of the preamble might lead the reader to conclude that the barbarous acts committed before and during the Second World War were the only reasons for the statement of human rights and freedoms contained in the declaration. It would have been more correct to indicate that one of the dangers of oppression had been its use by fascists as a method of conquest, that millions of workers and inhabitants of colonies still lived under oppression and that a real threat of further oppression could be seen in the racial theories embraced by some countries, the reactionary, domestic and aggressive foreign policies of others and the continued existence of fascist regimes. It was most unfortunate that the preamble failed to mention either the possibility of a re-birth of fascism or the need to develop friendly relations between nations in the interests of safeguarding human rights.

The USSR amendment was short and concise; it provided concrete guarantees of the protection of human rights; it proclaimed the principle of non-discrimination; it spoke of social progress, the improvement of living conditions and the development of friendly relations between nations. It would ensure the necessary conditions for the preservation of the dignity and worth of the human person and would oppose the spread of fascism. Moreover, its final paragraph contained clear and concrete provisions for the practical implementation of the principles contained in the declaration. For all those reasons, the delegation of the Byelorussian SSR would support the USSR amendment.

Mr. Kaminsky did not consider the Egyptian (A/C.3/264) and Netherlands amendments acceptable because neither could be proved scientifically. Both attempted to justify existing inequalities by metaphysical statements. The Netherlands amendment, in particular, should be rejected by the Committee, because it was contrary to the constitutions of a number of countries which proclaimed the separation of Church and State and granted freedom of religion and conscience to their citizens. The Netherlands text would be inappropriate in any document of the United Nations, which was a secular organization.

MR. DE ATHAYDE (Brazil) pointed out that it was the possession of certain special qualities [766] which differentiated man from animals. His intelligence, for example, enabled him to progress and to contribute to the wellbeing of the community in which he lived.

The only criticism that could be offered concerning the draft declaration prepared by the Commission was that it remained too limited in time and space. The origin of the concept of rights and freedoms was to be found in the conscience of society itself. More than that, from time immemorial, man had been attempting to set out his thoughts, and that effort would not have been made had he not been of divine origin. The reference to the dignity and worth of the human person, to the barbarous acts committed before and during the Second World War and to tyranny and oppression was the result of centuries of experience. The rights set forth in the declaration existed because of an abstract force and not as a result of any materialistic concept.

The Brazilian delegation had submitted an amendment (92nd meeting) to article 1 with a view to satisfying the religious feelings of the masses. The amendment had been withdrawn (99th meeting), it was true, but it had received warm support in all parts of the world. It should have been adopted by the Committee, for it would have considerably strengthened the declaration. As the document then read, it would be unacceptable to a great part of the peoples of the world. The Netherlands amendment would have the effect of relating the declaration to the human conscience and because that was the element which bound people together the declaration would, thus, become more understandable to the individuals for whom it was intended.

MR. AQUINO (Philippines) supported the amendment put forward by the United Kingdom delegation. As a result of the regime of law, established by Hitler and his satellites, the expression had come to have an obnoxious meaning. He agreed with the French representative that it was necessary to include a reference to the Second World War. Mankind had to be reminded of the fact that a few men, through the use of force, had attempted to eliminate the fundamental freedoms. It also had to be reminded of the fact that freedom could not be taken for granted.

The French amendment, however, made no mention of fascism. The doctrine was still as repugnant as it had ever been and was the basic cause of the militarism which had attempted to destroy the whole of Europe and parts of the Orient. In certain parts of the world, fascists were still on the alert, awaiting an opportunity to seize control.

For that reason, fascism had to be mentioned equally with Nazism and racism, as one of the essential causes of human suffering.

In his opinion, the principle of the USSR amendment, that Member States should promote international understanding through legislation and education, was already covered in the final paragraph of the present text of the preamble. The reference to the populations of Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories was not necessary in the preamble as it had already been more effectively incorporated in the body of the declaration.

[767]

The South African amendment (A/C.3/226) had fortunately been withdrawn; fortunately, because its motive was so obviously questionable. The French proposal to substitute the word “universal” for “international” was unrealistic. The declaration strove for universality but, at best, could be regarded as having an international character. The amendment put forward by the Cuban and Chilean delegations was already covered by the third paragraph of the basic text of the preamble.

MR. CARRERA ANDRADE (Ecuador) recognized that some aspects of the basic text of the preamble were satisfactory, but disagreed with the order of the ideas contained therein. It should begin, for example, with a reference to the purpose of the United Nations in drafting such a declaration.

The reference to education in the USSR amendment seemed to him rather conservative and tended to weaken the declaration, as many years would be needed for the purpose of educating people to the provisions of the declaration. Furthermore, it was inappropriate to include in the preamble a recommendation concerning the implementation measures to be put into effect by the various individual States.

He sympathized with the motives of the French delegation, but could not support the proposal for the insertion of the words “Nazism and racialism”. It would have the effect of dating a document which, like the Magna Charta and the American and French bills of rights, was intended for all times. The American Bill of Rights, for example, did not contain a single word of reproach, even though it had been drafted at the end of a bitter struggle for independence. Moreover, there was no danger that the barbarities of the Second World War would be forgotten.

The New Zealand amendment contained no new idea and was merely an inadequate synopsis of the basic text. He would support the inclusion of the proposal from the representative of the Dominican Republic. His objections to the Netherlands amendment had been made clear (96th meeting) in the discussion on article 1.

The United States representative had stated that the Ecuadorean amendment was too diffuse, but, in his opinion, it was clearer and more orderly and, therefore, an improvement on the original text.

MR. GRUMBACH (France) recalled the remarks he had made in regard to the Brazilian amendment to article 1. The Netherlands amendment was unacceptable, because it dealt with a matter which had divided men for centuries, and, as the Belgian representative had pointed out, it would be wrong to take a decision by a majority or minority vote on the insertion of a reference to man's origin.

In the past, believers and unbelievers had behaved intolerantly and often cruelly towards each other; neither had been more tolerant in their [768] attitudes. There still would be no point in voting on the Netherlands amendment, however, as agreement was impossible. It was necessary for the declaration to be acceptable to as many Governments as possible so that there might be the most favourable circumstances for its implementation.

For that reason he requested the Netherlands representative to withdraw his amendment.

MR. RADEVANOVIC (Yugoslavia) felt that the preamble stated too many facts, ideas and motives for it to be generally acceptable. The USSR amendment, on the other hand, set forth general principles and objectives and, like the New Zealand amendment, was a concise and clear text.

The former was preferable because it contained the major ideas of the declaration. It referred to the Charter, namely, to the basic law of the United Nations. It emphasized the interdependence of the legal aspect of man and his social progress. Finally, and most important of all, it referred to the promotion of the development of friendly relations between nations.

MR. DEMCHENKO (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) felt that the USSR text was the clearest, briefest and most acceptable. All the necessary ideas were included in it, such as the manner in which the declaration should be implemented, the question of social progress and the promotion of international understanding. He could not agree with the Belgian, United Kingdom and United States representatives that the reference to the declaration having to be used at the discretion of Member States was a restriction on the scope of the document.

The Netherlands amendment was unacceptable because it raised a philosophical and often disputed question. It violated the right to freedom of conscience and did not take into consideration the fact that in many countries the State was separated from the church. Should that amendment be accepted, he would be unable to vote for the declaration as a whole.

The New Zealand amendment was simply a repetition of certain of the articles in the declaration. Like the last part of the Ecuadorean proposal, it referred to the declaration as a common standard or ideal to be achieved by Member States. He was unable to accept that point of view as certain countries, such as the USSR, had already gone very far towards the achievement of fundamental human rights. Such a provision would, therefore, be restrictive in character.

He would support the amendment put forward by the representative of the Dominican Republic, for the reasons given by the Indian and other representatives. The Cuban and Chilean amendment was very important and should be incorporated in the declaration. It was impossible to speak of human rights without also referring to the right to rebel against tyranny and oppression. It had been suggested that the right to rebel could be abused. In his opinion, such fears were unjustified, on the grounds that where no tyranny [769] or oppression existed, there was no danger of incitement to revolt. The right was an important one because of the existence of fascist countries such as Franco Spain.

MR. CARRERA ANDRADE (Ecuador) drew attention to the fact that in the French text of the corrigendum to his amendment (A/C.3/351/Corr.1) the words l'idéal commun should be changed to read la norme commune.

Summary Record of the Hundred and Sixty-Sixth Meeting
[of the Third Committee]

Held at the Palais de Chaillot, Paris, on Tuesday,
30 November 1948, at 3 p.m.

Chairman: MR. CHARLES MALIK (Lebanon).

MR. WATT (Australia) began by discussing the amendments proposed as a new text for the preamble. Of those, the USSR amendment (E/800, page 31) would be acceptable at any rate in so far as the first two paragraphs were concerned. He was, however, somewhat apprehensive of the last paragraph, for it expressed a tendency which had recently appeared in the Committee to endow the declaration with a legally binding character, while the legal obligation of States to implement the declaration must be the object of a subsequent covenant. If such a character were given to the declaration, many delegations would find it impossible to sign it, and its scope would thereby be limited.

The New Zealand amendment (A/C.3/267) was praiseworthy for its brevity, but it did perhaps carry that virtue too far, for it did not take into account certain important principles. If the delegations which had stated those ideas considered that they should be contained in the declaration, they could not be better placed than in the preamble.

A noble and lofty style, such as that of the Ecuadorean amendment (A/C.3/351 and A/C.3/351/Corr.1), should be adopted in a preamble of such importance. However, the third and fifth recitals of the preamble were couched in terms which ought to be more explicit.

Passing to the amendments merely contemplating the modification of the text of the Commission on Human Rights, he stated that his delegation would be prepared to accept the Netherlands amendment (A/C.3/219). However, the opinion of delegations which were opposed to its adoption should be taken note of. Similarly, while he considered that the Dominican Republic amendment (A/C.3/217, A/C.3/217/Corr.1) was superfluous, he would conform to the general opinion, if a majority decided in its favour.

The joint amendment submitted by Cuba and Chile (A/C.3/314/Rev.1/Add.1) was prompted [770] by a most laudable principle, but since the text of the preamble contained the essentials of that amendment, he hoped that the delegations of Cuba and Chile would not insist on maintaining it.

In conclusion he said that his delegation would reserve its opinion concerning the amendment it had submitted (A/C.3/257), which was, however, only of a drafting character; it would decide whether to retain it or withdraw it in the light of the forthcoming debate.

MR. CASSIN (France) pointed out that all the new texts proposed as substitutions to the text submitted by the Commission on Human Rights had a great advantage over the latter in that they were brief. In that respect, the USSR amendment would be particularly apt, except for its last paragraph, which the French delegation could not accept, as it largely overstepped the bonds determined by the Charter with regard to the competence of the States and the United Nations; the text prepared by the Commission on Human Rights was therefore the better one. That text was also better than the one contained in the New Zealand amendment, the operative part of which did not contain any definite programme and gave no prospect that States would be called upon to take measures to harmonize their respective legislation with the principles laid down in the declaration.

The Ecuadorean amendment was drafted in noble terms. He considered that some of its paragraphs should serve as a model for the corresponding paragraphs of the final text.

Finally, he thought that the three texts submitted as substitutions would be perfectly acceptable if the fourth paragraph of the Commission's text did not already contain a reference to social progress and to living standards and moreover recalled very aptly certain provisions of the Charter. He therefore considered it unnecessary to modify that part of the text proposed by the Commission on Human Rights.

As regards the amendments proposing changes of detail, the French delegation could not lend its support to the Egyptian amendment to the fifth paragraph (A/C.3/264) and thought that the term favoriser was too weak, especially since all the States which had signed the Charter had pledged themselves, in so doing, to certain obligations. He preferred the word assurer, which was clearer and more forceful. The French delegation could not accept the Australian amendment either, at any rate in its present form; yet that amendment had been prompted by the laudable desire to simplify the preamble and ought to be given special attention.

The United Kingdom amendment (A/C.3/253) proposed the substitution of the expression "regime of law" by the term "rule of law". He perfectly understood the desire for precision which had motivated that amendment. If the English text was thus modified, the French text should also be amended by substituting the term régime de droit, which was closer to the English term "rule of law".

As regards the joint amendment of Cuba and Chile, he considered that its wording was too [771] strong. However, as those used in the text of the Commission on Human Rights might be found too weak, he proposed a compromise consisting of replacing the words en dernier ressort by the expression recours suprême.

In conclusion, he pointed out that, except for certain justified criticisms, the preamble as a whole as worded by the Commission on Human Rights was satisfactory. It had the advantage of being set out logically, since it began with a reference to history and ended with a reference to the Charter. The French delegation would therefore be able to accept only slight modifications.

MISS BERNARDINO (Dominican Republic) thanked the delegations which had supported the amendment submitted by the Dominican Republic, proposing that an explicit mention should be made of the equality between the rights of men and women in the preamble of the declaration. Certain delegations had decided in favour of the principle contained in that amendment, although they considered that it was out of place in the preamble. They had shown the same attitude at San Francisco during the drafting of the Charter of the United Nations. She thought that attitude was the result of an unwillingness to grant women the same rights as those of men.

The delegation of the Dominican Republic was so persistent in its amendment because it was aware that in certain countries the term "everyone" did not necessarily mean every individual, regardless of sex. Certain countries did in fact recognize certain rights for “everyone”, but experience had shown that women did not enjoy them, as, for instance, voting rights. She thought it was necessary to state that principle explicitly, in order to pay tribute to the part which women had played in the cultural development of the world and to the heroism that they had shown during the war.

She appealed to all the delegations to adopt the amendment submitted by the Dominican Republic unanimously.

MR. CHANG (China) wished to make certain remarks concerning the amendments proposed to the first recital of the preamble. He recalled that he had had the honour of taking part in the work of the Commission on Human Rights and that the members of the Commission had then considered that first recital too long. The Netherlands amendment would make the text even more lengthy and more complex.

Moreover, if the idea of the divine origin of man were to be embodied in the declaration, it should be done in a separate paragraph so as to stress its importance; but as certain delegations had pointed out, it was impossible to decide so important a problem by a vote which would only reflect political factors; for the consideration of such a question the number of votes for each country should be proportional to the size of its population.

For all those reasons, he hoped that the Netherlands delegation would withdraw its amendment.

MR. DAVIES (United Kingdom) stated first of all that he was happy to note that his delegation’s amendment had received the approval of a number of delegations.

The Netherlands amendment contained a very important principle which he wished to see included in the declaration. Nevertheless, he pointed out that the Committee had already decided not to include the concept of God in the declaration, since it was aware of the fact that such a concept might rouse the opposition of delegations representing more than half of the world’s population. If the declaration was to have a universal character the views of those delegations should be respected.

As regards the amendment of the Dominican Republic, he thought that since the principle which had prompted it was already contained in article 1 of the declaration, that amendment was superfluous. The same was true of the Egyptian amendment.

The USSR amendment had the great advantage of being shorter than the text submitted by the Commission. Nevertheless, he considered that it was not desirable to leave the implementation of the declaration of human rights to the discretion of the States concerned; for that reason the United Kingdom delegation felt itself obliged to vote against that amendment.

The amendment submitted by Australia to the second paragraph (A/C.3/257) was both brief and general. If the Australian delegation retained it, he would vote for it. He did, however, prefer the text of the Commission to the second amendment of Australia concerning the fifth paragraph of the preamble.

The United Kingdom delegation would be glad to accept the New Zealand amendment, which was briefer and the style of which was more lofty than that of the Commission's text, but, on the one hand, that amendment was prompted by a philosophical concept which all the delegations would not perhaps be able to endorse and, on the other hand, its enacting part did not appear sufficiently extensive and definite. The text of the Commission was therefore the better one.

In the same way, the United Kingdom delegation would not be able to vote for the French amendment to the second paragraph (A/C.3/339), which seemed to confuse somewhat the distinct character of the declaration, which should confine itself to proclaiming fundamental human rights, with the character of the covenant, which should show the measures to be taken to implement the declaration. Moreover, a statement to the effect that ignorance of human rights was the essential cause of the world's sufferings would appear to provide an excuse for the atrocities committed by the Nazis.

The amendment of Ecuador had been inspired by very noble principles, but its vagueness made it unacceptable. Nor could the United Kingdom delegation support the joint amendment of Cuba and Chile, which might be construed as an invitation to revolt, since it stressed the right to rebel.

[773]

In conclusion, the United Kingdom representative stated that his delegation would vote for the draft preamble as proposed by the Commission on Human Rights as amended by the United Kingdom and Australian proposals.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) thought that, in view of the urgent need to conclude the work, it would be advisable to speed up the Committee's decisions. He therefore proposed the closure of the debate.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) opposed the motion for closure of the debate. Some delegations, his own for instance, had had no chance to speak; he was sure that, had the Cuban delegation been aware of that fact, it would not have submitted such a proposal.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) endorsed the opinion of the Chilean representative, and added that while some delegations had had no opportunity to speak, others had only been able to submit their own amendments, without making any observations on the amendments of other delegations. It was therefore not advisable to close the debate.

THE CHAIRMAN put the motion for closure of the debate to the vote.

The motion was rejected by 20 votes to 12, with 8 abstentions.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) regretted that a technical hitch had prevented the members of the Committee from hearing his second statement, during which, in view of the remarks of the representative of Chile, he had withdrawn the motion for closure of the debate.

MR. ANZE MATIENZO (Bolivia) gave general approval to the terms of the preamble drafted by the Commission on Human Rights, although he would have preferred a simpler style. In order to improve the original text, the Third Committee might take as a model certain amendments, in particular that of Ecuador, the style of which was remarkably clear.

The Bolivian delegation took up the cause of the Netherlands amendment, believing that it was fitting to mention Providence in a document in which man affirmed his rights, which might otherwise appear to be a manifestation of pride.

At the same time, the Bolivian representative endorsed the amendment of the Dominican Republic, paying tribute to the representative of that country for her admirable efforts in support of women's rights.

In connexion with the joint amendment of Cuba and Chile, he referred to the struggles of his nation and other countries on the American continent for the conquest of freedom, and stated that those countries were fundamentally opposed to all forms of tyranny. He deplored the tendency of young peoples to be swept away by the spirit of revolt, to the detriment of political stability, and feared that a solemn affirmation of the right [774] to rebel might encourage anarchistic tendencies. He believed that that matter should be handled with the greatest prudence.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) thought that the draft preamble proposed by the Commission on Human Rights was on the whole satisfactory and in keeping with the contents of the declaration. Most of the amendments would involve complete redrafting of the original text.

Among the drafts submitted as substitutions, he pointed out that that of Ecuador did not mention economic and social rights, which, on the other hand, were included in the USSR amendment. It might be a good plan for the Committee to draw upon the latter amendment to improve the text of the preamble.

The Chilean representative, having endorsed the amendment of the Dominican Republic, stressed the difficulty of adopting the Netherlands proposal, which touched upon the divine origin of man. He recalled that Chile, where the bulk of the nation was sincerely Catholic, had no mention of Providence in its Constitution, out of respect for the convictions of an important minority. For similar reasons, Chile would not support the Netherlands amendment.

In reply to objections raised to the joint Chilean and Cuban amendment, he declared that the adoption of that draft would not encourage subversive movements against legitimately established order. The idea of national sovereignty was explicitly safeguarded by article 20 of the declaration, and articles 27 and 28 had been drawn up for the defence of public order in a democratic society. There was nothing in the amendment in question to encourage rebellion against a really democratic regime based upon universal suffrage and respect of human rights. It was concerned only with the right to rise up against a system of tyranny or oppression; such a right was legitimate and sacred.

Opposition to the adoption of that amendment would be tantamount to implicit legalization of acts of tyranny and oppression; its adoption, on the other hand, would give hope to millions of human beings who were suffering under oppression.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) stated that the Netherlands amendment was unacceptable to certain delegations, not only from the philosophical point of view, but also as being incompatible with the constitutions of some countries which had proclaimed the separation of the Church and State.

The representative of the USSR supported the amendment of the Dominican Republic. He also stated that he had no objection to the alterations in the text proposed by the representative of the United Kingdom.

The USSR delegation could not accept the addition proposed by the Egyptian amendment (A/C.3/264), because it did not recognize the principle that a man possessed individual rights, independently of his status as a citizen of a given [775] State. He raised no objection, however, to the other Egyptian amendment regarding the French text of the fifth paragraph.

As the Australian delegation had declared that its amendment implied no change of substance, the USSR representative saw no reason for adopting it.

The New Zealand amendment was no improvement on the text of the Commission on Human Rights, except that it was shorter. Furthermore, the final sentence of that amendment, stating that the declaration represented "a common standard for achievement by all peoples and nations", appeared to him to be an exaggeration.

The French amendment concerning the title of the preamble (A/C.3/339), stressing the universal character of the declaration, tended to make it binding upon all countries, whether they were Members of the United Nations or not. The USSR delegation could not accept that principle. On the other hand, the French amendment to the second paragraph contained ideas of which the USSR representative approved, but he did not like the way in which it was drafted, and did not consider the explanation given of the barbarous acts committed by the exponents of Nazism and racialism to be a valid one. The USSR delegation would support that part of the French amendment provided it was suitably reworded.

Referring to the amendment of Ecuador, he considered that it contained too much controversial matter: such as the idea that a juridical standard was the foundation of the existence of peoples, or the theory that disregard for human rights was the main cause of wars and revolutions, The USSR delegation did not consider the amendment acceptable from a sociological point of view.

In reply to objections raised by the representative of Bolivia to the joint Chilean-Cuban amendment, MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) affirmed that those objections were an expression of pessimistic philosophy. The contention of Cuba and Chile, on the contrary, was based on the conviction that all progress in the field of social justice was the outcome of struggle against oppression.

In order to obtain unanimous adoption of its proposal, the Cuban delegation would consent to the use of the expression "to resort to the extreme measure, which was revolt" proposed by the French delegation.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) stated that his delegation also accepted that amendment.

MR. CONTOUMAS (Greece) stressed the fact that, although the last paragraph of the text proposed by the Commission on Human Rights contained just ideas, it was in a way somewhat illogical. The French text also contained an unfortunate repetition (les nations devront s'efforcer. . . afin que tous les individus. . . s'efforcent). For those reasons, the Greek delegation proposed that the final paragraph should be redrafted (A/C.3/314/Rev.1/Add.2) and that the new text should address the need to achieve the aims of the declaration in the near future.

MR. CARRERA ANDRADE (Ecuador) pointed out that the French amendment to the second paragraph, which condemned Nazism and racialism, was silent on other equally criminal systems, such as Italian fascism and Japanese militarism. As any list of such systems might be incomplete, it would be preferable to abandon the idea of including one in the preamble.

Some of the expressions used in the Australian amendment could well be substituted for the corresponding words in the original text of the Commission.

He warmly supported the joint proposal of Cuba and Chile, which would arouse sympathetic feelings.

Replying to the objections regarding his delegation's draft he remarked that even if certain ideas contained in the two first paragraphs of the basic text were omitted, the preamble would not lose thereby. In answer to the representative of the United Kingdom, who had asked the meaning of the expression norme juridique, the representative of Ecuador explained that it meant the legal frame within which the life of a nation unfolded itself.

MR. BEAUFORT (Netherlands) wished to clear up certain misunderstandings in regard to his amendment. The representative of France had said that it was not necessary to take a decision on such a controversial question as the origin of man.

The Committee would not be called upon to vote upon that question, but upon the advisability of mentioning in the preamble the origin and destiny of man.

It was also incorrect to say that a decision had already been taken on the matter when the Brazilian amendment to Article 1 (A/C.3/215) had been considered; a number of representatives had expressed their views, but the Committee as a whole had been unable to give its opinion, since the Brazilian amendment had been withdrawn.

Moreover, the Netherlands representative did not share the opinion that controversial questions should be eliminated in order to attain unanimity. Was agreement really impossible between those who believed that human rights were inalienable and those who affirmed that man was only a means and that the State was an end in itself?

To all those who emphasized the diversity of the various conceptions and beliefs he replied that his amendment was so drawn up as to be accepted by the major portion of the population in every country, being compatible with all religions and even with the ideas of those who believed in the existence of a Supreme Being on strictly philosophical grounds. Bitter experience in the recent past had shown the danger of allowing the monstrous materialistic conception of man as a mere tool in the service of the State.

To the remark that some peoples preferred physics to metaphysics and desired to base human rights on a scientific foundation, he replied that science had to serve not only material, but also [777] spiritual, ends and purposes. If man forgot that important fact, he would be unable to remain the master of creation. Man was, in fact, destroying human and other life by the products of his own spirit while the progress of science could only bring benefit to all if its results were handled in the right spirit; the Netherlands delegation wished that spirit to be included in the declaration.

Nevertheless, in view of the fact that his amendment had not met with the approval of the majority of the members of the Committee, he would not press for a vote on it.

MR. THURROTT (Canada) stated that his delegation preferred the text of the preamble as drafted by the Commission on Human Rights and incorporating the alteration advocated by the United Kingdom. He also hoped that the Australian delegation would maintain its proposals with regard to the second and fifth recitals.

MR. CHANG (China) considered that the two first recitals in the text as submitted by the Commission on Human Rights should be retained. As for the third recital, it would be wise to accept the modification proposed by the United Kingdom delegation. On the other hand, he did not approve of the proposed additions to the fourth recital recapitulating ideas expressed in the Charter.

Although the declaration dealt with all the rights of man, it was not necessary to refer to all of them in the preamble.

MR. CASSIN (France) stated that his delegation withdrew his own amendment to the second recital and would submit a joint amendment with Australia. As for the third recital it would also submit a joint amendment with Cuba and Chile.

The fifth recital of the text, as drafted by the Commission on Human Rights, would be improved by aligning it with Article 55, paragraph c of the Charter, i.e., by adding at the end of the sentence the words “for all”.

MR. WATT (Australia) recalled that the purpose of the Australian amendment to the second recital was to delete all reference to the Second World War. Having consulted the representative of France, he would withdraw that amendment and replace it by an amendment jointly submitted by his delegation and that of France (A/C.3/383). It read as follows:

“Whereas disregard and contempt for human rights have resulted in barbarous acts which have outraged the conscience of mankind, and

“Whereas the advent of a world in which human beings shall enjoy freedom of speech and belief and freedom from fear and want has been proclaimed as the highest aspiration of the common people.”

MRS. MENON (India) expressed the opinion that the objection raised by the representative of China to the amendment submitted by the Dominican Republic (A/C.3/217 and A/C.3/217[778]Corr.1) was unfounded. It was quite normal to quote the whole of the second paragraph of the preamble of the Charter in the fourth recital, and not to cut it, as had been done in the text submitted by the Commission on Human Rights.

She earnestly appealed to members of the Third Committee to affirm in the declaration the principle of equal rights for men and women.

MRS. NEWLANDS (New Zealand) regretted that the majority of members of the Committee did not consider brevity to be essential in the preamble. In view of the criticisms that had been made, however, she would not press for a vote on her amendment.

The New Zealand delegation wished to express its sympathy for the Netherlands amendment to the first recital; it would have voted for it had it not been withdrawn by its author.

She shared the point of view of the representative of the Dominican Republic and of India with regard to the fourth recital. The principle of equal rights for men and women should be explicitly mentioned.

In the opinion of her delegation the draft preamble submitted by the USSR had the virtue of brevity. The second paragraph of that draft should be inserted in the text which would be adopted in due course by the Committee. It would be difficult however to accept the third paragraph because of the phrase: “to be used at their discretion”.

MR. SHAHI (Pakistan) recalled that the United Kingdom representative had stated that the term “rule of law” was preferable to the term “regime of law”, since it guaranteed that any government action which violated human rights would be subject to the jurisdiction of courts and thus provide a more effective guarantee against any such violation. The United Kingdom representative’s statement had not convinced the Pakistan delegation, who considered that the proposed term was inseparably linked to a doctrine special to Anglo-Saxon law. It could not be used in a document of so universal a character as the declaration of human rights. Moreover, there were certain human rights which could not be legally defined, such as the rights established by article 23 or article 25. Those rights could not be guaranteed by courts.

The Pakistan delegation was therefore of the opinion that the United Kingdom amendment was not appropriate to a declaration which was not a legal document but which simply enunciated general principles.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) stated that his delegation could not be indifferent to the amendment submitted by the Dominican Republic. Indeed, it was the Cuban delegation, together with the delegations of Brazil, Mexico and the Dominican Republic, which had caused the principle of equal rights for men and women to be enunciated in the Charter.

The Cuban delegation whole-heartedly supported the amendment of the Dominican Republic and hoped that the Third Committee would agree [779] to the necessity of inserting an explicit reference to the principle in the preamble of equal rights for men and women.

Establishment of a Sub-Committee to Examine the Draft International Declaration of Human Rights as a Whole

THE CHAIRMAN asked the Committee to take an immediate decision on the draft resolution which he had submitted (A/C.3/380) to set up a sub-committee to examine the declaration of human rights as a whole, only from the viewpoint of presentation, compatibility and uniformity.

He hoped that that draft would be adopted without a lengthy debate.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) supported without any reservation the draft resolution submitted by the Chairman. It met the wishes of all the members of the Committee and answered an obvious need.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) thought that the draft resolution was entirely in accordance with the procedure his delegation had proposed from the beginning of the examination of the declaration of human rights.

He would ask for clarification on the question whether the work of the Third Committee and of the sub-committee suggested by the Chairman would in due course be carried on simultaneously. There was the possibility that the Committee might hold three daily meetings in order to finish its agenda; the small delegations in particular would find it difficult to accept such a solution. If the sub-committee had to meet while the Third Committee continued its work, he would find it impossible to accept the nomination to serve on the sub-committee.

It would be appropriate for the sub-committee to take into account the Cuban proposal with regard to the final form of the declaration of human rights (A/C.3/218).

MR. WATT (Australia) had the same reservation to make as the representative of Cuba on the holding of simultaneous meetings of the Third Committee and the sub-committee.

THE CHAIRMAN stated that there was no question of holding three daily meetings regularly. He recalled, however, that the Committee had a very important task to fulfil before the end of the session of the General Assembly. The proposed sub-committee would have to accomplish the task entrusted to it in a very short time.

MR. LUNDE (Norway) supported the draft resolution submitted by the Chairman and believed that the sub-committee would perform a very useful task.

Attention must be drawn to the importance of the sub-committee's terms of reference; it would undoubtedly be desirable for it to have unofficial contacts with all the delegations which had submitted amendments to the text proposed by the Commission on Human Rights.

MR. DAVIES (United Kingdom) approved of the Chairman's draft resolution.
[780]

He pointed out, however, that the sub-committee's sole task would be to improve the text referred to it without making any substantive alterations and he therefore thought that it would be desirable to add after the word "uniformity" the words "and of style". He wondered if it would be necessary for the sub-committee to set up a language group; the task of that group could perfectly well be carried out by the technical services of the Secretariat.

MR. CASSIN (France) supported the addition of the words "and of style" proposed by the United Kingdom representative.

The second paragraph of the draft resolution might be so modified as to indicate merely that the sub-committee was entrusted with the task of checking and ensuring the concordance of texts. It would be for the sub-committee itself to decide whether it was absolutely necessary to set up a language group.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) considered that it was indispensable to set up a language group within the sub-committee. The responsibility of correlating the texts in the five official languages could not be left to the technical services of the Secretariat.

In view of the importance of the declaration of human rights the text must be established by representatives of the Member States with the assistance of qualified translators.

In his opinion the Committee should not continue to work while the sub-committee held its meetings and he thought it would be wise to suspend the Committee's meetings for a day or two.

MR. CHANG (China) shared the USSR representative's views on the adjournment of the Committee's work during the meetings of the sub-committee.

THE CHAIRMAN recalled that the Third Committee had a very heavy agenda and that it was consequently difficult to cancel several meetings. The Committee, however, was free to take a decision on that point.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) favoured the setting up of a language group. In order to work efficiently, the sub-committee must first draw up the text of the declaration in the two working languages and entrust to the language group the drafting of it in the three other official languages. That was the procedure which had been adopted when the Charter had been drafted at San Francisco.

It would be desirable for the Third Committee to hold only one meeting instead of the three meetings scheduled for 2 December.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) pointed out that in all probability the session of the General Assembly would soon be adjourned and resumed at Lake Success in the beginning of 1949. There was therefore not so much urgency for the Third Committee to finish its agenda and it would consequently be regrettable to sacrifice the efficiency of the work to considerations of speed.

On the other hand, he thought that the General Assembly might prolong for a day or two the work on which it was engaged, in order to study the declaration of human rights.

MR. COROMINAS (Argentina) supported without reservation the Chairman's draft resolution. The work of the sub-committee could be done in a matter of hours and he thought there was no need to cancel the meetings scheduled for 1 and 2 December.

THE CHAIRMAN requested the Committee to express its opinion first on the draft resolution (A/C.3/380) and then to decide whether the Third Committee should meet on 1 December.

The draft resolution was adopted unanimously.

By 21 votes to 8 with 7 abstentions, the Committee decided not to meet on 1 December.

The meeting rose at 6:45 p.m.

30 November 1948

Summary Record of the Hundred and Sixty-Seventh Meeting
[of the Third Committee]

Held at the Palais de Chaillot, Paris, on Tuesday,
30 November 1948, at 3 p.m.

Chairman: MR. CHARLES MALIK (Lebanon).

Preamble (continued)

THE CHAIRMAN said he was anxious that the text of the preamble to the draft declaration should be adopted during that meeting. He explained that since the other drafts had been successively withdrawn, the Committee had now before it only the amendment proposed by the USSR (E/800, page 31), the amendment proposed by Ecuador (A/C.3/351 and A/C.3/351/Corr.1), the joint amendment submitted by Cuba, Chile and France (A/C.3/382/Rev.1), and the joint amendment submitted by Australia and France (A/C.3/383).

THE CHAIRMAN said that he would put to the vote first the two texts to replace the whole of the preamble proposed by the Commission on Human Rights, namely the USSR amendment and then the Ecuadorian amendment.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics), requested that the vote be taken in parts.

The first paragraph was rejected by 14 votes to 11, with 8 abstentions.

The second paragraph was adopted by 13 votes to 11, with 10 abstentions.

The third paragraph was adopted by 15 votes to 11, with 9 abstentions.

The fourth paragraph was rejected by 24 votes to 8, with 3 abstentions.

[782]

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) commenting on the result of the vote, asked the USSR representative if he would consent to the second and third paragraphs of his amendment, which had just been adopted, being added to the preamble instead of being substituted for it.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) agreed to the two paragraphs in question being added to the preamble.

MR. DAVIES (United Kingdom) objected to that procedure, which he declared was unacceptable; the Committee had plainly voted on a new text to substitute for the other; there could thus be no question, at that juncture, of an addition to the preamble.

The USSR representative, moreover, had not made his intentions very clear; he should explain them again.

MR. CHANG (China) said he was very surprised at the change of position which had occurred during the voting. The Chairman should take a vote on whether the two paragraphs which had been adopted should be submitted for the whole of the preamble or not, because a decision to add them to the preamble would create an entirely new situation.

MR. KAMINSKY (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) said that the USSR representative was perfectly entitled to ask that the two paragraphs which had just been adopted be added to the preamble.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) pointed out that there had been instances of similar changes of position in the past. The USSR representative should, in his opinion, be able to present his amendment as he wished. If the Committee did not agree to an addition being made, it had merely to vote against the two paragraphs as a whole.

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) pointed out that the addition to the preamble of the two paragraphs which had been adopted separately would constitute a complete change of position; moreover, it would be difficult to superimpose those texts on the preamble, which they to a certain extent duplicated.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) referred to rule 118 of the rules of procedure in justification of his attitude. He quoted, moreover, a precedent in the First Committee in connexion with a draft submitted by his delegation. Only three paragraphs out of six in that draft had been adopted, and the Committee had disposed of those three as it thought fit. The same method should be adopted again at the present time. There could be no question of putting to the vote the two paragraphs which had been adopted separately as a substitute for the preamble as a whole; they should obviously be added to the preamble.

COUNT CARTON DE WIART (Belgium) urged that everyone should be allowed to express his opinion freely and clearly. He noted that the request of the USSR representative was acceptable because the two adopted paragraphs were not at [783] variance with the preamble. They could therefore be added to the preamble, and he supported that solution.

He considered that the Chairman should give a ruling or, if he hesitated to do so, he should consult the Committee.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) agreed with the representatives of Chile and Belgium. He declared that points of procedure should be used to whittle down a text. The vote of the Committee had indicated its desire that the two paragraphs adopted should be inserted in the preamble. If there was any doubt about the matter, they should not be afraid to take a fresh vote, and abide by the decision of the majority.

MR. CHANG (China) wondered where the text should be inserted, if the principle were accepted that the two paragraphs should be added to the preamble. Furthermore, should the two paragraphs be added to the actual preamble, or to the text proposed by the Ecuador delegation?

Mr. Chang proposed that, in order to same time, they should first take a vote, and then the USSR representative should explain in what form he wished the two paragraphs to be added.

THE CHAIRMAN agreed with the Chinese representative's proposal.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) supported those who opposed the proposal to add the two adopted paragraphs to the preamble. He said it was forbidden to change the meaning of the vote, which had indisputably been taken on a substitute text and not on an additional text. The Committee was entitled to reconsider a vote but not to change its attitude in the middle of a vote.

He also stressed that if they were to take a fresh vote on the question, they should first have time to reflect, in view of the extreme importance of the wording of the preamble.

MR. DAVIES (United Kingdom) thought that, under rule 118 of the rules of procedure, the situation was quite clear. The two separately adopted paragraphs should be voted on a substitute for the draft preamble prepared by the Commission on Human Rights. There could be no question of voting on their addition to the preamble. But the USSR representatives was entitled to propose the addition of the two paragraphs, as amendments, during the voting on each separate paragraph of the preamble.

MR. ENCINAS (Peru) stated that neither of the two paragraphs in question was incompatible either with the text of the Ecuador amendment, or with the wording of the preamble as drawn up by the Commission on Human Rights.

He suggested that the new ideas contained in those paragraphs of the USSR amendment which had been adopted should be referred to the newly constituted Sub-Committee so that the latter could decide how they were to be inserted in the preamble.

MR. CASSIN (France) declared that, in justice to the other delegations which had submitted additional texts, his delegation was unable to [784] agree that the USSR amendment should be changed from a substitute text into an additional text.

MR. THURROTT (Canada) objected to the meaning of the vote being modified. Moreover, he wondered, like the Chinese representative, where the addition should be made, if it were decided to add the two adopted paragraphs to the preamble.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of the Soviet Socialist Republics) again defended the thesis that his text should be added to the preamble. The fact that the majority of the Committee had deliberately adopted those two paragraphs indicated that they considered that the preamble would thereby be improved. Hence the Committee had indicated its intention to supplement the preamble by improving it.

In reply to the Chinese representative, he thought that the two paragraphs could be inserted after the first paragraph of the preamble; that was however a question to be settled by the Drafting Sub-Committee.

He asked to be given the necessary time in order to submit his text in the form of a new proposal, and stated that the fact that it had already been accepted by the Committee must of course be taken into account.

THE CHAIRMAN in view of the amount of work still before the Committee, insisted that a vote should be taken on whether the two adopted paragraphs should be substituted for the whole of the text proposed by the Commission on Human Rights.

He opposed the proposal made by the Peruvian and USSR representatives to refer those paragraphs to the Drafting Sub-Committee, since the Committee had as yet no preamble to refer to that Committee.

Finally, he stated that the USSR representative should submit his text in the course of that meeting, in the form of an amendment either to the Ecuadorean text, or the text proposed by the Commission on Human Rights.

He put to the vote the two paragraphs in question as a substitute text for the preamble proposed by the Commission.

That text was rejected by 22 votes to none, with 6 abstentions.

MR. CARRERA ANDRADE (Ecuador) agreed to incorporate in the text of his amendment the joint Cuban, Chilean and French amendment which would replace the fourth paragraph of the text prepared by his delegation. He also agreed that the third paragraph of the USSR amendment concerning the development of friendly relations between nations should be added at the end of the second paragraph of the Ecuadorean amendment. He thought that if his amendment was not adopted as a whole, those parts which were adopted should be substituted for the corresponding parts of the text proposed by the Commission on Human Rights.

THE CHAIRMAN stated that he could not follow a different procedure in regard to the Ecuador-[785]ean amendment from that which had been followed in regard to the USSR amendment. He would consider the adopted paragraphs as a proposed substitution for the whole of the text proposed by the Commission.

In reply to a question by MR. CHANG (China), THE CHAIRMAN explained that the vote would be taken on whether the text proposed in the Ecuadorean amendment should be substituted for the text of the Commission and not on the ideas expressed in the various parts of the amendment.

At the request of MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba), the Chairman agreed that if the Ecuadorean amendment – into which the joint amendment submitted by Cuba, Chile and France had been inserted – was rejected, the joint amendment would be voted upon as an amendment to the text of the Commission on Human Rights.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote paragraph by paragraph the amendment of Ecuador, into which the joint amendment of Cuba, Chile and France and the third paragraph of the USSR amendment had been incorporated.

The first paragraph was rejected by 23 votes to 5, with 10 abstentions.

The second paragraph was rejected by 19 votes to 6, with 12 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the third paragraph, namely the third paragraph of the USSR amendment.

That paragraph was adopted by 15 votes to 14, with 9 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the fourth paragraph, formerly the third paragraph of the Ecuadorean amendment.

That paragraph was rejected by 20 votes to 4, with 12 abstentions.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) drew attention to the English text of the fifth paragraph, which corresponded to the former joint amendment submitted by Cuba, Chile and France to the text of the Commission on Human Rights. The words “to fall back as a last resort. . .” seemed to indicate that, to some extent, a concession was concerned, which was not true of the French text.

MR. WATT (Australia) also thought the English and French texts differed substantially from one another: the French text had a positive meaning, which the English text did not give.

MR. SANDIFER (United States of America) proposed that the words “to fall back, as a last resort, on rebellion” should be replaced by the words “to have recourse, as a last resort, to rebellion”.

It was so decided.

MR. DAVIES (United Kingdom) proposed that, in the English text, the words “by a rule of law” should be replaced by the words “by the rule of law”.

It was so agreed.

THE CHAIRMAN put the fifth paragraph thus modified to the vote.

[786]

A vote was taken by roll-call as follows:

The Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, having been drawn by lot by the Chairman, was called upon to vote first.

In favour: Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Chile, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, France, Haiti, India, Mexico, Panama, Poland, Syria, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Yugoslavia.

Against: Canada, Greece, Honduras, Lebanon, Pakistan, Sweden, United Kingdom, United States of America, Australia, Belgium.

Abstaining: China, Denmark, Ethiopia, Netherlands, New Zealand, Peru, Philippines, Venezuela, Afghanistan, Argentina, Brazil, Burma.

That paragraph was adopted by 16 votes to 10, with 12 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put the sixth and seventh paragraphs to the vote successively.

The sixth paragraph was rejected by 21 votes to 3, with 14 abstentions.

The seventh paragraph was rejected by 16 votes to 9, with 13 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN refused to accede to a proposal to withdraw the approved parts of the Ecuadorean text, on the grounds that the parts already adopted were henceforth the property of the Committee.

He put to the vote as a whole those parts of the Ecuadorean amendment which had been adopted separately.

That text was rejected by 18 votes with 16 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN then opened the discussion on the draft preamble submitted by the Commission on Human Rights and on the proposed amendments to the various paragraphs of the draft.

He first put to the vote the French amendment (A/C.3/339) consisting in the substitution of the word “universal” for the word “international” in the title of the declaration.

The amendment was adopted by 17 votes to 11, with 10 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the French amendment consisting of the adoption of the phraseology of the United Nations Charter so that the preamble would begin with the words: “We, the peoples of the United Nations”.

MR. CASSIN (France) drew the Committee’s attention to his country’s proposal that the final operative clause of the preamble should begin with the words “Proclaim through our representatives in the General Assembly, this declaration etc. . . .”

The amendment was rejected by 19 votes to 10, with 9 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put the first paragraph of the draft preamble to which no amendments had been proposed to the vote.

That text was adopted unanimously.

THE CHAIRMAN drew the Committee's attention to the joint Australian and French amendment (A/C.3/383) to the second paragraph of the preamble prepared by the Commission.

[787]

MR. CHANG (China) proposed formally that the second paragraph of the amendment should be replaced by the last sentence of the first Australian amendment (A/C.3/257): "... and have made apparent the supreme importance of the recognition and guarantee of fundamental freedoms".

He thought that everyone was acquainted with the fundamental freedoms proclaimed by President Roosevelt and set forth in the joint Australian-French amendment. To mention them would therefore be sufficient, but it was essential to provide for the recognition and guarantee of those fundamental freedoms.

MR. SAINT-LOT (Haiti) did not agree with the Chinese representative. On the contrary he believed it was essential to state which were man's fundamental rights and freedoms.

MR. SANDIFER (United States of America) proposed that the joint Australian-French amendment should reproduce the exact words of President Roosevelt's declaration on fundamental freedoms.

MR. CASSIN (France) replied that when presenting the amendment he had tried to set forth the generally accepted opinions which had been so well expressed by President Roosevelt. His intention had not been to quote the President word for word.

MR. SANDIFER (United States of America) withdrew his proposal.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the first paragraph of the joint Australian and French amendment (A/C.3/383).

That paragraph was adopted by 32 votes with 5 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the proposal just made by the Chinese representative in regard to the second paragraph of the joint Australian-French amendment.

The proposal was rejected by 17 votes to 9, with 10 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put the second paragraph of the joint Australian-French amendment to the vote.

At the request of the representative of China, the representatives of France and Australia confirmed that they had already agreed to join the two paragraphs of their amendment together so as to eliminate the word “whereas” at the beginning of the second paragraph.

The second part of the amendment was adopted by 25 votes with 10 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put the whole of the joint Australian-French amendment to the vote, as modified.

The amendment was adopted by 27 votes with 8 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN opened the discussion on the third paragraph of the draft preamble prepared by the Commission and put to the vote the joint amendment submitted by Cuba, Chile and France (A/C.3/382/Rev.1).

[788]

Replying to MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon), he said that the French and English versions would be brought into harmony by the Sub-Committee which would be asked to prepare the final version of the declaration. The Sub-Committee would provide an accurate English translation for the words régime de la loi used in the French version.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) asked for a vote by roll-call.

A vote was taken by roll-call, as follows:

France, having been drawn by lot by the Chairman, was called upon to vote first.

In favour: France, Greece, Haiti, Honduras, India, Lebanon, Mexico, Netherlands, New Zealand, Panama, Poland, Syria, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Yugoslavia, Afghanistan, Argentina, Australia, Brazil, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Chile, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Dominican Republic, Ethiopia.

Against: Sweden.

Abstaining: Pakistan, Peru, Philippines, United Kingdom, United States of America, Venezuela, Belgium, Burma, Canada, China, Denmark.

The amendment was adopted by 25 votes to 1, with 11 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the amendment submitted by the Dominican Republic (A/C.3/217) to the fourth paragraph of the Commission’s draft preamble with a slight drafting change in the English version to bring it into conformity with the phraseology used in the Preamble of the Charter.

A vote was taken by roll-call as follows:

Guatemala having been drawn by lot by the Chairman was called upon to vote first.

In favour: Haiti, Honduras, India, Lebanon, Mexico, Netherlands, New Zealand, Pakistan, Panama, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Sweden, Syria, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Venezuela, Yugoslavia, Afghanistan, Argentina, Australia, Belgium, Brazil, Burma, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Chile, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Dominican Republic, France, Greece.

Against: United States of America, China.

Abstaining: United Kingdom, Canada, Ethiopia.

The amendment was adopted by 32 votes to 2, with 3 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote by show of hands the fourth paragraph of the draft preamble prepared by the Commission.

The fourth paragraph, as amended, was adopted by 36 votes to none, with 1 abstention.

THE CHAIRMAN then put to the vote the fifth and sixth paragraphs of the draft preamble prepared by the Commission.

The fifth paragraph was adopted unanimously.

The sixth paragraph was adopted by 35 votes to none, with 2 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN said that the new amendment to the Commission's draft preamble proposed by the USSR representative was contained in document A/C.3/385, which had just been circulated.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) proposed an amendment to the second part of the USSR amendment, which he thought should be added to the sixth paragraph of the preamble in the following form: "and the development of friendly relations between nations".

He wished his own amendment to be put to the vote first.

THE CHAIRMAN said he could not accept that amendment as it changed the very meaning of the second part of the USSR amendment and could not, therefore, be proposed during the vote.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the first part of the USSR amendment.

The first part of the amendment was rejected by 17 votes to 14, with 5 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the second part of the USSR amendment.

A vote was taken by roll-call, as follows:

Iceland, having been drawn by lot by the Chairman was called upon to vote first.

In favour: India, Mexico, Pakistan, Panama, Peru, Poland, Sweden, Syria, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Yugoslavia, Argentina, Australia, Belgium, Brazil, Burma, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Chile, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Ethiopia, France, Haiti, Honduras.

Against: Netherlands, New Zealand, United Kingdom, United States of America, Venezuela, Canada, China, Greece.

Abstaining: Lebanon, Philippines, Afghanistan.

The second part of the amendment was adopted by 26 votes to 8, with 3 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the Greek amendment (A/C.3/314/Rev.1/Add.2) to the last part of the draft preamble prepared by the Commission on Human Rights with a few drafting changes in the last sentence of the amendment.

The amendment was rejected by 23 votes to 7, with 8 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the last part of the draft preamble prepared by the Commission on Human Rights.

That text was adopted by 34 votes to 1, with 3 abstentions.

MR. CASSIN (France) pointed out that that text made it appear as though the declaration of human rights did not apply to non-member States. It might be possible to fill that gap by submitting again, as an additional amendment, the last sentence of the operative part of the preamble proposed by the delegation of Ecuador (A/C.3/351/Corr.1).

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) formally proposed, in accordance with rule 112 of the rules of procedure, that the vote should be reconsidered so [790] that the Committee could adopt the amendment proposed by the French representative.

MR. SANDIFER (United States of America) objected to that proposal. The Committee had had sufficient time to examine the text of the operative part of the preamble. It would be a bad procedure after an almost unanimous vote to reconsider a decision already taken.

MR. CHANG (China) said the Cuban representative's proposal could not be accepted as the Committee had not yet finished voting on the preamble. Once the whole of the preamble had been voted upon, it would be possible for the Committee to take a decision on a proposal to reconsider its vote.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) withdrew his proposal as a result of the observations made by the Chinese representative.

THE CHAIRMAN read out the whole of the Commission's text of the draft preamble, as amended.

The preamble, as amended, was adopted by 36 votes to none, with 1 abstention.

MR. COROMINAS (Argentina), speaking on a point of order, reminded the Committee that his delegation's draft resolution (A/C.3/384) relating to the declaration of old age rights had been distributed during that meeting.

As he would soon be leaving and would no longer be able to attend the meetings of the Committee, he wished the Committee to adopt his delegation's draft resolution at the current meeting; it merely asked the General Assembly to refer the question to the Economic and Social Council for consideration.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the Committee should first decide whether to include the question raised by the Argentine representative in the agenda of that meeting.

MR. SANDIFER (United States of America) and MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) supported the Argentine representative's proposal.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) thought the Committee should examine the question at its next meeting and moved the adjournment of the debate.

The motion was rejected by 25 votes to 7, with 7 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the Argentine proposal that the Committee should immediately proceed to examine item 9 of its agenda on the declaration of old age rights.

That proposal was adopted by 29 votes to none, with 7 abstentions.

Text of preamble of the draft Declaration (E/800) Adopted by the Third Committee

Whereas recognition of the inherent dignity and of the equal and inalienable rights of all members of the human family is the foundation of freedom, justice and peace in the world; and

Whereas disregard and contempt for human rights have resulted in barbarous acts which have outraged the conscience of mankind, and the advent of a world in which human beings shall enjoy freedom of speech and belief and freedom from fear and want has been proclaimed as the highest aspiration of the common people; and

Whereas it is essential if man is not to be compelled to have recourse, as a last resort, to rebellion against tyranny and oppression, that human rights should be protected by the rule of law; and

Whereas the peoples of the United Nations have in the Charter determined to reaffirm faith in fundamental human rights, in the dignity and worth of the human person and in the equal rights of men and women and to promote social progress and better standards of life in larger freedom;

Whereas Member States have pledged themselves to achieve, in co-operation with the Organization, the promotion of universal respect for and observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms; and

Whereas a common understanding of these rights and freedom is of the greatest importance for the full realization of this pledge;

Whereas it is essential to promote the development of friendly relations between nations;

Now therefore the General Assembly

Proclaims this Declaration of Human Rights as a common standard of achievement for all peoples and all nations, to the end that every [2] individual and every organ of society, keeping this Declaration constantly in mind, shall strive by teaching and education to promote respect for these rights and freedoms and by progressive measures, national and international, to secure their universal and effective recognition and observance, both among the peoples of Member States themselves and among the peoples of territories under their jurisdiction.

Draft Report of Sub-Committee 4 of the Third Committee

Submitted by Mr. Alan S. Watt (Australia), Rapporteur

Terms of Reference of the Sub-Committee

At its 166th meeting, on 30 November 1948, the Third Committee set up a Sub-Committee “to examine the totality of the Declaration of Human Rights, i.e. the 29 articles and the Preamble, adopted by the Third Committee, solely from the standpoint of arrangement, consistency, uniformity and style and to submit proposals thereon to the Third Committee”.

The Sub-Committee was also asked to “set up a language group of five members, one for each of the official languages, to check and secure the exact correspondence of the text in the five official languages”.

Composition of the Sub-Committee

The Sub-Committee was composed of the representatives of the following eleven countries: Australia, Belgium, China, Cuba, Ecuador, France, Lebanon, Poland, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Kingdom, United States of America.

Summary of the proceedings and recommendations of the Sub-Committee

The Sub-Committee held 10 meetings from 1 December to 4 December 1948.

The first meeting of the Sub-Committee was called to order by the Director of the Division of Human Rights and immediately proceeded to the election of the following officers: Chairman: Professor René Cassin (France); Rapporteur: Mr. Alan S. Watt (Australia).

Mr. John Humphrey, Director of the Division of Human Rights, represented the Secretary-General and Mr. T. L. Tchang acted as Secretary.

At its first meeting, after hearing statements by the representatives of China, Cuba and Ecuador on the general structure of the Declaration and the order of the articles, the Sub-Committee proceeded to a detailed examination and study of the Declaration article by article. This detailed examination continued through the second to the ninth meeting.

As a result of this examination and study, and subject to the reservations indicated below regarding the text of certain articles and the question of order and arrangement, the Sub-Committee decided to recommend to the Third Committee the text attached hereto as Annex A. Subject to the same reservations, it also decided to recommend that the order of the paragraphs in the preamble and of the articles of the Declaration be as therein indicated.

The Committee had before it the following documents: A/C.3/380, A/C.3/218, A/C.3/379 (E,F,C,R,S), A/C.3/386 (E,F,C,R,S), A/C.3/SC.4/W.1, A/C.3/SC.4/1 to 21.

The Sub-Committee has not yet had the time to examine the Chinese, Russian and Spanish texts. It considered however that, having regard to the urgency of the Third Committee’s task, it should make the preliminary report as soon as possible and report later on the correspondence of these texts.

During the course of the debates various members requested that certain points be brought to the attention of the Third Committee. These points are the following:

Article 2

Paragraph 1: The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics protested against the action of the Sub-Committee in changing the place of the word “birth”. He said that this changed a decision taken by the Third Committee on a question of substance, and reserved his right to bring the matter up again in the Third Committee.

Paragraph 2: The representatives of Ecuador, Poland and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics were of opinion that the Sub-Committee had exceeded its terms of reference in changing the additional article adopted by the Third Committee which now appears in modified form as paragraph 2 of article 2. In what it considers a drafting change, the Sub-Committee had, they felt, changed the substance of a decision of the Third Committee. These representatives therefore protested against the action taken by the Sub-Committee and reserved their right to raise the question in the Third Committee.

Article 12

Paragraph 2: Certain representatives felt that the suggested new [3] version of the second paragraph might affect the substance of the article as adopted by the Third Committee.

Article 18

The Sub-Committee decided to ask the Third Committee whether it was advisable to retain the word “pacifique” in the French text of Article 18.

Article 19

The representatives of Cuba, France and the Lebanon were strongly of opinion that the French text of paragraph 3 of article 19 should begin: “La volonté du peuple est le fondement. . .”

Article 20

The representative of Ecuador is of opinion that the French version of article 20 as proposed by the Sub-Committee is completely different from the English version which he considers to be the basic text.

Article 22

Certain members of the Sub-Committee thought that the suggested change “All children, whether born in or out of wedlock. . .” in paragraph 3 of article 22 might affect the substance of the article as voted by the Third Committee.

Article 23

The representative of Ecuador protested against any modification of the fundamental right to free education as stated in the text voted by the Third Committee.

At the ninth meeting of the Sub-Committee, the Cuban Representative criticized the Secretary-General for not having provided interpretation from Spanish into the working languages notwithstanding the fact that interpretation had been provided from one of the other official languages. He requested that this protest be recorded in the report of the Sub-Committee.

During a discussion of the order of the articles at the ninth meeting, the representative of Cuba requested roll-call votes on three issues.

The first of these votes was on the Cuban proposal to insert articles 16 and 17 immediately after article 4(a). The result of this vote was as follows:

Australia, no; Belgium, abstention; Ecuador, no; Cuba, yes; China, no; USA, no; [4] France, no; Lebanon, abstention; Poland and USSR, did not participate in the vote; United Kingdom, no
Result: 1 for, 6 against, 2 abstentions.

In the explanation of his vote, the representative of Cuba referred to the importance of his proposal and reserved his right to take up the matter before the Third Committee.

The second roll-call vote was on the Cuban proposal to insert article 14 immediately after article 4(a). The result of this vote was as follows:

Australia no; Belgium, abstention; Ecuador, no; Cuba, yes; China, no; USA, no; France, no; Lebanon, abstention; Poland and USSR, did not participate in the vote; United Kingdom, no
Result: 1 for, 6 against, 2 abstentions.

The third roll-call vote was on the Cuban proposal to insert articles 20 to 25 inclusive immediately after article 4(a). The result of this vote was as follows:

Australia, no; Belgium, abstention; Ecuador, no; Cuba, yes; China, no; USA, no; France, no; Lebanon, abstention; Poland and USSR, did not participate in the vote; United Kingdom, no
Result: 1 for, 6 against, 2 abstentions.

[5]

In the explanation of his votes on these three issues, the representative of Cuba referred to the importance of his proposal and reserved his right to bring them up again before the Third Committee.

Report of Sub-Committee 4 of the Third Committee

Submitted by Mr. Alan S. Watt (Australia), Rapporteur

Terms of Reference of the Sub-Committee

At its 166th meeting, on 30 November 1948, the Third Committee set up a Sub-Committee “to examine the totality of the Declaration of Human Rights, i.e. the 29 articles and the Preamble, adopted by the Third Committee, solely from the standpoint of arrangement, consistency, uniformity and style and to submit proposals thereon to the Third Committee”.

The Sub-Committee was also asked to “set up a language group of five members, one for each of the official languages, to check and secure the exact correspondence of the text in the five official languages”.

Composition of the Sub-Committee

The Sub-Committee was composed of the representatives of the following eleven countries:

Australia, Belgium, China, Cuba, Ecuador, France, Lebanon, Poland, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, United Kingdom, United States of America

Summary of the proceedings and recommendations of the Sub-Committee

The Sub-Committee held 10 meetings from 1 December to 4 December 1948.

The first meeting of the Sub-Committee was called to order by the Director of the Division of Human Rights and immediately proceeded to the election of the following officers: Chairman: Professor René Cassin (France); Rapporteur: Mr. Alan S. Watt (Australia).

Mr. John Humphrey, Director of the Division of Human Rights, represented the Secretary-General and Mr. T. L. Tchang acted as Secretary.

At its first meeting, after hearing statements by the representatives of China, Cuba and Ecuador on the general structure of the Declaration and the order of the articles, the Sub-Committee proceeded to a detailed examination and study of the Declaration article by article. This detailed examination continued through the second to the ninth meeting.

As a result of this examination and study, and subject to the reservations indicated below both regarding the text of certain articles and the question of order and arrangement, the Sub-Committee decided to recommend to the Third Committee the text attached hereto as Annex A. Subject to the same reservations, it also decided to recommend that the order of the paragraphs in the preamble and of the articles of the Declaration be as therein indicated.

The order in the Annex is the same as that of the original text with the exception of a few changes in the order of articles and of one paragraph in the Preamble. The representative of Cuba explained his vote against the proposed re-arrangement because he considered that this order contained serious mistakes in that it did not take into proper account (1) the right to protection of the family; (2) the right to freedom of thought, conscience and religion; (3) social rights (articles 20 to 25).

It will be noted that there has also been one change in the order of the recital of the preamble.

The Committee had before it the following documents: A/C.3/380, A/C.3/218, A/C.3/379) (E,F,C,R,S), A/C.3/386 (E,F,C,R,S), A/C.3/SC.4/W.1, A/C.3/SC.4/1 to 21.

At its last meeting, the Sub-Committee set up the language group mentioned in its terms of reference. The membership of this group is as follows:

Dr. P. C. Chang and Mr. T. Y. Tsao (China); Mr. Borisov and Petrov (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics); Dr. Pérez Cisneros (Cuba) and Mr. Carrera de Andrade (Ecuador); Mr. Rundall (United Kingdom); Mr. Ryckmans (Belgium.)

During the course of the debates various members requested that certain points be brought to the attention of the Third Committee. These points are the following:

Article 2

Paragraph 1: The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics protested against the action of the Sub-Committee in changing the place of the word “birth”. He said that this changed a decision taken by the Third Committee on a question of substance, and reserved his right to bring the matter up again in the Third Committee.

[3]

Paragraph 2: The representatives of Ecuador, Poland and the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics were of opinion that the Sub-Committee had exceeded its terms of reference in changing the “additional” article adopted by the Third Committee which now appears in modified form as paragraph 2 of Article 2. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics said that this amounted to a deletion of the “additional” article as a separate article. The representative of Ecuador was of opinion that the suppression of the colonial clause constituted a reconsideration of a decision taken by the Third Committee and that such reconsideration required a two-thirds majority vote of the Third Committee.

Article 4

The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics said that the change made by the Sub-Committee in the order of the article weakened the text in that the emphasis had been altered.

Article 12

Paragraph 2: Certain representatives felt that the suggested new version of the second paragraph might affect the substance of the article as adopted by the Third Committee.

Article 18

The Sub-Committee decided to ask the Third Committee whether it was advisable to retain the word “pacifique” in the French text of Article 18.

Article 19

The representatives of Cuba, France and the Lebanon were strongly of opinion that the French text of paragraph 3 of article 19 should begin: “La volonté du peuple est le fondement. . .”

Article 20

The representative of Ecuador is of opinion that the French version of article 20 as proposed by the Sub-Committee is completely different from the English version which he considers to be the basic text.

Article 22

Certain members of the Sub-Committee thought that the suggested change “All children, whether born in or out of wedlock. . .” in paragraph 3 of Article 22 might affect the substance of the article as voted by the Third Committee.

Article 23

The representative of Ecuador protested against any modification of the fundamental right to free education as stated in the text voted by the Third Committee. The representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics reserved his right to raise this question in the Third Committee inasmuch as the text had not been improved but weakened.

Additional article

The representative of Ecuador desired to draw the attention of the Third Committee to the fact that this article no longer appears in the draft Declaration as a separate article.

[4]

At the ninth meeting of the Sub-Committee, the Cuban Representative criticized the Secretary-General for not having provided interpretation from Spanish into the working languages notwithstanding the fact that interpretation had been provided from one of the other official languages.

He requested that this protest be recorded in the report of the Sub-Committee.

During a discussion of the order of the articles at the ninth meeting, the representative of Cuba requested roll-call votes on three issues. The first of these votes was on the Cuban proposal to insert articles 16 and 17 immediately after article 4(a). The result of this vote was as follows:

Australia, no; Belgium, abstention; Ecuador, no; Cuba, yes; China, no; USA, no; France, no; Lebanon, abstention; Poland and USSR, did not participate in the vote; United Kingdom, no.
Result: 1 for; 6 against, 2 abstentions.

In the explanation of his vote, the representative of Cuba referred to the importance of his proposal and reserved his right to take up the matter before the Third Committee.

The second roll-call vote was on the Cuban proposal to insert Article 14 immediately after Article 4(a). The result of this vote was as follows:

Australia, no; Belgium, abstention; Ecuador, yes; Cuba, yes; China, no; USA, no; France, no; Lebanon, no; Poland and USSR, did not participate in the vote; United Kingdom, no.

Result: 2 for, 6 against, 2 abstentions.

[5]

The representatives of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republic and Poland stated that they had been unable to participate in the voting on the two Cuban motions mentioned above because no general plan for the order of articles had been adopted by the Sub-Committee which had only considered the location of individual articles. In these circumstances, it was impossible for them to judge the advisability of making isolated changes in the order of the articles.

The third roll-call vote was on the Cuban proposal to insert articles 20 to 25 inclusive immediately after Article 4(a). The result of this vote was as follows:

Australia, no; Belgium, yes; Ecuador, yes; Cuba, yes; China, no; USA, no; France, no; Lebanon, abstention; Poland, yes; USSR, yes; United Kingdom, no.

Result: 5 for, 5 against, 1 abstention.

In the explanation of his votes on these three issues, the representative of Cuba referred to the importance of his proposals and reserved his right to bring them up again before the Third Committee.

At the ninth meeting of the Sub-Committee the representative of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics said that, because the language group had not been established, the Sub-Committee was working under abnormal conditions and had not performed its mandate.

This revision of the draft report of the 4th Sub-Committee does not contain the Annex A, which is to be found in Document A/C.3/400.

Text of Preamble as adopted by Sub-Committee 4

Whereas recognition of the inherent dignity and of the equal and inalienable rights of all members of the human family is the foundation of freedom, justice and peace in this world; and

Whereas disregard and contempt for human rights have resulted in barbarous acts which have outraged the conscience of mankind, and the advent of a world in which human beings shall enjoy freedom of speech and belief and freedom from fear and want has been proclaimed as the highest aspiration of the common people; and

Whereas it is essential, if man is not to be compelled to have recourse, as a last resort, to rebellion against tyranny and oppression, that human rights should be protected by the rule of law; and

Whereas it is essential to promote the development of friendly relations between nations; and

Whereas the peoples of the United Nations have in the Charter reaffirmed their faith in fundamental human rights, in the dignity and worth of the human person and in the equal rights of men and women and determined to promote social progress and better standards of life in larger freedom; and

Whereas Member States have pledged themselves to achieve, in co-operation with the United Nations, the promotion of universal respect for and observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms; and

Whereas a common understanding of these rights and freedoms is of the greatest importance for the full realization of this pledge;

Now therefore the General Assembly

Proclaims this Universal Declaration of Human Rights as a common standard of achievement for all peoples and all nations, to the end that every individual and every organ of society, keeping this Declaration constantly in mind, shall strive by teaching and education to promote respect for these rights and freedoms and by progressive measures, [2] national and international, to secure their universal and effective recognition and observance, both among the peoples of Member States themselves and among the peoples of territories under their jurisdiction.

Summary Record of the Hundred and Seventy-Fourth Meeting
[of the Third Committee]

Held at the Palais de Chaillot, Paris, on Saturday,
4 December 1948, at 4.15 p.m.

Chairman: MR. CHARLES MALIK (Lebanon).

104. Draft universal<sup>1</sup> declaration of human rights (E/800): (continued)

THE CHAIRMAN congratulated Sub-Committee 4 on having completed its work on the draft universal declaration of human rights and said that the report would be ready for consideration at the following meeting.

In the meantime, he suggested that the Committee should turn its attention to the French draft resolution (A/C.3/381).

In reply to MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics), THE CHAIRMAN announced that the text of the draft declaration had already been completed in all five official languages.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) expressed the view that the Committee could not consider the French draft resolution until it had completed its examination of the draft declaration. He therefore moved the adjournment of the meeting.

THE CHAIRMAN put the USSR motion for adjournment to the vote.

[<sup>1</sup>] See 167th meeting.

The motion was rejected by 18 votes to 11, with 7 abstentions.

A short discussion ensued, in which it was pointed out, on the one hand, that it would be wrong to discuss a draft resolution advocating the widest publicity for the Universal Declaration of Human Rights before the declaration itself had been adopted and, on the other hand, that it would save time to take a decision on the French draft resolution at the current meeting. It was also pointed out in that connexion that if the declaration were not adopted, the Committee would be at liberty to reverse its decision concerning the French text.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba), in an effort to save the Committee's time, moved the closure of the debate.

THE CHAIRMAN put the Cuban motion of the closure of the debate to the vote.

The motion was rejected by 9 votes to 7, with 15 abstentions.

MRS. CORBET (United Kingdom) was surprised that the representatives of the Soviet Union, the Byelorussian SSR and the Ukrainian SSR had desired the adjournment of the meeting. Only two slight modifications in the text of the declaration would need to be discussed. She therefore believed that it would be proper to debate the French draft resolution immediately; the Committee could rescind its decision in the event that the report of the Sub-Committee 4 was not adopted.

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) said that logic, as invoked by the USSR representative, should be coupled with good will. The peoples of the world, for whom the declaration was intended, would benefit from the quickest possible adoption of it. There would be no considerable changes of substance in the text submitted by the Commission on Human Rights.

The French draft resolution did not prejudice the final form of the declaration. It would be perfectly proper to vote on that draft immediately, since it was most probable that it would be adopted; any other result would be deplorable.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) pointed out that there were discrepancies between the English and French texts of the declaration; there was even more reason to suppose that such discrepancies would appear in the translation into the other official languages. Some amendments had altered the substance of the text; he could not agree with the representative of the United Kingdom that they were slight. Until texts were available in all official languages it would be inappropriate, in the absence of basic documents, to discuss the French draft resolution.

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) moved the closure of the debate and asked that the French draft should be discussed immediately.

MR. DEMCHENKO (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) protested against the closure, because it would preclude argument by those representa-[849]tives who believed that it would be illogical to discuss the French draft before action had been taken on the Sub-Committee's report. Before such action could be taken, that report must be available in all official languages.

Replying to the representative of the United States, Mr. Demchenko said that the discussion on article 21 had shown the relative attitudes of the delegations towards the wellbeing of the peoples of the world.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the United States motion for the closure of the debate.

The motion was adopted by 21 votes to 7, with 3 abstentions.

Summary Record of the Hundred and Seventy-Fifth Meeting
[of the Third Committee]

Held at the Palais de Chaillot, Paris, on Saturday,
4 December 1948, at 4.15 p.m.

Chairman: MR. CHARLES MALIK (Lebanon).

105. Draft universal declaration of human rights (E/800): report of Sub-Committee 4 (A/C.3/400 and A/C.3/400/Rev.1)

MR. WATT (Australia), Rapporteur of Sub-Committee 4, presented the Sub-Committee's report (A/C.3/400) and drew attention to the various changes proposed by it, which appeared in the right-hand column of the annex. The left-hand column gave the text adopted by the Third Committee.

He recalled the terms of reference of Sub-Committee 4 and drew attention to the observations on the various articles of the preamble made by some representatives, who considered that the Sub-Committee had exceeded its terms of reference, and had made changes which altered the meaning of the declaration.

MR. CASSIN (France), Chairman of Sub-Committee 4, congratulated Mr. Watt on the accuracy of his report and drew the Committee's attention to the terms of reference of the Sub-Committee which empowered it "to examine the totality of the declaration of human rights, i.e., the 29 articles and the preamble adopted by the Third Committee, solely from the standpoint of arrangement, consistency, uniformity and style and to submit proposals thereon to the Third Committee".

The Sub-Committee had therefore made the necessary changes to give the text coherence and to eliminate both the contradictions and the repetitions which had been discovered after careful analysis. In some cases, the fusion of certain [850] paragraphs of the declaration had been recommended. In others, certain sentences had had to be redrafted.

Those who thought that some of those changes altered the sense of the text had said that all changes should be approved by a two-thirds majority. Speaking as a jurist, Mr. Cassin thought the Sub-Committee's terms of reference, which had been adopted unanimously, already carried that approval, since they authorized it to revise the text. It could not, therefore, be contended that the Committee had exceeded its powers. The majority of the Sub-Committee was convinced that all the modifications made affected only form.

It was for the Third Committee to adopt or to reject the Sub-Committee's text, but it need adopt the changes by only a simple majority.

Mr. Cassin suggested that the Committee should begin with a comparative study of the two texts and then pass on to an examination of the arrangement of the text.

THE CHAIRMAN proposed that the Committee should proceed to an examination, paragraph by paragraph, of the text submitted by the Sub-Committee to make sure, first of all, that the sense had not been altered, and that it should then pass on to an examination of the proposals made by the Sub-Committee concerning the arrangement of the articles, as the French representative had suggested.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) suggested that members who had submitted amendments should be limited to ten minutes for their first statements, and that all other statements should be limited to five minutes.

MR. CARRERA ANDRADE (Ecuador) suggested that the Committee should begin by discussing the additional article, the position and the wording of which had been changed by the Sub-Committee.

A short procedural discussion followed.

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) asked for the closure of the discussion and suggested that the method proposed by the Chairman should be followed.

The motion was adopted by 22 votes to 2, with 9 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the proposal made by the representative of Cuba on limiting the time for speakers.

That proposal was adopted by 29 votes to one, with 3 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the proposal of the representative of Ecuador that the discussion of the report of Sub-Committee 4 should begin with the examination of the additional article.

That proposal was rejected by 17 votes to 9, with 6 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN then put to the vote his proposal that the Committee should examine each of the articles which had been altered by the Sub-Committee.

That proposal was adopted by 31 votes to none, with 3 abstentions.

[851]

Preamble

THE CHAIRMAN read out the first three paragraphs of the preamble of the Sub-Committee's text.

The only criticism made was by MR. CONTOUMAS (Greece), who in the French text preferred the word est to the word constitue in the first recital.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the text proposed by the Sub-Committee for the first three recitals.

The first three paragraphs of the recital were adopted by 11 votes to 2.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that the fourth paragraph of the recital had not been changed by the Sub-Committee.

*The fifth, sixth and seventh paragraphs of the recital were adopted.
The enacting part of the preamble was adopted.*

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that article 1 had not been altered by the Sub-Committee, and opened discussion on article 2.

Article 2

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) criticized the alterations made by the Sub-Committee in the wording of the first paragraph of article 2.

He recalled that when the article had been studied in the Third Committee he had declared himself opposed to the use of the word “birth”, to which he preferred the word “estate” (101st meeting). Since certain delegations had not wished that expression to be used, though it was rich in meaning both historically and politically, he had agreed to accept the word “birth” on condition that it should be in its proper place in the Third Committee’s text, namely, following considerations of a social character.

He considered that the alterations made by the Sub-Committee deprived the word “birth” of the sense which it was intended to have, and he suggested that the text adopted by the Committee should be retained.

MR. CASSIN (France) could well understand the justifiable concern of the USSR representative, but thought he would be able to dispel that anxiety.

As regards substance, the idea of “estate”, the absence of which Mr. Bogomolov deplored, was introduced in three of the places: in the expression “without distinction of any kind”, “social origin”, “or any other status”, and the word “birth” itself recalled sufficiently the division of classes or “estates” of the ancien régime or of Tsarist Russia.

Moreover, he did not agree that the change in the position of the word “birth” had robbed it of its meaning. Placed after the word “religion”, it could not lead to ambiguities or acquire biological implications.

His country was responsible for the wording of the French text and he urged that the word “birth” should be retained in the place suggested by the Sub-Committee. He would have no objection if the Russian translation used a term corresponding to “estate”.

[852]

MR. CHANG (China) favoured the text submitted by the Sub-Committee, for reasons of form.

MR. WATT (Australia) recalled that his delegation had voted against the new wording in the Sub-Committee because the Third Committee had added the word “birth”, at the suggestion of the USSR and had allotted it a precise place. He thought, therefore, it would be impossible to alter that vote for reasons of form.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) entirely shared Mr. Cassin’s opinion on the new text. He stated however that he would prefer to see in the French text the expression toute personne retained at the beginning of the first paragraph for he considered it better than the word chacun. Any sujet de droit must needs be a personne.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) wished to reply to Mr. Cassin, whose attitude he did not quite understand. The regime of “estates” had, it was true, disappeared in Russia as it had in France, but the historical term did nevertheless remain. It should not be forgotten that the declaration of human rights should also apply to countries which had not yet evolved as fully as France and the USSR, and that there were still backward countries, in some of which castes and privileges attached to “estates” still existed. There were countries where the revolution which had abolished the “estates” in France had not taken place.

He thought the French representative’s arguments unconvincing. The declaration should contain principles of universal significance, as the French delegation itself had asked.

The alteration to the original text made by the Sub-Committee therefore affected the substance itself of the question, and for that reason the USSR delegation could not adopt it.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) recalled that in the Sub-Committee he had voted against the new text because the alteration made considerably affected the sense of the paragraph.

He wondered whether the representatives of France and the USSR could not reach agreement by taking the original text of the Third Committee and inserting at the end of the paragraph the words “property or other status”.

MR. KAMINSKY (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) criticized the Sub-Committee for having redrafted the original text and having considerably altered its sense.

He stated that a two-thirds majority would be required for the changes to the Third Committee’s text to be adopted.

MRS. CORBET (United Kingdom) suggested that, in order to satisfy the USSR delegation, the words “property or other status” should be added to the original text after the word “birth”.

MR. CHANG (China) suggested the following wording: “. . . language, religion, national or social origin, political or other opinion, birth, property or other status”. [853]

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) requested that the original text, should be retained, in view of the ambiguity of the word “birth” and of his delegation’s attitude on that question.

MR. CASSIN (France) pointed out that he was ready to accept a compromise solution, but could not agree that, in order to avoid an absurdity in one language, an absurdity should be imposed in another. The word état would no longer be understood in French.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) proposed the adoption of the following order of enumeration in the first paragraph of article 2: “. . . without distinction of any kind, such as race, colour, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, property, birth or any other status”.

The text was adopted unanimously.

With regard to the substitution of the term toute personne by chacun in the French text, MR. CONTOUMAS (Greece) pointed out that in a State where individuals might lose their juridical personality, these individuals, by virtue of the text adopted by the Committee, would no longer enjoy any protection. Besides, the word chacun was closer in meaning to the English term “everyone”.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) consequently withdrew his proposal.

THE CHAIRMAN asked the Committee to pass to the examination of the second paragraph of article 2.

MR. CARRERA ANDRADE (Ecuador) said that, in the Sub-Committee, his delegation had reserved its right to come back to that paragraph.

In the text adopted by the Third Committee, there was an additional article on the colonial clause which the Sub-Committee had rejected by a majority of five votes, thereby ignoring the will of thirty countries expressed in the Committee. Although four members of the Sub-Committee, including the Chairman, had claimed that the amendment was only one of form, four other members, including himself, had considered that the amendment was one of substance, as the Sub-Committee had reopened a decision adopted by the Committee. However, any reconsideration of the article would be possible only if it were decided upon by a two-thirds majority vote of the members of the Committee.

The representative of Ecuador could not accept Mr. Cassin’s assertions that the Sub-Committee had full powers to act in that way. In his opinion, the Sub-Committee had exceeded its terms of reference.

THE CHAIRMAN stated that it was very difficult to determine the nature of a modification. However, he felt that when a paragraph had been transposed and certain words deleted at the same time, and when some members had raised serious objections, as in the case of the paragraph in question, the decision should be taken by a two-thirds majority vote.

Summary Record of the Hundred and Seventy-Sixth Meeting
[of the Third Committee]

Held at the Palais de Chaillot, Paris, on Monday,
6 December 1948, at 10:30 am

Chairman: MR. CHARLES MALIK (Lebanon).

106. Draft universal declaration of human rights (E/800): report of Sub-Committee 4 (A/C.3/400 and A/C.3/400/Rev.1) (continued)

MR. RADEVANOVIC (Yugoslavia) stated that Sub-Committee 4 had inserted paragraph 2 of article 2 in the declaration in an irregular manner, while rejecting the additional article adopted by the Committee. The wording of that additional article had been perfectly clear and there had been no need to alter it in any way. On the contrary, the new text proposed by the Sub-Committee was too vague and did not correspond to the original idea, which was to make a special declaration of the rights of the populations of Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories.

According to the terms of reference received from the Third Committee (166th meeting), the Sub-Committee was only a technical organ, without competence to introduce substantive modifications. In proposing an entirely new text, it had exceeded its terms of reference. The Committee had concluded the debate on the substance and no new proposal could be accepted unless the Committee decided to reopen the debate in accordance with rule 112 of the rules of procedure.

MRS. KALINOWSKA (Poland) recalled that there had been stubborn opposition in the Committee to the additional article.<sup>1</sup> She thought that paragraph 2 of article 2, which the Sub-Committee proposed to substitute for that article, sprang from the same attitude of mind which was in favour of the colonial system.

The draft convention on genocide, the protocol on narcotic drugs and many other similar documents contained clauses to the effect that those documents were not applicable to Non-Self-Governing Territories. The draft declaration on human rights was fortunately an exception in that respect. The additional article proclaimed the rights of the millions of inhabitants of colonies and Trust Territories; the Committee had decided to state those provisions in a separate article. The Sub-Committee was not empowered to reverse that decision by deleting that article. The Polish delegation had already made a statement to that effect in the Sub-Committee.

MR. KAYALY (Syria) agreed that the Sub-Committee had no right to replace the separate article by a mere paragraph.

The Syrian delegation considered that the modification which had been made in the text and which related to a question of substance was inadmissible.

[<sup>1</sup>] See 163rd meeting.

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America), though not fundamentally opposed to the idea on which the additional article was based, wondered whether they were really doing a service to the peoples in question by mentioning them specifically at the end of the declaration.

On reading over the complete text, the members of the Sub-Committee had realized that it was not logical to state in article 2 that “everyone is entitled to all the rights and freedoms. . .”, and then to state afterwards, in an article 29, that those rights “also apply to any person belonging to the population of Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories”. That would amount to saying that the general term “everyone” did not apply to a specific group of people.

If, however, some delegations considered it logical to include in one and the same text two contradictory statements, then the United States delegation would not oppose the adoption of article 29. Nevertheless, the United States delegation thought paragraph 2 of article 2 definitely preferable, because it was of universal scope.

MR. RADEVANOVIC (Yugoslavia) pointed out that the United States representative was raising questions of substance and THE CHAIRMAN replied that members were perfectly entitled to raise such questions. It was only when it was a matter of introducing a modification of substance into the text of the declaration that the Committee had first to decide, by a two-thirds majority, to reopen discussion on the point raised.

MR. SAINT-LOT (Haiti) asserted that the Sub-Committee had exceeded its terms of reference in adopting paragraph 2 of article 2.

The French representative’s argument that they should be careful not to cause offence to the colonial peoples had not convinced the representative of Haiti. His country, which could speak for those peoples, assured the Committee that they would prefer such a slight to their pride rather than have their rights go unrecognized.

The delegation of Haiti was opposed to the step taken by the Sub-Committee and thought draft article 29 should stand, unless the Committee decided otherwise by a two-thirds majority.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) recalled that it was his delegation which, in the Sub-Committee, had proposed the new paragraph of article 2. He could not allow the motives of those who had proposed or approved that text to be called in question. In the Fourth Committee, where he also represented his country, he had always upheld the cause of the peoples of Trust Territories. There were occasions when representatives made mistakes, and sub-committees exceeded their terms of reference, but to question the good faith of the members of the majority on Sub-Committee 4 and of its Chairman, Mr. Cassin, was inadmissible.

The Sub-Committee was entitled by its terms of reference to ensure that the various clauses of the declaration were logically consistent and that there was no unnecessary repetition. Article 2 covered all possible forms of discrimination. [856] The aim of the additional article was to exclude difference of treatment based on the legal status of a certain category of territories. The Cuban delegation, together with the majority of the Sub-Committee, had thought that that idea should be incorporated in the provisions of article 2 and expressed in such a way as to ensure universal application. It was not only a question of Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories. There were other countries where it was vital to protect human rights, namely, countries under foreign occupation, which none had yet thought of defending.

The Cuban delegation had thought that the text adopted should be couched in terms general enough to apply to those countries also. If that delegation had exceeded the terms of reference of the Sub-Committee, it had done so with the best of intentions; but he thought that it was in fact a question of form and, as such, came within the competence of the Sub-Committee. He asked the Committee to take a vote on whether the modification made by the Sub-Committee affected the substance of the additional article or merely the form.

He was willing to grant the critics of paragraph 2 of article 2 that it did not express the generous idea behind the additional article as clearly as that article did.

For that reason he was making a formal proposal that the words "and jurisdictional" should be added between the words "political" and "status", and, that the territory of the individuals should be mentioned at the same time as his country.

MR. KAMINSKY (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) pointed out that the arguments that were being put forward were the same as those which had been used to oppose the adoption of the additional article. The Committee, however, had already adopted that article (163rd meeting), the text of which was extremely clear. That text contained explicit mention of the peoples of Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories, whereas the text proposed as a substitute for it referred to the political regime of various countries. The wording of the new paragraph lacked clarity as it seemed to give the impression that it was no longer a matter of defining the rights of the individual as such, but the rights of persons attached to certain territories.

The representative of Cuba wanted to broaden the conception of the political regime in order to make it apply to occupied countries. The Byelorussian representative did not think there was any need to take account of occupied countries. Moreover, any comparison between the occupied zones of Germany and the colonial territories would be unfavourable to the latter.

He thought that the Committee should reject paragraph 2 of article 2, and retain the text of draft article 29.

MR. CASSIN (France) explained that, as Chairman of Sub-Committee 4, he had abstained from voting on paragraph 2 of article 2; nevertheless, the text had been adopted by the Sub-Committee by 6 votes to 3. He protested against the tendency [857] to question the good faith of the members who constituted that majority. He recalled also that when the Cuban delegation had proposed the text in question he had pointed out that it might be regarded by some as a substantive modification. The Sub-Committee had therefore decided to draw the attention of the Committee to that aspect of the question.

The French representative declared that his country's attitude on the subject of the Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories had never changed. France wished to defend the rights of all human beings without exception. The Territories in question were already mentioned in the preamble to the declaration; to repeat that idea was unnecessary, and to mention it in a restrictive sense would be dangerous. Failure to mention other categories of countries, such as occupied countries, might restrict the universal application of the provisions of article 2. He urged that, as matters stood, the article would gain in effectiveness through being as general as possible.

As regards procedure, the French representative recalled that the terms of reference of the Sub-Committee included the obligation to avoid contradictions, duplication and gaps. The Committee was free to take decisions on the substance as well as on the form; it should relieve the Sub-Committee of its mandate and take a simple majority vote on each question.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) recalled that his delegation had already protested against the Sub-Committee's decision, which was a violation of the basic decision previously taken by the Third Committee. None of the explanations given to justify such a deviation was convincing. The fact that a principle was stated in the preamble to the declaration should not exclude all later mention of it. In such a case, repetition could only add to the force of the principle.

The USSR delegation therefore formally requested that the additional article should be restored to its original form. With regard to the place to be taken by that article in the body of the declaration, the USSR delegation would give its opinion when the Committee discussed the final form of the draft.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) said that the text drawn up by the Sub-Committee, particularly if it were amended in the sense proposed by the Cuban representative, was fundamentally more satisfactory than the narrower version which had been adopted by the Committee itself. He admitted, however, that a substantive amendment was involved and that any decision in favour of its adoption should therefore be supported by a two-thirds majority of the Committee, in accordance with the rules of procedure.

He added that, in adopting that attitude, the Chilean delegation did not question the intentions of the members of the Sub-Committee, for whom it had the highest respect.

MR. CONTOUMAS (Greece) pointed out that it seemed impossible to interpret the draft prepared [858] by the Sub-Committee otherwise than as extending the rights established in the declaration to every individual without exception. The only criticism, if any, might be that that text was broader than the earlier version, since it extended the enjoyment of human rights not only to the inhabitants of Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories, but to the inhabitants of every country and every territory in the world, whatever its international political status.

The misunderstanding no doubt arose from the absence of the word “international”, because “political status” might be taken as meaning the internal regime of the territories in question, and appeared to have been so taken by some delegations. In putting the emphasis on the international aspect, such territories as Tangier, which had a special international status, would be understood to be included, together with any new forms of jurisdiction which might be established in the future for other territories. As thus defined, the text proposed by the Sub-Committee would be perfectly clear and would be an improvement on the original.

MR. CARRERA ANDRADE (Ecuador) said that the political status of a country was determined by its internal structure and not only by the form of government it happened to have. The members of the Sub-Committee had recognized their mistake since the representative of Cuba proposed an amendment to the text sponsored by his own delegation and the French representative admitted that he had abstained from voting in the Sub-Committee of which he had been Chairman.

The additional article, as adopted by the Committee, called for no change in style or form; moreover, its explicit purpose was to extend the protection of the declaration of human rights to the inhabitants of colonies, Trust Territories and Non-Self-Governing Territories; it therefore seemed preferable to retain it.

His delegation wished to point out that, in taking up that position, it did not question the good faith of the members of the Sub-Committee, and particularly of the Cuban representative, whose intelligent and devoted contribution to the cause of human rights was known to all.

COUNT CARTON DE WIART (Belgium) said that the Sub-Committee had been entrusted with a very delicate task. Having taken part in most of the meetings, he could not express an opinion upon the value of its work but he wished to pay a tribute to the sincerity shown in all its discussions and to the great ability of its Chairman, Mr. Cassin.

The Sub-Committee had been instructed to give the draft declaration as harmonious a form as possible. From that point of view the Belgian delegation did not think it had been wrong to insert, instead of an article referring solely to the inhabitants of Non-Self-Governing Territories, a more general text, which was also much clearer. As had been noted by the representative of Greece, one advantage of the new text was that it also included inhabitants of territories with a [859] special juridical status which had not previously been taken into account, namely, Tangier and Trieste currently and Jerusalem in the future. The two amendments proposed by the representative of Cuba clarified that point very satisfactorily.

If the Committee adopted the new text, amended in the sense proposed by the Cuban representative, it would respect the basic idea which had inspired all its work, namely, the principle of the universal application of the Declaration of Human Rights, and would avoid the danger of excluding a single human being from enjoying the rights and freedoms to be established in that declaration.

MR. BAROODY (Saudi Arabia) stated that his delegation would vote in favour of the Committee's text.

It would not be able to accept the Sub-Committee's proposal, which undoubtedly affected the substance of the original text, nor could it be convinced by arguments that that proposal avoided a repetition, for his delegation considered that such a repetition would, on the contrary, be useful in the present case.

He was therefore in favour of retaining a separate article, as drafted by the Third Committee.

MRS. CORBET (United Kingdom) thanked the Cuban representative for the way in which he had clarified the debate.

The United Kingdom delegation would vote in favour of the new paragraph which the Sub-Committee wished to add to article 2. That did not mean that her delegation was opposed, in principle, to the provisions of the additional article; the contrary was the case; but it would like those provisions to be stated in conformity with the general wording of the declaration. It was undeniable that the purpose of draft article 29 was to broaden article 2; the Sub-Committee had respected that intention by drafting a text which could be incorporated in article 2. Although it did not mention them explicitly, there could be no doubt that that text implicitly included Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories. Moreover, it had the advantage, especially if the Committee accepted the suggestions made by the representatives of Cuba and Greece, of including all other territories, such as Tangier and Trieste, which had been mentioned, or the regions at present under military occupation; that comprehensiveness was in complete accord with the general feeling, since it was stated that the declaration would be universal.

Certain delegations seemed to fear that the rights established by the declaration would not apply to the inhabitants of Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories; that fear had no foundation, for all the countries which still had links with those Territories were doing their utmost to lead them towards independence in accordance with the provisions of the treaties which they had signed. She feared that the danger was much more real in regard to the populations of totalitarian countries where human rights did not exist and were not likely to exist.

[860]

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) expressed his agreement with the argument that the additional article could not be inserted in the declaration in the form given to it by the Committee since that would weaken the universal scope of article 2.

Moreover, although the good faith of the authors of the text submitted by the Sub-Committee could not be questioned, it should nevertheless be realized that the text did not entirely correspond to the intentions of those who thought it necessary to include explicit mention of the populations of the Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories in the declaration.

In order to reconcile those two points of view, the Lebanese delegation proposed the retention of the text and its insertion in article 2 – which would be more in conformity with the draft declaration as a whole. Taking into account the amendments suggested by the Cuban representative, he proposed that paragraph 2 of article 2 should be worded as follows (A/C.3/404):

“Furthermore, no distinction shall be made on the basis of the political, jurisdictional or international status of the country or territory to which a person belongs, whether this territory is an independent, Trust or Non-Self-Governing territory.”

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) thanked the Byelorussian representative for the courtesy he had shown in presenting his constructive criticisms of the Cuban amendment. He drew his attention to the fact that it did not refer to Germany but to all territories, including colonies, which were under military occupation, and the exact status of which was unknown.

MR. DEMCHENKO (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) recalled that, in defining the Sub-Committee’s terms of reference, The Chairman had carefully pointed out that its work would be of a purely drafting nature. The Sub-Committee had however gone as far as to delete an article which had been adopted by the full Committee by a considerable majority; it had therefore exceeded its terms of reference. Such liberties were not surprising: it was only one more manifestation of the attitude which certain colonial countries had maintained all through the debates on the declaration of human rights; giving seemingly innocent drafting considerations as a pretext, certain delegations had wished at all costs to prevent the declaration from including explicit mention of the populations of Non-Self-Governing or Trust Territories.

The same pretext had been given at the current meeting for eliminating an essential article from the declaration. The colonial populations were waiting impatiently for their independence and their equality to be recognized; it was essential that that should be done. The additional article of the declaration fulfilled those aims perfectly; the Committee had adopted it and the new examination suggested by certain delegations was therefore unnecessary.

In conclusion, the Ukrainian representative expressed his support of the original text. He would not be able to accept the text as redrafted by the Sub-Committee, which had gone beyond its terms of reference in drafting it.

MR. AQUINO (Philippines) wished to stress the fact that there could be no doubt as to the good faith of the Cuban delegation, on whose initiative the Sub-Committee had decided to delete the additional article and reintroduce it in the form of a second paragraph to article 2. The progressive attitude which the Cuban representative had always shown would in itself suffice to dispel any possible misunderstanding in that connexion.

It was, however, indisputable that the Sub-Committee had gone beyond its terms of reference. Draft article 29 mentioned Non-Self-Governing Territories and Trust Territories. By substituting for those precise terms expressions which were so vague that they might be taken as including territories occupied by the Allies as a result of the war – and certain delegations had definitely stated that such an interpretation was possible – the Sub-Committee had touched upon questions of substance which did not fall within its competence.

For those reasons, the Philippine delegation would support the text of the additional article, as approved by the full Committee.

MR. AIKMAN (New Zealand) said he would vote in favour of the text submitted by the Sub-Committee, which not only kept intact the fundamental principle of the additional article but stated it in a way more in keeping with the declaration as a whole. The amendments proposed by the Cuban delegation were very appropriate in his opinion. So was the amendment submitted by the delegation of Lebanon though it would be preferable, however, if it could be worded slightly differently in order to improve the form of expression.

MR. RADEVANOVIC (Yugoslavia) pointed out that the authors of the text proposed by the Sub-Committee had themselves recognized the fact that they had intended to broaden the scope of the additional article. They had therefore admitted to having modified that article in regard to its substance.

If the clear terms of “Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories” were replaced by the vague terms of “political status” and “countries”, the most fundamental part of the text adopted by the Committee would be deleted.

THE CHAIRMAN stated that there could be no doubt as to the complete good faith of members of the Sub-Committee. For the reasons which the representative of Yugoslavia had just given, however, it was evident that the Sub-Committee had gone beyond its terms of reference. The additional article laid stress on two definite terms; that was the reason for its existence, as the discussion had shown. The Sub-Committee's text did not take into account the particular importance which the Committee had given those two terms; it was evident therefore that the Sub-Committee had introduced into the original text a modification in regard to its substance.

Consequently, the Chairman felt that he could not ask the Committee to vote on the new text unless the Committee decided, by a two-thirds majority, to re-examine draft article 29.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) stated that, with all due respect to the Chairman, he could not share his views on that point.

[862]

He appealed to the Committee against the Chair's ruling and said he would accept the Committee's decision.

He asked for a vote to be taken by roll-call.

A vote was taken by roll-call, as follows:

In favour: Argentina, Belgium, China, Cuba, France, Greece, United States of America.

Against: Afghanistan, Brazil, Burma, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Chile, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, Dominican Republic, Ecuador, Ethiopia, Haiti, India, Iran, Mexico, New Zealand, Norway, Pakistan, Panama, Paraguay, Peru, Philippines, Poland, Saudi Arabia, Sweden, Syria, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Yemen, Yugoslavia.

Abstaining: Australia, Bolivia, Canada, Colombia, Honduras, Lebanon, Netherlands, Turkey, United Kingdom.

The appeal was rejected by 29 votes to 7, with 9 abstentions.

MRS. CORBET (United Kingdom) explained that her delegation had abstained, not because it considered that the Sub-Committee had introduced changes in the substance of the Committee's text, but because it did not wish to question the Chairman's ruling.

MR. WATT (Australia) reminded the Committee that his delegation had abstained when the Sub-Committee had been called upon to vote on whether the amendments proposed with regard to the additional article were amendments of substance or of form. His abstention in the vote which had just been taken was therefore in conformity with the general position adopted by his delegation.

MR. SAINT-LOT (Haiti) had supported the Chairman's ruling which did credit both to the Chairman and to the Committee. Indeed, by recognizing the fact that they had wished to broaden the scope of the Committee's text, certain members of the Sub-Committee had admitted by implication that they had introduced modifications in regard to substance into the original text.

MR. CASSIN (France) had opposed the Chairman's ruling. He had done so quite objectively as he considered that a sub-committee which had been asked to make a text more coherent could not be criticized for having carried out its terms of reference.

He emphasized the fact that it was now the Committee's responsibility to fill the gaps in the original text.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) agreed with the statement made by the French representative.

He bowed to the Committee's decision and said that he was ready to vote in favour of the original text.

MRS. CORBET (United Kingdom) moved formally that the Committee should re-examine the additional article.

MR. CARRERA ANDRADE (Ecuador) asked for the vote on the United Kingdom representative's proposal to be taken by roll-call.

A vote was taken by roll-call, as follows:

[863]

In favour: Afghanistan, Argentina, Australia, Belgium, Bolivia, Brazil, Canada, Chile, China, Colombia, Cuba, Denmark, France, Greece, Honduras, Netherlands, New Zealand, Norway, Panama, Paraguay, Sweden, Turkey, United Kingdom, United States of America, Yemen.

Against: Burma, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Czechoslovakia, Ecuador, Ethiopia, Haiti, India, Pakistan, Poland, Saudi Arabia, Syria, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Yugoslavia.

Abstaining: Dominican Republic, Iran, Iraq, Mexico, Peru, Philippines.

The result of the vote was 25 in favour, 14 against and 6 abstentions. The proposal for the re-examination of article 29 was not adopted, having failed to obtain the required two-third majority.

Article 3

Article 3 was adopted.

Article 4

THE CHAIRMAN drew attention to the fact that the only amendment introduced in article 4 consisted in an alteration of the order of the sentences.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) reminded the Committee that his delegation had spoken in the Sub-Committee against the change effected in the order of the sentences in that article. He considered that in its new form, article 4 had lost both in forcefulness of expression and in scope. It was therefore more reasonable to retain the article in its original form.

MR. WATT (Australia) said that the Committee had not taken a decision as to the final order to be given to the various paragraphs of article 4. The order which the Sub-Committee recommended appeared to him to be perfectly acceptable.

THE CHAIRMAN asked the Committee to vote on article 4 in its new form.

Article 4 was adopted by 32 votes to 6, with 3 abstentions.

Articles 4a, 5, 6 and 6a

Articles 4a, 5, 6, 6a were successively adopted.

Article 7

MR. CASSIN (France) proposed that the word arbitrairement should be placed at the beginning of the sentence, between the words être and arrêté, in order to avoid any possible misunderstanding. That modification concerned only the French text.

It was so decided.

With that further modification, article 7 was adopted.

Article 8

Article 8 was adopted.

Article 9

Pointing out a slight discrepancy between the French and English texts, MR. CASSIN (France) requested that the word juridiquement should be replaced, in the French text, by the word légalement.

[864]

It was so decided.

With that modification, article 9 was adopted.

Article 10

MRS. CORBET (United Kingdom) proposed that the word “arbitrary”, which could only be applied to interference prohibited by law, should be replaced by the word “unreasonable” which had a wider meaning and also included interference of a private nature.

MR. AQUINO (Philippines) supported that proposal.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) preferred the word “abusive” which appeared in the Spanish text of the draft declaration.

MR. ABADI (Iraq) suggested the word “unwarranted” which was more forceful in English than “unreasonable” and had a wider meaning than “arbitrary”.

MRS. CORBET (United Kingdom) agreed with that proposal.

MR. CASSIN (France) stressed the fact that the question had already been discussed at length and that the Committee had taken a decision on the matter which there was no cause to reconsider. The term “arbitrary” was used on several occasions in the draft declaration and it was fully understood that it expressed two shades of meaning: that of illegality and that which the United Kingdom representative had sought to define by using the word “unreasonable”.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics), MR. SAINT-LOT (Haiti), MR. CHANG (China) and MR. AIKMAN (New Zealand) shared the views expressed by the representative of France.

THE CHAIRMAN asked the Committee to vote on the replacement of the term “arbitrary” by the word “unwarranted”.

*It was decided, by 34 votes to 2, with 5 abstentions, to retain the word “arbitrary”.
Article 10 was adopted.*

The meeting rose at 1:10 p.m.

107. Draft universal declaration of human rights (E/800): report of Sub-Committee 4 (A/C.3/400 and A/C.3/400/Rev.1) (continued)

Article 11

Article 11 was adopted.

Article 12

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) did not object to the text of paragraph [865] 2 of article 12 as drafted by the Sub-Committee, but pointed out that the Sub-Committee had not merely altered the wording of the original text, but had touched upon the substance of the question. The original text of paragraph 2 had represented a legal definition of persecution; the Sub-Committee's text no longer did so, but merely listed exceptions to the principle stated in paragraph 1 of the same article.

THE CHAIRMAN put article 12 to the vote.

Article 12 was adopted by 29 votes to none, with 2 abstentions.

Articles 13, 14 and 15

Articles 13, 14 and 15 were successively adopted.

Article 16

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) proposed that the word ou in the phrase seul ou en commun in the French text should be replaced by the word et for the sake of greater clarity.

In reply to a question by MR. CHANG (China), the Chairman stated that the replacement of ou by et in French must involve a corresponding change in the English text. He pointed out, however, that the word "either" in the English text made it clear that freedom to manifest religion or belief in public by no means excluded the freedom to do so in private.

MRS. CORBET (United Kingdom) agreed with the Chairman that if a disjunctive were replaced by a conjunction in the French text, a corresponding alteration must be made in the English text.

MR. CASSIN (France) had no objection to the Cuban representative's proposal as far as the French text was concerned, but thought that the text was sufficiently clear as it stood.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) withdrew his proposal in view of the opinion expressed by the representative of France, but reserved the right to make the appropriate change in the Spanish text.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) pointed out that the Russian text of article 16 was not satisfactory as it did not correspond with either the English or the French texts; he reserved the right to make the necessary alteration.

THE CHAIRMAN put article 16 to the vote.

Article 16 was adopted.

Article 17

Article 17 was adopted.

Article 18

MR. CONTOUMAS (Greece) formally proposed the deletion of the word pacifique in the French text. The meaning of the word pacifique in French was not the same as that of “peaceful” in English: moreover, in the English text the word “peaceful” applied both to “assembly” and “association”, while in the French text the word pacifique applied only to réunion.

[866]

THE CHAIRMAN stated that the amendment proposed by the representative of Greece was one of substance, and called for reconsideration of article 18; he recalled that, under rule 112 of the rules of procedure, a proposal which had been adopted or rejected could not be reconsidered unless the Committee so decided by a two-thirds majority.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) thought that the Greek representative’s proposal did not constitute a request for reconsideration of article 18, but was merely a drafting change. It was essential that the English and the French texts should be as nearly identical as differences of language would permit.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) suggested that the Greek representative’s second objection might be overcome if the French text were altered to read . . . à la liberté de réunion et d’association pacifiques.

THE CHAIRMAN put the Lebanese proposal to the vote.

The proposal was adopted.

THE CHAIRMAN put article 18, as amended in respect of the French text, to the vote.

Article 18, as amended in respect of the French text, was adopted.

Article 19

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) drew attention to the first phrase of paragraph 3 of article 19. He recalled that, during the discussions in Sub-Committee 4, there had been no divergences of opinion on any point of substance; however, two different views had been advanced as to the form of the verb “to be” which should be used in that phrase.

He proposed that the words doit être in the French text should be replaced by est; the use of the present indicative in that context would give more force to the principle proclaimed.

THE CHAIRMAN suggested that the matter should be decided by the French-speaking delegations, as the English text was unaffected by the proposal of the Lebanese representative.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) was strongly opposed to the Lebanese representative’s proposal, as it involved a change of substance. The words doit être made it clear that not every Government could claim that its authority was based on the will of the people; they imposed a certain obligation, both on Governments and on peoples. The word est, on the other hand, implied that the authority of any Government was based on the will of the people, which did not correspond to the truth; such a formula might be used as an argument in favour of a Government not in fact based on the will of the people.

MR. CASSIN (France) pointed out that all members were agreed on the principle involved; the point at issue was the manner in which that principle should be most clearly and most forcefully proclaimed. In the French language, the present [867] indicative was the most emphatic form of the verb “to be”.

He recalled in that connexion that the Committee’s original draft of the first paragraph of article 4 read: “Slavery and the slave trade are prohibited in all their aspects.”

THE CHAIRMAN stated that, in the English language, the present indicative form of the verb “to be” was used in all declarations of principle, and had the force of an absolute statement. The difference of meaning referred to by the representative of the Soviet Union did not exist in English, although it might exist in Russian.

He could not therefore share Mr. Bogomolov’s opinion.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) reiterated the view that it would be more accurate and more appropriate to use the imperative future both in the English and in the French texts. The use of the present indicative, which obviously did not reflect the truth in the case in point, would merely weaken and distort the substance of the principle involved.

He urged that the text should be retained as it stood.

MR. CHANG (China) recalled that the current form of the first phrase of paragraph 3 had been established as a compromise solution, as the result of a concession by the French delegation, which had always expressed preference for the use of the present indicative. After some debate, the Committee had decided in favour of the current wording.

While expressing no personal preference, he suggested that, in order to avoid loss of time and a possible disparity between the French and English texts, the sentence should be retained as it stood.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics), speaking on a point of order, stated that the change proposed by the representative of Lebanon affected the substance of the matter and would therefore require a two-thirds majority vote. The proposed alteration was a question of politics rather than of grammar.

THE CHAIRMAN did not agree with the representative of the USSR; the Lebanese representative’s proposal was directed only at making the statement more emphatic and did not therefore require a two-thirds majority.

MR. CASSIN (France) supported by MR. RYCKMANS (Belgium), assured the representative of the Soviet Union that, in the French language, the present indicative had the value of a categorical imperative; the substitution of est for doit être would give additional emphasis to the statement, while in no way changing its meaning.

MR. CONTOUMAS (Greece) agreed with the representative of France, and added that the present indicative was used in statements of principle in the French Constitution.

MR. WATT (Australia) believed that any change made in the French text should also be made in the English text. As far as the latter was concerned, the substitution of the word “is” for “shall be” would constitute an improvement by [868] making it perfectly clear that the statement in question reflected an abstract principle. The USSR representative’s objections did not apply to the case in point.

MRS. CORBET (United Kingdom) agreed with the representative of the Soviet Union that the use of the word “is” in the English text would constitute an inaccuracy; she believed that the English text was satisfactory and would prefer it to be retained as it stood.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the proposal that the word est should be substituted for the words doit être in the French text.

The proposal was adopted by 15 votes to 5, with 14 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the proposal that the word “is” should be substituted for the words “shall be” in the English text.

The proposal was rejected by 26 votes to 3, with 9 abstentions.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) stated that the Russian text would be drafted to correspond to the English rather than to the French text.

THE CHAIRMAN put article 19, as amended in the French text, to the vote.

Article 19 was adopted, as amended in the French text.

Articles 20 and 21

Articles 20 and 21 were successively adopted.

Article 22

MR. LUNDE (Norway) stated that his delegation, which had submitted the amendment<sup>1</sup> on which the new text of paragraph 2 was based, was prepared to accept the Sub-Committee’s draft. It considered, however, that as a result of the combination of paragraphs 2 and 3, the idea of social protection for children born out of wedlock was not as clear as in the former text.

Mr. Lunde reserved the right to raise the question again.

THE CHAIRMAN put article 22 to the vote.

Article 22 was adopted.

Article 23

MR. CHANG (China) observed that he had submitted a slight amendment (A/C.3/397) to paragraph 1 of article 23, chiefly for the sake of uniformity of style. The first two sentences of the paragraph would remain unchanged; the third would read as follows:

“Elementary education shall be compulsory; technical and professional education shall be made generally available; and higher education shall be equally accessible to all on the basis of merit.”

MR. CASSIN (France) proposed the following translation of the last phrase of the Chinese amendment:

L'accès aux études supérieures doit être ouvert également à chacun en fonction de son mérite.

[1] See 143rd meeting.

[869]

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) suggested that en pleine égalité should be substituted for également, which was somewhat ambiguous.

MR. CASSIN (France) thought that if the Lebanese representative's suggestion were adopted, it would be impossible to say à chacun and it would be necessary to revert to the original text.

MRS. CORBET (United Kingdom) stated that she would vote for the Chinese amendment.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) and MR. CARRERA ANDRADE (Ecuador) asked that paragraph 1 of article 23 should be voted on in two separate parts.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the first two sentences of paragraph 1.

The first two sentences were adopted by 27 votes to 8.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the Chinese amendment to the remainder of paragraph 1.

The amendment was adopted by 13 votes to 1, with 7 abstentions.

Paragraph 2 of article 23 was adopted.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) asked that paragraph 3 should be put to a vote. As the paragraph was worded, it might be interpreted to mean that if a young man of 23 or 24 wished to study a certain subject, his parents had the right to prevent him from so doing.

He asked that the word “minor” should be inserted before the word “children”.

THE CHAIRMAN observed that as the USSR proposal was one of substance, a two-thirds majority would be required to decide whether it could be debated.

MR. AQUINO (Philippines) protested against the proposal of the representative of the Soviet Union because he felt that to reopen the whole question, which had already been debated at length, would create a bad precedent. He thought it was clear that the article referred to minors; that could be stated if the USSR representative so desired, but in any case proper parliamentary procedure should be followed.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) supported the proposal of the representative of the Soviet Union as far as the French text was concerned.

MR. CASSIN (France) pointed out that the paragraph had never been voted on. He suggested the addition of the word mineurs in the French text.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) said that the point at issue was simply to find a good equivalent in French and Russian for the word “child”.

THE CHAIRMAN pointed out that if the word “minor” were added, the Committee would then have to decide at what age a child ceased to be a minor; that age differed in different countries.

MR. CHANG (China) suggested replacing the words “to their children” by the word’s “to their offspring in their early childhood”.

MR. WATT (Australia) explained that the Australian delegation had opposed an earlier USSR suggestion for the introduction of the word “younger” only because that proposal had been made when the Committee was in the middle of voting.

No one had intended that parents should have such rights over their children up to all ages; indeed it was more the authority of the parent in relation to the State that had been envisaged. It had been considered, for instance, that it should be stated that parents had some say concerning whether their children should be sent to State schools or private schools.

MR. KAMINSKY (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) recalled that the wording of the paragraph had never been discussed in detail. After the existing wording had been adopted, the USSR representative had made his observations, which had convinced members of the Sub-Committee that the wording was not very good, that it enunciated an obsolete principle, and that it must be clarified.

MR. RYCKMANS (Belgium) said he would vote against the proposed amendment. The article was clearly intended to confirm parents’ priority over the State or organizations other than the family in matters of education. The draft declaration nowhere limited the authority of parents or determined when it should cease to be exercised. Naturally no one could compel an adult to enter an educational establishment against his wish; the article could therefore apply only to children under age.

MRS. CORBET (United Kingdom) opposed the amendment. There was a danger that the introduction of any change would entail material alterations of substance.

MR. CASSIN (France) pointed out that the existing text had the advantage of flexibility; it might refer to children up to 14, 18, or 21 years of age. The introduction of the word “minor” would make it refer specifically, at any rate in France, to persons under 21 years of age, and might thus have the effect of curtailing the freedom of children.

MR. ENCINAS (Peru) moved the closure of the debate.

The motion was adopted.

THE CHAIRMAN put paragraph 3 of article 23 to the vote.

Paragraph 3 was adopted.

Article 24

THE CHAIRMAN stated that it had been decided to place article 24 between articles 21 and 22.

MR. AIKMAN (New Zealand) suggested that the word “including” should be substituted for the word “to” between the words “leisure” and “reasonable”.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) and MR. SAINT-LOT (Haiti) thought that the addition of the word “including” in no way improved the text of article 24, which they considered to be quite clear already.

[871]

MRS. CORBET (United Kingdom) stated that her delegation welcomed the amendment of New Zealand, which laid emphasis on the right to leisure.

THE CHAIRMAN put the New Zealand amendment to the vote.

The amendment was adopted by 15 votes to 12, with 12 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put article 24, as it had just been amended, to the vote.

Article 24, as amended, was adopted.

Articles 25 and 26

THE CHAIRMAN recalled that slight drafting changes had been suggested in respect to the French texts of articles 25 and 26. He put the articles, thus amended, to the vote.

Articles 25 and 26, as amended in respect of the French texts, were successively adopted.

Article 27

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) considered that the wording of the French text of paragraph 1 was ambiguous; he asked whether it meant that an individual had duties and obligations towards society because society existed only for the purpose of enabling him to develop his personality.

MRS. CORBET (United Kingdom) stated that she had noticed in paragraph 2 that the term “prescribed” corresponded to the word établies in French; “prescribed” gave the impression of a written order, and was therefore not appropriate. She suggested the word “determined” in its place.

MR. CASSIN (France) confirmed the opinion of the representative of the United Kingdom, and informed the Cuban representative that his interpretation of paragraph 1 was correct, since society established the environment which permitted the individual to develop his personality.

THE CHAIRMAN stated that unless there were any objections, the United Kingdom amendment, substituting the word “determined” for the word “prescribed” in paragraph 2 of article 27, would be considered adopted.

It was so agreed.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) stated that, with all due respect for the interpretation of paragraph 1 by the representative of France, he considered that the wording of that paragraph was ambiguous; it might well be understood that an individual had no duties towards a society which did not ensure his free development.

That was his delegation’s interpretation of that paragraph, and he wished it to be recorded.

MR. AIKMAN (New Zealand), while expressing respect for the opinion of the representative of Lebanon, desired to associate himself with the views of the representative of France.

THE CHAIRMAN put article 27, as amended in respect of the English text, to the vote.

Article 27, as amended in respect of the English text, was adopted.

Article 28

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) declared that the Sub-Committee had been unable to devote the necessary attention to article 28, and that the text before the Committee might be wrongly interpreted. From the wording, it might be deduced that a State, group or individual had the right to disregard the provisions of the declaration. That right was not recognized in the declaration. The Lebanese delegation could not accept a text which could allow of such an interpretation.

He suggested substituting the words “can be invoked” for the words “shall imply”.

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) stated that her delegation approved the text as it stood; she thought it unnecessary at that time to attempt to state in new words what was already perfectly clear.

MR. CASSIN (France) observed that the Lebanese proposal eliminated the concept of the law, which was very important.

MR. WATT (Australia) agreed with the United States representative that the text as it stood was satisfactory. He felt that it would be a mistake to attempt to redraft it hastily at that stage.

THE CHAIRMAN stated that due time would be given to the discussion of the question, and requested that the Lebanese amendment should be prepared in English and French in time for distribution at the meeting to be held the same evening.

He asked the French, Lebanese and Australian representatives to agree upon the wording of the Lebanese amendment before 8.30 that evening.

The meeting rose at 6:40 p.m.

A/C.3/SR.178<sup>155</sup>

6 December 1948

Summary Record of the Hundred and Seventy-Eighth Meeting [of the Third Committee]

Held at the Palais de Chaillot, Paris, on Monday,
6 December 1948, at 8.30 p.m.

Chairman: MR. CHARLES MALIK (Lebanon).

108. Draft, universal declaration of human rights (E/800): report of Sub-Committee 4 (A/C.3/400 and A/C.3/400/Rev.1) (continued)

MR. CONTOUMAS (Greece) submitted a new text (A/C.3/406) for article 28, designed to meet the Lebanese representative’s point that the article should contain a categorical statement (177th meeting). The new text read as follows:

“Nothing in this Declaration may be interpreted as implying for any State, group or person the right to engage in any activity or to perform any act aimed at the destruction of any of the rights and freedoms prescribed herein.”

[873]

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote a proposal that in the English text of the amendment the words “the right to engage” should be replaced by the words “any right to engage”, and that the word “prescribed” should be replaced by the words “set forth”; and that in the French text the word saurait should be replaced by the word peut and the words le droit by the words un droit quelconque.

The proposal was adopted.

THE CHAIRMAN put the amendment, thus amended, to the vote.

The amendment was adopted.

THE CHAIRMAN put article 28, as amended, to the vote.

Article 28, as amended, was adopted.

Additional Article

MR. AIKMAN (New Zealand) suggested that in the additional article contained in the draft declaration of the Third Committee, the word “proclaimed” might be changed to “set forth”, which should be used throughout the declaration in preference to the words “prescribed”, “proclaimed” or “set out”.

It was so agreed.

MR. CAMPOS ORTIZ (Mexico), MR. CHANG (China) and MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) suggested drafting changes whereby the word également, in the French text, would be replaced by the words en pleine égalité, and the English text would read as follows:

“The rights set forth in this Declaration apply equally to all inhabitants of Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories.”

THE CHAIRMAN put the additional article, as amended, to the vote.

The additional article, as amended, was adopted.

Arrangements of Articles

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) thought that the place of certain articles should be changed. As a first step, which could be put to the vote separately, he suggested placing article 14 immediately before article 10, in order to bring together two articles which touched on the subject of the family.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) remarked that it might be better that article 14 should follow article 10; the transition from the purely legal matters dealt with in articles 7, 8 and 9 to an article dealing entirely with marriage and the family would be too abrupt.

MR. WATT (Australia), speaking as Rapporteur of Sub-Committee 4, explained that the Cuban representative had wished to group the various articles in such a fashion that fundamental rights would form one section, economic and social rights another, legal rights a third, and so on. The Sub-Committee however, had been unable to agree which rights were fundamental, and had consequently contented itself with altering the position of article 24 alone.

Speaking as the representative of Australia, Mr. Watt requested the Cuban representative to explain the broad general lines of the changes he [874] had in mind. The Committee could not consider separate suggestions without having an idea of the general order proposed.

MR. CHANG (China) called attention to the fact that various bodies had worked on the declaration for two years, and that all the Governments had had an opportunity of considering it and making comments. The order in which the articles appeared in the declaration had stood the test of time. The document possessed an organic unity which should not be tampered with lightly, at the very end of the Committee's work.

With regard to the Cuban proposal, if article 14 were inserted between articles 7, 8 and 9, which granted purely legal rights, and article 10, which dealt only incidentally with the family and called for legal protection with respect to a number of other matters, a logical sequence would be destroyed.

The Lebanese suggestion was equally unacceptable since articles 11, 12 and 13, dealing with freedom of movement, asylum, and nationality, were much more closely associated in meaning with article 10 than was article 14.

He pleaded with the Committee not to alter the order of any of the articles save for good and sufficient reasons.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) remarked that his delegation, too, had followed the gradual development of the declaration for two years and had studied the comments of the various Governments; it had, moreover, taken part in the Bogotá conference, where the subject of human rights had been considered at length. In the light of its experience, it found the declaration admirable in detail, but lacking coherence as a whole.

He recalled that the Cuban delegation had raised the question of re-arranging the articles at the very beginning of the current session (93rd meeting), as well as in the Sub-Committee; it was its last opportunity to press a matter to which it attached considerable importance.

It was necessary to assign a prominent position to those rights which deserved the greatest attention on the part of the reader. For that reason, he wished to propose three changes: article 16, dealing with religion, should follow directly upon article 3; articles 20 to 25 inclusive, dealing with social rights, should come immediately after article 4 (a); and article 14 should be placed between articles 9 and 10.

There were serious reasons for those changes. In particular, social rights, which were the achievement of the twentieth century, should, in a twentieth century declaration, precede legal rights, acquired long ago and repeated in a number of similar documents. There was no doubt but that social rights deserved a place of honour, nor could there be any doubt but that an even more prominent place should be assigned to freedom of conscience and religion.

COUNT CARTON DE WIART (Belgium) agreed with the representative of China that the order [875] in the Sub-Committee's text was logical; he had no objection to it.

The Lebanese representative's proposal for the amendment of the order suggested by the Cuban delegation had the disadvantage of placing an article on marriage between one prohibiting interference with privacy and another on freedom of movement.

Recognizing that the declaration could not, in the nature of things, be finally perfect, he was prepared to agree with the Chinese representative's defence of the Sub-Committee's arrangement.

MR. CASSIN (France) agreed in general with the Chinese representative. The two initial articles stated general principles, within the framework of which individual rights were defined. There was a regular progression from individual rights to social rights. Between those two categories came, first, a group of articles dealing with the physical protection of the individual, then a group dealing with the relation of man to his fellows and to things – family, residence, frontiers, nationality and, finally, property; then came articles dealing with the great public freedoms, including freedom of religion, and their external manifestations in such forms as freedom of expression; and lastly, articles 20 to 26 provided guarantees of social security.

Had the intention been to base the order on contemporary values or on some abstract theory, it might well have been differently arranged; from the point of view of timeliness, for example, the articles on social rights would certainly have been given priority. The right to life, in Mr. Cassin's view, should come first in any case. Economic and social rights were almost as important as the right to freedom of thought, but to place them in the second group would break the chain of logic. He had originally thought that article 27 might be inserted between articles 2 and 3, but had abandoned that idea because the articles on social rights were very well placed at the end, as the logical development from the articles on individual rights.

He agreed with the representatives of Cuba, Lebanon and Belgium that the articles dealing with the family might be badly placed; the broader group should not come first. If the representatives of Cuba and Lebanon could agree on the arrangement of those articles, he would be prepared to support them. Article 6 defined relations between man and society and so could be better placed between articles 26 and 27; it was extremely important not to confuse the rights therein set out with the ordinary course of justice. The articles on freedom of thought and freedom of expression should be grouped with the public freedoms. The main alterations which he suggested, therefore, involved only articles 6 and 14.

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) maintained that all articles in the declaration were of equal importance regardless of their position. The important point was that the rights should be [876] grouped in such a way that they would be intelligible to the person who reads the document. She therefore regretted that the Cuban representative had proposed a change in the order. The declaration should make its impact as a whole; there was no point in attempting to give priority to one or other article.

MR. DE ATHAYDE (Brazil) recalled that the Brazilian amendment (A/C.3/215) to article 1 and the Netherlands amendment (A/C.3/219) to the preamble, the purpose of which had been to give religion its due place in the declaration, had had to be withdrawn by their sponsors.

He therefore supported the Cuban proposal, which, he felt, gave the Committee a last opportunity to retrieve the regrettable error it had made in failing to accept the substance of those amendments.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) complained that there appeared to be no methodological plan in the arrangement. Too little stress had been laid on the rights of man as a toiler and on his place in society; man's role as the creator of wealth had been placed last. The general viewpoint was unduly individualistic and thus unrealistic. The views of the Cuban representative were somewhat closer to reality; they at least made a proper distinction between reality and abstract theory.

With regard to the additional article, its best place would be immediately following article 2, because it elaborated the provisions which would give to declaration a universal application.

MR. WATT (Australia) supported the Sub-Committee's text because he could see equal advantages and disadvantages in all the proposed changes.

If, as the Cuban representative had suggested, article 16 were placed after article 3, it would be divorced from article 17, whereas articles 16 and 17 had a natural affinity. The article would gain more prominence but the logical chain between the articles dealing with the person would be broken.

Similar considerations applied to the proposal to associate articles 10 and 14.

He agreed with the representative of France that there was a natural progression in the articles as they stood and with the United States representative that the order was not as important as the total impact.

The objection to the French proposal for the rearrangement of article 6 was that that article was closely linked to articles 7 and 8, dealing as they did with legal status.

There was some cogency in the USSR proposal that the additional article should be placed near the beginning, although it might be more appropriate as a second paragraph to article 2.

MR. CHANG (China) suggested a rearrangement of certain articles with a view to ensuring that there was no break in the organic progression [877] from articles on the right to life and the right to liberty to articles on the protection and enjoyment of those rights.

He agreed with the Brazilian representative that priority should be given to article 16, which should follow article 3; he felt, however, that articles 17, 18 and 19, which all dealt with the rights of the individual in relation to society, should continue to follow immediately upon article 16.

He would not object to the USSR proposal concerning the additional article if it met with the Committee's approval.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) agreed with the representative of Australia that articles 16 and 17 were closely connected and with the Brazilian representative that article 16 should be given an important place immediately after article 3. He agreed that all the articles of the declaration were equally important, but believed that that change would tend to give a driving force to the initial part of the declaration.

He would accept the Lebanese suggestion that article 14 should be placed immediately after article 10.

MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) agreed with the representative of Cuba that articles 16 and 17 should be moved forward to follow article 3. It was the logical and intelligible position and, moreover, it followed the lines of the four freedoms enunciated by President Roosevelt; that would strengthen the declaration.

He was prepared to accept the proposal of the representative of the Soviet Union concerning the additional article.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the USSR proposal for the insertion of the additional article as a new article 3. He made it clear that if that proposal were adopted, the remaining articles would be renumbered accordingly.

The proposal was adopted by 34 votes to none, with 3 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN, recalling that the Cuban proposal for the insertion of articles 16 and 17 after the additional article had been supported by the representatives of Lebanon and Brazil, put the proposal to the vote.

The proposal was adopted by 13 votes to 12, with 11 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the Chinese proposal for the insertion of articles 18 and 19 after articles 16 and 17 in their new position.

*The proposal was adopted by 21 votes to 3, with 12 abstentions.
It was agreed that article 4a should become article 5.*

MR. ANZE MATIENZO (Bolivia), MR. CASSIN (France) and MR. CAMPOS ORTIZ (Mexico) protested that the arrangement of the articles had become confused.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) and MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) called for closure of the debate.

[878]

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) and MR. CASSIN (France) opposed the motion for closure, emphasizing the need for fuller discussion.

THE CHAIRMAN put the motion for closure to the vote.

The motion was not adopted, 17 votes having been cast in favour and 17 against, with 2 abstentions.

MR. SAINT-LOT (Haiti), supported by MR. CASSIN (France), suggested a way out of the difficulty. The Committee should vote, by a two-thirds majority, for the reconsideration of the decisions on the Cuban and Chinese proposals. The adoption of the proposal of the Soviet Union had clearly been satisfactory and had met the intentions of the Committee.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) supported the Haitian proposal.

He suggested that a small sub-committee should be set up to clarify the situation.

MR. CHANG (China) withdrew his earlier suggestions. He pointed out that the new position of articles 16 and 17 had caused the confusion.

He supported the Haitian proposal for the reconsideration of the Committee's decisions.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) offered to withdraw all his other proposals on the understanding that articles 16 and 17 were retained in their new position.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile), MR. CHANG (China) and MRS. CORBET (United Kingdom) urged that a single vote should be taken on the question of reconsidering the Committee's decisions on the arrangement of articles 16, 17, 18 and 19, which, they considered, represented a unified whole.

THE CHAIRMAN ruled that, since two distinct decisions had been taken, two separate votes were required on the question of reconsidering those decisions.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) and MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon) supported the Chairman's ruling.

MR. SAINT-LOT (Haiti) suggested that the vote to reconsider the decision on articles 16 and 17 might be taken first; if the required two-thirds majority were not obtained, those who wished to ensure that the four articles were not separated could vote against the reconsideration of the decision on articles 18 and 19.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) could not agree with those who held that the four articles were inseparable. Articles 16 and 17 dealt with individual rights, while articles 18 and 19 set forth the rights of the individual as a member of society.

In order to facilitate the work of the Committee, he suggested that a vote might be taken, by roll-call, on whether the four articles should be kept together. If the result of the vote was in the affirmative, he would withdraw all his proposals for rearrangement. He called attention, however, [879] to the fact that such a vote would mean that freedom of religion would not appear in the declaration in the place to which it was entitled.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the proposal that articles 16, 17, 18 and 19 should not be separated.

A vote was taken by roll-call, as follows:

New Zealand, having been drawn by lot by the Chairman, was called upon to vote first:

In favour: New Zealand, Norway, Peru, Sweden, Turkey, United Kingdom, United States of America, Venezuela, Afghanistan, Australia, Canada, China, Denmark, France, Greece, Haiti.

Against: Syria, Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil, Cuba, Lebanon, Netherlands.

Abstaining: Philippines, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Yugoslavia, Belgium, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Chile, Czechoslovakia, Dominican Republic, Honduras, India, Iran, Mexico.

The proposal was adopted by 16 votes to 7, with 13 abstentions.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) thereupon withdrew his proposals with respect to rearranging the order of the articles in the declaration.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the proposal for the reconsideration of the decision on articles 16 and 17.

The proposal was adopted by 23 votes to none, with 10 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put to the vote the proposal for the reconsideration of the decision on articles 18 and 19.

The proposal was adopted by 25 votes to none, with 8 abstentions.

MR. SAINT-LOT (Haiti) moved the adoption of the order proposed by the Subcommittee, with two changes: the insertion of the additional article as article 3, and of article 24 between articles 21 and 22.

The proposal was adopted by 27 votes to 6, with one abstention.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) stated that he had voted against the Haitian proposal because he found the order of the articles unsatisfactory. The declaration failed to assign due prominence to freedom of religion and to social rights and could not be called a coherent whole.

Vote on the Draft Declaration of Human Rights as a Whole

THE CHAIRMAN said that since the Committee had adopted separately the substance and the arrangement of the draft universal declaration of human rights, he would put to the vote the text as a whole.

A vote by roll-call had been requested by the representative of Chile.

A vote was taken by roll-call, as follows:

The Philippines, having been drawn by lot by the Chairman, was called upon to vote first:

In favour: Philippines, Sweden, Syria, Turkey, United Kingdom, United States of America, [880] Venezuela, Afghanistan, Argentina, Australia, Belgium, Bolivia, Brazil, Chile, China, Cuba, Denmark, Dominican Republic, France, Greece, Haiti, Honduras, India, Iran, Lebanon, Mexico, Netherlands, New Zealand, Peru.

Abstaining: Poland, Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic, Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, Yugoslavia, Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, Canada, Czechoslovakia.

The draft universal declaration of human rights, as amended, was adopted by 29 votes to none, with 7 abstentions.

Draft Resolution Submitted by the Delegation of France (A/C.3/381) concerning the Universal Declaration of Human Rights

MR. CASSIN (France) introduced his draft resolution (A/C.3/381) and drew attention to certain corrections which should be made in the document. Only one correction, the substitution of the word “publicize” for “promulgate”, in paragraph 1 of the operative part, applied to the English text.

MR. DE ATHAYDE (Brazil), MR. ANZE MATIENZO (Bolivia) and MR. SAINT-LOT (Haiti) warmly supported the French draft resolution.

MR. CASSIN (France) accepted the Cuban amendments (A/C.3/402) and the suggestion of the representative of the Dominican Republic that words “of the world” should be inserted after “non-governmental organizations” in paragraph 3 of the draft resolution.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) drew attention to two corrections which should be made in the English text of his amendments (A/C.3/402) to the French draft resolution; in paragraph (a), the word “peoples” should be substituted for “classes of society”, and in paragraph (b) the word “regime” should be changed to “status”.

MRS. CORBET (United Kingdom) and MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) warmly supported the French draft resolution, but felt that the financial implications of paragraph (c) of the Cuban amendment should be carefully considered by the Committee.

MR. CHANG (China) suggested that paragraph (c) of the Cuban amendment should be changed to read as follows:

“... not only in the official languages, but also, using every means at his disposal, in all possible languages”.

It was so agreed.

At the suggestion of MR. AZKOUL (Lebanon), MR. CASSIN (France) inserted the word “principally” after “expounded” in paragraph 1 of his draft resolution.

MR. KAYALY (Syria) suggested the deletion of the second paragraph of the preamble of the French draft resolution.

It was so agreed.

THE CHAIRMAN put the French draft resolution, as amended, to the vote.
[881]

The draft resolution, as amended, was adopted by 28 votes to none, with 8 abstentions.

Draft Resolution Submitted by the Delegation of New Zealand (A/C.3/405) concerning the Universal Declaration of Human Rights

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) felt that no vote could be taken on the New Zealand draft resolution (A/C.3/405), because it implied that the Committee had already discussed and decided upon the covenant on human rights and measures of implementation. As no such discussion had taken place, the only resolution that could be passed by the Committee would be to the effect that the General Assembly, not having had time in which to discuss those questions, referred them again to the Commission on Human Rights.

In any case, there was no time at the current meeting to discuss the substance of the New Zealand draft resolution in a satisfactory manner.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) could not accept the USSR representative's point of view. The decision that the international bill of human rights should include the declaration, the covenant and measures of implementation had been taken by the Commission on Human Rights in December 1947.<sup>1</sup> Furthermore, that question had been discussed in the Third Committee at the time of the decision to examine the draft declaration (94th meeting).

MR. CAMPOS ORTIZ (Mexico) agreed with the Chilean representative, but wondered whether it would be advisable to adopt the New Zealand draft resolution. In his opinion, the third paragraph was unsatisfactory because it emphasized the fact that the declaration would have very little weight without the covenant and measures of implementation.

MR. AIKMAN (New Zealand) recalled the position his Government had taken in regard to the declaration. It had originally been decided that the bill should be in three parts, to be adopted simultaneously. His delegation had reluctantly agreed to discuss the declaration separately and had voted for its adoption, but felt strongly that the whole purpose of the bill would be lost if emphasis were not laid on the fact that the declaration was insufficient without the covenant and measures of implementation.

In reply to the representative of the Soviet Union, he pointed out that both the first and the third paragraphs of his draft resolution were based on the provisions of reports of the Commission on Human Rights. The resolution was a simple one and merely requested the Commission to continue to give priority in its work to the preparation of the covenant and measures of implementation.

MR. KAMINSKY (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) felt that the Committee was not obliged to consider the New Zealand draft resolution in connexion with the declaration and that it would be preferable to consider it in connexion with

Chapter III of the report of the Economic and Social Council.

He therefore moved the adjournment of the debate.

THE CHAIRMAN agreed that the New Zealand draft resolution could be discussed in connexion with chapter III of the report of the Economic and Social Council, but felt that the Committee owed it to the New Zealand representative and to the other representatives who shared his point of view to attempt to come to some conclusion at the current meetings. There was always a danger that the Committee would not have sufficient time to complete its consideration of chapter III at the current session of the Assembly.

He put the motion for the adjournment of the debate to the vote.

The motion was rejected by 20 votes to 11, with 6 abstentions.

MR. SAINT-LOT (Haiti) considered that the operative part of the New Zealand draft resolution was dangerous because it would weaken the effect of the declaration. It would not be appropriate for the Assembly to recognize the inoperative character of the declaration, as that could be construed as exonerating States from any moral obligation to fulfil its provisions.

Subject to that criticism, however, he was generally in favour of the draft resolution.

MR. WATT (Australia) had always hoped for a resolution, or at least an expression of views, concerning the covenant and measures of implementation, because of the indisputable importance of the question. Should it prove impossible to adopt a resolution at that meeting, the matter should be raised during the discussion of the declaration in the General Assembly.

MR. CHANG (China) supported the views of the representatives of Haiti and Mexico and proposed that the third paragraph of the New Zealand draft resolution should be deleted.

MRS. CORBET (United Kingdom) associated herself with those representatives who considered that the covenant and measures of implementation were the important parts of the Bill of Human Rights. The easier part of the task had been completed and the emphasis had to be placed on the difficult work ahead.

She could accept the Chinese representative's suggestion for the deletion of the third paragraph of the New Zealand draft resolution, or the substitution of the words "renders desirable" for "necessitates" in the third paragraph of the resolution.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) felt that the adoption of the New Zealand draft resolution would have the effect of killing the declaration.

He again suggested that consideration should be given to his proposal that the draft covenant and measures of implementation should be referred back to the Commission on Human Rights.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) agreed with the Haitian and Mexican representatives that the New Zealand draft resolution would not kill, but [883] would seriously weaken, the declaration. Under the terms of resolution 151(VII) of the Economic and Social Council, it was necessary that the covenant and measures of implementation should be considered, as well as the declaration.

He therefore proposed the adoption of the following resolution:

"The General Assembly,

Considering that neither the Commission on Human Rights nor the Economic and Social Council have been able to complete the consideration of those parts of the report of the Drafting Committee relating to a covenant on human rights and to measures of implementation.

Takes note of the remainder of the report of the Commission on Human Rights and sends back to the Economic and Social Council those parts which refer to the covenant and measures of implementation, so that their study can be completed and a report submitted to the fourth regular session of the General Assembly."

MR. CASSIN (France) was prepared to support the Chilean draft with the addition of the first paragraph of the New Zealand draft resolution.

MR. SAINT-LOT (Haiti) also suggested a new text, which, unlike the Chilean draft, would retain the operative part of the New Zealand draft resolution, but in a form which would not have the effect of weakening the declaration.

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) was prepared to accept any of the proposals which had been made concerning the New Zealand draft resolution. The fact that the New Zealand resolution might be interpreted as weakening the moral effect of the declaration was a valid criticism, but it was also necessary to make it clear that there was more work to be done after the declaration had been adopted.

MR. AQUINO (Philippines) agreed that the New Zealand draft resolution perhaps overemphasized the fact that the work on the international bill of human rights was not yet completed, but felt that some such enabling resolution was necessary to lend continuity to the work of the Commission on Human Rights.

MR. KAMINSKY (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) urged the Committee not to adopt a hasty resolution and again moved the adjournment of the debate.

THE CHAIRMAN put the motion for the adjournment of the debate to the vote.

The motion was rejected by 20 votes to 11, with 6 abstentions.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) said he would support the New Zealand draft resolution if the second and third paragraphs were deleted. He would also be prepared to accept the Chilean draft.

AS MR. KAMINSKY (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) insisted on seeing the Chilean [884] draft resolution in writing, MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile), in an effort to speed up the work of the Committee, withdrew his draft.

MR. AIKMAN (New Zealand) withdrew the third paragraph of his draft resolution and asked that the other three paragraphs should be put to the vote separately.

THE CHAIRMAN put the first paragraph of the New Zealand draft resolution to the vote.

The first paragraph was adopted by 19 votes to 10, with 4 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put the second paragraph of the New Zealand draft resolution to the vote.

The second paragraph was rejected by 25 votes to 5, with 3 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put the fourth paragraph of the New Zealand draft resolution to the vote.

The fourth paragraph was adopted by 20 votes to none, with 10 abstentions.

THE CHAIRMAN put the New Zealand draft resolution as a whole to the vote.

The draft resolution was adopted by 22 votes to none, with 10 abstentions.

The meeting rose at 3:10 a.m.

Draft International Declaration of Human Rights Report of the Third Committee

Rapporteur: Mr. E. St. Lot (Haiti)

1. The Economic and Social Council, acting under Articles 62 and 68 of the Charter of the United Nations, established a Commission of eighteen members under the name of Commission on Human Rights; its main task was to prepare a draft international declaration of fundamental human rights and freedoms and a draft international covenant for the application of such rights and freedoms, as well as to study measures of implementing both these documents.

2. The Commission on Human Rights, after devoting three sessions and close on two years to this work partly at Lake Success and partly at Geneva, submitted to the Economic and Social Council a draft declaration and some advance drafts of an international convention.

3. The General Assembly, at its 142nd meeting held on 24 September 1948, referred to the Third Committee item 13 of the supplementary list of agenda items for the third regular session; this item concerned the draft declaration and related documents.

4. The Third Committee, at its 94th meeting, decided to consider only the draft declaration, as the other two documents (the covenant and measures of implementation) were not yet in a state suitable for consideration.

5. The Third Committee spent eighty-four meetings in considering and discussing the draft prepared by the Commission on Human Rights. Most of the articles were adopted by unanimous votes. Representatives exercised their rights to explain their votes to a large extent and thus were able either to enter reservations or to indicate the meaning of their votes or the meaning which they attached to certain expressions. The summary records of these meetings (given in documents A/C.3/SR.88 to 116, A/C.3/SR.119 to 170 and A/C.3/SR.174 to 178) mention all these statements and reservations.

6. In view of the fact that a considerable number of amendments were adopted and having regard to the difficulty of making the resulting texts correspond exactly in the official languages and to the wish [2] to introduce a logical order, the Third Committee set up a Sub-Committee to consider the Declaration of Human Rights as a whole, including the twenty-nine articles and the preamble, solely from the point of view of arrangement, consistency, uniformity and style.

7. The report of the Sub-Committee was considered, discussed and adopted in the course of the 174th to 178th meetings of the Third Committee, resulting in the adoption of the following draft Universal Declaration of Human Rights (see text under A) which is recommended by the Third Committee of the General Assembly for adoption.

8. A draft resolution (resolution B) on the right of petition was adopted by the Third Committee at its 160th meeting.

9. A draft resolution (resolution C) concerning the fate of minorities was adopted at the 163rd meeting.

10. A draft resolution (resolution D) concerning publicity to be given to the Universal Declaration of Human Rights was adopted at the 178th meeting.

11. A draft resolution (resolution E) concerning the early consideration by the Economic and Social Council of the draft Covenant and measures of implementation was adopted at the 178th meeting.

12. The Third Committee therefore recommends for adoption by the General Assembly the following five texts:

International Bill of Human Rights

United Kingdom: Amendment to article 3 of the draft Declaration proposed by the Third Committee (A/777)

Delete Article 3 and substitute the following text as paragraph 2 of Article 2:

“Furthermore, no distinction shall be made on the basis of the political, jurisdictional or international status of the country or territory to which a person belongs, whether this territory be an independent, Trust or Non-Self-Governing territory.”

A/C.3/SR.179<sup>156</sup>7 December 1948

Summary Record of the Hundred and Seventy-Ninth Meeting
[of the Third Committee]

Held at the Palais de Chaillot, Paris, on Tuesday,
7 December 1948, at 3:35 p.m.

Chairman: MR. CHARLES MALIK (Lebanon).

109. Draft universal declaration of human rights (continued)

Mr. CHARAR (Afghanistan) expressed gratification that a universal declaration of human rights was becoming a reality. As the representative of a Moslem country, however, he found it necessary to state that certain articles in the declaration did not easily conform to the religious standards of his people.

He therefore reserved the right to bring those articles into harmony with Moslem principles, which were the basis of the political, social and economic existence of the people of Afghanistan.

MRS. CORBET (United Kingdom) referred to the declaration as a document of the greatest moral force, and as an important step towards early completion of the International Bill of Human Rights. When surveying its work, it was natural, of course, for the Committee to feel that it might have done better. It must not be forgotten, however, that the declaration was an international document, representing a common denominator of agreement among most of the nations in the world; and in view of the different systems of Government, laws and national philosophies represented in the Committee, the declaration was no small achievement.

The representative of the United Kingdom wished to make definite reservations regarding the additional article, which had become article 3 (178th meeting). That article was thoroughly unsatisfactory and seriously weakened article 2. The United Kingdom delegation would therefore reserve its right to propose, in the General Assembly, that the Lebanese amendment (A/C.3/404) to paragraph 2 of article 2 should replace article 3 and become paragraph 2 of article 2. The text of the amendment was as follows:

“Furthermore, no distinction shall be made on the basis of the political, jurisdictional or international status of the country or territory to which a person belongs, whether this territory is an independent, Trust or Non-Self-Governing Territory.”

The Lebanese amendment contained all the substance of the original paragraph, but would extend its scope; moreover, any ambiguities which might be contained in the Cuban amendment (A/C.3/224) would be avoided. Paragraph 2 would thus mention not only Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories, but also other territories, and its provisions would therefore be of universal application.

Mrs. Corbet also referred to the question raised at the 178th meeting of moving article 16 to what had been termed a more prominent position in the declaration. The United Kingdom delegation did not consider any one place in the declaration to be more prominent than another; it might indeed be said that the most important articles were those concerning social rights, which came at the end of the document and formed a climax. Mrs. Corbet had been prepared to accept articles 16 to 19 as grouped, because they formed a logical sequence. She would also have been prepared to follow the Lebanese suggestion concerning article 6, which could be considered as a general introductory article to the articles dealing with legal rights. She had been willing to agree that the article on religion should be placed among the first articles of the declaration; the United Kingdom delegation did not hold religion in less esteem than did other delegations. She wished to point out, however, that that article did not deal exclusively with religion; it also covered freedom of thought and should not therefore be separated from the three articles which immediately followed it.

The United Kingdom delegation had abstained from voting on the French draft resolution (A/C.3/381) as amended by Cuba (A/C.3/402), not because it did not agree that the text of the declaration should be disseminated, but because it was not satisfied with the financial implications and the instructions given to the Secretary-General in regard to printing the text in all languages.

The United Kingdom representative wished to assure the representative of Afghanistan that she fully respected and sympathized with the reason which had prompted his statement.

MR. AIKMAN (New Zealand) recalled that in the general debate the representative of New Zealand had expressed her country's views as to the [886] future of the declaration, giving the reasons for which she had then considered it preferable that the declaration should not be adopted at the current session of the General Assembly.

The New Zealand representative had also suggested the simultaneous adoption of the declaration and the covenant. Since then, the Committee had spent nearly two months examining the draft declaration prepared by the Human Rights Commission. In spite of difficulties encountered, all members had had an opportunity of expressing their views on the vital subject under discussion, and much mutual good will and understanding had been shown. The resulting declaration was not perfect, partly because the draft was unnecessarily long and inconsistent, and partly because the procedural suggestion of the New Zealand delegation had not been adopted.

In view, however, of the importance of the declaration and the amount of work already expended on it, it would be unfortunate if the declaration could not be proclaimed to the world at the current session of the Assembly. It was for that reason that his delegation had voted in favour of the declaration. His Government unreservedly accepted its obligations under Article 55 of the Charter for the promotion of universal respect for and observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms.

The New Zealand draft resolution (A/C.3/405), submitted at the 178th meeting, requesting the Human Rights Commission to give priority to the work on the draft covenant and draft measures of implementation, demonstrated the importance his delegation attached to the work. Like other delegations, the New Zealand delegation had always held the view that the declaration, as distinct from the covenant, was not a legally binding document, but stated simply the essence of each fundamental right and freedom. It was a common standard of achievement for all peoples and all nations, and for that reason he had been glad to support the French draft resolution. The covenant, not the declaration, would create legal obligations, and must be regarded as the more important document.

Since the Committee had decided to recommend the adoption of the declaration separately from the covenant, Mr. Aikman wished to reemphasize that the New Zealand Government would not consider that the United Nations had fulfilled its task until a covenant and effective measures of implementation had been adopted by the General Assembly. New Zealand would continue to participate actively in discussions and strive for their successful outcome.

MR. THURROTT (Canada) stated that the abstention of the Canadian delegation did not indicate a light approach to so important a document. Canada had given and would continue to give sober consideration to the declaration and its implementation.

The Canadian delegation reserved the right to clarify its position in plenary meeting of the General Assembly.

[887]

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) explained why his delegation had abstained from voting on the declaration. Throughout the discussions the USSR delegation had made detailed statements concerning the unsatisfactory aspects of the draft and had indicated a number of important principles on which it should have been based; unfortunately most of its amendments had been rejected, and the text adopted at the 178th meeting was practically identical with the original draft.

The delegation of the Soviet Union therefore submitted the following draft resolution (A/C.3/407):

“Whereas the text of the declaration considered by the Third Committee requires serious improvements in a whole series of articles,

“The Third Committee

“Requests the General Assembly to postpone the final adoption of the declaration of human rights to the next session of the General Assembly.”

The USSR delegation would reserve the right to submit appropriate amendments and proposals to the Assembly when discussion of the declaration took place.

MR. KAMINSKY (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic) stated that he had abstained from voting on the draft declaration because he found it unsatisfactory. It did not guarantee human rights since it did not provide for their implementation; moreover, it did not recognize the right to the protection of national culture.

He considered that articles 11 and 12, in the Sub-Committee's enumeration, constituted a violation of the sovereign rights of States. Moreover, no provision was made for the struggle against fascism; that was particularly unfortunate at such a time.

The delegation of the Byelorussian SSR therefore found it necessary to support the draft resolution of the Soviet Union for the postponement of the final adoption of the declaration.

MR. DEMCHENKO (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) stated that his delegation had abstained from voting on the declaration on the same grounds as those given by the USSR representative.

It also endorsed the proposal of the Soviet Union that the adoption of the draft declaration should be deferred until the following session of the General Assembly.

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) felt that the adoption of the declaration would be the one great achievement of the session and maintained that there should be no question of reconsidering the decision taken by the Committee.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) stated that the object of the USSR draft resolution was to improve the text of the declaration.

The United Kingdom representative had mentioned certain improvements she thought desirable, and similar remarks had been made by other delegations. Further, a number of important questions, such as those concerning nationality and national minorities, had been before the Committee without a decision having been reached; there was not a word in the declaration about the protection of minorities. The question had, however, been discussed by the Committee and had been referred to the Sub-Commission on the Prevention of Discrimination on the grounds that the documentation available was not sufficient.

The Committee had not specified that the adoption of the declaration must take place during the current session of the General Assembly. Only four days remained for the discussion of innumerable questions.

MR. AQUINO (Philippines) considered that the proposal of the Soviet Union was ill advised; it constituted a challenge to the good faith of the members of the Committee. Two months' labour had been expended on the declaration. A bill of human rights had long been needed by mankind and was necessary for the foundation of a common world order.

It was clear that the USSR delegation considered the declaration unworthy of approval only because it wished to make changes in that document.

The representative of the Soviet Union had stated that the declaration did not provide for the protection of minorities, but the majority of the Committee had agreed that that was a separate question, and it was even doubtful whether it came within the province of the declaration.

The Philippine delegation would vote against the USSR draft resolution and strongly urged that no step should be taken to cause any delay in the adoption of the declaration.

MR. CASSIN (France), referring to the USSR proposal, stated that his delegation felt that the Third Committee's decision on the draft universal declaration should be upheld; that text, which represented the work of the United Nations during three years, should be put to the General Assembly for its decision.

No document based on compromise could be perfect. France, like the USSR, had seen many of its amendments rejected by the Committee. It was not, however, a question of particular amendments, but of the draft declaration as a whole. Further consideration of the document would only weaken it.

The Committee should complete its work and face its responsibilities. By adopting the declaration at the current session, the General Assembly would enable the Commission, which was scheduled to meet in April 1949, to concentrate upon the draft covenant and the draft measures of implementation, thus consolidating the work on the matter.

It would be most dangerous for the Committee to go back on its decision and suspend its work without having reached any concrete results. Such action would have a disastrous effect upon public opinion.

Mr. Cassin would therefore oppose any proposal for the postponement of the adoption of the declaration.

MR. BOGOMOLOV (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics), in reply to the representative of the Philippines, said that the latter's argument lacked consistency.

The USSR delegation believed that, in view of the shortcomings of the declaration, its adoption – a matter of grave responsibility for the Committee – should be postponed in order that the text might be improved. Mr. Bogomolov did not share the pessimism of those who believed that further consideration of the document was useless. On the contrary, there was good reason to expect that further study of the document might lead to certain improvements in it and bring about a greater measure of agreement with regard to certain of its provisions.

MR. CARRERA ANDRADE (Ecuador) stated that postponement of the adoption of the draft declaration would increase the anxiety of the peoples of the world and lower the prestige of the United Nations in their eyes. Moreover, such action would be illegal in view of the fact that the Committee had already adopted the draft declaration.

While the text was imperfect and not entirely adequate in parts, it constituted a step forward, since it was the first instance of international action to safeguard human rights.

The delegation of Ecuador was not entirely satisfied with the text of the declaration, particularly articles 20 and 23, and regretted that article 1 contained no reference to the preamble of the American Declaration of the Rights and Duties of Man adopted at the Ninth International Conference of American States. It should be pointed out, however, that the Committee had been charged to examine and, if necessary, to improve the text submitted to the General Assembly by the Economic and Social Council. Those terms of reference could not be changed. The work had been completed and should be transmitted to the General Assembly for final adoption. The representatives concerned could explain their points of view before the General Assembly; the Third Committee, however, should not reverse its decision.

In conclusion, Mr. Carrera Andrade stated that the adoption of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights would help to relieve the feeling of insecurity and fear in the world.

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) drew the Committee's attention to the fact that its work was still unfinished.

She doubted whether it was the feeling of the Committee that a series of articles of the draft declaration required reconsideration, as stated in the draft resolution of the Soviet Union.

She therefore moved the closure of the debate.

THE CHAIRMAN put the United States motion for the closure of the debate to the vote.

The motion was adopted by 27 votes to 6, with 1 abstention.

[890]

THE CHAIRMAN, pointing out that the USSR draft resolution (A/C.3/407) required a two-thirds majority for adoption, put it to the vote.

The draft resolution was rejected by 26 votes to 6, with 1 abstention.

[893]

...

THE CHAIRMAN ... thought the Committee might be interested to hear a few statistics in connexion with the declaration.

Eighty-five meetings of the Committee had been devoted to the question of human rights. The average number of members present at the time of voting and taking part in the votes had been 41; the average number of members absent had been 17. An average of 36 members had voted in favour of the articles, 1.5 against and 3.36 had abstained. Thus the percentage of votes in favour had averaged 88.1, those against 3.7, abstentions 8.2. The result of the final vote on the draft declaration had been 29 in favour, none against and 7 abstentions.

Report by Mr. P. B. Ryckmans (Belgium) of the group of linguistic experts of Sub-Committee 4

At its tenth meeting, held on 4 December 1948, Sub-Committee 4 of the Third Committee, set up a group of five members: Belgium (Mr. P. Ryckmans); China

(Mr. P. Y. Tsao); Cuba (Mr. Guy P. Cisneros); United Kingdom (Mr. R. Ledward); USSR (Mr. Alexander P. Borisov) for the purpose of checking and ensuring the exact concordance in the five official languages of the text of the Draft International Declaration of Human Rights, taking the English and French texts as adopted by the Third Committee as their basis.

The Secretariat of the United Nations placed experts in these languages at the group's disposal.

At its first meeting on 5 December 1948, the group agreed to split up into four sub-groups:

1. the English-French group
2. the Chinese group
3. the Russian group
4. the Spanish group

The first of these was instructed to report on the original English and French texts.

The other three were instructed to prepare a draft text in their respective languages, corresponding to the Committee's text.

The group met again in plenary meeting on 7 December under the Chairmanship of Mr. Ryckmans. At this meeting it studied simultaneously the concordance of the texts in the other three official languages with the texts in the two working languages as prepared by the Sub-groups. The [2] final text, as adopted by the Third Committee (Document A/777), was read in each of the five languages.

The following comments were made when these texts were read at this meeting:

- Article 1* – The Spanish text gives greater prominence than the French text to a relationship between “endowed with reason and conscience” and the duty of human beings to act towards one another in a spirit of brotherhood.
- Article 2* – The words “such as” are not translated in the Spanish text.
- Article 7* – The Russian text gives “everyone wherever he may be” as the translation of “everywhere” (“en tous lieux”).
- Article 12* – The Spanish text (literally translated) says “has the right that his innocence be presumed. . .”
- Article 14* – The French, Spanish and Chinese texts speak of “a state” whilst the English and Russian texts speak of “each state”.
- Article 15* – The Spanish text gives “cualquier país”, as a translation of “other countries”.
- Article 17* – The Russian text conveys the idea of majority according to law.
- Article 20* – The word “ideas” is translated in Spanish by “opiniones”.
- Article 25* – The word “including”, which had been introduced as the result of an amendment, could not be translated into Spanish.

Article 27 – The word “fundamental” is translated in the Russian text by a word equivalent to “general”. The Russian text implies the notion that the education of very young children is referred to.

Although there are a small number of points where the texts do not seem to correspond perfectly in shades of meaning, the group nevertheless expresses the opinion that on the whole these texts are very satisfactory.

Amendment proposed by the United Kingdom (A/778/C/Rev.1) and amendments proposed by the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (A/784) to the Draft Declaration

Draft resolution proposed by the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics
(A/785/Rev.2).

MR. SAINT-LOT (Haiti), Rapporteur of the Third Committee, submitted the Committee's report [853] on the draft universal declaration of human rights<sup>1</sup> (A/777).

The report consisted of five parts: a draft universal declaration of human rights and four draft resolutions concerning the right of petition, the fate of minorities, publicity to be given to the universal declaration of human rights, and the preparation of a draft covenant on human rights and measures of implementation respectively.

As representative of Haiti, he thanked the delegations for having appointed him to bring before the Assembly the text of a declaration of human rights which, for the first time, was to be universal in scope and for having thus associated his country with that historic act.

A little over eight years ago, the forces of evil had been let loose to compass the destruction of the spiritual and moral values which represented for the majority of mankind the sole reason for living.

At a moment when the greatest confusion reigned in that epic struggle, the clear and sincere voice of President Roosevelt had rallied the hopes of those who for centuries had been seeking the path of justice and liberty amid the tortuous ways of iniquity. When President Roosevelt proclaimed that all men should enjoy freedom of conscience and freedom of expression, that they should be free from want and free from fear, he overcame the last doubts of the waverers, for his appeal was genuine and expressed clearly the aspirations of twentieth century man.

That was the concept which had inspired the Commission on Human Rights and the Third Committee in their work; upon that concept was based the draft universal declaration of human rights which was that day before the General Assembly of the United Nations.

After the war, at a time unpropitious for the success of such a venture, with rival ideologies confronting each other, the United Nations representatives had sought out, among old-established or recent political, economic, social and cultural rights, formulas which might be acceptable to men from the four corners of the earth. The text of the draft declaration represented a kind of common denominator for those various ideas. It was perhaps not perfect, but it was the greatest effort yet made by mankind to give society new legal and moral foundations; it thus

[1] The Third Committee expressed its wish, at its 167th meeting, to have the draft international declaration of human rights called the draft universal declaration of human rights.

marked a decisive stage in the process of uniting a divided world. Its authors had tried to make it simple, clear and easily intelligible both to the masses and to the élite. The articles followed a logical and rational order. Article 30 of the declaration provided for the possible limitation of the rights and liberties, which would otherwise be absolute, for reasons of public order, morality and the general welfare.

He reminded the Assembly that the declaration was to be supplemented by an international convention to give effect to the principles laid down and the measures of implementation. That was an urgent task. The adoption of the declaration would not, indeed, be sufficient to restore the shaken faith of men in their fundamental rights and liberties.

He proclaimed his satisfaction that, by a coincidence, the declaration had come into being in Paris, the capital of liberty, and that the Commission on Human Rights, which was mainly responsible for it, had been presided over by the wife of the apostle of fundamental human rights and liberties. In conclusion, he paid a stirring tribute to Mrs. Roosevelt for her wholehearted collaboration, as well as for her tempered authority and the deep knowledge she had brought to the preparation of that historic document.

The President requested the Assembly to consider the draft resolution concerning the declaration of human rights submitted by the delegation of the USSR (A/785).

MR. VYSHINSKY<sup>158</sup> (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) recalled the active part taken by the representatives of the USSR in the preparation of the draft declaration of human rights from the time of the inception of the work in Geneva until the last meetings of the Third Committee. The Geneva text had had certain qualities, but it had also had serious defects, among which might be counted its ultra-legal form and the absence of provisions for the implementation of the principles laid down. Although the Geneva text had undergone successive revisions, the faults still persisted in the text at present before the Assembly. They were apparent, for example, in the abstract form of some articles dealing with extremely important questions.

Article 4 was a case in point: it did not mention even the most elementary measures to be taken by the State to ensure practical application [855] of the rights enumerated therein. The USSR delegation had proposed an amendment to that article, providing that the State should assure for each person protection against any attack on his rights, as well as living conditions which would relieve him of the fear of hunger and death from exhaustion. Mr. Vyshinsky regretted that that amendment had been rejected and that the Third Committee had adopted a completely abstract formula with no real sense.

Article 23 was another example. It dealt with a very important problem, but it was doubtful if the solution offered was adequate for a question of such scope. It seemed as if the authors of the declaration, in their attempt to find a satisfactory solution to the problem, had been hindered by their ideology and certain political considerations. The present article 23 only retained a part of the article which had been proposed by the USSR delegation; it gave no assurance that the principles laid down would be implemented. The delegation of the USSR had asked that social insurance should be paid under national legislation by the employer or by the State, in order that its cost should fall upon those who benefited by the work done. Although that had merely been a proposal of moral import and, in any case, only a recommendation, it had met with vigorous opposition. As it stood, the article certainly contained fine ideas expressed in high-sounding phrases, but the experience of the last hundred and fifty years had shown that the realization of an ideal came into daily conflict with existing facts. The application of the principles laid down had therefore to be guaranteed and the Third Committee had not done that.

The delegation of the USSR could not accept article 20, which did nothing to solve the question. Complete freedom to disseminate ideas did not solve the problem of freedom of expression. There were dangerous ideas the diffusion of which should be prevented, war-mongering and fascist ideas, for instance. It was impossible to agree that that article should permit the propagation of such ideas, which had been responsible for the horrors that the world had recently known. Article 20 would allow even fascists to raise their heads unless the deformation of the concept of liberty contained therein was corrected. It was of no use to argue that ideas should only be opposed by other ideas; ideas had not stopped Hitler making war. Deeds were needed to prevent history from repeating itself. Not only must ideas be fought by other ideas but fascist manoeuvres and warmonger's machinations must also and especially be made illegal and the necessary punitive measures must be provided for. The mistake of not considering any measures for [856] punishment might once again cost the world millions of human lives.

That article also made no provision for the free dissemination of just and lofty ideas. If freedom of expression was to be effective, the workers must have the means of voicing their opinions, and for that they must have at their disposal printing presses and newspapers. The USSR delegation had proposed that the article should be amended so as to give the workers the material means by which they could express themselves, but the USSR amendment had been rejected on the plea that it might permit the State to restrict freedom of expression. For its part, the delegation of the USSR considered that the rejection of that amendment constituted an attempt to prevent the masses of the people from obtaining the means of expression which would make them independent of the capitalist or official Press.

Article 21 had the defect of not recognizing the right to street demonstrations. The USSR amendment to that article had been rejected, but that freedom ought to be guaranteed. Another defect of that article was the fact that it did not deprive fascist groups of the right to hold meetings. The USSR amendment on that subject had also been rejected on the pretext that it was difficult to define fascism. It was a strange thing, after the sufferings through which the world had just passed, that it should be necessary to define fascism. Such arguments must not be allowed to permit its re-birth.

As regards article 28, the USSR delegation had suggested that a sentence should be added to the first paragraph, to the effect that all scientific discoveries should serve the cause of progress, the strengthening of democratic regimes and international co-operation. It was necessary to make sure that scientific research would not be used for war purposes which would obviously hinder progress. It was difficult to understand why such a self-evident truth should have met with the opposition of the majority. Did not the whole United Nations Organization serve the cause of democracy and progress? Were not the democratic regimes the only ones to assure the implementation of the rights specified in the declaration? The delegation of the USSR could therefore not accept the first paragraph of article 28 in its present form, because it was incomplete.

Mr. Vyshinsky then drew the Assembly's attention to a defect in the draft declaration which he considered to be fundamental: the absence of provisions guaranteeing the rights of national minorities. The Geneva text had contained an article which, although incomplete, had dealt with the necessity of assuring to ethnical or reli-[857]gious groups the use of their mother tongue, the right to have their own schools, to develop their own culture, to have their own newspapers and to participate in the government of the State. Although, in enunciating the general principles, the declaration stated that there should be equal rights for all, there was nothing which corresponded to that affirmation in the concrete provisions proposed for giving full expression to those rights.

Finally, the declaration did not mention the sovereign rights of States. Articles 14 and 20 only incorporated a part of the USSR amendments and those were the less important ones. The draft declaration of human rights therefore suffered from serious defects and omissions. That was largely due to the rejection of amendments proposed by the USSR; the adoption of a very small number of the USSR amendments was not enough to make the declaration acceptable.

The draft universal declaration of human rights should be worthy of its lofty purposes. The draft before the Assembly was unacceptable in its present form and there was no time to amend it properly. Hence he requested the General Assembly to postpone examination of the draft declaration of human rights until the fourth ordinary session.

MR. CHARLES MALIK (Lebanon) stated that the declaration was destined to mark an important stage in the history of mankind. As had already been said, that declaration had been inspired by opposition to the barbarous doctrines of nazism and fascism and, more directly, by President Roosevelt's proclamation of the four essential freedoms, as well as by the affirmation of human rights and fundamental freedoms mentioned on seven different occasions in the Charter.

Mr. Malik traced the origin and growth of the text at present before the Assembly. On 16 February 1946,<sup>1</sup> the Economic and Social Council had set up the Commission on Human Rights. It had decided that the work of the Commission should primarily be devoted to submitting proposals, recommendations and reports for an international charter of human rights.

The nine members of the original body had included Mrs. Roosevelt, representative of the United States of America, Mr. Cassin, representative of France, and Mr. Neogi, representative of India. During a preliminary meeting held at Hunter College from 29 April to 20 May 1946, it had studied the final composition of the Commission on Human Rights and had asked the Secretary-General to collect all possible information on the subject. At that stage the Human Rights Division was set up in the Secretariat. That Division had begun a study of various drafts submitted by the delegations of Panama, Chile and Cuba and by the American Federation of Labor, as well as private drafts, especially those of Dr. Lauterpacht of Cambridge University, Dr. Alvarez of the American Institute of International Law, the Rev. Parsons of the Catholic Association for International Peace, Mr. McNitt of the Faculty of Law of South Western University, and Mr. H. G. Wells.

At the first session, which had been held at Lake Success at the beginning of 1947,<sup>1</sup> the Commission on Human Rights had confined itself to determining the general trend of the charter and to laying the foundations for the present text. After many difficulties, Mrs. Roosevelt, President of the Commission, had proposed that that charter should be drafted in the form of a declaration or a manifesto which the General Assembly could adopt as a resolution, and which could be followed by conventions that would be legally binding on States. The Commission had asked its officers to make a preliminary draft with the help of the Secretariat. In view of the difficulties encountered by that small group, Mrs. Roosevelt had informed the President of the Economic and Social Council of its decision to set up a wider and more representative drafting committee. The Council had endorsed that decision and had asked the Secretariat to prepare a draft declaration as a basic text.

It could be said that the present declaration had been drafted on a firm international basis, for the Secretariat's draft was a compilation not only of hundreds of proposals made by Governments and private persons, but also of the laws and legal findings of all the Member States of the United Nations.

At the first meeting of the Drafting Committee, the United Kingdom representative, Lord Dukeston, had submitted a formal proposal on behalf of his delegation for preparing a draft convention or treaty concerning human rights. That draft had been examined together with the draft prepared by the Secretariat. As a result of discussions in the Drafting Committee, Mr. Cassin had prepared a new version of the Secretariat's draft. The Drafting Committee had then submitted to the Commission Mr. Cassin's and Lord Dukeston's texts to serve as a basis for a declaration and a convention on human rights.

Mr. Malik spoke in appreciative terms of all those who had made an important contribution to the work of the Drafting Committee. He mentioned in particular the USSR representative who had been the first to stress the importance of the principle of equality and non-discrimination; the representative of Australia, who had emphasized the necessity for specifying measures for implementation and for the establishment of an international court of human rights; Mr. Chang, representative of China, Vice-Chairman of the Drafting Committee and of the Commission on Human Rights; the representative of Chile; the representative of India; and the representatives of the specialized agencies and non-governmental organizations.

The second session of the Commission on Human Rights, held at Geneva in December 1947, marked a historic stage in its work. It was in the course of that session that the conception of a charter of human rights comprising three parts had emerged: a declaration, a convention and measures for implementation. It had, in fact, become evident that many Governments were prepared to accept a draft declaration if it were to precede and not to replace a convention. One noteworthy result of that session was a report on the measures for implementation prepared by the representative of Belgium, which remained a basic document for all subsequent study in that field.

The Drafting Committee had met a second time in Lake Success from 3 to 21 May 1948. It had studied the draft declaration, taking into account the observations made by Governments, the new wording proposed for certain important articles by the Conference on Freedom of Information, the suggestions of the Commission on the Status of Women for articles 1 and 13, and, finally, the text of the Bogotá Declaration. It had submitted to the Commission a new text which was a compromise between too great conciseness on the one hand and the inclusion of too much detail on the other.

The third session of the Commission on Human Rights, held at Lake Success from 24 May to 18 June 1948, had been devoted entirely to a new examination of the individual articles of the draft declaration. Mr. Pavlov, the USSR representative, had stressed in particular the necessity of giving the declaration a practical character. His efforts, together with those of the other representatives of the USSR who had taken part in the Commission's work, had resulted in emphasis being placed on the four principles: non-discrimination, improvement in the living conditions of the masses, the duties of the individual towards society, [860] and the decisive role of the State in guaranteeing human rights and freedoms. The final text, drafted during the third session, had been adopted without any opposition. He once again paid a tribute to Mrs. Roosevelt for her able conduct of the work of the Commission on Human Rights.

Owing to a lack of time, the Economic and Social Council had, during its seventh session, done no more than refer the draft declaration to the General Assembly.

Mr. Malik then pointed out that the Third Committee had devoted 85 meetings to the discussion of the draft declaration, in addition to 20 meetings held by various sub-committees. Of the 29 articles of the present draft declaration, 18 had been adopted without any opposition. Of a total of 1,233 individual votes, 88.08 per cent had been affirmative, 3.73 per cent negative and 8.19 per cent had been abstentions. He stressed the contribution made to the drafting of the declaration by the members of the Third Committee, who had also earned the gratitude of the Assembly.

The Third Committee had not made any substantial alterations in the general structure of the declaration. The latter had, however, undergone certain important changes. He quoted the modifications made in article 3 on the proposal of the Yugoslav representative, in the preamble on the initiative of the representative of the Dominican Republic, in article 24 on the suggestion of the Cuban representative; article 10 had been amended as a result of a proposal of the Ecuadorean representative, and article 9, at the suggestion of the representative of Mexico. Finally, important changes had been made in the articles concerning economic and social rights.

In conclusion, Mr. Malik recalled that the Members of the United Nations had already solemnly pledged themselves, under the Charter, to promote respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms but that it was the first time that human rights and fundamental freedoms had been set forth in detail. Hence every Government knew, at present, to what extent exactly it had pledged itself, and every citizen could protest to his Government if the latter did not fulfil its obligations. The declaration would therefore provide a useful means of criticism and would help to bring about changes in present legal practice. A convention could subsequently be prepared, but it would rest on the rights laid down in that declaration; the latter was consequently of extreme importance.

MRS. ROOSEVELT (United States of America) pointed out that the declaration of human [861] rights, the product of long and meticulous debate, was based on the views of the various persons who and Governments which had drawn it up. As a consequence, it represented, to a certain extent, a compromise which did not contain everything the delegation of the United States of America would have wished it to contain, nor doubtless, everything which other countries would have wished. Nevertheless, the United States delegation regarded it as a satisfactory document and would accord it full support.

The amendments submitted by the USSR to the Third Committee, and rejected by that Committee, were substantially the same as those submitted to and rejected by the Commission on Human Rights. Whilst paying a tribute to the USSR delegation for the tenacity with which it had defended its convictions, Mrs. Roosevelt remarked that people sometimes had to co-operate loyally with the majority even when they disagreed with its views. She was convinced that the amendments which the delegation of the USSR was at present putting before the General Assembly would be rejected without discussion.

The first two paragraphs of the USSR amendment to article 3 dealt with the question of minorities. The Third Committee had already decided that that question required further study, and had recommended that it be referred, for that purpose, to the Economic and Social Council and the Commission on Human Rights.

Moreover, it was clear from the USSR amendment to article 20 that the aim was to guarantee the rights of certain groups, and not the rights of individuals, with which alone the declaration was concerned.

The effect of the USSR amendment to article 22 would be to restrict freedom of opinion and expression. It proposed to set up standards which would allow any State to deny freedom of opinion and expression without violating that article. It had already become clear that the expressions "democratic opinion", "democratic States", "democratic system" and "fascism" were open to the most varied and misleading interpretations. The USSR amendment to article 22 introduced new elements into that article, without however improving the text submitted by the Committee. Article 2 already guaranteed equal rights sufficient to prevent discrimination; repetition of the same idea might merely have the effect of weakening the meaning of article 2.

The new article 30 proposed by the USSR delegation again proclaimed the obligations of the State, a conception which the USSR delegation had tried to introduce into practi-[862]cally every article of the declaration. If that conception were adopted, the entire character of the declaration would be changed.

As regards the USSR proposal for referring consideration of the draft declaration to the next session of the General Assembly, the Third Committee had already rejected a similar draft resolution by 26 votes to 6. She was sure the Assembly would understand that the declaration represented the result of hard work over a long period of time, and that it should be approved now.

Mrs. Roosevelt then referred to article 30, which limited the exercise of the rights and the enjoyment of the freedoms proclaimed without any restriction in the other articles in order to meet the just requirement of morality, public order and general welfare in a democratic society. She thought that the right of equal access to the public service was provided for in article 30. The Government of the United States of America would not regard the exclusion from the public service of persons who failed to observe the basic principles of the laws and constitution of the country as an infringement of that right. That also applied to persons holding subversive beliefs. That had been already stated in the text submitted by the Commission on Human Rights. The delegation of the United States of America regarded article 23, as proposed by the Commission, as an “umbrella” article for that part of the declaration dealing with economic and social rights, despite the fact that that article contained no reference to the articles following it. It would therefore subscribe to the proclamation of economic, social and cultural rights contained in those articles.

Mrs. Roosevelt stressed that the Committee must bear in mind that the declaration of human rights was of basic importance: it was first and foremost a declaration of the basic principles to serve as a common standard for all nations. It might well become the Magna Carta of all mankind. Mrs. Roosevelt thought that its proclamation by the General Assembly would be of importance comparable to the 1789 proclamation of the Declaration of the Rights of Man, the proclamation of the rights of man in the Declaration of Independence of the United States of America, and similar declarations made in other countries. The fact that 58 States, which had had so much difficulty in reaching a common basis of agreement in many other fields, should have found a large measure of agreement on the subject of human rights was proof of their desire to raise the standard of living of peoples and guarantee mankind greater freedom.

It was clear that the declaration was inspired by a sincere desire for peace. The declaration was based on the conviction that man must have freedom in order to develop his personality to the full, and have his dignity respected. The fact that the declaration had the moral support of 58 nations would help in the adoption of the measures necessary for its implementation.

Finally, Mrs. Roosevelt hoped that the adoption of the declaration of human rights, at the third session of the Assembly, as Mr. Marshall had desired, would encourage those who were responsible for drafting the convention and working out the measures for its implementation.

MR. SANTA CRUZ (Chile) declared that the promulgation of the universal declaration of human rights would in itself be sufficient to justify the holding of the third session of the General Assembly. Henceforth, men everywhere would know what their rights and freedoms were. Mr. Santa Cruz emphasized that the presence of Mrs. Roosevelt, who had worked so actively and with such patience both on the Commission on Human Rights and on its Drafting Committee, and the proximity to the place where, a century and a half before, the 1789 Declaration of the Rights of Man had been born would make the promulgation a solemn occasion. Evoking the memory of President Roosevelt, of whom the present Declaration of Human Rights was, to a certain extent, the moral testament, he wondered whether the third session of the General Assembly might not perhaps go down in history as the "human rights session".

Both its universal nature and its juridical significance made the declaration of exceptional importance. All the States which were signatories to it undertook to respect and extend the basic rights proclaimed. It was not of course perfect; but it would constitute a safeguard for all human beings as long as the United Nations existed. Fifty-eight civilized nations had succeeded in overcoming ideological and juridical differences and had agreed on a joint proclamation of human rights. The only nations unable to subscribe to that declaration were States which denied the value of freedom as such and denied that man had rights independently of the form of the State, or which did not believe that man possessed inherent rights that had existed before the formation of social groups.

The true character of the declaration was revealed in three articles: articles 4, 23 and 29. Article 4 proclaimed the right of the individual to life, freedom and personal security; article 23 stated that everyone was entitled to the economic, social and cultural rights indispensable for his dignity, and to social security; article 29 proclaimed the need for a just social order and a peaceful international order – the two elements essential for the exercise of basic human rights.

The other principles enunciated completed the conception of a democratic society, on the national as well as on the international plane, and in the economic, social and political fields. The result was a conception of society which excluded all non-democratic regimes, and provided a criterion for distinguishing between true and false forms of democracy. Democracy was a system opposed to every form of dogmatism. No one could claim a monopoly of the truth, and common problems should be solved by universal and free suffrage. That system was based on national solidarity. Groups of persons subject to the orders of foreign authorities could not be called upon to take part in public affairs. Furthermore, efforts made to have the declaration recognize the State authority to restrict or regulate the rights proclaimed had failed. The opinion of the majority had been that to do otherwise would amount to waiving indefeasible human rights and proclaiming the totalitarian rights of the State; whereas the declaration as it stood would make it incumbent on States to adapt their legislation to the principles laid down.

He was convinced that the declaration of human rights would be approved, respected and implemented. Whereas the Declaration of 1789 had brought the hope of freedom, the declaration of human rights stated that hope, in concrete terms, the form of unambiguous rights which no one could infringe without becoming an outcast from the community of nations.

MR. CASSIN (France) stated that his country wholeheartedly supported the declaration of human rights which, 100 years after the 1848 Revolution and the abolition of slavery in French territory, constituted a world milestone in the long struggle for human rights.

The declaration was the most vigorous and the most urgently needed of humanity's protests against oppression. The last war had taken on the character of a crusade for human rights. In the midst of the turmoil, President Roosevelt, and President Benes had proclaimed it as such; and France, though a prisoner at that moment, had added her voice to theirs in proclaiming that the practical application of the basic human freedoms was an essential requisite for the establishment of international peace. The United [865] Nations Charter mentioned human rights and fundamental freedoms on seven occasions as among the purposes to be attained, and those rights and freedoms had thus become a part of positive international law. To fulfil that promise, the Assembly must at present draw up a charter of human rights, which should not merely enumerate those rights but also set forth how they could be established, their limitations and the national and international guarantees in respect of them.

Mr. Cassin stressed that it was impossible to attain complete agreement on doctrine, but that an agreement based on the practical as well as the ideal could be achieved, and that was the more urgently needed because respect of human rights had been one of the major issues of the late war.

In that connexion, the universal declaration of human rights was a considerable effort on the part of individuals, groups and States alike. In common with the 1789 Declaration, it was founded upon the great principles of liberty, equality and fraternity; but it was adapted to the present epoch in which individualism had been condemned by facts, but in which the mechanization of mankind under the tyranny of powerful groups was also abhorrent. The principle of equality, for example, had been supplemented by the prohibition of discrimination.

The declaration rested on four fundamental pillars: personal rights, relationships between man and his fellow men, public liberties and fundamental political rights, and economic and social rights. The final texts of the declaration welded those elements together, for they implied ties between the individual and society and affirmed the need of an adequate social and international order capable of ensuring that rights were respected; they provided safeguards or hope of safeguards, while at the same time also imposing certain limitations upon mankind. With regard to the latter, article 30 was one of the keystones of the declaration.

Mr. Cassin said he was very well aware of the shortcomings of the declaration. France had submitted certain amendments which had been accepted, such as the right to nationality and the general rights of intellectuals; but his country did not intend to leave the path trodden by others because not all its amendments had been accepted, especially those concerning the right of petition. The delegation of the USSR likewise knew that some of its amendments had also been adopted while others had not, either because the substance of them was already covered by some part of the declaration or else because they were more suitable for incorporation in a later convention. In addition, some of the objections raised by delegations would [866] have been dropped if those delegations had read the texts of the amendments and compared them with each other.

Mr. Cassin also observed that, in the declaration, a choice had had to be made between excessive simplicity and a fullness of detail which would have anticipated the measures for implementation. A universal declaration permitted of less freedom than did a national constitution.

It should finally be pointed out that the four pillars of the declaration were all of equal importance, and no hierarchy of rights could be established in the declaration.

To Mr. Cassin the chief novelty of the declaration was its universality. Because it was universal, the declaration could have a broader scope than national declarations and draw up the regulations that were essential to good international order. It was for States to conclude conventions between themselves for the preservation of that order; otherwise it would establish itself over their heads, for men could not be indefinitely deprived of the necessary protection of their rights.

The French delegation was happy to assent its complete agreement with all the delegations which had emphasized the importance of non-discrimination. Not merely did the declaration eliminate all distinction between nationals and aliens in regard to fundamental rights, but, in the opinion of the French delegation, it also consecrated the principle of territorial universality. France was convinced that the benefit of those fundamental rights could not be withheld from the peoples of Trusteeship or Non-Self-Governing Territories. Hence, non-self-governing peoples enjoyed in the French Union rights under the national Constitution equal to those of citizens. Nor could peoples be excluded whose Governments had not yet been admitted to membership in the United Nations: the declaration had been framed for them as well as for the peoples of the United Nations, for it was intended for all mankind.

The declaration had a wide moral scope. Furthermore, while it was less powerful and binding than a convention, it had no less legal value, for it was contained in a resolution of the Assembly which was empowered to make recommendations; it was a development of the Charter which had brought human rights within the scope of positive international law. That being so, it could not be said that the declaration was a purely theoretical instrument. It was only a potential instrument; but that fact in no way detracted from the binding force of the provisions of the Charter.

Mr. Cassin outlined the work that remained to be done and stressed that the declaration must constitute a beacon of hope for humanity. It must pave the way for the covenant, to which States would consign their undertakings in order to make them legally binding. It was, however, impossible to make this need of a convention the ground for an idea not contained in the Charter, namely, that the national sovereignty of the States remained absolute. Mr. Cassin recalled that in 1933, before the League of Nations Assembly, Hitler's henchmen had adduced arguments based on the national sovereignty of States to justify their actions with regard to their own countrymen and that the failure to punish the crime committed against the rights of the German people had led to the supreme crime of universal war.

True, they would have to rely on the goodwill and good faith of States, for, according to the Charter, the chief responsibility rested upon them. But the solidarity of nations was indispensable and their co-operation must be ensured by suitable means.

France had, in that connexion, already submitted to the Commission on Human Rights plans for the implementation of human rights, not by coercion but, in the first place, through petitions, conciliation and recommendations; for it was convinced that, with regard to the safeguarding of peace, the existing United Nations machinery, the General Assembly and the Security Council would, if need be, be able to assume full responsibility.

He expressed the hope that the 1948 Paris Assembly of the United Nations would, by the unanimity of its delegations, be known in history as the "human rights Assembly".

GENERAL ROMULO (Philippines) pointed out that, during its third session, the United Nations had been on trial for its life and that it was at that very moment that it had justified its existence before an anxious world by producing the universal declaration of human rights. The new charter of human freedom was the outcome of two and a half years of painstaking work by different bodies of the United Nations. It expressed the wish of the various peoples of the world to live together in amity, mutual co-operation and fuller freedom. That document was in reality the first in history which, from a truly universal standpoint, defined the basic rights and the fundamental freedoms to which all men were entitled. The declaration's greatest interest lay in the fact that it would prevent the recurrence of the recent [868] atrocities by ensuring human rights the protection of the law.

He then recalled all the recognized political rights of the individual. He further stated that, parallel to the bill of political rights, the document contained a bill of economic and social rights. The practical implications of the economic and social provisions were the distinguishing features which really characterized the universal declaration of human rights as a charter of human freedom. The new declaration recognized rights which were perhaps not even contemplated in the Magna Carta, the 1789 Declaration of the Rights of Man, or the American Declaration of Independence. That recognition was based upon the fact that a traditional declaration of political rights would be insufficient unless buttressed by a declaration of economic and social rights.

The document certainly could make no claims to perfection since it had been the result of a compromise. At the same time, compromise was the essence of democracy and the very basis of the United Nations. That was best shown by the fact that the philosophy on which the declaration was based was valid for all peoples and all nations and was universally accepted.

The declaration, it should be borne in mind, constituted the first step towards a universal bill of human rights. The covenant would constitute the next step; then there would be measures of implementation which would reinforce the declaration. The imperfections of the universal declaration of human rights in themselves did not constitute an adequate reason why the Assembly should not adopt it. It could always be improved later.

It had been objected that the declaration infringed national sovereignty. In refutation of that statement, General Romulo quoted the preamble to the declaration. He then paid a tribute to the outstanding contribution of Mrs. Roosevelt in the drawing up of the document which had important implications for the future. In conclusion, he stated that the present General Assembly was in duty bound to give to all mankind what it had been seeking for so long: the respect of human rights and the guarantee of human freedoms.

MR. MANUILSKY<sup>159</sup> (Ukrainian Soviet Socialist Republic) said that his delegation had been disappointed by Mrs. Roosevelt's proposal that the USSR amendments should not be discussed. That conception of the declaration of human rights at present before the General Assembly constituted the first violation of that document, which [869] recognized freedom of opinion and the right of everyone to defend his opinions.

With respect to the substance of the problem, he stated that, in his opinion, it was not really desirable for the General Assembly to adopt the declaration. Great upheavals had taken place in the world. Since 1917, a new social system had been developing in the USSR, a land which covered one sixth of the globe. In Eastern Europe, several countries had, since the war, turned towards Socialism. The peoples of Asia were demanding freedom and national independence. Millions of men who had suffered greatly during the war were at present demanding the fulfilment of their aspirations. Nevertheless, the majority of the Third Committee had ignored those facts when working on the draft declaration; throughout their work, their thoughts had been directed to the past and not to the future.

It was, of course, possible to draft a declaration containing great humanitarian principles, but those principles should bear some relation to the every-day facts of contemporary life in capitalist countries. Each man's right to a luxurious mode of living could be proclaimed; it would, however, remain a fiction for millions of men as long as their living conditions were such that it was impossible for them to enjoy it. The laws of many countries guaranteed the freedom of the Press, but, since printing presses and paper were privately owned, that freedom was controlled by the political opinions of the owners. The bourgeois French revolution had proclaimed the equality of men, but equality had not been attained thereby; on the contrary, economic inequality had become more pronounced in bourgeois society than it had ever been under the feudal regime.

It was a salient feature of the present epoch that the great social reforms of the Soviet world had left their impression on the consciousness of millions of men who lived under a different social structure from the Soviet type. The right to work, the right to rest and the right to education were essential human rights and rights of the Soviet citizen. The fact that Soviet citizens fully enjoyed them constituted the greatest achievement of the Soviet world. It was an achievement that could not be ignored. It was not possible to ignore those facts. In capitalist countries there was and always would be a flagrant contradiction between what was said in the declaration of human rights and reality.

The declaration proclaimed the right to work; but in real life something quite different happened. He quoted official data concerning the United States as an example. That country had nearly two million unemployed. If families were taken into account that made six million persons lacking the means of livelihood, to say nothing of those who were only partly employed. The same situation prevailed in the United Kingdom, which had long suffered from chronic unemployment. Moreover, the implementation of the Marshall Plan paralyzed the national industry of many European countries, where the number of the unemployed consequently increased and the standard of living went down.

The declaration accorded the right to rest; that statement, however, had a hollow ring in a society in which a small group always rested, while the overwhelming majority worked all the time. It was not possible to speak of rest for the masses while the purchasing power of wages was being systematically lowered, while the standard of living was reduced by inflation and mechanization, and while taxes to cover military budgets were steadily increasing.

The declaration proclaimed the right to education. What, however, happened in reality? There was compulsory free education in the United States; yet many children in that country either did not attend school or received inadequate schooling. The situation was obviously worse in colonial territories. Thus, in Nigeria, which had been under British rule for over a century, there was no governmental education system. Only seven out of every thousand children of school age attended school.

Before the rights to work, to rest and to education could be put into effect, it was necessary to alter drastically the economic system of private enterprise, the motive power of which was the desire for profit. Unemployment was an essential element of that system. It should also be noted that the present imperialistic stage of development of bourgeois society was characterized by a constant expansion of capitalist monopolies and the growth of military expenditure, whereas a glance at the situation in Western Europe and the United States showed that there was no allocation in any national budget for recreational facilities for workers. In the USSR, on the other hand, apart from paid holidays, to which all workers were entitled, millions of persons were able every year to rest at Government expense in rest homes and sanatoria.

The least possible seemed to have been provided for in countries which had a different economic system from that of the USSR to implement the right to education. According to official data, 30 per cent of the budget of the USSR for 1948 had been allocated to economic and cultural needs. In the United Kingdom, only 3 per cent of the budget was allotted for purposes of education, while in the United States it was only  $1\frac{1}{2}$  per cent. In the USSR over 34 million persons were pursuing their studies; moreover, 730,000 university students were educated at Government expense. That fact spoke for itself. If the Governments of the United Kingdom and the United States were to reduce their military expenses by one-third, as the USSR had proposed, those countries could then provide a practical basis for the exercise of the rights set forth in the declaration of human rights.

He next dealt with the principle of equality as enunciated in the declaration. There could be true equality among men only under an economic system which guaranteed to everyone equal conditions and opportunities for the development of his own potentialities. That was not the equality mentioned in the declaration of human rights. Again in countries the economic structure of which differed from that of the USSR, men spoke of political, national, or racial equality while, on the other hand, they did not hesitate to lynch Negroes, as in the United States, to pass racial laws, as in the Union of South Africa, to exterminate minorities, as in Greece, to quote only some examples.

The reader of the declaration of human rights found therein no mention of the elementary democratic right of minorities to use their own language in courts and schools, to have their own culture and books, and to be protected from racial discrimination.

Another elementary democratic right of every citizen was the right to participate in the government of his country and to have access to administrative posts regardless of his race, colour, language or religion. Voting once every four or five years did not constitute a full exercise of the right of the citizen to take part in the government of his country.

Neither did the declaration of human rights recognize the right of peoples and nations to self-determination, a right arising from human rights as each citizen was a member of the community and only the community could obtain such a [872] right for the individual. Lenin and Stalin had recognized that right and, if at present the States which had signed the United Nations Charter wanted to respect it, they must take steps to extend the right to self-determination to peoples of colonial, Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories.

The absurd theory current among colonial Powers that there were superior and inferior races must be eradicated. It was reminiscent of the defeated Nazi theory. The Prime Minister of the Union of South Africa had frankly stated, in that connexion, in January 1948 that Europeans must be given education, social insurance and so forth, but that, if the same rights were accorded to the Natives, the Europeans would be unable to rule the country and would be obliged to leave it. Was that an application of the principle of equality? It was therefore not surprising that there should be no reference to democracy in the declaration of human rights, although the exercise of the rights set forth in it must be based on democratic principles and democratic equality. There was no need to go to the Union of South Africa to illustrate the obvious situation: the same situation would be found, for instance, in Indonesia.

There was furthermore not one word in the declaration condemning fascism. The delegation of the Ukrainian SSR regretted that Mrs. Roosevelt had not allowed that question to be discussed along with the principles of the declaration. She had taken a position reminiscent of the one held by the democratic parties in Germany under the Weimar Republic; they had considered fascism a legitimate political movement having the same right to existence as any other trend of public opinion. The tragic consequences of that attitude, which should not be reflected in the declaration, were known to all.

Mr. Manuilsky recalled that Mr. Molotov<sup>160</sup> had stated at the Paris Conference that, in the interests of all peace-loving peoples, the fight against fascism must be continued to the end. Those words should be borne in mind. It could not be forgotten that, in spite of the military defeat of the Axis countries, a fascist regime continued intact beyond the Pyrenees. Greece, supported by reactionary circles in the United States and the United Kingdom, was moving towards fascism. It could not be forgotten either that criminals like Degrelle<sup>161</sup> and Mosley were still at large. Those circumstances made it necessary to include in the declaration a provision permitting [873] the citizen to fight against fascism ideologically and publicly.

A study of the universal declaration of human rights consequently showed a series of rights which could not be exercised in view of the present conditions and the economic structure of a great number of countries, whereas several elementary democratic rights which could be realized even in a capitalist society had been deliberately omitted. Thus, the declaration was devoid of any significance from the point of view of democracy. That was scarcely accidental: the authors of the declaration had endeavoured to minimize its democratic scope and to conceal the fact by pronouncing grandiloquent principles.

He concluded by saying that those were the concrete practical reasons which moved his delegation to support the USSR proposal to postpone the adoption of the declaration of human rights until the fourth session of the General Assembly.

MR. VAN ROIJEN (Netherlands) stated that his delegation welcomed the fact that a first step had been taken towards the realization of a most important aim: the drafting of a bill of human rights.

He recalled that the long history of the Dutch people bore testimony to its great love of freedom in the field of thought, religion and politics. The Netherlands considered the rights of the individual to be sacred and the recognition of those rights the best safeguard of the physical and spiritual wellbeing of mankind.

He was grateful for the work done by the General Assembly at its third session. The solemn declaration, which was the first part of the bill of human rights, should serve as a common standard for all peoples and all nations throughout the world. Although the declaration was not legally binding on Governments, it should have great moral force and would serve as a guiding light to all those who endeavoured to raise man's material standard of living and spiritual condition. The Netherlands delegation understood that the adoption of the declaration placed a moral obligation on the different countries to find ways and means of giving effect to the rights proclaimed therein, and more especially to draft without delay a covenant on human rights and the necessary measures of implementation.

He remarked that his delegation would warmly support the resolution included in the report of the Third Committee which stated that the preparation of the rest of the bill of human rights should have a high priority.

<sup>161</sup> Léon Degrelle (1906–94) was a Belgian politician and Nazi collaborator. He fled to Spain at the end of the war and lived there in exile until his death in 1994.

While he would not dwell on the different aspects of the declaration in detail, he felt that the inclusion of social and economic rights constituted a marked improvement over previous declarations. Although his delegation would have preferred several articles to be differently worded, it accepted the text of the declaration as a whole. The people of the Netherlands would regard it as a recognition of principles which, generally speaking had already found expression in its national legislation.

Referring to the source of those rights, Mr. van Roijen regretted that man's divine origin and immortal destiny had not been mentioned in the declaration, for the fount of those rights was the Supreme Being, who laid a great responsibility on those who claimed them. To ignore that relation was almost the same as severing a plant from its roots, or building a house and forgetting the foundation. That conviction had always been one of the mainsprings of the actions of the Dutch people, and, in particular, of the resistance movement during the last war, when human rights had been so flagrantly violated. The solemn declaration it was proposed to adopt might have had, as its foundation, the recognition of the lofty origin of those rights. He realized that the time was perhaps not yet ripe for the acceptance of that idea. He hoped it would be accepted in the future.

Mr. van Roijen stated, in conclusion, that human rights could be fully exercised only if communities were prepared to protect and safeguard them. The authors of the declaration had proclaimed the rights of the individual, and in so doing they had set a standard for society. He hoped that all States would endeavour to give full effect to the principles of the declaration for the benefit of mankind in general and of posterity in particular.

117. Continuation of the discussion on the draft universal declaration of human rights: report of the Third Committee (A/777)

Amendment proposed by the United Kingdom (A/778/Rev.1) and amendments proposed by the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (A/784) to the Draft Declaration

Draft resolution proposed by the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (A/785/Rev.2)

MR. WATT (Australia) emphasized the importance of the draft international declaration of human rights submitted for approval to the General Assembly.

Some delegations might have preferred the draft declaration to be in the form of a short outline of fundamental principles; others, on the contrary, might have liked the draft to have been more detailed. Nations which had taken part in the preparation of the draft declaration differed profoundly from the political, economic, social and religious points of view and divergences were bound to become apparent regarding the manner in which the various aspects of the question should be approached and treated. The draft declaration presented, therefore, an effort at compromise and mutual understanding. It had been said that that would prejudice its authority; he thought, on the contrary, that having been accepted and approved by the majority of Member States of the United Nations, the declaration would go forth to the world with much greater strength and authority.

The Australian delegation attached particular importance to articles 23, 24, 25 and 26 of the draft declaration, which dealt with economic and social rights, and particularly with the right to social security, equitable and satisfactory working conditions, rest and leisure and an adequate standard of living to ensure the health and wellbeing of every man and his family. Those rights flowed from certain provisions which had been incorporated in the Charter on Australia's suggestion, namely, the provisions of Articles 55 and 56, under which Member States pledged themselves to take joint and separate action in co-operation with the United Nations, so as to [876] ensure higher standards of living, full employment and universal respect for, and observance of, human rights and fundamental freedoms.

Whatever its importance, however, the declaration did not by itself constitute an international charter of human rights. The working plan of the Commission on Human Rights had laid down that such a charter should also include a covenant relating to human rights and measures of implementation. The declaration represented a common ideal to be attained by all peoples of the world; it had no legally binding character. The General Assembly should see to it that the rights listed in the declaration did not remain a dead letter and should ensure effective respect of those rights.

The Australian delegation had always stressed, therefore, both in the Commission on Human Rights and in the Third Committee, the importance of the measures of implementation. Consequently, it gave its support, unreservedly, to draft resolution E proposed by the Third Committee, which requested the Economic and Social Council to ask the Commission on Human Rights to continue to give priority in its work to the preparation of a draft covenant on human rights and draft measures of implementation.

He recalled that, at the Paris Conference in 1946, Dr. Evatt, the head of the Australian delegation, had proposed the creation of an international court of human rights to which individuals, groups or States might have recourse if legitimate human rights were violated. At the time a number of delegations had considered that proposal as a rather bold one; since then, however, the usefulness of such a court had become apparent to many delegations. In the Commission on Human Rights, the Australian delegation had put forward a detailed plan relating to the creation of an international court on human rights (E/CN.4/15) and the plan would certainly be thoroughly examined by the Commission at its next session.

The Australian delegation sincerely hoped that the General Assembly would adopt the draft universal declaration of human rights by a very large majority, if not unanimously.

MR. PÉREZ CISNEROS (Cuba) reminded members that the Cuban delegation had submitted the first draft resolution which was to serve as a basis for the universal declaration of human rights.

[877]

He emphasized the importance and value of the draft declaration and paid tribute to the persevering efforts of the Commission on Human Rights and its Chairman, Mrs. Roosevelt. The draft declaration expressed in particularly clear and precise terms the most noble aspirations of twentieth-century man. That declaration would mark the advent of a world in which man, freed from fear and poverty, could enjoy freedom of speech, religion and opinion.

The Cuban delegation had taken a very active part in the work of the Third Committee and had submitted numerous amendments to the initial draft; it had done so in the belief that the importance of the question demanded much care and a critical approach on the part of every delegation.

On its suggestion, the Third Committee had decided to include in the draft some of the essential provisions contained in the Declaration of Human Rights proclaimed at Bogotá by the peoples of the American continent. Article 9 had been inserted in the draft declaration on the suggestion of the Mexican representative. It drew its inspiration from the "right to protection" which was embodied in Mexican legislation. The preamble to the draft declaration contained the essential part of an article of the Cuban Constitution, which recognized that man had the right to rebel against tyranny and arbitrary action. Social rights, which were a feature of the twentieth century, occupied a prominent place in the draft declaration. The Third Committee had deemed it useful to add two amendments submitted by the Cuban delegation, which proclaimed that everyone had the right to free choice of employment and to just and favourable remuneration which would ensure for himself and his family an existence worthy of human dignity and which would be supplemented, if necessary, by all other means of social protection. On the suggestion of France, Mexico and Cuba, the Committee had included in the draft declaration provisions relating to the protection of the moral and material interests of scientists, artists and writers. Indeed, such protection was indispensable to enable that intellectual and artistic elite to continue its work with dignity. Lastly, the Cuban delegation noted with great satisfaction that the draft declaration protected individuals against any attack upon their honour, finally condemned any distinction on racial grounds, and recognized the equality of men and women.

MR. THORS (Iceland) regretted that his delegation had been unable to participate as actively as it would have wished in the remarkable work of the Third Committee. His delegation attached [878] very great importance to that universal declaration of human rights which it regarded as a preamble to a future world constitution.

The delegation of Iceland was glad to note that the principles set forth in the draft declaration were also contained in the Constitution of his country. That Constitution was based on the conviction that all men were born free and equal in dignity and in rights; it recognized that everyone should enjoy freedom of thought, conscience and religion, freedom of opinion and expression, and the right to peaceful assembly and association. The Icelandic Government was freely elected and acted in conformity with the will of the people. Iceland had a social security system; the workers enjoyed periodical holidays with pay, and education was free for all. Furthermore, the Government granted scholarships to enable the less-well-to-do pupils to attend secondary and higher schools. All men and women in Iceland enjoyed equal rights and there was no distinction on account of race, class or religion. They enjoyed fair standards of living and took part in the direction of the public affairs of their country.

In those circumstances, the Icelandic delegation was prepared to vote for the draft declaration, especially as that draft had been carefully prepared by the Commission on Human Rights and the Third Committee.

The universal declaration of human rights would arouse great hopes among peoples who were still deprived of those rights. The success and the practical value of the declaration would depend on the goodwill with which the nations provided for its effective implementation.

MR. DE ATHAYDE (Brazil) paid a tribute to the efforts and the spirit of conciliation of all nations, great and small, which had taken part in preparing the draft universal declaration of human rights. The draft declaration was certainly not perfect; it was none the less a remarkable achievement and would have far-reaching effects.

The draft declaration did not reflect the particular point of view of any one people or of any one group of peoples. Neither was it the expression of any particular political doctrine or philosophical system. It was the result of the intellectual and moral co-operation of a large number of nations; that explained its value and interest and also conferred upon it great moral authority.

The Brazilian delegation sincerely hoped that the General Assembly would adopt the declaration, which had been conceived and drafted in a [879] liberal and generous spirit and which would open up a new era of liberty and justice for all mankind.

COUNT CARTON DE WIART (Belgium) felt that the universal declaration of human rights would undoubtedly be the most complete and most concrete achievement of the third session of the General Assembly. He paid a tribute to all those who had most actively contributed to the work, and in particular to Mrs. Roosevelt, and to the Chairman and the Rapporteur of the Third Committee, Mr. Charles Malik and Mr. Saint-Lot.

The essential merit of that declaration was to emphasize the high dignity of the human person after the outrages to which men and women had been exposed during the recent war. It was essential that the dignity of the human person should be safeguarded against the recurrence of such acts and also against the excessive risks of individualism and of State control.

The representative of Belgium noted that social rights, economic rights, cultural rights were being added by the declaration to the classical freedoms already set forth in similar documents. It further proclaimed the equality of rights between man and woman and stressed the rights of the family, which was the natural and fundamental element of society. It was also necessary to emphasize in that connexion the right to family wages and the parents' prior right to choose the kind of education to be given to their children.

That work, however, was not faultless. It would no doubt have been desirable to acknowledge the real basis of the equality of rights, namely, the common origin and destiny of all men.

Again, the order of the articles did not seem perfect. It was surprising to see an essential article like article 19, which proclaimed the right to freedom of conscience and thought, placed after the recognition of the right to own property and after certain prerogatives of only relative importance. Article 25 declared that everyone had a right to periodic holidays with pay. That should be true of all workers, but the application of such an absolute regulation was hardly possible in certain cases such as, for instance, that of the mother of a family detained by her domestic duties.

The Belgian representative considered that article 3, referring to Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories, was not a very successful one. Article 2 provided, in fact, for the universal application of the declaration in the most positive terms. There might, therefore, be some danger in including in article 3 a limitative enumeration. It would accordingly be better to delete [880] that article altogether or to make its terms more concrete and embody it in article 2 as a second paragraph.

In certain circles, it had been said that the declaration of human rights was a purely academic document. That statement was erroneous, for the declaration not only had an unprecedented moral value, it had also the beginnings of a legal value. The man in the street who appealed to the declaration could support his protests with the authority of the unanimous decision of the peoples and Governments of the United Nations.

It had also been alleged that the declaration spoke only of human rights, without mentioning duties. That criticism was unfair. Article 30, in fact, imposed on all men the duty to respect the rights of others, public order, morality and the general welfare as provided for in a democratic society. Those were limitations justified by civilized life itself, as well as limitations of conscience. It was therefore unjust to say that all those duties, taken together with the rights proclaimed, did not form a coherent whole.

The Belgian representative approved the request of the French delegation proposing that, by the employment of all modern means of disseminating information, the universal declaration of human rights should be given the widest possible publicity so that it might influence all minds and all hearts.

Count Carton de Wiart was happy that circumstances had allowed the universal declaration of human rights to be completed in the very heart of France which, throughout the ages, had given to the world so many noble and generous ideas. He hoped that the declaration would serve the cause of human dignity and would contribute to the rapprochement and friendship of peoples.

MR. AUGENTHALER (Czechoslovakia) regretted to have to state that the proclamation of the universal declaration of human rights would not be the splendid event, acclaimed by the masses and immortalized by history, as might have been expected.

The Third Committee had, in fact, held 85 meetings, during which 1,000 speeches had been made and 200 amendments submitted, and had endeavoured to improve the text submitted by the Commission on Human Rights. But the declaration that had been drawn up on those lines, had departed too far from the ideal which today represented the hope of some and the fear of others.

All present-day declarations of human rights had been the expression of a fully progressive society; they had looked towards the future, and [881] had clearly brought out the failure of declining Powers. The declaration before the Assembly was not imbued with that revolutionary spirit. It had been outstripped by the Constitutions of many Member and non-member States.

Mr. Augenthaler then quoted a passage from the preamble of the Czechoslovak Constitution which stated that Czechoslovakia was a popular democratic State in which the people carried out the laws they had chosen themselves, and where the national economy served the people and was intended to promote the general wellbeing, prevent economic crises and distribute the national income equitably in order to eventually put an end to the exploitation of man by man.

After acquiring such a Constitution, Czechoslovakia would feel that she was taking a step backward if it contented itself with the proposed declaration of human rights, which was neither bold nor modern.

The Czechoslovak delegation had constantly demanded that the first universal declaration of human rights should contain pledges for its immediate and progressive implementation, but the majority had concentrated above all on the verbal side of the declaration. Believing that it could not rise above the level of the constitutional evolution of all countries and forgetting that one of its arguments was to refuse to interfere with State institutions, that majority had rejected amendments submitted by the USSR which aimed at solving the problems of emigration and of choice of residence within the legislative framework of each State. The Third Committee, moreover, had approved by a majority of only one vote the amendment of the Soviet Union giving equality of rights in marriage to men and women; and it had not agreed to the abolition of the death sentence in peace time, although that had been done a century previously by the French Government of 1848. Further, the Third Committee had not agreed to denounce publicly and formally "fascism" and "aggression", although those words still had a cruel and sinister significance for many peoples, and although such denunciation should have been dictated by the principles of morality regardless of political concepts. The experience gained during the war should have received greater attention. Those who had refused to include in the declaration the right to protection against fascism and aggression had either known nothing of the war or were lacking in sincerity.

Articles 23 to 27 were among the most modern articles; they dealt with work, the greatest of human values. Recalling a discussion in the Third Committee as to whether man was created in the image of God or was a product of material evolution as conceived by Darwin, Mr. Augenthaler expressed his view, based upon the teachings of Marx and Engels, that man was a product of work. The work of the hand made the tool, and the tool permitted the development of the brain and the senses; by means of work man organized himself in society so as to meet his needs and achieve his intellectual and moral development. In its present form, the declaration took no account of the practical aspect of the problem; it simply expressed lofty ideals, making no provision for their implementation in the difficult daily life of the workers. For example, there was surely no point in proclaiming the right to leisure if some men had no means of exercising that right. Unfortunately, the majority had not followed the advice of the Czechoslovak delegation when it had asked that the discussion should centre around the concept of work, and that the necessity for State guarantees should be recognized. Mr. Augenthaler considered that article 25 of the declaration lagged behind a French law of 25 February 1948, by which the French Government undertook to guarantee work to all citizens, and recognized the workers' right to group themselves together so as to enjoy the legitimate fruits of their work.

The declaration was a synthesis of ancient truths; it was out of touch with present realities and with the strength that resided in the people; it was only a vague picture of human rights as they could be conceived in the twentieth century.

The Czechoslovak delegation was, however, not averse to the codification of the average rights recognized in certain civilized States, because the most elementary rights were not yet acknowledged everywhere, and certain States permitted racial discrimination which was incompatible with the Charter of the United Nations. Some purpose would therefore be served by drawing up a list of fundamental rights, even though many States might already have recognized and guaranteed them, but it was essential to pave the way to progress.

It was for that reason that the USSR proposal afforded the only reasonable solution, that of postponing to the fourth session of the General Assembly the adoption of the universal declaration of human rights.

MR. DAVIES (United Kingdom) stressed the fact that the preparation of the draft declaration was a milestone on the road of human progress and observed that many speakers had compared the draft declaration to other declarations made in history. It had to be recognized, however, that never before had so many nations joined together to agree on what they considered to be the fundamental rights of the individual. More than 50 nations with differing systems of government [883] and differing social structures, religions and philosophies had adopted by an overwhelming majority the articles of the draft declaration under discussion. It was perhaps worthwhile recalling that previous declarations had lived in history long after the wars or disputes which had given rise to them; and it should not be forgotten either that the war, by its total disregard of the most fundamental rights, was responsible for the fact that the United Nations had drafted a new declaration of human rights.

That declaration was, however, only a first step. While in no way wishing to minimize its moral force, the United Kingdom felt strongly that the Commission on Human Rights should continue its work on the draft covenant and on the measures for implementation of the declaration.

The United Kingdom delegation therefore wholeheartedly supported draft resolution E of the Third Committee as well as draft resolution D proposed by France, concerning the publicity that should be given the declaration. Although the general view was that it was too late to modify the text of the draft declaration, the United Kingdom delegation nevertheless proposed an amendment (A/778/Rev.1) to article 3. That article contained one of the most serious blemishes in a declaration which included certain passages that doubtless could have been better drafted, but which the United Kingdom delegation and the majority of the Assembly were prepared to accept.

Article 2 laid down that every individual was entitled to the rights and freedoms proclaimed in the declaration, without distinction of any kind. If article 2 had any meaning and if its terms were sufficiently precise and enumerated sufficiently clearly the distinctions to be outlawed, there was no reason to add an article 3 stipulating that those rights applied to the inhabitants of the Trust and Non-Self-Governing territories.

The United Kingdom had been accused in the Third Committee of wishing to delete article 3, so that it should not have to respect the rights in its colonial territories. As the Assembly was aware, there was no justification whatsoever for making a statement of that kind. If that were the case, the United Kingdom would not have accepted article 2.

The fact was that at every stage of the preparation of the declaration, the United Kingdom had consulted its colonial territories and it would accept the declaration not only on its own behalf but also on behalf of those territories.

Mention had been made of territories in which all rights were disregarded. Such territories should not be sought among British territories, [884] which were largely self-governing, but rather among the totalitarian States of Eastern Europe, where there was no freedom of the Press except for supporters of the Government, where justice was subordinated to political requirements, where millions of human beings were held in concentration camps and where the role of parliaments was more and more limited to ratifying the decisions of the party in power. Mr. Davies merely mentioned those facts in answer to the observations that had been directed against the United Kingdom the previous day (180th plenary meeting).

Furthermore, the Third Committee had rejected certain amendments submitted by the USSR only after long and serious discussions; it had taken that action because the adoption of those amendments would have limited the universal scope of the declaration, and because consideration would have been given to motives of political propaganda. While the delegation of the Soviet Union had wished to restrict the scope of the rights recognized in the declaration in order that it might serve a specific purpose, the majority, on the other hand, had felt that any limitation on freedom of expression and opinion, no matter how noble the reason, would be preparing the ground for the domination of a certain set of ideas and would clear the path for a totalitarian regime. The development of fascism had been due more to the suppression of the freedom of expression than to the dissemination of lies. The fact that political refugees came from the East to the West of Europe proved that that same danger still existed in some countries.

As regards the amendments proposed by the USSR (A/784), the United Kingdom delegation had no objection in principle to paragraph 1 of the amendment to paragraph 3. The United Kingdom had always encouraged the evolution towards self-government in the territories under its jurisdiction. Since, however, the document under discussion was a declaration of human rights, it would not be appropriate to include in it clauses dealing with the duties of States. The United Kingdom delegation had constantly maintained that point of view during the discussions.

Paragraph 2 of the USSR amendment to article 3 was a new version of an article on minorities which had already been discussed and rejected by the Third Committee. It was better not to insert such an article in the Declaration for the time being, since the Sub-Commission on the Prevention of Discrimination and the Protection of Minorities was in the process of examining the question. Moreover, the USSR amendment was concerned only with national minorities; there were, however, also cultural minorities. Draft resolution C of the Third Committee showed that the Assembly, as the United Kingdom dele-[885]gation had already pointed out, was not indifferent to the fate of minorities.

Paragraph 3 of the USSR amendment to article 3 was unacceptable, for it insinuated that the colonial territories did not enjoy any rights.

The USSR amendment to article 20 tended to limit freedom of expression to the dissemination of "democratic" ideas. For the Soviet Union, the word "democratic" had plainly a meaning different than it had for the other States. Moreover, that amendment did away with the right to seek and receive information; while it granted every person the right to spread and to defend communist ideas, it did not grant the right to try to find out what was going on in the world.

Article 22, as proposed by the USSR, set forth very limited rights; it was, in fact, foreign to any concept of true democracy and could satisfy only those States in which the electorate voted for a single and carefully chosen list of candidates.

Finally, the new article which the Soviet Union proposed for inclusion after article 30 would have the effect of transforming the declaration into a pact which would be legally binding upon the signatory States; it was in contradiction to the last paragraph of the preamble.

Mr. Davies referred again to the amendment the United Kingdom had proposed to article 3, which constituted the last improvement that could be made in the declaration. Instead of merely deleting article 3, many delegations preferred to state explicitly that article 2 applied to all countries, whatever their political status might be.

Mr. Davies hoped that the General Assembly would accept that amendment, and that it would also adopt by an overwhelming majority the declaration as a whole, which could then be presented to the world as a truly universal document.

MR. CAMPOS ORTIZ (Mexico) said that his delegation considered that the universal declaration of human rights was a truly fundamental document. Although it was not a legal document with binding force, that declaration would serve as the basis for the realization of one of the highest aims of the United Nations, that of developing and encouraging universal respect for human rights.

The Mexican representative referred to the position which his Government had taken up in that matter. It therefore considered itself one of the initiators of the international movement which had been in progress during recent years, and the outcome of which had been the present proclamation of human rights. Mexico's attitude had been made clear following the Dumbarton Oaks Conference, the Conference of Chapul-[886]tepec and, finally, the San Francisco Conference where, with the delegations of Brazil, Ecuador, the Dominican Republic, Cuba and Panama, the Mexican delegation had submitted concrete proposals which were the basis of the Articles of the Charter referring to human rights. By the attitude it had adopted, Mexico had expressed its conviction that in a peaceful world it was essential to ensure respect for human rights.

The declaration was very well drafted in the sense that the various articles enumerated essential rights, the final article setting forth the principle of limitation of those rights. That presentation was preferable to one in which each article mentioned the limitations affecting the exercise of each right. It was for that reason that the Mexican delegation had always supported the draft prepared by the Commission on Human Rights, containing a formula according to which national legislations could impose limitations on the exercise of those rights, limitations which were warranted by the principles laid down in the general article of the draft prepared by the Commission on Human Rights.

The Mexican delegation wished to emphasize that it maintained the reservations it had made when it explained its vote in favour of articles 16 and 25 of the draft declaration of human rights.

The Mexican delegation congratulated itself on the reception which had been given to its amendments, in particular to its proposal that the right to a simple, speedy and effective legal remedy, which protected each individual against acts violating the fundamental rights granted him by the constitution or by law, should be acknowledged as an essential human right. That amendment had been inserted in article 9, thus establishing in the international field a legal rule which was common to many Latin-American countries and which for over a century had been part of Mexican law. That "right to protection" was the best guarantee that human rights would be respected.

Mr. Campos Ortiz considered that the adoption of the universal declaration of human rights was one of the most important actions in the history of the United Nations. It would mark a step towards the establishment of a lasting peace. He hoped that that document would have a significance and repercussion equal to that of the Declaration of the Rights of Man and of the Citizen which had been proclaimed in France.

MR. UGON (Uruguay) wished first to explain why his delegation was taking part in those discussions. In spite of the principle of the legal equality of Member States, certain questions such [887] as, in particular, the problems of international security, came principally within the province of the great Powers. But all States, whatever their geographic or economic importance, had the same sacred mission in so far as respect for and protection of human rights were concerned. In that field the principal criteria were the efforts made and the results obtained by each State. It was for that reason that Uruguay considered itself qualified to continue, in the General Assembly, the work it had undertaken on a national as well as an international plane.

The Uruguayan delegation warmly supported the draft resolutions submitted by the Third Committee and, in particular, the draft universal declaration of human rights. It viewed with satisfaction the adoption in that draft of fundamental principles, such as the one providing that the exercise of human rights could only be limited by laws necessary to ensure the general wellbeing in a democratic society. The general character of the law and the fact that it was usually formulated by representative organs were guarantees against arbitrary action.

The human being must be the raison d'être and the ultimate aim of the international community and of international law. Thus, the inherent rights and freedoms of the human being should be internationally protected and guarded.

The universal declaration of human rights had its inception in various provisions of the Charter. The principle which had inspired it was among the most noble principles of the United Nations. That declaration was a natural complement of the Charter, and thus, its enforcement and respect for its provisions would become one of the obligations of Member States. Human rights were at all times threatened and endangered by hidden forces and unfortunate events, and all those who would champion those rights had to be vigilant. Those human rights, however, would in future be protected and defended by all the peoples of the States Members of the Organization.

MR. AIKMAN (New Zealand) pointed out that the Preamble of the Charter had established a strong bond between peace and justice and the rights of the human being, thus calling to mind one of the fundamental principles of Roman Law. Human rights were rooted in the nature of man himself as well as in the structure and needs of the modern world. The principles proclaimed in the Declaration were not therefore the original creation of 58 nations or their representatives meeting in a twentieth-century committee room.

The preparation of the draft declaration had been a difficult task since its authors had different social, economic and philosophical backgrounds, but it had proved that with good will and a sincere desire to co-operate, it was possible for divergent points of view to be reconciled. Thus, that declaration could justly be described as being "universal". It was a work of which the United Nations might be proud and to which the greatest possible publicity should now be given all over the world.

The discussions in the Third Committee had shown that as all the articles of the universal declaration of human rights were of equal importance, the order of those articles was of no particular significance. The New Zealand delegation supported that point of view, as it considered that all the rights enumerated were fundamental.

The New Zealand delegation noted with satisfaction the place given to economic and social rights. Experience had shown that the individual could only reach full development if he was assured of social security in the widest sense of the term. Economic and social rights could give the individual the normal conditions of life which would enable him to experience greater freedom, and in New Zealand it was considered a governmental function to promote their realization.

The universal declaration of human rights dealt with all fields of human activity either expressly or by implication. It was possible that all the principles set forth might not be respected as they should be, but everyone ought to make an effort to see that there was no cause for criticism.

It was true that the universal declaration of human rights, as a statement of principles, had moral force only. It imposed no legal obligations. It was for that reason that the New Zealand delegation had insisted on the draft resolution according to which the Commission on Human Rights should continue to give priority to the preparation of a covenant on human rights and measures of implementation.

Mr. Aikman recalled that the international bill of human rights should eventually consist of three parts: first, the declaration which was before the Assembly; secondly, a covenant or convention imposing on States obligations that would be legally binding; and lastly, effective measures of implementation. The New Zealand delegation considered that the covenant on human rights would be a more important document than the declaration itself, in view of the fact that it would impose legal obligations on the States ratifying it. It was to be hoped, moreover, [889] that a series of international conventions would progressively elaborate and define the principles set forth in the universal declaration of human rights; a beginning had been made by the preparation of three draft conventions on the freedom of information which the Third Committee had now on its agenda.

In the opinion of the New Zealand delegation, the Commission on Human Rights in its work on the covenant should in the first instance concentrate on only some of the rights set forth in the Declaration. The other rights would be dealt with later.

Some of them, in particular economic and social rights, could be entrusted to other organs such as the Economic and Social Council, the World Health Organization, the Food and Agriculture Organization and the International Labour Organization. At the same time, the Commission on Human Rights should examine proposals in connexion with the implementation of the Declaration, especially those relating to the right of petition. The latter was very important and should be examined very carefully by the Commission.

The New Zealand delegation attached great importance to the declaration of human rights, but it wished to emphasize that the United Nations would not have fulfilled all its obligations in that field until the General Assembly had adopted a covenant and effective measures of implementation.

(A/785/Rev.2).

Sir MOHAMMED ZAFRULLAH KHAN (Pakistan), recalling the President's statement the previous day (179th plenary meeting) that the adoption [890] of the Convention on Genocide was an epoch-making event, said that adoption of the universal declaration of human rights would also be of that character. The Pakistan delegation fully associated itself with what had been said in praise of the declaration, and with the appreciation of the work accomplished by all the delegations who had taken part in drawing up the document.

The few observations his delegation wished to make in connexion with the declaration concerned article 19 which dealt with freedom of conscience, including freedom to change one's religion. When the latter question was discussed in the Third Committee, its whole scope had not been understood; for that reason he thought it necessary to set out very clearly his delegation's position as to that part of article 19.

Pakistan was an ardent defender of freedom of thought and belief and of all the freedoms listed in article 19. There could be no doubt on that point and, if that question only had a political aspect, the declaration he had just made would have been sufficient. But for the Pakistan delegation the problem had a special significance as some of its aspects involved the honour of Islam. He therefore thought it necessary to explain his delegation's point of view on the subject to the Assembly; it was a point of view arising out of the teaching of Islam in that field.

The teaching of Islam was based on the Koran which contained the oral revelations made to the prophet Mohammed; the Koran was, therefore, the very word of God for Moslems. Now it stated that neither faith, nor conscience which gave birth to it, could have an obligatory character. The Koran expressly said: "Let he who chooses to believe, believe, and he who chooses to disbelieve, disbelieve", and it formally condemned not lack of faith but hypocrisy. The Moslem religion was a missionary religion: it strove to persuade men to change their faith and alter their way of living, so as to follow the faith and way of living it preached, but it recognized the same right of conversion for other religions as for itself.

Article 19 had given rise to anxiety among certain delegations because of the actions of the missionaries of certain other religions. He was glad to pay tribute to the work carried out by the Christian missionaries in the East, especially in the fields of education, hygiene and medicine; nevertheless, it was undeniable that their activity had sometimes assumed a political character which had given rise to justifiable objections. In certain cases, the means employed to bring [891] about conversion had made that conversion a worse remedy than the ill it set out to cure.

There were other aspects of the problem, but it was not appropriate to deal with them at that stage of the work. His delegation considered that the essential point was to repeat that for its part the Moslem religion had unequivocally proclaimed the right to freedom of conscience and had declared itself against any kind of compulsion in matters of faith or religious practices.

The Pakistan delegation would therefore vote for article 19, and would accept no limitation on its provisions.

MRS. BEGTRUP (Denmark) recalled that when the Charter was drawn up at San Francisco, free men and women felt that it should not be solely a document regulating relations between States, but that it should also include the promise of establishing the rights of the individual which were the fundamental element of the State. Later on that conception prevailed. While the traditional concept of the sovereignty of States tended to disappear progressively, the promises given to humanity were on the contrary about to be realized. The universal declaration of human rights made the promises of the Charter a living reality.

Inequality among the races tended to disappear every day. But what concrete results had been achieved in the matter of equality of men and women? Mrs. Begtrup, convinced as she was that that equality would set free an exceptional human force which would render possible the better reconstruction of a peaceful world, attached particular importance to that aspect of the problem.

She wished to stress the importance of the work carried out by the United Nations in that field. That work had been due to the existence of the Commission on the Status of Women, the successor to the Sub-Commission which in 1946 had established a programme for the action of the United Nations and the specialized agencies. The programme could be adopted by all States sincerely desirous of putting the provisions of the Charter into effect; it was flexible enough to allow account to be taken of the particular conditions in each State. That programme had been based on four essential points: equal political rights; equal civil rights, including the very important right concerning marriage; equal economic rights; and equal rights of education. Some people had thought that bold plan too ambitious. The Economic and Social Council had understood its importance, however, and had seen that it constituted a kind of social revolution and that, for the first time in humanity's history, [892] emphasis had been laid on the need for studying the question of the equality of men and women from the economic, social and psychological point of view. The Economic and Social Council, understanding that experts in human rights were not necessarily experts in the rights of women, had established a commission which was to concern itself specially with those rights.

The work for the rights of women was the carrying out of the provisions of the Charter in a particular field of human rights. The Danish delegation was glad to see that the work had begun, and on the whole was satisfied by the provisions of the universal declaration of human rights relating to it. It wished, however, to stress that the word "everyone" should be understood as designating every man and every woman, and that it was sometimes desirable to repeat that the rights stated applied equally to men and women; it was necessary to repeat that without fear of incurring criticism, for that way of thinking was far from prevailing in the world. In that connection she recalled that the Declaration of the Rights of Man and of the Citizen proclaimed in France in 1789, which had so solemnly laid down the fundamental freedoms, made no mention of the rights of women and did not even imply them. The world had evolved since then, but men tended to be conservative when that was in accordance with their interests. It was therefore important to state clearly that the declaration applied equally to men and women. To do that was to do more than render women the justice which was their due; it was to appeal to all women to extend the field of their activities and to understand that humanity needed them as well as men in the reconstruction of a peaceful world in a new future.

The last phases of the work of the General Assembly had shown that the spirit of comprehension and of mutual concession was not sufficiently developed; the way of thinking and of feeling which was characteristic of women might perhaps bring about new atmosphere in the Organization and in the action it undertook.

Certainly, the rights of women were only one aspect of the rights and freedoms set forth in the declaration. But although it was only a partial aspect, it was none the less important. The rights of the individual should be carried out in two ways: first of all the present legislation of Member States had to be alerted, and then a current of public opinion which would influence men's thought had to be created. The latter point was perhaps the more important, for public [893] opinion crossed all boundaries and reached all human beings.

Mrs. Begtrup took that opportunity to appeal to all the statesmen present, through whose voice the will of the peoples was expressed, and asked them not to forget that the women of the whole world were ready to collaborate with their work in peace in order to protect their homes and their children from the horrors of a new war. Each time the declaration mentioned the word "everyone" it should be remembered that it alluded to the rights and responsibilities of women as well as men, in the work of peace.

MRS. MENON (India) recalled that her delegation had taken part from the outset in the work of the Commission on Human Rights. She supported the declaration which the Commission had drawn up. It provided a solid basis for the international co-operation referred to in Article 55 of the Charter; and it expressed the aspirations of peoples, who, though they had but recently attained political freedom, had always accepted and practised the noble ideals of religious tolerance and cultural freedom.

The full significance of the Indian delegation's attitude in the Third Committee could only be understood when considered in relation to the decision taken by the Indian Constituent Assembly to include in the Constitution of that country the same rights and freedoms as were proclaimed in the declaration.

The universal declaration of human rights was born from the need to reaffirm those rights after their violation during the war. It was now more than ever necessary to reaffirm those rights. The remedies to be applied to humanity had to be adapted to the seriousness of the conditions in which it lived; and when conditions deteriorated the remedy had to be all the stronger and more drastic.

That was one of the reasons why the present declaration was fuller and more detailed than all the other similar declarations. Earlier declarations had not mentioned rights such as the right to equal pay for equal work; the right of mothers and children to social protection, whether the children were born in or out of wedlock; the right to education; equality of rights for men and women. Those rights were the expression of a new social order, of true democracy based on social justice.

The listing of those rights and the consequences on the style and general form of the declaration had been commented upon too frequently for the matter to be ignored. Some delegations had objected to the repetition of certain phrases. Mrs. Menon thought, however, that harmony of [894] thought and purity of motive were much more important factors than mere beauty of words. The essential point was the contents of the declaration, and that ought not be sacrificed to considerations of style.

In accordance with the principles of the Charter, the declaration emphasized the equality of all human beings without any distinction whatsoever; and it proclaimed clearly, for the first time, that the rights mentioned were also applicable to Non-Self-Governing and Trust Territories. Those last provisions had been adopted by a large majority, despite the opposition of certain delegations. The indifference or opposition of certain States was significant, and should not be ignored. The stand of the Indian delegation on the matter had always been very firm and could not have given rise to any doubt. The Indian delegation stood, as always, against all forms of discrimination.

The Indian delegation had been reproached in certain quarters for lack of trust, and for its persistence in spelling out the obvious. Mrs. Menon declared that the attitude of her delegation had been inspired by the feeling that it was the duty of India, as a country which had just won its own independence, to help other countries which had not yet reached that stage.

Recalling how insistently the Indian delegation had stressed the importance of avoiding mention of any political doctrine either in the declaration or in the preamble, Mrs. Menon thanked the Third Committee for having understood that point of view. It would have been illogical to insist on political convictions which could not be shared by all, while at the same time proclaiming religious tolerance.

The right to hold different opinions was a sacred right and the prerogative of every truly democratic people. The Indian delegation had therefore upheld that right, though perfectly aware of the dangers inherent in it. India, like other countries, would never agree to restricting political rights in order to realize social aims, however noble those aims might be.

As regards article 30, the Indian delegation had accepted the restrictions it imposed, since, as Mahatma Gandhi had said, all rights were born of obligations, and no man could claim the right to live unless he fulfilled his duties as a citizen of the world. From the very fact that it proclaimed rights, therefore, the declaration was a declaration of obligations. Adoption of the declaration should not however lead to neglect of the most important document: the convention, the adoption of which the Indian Government was most [895] anxious to see; it hoped that it would be accompanied by effective measures for implementation.

In conclusion, Mrs. Menon expressed the hope that the declaration would pave the way to a new era of international solidarity, because the basis of rights was neither the State nor the individual, but the social human being, participating in social life, and striving for national and international co-operation.

MR. CHANG (China) pointed out that, in the course of the long debate on the universal declaration of human rights, representatives had reached agreement whenever they were concerned first and foremost with the defence of human rights. The disagreements had been due to preoccupation of a purely political nature.

Mr. Chang, who had worked for two years on drafting the declaration, hoped that it might prosper, nourished by the hope of mankind.

In the eighteenth century, when solemn declarations of the rights of man had been made in the west, the emphasis had been laid on human rights as contrasted with the divine right claimed by kings. The speaker stressed that Chinese thought had not been without influence on the evolution of those ideas in the western world. The first condition for defence of the rights of man was tolerance towards the various opinions and beliefs held throughout the world. Uncompromising dogmatism had caused much harm, by accentuating disputes, and lending them an ideological basis. In the present times, and more particularly during the years following the First World War, there had been a tendency to impose a standardized way of thinking and single way of life. With that approach, equilibrium could be reached only at the cost of moving away from the truth, or employing force. But, however violent the methods employed, equilibrium achieved in that way could never last. If harmony was to be maintained in the human community and humanity itself was to be saved, everyone had to accept, in a spirit of sincere tolerance, the different views and beliefs of his fellow men.

On the other hand, it was important that conceptions should be very accurately defined; that was no purely academic question. In the modern world, it was considered clever statesmanship to confuse one's adversary; but a real statesman could not tolerate confusion. Social order and peaceful co-operation could be achieved only if people learned to express clear ideas in precise terms. The disagreements all around were only too often the result of confusion spread [896] by the use – whether wilful or not – of inaccurate and ambiguous terms.

By pleading for tolerance of all opinions and beliefs and by insisting on precision of terminology, the Chinese delegation had striven to introduce certain improvements into the universal declaration of human rights.

MR. KAMINSKY (Byelorussian Soviet Socialist Republic), making a survey of the stages through which the declaration had passed, recalled that, in accordance with resolution 43(I) adopted by the General Assembly in December 1946, the declaration should reflect the spirit of the Charter. But as the document before the Assembly corresponded only partially to the aims proclaimed by the resolution, it was not certain that it could be finally adopted by the Assembly during that session.

The large number of amendments which had been moved to the original text was sufficient proof that the text did not fully satisfy the aims proposed. Few of those amendments, however, had been adopted, and as a result the final text of the declaration, while differing considerably from the original text, was not satisfactory to all delegations.

The declaration in its final form had many gaps. It was, in fact, merely a proclamation of human rights. It was true that it might lead to progressive respect for those rights if studied in scholastic institutions, but it should have fulfilled a less restricted purpose.

The restricted nature of the declaration was all the more regrettable in that it contained no guarantee of the rights it proclaimed. The aim of the amendments proposed by the USSR delegation had been to specify the measures for implementation of the rights proclaimed and to guarantee their application by the State within the framework of a democratic and progressive legislation. In rejecting those amendments, the Third Committee had distorted the meaning of the declaration. It was not sufficient to proclaim basic rights, such as the right to work, the right to equal pay for equal work, and social rights; it was also vital to think of their practical application.

The declaration did not even mention the existence of the State as such, and seemed thus to envisage the individual as being outside his own milieu. Moreover, it failed to lay due stress on the material conditions without which effective respect for the rights of individuals could not be [897] guaranteed. The delegation of the Byelorussian SSR could not accept that conception.

Furthermore, the declaration failed to proclaim the democratic principles which it was important to confirm. The right to a national culture, for instance, on which the Soviet Union had submitted an amendment, had not been mentioned. Yet that was a basic right, especially for the colonial peoples, which constituted almost half of the entire population of the world. Application of that right would enable millions of individuals to throw off the yoke of the colonial Powers.

There had also been no mention in the declaration of democracy's struggle against fascism and nazism. That struggle was an essential element in the protection of the rights of the individual. Certain capitalistic States, however, failed to recognize those rights. In other States, racial and nationalist campaigns were being carried on, and the forces of aggression were being let loose to sabotage the efforts of the democratic elements. Such facts could not be ignored, and yet the declaration did, in fact, ignore them.

The USSR delegation had submitted many amendments emphasizing the dangers of fascist reaction. One of those amendments had proposed that freedom of expression should be prohibited when it was being exercised for the purpose of fascist propaganda and incitement to racial hatred. Another had been aimed at the prohibition of fascist or anti-democratic organizations. The Third Committee, however, had not wished to admit such legitimate requirements, and the declaration was consequently silent on the necessity for combating fascism. Worse still, article 21 which dealt with freedom of association could be cited in its present form by fascist organizations, such as the Ku Klux Klan, to justify their activities.

Finally, articles 20 and 14, which dealt respectively with freedom to seek and impart information and freedom of movement within a State or outside its borders, did not allow for any limitation which the State might find it necessary to impose. They were contrary to the definite provisions of the Charter, which was based upon respect for the sovereign independence of States.

The delegation of the Soviet Union had objected to those deficiencies in the declaration and had tried to put the question in a more concrete and realistic perspective. But its realistic and democratic claims had not been understood. In its present form, therefore, the delegation of the Byelorussian SSR considered the declaration as unsatisfactory. It was particularly to be regretted that the declaration did not contain the provisions which the USSR delegation had proposed [898] in its amendment to article 3, and which had been opposed by the United Kingdom representative. There was nothing surprising in that opposition, nor in the text of the amendment which the same delegation had itself recently proposed to article 3 (A/778/Rev.1). The latter was intended strictly to limit the scope of the article, though it allowed it to apply in occupied Germany. It was clear that the colonial Powers objected to the application of the rights stated to colonial territories.

If the declaration were examined for its more novel elements, they would be found in the statement of the rights to education, to equal pay for equal work and to a series of economic rights. However, as those rights were not guaranteed in any way, the delegation of the Byelorussian SSR could not support the declaration.

Nevertheless, it thought that the text could be improved and, for that reason, it associated itself with the proposal of the Soviet Union that the draft declaration, together with the amendments which had been submitted, should be referred to the fourth regular session of the General Assembly, and that the text should be reconsidered with a view to its improvement. In the belief that the declaration could only be effective when it was truly democratic and progressive, the delegation of the Byelorussian SSR would vote in favour of the USSR proposal.

MR. PEARSON<sup>164</sup> (Canada) said that his Government regarded the universal declaration of human rights as inspired by the highest ideals and as expressing the most noble principles and aspirations. It believed that each nation would endeavour to implement it, in its own way and according to their own traditions.

<sup>164</sup> Lester B. Pearson (1897–1972) led the Canadian delegation to the third session of the General Assembly as Minister of External Affairs. He later served as President of the General Assembly and Prime Minister of Canada. He received the Nobel Peace Prize in 1957.

It was clearly impossible to secure the immediate application of such principles in an imperfect world. Moreover, some of the provisions of the Charter itself were not yet applied throughout the world; but such universal application of the principles contained in those documents should be the aim of all people.

The draft declaration, which was a simple statement of principles, had unfortunately been often worded in vague and imprecise language, but that disadvantage appeared to have been unavoidable. In Canada legislation was not passed when it was not possible to indicate the obligations demanded of the citizens in precise terms. That example had not, however, been [899] followed in the case of the universal declaration of human rights. Some articles had not been drawn up with sufficient precision to enable them to be translated into positive measures of implementation.

Article 22, for example, granted everyone the right to take part in the government of his country, whatever his political convictions. If the provisions of article 31 were disregarded, that might be taken as putting a State under the obligation of accepting for public office even a person who had openly stated his intention of destroying all the free institutions which the declaration of human rights was intended to protect. Without those institutions, which could only flourish in a liberal society, human rights would be a fiction.

In the view of the Canadian delegation, the imperfections and ambiguities of the draft declaration might have been removed if a body of jurists such as the International Law Commission, had been asked to review the text before it had been submitted to the General Assembly.

If the delegation of the Soviet Union had borne such a procedure in mind in submitting its draft resolution (A/785/Rev.2), the Canadian delegation would have supported it. But the representatives of the USSR and Ukrainian SSR had made it clear that they would take the opportunity for a further consideration of the draft to try again to introduce certain ideas which were far from having any connexion with human rights.

The Canadian delegation could not accept the theory that human rights should be limited to those sanctioned and sacrificed by the communist doctrine, while all others were to be outlawed as fascist. The term "fascism" which had once had a definite and dread meaning in the dictionary of despotism, was now being blurred by the abuse of applying it to any person or idea which was not communist.

For its part, Canada intended to protect the freedom of the individual within its territory, as it had done in the past. There, freedom was not only a matter of revolutions but of day-to-day practice, promoted by the jurisprudence and the laws as a whole, and Canada intended to persevere in that tradition.

In the Third Committee, the Canadian delegation had abstained from voting on some of the articles of the declaration, whenever those articles dealt with matters which, under the Canadian [900] Federal Constitution, came within the competence of the provincial governments. Mr. Pearson added that the Canadian Federal Government did not intend to encroach upon the rights of the provincial governments, to which the Canadian people attached as much importance as they did to the principles contained in the declaration. It had been for the same reason that his delegation had also abstained from the final vote in the Third Committee on the declaration as a whole.

Since the Government and people of Canada believed in and practised the principles of the declaration, the Canadian delegation, having defined the constitutional problems which adoption of the universal declaration of human rights would raise, would therefore vote for its adoption. It hoped that it would mark a milestone in humanity's upward march.

MR. ANZE MATIENZO (Bolivia) said that a breath of hope was being felt in the Assembly. Having survived a terrible war, the suffering world would soon have achieved universal recognition of human rights.

Henceforth, national and international law would provide a body of standards governing relations between the individual and the State on the one hand, and relations between the individual and the international community on the other. That community should inspire itself from humanitarian considerations. The association of peoples could only be maintained in so far as those peoples respected a number of moral principles in their political life and in the conduct of their Governments on the international plane.

Humanity would then enter upon a new phase which should lead to the establishment of a true international constitution, founded on the limitation of the sovereignty of States for the benefit of the individual.

Two opposing schools of thought had confronted each other in the discussion on that international moral code. There had been, on the one hand, the thesis upheld by the USSR, characterized by the desire to subordinate the individual to the State, and, on the other hand, the thesis supported by all the democratic countries, which was designed to make the individual capable of organizing a state, which, in turn, would respect the rights of the individual.

The Bolivian delegation had been instructed by its Government to pledge itself solemnly that Bolivia would adhere to all the provisions, which the Assembly was being called upon to adopt for the honour and wellbeing of humanity, as a [901] whole. As in the past, Bolivia would try to surmount the difficulties resulting from its geographical and ethnical complexity by subordinating the State to the individual.

The representative of the Ukrainian SSR had supported the thesis that the happiness of mankind should be subordinated to the interests of the all-powerful communist State. In that connexion, Mr. Anze Matienzo would only say that messianic worship of the State was closer to Hitler than to Roosevelt, and that the democratic peoples abhorred the former and venerated the latter.

In the western countries the situation was not as serious as had been suggested by Mr. Manuilsky. Everything was not as perfect as the peoples would wish; but, by steady improvement, the ideal defined by the universal declaration of human rights was being approached more closely.

MR. VASCONCELLOS (Paraguay) recalled that the defence of human rights had been in part of his country's tradition, from colonial times, when the famous Comuneros movement<sup>165</sup> had struggled desperately, and its members had laid down their lives, for the people's ideal.

The city which had nurtured the ideals of liberty, equality and fraternity had had the significant privilege of receiving the representatives of 58 nations, who were now being asked to approve a declaration which would be regarded as a beacon in the history of mankind.

The representative of Paraguay paid a grateful tribute to Mrs. Roosevelt, the Chairman of the Commission on Human Rights and the worthy companion of the great President, now departed, whose memory would be recalled whenever a great and noble task was being undertaken. Franklin Roosevelt had given an example of a life devoted to the service of peace and the welfare of humanity. In proclaiming the principles of the Atlantic Charter, he had both inspired and foreshadowed the universal declaration of human rights.

Though imperfect, the declaration was the most harmonious, comprehensive and universal that had been so far achieved. It would not, as if by a magic wand, end all the ills that afflicted humanity. But it would shed a light on the way men had to tread to reach happiness.

The principles of the declaration were very advanced, compared with the conditions prevailing in some countries. Millions of men would rejoice to think that they or their descendants would one day enjoy such elementary rights as [902] freedom to move about at will, freedom to choose where they would live, to enjoy the fruits of their labour, to benefit from social and economic security, the right to rest and enjoy leisure, and that they would, at last, no longer be cogs in the machine of the State, but would become free members of the great human family.

The universal declaration of human rights ought to inspire every national legislative body as well as collective international action. Nothing could justify its rejection. A few small amendments would be sufficient to make the declaration fully effective.

<sup>165</sup> The Comuneros, meaning common and poor people, led a rebellion in what is modern-day Colombia during the final years of Spanish colonialism. Inspired by the indigenous leader Tupac Amaru, their goals were social justice and an improved standard of living.

The delegation of Paraguay therefore wholeheartedly acceded to the universal declaration of human rights, which expressed the true raison d'être of humanity.

MISS BERNARDINO (Dominican Republic) reminded the Assembly of the efforts her delegation had made in the Third Committee to have equality of men and women stated explicitly in the universal declaration of human rights. The Dominican Republic had constantly supported that principle at all the Pan-American and international conferences in which it had been represented.

It was true the Charter of the United Nations proclaimed the absolute equality of men and women. But it was important that that principle, supplemented by more precise juridical concepts, should also be included in the instrument supporting the legitimate aspirations of women, especially in those countries where women had not yet won their place in society.

For that purpose, the delegation of the Dominican Republic had proposed an amendment to the preamble of the draft declaration. One of the aims of the declaration should be to encourage Governments to seek, in conformity with the circumstances prevailing in the different States, methods to abolish the inequalities of which women were the victims. That task would be made easier by the fact that traditional prejudices were giving way to a more humane conception which tended to recognize that social injustice towards a given group affected the wellbeing and progress of the whole community.

Faithful to the attitude it had adopted at the recent Conference at Bogotá, the delegation of the Dominican Republic had instituted that the principle of equal pay for equal work without distinction of race or sex should be inserted in the draft declaration. It was known that, in reality, [903] discrimination was systematically being practised against the women workers.

Miss Bernardino did not think it necessary to expound once more the many reasons which militated in favour of international recognition of the rights of women. The work of the Commission on the Status of Women and the decisions which it had taken sufficed to show that in the contemporary world there was a noticeable trend towards proclamation of the principle of the absolute equality of the two sexes.

The world's leaders had not always understood, however, that woman was a pivot of society with regard to the development and the implementation of democratic principles. For that reason Miss Bernardino appealed to the women of the world, as well as to all women's organizations to assert their strength, to fight against the elements opposing their aspirations and to give effect to the principles embodied in the declaration. The delegation of the Dominican Republic was convinced that the declaration, for which men and women the world over were anxiously waiting, would be approved by the General Assembly and would receive the unqualified support of all peoples.

In closing, Miss Bernardino paid a tribute to the members of the Commission on Human Rights for the remarkable work which they had done, as well as to its Chairman, Mrs. Roosevelt, who, conscious of the gravity of the hour and firmly convinced of the justice of the declaration, had devoted her time, energies and intelligence to that document.

MR. KATZ-SUCHY (Poland) wished to state at the beginning of his speech, that his delegation, considered that the General Assembly should not vote immediately on the draft declaration of human rights before it. Some improvements could then be made in the declaration which would make it not only more effective, but also acceptable to all the Members of the United Nations.

The Polish delegation asked that the vote should be postponed because it felt that the development and the encouragement of respect for human rights was one of the principal aims of the United Nations, as set forth in the Preamble of the Charter. Because it was profoundly aware of the importance of the problem, the Polish delegation had given its most ardent support to all the measures taken by the General Assembly and the Economic and Social Council to draw up a declaration of human rights.

It was, in fact, in the field of human rights that the activity of the United Nations for the maintenance of peace and international security could most successfully be carried out and on the broadest scale. That activity was the natural outcome of the struggle waged on the battlefields, a struggle designed principally to free humanity from attacks directed on human rights and human dignity.

The Polish delegation had welcomed the formation of the Commission on Human Rights. In the Economic and Social Council it had expressed its disappointment at the fact that the Council had only prepared the draft declaration and not the draft convention nor the measures of implementation which should have been elaborated simultaneously, especially in view of the fact that the declaration, as presented, was only an expression of principles with no legal force, with no provisions for implementation, and with only moral value.

The draft declaration presented to the General Assembly was as a whole not satisfactory. The discussions which had arisen while it was being drafted had shown, furthermore, that it had been calculated not to guarantee respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms. The draft, in fact, contained no details with regard to implementation and made no mention of the limitations to which the principles it proclaimed were subjected by the legislation of contemporary States. In present times, any declaration which failed to establish a close link between political rights and social and economic guarantees, and which did not assure a democratic basis for those rights, was pointless. The victory of the popular forces in several countries of Europe, however, had opened a wide road for the practical application of fundamental human rights by guaranteeing the political, economic and social liberties of the people.

The draft declaration which, according to some delegations should be considered as marking an important milestone on the road of human progress, in reality represented a step backward if compared with the Declaration of the Rights of Man and the Citizen, which had been produced during the French Revolution; if compared with the Communist Manifesto, which had proclaimed the compulsory nature of human rights a hundred years ago; and if compared with the principles which had inspired the October Revolution. It was surprising that, 30 years after that revolution, delegations such as that of the United States could appear before the United Nations and affirm that the declaration which the United Nations proposed to adopt could not impose on Governments the duty of assuring the enjoyment of those rights for their citizens; that it was [905] neither a treaty nor an international agreement; and that it therefore contained no legal obligations.

To have any weight in present times such a declaration should recognize, first of all, that the struggle for the respect of human rights and the struggle between democracy and fascism were closely linked. It should be emphasized that fascist ideology was based in part on the violation of human rights and on contempt of human dignity. Respect for human rights would only be assured by condemning fascism, by combating its remnants and by creating conditions of such a nature that no fascist regime could spring up again in any part of the world.

The Polish delegation noted with regret that such was not the case in reality. Fascist organizations were being encouraged in Germany; action against Franco Spain was being weakened; political fascism was cropping up again in many parts of the world. It noted with regret that, except in one article, the word "democracy" had been carefully deleted from the draft declaration and that nowhere in the document was there any allusion to the necessity of combating fascism.

There had even been some delegations which had maintained that it was difficult precisely to define the terms fascism and democracy. The United States delegation, in particular, had opposed the word "democracy" on the pretext that its inclusion would narrow the scope of the declaration.

Mr. Katz-Suchy stated that he had been surprised, on the preceding day (180th plenary meeting), to hear the representative of the United States of America inform the Assembly that her Government believed that the enjoyment of human rights should be subject to limitations in the interest of public order and the general welfare and that it would not consider that it was a violation of the declaration to dismiss from public employment persons whose political beliefs were subversive and whose attitude was contrary to the principles on which the Constitution of that country was based.

Thus, that delegation, which denounced an amendment intended to ensure that freedom of speech should be put at the service of the democratic ideal, on the pretext that it limited the scope of the declaration, did not hesitate in the same speech to defend the action taken against certain American Government officials, an action which had been criticized by the President of the United States himself.

Mr. Katz-Suchy could understand, on the other hand, that the representative of Chile, a country which had 40,000 political prisoners and which attacked its miners and its railwaymen [906] with machine-gun fire, would oppose the inclusion of the word "democracy" in article 20. The representative of Chile had stated that groups having political ties with foreign authorities or organizations could not be allowed to take part in the management of public affairs. That was a strange conception of democracy. Of course, the argument was not new. In the course of the centuries, each time that a people had wished to gain its freedom, each time that the world had witnessed the birth of a liberation movement among the colonial peoples, or the rise of new social aspirations, the forces in power had attributed those efforts to alien influences.

Mr. Katz-Suchy reminded the members of the General Assembly that the war against fascism dated only from yesterday. Then there had been no divergence of opinion with regard to the meaning of fascism and democracy. The various declarations made by the Allied Powers, the joint Declaration of the United States, the United Kingdom and the USSR concerning Italy, dated 1 November 1943, the Yalta Declaration of 11 February 1945, the Potsdam Agreement and the Declaration of 5 August 1945 clearly indicated that the Allied Powers were then resolved to suppress every vestige of fascism and nazism and to tolerate no discrimination of any kind. Mr. Katz-Suchy read excerpts from those Declarations to show that they expressly mentioned democracy and anti-democratic movements.

For the Polish nations, the term democracy, and the struggle against fascism, were not empty words. It had learned their true meaning on the battlefields; for them it had sacrificed millions of lives, the best of its blood. It would not, therefore, accept any declaration which was silent on the great struggle which humanity had waged against fascism.

Moreover, the draft declaration before the Assembly only went so far as to state traditional freedoms and rights of the old liberal school. It omitted to mention that the counterpart of those rights was the duties of the individual towards his neighbours, his family, his group and his nation. Article 30, which merely said that everyone had duties towards the community which enabled him freely to develop his personality, created the erroneous impression that those duties were solely based on a debt of gratitude and that, consequently, their fulfilment was left to the discretion of the individual. At the present stage of civilization, a declaration of human rights could not restrict itself to a mere statement of rights. If that were the case, the declaration would be a retrograde document which would not fit into the economic and social conditions of the most advanced States. For the Polish people, freedom and duty went together. In Poland, [907] the State was a product of society, -serving it and not hostile towards it. The individual had duties towards the State which, in turn, guaranteed his rights.

However, it was not enough to state rights; their observance had to be ensured. Society had to stand behind those freedoms; it had to establish and guarantee them, and to make a reality of a declaration which, without its help, would remain a dead letter. The right to work, to rest, the right to leisure of the working classes, the right of all children without exception to education, should be more than a statement in a declaration of principle; those rights should be based on reality.

The way in which most delegations overlooked reality had been particularly shown by the manner in which they had considered the principle of non-discrimination. Discussions which had taken place in that connexion had also revealed that those delegations had not been willing to admit that the capitalist regime permitted discrimination and that millions of people were victims of it at the present time, in the colonies and Non-Self-Governing Territories and even in certain sovereign States such as the United States of America.

In their refusal also to admit that in many parts of the world, woman was still being treated as an inferior being, those delegations had rejected all amendments aimed at reaffirming the principle of non-discrimination in the text of the declaration, maintaining that the general statement made in article 2 was entirely sufficient. It had been only after some hesitation that they had agreed to include in article 21 the principle of equal pay for equal work for men and women, both white and coloured.

Mr. Katz-Suchy further pointed out that that declaration of human rights, drawn up in the twentieth century, completely ignored the right of every person to speak his own language, and to have the protection of his national culture ensured. The additional article on that matter proposed by the USSR had been set aside on the pretext that it only concerned the rights of minorities and should be the subject of more thorough examination. Poland, whose national culture had suffered appalling violations, could not subscribe to a declaration with such an omission.

Thus Poland, whose cultural life had been suppressed by Nazi Germany throughout six long years, was being confronted with a declaration allowing fascism full freedom of action. It had before it an article on the freedom of the Press which permitted propaganda inciting to hatred, [908] and another article on the right of asylum which sheltered fascist adventurers and even war criminals. Nor did the declaration contain any guarantee safeguarding the sovereignty of States with regard to their internal jurisdiction, although such a guarantee would prevent any abuse of freedoms and ensure the effective enjoyment of rights.

In respect of freedom to conduct scientific research, Mr. Katz-Suchy pointed out to what misuse that freedom could lead and to what restrictions it could be submitted. As instances, he cited the experiments carried out by the Nazis and the work at present being done on atomic energy in the United States. Recalling that it was the duty of the scientists and intellectuals to contribute to the maintenance of peace, the Polish representative read the appeal for peace published by the representative of 45 nations, who had met at the Congress of Intellectuals held at Wroclaw in August 1948.<sup>166</sup> That appeal, made by the responsible voices of more than 500 eminent men who had considered it necessary to warn the world, in view of growing tension and of the renewal of fascist propaganda, should be heeded.

He then referred to certain expressions used by the Canadian representative who had spoken of slavery, world communism and oppression in connexion with the proposals of the Soviet Union. In that respect, he wished to draw the attention of the Canadian representative to certain facts in which the Polish delegation was particularly interested: for instance, he would refer to the Manitoba camp, in Canada, where 325 Poles lived in conditions closely resembling slavery or to the case of the manufacturer Dyon and the foreign girls whose labour he exploited. He would like to know, among other things, what had become of the art treasures which Poland had entrusted to Canada for safekeeping on the outbreak of war and which had not yet been returned in spite of its rightful claims.<sup>167</sup>

Returning to the universal declaration of human rights, the Polish representative stressed the fact that its importance would depend on the extent of its implementation, and particularly on its application to all countries, whatever their legal status. He pointed out that the most ardent defenders of human rights forgot those rights when dealing with the colonial question. When it was a question of applying progressive measures to the colonies, they invoked local legislatures and the need to abide by the wishes of the populations. In trying, in the course of his last statement, to amend a text adopted by the Third Committee, the United Kingdom representative, in an attempt to justify his delegation's stand with respect to the article on the applica-[909]tion of the declaration to the colonies, had spoken of concentration camps and labour camps. Was he not aware that the British colonies were a gigantic enterprise for the exploitation of cheap labour? That was sufficiently evident from the reports submitted to the Trusteeship Council by the Non-Self-Governing Territories, each page of which showed that oppression, slavery and exploitation of labour, to a hitherto unknown degree, were the characteristic features of colonial administration.

<sup>167</sup> In 1939, the Polish authorities entrusted Canada with the royal collection of treasures from the Wawel Castle in Krakow. At the conclusion of the war, the Polish government in exile with the assistance of government authorities attempted to conceal the treasure from the new communist government. The art was returned to Poland in 1961.

The Polish delegation would therefore vote for the USSR proposal to defer the vote on the draft declaration of human rights, as it thought that the draft had so many omissions that it should be the subject of further study and discussion during the fourth session of the General Assembly.

He emphasized that if he had been sure that the declaration would give the results that were hoped for, it would be applied to the colonies in the near future, it would help to save the defenders of liberty and democracy awaiting their death sentences in the prisons of France, or help the peoples struggling against United Kingdom domination; if he had thought that its adoption would ensure that the negroes of Mississippi would have the right to vote, that the provisions of article 14 would be applied to the immigrants wishing to enter the United States, that Pablo Neruda would be able to walk freely about the streets of Santiago and that the living conditions of the workers of the Gold Coast<sup>168</sup> and Uganda would be improved, he would not have hesitated to vote for it, in spite of its many imperfections. It had however been clearly established that it was merely a declaration of principles, which no Government would be obliged to implement. Under those conditions, its adoption did not seem to be a matter of any apparent urgency.

Mr. Katz-Suchy, stated that the Polish Government knew what it was defending in defending the principles set forth in its own legislation. One of the first acts of the Parliament which had been called upon to reconstruct the political system of the State, after the total destruction wrought by the war, had, in fact, been to promulgate a declaration of the rights of the citizen.

The Polish delegation wanted those principles, with which benefits it was acquainted, to be extended to all parts of the world. It fully recognized the positive aspect of the draft declaration, but thought it would be possible to improve it further, even at that stage. For that reason it requested the General Assembly not to regard the consideration of it as closed, so that agreement might be reached on a declaration worthy of [910] democratic progress and fully in keeping with the times.

MR. ANDREWS (Union of South Africa) stated that after the remarks made by the Polish representative, his delegation would first wish to pay a tribute to the magnificent work accomplished by Mrs. Franklin Roosevelt and to the devotion and sincerity she had shown in participating in drawing up the draft declaration of human rights.

He then explained the reasons why his delegation would abstain from voting on the draft declaration of human rights. In the Third Committee, at its 90th meeting, the South African representative had stressed the fact that the declaration, although it was not in the nature of an international convention, would none the less impose certain obligations on Member States if it were accepted by the General Assembly, as it would probably be interpreted as an authoritative definition of fundamental rights and freedoms which had been left undefined in the Charter. If such an interpretation were accepted, those Member States who voted for the draft declaration would be bound in the same manner as if they had signed a convention embodying those principles, with the difference however that, in the case of a convention, the obligations undertaken would be clearly defined, whereas in the declaration there were set out a number of human rights which were not only very loosely stated but which few States would be prepared to undertake as a legal obligation.

On the same occasion, the head of the South African delegation expressed apprehension that the draft declaration went far beyond fundamental human rights, and doubt as to the wisdom of a declaration which would be honoured in the breach rather than in the observance of its provisions. Finally, he had warned the Committee against the risk of having its debates exploited for purposes of political and ideological propaganda.

The course of the debates had taken seemed fully to have justified the South African representative's apprehensions. Instead of remaining on the high plane of moral principles, statements had often taken the form of attacks on Member States. It was interesting to note that those attacks were generally made by delegations representing countries where some of the most elementary freedoms mentioned in the draft declaration were not being implemented.

Moreover, the draft declaration submitted to the General Assembly went far beyond the rights and freedoms contemplated in the Charter. It was clear from the provisions of the Charter that [911] social, cultural and economic rights had never been intended to be included in the draft declaration. Indeed, the preamble, as well as articles 1, 13, 55, 62 and 76 dealt with economic, social and cultural problems quite independently of measures for "the promotion and encouragement of and respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms". The Charter therefore made a clear distinction between those two subjects.

The laws in force in the Union of South Africa ensured that everyone, without distinction of race, creed or sex, was able to enjoy all the fundamental rights and freedoms, such as inviolability of the person and property, freedom of conscience and religion, freedom of thought, personal liberty, equal justice in the courts of law, etc. In that respect, the Union of South Africa was second to no State represented in the Assembly.

It was such elementary basic rights that the Charter intended to proclaim in order to ensure human dignity. However, it certainly did not contemplate, as falling within the category of fundamental human rights, certain rights to which the Union of South Africa could not subscribe and in connexion with which it could not help wondering how many Member States would be willing or able to put them into practice.

There was, for instance, "the right to employment and remuneration". The Union of South Africa spared no effort to obtain work for all who needed it, but it could not commit itself to guaranteeing full employment to everyone. The adoption of such an article would create an obligation, which probably very few States would be able to fulfil.

If the delegation was not intended to entail any obligations, it would be lacking in all practical value. Yet, according to the views expressed by several delegations in the Third Committee, which had taken the declaration to be a definition of the rights and freedoms mentioned in the Charter, the adoption of the declaration would entail certain legal obligations for the Governments subscribing to it. He wondered whether the delegations supporting that view realized to what extent they were committing their Governments. The scope of the declaration was such, indeed, that many questions, hitherto considered as falling wholly within the sphere of domestic jurisdiction of States, could in future be the subject of discussion, and even condemnation, by the General Assembly.

For the reasons stated, the South African delegation felt regretfully compelled to abstain from voting on the draft declaration.

Draft resolution proposed by the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics (A/785/Rev.2).

MR. RAAFAT (Egypt) said that his delegation appreciated the high ideals which had guided the Third Committee in its work, the result of which was the declaration of human rights now before the Assembly. That declaration, together with the Convention on Genocide, already unanimously adopted by the Assembly, constituted a real step forward in the establishment of legal and humanitarian principles.

Many of the principles set forth in the declaration of human rights were already established in the democratic constitutions of different countries, including Egypt. Mr. Raafat, however, wished to make certain reservations with regard to article 17 and 19 of the draft declaration.

Article 17 referred to the freedom to contract marriage without any restrictions as to race, nationality or religion. In Egypt, as in almost all Moslem countries, certain restrictions and limitations existed regarding the marriage of Moslem women with persons belonging to another faith. Those limitations were of a religious character, sprung from the very spirit of the Moslem religion, and therefore could not be ignored. They did not, however, shock the universal conscience, as did, for instance, the restrictions based on nationality, race or colour, which existed in certain countries and which were not only condemned, but unknown in Egypt.

With regard to article 19, Mr. Raafat pointed out that that text did not confine itself to proclaiming freedom of thought, conscience and religion – which of course his Government [913] approved without reservations – but that it also proclaimed man's right to change his religion or belief; the Egyptian delegation was not entirely in agreement with that "right". Religious beliefs could not be cast aside lightly. When a man changed his religion it was often due to outside influences or for purposes which were not very commendable, such as divorce. His delegation feared that by proclaiming man's freedom to change his religion or belief the declaration would be encouraging, even though it might not be intentional, the machinations of certain missions, well known in the Orient, which relentlessly pursued their efforts to convert to their own beliefs the masses of the population of the Orient. Mr. Raafat said that he might have withheld the reservations he had made on articles 17 and 19, but it seemed more loyal and frank to have stated them, since, in voting for the declaration, his country intended to apply and execute it in all honesty.

He concluded by stating that having submitted those explanations, which he wished to have inserted in the summary record, his delegation was ready to vote in favour of the declaration of human rights.

MR. RADOVANOVIC (Yugoslavia) said that the declaration of human rights was considered by many delegations as one of the most important questions dealt with during the third session of the General Assembly. Many representatives had stressed the historical importance of the new declaration, which the United Nations was about to offer to humanity.

The Yugoslav representative considered that, in spite of certain provisions of a progressive character, the text of the declaration gave rise to a number of serious objections.

In the first place, his delegation felt that the principles of human rights set out in the declaration lagged behind the social progress achieved in modern times; and that they did not grant full juridical and social protection to man. So as to have historical and juridical value, the declaration of human rights ought to reflect fully the progressive tendencies of the present generation. It should also provide a more general protection to man, not only as an individual but as a member of social groups, since a number of important human rights resulted from the interdependence existing between man and the community to which he belonged.

The text before the Assembly was based on individualistic concepts which considered man as an isolated individual having rights only as an individual, independently of the social conditions in which he was living and of all the forces which acted upon his social status. The Declaration of the Rights of Man of 1789 might have been drawn up on such a basis. At that time it represented a revolt against the feudal slavery of man and was the expression of a new and progressive concept of individual freedom. However, the individualistic doctrine which had liberated man from feudal slavery, at the end of the eighteenth century, had re-introduced that slavery in the course of the social development which had taken place during the second half of the nineteenth century, and in particular during the current century, within the framework of a new social capitalistic order which had brought man into a situation of dependence and economic subjugation. In theory, he was entitled to all kinds of human rights, but in reality, the enjoyment of those rights was not fully granted.

The economic factor had become decisive in the whole social development of the present time. Consequently, the social status of the individual was not based on juridical instruments but was the result of the social and economic conditions in which that individual lived. That meant that the civil and political status of the individual had become in a very great measure dependent upon his social status.

The radical change in social conditions emphasized the necessity to widen the traditional categories of human rights – which generally included political and civil rights – and of establishing a system of social rights, including the collective ones for certain communities. In the opinion of the Yugoslav delegation, the draft declaration of human rights did not pay sufficient attention to the new requirements of modern society or to the recognition of social rights. Generally speaking, it was a declaration of the political and civil rights of man. Of its 29 articles, 20 had those rights as their objectives. Undoubtedly, the category of political and civil rights was of the greatest importance to the individual and without the recognition of those rights, his own protection was impossible. However, Mr. Radovanovic pointed out that many of the rights which the Declaration contained had already been included in previous declarations drawn up during the last 150 years, and they had also been introduced by legislative or constitutional measures in almost all modern States. In that sense, therefore, the declaration appeared to be an instrument of international codification rather than an instrument which [915] opened a new and brighter future for the individual in the vast field of social rights.

In the opinion of the Yugoslav delegation, in a modern declaration the inclusion of those traditional categories of human rights was necessary; they were not new as they were already recognized in the legislation of modern States, but they were not being fully respected throughout the world.

The historical development of the capitalistic society had imposed on the individual unfavourable economic conditions. Therefore, a simple declaration of those rights without providing assurances of adequate material conditions in which they could be enjoyed would be illusory. Moreover, fascism which was the enemy of democracy and of international peace as well as of human rights, though militarily defeated in the last war, had not yet been rendered completely harmless. On the contrary, it continued to exist and was very active.

The declaration of human rights, drawn up after the terrible trials humanity had undergone as a result of fascism, could not remain passive before such an enemy. The principal objective of the new declaration of human rights should not have been to simply enumerate those rights in terms which were already widely known, but the social and material conditions necessary for their enjoyment. Fascism ought to be denied the right to use democratic institutions for its fight against democracy. Only in that manner would the declaration of rights represent a step forward in the recognition and protection of human rights – at least in respect of political and civil rights. But the declaration had not gone further than the old concepts, and the Yugoslav delegation regretted that the continuous efforts of certain delegations, and in particular those of the USSR delegation with which the Yugoslav delegation concurred, had not found, in that respect, sufficient understanding on the part of the majority of the Committee; many proposals, which would have given the declaration a progressive and decisive character, had been rejected. It was only in certain articles that the draft declaration had widened the traditional category of human rights by the inclusion of provisions covering social rights. In the new part of the declaration dealing with the proclamation of social rights, particularly in respect to social rights which should be recognized so as to protect man against the system exploiting him in the social capitalist order, the draft was in a great measure inadequate. It had not even adopted the system of social protection of the worker which had already been established before the Second World War in a series of international conventions drawn up in collaboration with the International Labour Office.

Mr. Radovanovic enumerated some of the deficiencies and omissions contained in the declaration with regard to the physical protection of the working man.

Because of the position which had been adopted in respect of the social rights of man, in the opinion of the Yugoslav delegation, the declaration did not guarantee a sufficiently stable situation to man in so far as his political and civil rights were concerned. The strictly individualistic attitude of the majority of the Third Committee – which was also the fundamental characteristic of the declaration – had led to another important shortcoming, namely, the absence of provisions to protect different communities, such as national minorities.

The declaration was, in certain respects, not based on reality, because it described man as an isolated individual and overlooked the fact that he was also a member of a community. The inclusion of that concept had considerably reduced the objective value of the declaration.

The wellbeing of man depended in a very great measure on the conditions existing in the community to which he belonged, and, therefore, the protection of that community, whether social, religious or of any other character, ought to have been included among human rights. The need for the protection of the rights of national minorities became even more imperative. It was impossible to conceive that the rights of a member of a community could be guaranteed if the community to which he belonged was oppressed and persecuted. In that respect, one of the most serious shortcomings of the declaration was the fact that it did not contain any provisions for the protection of national minorities, and that it did not mention the rights of the individual resulting from such protection.

All those shortcomings, and others which he had not expressly mentioned, reduced, in a great measure, the political efficacy of the draft declaration before the Assembly; because of those shortcomings, the Yugoslav delegation was not entirely satisfied with the text. It had hoped that the discussion in the Third Committee would have resulted in a more complete and more progressive text, better adapted to present times.

However, in spite of all those shortcomings, the draft declaration contained certain positive aspects. In the first place, the Yugoslav delegation wished to stress the importance of the provisions of article 3 on the application of the declaration of human rights to the populations of mandated and Non-Self-Governing territories. In that respect, the declaration represented one of the few international documents in which the unjust and discriminatory colonial clause was not only abandoned but replaced by another clause having an opposite effect and recognized the equality between the colonial populations and those of other territories. That provision represented a step forward which was worthy of note as it contained the great principle of justice towards the unhappy colonial peoples who had always been denied that right.

With regard to the other provisions contained in the declaration, the Yugoslav representative pointed out that while the part of the declaration dealing with the social rights was inadequate, it nevertheless contained two important principles concerning social protection with regard to work as well as social insurance. Finally, in the part relating to the political and social rights, the declaration contained provisions which the Yugoslav representative thought useful.

The delegation of the USSR had submitted several amendments which would considerably improve the text of the draft. The new proposal concerning article 3 introduced in the declaration the protection of national communities and minorities; the absence of their protection was a serious omission to which the Yugoslav delegation had previously drawn the attention of the General Assembly.<sup>1</sup> The new USSR proposal relating to article 20 included the necessary protection against fascism which would give the declaration a decisive democratic character. The further USSR proposal relating to article 22, confirming and defining the fundamental democratic principle with regard to public powers, should also be considered in the same light.

All those amendments would considerably increase the value of the draft declaration and correct its shortcomings to a large extent. For those reasons, the Yugoslav delegation would vote in favour of the amendments submitted by the USSR.

On the other hand, it did not see that any useful purpose would be gained by the adoption of the amendment submitted by the United

Kingdom which in no way improved the present drafting of article 3. On the contrary, it might even weaken the text because it proposed the replacement of a specific provision proclaiming the equality of colonial peoples with those of other territories by a provision covering the general equality of peoples. In the opinion of the Yugoslav delegation, the colonial world was, in general, under a rule of cruel inequality and such an explicit statement was necessary.

In conclusion, the Yugoslav representative stated that his dissatisfaction did not concern the principles envisaged in the draft – although he would have wished the text to have been more complete – but rather its serious shortcomings and omissions.

The Yugoslav delegation hoped that the General Assembly would adopt the amendments submitted by the USSR delegation which would greatly strengthen the value and authority of the declaration and rectify some of the omissions.

MR. CARRERA ANDRADE (Ecuador) said that throughout many centuries of political struggle to bring about human unity, the climax had now been reached with the preparation of the document in which 58 nations had expressed their common ideal and their identity of thoughts regarding fundamental human rights. From time immemorial, man had sought an international standard which would make peace and the universal concept of human rights a reality. Throughout the world man had endeavoured to establish an atmosphere of justice to allow him to live and prosper within the framework of social, juridical, political, moral and religious rights. From the ruins of the destruction wrought by the Second World War, man had once again fanned the immortal flame of civilization, freedom, and law. The multiplicity of origin of human rights could be detected in reading the articles of the declaration. It was true that some of the articles had already become part of the Constitutions of many Member States whose democratic systems made their exercise possible, but that gave added strength to the declaration as it was proof that that international document was based on political realities and not on utopias.

Many of the rights established in the declaration had been the heritage of mankind for several years, but others had only recently come into existence, such as the right of man to work and his right to benefit from his leisure, the right to a decent standard of living, and the right to social security. All those rights constituted the [919] real triumph of the twentieth century, and were the foundation for the modern democratic system which believed that social peace depended on the wellbeing of the individual.

In the social systems being developed, there existed a close interdependence between man, the State and world order; thus if man were given peace and economic security the whole world would also enjoy that peace and security.

The delegation of Ecuador would not support any draft resolution recommending that the declaration of human rights should be referred back to the Third Committee for redrafting. Such a delay would not improve the international atmosphere and would dash the hopes of the ordinary people of the world, who today were not only expecting the restoration of material ruins but that of the human dignity as well.

Nazism and fascism having been destroyed, so had the brutal totalitarian States. The United Nations should strive for a new democratic internationalism which would have as its objective not war or conflicts, but the establishment of a lasting peace. It was the duty of democratic systems to create a just social order so as to make a century of progress possible.

The declaration of human rights contained a number of new rights which were the logical result of the victory of democracy and of the birth of that internationalist spirit to which he had just referred. Certain clauses dealt with social order while others dealt with the universal protection of human rights. All men had the right to live in a world ruled by justice and where laws were respected and freedoms recognized. The inclusion of those provisions was one of the great triumphs of the United Nations. The declaration of human rights had been drafted by the Third Committee with the help of specialized agencies which had based their work on long years of experience. An effort had been made to establish the status which a man should have from birth, and the document was based on social and international understanding.

The delegation of Ecuador had proposed in the Drafting Sub-Committee that the declaration should have a more rational structure. Its intent had been to enumerate all rights from the general to the particular, namely, the right to live, the right to work, and the right to enjoy a decent standard of living, but those proposals had not been accepted by the majority of the Com-[920]mittee. The terms of the first article of the declaration were familiar inasmuch as they were similar to those of the Declaration of Bogotá. The contribution of the delegation of Ecuador to that document could be found in articles 10 and 24 which dealt with the freedom and physical integrity of man, as well as his right to work.

The Declaration of Bogotá had established the right to prevent not only arbitrary imprisonment and arrest, but also the archaic custom of exile which certain Latin-American countries continued to practise. Man should not be exiled, for he often preferred his country to his life. Many delegations in the Third Committee had supported the proposal of the delegation of Ecuador to include the prohibition of exile among the provisions set forth in article 10.

In the Drafting Sub-Committee, his delegation had proposed the inclusion of a clause dealing with social protection so that sufficiently high salaries would be paid to enable workers to live in human dignity. That clause to article 24 had been adopted by the Third Committee.

The declaration of human rights did not perhaps satisfy everybody but in such a period of historic evolution, it was first of all necessary to deal with the essential concepts. The best way of deciding whether the declaration was incomplete or unsatisfactory might be to allow it time and then judge from the results obtained. The declaration of human rights would bring a healthy democratic influence upon people's lives and would assure them the necessary protection. The document could be considered as a further step on the road to peace, for the democratic States were closely linked by their conventions and international treaties resulting from the vigilance of public opinion and a free Press. When international agreements were respected, no one would have recourse to war. For that reason, the world should view with alarm those countries where human rights were interfered with, as such interference endangered collective security.

Mr. Carrera Andrade appealed to the States represented in the Assembly not to delay the adoption of the declaration of human rights which would have only one result, namely, to increase the disappointment already felt in the world and to delay the efforts of the United Nations to preserve peace.

The historic moment had come to proclaim the dignity of man and his faith in the progress of society, as well as in legal standards which would lead him towards a new era of justice and culture.

MR. ABDUL RAHMAN KAYALY (Syria) said that in his delegation's view, the declaration set forth the principles already included in the constitution adopted and put into force in Syria five years previously. Thus, the Syrian delegation had been anxious to take part in the discussion and to help in the drafting of the declaration. It did not believe that it was perfect, or that it fulfilled all the aspirations of humanity. The declaration had to be perfected; it needed some additions. But those additions could not be made in one year; many years of experience were necessary.

During the examination of the articles of the declaration in the Third Committee, it had been found that there were certain ideas or principles on which not all members were in agreement; the Syrian delegation had opposed some points and had agreed to others. It would, however, go along with the majority because democracy implied acceptance of the majority's decisions.

Throughout the discussion, the Syrian delegation had upheld three principles:

Firstly, the declaration should deal with the rights of individuals and not with those of the State or society. It should deal with human beings as individuals because, without the security and the welfare of the individual, society could not exist. The other aspect of the question had to be covered by other declarations, which would be established by means of international agreements;

Secondly, the principles set forth should be harmonious, logical, clear, concise, exact and understandable to all; there were to be no ambiguities;

Thirdly, there should be no contradiction between the declaration and the United Nations Charter. The declaration dealt for the most part with abstract principles and ideals the application of which had been left to future instruments of implementation. That was why the articles were short and precise.

It was in that spirit that the nations had to collaborate with each other; the Syrian delegation, together with many others, believed that the troubles of the world were not due to differences between power and weakness, or between small and great nations; neither were they due to the lack of equilibrium between individual nations, but to the fact that human beings did not have equal chances. Given freedom and [922] equal chances to develop their capacities and to follow their natural tendencies, men would live in friendship with one another. Human beings should be given equal chances to live as all men wished to live.

If there were no social justice, individuals would fight against each other and there would be no peace in the world. For that reason the great reformers, thinkers and philosophers had laboured hard for many centuries to establish a declaration of human rights to fulfil the requirements of social justice by giving an equal chance to all on a basis of universal brotherhood, to which article 1 of the present declaration referred. Mr. Kayaly recalled that he had asked the Third Committee for the meaning of that word "brotherhood", and had found that everyone understood it to mean the individual's right to live, to be free and to live in security. It was surprising, in the circumstances, that the concept of brotherhood had had to be defined; other questions outside the present declaration were even more in need of definition.

Some representatives had expressed disapproval of the declaration because it was not perfect, or because some Governments did not apply its principles in their own territories, in territories which they held under Trusteeship, or in their colonies; it had also been suggested that the declaration should be referred to the fourth regular session of the General Assembly, so that the Economic and Social Council might reconsider it. But what more could the Economic and Social Council do than to approve the declaration as it stood? It was not the first time that human rights had been declared; they had often been proclaimed in the course of history; those earlier declarations had not all been perfect and they had not all been applied; civilization had progressed slowly, through centuries of persecution and tyranny, until, finally, the present declaration had been drawn up. It was not the work of a few representatives in the Assembly or in the Economic and Social Council; it was the achievement of generations of human beings who had worked towards that end. Now at last the peoples of the world would hear it proclaimed that their aim had been reached by the United Nations.

The nations should endeavour to work incessantly with faith and determination to honour the rights of the human being as proclaimed in the present declaration, and to ensure that they were put into effect in their legislations, their policies, their forms of government, and their education, thus bringing peace nearer.

Mr. Kayaly believed that Members who had criticized other States were mistaken in their attitude. They had claimed that their Governments were perfect in everything they attempted to do, while others were always wrong. They would do well to consider whether their claims were justified, and whether such an attitude could lead them to perfection.

The Government of Syria was determined to observe such rights as would ensure that all individuals would take their proper place in the brotherhood of men; it hoped that its approach was practical rather than theoretical. Mr. Kayaly called upon the Members not to be arbitrary in their attitude and not to try to separate the nations. He appealed to them not to try to enslave other nations; any nation which tried to enslave another would in turn enslave itself: the same applied to any individual.

MR. VYSHINSKY (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) recalled that his delegation and other delegations which shared its views had already stated their position in respect of the declaration of human rights submitted by the Third Committee to the General Assembly, and had referred to concrete articles of the declaration to explain their view that the draft was unsatisfactory. Though, as he had said at a previous meeting, the declaration contained a number of positive elements and was not without merit, it did not befit the General Assembly to issue such a document on behalf of the United Nations, precisely because of the significance that a declaration of human rights had to have. The USSR delegation had pointed out that a number of articles completely ignored the sovereign rights of democratic Governments, moreover, that the draft contained provisions directly contradicting those of the Charter, which prohibited interference in the internal affairs of States.

The USSR delegation had also pointed out that it had spared no effort to eliminate those shortcomings from the declaration. It had not succeeded, and that was one of the main reasons why it could not support the declaration.

A certain theory which had already been advanced by some Members at the previous session was now being upheld; it was the entirely false theory that the principle of national sovereignty was a reactionary and out-dated idea, and that the repudiation of that principle was an essential condition of international co-operation. The draft declaration of human rights appeared to endorse that reactionary view directed against [924] national sovereignty and was therefore entirely inconsistent with the principles of the United Nations. It was sometimes argued that the declaration on human rights should not touch on matters of national significance because it was devoted to the rights of individual human beings. It was impossible to agree to such a view, if only because human rights could not be conceived outside the State; the very concept of right and law was connected with that of the State. Human rights meant nothing unless they were guaranteed and protected by the State; otherwise they became a mere abstraction, an empty illusion easily created but just as easily dispelled.

The representative of France had stated that Hitler, too, had proclaimed absolute sovereignty. He had quoted Hitler as saying that everyone was master in his own house and had argued that that attitude, constituting a crime against the human rights of the German people, had led to greater crimes against human rights in other countries.

Such an interpretation of the reasons for the Second World War, however, did not correspond to the facts. The reasons for the Second World War were not to be sought in the violation of the human rights of the German people, but in the policy of the leading European statesmen of that time, namely Daladier and Chamberlain, supported by the Government of the United States of America. The substance of that foreign policy had consisted in encouraging the re-establishment the war potential of Hitlerite Germany, so as to direct German aggression towards the Soviet Union and the East. The French representative, in making his remarks, had forgotten the real reasons leading up to the Second World War.

The question of national sovereignty was a matter of the greatest importance. Many experts in international law defined national sovereignty as the right of a State to act according to its own will, never serving as a tool of the policy of another State: such an evaluation was closer to the truth than the French representative's view.

Another school of thought, however, adopted a really reactionary position by attacking the principle of national sovereignty; there was a tendency to forget that if sovereignty were destroyed, the State itself might not survive. Propaganda against national sovereignty disguised by attacks against absolute sovereignty was nothing but an ideological preparation for a country's political surrender to a more powerful State and its economic might. The USSR delegation thought it [925] necessary to warn Members against such attempts, to warn public opinion against plans of world domination threatening the economic and political independence of other and weaker States. The independence and wellbeing of a nation depended on the principle of national sovereignty: that was why the USSR delegation rejected the arguments against national sovereignty advanced by the representative of France. The latter might have been inspired by the examples of Mr. Eden, who had stated in the House of Commons on 22 November 1945 that, following the advent of the atom bomb, the world could save itself only by abandoning its present conception of sovereignty, or by Mr. Bevin, who had said that national sovereignty would soon be replaced by the sovereignty of mankind as a whole.

The principle of national sovereignty was the sole protector of the smaller countries against the expansionist dreams of more powerful States; although in some cases it had been undermined by such measures as the Marshall Plan and the creation of the Western European political bloc, the principle of national sovereignty still retained its force.

Throughout the preparatory work on the declaration of human rights, the USSR delegation had done its utmost to ensure that the declaration should at least meet two basic requirements: it should guarantee respect of human rights and of fundamental freedoms for all, without discrimination as to race, nationality, class, religion, language and sex, in accordance with the principles of democracy, national sovereignty and the political independence of the State; and it should not only proclaim human rights but also ensure their observance, taking into account the economic, social and national conditions of each country.

The declaration ought not to limit itself at formally establishing the rights of citizens; it should not only proclaim the equality of human rights, but also guarantee their observance by definite concrete means. A document such as the declaration of human rights could not be expected to have the force of a national constitution; nevertheless, it should not remain within the narrow confines of abstract statements of principle. The draft declaration before the Assembly did not meet those requirements. It was for that reason that the USSR delegation had proposed at the 180th plenary meeting that the approval of the declaration of human rights, with all the resolutions appended to it, should be deferred until the following session. If, however, that proposition were rejected, the USSR delegation wished to propose a number of amendments which would improve the declaration to a considerable degree.

Mr. Vyshinsky recalled a statement made by Generalissimo Stalin to the effect that the Soviet Constitution was based on the equality of all nations and races and on the fact that differences in colour, language, cultural level or national development could not justify a lack of national equality. The constitutions of capitalist countries, on the other hand, were based on the assumption that races and nations did not have equal rights. It would be advisable to reconsider that statement in the light of the draft declaration before the Assembly which was distinguished by the same characteristics as the constitutions of the capitalist countries. That was true in particular of article 2; while proclaiming equal rights without distinction as to race, nationality, language and so forth, that article confined itself to the general statement that everyone was entitled to all the rights and freedoms set forth in the declaration. That statement was entirely inadequate; article 3, which consisted in the statement that the rights set forth in the declaration applied equally to all inhabitants of Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories, was still less satisfactory.

The USSR delegation wished to stress that the draft declaration contained no reference to the highly important question of the right of all nations to self-determination. The establishment of that right was one of the major achievements of the internal policy of the USSR. While the USSR delegation did not expect that right to be proclaimed in the declaration of human rights with the same forcefulness as in the Soviet Constitution, it believed that the example of the Soviet achievement should not be left out of account. It considered article 3 to be inadequate because it went no further than to proclaim the rights of inhabitants of Trust and Non-Self-Governing Territories; it therefore thought it necessary to replace article 3 by a new text contained in document A/784. In that connexion, Mr. Vyshinsky recalled that Mr. Molotov had described the solution of the question of nationalities in the Soviet Union as one of the most instructive facts of modern times.

The question of nationalities was still very far from a solution in a number of States which lacked the necessary economic, social and political conditions. In establishing a declaration of human rights on behalf of all the Members of the United Nations that fact could not be disregarded; on the other hand, it was wrong to overlook the [927] results achieved by other States in the struggle for human rights.

Instead of article 20 as drafted in the text, the USSR delegation proposed the insertion of another article which would declare the inalienable right of every person freely to express and disseminate democratic views. The representative of the United Kingdom had made comments, at the 181st plenary meeting, with regard to the defence of freedom without any limitations, even including freedom to indulge in fascist propaganda. Such remarks did not allow honest and honourable people to engage in controversy with the representative of the United Kingdom. He had argued that the Soviet amendments had been rejected because they limited freedom. The USSR delegation had clearly stated that the only limitation to freedom that it required was the limitation of fascist propaganda and fascist activities. It did not ask for the limitation of the propaganda and activities of any social organization save fascist ones. Fascist propaganda was a crime but to argue that the prevention of fascist propaganda was impossible from the point of view of the principles of complete freedom was tantamount to applying the same attitude to laws which restrained the activities of various types of criminals, murderers, thieves, rogues, etc. Discussions carried on in that spirit were surely out of place in the Assembly.

The USSR delegation also proposed that certain changes should be made in article 22, replacing the text as given in the draft by a new text which would state that every citizen of any State without distinction as to race, colour, nationality, birth, property status, social origin, language, religion, or sex, should have the right to participate in the government of his country. It was not enough merely to refer to the right of everyone to take part in the government of his country. It was necessary to state that he also had the right to elect persons and be elected to all organs of authority and that, not only on the basis of universal, equal and secret suffrage but on the basis of direct suffrage which was the only democratic procedure. It was essential to state explicitly, that every citizen of any State must have the right, equally with other citizens, of access to any State or public office in his country. All those provisions were omitted in article 22. It was consequently impossible to expect that those who had taken up a different position in matters of principle would agree to an article so drafted.

The USSR delegation furthermore proposed to add a new article to follow article 30 and reading as follows:

“The human and civic rights and fundamental freedoms enumerated in the present Declaration shall be guaranteed by national laws. Any violation or limitation of these rights, whether direct or indirect, shall be deemed to violate the present Declaration and to be incompatible with the high principles proclaimed in the United Nations Charter.”

Why should objections be raised when the USSR delegation requested the inclusion of such an article in the declaration? That proposed article was self-explanatory, it required that the fundamental rights and freedoms of the individual and citizen should be guaranteed by the laws of the State; it stated that any violation or limitation of those rights, whether direct or indirect, should be deemed to violate the present declaration and to be incompatible with the high principles proclaimed in the United Nations Charter. Such an article was wholly in harmony with the principles of the Charter.

Those were therefore the essential points of principle which ought to be included in the declaration of human rights in order that it might satisfy the desires of millions and millions of simple persons, the desires of all peace-loving peoples, to see fundamental freedoms established and made secure as well as the right of men to democracy and progress, to peace and security. The USSR delegation was convinced that without those amendments the draft declaration of human rights would remain incomplete and unsatisfactory and would therefore not attain that aim which it was called upon to serve in accordance with the standards applicable to a document issued on behalf of the United Nations.

There was one question which had been raised in the course of the debate and which did not seem to him to be a theoretical question, although it had been presented on that level. He referred to the tendency which, it was alleged, had prompted the USSR delegation to submit those proposals.

It had been stated that the USSR wished to subordinate the individual to the State, making of the individual some sort of cog in the powerful, indeed the all-powerful State on the lines of Hobbes' Leviathan. Those were hollow arguments which merely went to prove that those who used them did so with insufficient understanding and inadequate analysis of the real meaning of what they had allowed themselves to say about the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. They had evidently forgotten that the contradiction between the State and the individual was a phenomenon which had occurred, in [929] history, when society had been divided into rival classes. Wherever society was so divided, the ruling class controlled the machinery of government. In such societies the State had become the tool of the ruling classes whose aims and interests were contrary to those of all the other classes. There the State did indeed seek to rule over the individual whose interests were in conflict with its own.

Circumstances were wholly different in a society where there were no rival classes. That was indeed natural, for in such a society, there could not be any contradiction between the government and the individual since the government was in fact the collective individual. That contradiction was eliminated when a society reached the stage when it was no longer divided into classes conflicting with each other, the class of the exploiter and the class of the exploited.

Therefore the problem of the State and the individual, in its historical sense, did not exist. History had already solved that problem in his country. The State and the individual were in harmony with each other; their interests coincided. That relationship was expressed in the formula of which all progressive persons were justly proud: "the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics is the socialist State of workers and peasants". That formula indicated that in their State, the problem of contradiction between the State and the individual did not exist in the form in which it had prevailed at all stages of society's historical development when it was divided into classes: feudal, bourgeois, capitalist and the contemporary socialist-capitalist State. They wished to see other States move closer to that noble ideal which had already been attained in one-sixth of the world.

Two opposing tendencies had certainly been rejected throughout the preparation of the draft declaration. The first tendency was that of the defence of the principle of democracy and the securing of peace. With that purpose in mind fascism and fascist racial activities had to be eliminated. The other tendency was that of reaction and aggression, supporting and using all reactionary forces, including even fascism and nazism. The conflict between those two tendencies had been reflected in the work of the Third Committee and was responsible for the opposition which had been shown, in that Committee, to the proposals of those delegations which worked for democracy and progress and against reaction and aggression.

THE PRESIDENT stated that the discussion was closed and that the General Assembly would proceed to the vote.

He would first submit to the vote the USSR draft resolution (A/785/Rev.2). If that pro-[930]posal were rejected he would put each of the five amendments to the vote; four had been submitted by the Soviet Union and one by the United Kingdom delegation. Finally, he would put the text of the draft declaration to the vote either as it stood or in its amended form.

MR. VYSHINSKY (Union of Soviet Socialist Republics) stated that the USSR delegation had not requested that the resolution submitted by it should be put to the vote by roll-call.

THE PRESIDENT next asked the Assembly to vote on the text proposed by the Third Committee.

MR. KATZ-SUCHY (Poland) requested that the draft universal declaration of human rights be put to the vote article by article.

THE PRESIDENT recalled that it was only the United Kingdom amendment which had been adopted and that he would put the draft declaration to the vote including that amendment.

The draft universal declaration of human rights consisted of a preamble and 31 articles. He would put the declaration to the vote article by article. He wished to know whether the Assembly wished to vote on the preamble as a whole or to take a separate vote on each of the seven recitals of the preamble.

MR. KATZ-SUCHY (Poland) asked that a separate vote be taken on each recital of the preamble.

The first recital of the preamble was adopted, with 2 abstentions.

THE PRESIDENT stated that he would then put to the vote by roll-call the draft universal declaration of human rights as a whole including the United Kingdom amendment previously adopted. He added that, as a result of the deletion of article 3, the articles in the final text of the declaration would have to be renumbered.

A vote was taken by roll-call as follows.

The President said that the adoption of that very important Declaration by a big majority without any direct opposition was a remarkable achievement. The General Assembly and the Security Council had both been subjected to a great deal of criticism which was mainly due to the fact that far more attention was being paid to the political activities of the United Nations in the Security Council and the Assembly than to the field of social, humanitarian and cultural activities to which the present achievement belonged. As had been pointed out, however, the Declaration only marked a first step since it was not a convention by which States would be bound to carry out and give effect to the fundamental human rights; nor would it provide for enforcement; yet it was a step forward in a great evolutionary process. It was the first occasion on which the organized community of nations had made a declaration of human rights and fundamental freedoms. That document was backed by the authority of the body of opinion of the United Nations as a whole and millions of people, men, women and children all over the world, would turn to it for help, guidance and inspiration.

He wished to congratulate those who had worked so zealously and so long to achieve that result. It was particularly fitting that there should be present, on that occasion, the person who, with the assistance of many others, had played a leading role in that work, the person who had raised to even greater heights even so great a name: Mrs. Roosevelt, the representative of the United States of America. He did not wish to mention everyone by name: Dr. Malik, representative of Lebanon, the Vice-Chairman and all the other members of the Committee who had laboured incessantly in a domain to which practically no attention was being paid by those who criticized the United Nations.

In the political field, in the committees concerned with political work, disputes and troubles occurred, but, as the vote just recorded had shown, there was a wide area of agreement in the social field. If that work were carried through progressively it would gradually result in bringing to an end many of the political differences which divided the Members of the United Nations. He felt it to be a great honour to have been present when that vote had been recorded and congratulated all those concerned in the result.

[935]

He would now put to the vote resolution B relating to the right of petition (A/777).
